i) a Judge is a party to the case, or has a financial or proprietary interest in the outcome of a case, or if the Judge’s decision will lead to the promotion of a cause in which he or she is involved, together with one of the parties. Under these circumstances, a Judge’s disqualification from the case is automatic; or ii) the circumstances would lead a reasonable observer, properly informed, to reasonably apprehend bias.’³⁰²

The ICC may develop its own legal standard according to the established practice of these judicial bodies and adjust it to its procedure which is certainly quite distinct in nature.

²⁹³ Demicoli v. Malta, Application No. 13057/87, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 August 1991, para. 40.

²⁹⁴ De Cubber v. Belgium, Application No. 9186/80, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 26 October 1984, para. 25.

²⁹⁵ Hauschildt v. Denmark, Application No. 10486/83, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 24 May 1989, para. 47.

²⁹⁶ Kyprianou v. Cyprus, Application No. 73797/01, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 15 December 2005, para. 119.

²⁹⁷ Valentina Marin v. Romania, Application No. 47448/13, ECtHR, Decision of 2 September 2014, para. 22; Langborger v. Sweden, Application No. 11179/84, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 22 June 1989, para. 32.

²⁹⁸ Warsicka v. Poland, Application No. 2065/03, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 16 January 2007, para. 37.

²⁹⁹ Morel v. France, Application No. 34130/96, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 6 June 2000, para. 42; Ferarantelli and Santangelo v. Italy, Application No. 19874/92, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 7 August 1996, para. 58.

³⁰⁰ See, inter alia, Fehr v. Austria, Application No. 19247/02, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and just Satisfaction) of 3 February 2005, para. 30; Depiets v. France, Application No. 53971/00, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 10 February 2004, para. 35.

³⁰¹ Micallef v. Malta, Application No. 17056/06, ECtHR, Judgment of 15 October 2009, para. 95.

³⁰² Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 21 July 2000, <<https://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/c96f8e/>> accessed 7 March 2015, para. 189; for further details on the test, see, El Zeidy, in: Klip and Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, xix (Hart Publisher 2010) 280.

III. Paragraph 3: Collapse or unavailability of the national judicial system

- 74 When determining the inability of the State to investigate or prosecute in a particular case, the ICC shall consider whether, due to a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of its national judicial system, the State is unable to obtain either the accused or the necessary evidence and testimony or otherwise carry out the proceedings. Situations such as ‘Somalia, lacking a central government, or a state of chaos due to a civil war or natural disasters, or any other event which leads to public disorder’³⁰³ were contemplated. When the Rome Statute was being drafted, the proposed complementarity mechanism was harshly criticised by experienced international criminal law personalities such as the Prosecutor of the ad hoc tribunals. Louise Arbour argued essentially that the regime would work in favour of rich, developed countries and against poor countries. Although the Court’s Prosecutor might easily make the claim that a justice system in an underdeveloped country was ineffective and therefore ‘unable’ to proceed, essentially for reasons of poverty, the difficulties involved in challenging a State with a sophisticated and functional justice system would be virtually insurmountable. It was feared that there was a danger that the provisions of article 17 would become a tool for overly harsh assessments of the judicial machinery in developing countries.
- 75 However, the current practice before the Court does not seem to be heading in that direction. Pre-Trial Chamber I’s acknowledgement of the revival of the justice system in Ituri in 2005 is a welcome development in this respect.³⁰⁴ In Lubanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I ruling on the request for issuing a warrant of arrest against the suspect corrected the Prosecutor’s position regarding the capacity of the Congolese justice system to carry out domestic proceedings. It noted the fact that Lubanga had been detained for nearly a year, and that proceedings were underway against him before national courts, which indicated that the Prosecutor’s position ‘that the DRC national justice system continues to be unable in the sense of article 17(1)(a) to (c) and (3), of the Statute does not wholly correspond to the reality any longer’.³⁰⁵ The Chamber still issued the warrant of arrest despite the Chamber’s acknowledgment of the DRC’s improved capacity to proceed because the State had not been investigating the same case as before the Court, and thus, there remained a situation of inactivity.

In the Situation in Central African Republic, the Prosecutor explained a rather lengthy delay between referral and his decision to initiate an investigation arguing that there was uncertainty about whether or not the State concerned was able to prosecute.³⁰⁶ Several years later, Trial Chamber III noted two decisions issued by the Bangui Court of Appeal and the Cour de Cassation, the country’s highest judicial body, ‘describing the court’s inability to undertake [the proceedings before the Court]’.³⁰⁷ The same Chamber also noted the position of the CAR representative who ‘stressed that [...] the presence of the MLC militia on the territory of CAR, as well as the areas of conflict, ma[d]e it impossible, given the security considerations, to organise and hold a trial against Mr Bemba on the territory of the CAR’.³⁰⁸ In a more recent development in the situation of Mali referred to the Court on ³⁰³ Arsanjani, in: von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court (1999) 57, 70.

³⁰⁴ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 36.

³⁰⁵ Ibid.

³⁰⁶ Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-7, Prosecution’s Report Pursuant to Pre-Trial Chamber III’s 30 November 2006 Decision Requesting Information on the Status of the Preliminary Examination of the Situation in the Central African Republic, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 December 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1dd66a/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras 9 and 12–20.

³⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 June 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/a5de24/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras. 134, 245.

³⁰⁸ Ibid.

18 July 2012, the Malian authorities indicated to the Prosecutor that the 'Malian courts were, following the withdrawal of the judicial services from the northern cities, unable to prosecute crimes allegedly committed by armed groups in Mali'.³⁰⁹ The Prosecutor has decided to open an investigation into alleged crimes committed on the territory of Mali since January 2012. Arguably the Prosecutor has done so mainly on the basis of the fact that, inter alia, 'no judicial proceedings have been instituted'³¹⁰ and that 'no other State with jurisdiction is conducting or has conducted national proceedings'.³¹¹ In all of these situations referred to the Court, it was these States initially acknowledging their lack of ability to carry out proceedings related to these situations rather than the Court. This suggests that at least the practice of the Court in relation to under developed countries has been so far moderate, despite the conclusions reached by Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case.³¹²

Article 17(3) sets out a number of scenarios whereby the Court can make a finding on the admissibility of the case on the basis of this criterion. To determine inability 'the Court shall consider whether, due to a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of its national judicial system, the State is unable to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence and testimony or otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings'.³¹³ Unlike the notion of unwillingness, the test of inability is much less subjective and rather inspired by elements of objectivity. The test has nothing to do, for instance, with determining the intentions of a State to shield a person from criminal responsibility. Rather, the test quite often relies on more straightforward facts revealing whether the State is actually in a position to conduct domestic proceedings in relation to a particular situation/case. This is clear from the scenarios provided in this provision such as the inability: 1) to obtain the accused; 2) to obtain the necessary evidence; or 3) to obtain the necessary testimony. Since the inability of the State could be the result of different reasons, the drafters of the Statute desired to close any gap and therefore added the phrase 'or otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings'. This latter insertion was intended to serve as a catch all clause for those situations which were not envisaged.³¹⁴ For the Court to make a finding on the inadmissibility of the case on this ground, it is not sufficient to show, for instance, that the State cannot obtain the accused. Rather it must be shown that the inability to obtain the accused was due to either a 'total or substantial collapse' of the State's 'national justice system' or its 'unavailability'. So far, the Court has been cautious to make any judicial pronouncement regarding a 'total or substantial collapse' of any State's judicial system. Libya, for example, could currently represent a scenario of failed State³¹⁵. Logically, such failure signals a sort of collapse in the organs of the State including its national judicial system. As observed by Prof. Crawford, 'failed State would seem to encompass various instances of governmental crisis and breakdown'.³¹⁶ It resembles a situation of 'State collapse [...] where the structure, authority (legitimate power), law, and political order have fallen apart and must be reconstituted in some form, old or new'.³¹⁷ It also reveals that 'a state's fundamental institutions have so deteriorated that it needs long-term external help, not to ³⁰⁹ Situation in Mali: Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013, para. 137; Also Referral Letter by the Government of Mali, 13 July 2012 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/situations%20and%20cases/situations/icc0112/Pages/situation%20index.aspx> accessed 6 March 2015.

³¹⁰ Ibid., para. 138.

³¹¹ Ibid., para. 140.

³¹² See mn 77–79.

³¹³ Rome Statute, article 17(3). For a detailed discussion on the legal interpretation of the different elements of article 17(3), see El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008) 223 et seq.

³¹⁴ Ibid. 223–224.

³¹⁵ Engel, A., 'Libya As A Failed State: Causes, Consequences, Options', The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Number 24-November 2014, p. 1, available at, http://www.washingtoninstitute.org/uploads/Documents/pubs/ResearchNote24_Engel-3.pdf.

³¹⁶ Crawford, J., The Creation of States in International Law, 2nd ed., (OUP 2006) 720.

³¹⁷ Ibid.; Zartman, W. I., 'Introduction: Posing the Problem of State Collapse', in Zartman(ed.), Collapsed States: The Disintegration and Restoration of Legitimate Authority (Rienner 1995) 1.

institutionalized foreign control but to create stronger domestic institutions capable of self-government'.³¹⁸ Nevertheless, what matters for the purpose of article 17(3) is the impact of such failure or the extent of the collapse on the actual operation of the national judicial system and on those relevant organs involved in the national proceedings. At least a 'substantial collapse' of the national judicial system is required to meet the threshold of article 17(3). This entails a collapse "of such intensity [which] affects a significant or considerable part of the domestic justice system – a degree of intensity that is sufficient to paralyze the system in fulfilling its functions regarding investigation, prosecution, trial and execution of sentence".³¹⁹ Maybe the collapse of such nature was not that clear when the Court ruled on the two admissibility challenges against Saif Al-Islam and Al-Senussi. However, nowadays there is a clear change of circumstance and it is for the Prosecutor to make an assessment as to whether the available information supports a finding that the present situation in Libya is of such an intensity that affects the proper functioning of its national justice system. Despite the apparent existence of new facts, the Prosecutor has not so far requested a review of the 11 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision pursuant to article 19(10) of the Statute.³²⁰

77 Be it as it may, relying on the element of 'unavailability' of the State's national judicial system instead of its collapse has been the prevailing trend before the Court in its jurisprudence on inability. In the 24 June 2010 Bemba Decision,³²¹ Trial Chamber III considered, inter alia, the decision of the Cour de Cassation referred to above, the difficulty in securing the presence of Bemba due to his 'alleged power', the lack of necessary protective measures for witnesses, the 'complexity and the extent of the prosecution case', the expected lengthy duration of proceedings and the limited 'judicial services' available, and concluded that the 'national judicial system [in] CAR [was] unavailable [...] to handle these proceedings' (emphasis added).³²² Although the Chamber could have also relied on alternative elements of inability such as the inability to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence, it has not done so. This is understandable given that there were various reasons which impeded the national authorities from carrying out the national process. The Chamber apparently relied on the broader phrase 'otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings', in order to capture the wide range of problems facing the country. In a more recent and elaborate decision on inability (the 31 May 2013 Gaddafi Decision), Pre-Trial Chamber I found that Libya was neither able to secure the accused or obtain the necessary testimony, nor otherwise able to carry out the proceedings against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi. The Chamber's finding was linked to the unavailability of the Libyan justice system.³²³ According to the Chamber, Libya 'continued to face substantial difficulties in exercising its judicial powers fully across the entire territory. Due to these difficulties, [...] its national system

³¹⁸ Clarke, W., Herbst, J., 'Somalia and the Future of Humanitarian Intervention', (1996) 75 Foreign Affairs 84.

³¹⁹ See also, El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008) 224–226.

³²⁰ Rome Statute, article 19(10); rule 62 of the RPE. However, see Ninth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970(2011), para. 16 (noting that on the basis of the Prosecutor's access to the data regarding the national proceedings against Al-Senussi, the information obtained from the United Nations Support Mission in Libya, the Libyan Prosecutor General's office, and from independent civil society, she concluded that her office 'is not in possession of new facts that would fully satisfy [...] that the basis on which the case against Mr Al-Senussi had previously been found inadmissible before the ICC has been negated').

³²¹ Although in this decision Trial Chamber III failed to provide a legal interpretation to the different constituent elements of article 17(3), it still relied on this provision from a purely factual perspective to arrive at its conclusion.

³²² Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 June 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/a5de24/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras 245–246.

³²³ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-344-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 31 May 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/339ee2/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 205.

cannot yet be applied in full in areas or aspects relevant to the case, being thus ‘unavailable’ within the terms of article 17(3) of the Statute’.³²⁴

With respect to the inability to obtain the accused, there were several allegations by the Libyan government that the suspect will be transferred from his place of detention under the custody of a militia in Zintan.³²⁵ However, the Libyan authorities failed to secure such transfer to Tripoli,³²⁶ where his trial should have been conducted. As such, the Chamber considered that this is a form of inability to obtain the accused within the meaning of article 17(3) of the Statute.³²⁷ Also, the failure of the central government to conduct interviews with two witnesses held in detention, beyond the reach of the Libyan authorities was a factor in determining that Libya was unable to obtain the necessary testimony as provided in article 17(3).³²⁸ The same holds true with respect to the lack of witness protection programmes, which was another indication for the Chamber that Libya lacked the means to protect witnesses who agreed to testify.³²⁹ Further, the lack of independent legal representation for the suspect by way of securing a qualified lawyer to defend the suspect throughout the proceedings was an indication that Libya was ‘otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings’.³³⁰ This was due to the fact that the lack of a counsel constituted a bar to the conduct of a trial, which in effect meant that Libya was unable to carry out its national proceedings against the suspect.

By contrast, in the 11 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision, the same Chamber did not consider that the lack of witness protection programmes and absence of control by the central government over certain ‘detention facilities’ constituted inability. Instead, the Chamber believed that these factors were decisive only in the 31 May 2013 Gaddafi Decision as they ‘prevent[ed] Libya from obtaining “the necessary evidence and testimony”’.³³¹ This was not the case in the 11 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision where Libya managed to gather ‘a considerable amount of evidence’ against the suspect despite the security concerns or lack of governmental control in relation to some prisons.³³² Thus, according to this precedent, the decisive factor in making a ruling on the State’s inability is whether the domestic proceedings have been ‘prejudiced’ by the existence of security challenges.³³³ In the context of the Al-Senussi case, the Chamber considered that the overall progressive steps undertaken in relation to the judicial proceedings against him ‘[did] not result in Libya’s inability genuinely to carry out its proceedings’.³³⁴ This indicates that a determination of inability should not be conducted in the abstract and thus it requires a case-by-case assessment.

³²⁴ Ibid.

³²⁵ Ibid. para. 206.

³²⁶ Ibid. paras. 206–207.

³²⁷ Ibid. para. 208.

³²⁸ Ibid. para. 210.

³²⁹ Ibid. para. 211.

³³⁰ Ibid. paras. 213–214.

³³¹ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 297.

³³² Ibid. para. 298.

³³³ Ibid. paras. 299–301.

³³⁴ Ibid. paras. 301 and 303.

Article 18

Preliminary rulings regarding admissibility

1. When a situation has been referred to the Court pursuant to article 13 (a) and the Prosecutor has determined that there would be a reasonable basis to commence an investigation, or the Prosecutor initiates an investigation pursuant to articles 13 (c) and 15, the Prosecutor shall notify all States Parties and those States which, taking into account the information available, would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned. The Prosecutor may notify such States on a confidential basis and, where the Prosecutor believes it necessary to protect persons, prevent destruction of evidence or prevent the absconding of persons, may limit the scope of the information provided to States.

2. Within one month of receipt of that notification, a State may inform the Court that it is investigating or has investigated its nationals or others within its jurisdiction with respect to criminal acts which may constitute crimes referred to in article 5 and which relate to the information provided in the notification to States. At the request of that State, the Prosecutor shall defer to the State's investigation of those persons unless the Pre-Trial Chamber, on the application of the Prosecutor, decides to authorize the investigation.

3. The Prosecutor's deferral to a State's investigation shall be open to review by the Prosecutor six months after the date of deferral or at any time when there has been a significant change of circumstances based on the State's unwillingness or inability genuinely to carry out the investigation.

4. The State concerned or the Prosecutor may appeal to the Appeals Chamber against a ruling of the Pre-Trial Chamber, in accordance with article 82. The appeal may be heard on an expedited basis.

5. When the Prosecutor has deferred an investigation in accordance with paragraph 2, the Prosecutor may request that the State concerned periodically inform the Prosecutor of the progress of its investigations and any subsequent prosecutions. States Parties shall respond to such requests without undue delay.

6. Pending a ruling by the Pre-Trial Chamber, or at any time when the Prosecutor has deferred an investigation under this article, the Prosecutor may, on an exceptional basis, seek authority from the Pre-Trial Chamber to pursue necessary investigative steps for the purpose of preserving evidence where there is a unique opportunity to obtain important evidence or there is a significant risk that such evidence may not be subsequently available.

7. A State which has challenged a ruling of the Pre-Trial Chamber under this article may challenge the admissibility of a case under article 19 on the grounds of additional significant facts or significant change of circumstances.

Literature: John T. Holmes, Complementarity: National Courts versus the ICC, in: Antonio Cassese/Paola Gaeta/John R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary 667 (2002); id., Jurisdiction and Admissibility, in: Roy S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence 321 (2001); id., The Principle of Complementarity, in: Roy S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: the Making of the Rome Statute – Issues – Negotiations – Results 41 (1999); Héctor Olásolo, The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court (2005); Jann K. Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007); Mohamed M. El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008); Joe Stigen, The Relationship Between the International Criminal Court and National Jurisdictions: The Principle of Complementarity (2008); William A. Schabas, 'Article 18: Preliminary Rulings Regarding Admissibility/Décision préliminaire sur la recevabilité', in: The International Criminal Court: A Commentary On The Rome Statute 353 (2010); Joe Stigen, 'The Admissibility Procedures', in: Carsten Stahn/Mohamed El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: from Theory to Practice 503, Vol. I (2011); Silvain Sana, 'Article 18: Décision préliminaire sur la recevabilité', in Julian Fernandez/Xavier Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire Article par Article 711, Vol. I (2012).

A. Introduction

I. Historical developments and drafting history

This provision was first proposed for inclusion into the Statute as article 11*bis* during the last Preparatory Committee proceedings – less than four months before the Statute was finalised – at the urging of the United States¹. It was included in the Preparatory Committee Draft and repositioned as article 16 without substantive alteration². The ILC Draft³ did not contain anything like it, since it did not provide for an independent Prosecutor with the power to initiate investigations proprio motu. Under the ILC Draft, only States and the Security Council could trigger the jurisdiction of the Court⁴. It was only after it became apparent during the Preparatory Committee and the Rome Diplomatic Conference meetings that a majority of States favoured an independent Prosecutor with proprio motu powers, that the provision was introduced as a check on the Prosecutor's powers.

The drafters of the Statute recognized that States already had jurisdiction over the crimes that the ICC was being set up to try. They also recognized the advantages of national jurisdiction over that of the ICC⁵. So, unlike the drafters of the Statutes of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals who gave those Tribunals primacy over national courts, the drafters of the ICC Statute made the ICC's jurisdiction secondary or complementary to that of States⁶. States have a prior right to exercise that jurisdiction. As long as they are exercising it genuinely and effectively, the Court must defer to them. Thus where both a State and the Court have simultaneously asserted jurisdiction over the same situation or case, the Court must yield to State jurisdiction. But, under the ILC Draft, the earliest stage at which 'an interested State' could have asserted its jurisdiction and stopped the Court's involvement was at the post-investigation phase, after charges would have already been framed and proffered against a particular individual or individuals⁷. However, a number of States, notably the United States, favoured an arrangement where an interested State could stop the Court's involvement at an earlier stage. What eventually became article 18 was inserted at their insistence, as it would help them attain that desideratum⁸.

Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 contained five subsections. It applied to all the mechanisms by which the Court's jurisdiction could be triggered – State Party referral, UN Security Council referral or the Prosecutor acting proprio motu. Once the Prosecutor had determined that a sufficient basis existed to commence an investigation, a public announce-

¹ See Proposal submitted by the United States of America: Article 11 bis – Preliminary rulings regarding admissibility, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.3/DP.2 (25 Mar. 1998). This proposal was included as Article 11 bis in the Preparatory Committee's draft of Part 2 of the Statute: Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court – Part 2: Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law, UN Doc.A/AC.249/1998/CRP.8 (2 Apr. 1998), pp. 33–34.

² See Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court – Addendum: Part One – Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 (14 Apr. 1998), pp. 42–43.

³ See ILC Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, in Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-sixth Session (2 May – 22 July 1994), UN Doc.A/49/10 (1994), in: Yearbook of the International Law Commission 1994 – Volume II, Part Two (1997), UN Doc.A/CN.4/SER.A/1994/Add.1 (Part 2), pp. 26–74.

⁴ ILC Draft articles 21, 23, 25, Ibid., pp. 41–46.

⁵ See Report of the Ad hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc.A/50/22 (6 Sep. 1995), para. 31.

⁶ See paragraph 10 of the Preamble, as well as articles 1 and 17 of the Statute.

⁷ See ILC Draft article 35, supra note 3, p. 52, concerning 'Issues of admissibility' under which 'the accused' or 'an interested State' could challenge the admissibility of 'a case' already before the Court, on the ground, inter alia, that the case 'has been duly investigated' or is 'under investigation'.

⁸ See Statement of the US Delegation on Article 11*bis* – Preliminary Rulings Regarding Admissibility, UN Doc.A/AC.249/1998/WG.3/DP.2 (3 Apr. 1998). Generally see Bleich (1997) 13 NEP 230.

ment would follow and only States Parties would be formally notified. A State with jurisdiction would then have an undetermined number of days in which to inform the Court that it was investigating the same matter, and the Prosecutor would have to defer to that State upon its request ‘unless the Prosecutor determine[d] that there [was] a total or partial collapse or unavailability of the State’s national judicial system, or the State [was] unwilling or unable’ to carry out genuine investigations and prosecutions. Such a determination had to be confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber before an investigation could start. The relevant State could appeal the Pre-Trial Chamber’s confirmation but would need either a two-thirds majority or a unanimous Appeals Chamber bench in order to succeed. A deferral by the Prosecutor to a State’s investigation would be open to review by the Prosecutor at either a six month or one year interval and he or she could request periodic reports from that State on the progress of its investigations and prosecutions. States Parties would have to respond to such requests without undue delay. A challenge pursuant to Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 did not prejudice a State’s right to challenge the admissibility of a case pursuant to what is now article 19⁹.

- 4 Upon the introduction of Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 at the Diplomatic Conference, the United States representative posited that due to the support for the referral of overall situations to the Court by the UN Security Council, a State party, or the Prosecutor acting proprio motu, ‘it would [...] seem necessary to provide for a procedure, at the outset of a referral, which would recognize the ability of national judicial systems to investigate and prosecute the crimes concerned.’ Under the proposal, ‘the Prosecutor would be able to proceed immediately to conduct an independent investigation if, in the face of a challenge by a national judicial system, the Prosecutor could persuade the judge to allow him to do so.’ The proposed article ‘concerned an overall matter referred to the Court at an earlier stage, when no particular suspects had been identified’ and was intended to be consistent with (but independent from) what is now contained in article 19 paras. 2 and 4, where a State or the person concerned could challenge the admissibility of a concrete case relating to specific persons¹⁰.
- 5 The initial reaction of States to the Draft article 16 was mixed; some States supported it¹¹ or only parts of the article¹², others opposed it¹³ or expressed doubt¹⁴, while various other States awaited further clarifications before they would take a firm stance on the matter¹⁵.
- 6 The United States eventually submitted a revised version of Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 containing seven subsections¹⁶ which was incorporated into a Bureau discussion paper on jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law and was left open for further discussions; no alternative proposals for article 16 were provided to the delegates¹⁷. This version

⁹ Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 paras. 1–5.

¹⁰ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), para. 25 (Mr. Scheffer – United States of America).

¹¹ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), paras. 27 (Mr. Gonzalez Glavez – Mexico), 29 (Mr. Salinas – Chile), 33 (Mr. Bazel – Afghanistan); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.12 (23 Jun. 1998), paras. 2 (Mr. Nagamine – Japan), 3 (Ms. Cueto – Cuba), 5 (Mr. Effendi – Indonesia), 10 (subject to a reservation regarding the criteria for determining unwillingness) (Mr. Rama Rao – India), 22 (subject to improved drafting) (Mr. Bello – Nigeria), 40 (Mr. Niyomrerks – Thailand).

¹² UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), para. 47 (Ms. Le Fraper du Hellen – France); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.12 (23 Jun. 1998), para. 1 (Mr. Abdelkader Mahmud – Iraq).

¹³ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), paras. 28 (Mr. Wilmshurst – Belgium), 40 (Ms. Lehto – Finland), 43 (Mr. Yopez Martinez – Venezuela), 46 (Ms. Wyrozumska – Poland); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.12 (23 Jun. 1998), paras. 16 (Mr. Zellweger – Switzerland), 21 (Ms. Kolshus – Norway), 25 (Mr. Fadl – Sudan), 34 (Mr. Stillfried – Austria), 46 (Mr. Diaz Paniagua – Costa Rica).

¹⁴ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), paras. 34 (Ms. Wilmshurst – United Kingdom), 35 (Ms. Diop – Senegal); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.12 (23 Jun. 1998), paras. 13 (Mr. Nyasulu – Malawi), 26 (Mr. Politi – Italy), 35 (Mr. Minoves Triquell – Andorra), 36 (Ms. Wong – New Zealand).

¹⁵ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.11 (22 Jun. 1998), paras. 36 (Mr. Skillen – Australia), 38 (Mr. Syquia – The Philippines), 39 (Mr. Zimmermann – Germany), 41 (Ms. Vargas – Colombia), 42 (Mr. Nathan – Israel).

¹⁶ See Proposal submitted by the United States of America: Article 16 – Preliminary rulings regarding admissibility, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.25 (29 Jun. 1998).

¹⁷ See Bureau Discussion Paper: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 Jul. 1998), article 16 paras. 1–7.

dropped the requirement of a public announcement when the Prosecutor determined that a sufficient basis to commence an investigation existed, expanded the notification requirements of the Prosecutor to include ‘any non-States Parties that may have jurisdiction’ and permitted such notification on a confidential basis ‘to protect persons or prevent destruction of evidence’. It set a one-month deadline upon which a State could inform the Prosecutor that it was investigating the relevant matter. Additionally, the Prosecutor’s ability to review deferrals was set to six months after the date of the referral but was also expanded to any time where ‘significant change[s] of circumstances indicat[ed] that the State ha[d] become unwilling or unable to genuinely carry out the investigation.’ The Prosecutor could also seek the Pre-Trial Chamber’s permission, pending a ruling on his or her determination that a State was unwilling or unable to proceed with an investigation, to pursue investigative steps where a unique opportunity arose to obtain important evidence or where there was a significant risk that such evidence would subsequently become unavailable. The requirement of a two-thirds majority or a unanimous Appeals Chamber bench for a successful appeal of the Pre-Trial Chamber’s decision on the Prosecutor’s determination was dropped and the Prosecutor was also afforded the opportunity to appeal. Pending the outcome of an appeal, the Appeals Chamber could authorize the Prosecutor to proceed with an investigation¹⁸.

Some States were still not entirely convinced with the article or opposed it outright¹⁹, with some expressing the view that it imposed hurdles upon the functioning of the Court²⁰. Nevertheless, it received support from numerous other States²¹, particularly in light of the principle of complementarity and the Prosecutor being afforded proprio motu powers²², or that it would be more palatable upon further redrafting²³.

In light of further discussions, the article was again amended and presented as part of a larger Bureau proposal on articles relating to jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law²⁴. Significantly, this version dropped from within its ambit the trigger mechanism of a UN Security Council referral and altered the standard for the Prosecutor’s determination to commence an investigation from ‘sufficient basis’ to ‘reasonable basis’. While the Prosecutor’s notification obligation could still be effected on a confidential basis to States and non-States Parties, he or she could also ‘limit the scope of the information provided’ so as to protect persons, prevent destruction of evidence and additionally, to prevent the absconding of persons. Further, the Prosecutor’s ability to determine formally whether a State was unwilling or unable to investigate upon that State’s request for a deferral (subject to confirmation by the Pre-Trial Chamber) was changed. Now, authority had to be sought from the Pre-Trial Chamber in order for the Prosecutor to proceed with his or her

¹⁸ Ibid., article 16 paras. 1–6.

¹⁹ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.29 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 156 (Mr. Oumarmaiga – Mali), 178 (Ms. Kasyanju – Tanzania); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 13 (Mr. Onkelinx – Belgium), 70 (Ms. Daskalopoulou-Livada – Greece), 118 (Mr. Yañez-Barnuevo – Spain); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 17 (Mr. Ngatse – Congo), 25 (Ms. La Haye – Bosnia and Herzegovina), 43 (Mr. Pandler – Hungary).

²⁰ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.29 (9 Jul. 1998), para. 66 (Mr. Dabor – Sierra Leone); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 (9 Jul. 1998), para. 17 (Mr. Robinson – Jamaica); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 (9 Jul. 1998), para. 38 (Ms. Plejić-Marković – Croatia).

²¹ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 31 (Mr. Bello – Nigeria), 34 (Ms. Shahen – Libyan Arab Jamahiriya), 78 (Mr. Effendi – Indonesia), 80 (Mr. Azoh-Mbi – Cameroon), 90 (Ms. Mekhemar – Egypt), 96 (Ms. Lehto – Finland), 104 (Mr. Güney – Turkey); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 11 (Mr. De Saram – Sri Lanka), 22 (Mr. Abdalla Ahmed – Iraq), 30 (Mr. Hadi – United Arab Emirates).

²² UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.29 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 102 (Mr. Wenaweser – Liechtenstein), 145 (Mr. Ivan – Romania), 186 (Mr. Kaul – Germany); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 (9 Jul. 1998), para. 24 (Mr. Hafner – Austria); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 29 (Mr. Nega – Ethiopia), 42 (Mr. Mirzaee Yengejeh – Iran).

²³ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.29 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 123 (Mr. Rwelamira – South Africa), 161 (Mr. Al Hussein – Jordan); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 62 (Mr. Krokmal – Ukraine), 123 (Mr. Politi – Italy); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 (9 Jul. 1998), paras. 19 (Mr. Mahmood – Pakistan), 37 (Mr. Gonzalez Galvez – Mexico).

²⁴ See Bureau Proposal: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 Jul. 1998), article 16 paras. 1–7.

investigation (rather than the Chamber confirming (or not) the Prosecutor's determination). The Prosecutor could still defer to a State's investigation if the State with jurisdiction was not notified by the Prosecutor of his or her determination or if the State failed to inform the Prosecutor of its investigation within the one-month deadline. Pre-Trial Chamber oversight was also added to the Prosecutor's review of deferrals upon significant changes in the State's willingness and ability to genuinely investigate. However, where the State concerned failed to provide information to the Prosecutor on the progress of its investigations and/or prosecutions, the Prosecutor could seek a ruling from the Pre-Trial Chamber on the State's unwillingness or inability to carry out such actions²⁵.

- 9 While the amended article 16 still provoked some opposition among States, such opposition was noticeably less than that to previous versions²⁶. Instead, States either supported the provision as presented²⁷, or expressed reservations as to its drafting (rather than opposing the article as a whole)²⁸, with States again stressing complementarity and its utility as a check on the Prosecutor's proprio motu powers²⁹. Further behind the scenes negotiations and redrafting ensued, eventually leading to the article's text as it presently appears in the Statute and to the repositioning into its final resting place as article 18³⁰. It was adopted together with other provisions on jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law the following evening by the Committee of the Whole³¹ and approved as part of the final Statute that same evening³².

II. Purpose

- 10 This provision serves four principal purposes. First, it underscores the primary responsibility and right of States Parties to investigate and prosecute crimes within the Court's jurisdiction. As sovereign States they have a right to prosecute and punish crimes that take place on their territory or otherwise fall within their jurisdiction. They also have a duty as members of the family of nations to investigate and prosecute those crimes. In a sense, then, the provision aims at giving them 'the right to act first', *Recht des ersten Zugriffs*³³. Second, the provision enables States to assert their superior jurisdiction at an early stage, before the Prosecutor gets involved through investigations where, '[o]ften[] no individual suspects will have been identified [...], nor will the exact conduct nor its legal classification be clear.'³⁴

²⁵ Ibid., article 16 paras. 1–5. It is worth noting in this context that the records do not appear to show specific discussions among States that would shed light on the reason(s) why the UN Security Council trigger mechanism was dropped from article 16 para. 1.

²⁶ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.33 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 21 (Mr. Caflisch – Switzerland), 85 (Ms. Plejić-Marković (Croatia)); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 58 (Mr. Rwelamira – South Africa), 100 (Ms. Wyrozumska – Poland).

²⁷ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 52 (Mr. Güney – Turkey), 84 (Mr. Panin – Russian Federation); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.35 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 36 (Mr. Effendi – Indonesia), 65 (Mr. Al Adhami – Iraq), 75 (Mr. Pandler – Hungary).

²⁸ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.33 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 67 (Mr. Asamoah – Ghana), 72 (but reserving its position on the article) (Mr. Westdickenberg – Germany); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 30 (Mr. Van Boven – The Netherlands), 37 (Mr. Yañez-Barnuevo – Spain), 113 (Mr. Gonzalez Galvez – Mexico); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.35 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 13 (Mr. Bello – Nigeria), 43 (Mr. Rodriguez Cedeño – Venezuela), 55 (Mr. Mahmood – Pakistan), 74 (Mr. Da Costa Lobo – Portugal); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.36 (13 Jul. 1998), para. 39 (Mr. Minoves Triquell – Andorra).

²⁹ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 8 (Mr. Saland – Sweden), 90 (Mr. Vergne Saboia – Brazil); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.35 (13 Jul. 1998), paras. 17 (Mr. Politi – Italy), 32 (Mr. Bouguetaia – Algeria), 48 (Mr. Manongi – Tanzania), 52 (Mr. Wenaweser – Liechtenstein), 82 (Ms. O'Donoghue – Ireland), 85 (Ms. Skelemani – Botswana).

³⁰ See Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.2 (16 Jul. 1998), article 18 paras. 1–7.

³¹ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.42 (17 Jul. 1998), paras. 35–36.

³² UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.9 (17 Jul. 1998), paras. 8–10.

³³ See Ambos (1997) 53 RevICommJurists 45.

³⁴ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., Case No. ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Third, it ensures that the Prosecutor, in the exercise of his or her discretionary powers, is accountable to some superior authority. Some States, accustomed to a prosecutor who, under their national systems, is accountable to some higher authority (such as the Minister of the Interior and ultimately Parliament) were wary of an international Prosecutor who was accountable to nobody. They feared that their national sovereignty might be compromised by decisions of a lone individual who, under the guise of investigations, might have other hidden political agendas or ulterior motives aimed at embarrassing targeted States. The provision serves to allay these fears via the involvement of the Pre-Trial Chamber, composed as it is of independent judges from different nations and legal systems. The Chamber helps check what some States perceived as a 'loose cannon' Prosecutor with unbridled powers by vesting it with the power to grant or to withhold authorization for his or her investigations. Fourth, the involvement of the Chamber at such an early stage of the proceedings also serves to protect the Prosecutor from unfounded accusations of bias and from political manipulations on the part of some powerful States. This is all the more important since any State Party may refer a situation in another State Party to the Prosecutor for investigation and prosecution³⁵. However, as of 31 May 2015, there have been no public decisions issued by the Court pursuant to article 18 proceedings.

III. Scope

Article 18 applies only when the Prosecutor is acting in response to a referral by a State Party under article 13 para. (a) or when he or she is acting on his or her own initiative under articles 13 para. (c) or 15 (which can also be exercised subsequent to an ad hoc declaration under article 12 para. 3³⁶). The article does not apply where the Prosecutor is acting in response to a referral by the Security Council, under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter³⁷. While the travaux préparatoires reveal that article 18 was not so originally restricted³⁸, it remains unclear exactly why Security Council referrals were removed from within its scope³⁹. However, it should be noted that the Council has primacy in matters involving international peace and security. Its decisions are binding on all States. Judicial proceedings are among the measures that it may opt for as a means of maintaining or restoring international peace and security. Once it has opted for and sanctioned such measures, there is no need for the Prosecutor to seek and obtain any further authorization from the Pre-Trial Chamber or from any other authority. The Prosecutor must forthwith proceed to investigate the situation referred to him or her under article 13 para. (b) of the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 38; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., Case No. ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 39.

³⁵ See article 13 para. (a).

³⁶ See for example, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Case No. ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 Nov. 2011 (where the Prosecutor sought authorization from the Pre-Trial Chamber to exercise his proprio motu powers to commence an investigation into the situation in Côte d'Ivoire's following that State's article 12 para. 3 declaration).

³⁷ See article 13 para. (b).

³⁸ See Proposal submitted by the United States of America: Article 11 bis – Preliminary rulings regarding admissibility, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.3/DP.2 (25 Mar. 1998), article 11 bis para. 1; Preparatory Committee Draft article 16 para. 1; Proposal submitted by the United States of America: Article 16 – Preliminary rulings regarding admissibility, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.25 (29 Jun. 1998), article 16 para. 1; Bureau Discussion Paper: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 Jul. 1998), article 16 para. 1; supra notes 1, 9, 16, 17.

³⁹ See Bureau Proposal: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 Jul. 1998), article 16 para. 1; supra notes 24, 25.

Statute, unless he or she determines that there is no reasonable basis to proceed⁴⁰. If his or her findings so warrant, the Prosecutor must then commence the necessary criminal proceedings against the person(s) concerned. It should also be recalled that by virtue of rule 163 subrule 2, article 18 has no application to (article 70) offences against the administration of justice.

IV. Source of the rule

- 12 The rule requiring judicial authorization to commence criminal investigations appears to be novel. There would appear to be no precedent for it either in international law or national or comparative law. Generally speaking, most of the developed legal systems of the world do not assign a role to the judiciary at the initial stages of criminal investigations. The only time when the judiciary gets involved in the process is when the investigators seek its authorization to use coercive measures, such as arrest and detention, search and seizure, or wiretapping and surveillance. It is only when the investigations are under way or when they are over but before trial that the judiciary gets involved, usually to confirm the indictment or charges before the suspect can be arraigned. In confirming the indictment or charge, the judiciary seeks to establish that the indictment or charge discloses a prima facie case or einen hinreichenden Tatverdacht (sufficient suspicion). This role may be played by a Grand Jury, as in the United States; or by a magistrate at a preliminary hearing, as in many Commonwealth countries; or by a juge d'instruction (investigating judge) in France and other countries of the French civil law tradition; or by a Prosecution Review Board, as in Japan. The Statute and Rules of both the ICTY and the ICTR also require a judge to review an indictment and, if satisfied that it discloses a prima facie case, confirm it before an arrest warrant for the accused person named therein can be issued⁴¹.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. 'Situation'

- 13 Generally, a referral from a State Party should not be limited to specific cases, in the sense of an allegation against a named individual or individuals for having committed a specific crime or crimes. A situation includes a whole set of circumstances, such as a war, a conflict or any other untoward episode, in which one or more of the crimes within the Court's jurisdiction might have been committed⁴². The purpose of the Prosecutor's investigation is to find out what, if any, crimes have been committed in the situation and by whom. The practice of the Court so far tends to suggest that the referring State or the Security Council ⁴⁰ For example, on 31 March 2005 the Security Council, via Resolution 1583 (2005), referred the situation in the Darfur region of the Sudan to the ICC Prosecutor and on 6 June 2005 he announced 'that the statutory requirements for initiating an investigation were satisfied'. See ICC Press Release, The Prosecutor of the ICC Opens Investigation in Darfur, ICC-OTP-0606-104, 6 June 2005. Similarly, on 26 February 2011 the Security Council, via Resolution 1970 (2011), unanimously referred 'the situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya since 15 February 2011 to the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court.' On 3 March 2011, only 5 days after the referral, the Prosecutor announced that after a preliminary examination he had determined that an investigation was 'warranted'. See ICC Press Statement, ICC Prosecutor to Open an Investigation in Libya, 2 March 2011. This practice is now part of the ICC Prosecutor's policy on preliminary examinations where the Security Council refers situations to his or her office: ICC Prosecutor, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, paras. 73, 76, 80, 92, notes 53, 61.

⁴¹ Article 19 ICTY Statute and rule 47 ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence; article 18 ICTR Statute and rule 47 ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Generally see Nsereko, in: Klip and Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals Vol. IV (2002).

⁴² For other provisions referring to 'situation' see article 13 paras. a and b, article 14 para. 1, and 15, paras. 5 and 6.

have the power to define both the geographical and temporal scope of a 'situation' they refer to the Prosecutor. Thus, in the first referral by the Security Council, the Council limited the situation to the Darfur region of the Sudan⁴³, while its second referral the situation included the whole country of Libya⁴⁴. Regarding temporal limits, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Central African Republic fixed the dates of the situations they referred to be 'since 1 July 2002', the date when the Rome Statute came into force, across their entire territory⁴⁵. The Security Council similarly fixed 1 July 2002 as the starting date for the Darfur situation⁴⁶, and 15 February 2011 for the Libyan situation⁴⁷. However, the referral of particular parties in a given situation is viewed more cautiously. Thus, while the Ugandan referral spoke of the 'situation concerning the Lord's Resistance Army'⁴⁸, subsequent ICC documents have referred, additionally, to the territory of 'northern and western Uganda' together with the Prosecutor's conclusion that 'the scope of the referral encompasses all crimes committed in Northern Uganda in the context of the ongoing conflict involving the LRA'⁴⁹. Similar misgivings are to be expected when the Security Council specifically excludes persons from the ambit of the situations it refers to the ICC Prosecutor⁵⁰.

2. 'Reasonable basis'

The Prosecutor need not act on the allegations of a State Party (or a State that has accepted the Court's jurisdiction on an ad hoc basis) unless he or she is satisfied, after a preliminary examination, that there is 'a reasonable basis' to do so⁵¹. For this reason, therefore, any State that refers a situation to the Prosecutor must also furnish him or her with sufficient credible information to help him or her decide whether there is indeed substance in the allegations to justify him or her going forward with the matter⁵². This is equally true where the Prosecutor acts proprio motu on information received from sources mentioned in article 15 of the Statute. He or she must be satisfied that on the strength of such information there is 'a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation'⁵³. It must be stressed, though, that 'reasonable basis' is not the same as 'reasonable grounds to believe'. The latter is a higher

⁴³ Resolution 1593 (2005), 31 March 2005, para. 1.

⁴⁴ Resolution 1970 (2011), 26 February 2011, para. 4.

⁴⁵ See ICC Press Release, Prosecutor Receives Referral of the Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-OTP-20040419-50, 19 April 2004; ICC Press Release, Prosecutor Receives Referral Concerning Central African Republic, ICC-OTP-20050107-86, 7 January 2005.

⁴⁶ Supra note 43.

⁴⁷ Supra note 44.

⁴⁸ See ICC Press Release, President of Uganda Refers Situation Concerning the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC, ICC-20040129-44, 29 January 2004.

⁴⁹ Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 Sep. 2005, paras. 30–31; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, paras. 30–31; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-55, Warrant of Arrest for Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, paras. 18–19; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-56, Warrant of Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, paras. 20–21; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, paras. 18–19.

⁵⁰ See for example, supra note 43, para. 6 (where the Security Council purports to exclude 'nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is not a party to the Rome Statute'); supra note 44, para. 6 (where the Security Council purports to exclude 'nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a State outside the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which is not a party to the Rome Statute').

⁵¹ This is also true of referrals by the Security Council. See generally ICC Prosecutor, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, supra note 40.

⁵² With respect to a Security Council referral, all members of the United Nations are also duty bound under the UN Charter, depending on the terms of the referring resolution, to cooperate with the Prosecutor by way of furnishing information and other logistical or material support to enable him or her to execute his or her mandate under the referral. See article 25, UN Charter. In practice, however, the Security Council resolutions that referred the situations in the Darfur region of the Sudan and in Libya have simply 'urge[d]' UN member states to cooperate with the Court: supra note 43, para. 2; supra note 44, para. 5.

⁵³ See article 15 para. 3, article 53 para. 1.

standard that is used when issuing an arrest warrant or issuing a summons to appear⁵⁴ and is inappropriate at the pre-investigation stage⁵⁵.

3. 'shall notify all States Parties'

- 15 Where the Prosecutor decides that there is a reasonable basis for mounting an investigation, he or she must notify (1) 'all States Parties' and (2) 'those States which, taking into account the information available, would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned'.
- 16 The purpose of the notification would seem to be twofold: (1) to give information to the general assemblage of the States Parties; and (2) to put those States that otherwise have jurisdiction over the crimes involved on notice that the Prosecutor intends to initiate an investigation into the matter. In the second situation, the State concerned is given an opportunity either to assert its superior jurisdiction or to let the Prosecutor go forward with his or her investigation.
- 17 A question arises whether the Prosecutor has an obligation to notify States that are not Party to the Statute. The answer to the question turns on the meaning of the clause 'and those States which [...] would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned'. One possible construction of the clause is to limit it to States Parties, 'and [particularly] those States which [...] would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned'. Indeed these States are the only ones that are contractually entitled to know of the activities of the Prosecutor and have bound themselves under the complementarity principle to exercise jurisdiction. The other construction is to say that the clause refers to States that are not parties to the Statute⁵⁶. An example of a State that 'would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned' is one whose national commits one of the crimes within the Court's jurisdiction or the State on whose territory such a crime is committed. The view that the intention of the drafters was to include States that are not parties appears to be strengthened by the deliberate use of the conjunction 'and'. If, however, this was their intention, then why did they provide in paragraph 5 that 'States Parties shall respond to such requests without undue delay'? Does this not tend to suggest that their intention was to limit the application of article 18 to States Parties only? In any case, a State that is not a Party to the Statute cannot invoke its provisions to claim treatment similar to that accorded to States Parties. Light can be brought to bear on this ambiguity by reverting to the travaux préparatoires. Draft article 16 para. 1 (the precursor to what is now article 18 para. 1) made explicit reference to 'non-States Parties' in the Prosecutor's notification requirement.⁵⁷ However, this language was subsequently deleted⁵⁸. Although the records do now show ⁵⁴ See article 58 para. 1(a). This was the position taken by Pre-Trial Chambers II and III: Situation in Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 Mar. 2010, paras. 27–35; Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 Nov. 2011, para. 24.

⁵⁵ But see Ventura (2013) 12(1) The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals 49–80.

⁵⁶ This appears to be the view taken by the Office of the Prosecutor. See ICC Prosecutor, Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor, September 2003, p. 5: '[t]he exercise of the Prosecutor's functions under article 18 of notifying States of future investigations will alert States with jurisdiction to the possibility of taking action themselves. In a case where multiple States have jurisdiction over the crime in question the Prosecutor should consult with those States best able to exercise jurisdiction [...] with a view to ensuring that jurisdiction is taken by the State best able to do so.' See also Situation in Republic of Kenya, Case No. ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 Mar. 2010, para. 51.

⁵⁷ See Bureau Discussion Paper: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 Jul. 1998), article 16 para. 1; Bureau Proposal: Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 Jul. 1998), article 16 para. 1; supra notes 17, 18, 24, 25.

⁵⁸ See Part 2 – Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.2 (16 Jul. 1998), article 18 para. 1.

clearly the reason(s) for this removal, it could serve as an indication of the drafters' intention to exclude States that are not Parties to the Statute.

The Prosecutor determines the method of notification to States that are entitled to be so notified⁵⁹. As to what authorities in those States he or she must address the notification is a matter on which both the Statute and the Rules are silent. The Prosecutor will presumably address the notification to the authorities that the States Parties are required to designate for the purpose of receiving requests for cooperation⁶⁰.

According to the Rules, the notification must contain, at the very minimum, information about acts that may constitute crimes under the Statute⁶¹. This is necessary because it is that kind of information that enables the State to respond to the Prosecutor's notification appropriately. To this end, a State that considers the information insufficient is entitled to request the Prosecutor for additional information or for further and better particulars; but it does not affect the one-month time limit referred to in article 18 para. 2. The Prosecutor is obliged to respond to such a request 'on an expedited basis'⁶².

4. 'on a confidential basis'

The Prosecutor may notify the State(s) entitled to be notified of his or her intentions to commence investigations on a confidential basis. He or she may also decide to limit the scope of the information he or she provides to the relevant State(s). The purpose of such limitations is to ensure that the information does not fall into the wrong hands, which, as a result, may hurt innocent individuals, particularly potential witnesses and other information providers, or may destroy valuable evidence, or assist suspects and witnesses to abscond. How much information the Prosecutor is entitled to withhold from States is a matter on which both the Statute and the Rules are silent; it is one that is apparently left to the discretion and good judgment of the Prosecutor. A problem may, however, arise when a State requests the Prosecutor for additional information or for further and better particulars, as noted above, to enable it to decide whether to defer to the Prosecutor or to commence or facilitate its ongoing investigations. Would the Prosecutor be entitled to withhold the additional information or further and better particulars on account of the risks involved in furnishing it? For the sake of avoiding unnecessary conflict, it would be advisable for the Prosecutor and the State concerned to reach some amicable understanding under which the Prosecutor would furnish the State with some additional information on condition that the State keeps it confidential and ensures that it is not used to cause political disadvantages for States possibly involved, to hurt people, or to let others abscond or destroy evidence.

⁵⁹ The practice to date is to communicate the notification by way of a letter. See, for example, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-19, Decision to Hold Consultation under Rule 114, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 21 Apr. 2005, p. 2; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 Sep. 2005, para. 36; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 36; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-55, Warrant of Arrest for Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 24; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-56, Warrant of Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 24; Prosecutor v. Lubanga and Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Feb. 2006, para. 22(iii); Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, para. 17.

⁶⁰ See article 87 para. 1(a). Also see rules 176 and 177.

⁶¹ Rule 52 para. 1.

⁶² Ibid., para. 2.

II. Paragraph 2

1. ‘Within one month of receipt’

- 21 States that wish to forestall the Prosecutor’s investigations must respond within one month after receiving the notification. Given the urgency of the matter and the need to move fast before valuable evidence is destroyed or witnesses have disappeared, one month is deemed ample time within which States may respond⁶³. Since the precise time for a State to respond is prescribed, it behoves the Prosecutor to ensure that the notification is served personally on the State officials designated to receive it and that such officials issue receipts for it.

2. ‘a State may inform the Court’

- 22 Any State that receives the Prosecutor’s notification and otherwise has jurisdiction in the matter may respond to the Prosecutor’s notification. In its response, such a State may inform the Court that ‘it is investigating or has investigated its nationals or others within its jurisdiction with respect to criminal acts’ that might amount to crimes under the Statute. What if a State has not investigated the criminal acts alleged prior to receiving the Prosecutor’s notification but, prompted by the notification, now wishes to institute investigations into those acts? Is it precluded from requesting the Prosecutor to defer to its jurisdiction? It is submitted that it is not. The spirit and general tenor of the Statute is to give due deference to State jurisdiction. Thus a State that has not yet started investigations but is otherwise able and willing to do so must be given a chance to do so under article 18 para. 2. It is in this spirit that it may request for and the Prosecutor should furnish it with additional information to enable it to do so.
- 23 Where the Prosecutor decides to assert international jurisdiction upon receiving no responses or information from States that otherwise have jurisdiction, he or she should include the lack of response from States in the application for either authorization to investigate⁶⁴, or the issuance of an arrest warrant or, as the case may be, a summons to appear. That statement serves to inform the Pre-Trial Chamber that the Prosecutor has fulfilled his or her obligation under article 18, para. 1, and that the State concerned has been afforded the opportunity to assert its right to exercise jurisdiction but has declined, failed or neglected to do so⁶⁵.

⁶³ The Rules, ibid., explicitly provide that any request by a State for additional information ‘shall not affect the one-month time limit provided for in article 18, paragraph 2’.

⁶⁴ But see the comments of Pre-Trial Chamber II which could be read as suggesting that article 18 only applies upon the granting of authorization to the Prosecutor to investigate: ‘defining the scope of the potential case(s) at this stage may well serve an effective application of article 18 of the Statute, which is immediately applicable when a Pre-Trial Chamber authorises the commencement of an investigation [pursuant to the exercise of the Prosecutor’s proprio motu power].’ Situation in Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 Mar. 2010, para. 51 (emphasis added). The Prosecutor appears to have gone further and submitted that ‘such notification can only occur after an affirmative determination of the Chamber on the Prosecutor’s application [to commence a proprio motu investigation].’ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-3, Request for Authorisation of an Investigation Pursuant to Article 15, Office of the Prosecutor, 26 Nov. 2009, para. 113 (emphasis added); Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-3, Request for Authorisation of an Investigation Pursuant to Article 15, Office of the Prosecutor, 23 Jun. 2011, para. 180 (emphasis added).

⁶⁵ See Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-19, Decision to Hold Consultation under Rule 114, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 21 Apr. 2005, pp. 2–3; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 Sep. 2005, para. 36; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 36; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-55, Warrant of Arrest for Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 24; Situation in Uganda, Case No. ICC-02/04-01/05-56, Warrant of Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, Warrant

3. ‘the Prosecutor shall defer to the State’s investigation’

Along with the information that it is investigating or has investigated the possible crimes disclosed by the Prosecutor’s notification, a State may ‘request’ the Prosecutor to defer to its investigation. Such a State must, however, make the request in good faith and for genuine reasons, not merely for the purpose of stymieing the Prosecutor’s efforts or frustrating the ends of international justice. To ensure that the State is acting genuinely and in good faith, the Rules require that any State that requests the Prosecutor for deferral must do so in writing and must at the same time furnish the Prosecutor with information concerning its investigation⁶⁶. If the Prosecutor considers such information to be inadequate, he or she may ask that State for additional information⁶⁷. When the State complies, the Prosecutor must defer to the State’s investigation without any more ado, unless the Pre-Trial Chamber orders otherwise. In as much as the Prosecutor has no choice in the matter but to defer, the ‘request’ is really not a request. It is a demand or an assertion by the State of its right to primacy. This demand is predicated on the presumption that the State’s assertion and exercise of its jurisdiction is regular, fair and otherwise effective, until the contrary is proven. Where the State concerned does not respond at all to the Prosecutor’s notification or, if it does, it does not ‘request’ the Prosecutor to defer to its investigations, then the Prosecutor may go ahead with his or her investigations. In such a case it is conceivable that both the State and the Prosecutor may be simultaneously investigating the same matter. However, if the Prosecutor proceeds to file a case before the Court whilst the State’s investigations or proceedings are still pending, such a case may be ruled inadmissible by the Court under article 17 of the Statute, unless it is shown that it falls under one of the exceptions of that article.

4. ‘unless the Pre-Trial Chamber [...] decides to authorize the investigation’

The Pre-Trial Chamber, rather than the Trial Chamber, deals with the pre-trial phase of the cases before the Court⁶⁸. This arrangement helps to preserve the Trial Chamber’s independence and impartiality. The Pre-Trial Chamber was the price that the advocates of an effective and independent Prosecutor had to pay. The Chamber serves to counterbalance the Prosecutor’s proprio motu powers and to ensure accountability in the exercise of those powers.

Notwithstanding a State’s assertion of its right to primacy, the Chamber may, in the interests of international justice and on an application by the Prosecutor, override that right and authorize the Prosecutor to carry on with the investigations. Where the Prosecutor makes such an application⁶⁹, he or she must do so in writing and must set out ‘the basis for the application’. The Prosecutor must also furnish the Pre-Trial Chamber with the information concerning the investigations of the relevant State, which that State has provided to him or her when it requested the deferral⁷⁰. This information apprises the Chamber of the nature of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 24; Prosecutor v. Lubanga and Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx 2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Feb. 2006, para. 22(iii)-(iv); Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, para. 17. With regard to the Kenya Situation, the Kenyan Government did not inform the Prosecutor of any ongoing investigations and did not request the Prosecutor to defer to it, but instead indicated to him that he may apply for authorization to open an investigation. The Prosecutor applied for and obtained the Pre-Trial Chamber’s authorization to investigate. However, the Kenyan Government subsequently challenged the Court’s jurisdiction under article 19, para. 2(b). See Prosecutor v. Ruto, et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-19 and ICC-01/09-02/11-26, Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Government of Kenya, 31 Mar. 2011, para. 3.

⁶⁶ Rule 53.

⁶⁷ Ibid.

⁶⁸ See also articles 15, 39 and 57.

⁶⁹ Regulation 38 para. 1(b) limits such an application (and responses thereto) to no more than 100 pages.

⁷⁰ Rule 54 para. 1.

and extent of the State's investigations. Lastly, the Prosecutor must notify the relevant State of the application and provide it with a summary of the basis of such an application⁷¹. This notification enables the State to respond to or to oppose the application, if it so wishes.

- 27 In accord with the principle that he who asserts must prove, the Prosecutor bears the evidentiary and legal burden to prove by a preponderance of evidence that valid grounds exist to justify the Pre-Trial Chamber granting him or her the authority to carry out the investigations. It is suggested that that evidence must be cogent. This suggestion is predicated on complementarity, a fundamental principle of the ICC regime, which gives primacy to State jurisdiction. That primacy should not be overridden save on cogent or substantial grounds.
- 28 The issues of the admissibility of specific cases before the Court under article 17 are, to some extent, similar to those that confront the Pre-Trial Chamber on an application by the Prosecutor under article 18 para. 2 for authority to investigate. They both involve overriding a State's jurisdiction in favour of international jurisdiction. For that reason the Rules specifically require the Pre-Trial Chamber to consider, to the extent possible, 'the factors in article 17 in deciding whether to authorize an investigation'⁷². These factors include the State's unwillingness or inability genuinely to investigate. The Prosecutor may also rely on these factors, particularly as they are amplified under article 17 paras. 2–3, in his or her application before the Pre-Trial Chamber. In addition, pending the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision, the relevant State may postpone the execution of requests under Part IX (International cooperation and judicial assistance) as per article 95. However, the Appeals Chamber has held that article 95 has no application in article 19 appellate proceedings. Therefore, to be able to postpone such matters, a State must seek and obtain from the Appeals Chamber suspensive effect of the impugned decision⁷³. It would be odd if this were not likewise in the context of article 18.
- 29 The Rules leave it to the Pre-Trial Chamber to adopt the most appropriate procedures to follow in disposing of the Prosecutor's application⁷⁴. They also vest in the Chamber the discretion to hold or not to hold a hearing. Whatever procedure the Chamber adopts, it must afford the State that requested the deferral an opportunity to be heard before it makes any final decision on the Prosecutor's application⁷⁵. Additionally, it must communicate the decision and its reasoning to the Prosecutor and to the State concerned as soon as possible⁷⁶.

III. Paragraph 3: 'State's investigation shall be open to review'

- 30 The Prosecutor may review his or her deferral to a State's investigation at the lapse of six months since the deferral or 'at any time when there has been a significant change of circumstances'. The changed circumstances must relate to or be 'based on the State's unwillingness or inability genuinely to carry out the investigation'. A State's unwillingness or inability genuinely to carry out the investigation, when properly proven, entitles the Prosecutor to assert international jurisdiction and, with authorization from the Pre-Trial Chamber, to investigate the matter. That a State has a prior right to investigate is no license

⁷¹ Rule 54 para. 2.

⁷² Rule 55 para. 2. See Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 37; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 38.

⁷³ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 27.

⁷⁴ Rule 55 para. 1.

⁷⁵ Rule 55 para. 2.

⁷⁶ Rule 55 para. 3.

for it to sit back and do nothing or to carry out the investigations in such a tardy and inefficient manner so as to appear to be calculated to shield the perpetrators of international crimes from justice. In order to completely oust international jurisdiction and to stop the Prosecutor’s involvement, a State’s exercise of its national jurisdiction must be and must appear to be genuine and effective.

Where the Prosecutor alleges a change of circumstances, he or she may apply in writing to the Pre-Trial Chamber for authorization to investigate⁷⁷. As before, the Prosecutor must accompany the application with the ‘basis for the application’⁷⁸ together with any information provided by the relevant State pursuant to article 18 para. 5⁷⁹. He or she must also notify the State concerned of the application⁸⁰. The Prosecutor must prove upon a preponderance of evidence that the alleged change of circumstances does indeed exist. The Pre-Trial Chamber conducts the proceedings in the same way as has been outlined in para. 18 above⁸¹. Importantly, the Chamber must afford the State concerned an opportunity to be heard or to oppose the Prosecutor’s application for authorization to investigate a matter which is already supposedly under investigation at the national level⁸².

IV. Paragraph 4

1. Appeal against the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber

The Prosecutor or a State aggrieved by a decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber may appeal against that decision to the Appeals Chamber in accordance with article 82 of the Statute. Reference to article 82 underscores the parties’ right to appeal, among other things, against a decision of either the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber ‘with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility’ (article 82 para. 1(a)). According to the Rules, a party wishing to appeal against the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber must file the appeal ‘not later than five days from the date upon which such party is notified of the decision’⁸³.

2. ‘on an expedited basis’

The procedures before the Pre-Trial Chamber and any resulting appeals, though necessary, delay the Prosecutor’s investigative initiatives. To avoid such delays, article 18 para. 4 provides that the appeal against the Pre-Trial Chamber’s decision ‘may be heard on an expedited basis’. Although neither the Statute nor the Rules spell out the full import of such expedited procedures, it must perforce involve skipping some procedural steps and giving priority to the appeal over other work before the Appeals Chamber. It is doubtless within the rights of the party appealing to ask the Appeals Chamber to hear the appeal on an expedited basis. Such party bears the burden to show the need for adopting this procedure. The Chamber, for its part, has the discretion to grant or to turn down the request. Where the interests of justice so demand, the Appeals Chamber may also order, on its own motion, that the appeal be heard on an expedited basis pursuant to the inherent power of any Chamber to regulate the proceedings of which it is seized. However, before making such an order, the Chamber must give both parties an opportunity to be heard on the matter.

3. Effect of the decision pending appeal

According to article 82 para. 3 of the Statute, ‘[a]n appeal shall not of itself have suspensive effect unless the Appeals Chamber so orders, upon request, in accordance with the Rules of

⁷⁷ Rule 56 para. 1.

⁷⁸ Ibid.

⁷⁹ Rule 56 para. 2.

⁸⁰ Rule 56 para. 3.

⁸¹ Ibid.

⁸² Rule 56 and 54.

⁸³ Rule 154 para. 1.

Procedure and Evidence'. Rule 156 sub-rule 5 provides that, '[w]hen filing the appeal, the party appealing may request that the appeal have suspensive effect in accordance with article 82, paragraph 3.' The import of these provisions is that where the Pre-Trial Chamber has authorized the Prosecutor to commence an investigation, the Prosecutor is entitled to proceed forthwith and to receive full co-operation from the State concerned, unless the Appeals Chamber orders otherwise. However, to avoid the friction between the Prosecutor and the State concerned that this course of action is likely to engender, it might be prudent, depending on the particular circumstances of a case, for the Appeals Chamber, if the State so requests, to suspend the operation of the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision pending the finalization of the appeal. However, as the Appeals Chamber has pointed out, 'neither article 82(3) of the Statute nor rule 156(5) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence stipulate in which circumstances suspensive effect should be ordered'. Consequently, 'this decision is left to the discretion of the Appeals Chamber. Therefore, when faced with a request for suspensive effect, the Appeals Chamber will consider the specific circumstances of the case and the factors it considers relevant for the exercise of its discretion'⁸⁴. Nevertheless, the Court has considered various factors in determining whether to grant suspensive effect. These include whether the impugned decision '(i) 'would create an irreversible situation that could not be corrected, even if the Appeals Chamber eventually were to find in favour of the appellant', (ii) would lead to consequences that 'would be very difficult to correct and may be irreversible', or (iii) 'could potentially defeat the purpose of the appeal'⁸⁵. Needless to say, the onus lies on the appealing party to satisfy the Appeals Chamber upon a preponderance of evidence that there are indeed compelling reasons to warrant the exercise of its discretion to suspend the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision pending the outcome of the appeal.

V. Paragraph 5: 'periodically inform the Prosecutor'

- 35 Where the Prosecutor defers to a State's investigations, he or she may request that State to keep the Prosecutor periodically apprised of the progress of the investigations. According to the provision, 'States Parties shall respond to such requests without undue delay'. This is as it should be, because when a State undertakes to investigate and to prosecute international crimes, it does so on behalf of the entire international community⁸⁶. So, it is only proper that such a State be required to account for the way it executes its mandate to the Prosecutor who would otherwise be responsible for investigating and prosecuting those crimes on behalf of the international community. Failure on the part of that State to respond on time, or at all, would be grounds for the Prosecutor to review the deferral and to seek the Pre-Trial Chamber’s authorization to commence investigations.

⁸⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1290, Decision on the Request of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo for Suspensive Effect of his Appeal Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Appeals Chamber, 22 Apr. 2008, para. 7. See also Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1347, Decision on the Requests of the Prosecutor and the Defence for Suspensive Effect of the Appeals Against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victim's Participation of 18 January 2008, Appeals Chamber, 22 May 2008, para. 10; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1444, Reasons for the Decision on the Request of the Prosecutor for Suspensive Effect of his Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Appeals Chamber, 22 Jul. 2008, para. 8.

⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-817, Decision on the Request of Mr Bemba to Give Suspensive Effect to the Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Appeals Chamber, 9 Jul. 2010, para. 11. See also Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-391, Decision on the Requests of Mr Ruto and Mr Sang for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012, paras. 9–10; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-401, Decision on the Request of Mr Kenyatta and Mr Muthaura for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012, paras. 9–10; Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-2953, Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeals Against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations and Directions on the Further Conduct of Proceedings', Appeals Chamber, 14 Dec. 2012, para. 82; Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-3344, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect of the Appeal Against Trial Chamber II's Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Appeals Chamber, 16 Jan. 2013, para. 6.

⁸⁶ See, for example, The Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, 36 ILR 277, at 304; and Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F. 2 d 582 (1985), U.S. Court of Appeals, 6th Circuit; Mohacsi and Polt (1996) 67 IRRevPenall 334; Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 15 et seq. and 50.

VI. Paragraph 6: ‘preserving evidence’

The phrase ‘to pursue necessary investigative steps’ means no more than to investigate. 36
The powers given to the Pre-Trial Chamber to authorize the Prosecutor to investigate under this paragraph are ‘exceptional’ or unusual because the Prosecutor’s application for authority to investigate would still be pending, or the Prosecutor would have already deferred to the State’s investigations (as per article 18 para. 2). So, authority will not ordinarily be granted, unless the Prosecutor shows, with cogent evidence, an urgent need for it⁸⁷. The purpose of authorizing these ‘investigative steps’ is to preserve evidence that is in danger of getting lost, or to take advantage of ‘a unique opportunity to obtain important evidence’ that may otherwise not be available afterwards. This provision is mirrored somewhat in article 19 para. 8, with the important exception that it does not include the ‘exceptional basis’ language of paragraph 6. This suggests that under paragraph 6 it may be more onerous for the Prosecutor to obtain authorization than it would be under article 19 para. 8. An example of an exceptional situation that would justify the Pre-Trial Chamber authorizing the Prosecutor to take steps under this paragraph would include a war that paralyses the national authorities’ investigations, uproots or displaces potential witnesses, or results in fatalities or in evidence being destroyed. It is to be noted that investigative steps authorized by the Pre-Trial Chamber pursuant to article 18 para. 6 override any postponement by a State to carry out or execute requests for cooperation under Part IX as per article 95.

VII. Paragraph 7

1. ‘A State which has challenged a ruling’

A State that unsuccessfully challenged an article 18 ruling of the Pre-Trial Chamber before 37 the Appeals Chamber is given another bite at the cherry to challenge the admissibility of a case under article 19 of the Statute. The challenge must be referred to the same Pre-Trial Chamber if the challenge is mounted before the confirmation of the charges. If the challenge is mounted after confirmation, it must be referred to the Trial Chamber⁸⁸. The Pre-Trial Chamber or, as the case may be, the Trial Chamber determines the admissibility of the case in accordance with article 17.

2. ‘may challenge the admissibility of a case’

The admissibility challenge will be directed at a case founded on the outcome of the 38
Prosecutor’s investigations. As noted earlier, a case, as opposed to a situation, is a specific allegation against a specific individual or individuals accusing him, her or them of committing specific crimes. A case’s contours are defined by the information contained in the warrant of arrest or, as the case may be, a summons to appear issued by the Pre-Trial Chamber⁸⁹.

⁸⁷ Regulation 38 para. 2(c) limits an application by the Prosecutor (and responses thereto) pursuant to article 18 para. 6 to no more than 50 pages.

⁸⁸ See article 19 para. 6.

⁸⁹ See Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 39; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 40.

3. 'additional significant facts or significant change of circumstances'

- 39 The grounds for the challenge must be 'additional significant facts' or 'significant change of circumstances'. The State concerned must show that, because of these facts or change of circumstances, it is now investigating or prosecuting or has investigated or prosecuted the case in question. Possible facts or change in circumstances may include the end of a war, the coming to power of a new government that is better disposed to exercise national jurisdiction fairly and effectively, and genuine national peace and reconciliation arrangements under which the defendants might have been granted amnesty or pardon.

Article 19

Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case

1. The Court shall satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in any case brought before it. The Court may, on its own motion, determine the admissibility of a case in accordance with article 17.

2. Challenges to the admissibility of a case on the grounds referred to in article 17 or challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court may be made by:

- (a) An accused or a person for whom a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear has been issued under article 58;
- (b) A State which has jurisdiction over a case, on the ground that it is investigating or prosecuting the case or has investigated or prosecuted; or
- (c) A State from which acceptance of jurisdiction is required under article 12.

3. The Prosecutor may seek a ruling from the Court regarding a question of jurisdiction or admissibility. In proceedings with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility, those who have referred the situation under article 13, as well as victims, may also submit observations to the Court.

4. The admissibility of a case or the jurisdiction of the Court may be challenged only once by any person or State referred to in paragraph 2. The challenge shall take place prior to or at the commencement of the trial. In exceptional circumstances, the Court may grant leave for a challenge to be brought more than once or at a time later than the commencement of the trial. Challenges to the admissibility of a case, at the commencement of a trial, or subsequently with the leave of the Court, may be based only on article 17, paragraph 1 (c).

5. A State referred to in paragraph 2 (b) and (c) shall make a challenge at the earliest opportunity.

6. Prior to the confirmation of the charges, challenges to the admissibility of a case or challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court shall be referred to the Pre-Trial Chamber. Decisions with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility may be appealed to the Appeals Chamber in accordance with article 82.

7. If a challenge is made by a State referred to in paragraph 2 (b) or (c), the Prosecutor shall suspend the investigation until such time as the Court makes a determination in accordance with article 17.

8. Pending a ruling by the Court, the Prosecutor may seek authority from the Court:

- (a) To pursue necessary investigative steps of the kind referred to in article 18, paragraph 6;
- (b) To take a statement or testimony from a witness or complete the collection and examination of evidence which had begun prior to the making of the challenge; and
- (c) In cooperation with the relevant States, to prevent the absconding of persons in respect of whom the Prosecutor has already requested a warrant of arrest under article 58.

9. The making of a challenge shall not affect the validity of any act performed by the Prosecutor or any order or warrant issued by the Court prior to the making of the challenge.

10. If the Court has decided that a case is inadmissible under article 17, the Prosecutor may submit a request for a review of the decision when he or she is fully satisfied that new facts have arisen which negate the basis on which the case had previously been found inadmissible under article 17.

11. If the Prosecutor, having regard to the matters referred to in article 17, defers an investigation, the Prosecutor may request that the relevant State make available to the Prosecutor information on the proceedings. That information shall, at the request of the State concerned, be confidential. If the Prosecutor thereafter decides to proceed with an investigation, he or she shall notify the State to which deferral of the proceedings has taken place.

Directly relevant rules: Rules 58–62; 122 sub-rule 2; 133; 154 sub-rule 1; 156.

Literature: Bergsmo, M. (ed.), Complementarity And The Exercise Of Universal Jurisdiction For Core International Crimes (2010); Cameron, I., 'Jurisdiction and Admissibility Issues Under the ICC Statute', in: D. McGoldrick (ed.), The Permanent International Criminal Court (2004) 65; El Zeidy, M.M., 'The Principle of Complementarity: A New Machinery to Implement International Law', (2002) 23 MichJIL 869; id., The Principle Of Complementarity In International Criminal Law (2008); Ellis, M.S., Sovereignty and Justice: Balancing the Principle of Complementarity Between International and Domestic War Crimes Tribunals (2014); Fernández de Gurmendi, S.A. and Friman, H., 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court', (2000) 3 YblHumL 289; Fourmy, O., 'Powers of the Pre-Trial Chambers', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, ii (2002) 1207; Holmes, J.T., 'Complementarity: National Courts versus the ICC', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 667; id., 'Jurisdiction and Admissibility', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 321; id., 'The Principle of Complementarity', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute – Issues – Negotiations – Results (1999) 41; Informal expert paper: The principle of complementarity in practice, ICC-OTP 2003: International Criminal Court, ICC Legal Tools, ICC Preparatory Works and Statute Amendments, National Implementing Legislation, Publications (<http://www.legal-tools.org>) (available 2014); Kleffner, J.K., Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007); id. and Kor, G., Complementary Views On Complementarity (2006); Nsereko, D. 'The ICC and Complementarity in Practice', (2013) 26 LeidenJIL 247; Olásolo, H., The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court (2005); Schabas, W.A., 'Article 19: Challenges to the Jurisdiction of the Court or the Admissibility of a Case/Contestation de la compétence de la Cour ou de la recevabilité d'une affaire', in: id. (ed.), The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 361; Stigen, J., The Relationship Between the International Criminal Court and National Jurisdictions: The Principle of Complementarity (2008); id., 'The Admissibility Procedures', in: C. Stahn and M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (2011) 503; Trigeaud, L., 'Article 19: Contestation de la compétence de la Cour ou de la recevabilité d'une affaire', in: F. Fernandez and X. Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire article par article, i (2012) 735.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	2
I. Paragraph 1: The Court's satisfaction of jurisdiction and proprio motu admissibility determination of a case	2
II. Paragraph 2: Challenges	13
1. Admissibility	14
2. Jurisdiction	17
3. Right to challenge	20
a) Accused or persons sought	21
b) Investigating or prosecuting States	26
c) Article 12 States	28
d) Certain aspects of the procedure for considering challenges	30
III. Paragraph 3: Right to seek rulings and to submit observations	34
IV. Paragraph 4: Limits on the number of challenges	39
V. Paragraph 5: Prompt challenges by States	45
VI. Paragraph 6: Allocation of responsibility and appeals	48
VII. Paragraph 7: Suspension of investigation	54
VIII. Paragraph 8: Permitted steps	56
1. Necessity	59
2. Taking statements and completing prior steps	60
3. Preventing the absconding of persons	62
IX. Paragraph 9: Acts of the Prosecutor or warrants not affected	64
X. Paragraph 10: New facts for review	65
XI. Paragraph 11: Information after a deferral	69

A. Introduction/General remarks

The 1994 International Law Commission's Draft Statute of the International Criminal Court (ILC Draft Statute) included a provision (article 34) permitting challenges to the Court's jurisdiction, in accordance with the rules, 'to ensure that the Court adheres carefully to the scope of jurisdiction defined by the Statute'¹. Challenges to jurisdiction could be made 'prior to or at the commencement of the hearing, by an accused or any interested State' and, 'at any later stage of the trial, by an accused'². In addition, article 24 stated that '[t]he Court shall satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in any case brought before it'³. Independently of these two provisions, article 35 of the ILC Draft Statute also provided that the Court might, 'on application by the accused or at the request of an interested State, at any time prior to the commencement of the trial, or on its own motion, decide, having regard to the purposes of this Statute, that a case before it is inadmissible' on grounds which are now found, in a more detailed and modified form, in article 17 of the *Rome Statute*⁴. The ILC Draft Statute provided that the accused and an interested State had the right to be heard and that the challenges would be decided by the Trial Chamber, or the Appeals Chamber, if the Trial Chamber considered that because of the importance of the issues they should be referred to that Chamber⁵. This scheme, although modified in a number of important respects, in particular, by the addition of the separate article 18 procedure (based on a US proposal) for challenging admissibility at an earlier stage than the article 19 procedure, has largely been retained in the *Rome Statute*⁶. One particular problem that has been carried over from the

¹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, Commentary to article 34.

² 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 34.

³ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 24.

⁴ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 35. The ILC explained:

'Article 35 allows the court to decide, having regard to certain specified factors, whether a particular complaint is admissible and in this sense it goes to the exercise, as distinct from the existence, of jurisdiction. This provision responds to suggestions made by a number of States, in order to ensure that the court only deals with cases in the circumstances outlined in the preamble, that is to say where it is really desirable to do so'; 1994 ILC Draft Statute, Commentary to article 35.

⁵ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 36.

⁶ The structure and purpose of the two articles are similar, but, as explained below in more detail, there are a number of significant differences. For example, article 18 applies only to admissibility challenges by any States (as per article 18 para. 2); article 19 applies to admissibility and jurisdictional challenges by States and by the accused (as per article 19 para. 2(a)-(c)). Article 18 para. 2 requires the Prosecutor, after a State admissibility challenge, to defer to a State investigation; article 19 para. 7 requires the Prosecutor to suspend the investigation after a State admissibility challenge, but not after a State jurisdictional challenge or a challenge on either ground by an individual. Article 18 applies when a State has referred a situation or the Prosecutor is acting proprio motu (as per article 18 para. 2); article 19 applies also to referrals by the Security Council under article 13 para. (b). Article 18 para. 2 permits the relevant Chamber to authorize the investigation to continue after a State admissibility challenge pending a determination; article 19 does not contain this option. Article 18 para. 4 expressly authorizes expedited interlocutory appeals; article 19 does not. Article 18 para. 5 requires States Parties to respond without delay to Prosecutor requests for information about deferred investigations and prosecutions; article 19 para. 11 does not. Article 18 para. 6 permits the relevant Chamber to authorize certain investigative steps during a deferral of an investigation only on an exceptional basis; article 19 para. 8(a)-(c) permits the relevant Chamber to authorize a broader range of investigative steps and without requiring an exceptional basis. Article 18 para. 2 requires a State making an admissibility challenge to do so within a month after it receives notification from the Prosecutor that he or she has determined there would be a reasonable basis to commence an investigation following a State referral or acting proprio motu; article 19 para. 5 simply requires that a State entitled to make a challenge shall do so at the earliest opportunity, but without mentioning a time limit or consequences for failing to do so. The practice of the Prosecutor in all the situations referred by States, the Security Council and when acting proprio motu, has been to commence investigations before identifying specific cases to prosecute. Since States will generally not know, when the Prosecutor notifies them concerning an investigation, which case(s) he or she intends to prosecute, it will only be able to mount an article 18 challenge effectively by listing every single investigation or prosecution it is conducting or has conducted. It is thus possible that article 18 challenges will be limited in comparison to those under article 19. Indeed, as of 31 May 2015, not a single State has made an article 18 challenge with regard to any of the situations that have been referred to the Court by States Parties or initiated

ILC Draft Statute (and occurs in other articles), is that ‘Court’, which is defined in article 34 as having six organs, is sometimes used in the Rome Statute to mean simply the Pre-Trial Chamber or the Trial Chamber, and sometimes it appears to include the Office of the Prosecutor and other organs as well⁷. In article 19, the term ‘Court’ is used in both its broader and narrower senses, as indicated below⁸.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: The Court’s satisfaction of jurisdiction and proprio motu admissibility determination of a case

- 2 In contrast to the Nuremberg Charter, which the International Military Tribunal found precluded it from considering challenges to its jurisdiction⁹, the Rome Statute requires the Court to determine whether it has jurisdiction in any case before it. This provision accords with the generally accepted principle of the administration of justice, according to which international courts have the power to ascertain their jurisdiction in a particular matter before them. As stated by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in Tadić, the power of a court to determine whether it has competence:

‘is part, and indeed a major part, of the incidental or inherent jurisdiction of any judicial or arbitral tribunal, consisting of its “jurisdiction to determine its own jurisdiction”. It is a necessary component in the exercise of the judicial function and does not need to be expressly provided for in the constitutive documents of those tribunals’¹⁰.

- 3 The Court has explicitly recognized that it too possesses this inherent power. For example, a Pre-Trial Chamber held that:

‘[i]t is a well-known and fundamental principle that any judicial body, including any international tribunal, retains the power and the duty to determine the boundaries of its own jurisdiction and competence. Such a power and duty, commonly referred to as “Kompetenz-Kompetenz” in German and “la compétence de la compétence” in French, [...] is enshrined in article 19, paragraph 1, of the Statute, pursuant to which “the Court shall satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in any case brought before it” [...].’¹¹

by the Prosecutor proprio motu, although with respect to the latter there are signs that Kenya considered this option: Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-19 and ICC-01/09-02/11-26, Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Government of Kenya, 31 Mar. 2011, para. 3.

⁷ This particular matter caused complications in the Kenyatta case where it became a contested issue as to whether the Prosecutor or a Chamber could issue requests for cooperation to States Parties under article 93 para. 1 (which refers only to ‘the Court’). See Prosecutor v. Kenyatta, ICC-01/09-02/11-908, Decision on Prosecution’s Applications for a Finding of Non-Compliance Pursuant to Article 87(7) and for an Adjournment of the Provisional Trial Date, Trial Chamber V(b), 31 Mar. 2014, paras. 16–33.

⁸ When ‘Court’ means the Pre-Trial Chamber for the purposes of article 19: ‘Orders or rulings of the Pre-Trial Chamber issued under article[] [...] 19 [...] must be concurred in by a majority of its judges’. Rome Statute, article 57 para. 2(a).

⁹ Trials of German Major War Criminals (with the dissenting opinion of the Soviet Member), Nuremberg, 30 Sep. and 1 Oct. 1946, 38 (London: H.M.S.O., Cmd. 6964).

¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 Oct. 1995, para. 18. The Appeals Chamber of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon has further held ‘that a customary rule has evolved on the inherent jurisdiction of international courts, a rule which among other things confers on each one of them the power to determine its own jurisdiction (so-called compétence de la compétence or Kompetenz-Kompetenz).’ In re El Sayed, CH/AC/2010/02, Decision on Appeal of Pre-Trial Judge’s Order Regarding Jurisdiction and Standing, Appeals Chamber, 10 Nov. 2010, para. 43.

¹¹ Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-147, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application that the Pre-Trial Chamber Disregard as Irrelevant the Submission Filed by the Registry on 5 December 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 9 Mar. 2006, paras. 22–23.

This view has been echoed in other decisions¹². Therefore, the requirement in this paragraph that the Court satisfy itself in any case before it that it has jurisdiction was not strictly necessary¹³.

The statutory duty of the Court to satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction (ratione personae, loci, materiae and temporis) is limited to ‘any case’ which is ‘brought before it’, which is narrower than ‘a situation’ within the meaning of articles 13, 14 and 18. The concept of a ‘case’ implies that an individual or individuals had been targeted during an investigation of a ‘situation’. This is reinforced by the requirement that a ‘case’ once identified by the Prosecutor must then be ‘brought before’ the Court (either before the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber), which further implies that formal proceedings beyond the initiation of an investigation of a situation and the questioning of a suspect under article 55 (in those instances where it was possible to do so before an arrest warrant or summons was sought). Indeed, this is confirmed by the basic understanding of the difference between a ‘case’ and a ‘situation’ as articulated by a Pre-Trial Chamber in the following – now often repeated – holding:

[T]he Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Regulations of the Court draw a distinction between situations and cases in terms of the different kinds of proceedings, initiated by any organ of the Court, that they entail. Situations, which are generally defined in terms of temporal, territorial and in some cases personal parameters, [...] entail the proceedings envisaged in the Statute to determine whether a particular situation should give rise to a criminal investigation as well as the investigation as such. Cases, which comprise specific incidents during which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court seem to have been committed by one or more identified suspects, entail proceedings that take place after the issuance of a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear¹⁴.

¹² See Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10. Mar. 2009, para. 45; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 Jun. 2009, para. 23; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summons to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 8; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 8.

¹³ This provision had its origin in article 24 of the ILC Draft Statute, which stated that ‘[t]he Court shall satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in any case brought before it’. The ILC commentary on this provision explained: ‘This article is intended to spell out the duty of the court (and of each of its organs, as appropriate) to satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in a given case. Detailed provisions relating to challenges to jurisdiction are contained in article 34. But even in the absence of a challenge there is an ex officio responsibility on the court in matters of jurisdiction’.

1994 ILC Draft Statute, Commentary to article 24.

The formulation in article 24 of the ILC Draft Statute was retained unchanged throughout the drafting process until the 1998 Zutphen Draft. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II p. 159 (the first sentence of the French proposal under then article 36 on verification of jurisdiction in the Preparatory Committee’s 1996 compilation of proposals); Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 318 (Article 24).

In the Zutphen Draft, adopted in Jan. 1998, this provision, then numbered article 0 [24] para. 1, was marked for deletion as unnecessary ‘in view of a similar text in paragraph 1 of article 12 [36]’. Zutphen Draft p. 165. The text of article 12 [36] modified the wording slightly to read: ‘At all stages of the proceedings, the Court (a) shall satisfy itself as to its jurisdiction over a case pursuant to article 24’. (The final phrase was deleted because this draft article was to be deleted.). Ibid., p. 167. In the New York Draft, which was the final text sent to the Rome Conference, these provisions of the Zutphen Draft were left unchanged. Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, articles 14 and 17.

¹⁴ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-101-t-ENG-Corr, Decision on the Application for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 17 Jan. 2006, para. 65 (leave to appeal this decision was denied and the Appeals Chamber subsequently denied an appeal on procedural grounds: Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-168, Judgment on the Prosecutor’s Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I’s 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006). See also Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Feb. 2006, para. 21; Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-93, Decision Following the Consultation held on 11 October 2005 and the Prosecution’s Submission on Jurisdiction and Admissibility Filed on 31 October 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 9 Nov. 2005, p. 4: ‘at this stage of the proceedings

As a corollary, ‘an initial determination on whether the case against [the accused] fall[s] within the jurisdiction of the Court [...] is a prerequisite for the issuance of a warrant of arrest’ or a summons to appear¹⁵. It is similarly a prerequisite for the confirmation of charges in a given case¹⁶. However, the Court would not have a duty under article 19 para. 1 to make a determination on its own motion that it had jurisdiction over an investigation into a situation (as opposed to a case) being conducted by the Prosecutor¹⁷. This is particularly important, as part of the investigation of the situation by the Prosecutor will be to determine whether the Court does have jurisdiction (see article 53 para. 1(a)). Of course, if it were clear that the Prosecutor was acting wholly outside of the Court’s jurisdiction (such as investigating a situation which arose and ended before the Statute entered into force) the Pre-Trial Chamber could exercise the Court’s inherent power to determine its own jurisdiction as articulated above – since article 19 para. 1 would not apply.

no warrant of arrest or summons to appear has been issued and thus no case has arisen’; Situation in Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 Mar. 2010, para. 41: ‘the Statute is drafted in a manner which tends to solve questions of admissibility at different stages of the proceedings [...]. These stages begin with a ‘situation’ and end with a concrete ‘case’, where one or more suspects have been identified for the purposes of prosecution’.

¹⁵ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Feb. 2006, para. 18. It must be emphasized that this decision also determined that an admissibility determination was similarly a prerequisite for the issuance of an arrest warrant or a summons to appear. On that point, this decision is no longer good law as it has been overruled by the Appeals Chamber (see Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/05-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor’s Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58’, Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006, paras. 42–45). Nevertheless, the view that a jurisdiction determination is a prerequisite continues to be good law, having been repeated in a number of article 58 decisions: Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-1-Red-tENG, Decision on the Prosecution Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Mar. 2007, para. 23; Prosecutor v. Harun and Abd-Al-Rahman (Kushayb), ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Apr. 2007, para. 13; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, para. 11; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 9; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 9; Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-36-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 7; Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 9.

¹⁶ See Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 67(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 Jun. 2009, para. 24; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 Jan. 2012, para. 25; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 Jan. 2012, para. 23.

¹⁷ Prior editions of this commentary to article 19 alluded to a debate as to whether a situation or a case is before the Court when the Pre-Trial Chamber authorizes the Prosecutor to commence a proprio motu investigation pursuant to article 15 paras. 3–4 (which uses the word ‘case’). This has since been resolved, with Pre-Trial Chamber II holding that the use of ‘case’ in that context, in light of its prior analysis of the same word appearing in article 53 para. 1(b), ‘shall be understood as relating to potential cases within the situation at stake’. Thus, the Chamber proceeded to ‘authorize[] the commencement of an investigation into the situation in the Republic of Kenya in relation to crimes against humanity [...] committed between 1 June 2005 and 26 November 2009’ (emphasis added). See Situation in Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 Mar. 2010, para. 64, Disposition. See also Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to ‘Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 Nov. 2011, para. 18. In other words, since the Chamber only authorizes the Prosecutor to investigate a situation proprio motu, Article 19 remains inapplicable.

When the Court is making a determination as to whether it has jurisdiction over the case with which it is seized: 5

‘it must meet the following three conditions: (i) the crime must be one of the crimes set out in article 5 of the Statute (jurisdiction ratione materiae); (ii) the crimes must have been committed within the timeframe specified in article 11 of the Statute (jurisdiction ratione temporis); an (iii) the crime must satisfy one of the other two criteria laid down in article 12 of the Statute, namely, it must either have been committed on the territory of a State Party or by a national of that State, or have been committed on the territory of a State which has made a declaration under article 12(3) of the Statute or by nationals of that State.’¹⁸ 6

Nonetheless, the UN Security Council can modify the last of these criteria so as to include the territory and nationals of States who are not parties to the Court by referring a situation to the Prosecutor pursuant to article 13 para. (b).

In contrast to the duty of the Court to determine whether it has jurisdiction in a case brought before it, the second sentence of paragraph 1 simply provides that the Court (the Pre-Trial Chamber or Trial Chamber) may, on its own motion (proprio motu), determine the admissibility of a case in accordance with article 17¹⁹. The provision does not thus impose a duty but merely confers discretion on the Court in the matter. To date, the Pre-Trial Chambers have considered the exercise of this discretion in the context of applications for warrants of arrest or summonses to appear or in the course of confirmation proceedings. In its earliest decision on the matter in Lubanga and Ntaganda, the Appeals Chamber laid down guidelines which Pre-Trial Chambers should follow when considering whether or not to exercise their discretion: 6

[A] Pre-Trial Chamber should exercise its discretion only when it is appropriate in the circumstances of the case, bearing in mind the interests of the suspect. Such circumstances may include

¹⁸ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-t-ENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, para. 12. See also Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 30 Nov. 2011, para. 9; Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-3, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Charles Blé Goudé, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 6 Jan. 2012, para. 8; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-2-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 2 Mar. 2012, para. 8; Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-36-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 8; Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 10.

¹⁹ The second sentence of paragraph 1 had its origin in article 35 of the ILC Draft Statute, which provided that ‘[t]he Court may [...] of its own motion, decide, having regard to the purposes of this Statute set out in the preamble, that a case before it is inadmissible’ on grounds similar to those now found in article 17. During the drafting of the Statute, the formulation in article 35 of the ILC Draft Statute shifted significantly from giving the Court the discretion on its own motion to determine simply that a case was inadmissible to giving it a broader discretion to determine admissibility. In the Ad Hoc Committee in 1995:

‘[S]ome delegations put forward the view that it would be preferable if the principles set out in article 35 in regard to admissibility and conferring a discretion upon the court to decide that a case before the court was inadmissible on the grounds set out in subparagraphs (a) to (c) were laid down as a condition rather than by way of conferring a discretionary power’.

In the 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39:

‘[T]he view was expressed that the Court should be able to declare, at any time and of its own motion [...] a case inadmissible. In this respect, it was also noted that the Court should retain the right to recommence proceedings after a fundamental change of circumstances, or to review its own decision on the admissibility of a case’.

The Preparatory Committee’s 1996 compilation of proposals did not include any modification of the language concerning the ability of the Court to determine on its own motion the inadmissibility of a case. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 159 et seq. However, at its Aug. 1997 session, the Preparatory Committee draft of what was now article 36 (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) stated in paragraph 1: ‘At all stages of the proceedings, the Court [...] (b) may, on its own motion, determine the admissibility of the case pursuant to article 35 [the predecessor of article 17]’. Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 318 (Article 36).

The same phrasing with regard to the Court’s discretion to determine admissibility was retained in the Zutphen draft, adopted in January 1998, in what was now numbered article 12 [36] para. 1. (Zutphen Draft, 44) and in the New York draft, which was the final text sent to the Rome Conference (Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, article 17).

instances where a case is based on the established jurisprudence of the Court, uncontested facts that render a case clearly inadmissible or an ostensible cause impelling the exercise of proprio motu review. In these circumstances it is also imperative that the exercise of this discretion take place bearing in mind the rights of other participants.²⁰

In that particular case the Appeals Chamber held that the Pre-Trial Chamber had erred in holding that admissibility was a mandatory consideration and that in exercising what should have been their discretion, ‘the Pre-Trial Chamber [ha]d not give[n] sufficient weight to the interests of [the accused].’ This was particularly so because the Chamber acted ex parte (Prosecutor only) and before the accused was able to challenge the matter pursuant to article 19 para. 2(a). If the matter was then taken to the Appeals Chamber, it too would potentially decide on admissibility prior to article 19 para. 2(a) proceedings. In such circumstances ‘[t]he right of the suspect to challenge the admissibility of the case before the [Court] thus would be seriously impaired’.²¹

- 7 Following the above guidelines, the majority of Pre-Trial Chambers have declined to exercise their discretion at the arrest warrant or summons to appear stage²². Only a small number of Pre-Trial Chambers in a few cases have gone against this trend where domestic proceedings concerning the accused existed, as occurred in *Harun and Abd-Al-Rahman (Kushayb)*²³, *Ngudjolo*²⁴ and *Katanga*²⁵. Bemba is a rare case where the Pre-Trial Chamber exercised its ²⁰ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/05-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor’s Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58’, Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006, para. 52.

²¹ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/05-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor’s Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58’, Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006, paras 42–45, 48–51, 53.

²² See Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-1-Red-tENG, Decision on the Prosecution Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Mar. 2007, paras. 10–15; Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 Mar. 2009, paras. 46–51; Prosecutor v. Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-15-AnxA, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 May 2009, para. 4; Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-1, Second Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Aug. 2009, para. 4; Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-94, Second Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Jul. 2010, para. 44; Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Callixte Mbarushimana, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 Sep. 2010, para. 9; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 12; Situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, ICC-01/11-01/11-1, Decision on the ‘Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Jun. 2011, paras. 11–12; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 30 Nov. 2011, paras. 22–24; Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-3, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Charles Blé Goudé, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 6 Jan. 2012, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Hussein, ICC-02/05-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58 Relating to Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 Mar. 2012, para. 10; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-2-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 2 Mar. 2012, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-36-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 13; Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 18.

²³ See Prosecutor v. Harun and Abd-Al-Rahman (Kushayb), ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Apr. 2007, paras. 18–25.

²⁴ See Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3, Decision on the Evidence and Information Provided by the Prosecution for the Issuance of a Warrant of Arrest for Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Jul. 2007, paras. 17–22.

²⁵ See Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-4, Decision on the Evidence and Information Provided by the Prosecution for the Issuance of a Warrant of Arrest for Germain Katanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Jul. 2007, paras. 17–21.

discretion where it appeared that the judicial authorities in the Central African Republic had abandoned their attempts to prosecute the accused on the ground that he enjoyed immunities as Vice-President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.²⁶ However, the general practice is for the Court to wait for an admissibility challenge pursuant to article 19 para. 2 before venturing into the subject, absent clear circumstances requiring an admissibility determination at an earlier stage in the interests of justice. Indeed, this is consistent with the linear approach intended by the drafters of articles 15, 18 and 19²⁷. Where no such challenge is filed, and the matter has not been broached in the arrest warrant or summons to appear decision, it may be appropriate for the Chamber to undertake the analysis proprio motu at the confirmation of charges stage²⁸.

The Court can nonetheless react to new developments pursuant to article 19 para. 1:

‘Considered as a whole, the corpus of [the Statute’s] provisions delineates a system whereby the determination of admissibility is meant to be an ongoing process throughout the pre-trial phase, the outcome of which is subject to review depending on the evolution of the relevant factual scenario. Otherwise stated, the Statute as a whole enshrines the idea that a change in circumstances allows (or even, in some scenarios, compels) the Court to determine admissibility anew.’²⁹

Thus, even though in the cases arising from the situation in Uganda the Pre-Trial Chamber originally exercised its discretion and held them to be admissible when issuing arrest warrants (without much elaboration³⁰), it deemed it necessary to revisit the issue years later. This was in light of comments made by the government of Uganda and the establishment of a specialised division of the High Court of Uganda with jurisdiction over serious crimes committed during an armed conflict in the country.³¹ The Pre-Trial Chamber found

²⁶ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-TENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, paras. 20–22.

²⁷ The exact relationship between articles 15, 18 and 19, the final versions of which were adopted only on the last day of the Rome Diplomatic Conference, was not resolved in the Rome Statute. When it came to drafting the Rules, France proposed an integrated approach that would have required admissibility and jurisdiction challenges to be made at the article 15 stage, while other states preferred a linear approach. According to two of the key participants in the negotiations:

‘The Rules settle this matter following a ‘linear’ approach, according to which both schemes – the Article 15 procedure and the Articles 18 and 19 regime – are not to be merged but considered separately and consecutively. Consequently, it is clear that the Article 15 procedure is not the appropriate forum for states and other parties to raise jurisdiction or admissibility challenges. The Prosecutor must include an assessment of admissibility in his or her determination whether to seek authorization from the Pre-Trial Chamber to initiate an investigation, but notice to states shall only be provided after a positive decision to commence an investigation is taken. In respect of an investigation triggered in accordance with Article 15, such notice will arguably only be given upon authorization by the Pre-Trial Chamber, which would then normally provide the eligible states and others with the first practical opportunity to raise issues of jurisdiction and admissibility’.

Friman and Fernández (2000) 3 YbHumL 289, 295. See also Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 328–329.

²⁸ See Prosecutor v. Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 8 Feb. 2010, paras. 25–34; Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, Corrigendum on the ‘Decision on Confirmation of Charges’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 Mar. 2011, paras. 25–28.

²⁹ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10. Mar. 2009, para. 28.

³⁰ Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-1-US-Exp, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, p. 2; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 Sep. 2005, para. 38; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 38; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-55, Warrant of Arrest for Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-56, Warrant of Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 28; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26.

³¹ See Prosecutor Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-320, Decision Initiating Proceedings under Article 19, Requesting Observations and Appointing Counsel for the Defence, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 21 Oct. 2008, pp. 6–7; Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10. Mar. 2009, paras. 33–44. Given this precedent, there is nothing that prevents Pre-Trial Chambers from undertaking similar action notwithstanding the fact that they have previously expressly refused to exercise their discretion to consider admissibility pursuant to article 19 para. 1.

that the cases continued to be admissible before the Court. On appeal, the Appeals Chamber was able to give further clarification on the matter. It held that:

[it] will not interfere with the Pre-Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion to make a determination proprio motu on the admissibility of a case merely because the Appeals Chamber, if it had the power, might have made a different ruling. [...] [T]he Appeals Chamber's functions extend to reviewing the exercise of discretion by the Pre-Trial Chamber to ensure that the Chamber properly exercised its discretion. However, the Appeals Chamber will not interfere with the Pre-Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion under article 19(1) of the Statute to determine admissibility, save where it is shown that that determination was vitiated by an error of law, an error of fact, or a procedural error, and then, only if the error materially affected the determination. This means in effect that the Appeals Chamber will interfere with a discretionary decision only under limited conditions.³²

The Appeals Chamber found that, according to the circumstances of the case, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not abuse its discretion. It based its finding on the grounds that: (i) the Pre-Trial Chamber's proceedings were not in camera but public; (ii) the Prosecutor, victims and the Government of Uganda participated; (iii) ad hoc Defence Counsel was appointed by the Chamber to facilitate submissions from a defence perspective; and (iv) the case did not involve gravity considerations (which were not susceptible to change). Further, it found that the issue of predetermination did not arise as the Pre-Trial Chamber's ruling was based on a 'factual scenario [that] was identical to the factual scenario prevailing at the time when the Chamber issued the warrants of arrest', since despite the creation of a specialised division of the High Court of Uganda, there was still inaction by the authorities with respect to the case³³. The Appeals Chamber also held that in circumstances where the suspects had not yet appeared before the Court, they were not entitled to legal representation when the Court exercises its article 19 para. 1 discretion with respect to admissibility³⁴.

- 9 Lastly, it is important to recall, as a Pre-Trial Chamber has correctly held, that it is 'beyond controversy that the accused will always be entitled to raise a [jurisdictional or admissibility] challenge under article 19(2) of the Statute, whether or not the Chamber has exercised its powers under article 19(1)'³⁵.
- 10 Regarding the procedure applicable to determinations of jurisdiction and admissibility when the relevant Chambers are acting on their own motion, the Appeals Chamber has stated that:

'rule 58(2) [...] gives the relevant Chamber broad discretion over the conduct of proceedings pursuant to articles 19(1) and (2) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber, however, finds that such discretion is not unlimited. It has to be exercised in conjunction with other relevant legal provisions'³⁶.

With regard to the standard of proof, Pre-Trial Chamber II in the first five cases in the Uganda situation simply found that the cases 'appear[ed] to be admissible'³⁷. This was a

³² Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/-5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute' of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, paras. 79–80.

³³ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/-5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute' of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, paras. 85–86.

³⁴ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/-5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute' of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, paras. 63–68.

³⁵ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10 Mar. 2009, para. 26.

³⁶ Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-321, Judgment on Appeal of Mr Laurent Gbagbo Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on Jurisdiction and Stay of Proceedings, Appeals Chamber, 12 Dec. 2012, para. 39.

³⁷ Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-1-US-Exp, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, p. 2; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 Sep. 2005, para. 38; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 38; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-55, Warrant of Arrest for Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26; Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-56, Warrant of relatively low standard of proof. Pre-Trial Chamber I, on the other hand, stated in the Lubanga and Ntaganda case that it was applying the intimate conviction (intime conviction) approach when determining whether there was a reasonable basis to issue arrest warrants, albeit a more restrictive version than is sometimes employed. This was because the judges would be 'bound, pursuant to article 58 para. 1 of the Statute, by the factual basis and the evidence and information provided by the Prosecution in the Prosecution's Application, the Prosecution's Submission and the Prosecution's Further Submission'³⁸. This language was reproduced almost verbatim in the subsequent decision concerning the arrest warrant in *Ntaganda*³⁹. While both decisions in these cases were originally issued under seal, the above language has not been repeated in any subsequent public arrest warrant or summons to appear decision to date.

Subsequent decisions on arrest warrants or summonses to appear, made without the participation of the suspects⁴⁰, reveal inconsistencies and ambiguity as to the evidentiary standard which the Prosecutor has to meet with respect to jurisdiction and admissibility. Some decisions have simply held that, on the basis of the evidence and information presented, the case fell within the jurisdiction of the Court and appeared to be (or was) admissible.⁴¹ Others have repeated such language but have confined it only to jurisdiction⁴². Some have seemingly applied the 'reasonable grounds to believe' test⁴³, while others have Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 28; Situation in Uganda, Case No. ICC-02/04-01/05-57, Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Jul. 2005, para. 26.

³⁸ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Feb. 2006, para. 14–15. The doctrine of intime conviction, which dates to the French Revolution, but has its roots in Roman law, means that the judge or juror decides, according to his or her conscience rather than according to formal rules of proof.

³⁹ Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-1-Red-tENG, Decision on the Prosecution Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Mar. 2007, paras. 18–19, 24–25.

⁴⁰ One noticeable exception to this occurred in the Kony et al. case, where the Pre-Trial Chamber reconsidered admissibility years after it had issued warrants of arrest. In doing so, it invoked rule 58 sub-rule 2 and permitted the Prosecutor, victims, the Ugandan Government and a specially appointed Defence Counsel to make submissions. See Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-320, Decision Initiating Proceedings under Article 19, Requesting Observations and Appointing Counsel for the Defence, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 21 Oct. 2008, pp. 7–8.

⁴¹ See Prosecutor v. Harun and Abd-Al-Rahman (Kushayb), ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Apr. 2007, para. 25; Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3, Decision on the Evidence and Information Provided by the Prosecution for the Issuance of a Warrant of Arrest for Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Jul. 2007, paras. 16, 22 (but also utilising the 'reasonable grounds to believe' standard with respect to the crimes at issue at para. 12); Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-4, Decision on the Evidence and Information Provided by the Prosecution for the Issuance of a Warrant of Arrest for Germain Katanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Jul. 2007, paras. 16, 21 (but also utilising the 'reasonable grounds to believe' standard with respect to the crimes at issue at para. 12); Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 Jun. 2008, paras. 19, 22 (but also utilising the 'reasonable grounds to believe' standard with respect to the crimes at issue at para. 13).

⁴² Prosecutor v. Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-15-AnxA, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 May 2009, para. 3; Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-1, Second Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Aug. 2009, para. 3; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 30 Nov. 2011, para. 16 (but also utilising the 'reasonable grounds to believe' standard with respect to the crimes at issue at para. 11 and relying on its prior decision authorizing an investigation at paras. 12–15); Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-3, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Charles Blé Goudé, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 6 Jan. 2012, para. 9 (relying on the analysis it had previously conducted in the L. Gbagbo case); Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-2-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 2 Mar. 2012, para. 9 (relying on the analysis it had previously conducted in the L. Gbagbo case); Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-36-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 13 Jul. 2012, para. 17.

⁴³ Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 Mar. 2009, para. 28(i) (but also simply held that jurisdiction must ‘attain the degree of certainty’⁴⁴. Given that this analysis is regularly conducted first at the article 58 para. 1(a) or article 58 para. 7 stage (at least with respect to jurisdiction), it would be reasonable for the Court to apply the ‘reasonable grounds to believe’ test.

- 12 It should also be noted that in some instances when the Chambers applied article 19 para. 1 at the confirmation of charges stage or in the course of final judgments, they simply referred back to their prior determinations in earlier proceedings and found that conditions had not changed;⁴⁵ alternatively, they undertook a rudimentary analysis particularly in light of past findings in the relevant case⁴⁶. As aforementioned, the exception to this has been in cases where no article 19 para. 2 challenges were filed by the persons concerned⁴⁷.

II. Paragraph 2: Challenges

- 13 Under article 18 para. 7, States which might have had their preliminary challenges to the admissibility of an investigation rejected by the Court, may still make a further challenge to a case pursuant to article 19. However, article 18 para. 7 requires that the State, when making an article 19 challenge must demonstrate the existence of ‘additional significant facts or significant changes of circumstances’. The aim of this requirement is to limit the possibilities of frivolous challenges. As of 31 May 2015, there have been no public article 18 challenges by States. Consequently, there have been no cases arising out of article 18 para. 7 and article 19 wherein this requirement would have been tested. However, ways by which frivolous challenges can be further minimized are dealt with below in the discussions of paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 7. In contrast to challenges to admissibility under article 18 or, if there are new developments, under article 19, States are limited to one challenge to jurisdiction, absent exceptional circumstances. However, nothing prevents a State from filing an article 19 challenge without first having filed one under article 18. The procedure for considering these challenges is discussed below at the end of this section.

stating that the case ‘falls within the jurisdiction of the Court’ at paras. 35, 40); Situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, ICC-01/11-01/11-1, Decision on the ‘Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Jun. 2011, para. 5; Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Callixte Mbarushimana, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 Sep. 2010, para. 3 (but also simultaneously applying a prima facie standard at para. 7); Prosecutor v. Hussein, ICC-02/05-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58 Relating to Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 Mar. 2012, para. 5 (but also simply stating that the case ‘falls within the jurisdiction of the Court’ at para. 9).

⁴⁴ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summons to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 9 (but also relying on its prior decision authorizing an investigation at paras. 10–11); Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summonses to Appear for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 Mar. 2011, para. 9 (but also relying on its prior decision authorizing an investigation at paras. 10–11).

⁴⁵ See for example Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 29 Jan. 2007, paras. 164–166; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 Jun. 2009, paras. 22–26; Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment Pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, 14 Mar. 2012, para. 9; Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3-tENG, Judgment Pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber II, 18 Dec. 2012, paras. 15–16; Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-tENG, Judgment Pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber II, 7 Mar. 2014, paras. 14–15.

⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Bosco Ntaganda, 9 Jun. 2014, para. 7; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Against Laurent Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Jun. 2014, para. 18; Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Against Charles Blé Goudé, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Dec. 2014, para. 11.

⁴⁷ See Prosecutor v. Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 8 Feb. 2010, paras. 25–34; Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, Corrigendum on the ‘Decision on Confirmation of Charges’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 Mar. 2011, paras. 25–28.

1. Admissibility

Paragraph 2 specifies that ‘[c]hallenges to the admissibility of a case on the grounds referred to in article 17’ may be made by certain individuals or States. This provision thus limits the grounds for challenges to admissibility to those listed in article 17. In this context the Appeals Chamber has noted that:

‘a challenge to admissibility [...] is not the mechanism under which to raise alleged violations of human rights of the accused in the course of the prosecutorial process. [...] Unless alleged prejudices and violations are relevant to the criteria of article 17 of the Statute, they cannot render the case inadmissible’⁴⁸.

It is also important to underline that ‘[g]enerally speaking, the admissibility of a case must be determined on the basis of the facts as they exist at the time of the proceedings concerning the admissibility challenge’⁴⁹. The Appeals Chamber has further clarified that ‘the expression “time of the proceedings” [...] clearly refer[s] to the time of the proceedings on the admissibility challenge before the [relevant] Chamber and not subsequent proceedings on appeal’⁵⁰. A Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber can nonetheless ask for further submissions in admissibility challenge proceedings should it be deemed necessary and appropriate⁵¹. Where circumstances change subsequent to a challenge, the correct course of action is to approach the relevant Chamber on the basis of article 19 para. 4 (by the concerned person or a State) or article 19 para. 10 (by the Prosecutor, where Court has determined that the case is inadmissible)⁵². Furthermore, a determination on the admissibility of a case ‘is made on the basis of the case brought by the Prosecutor without delving into consideration of the evidence put forward to sustain those charges’, as this would conflate a Chamber’s inquiry into the admissibility of a case with that of the merits of the same case.⁵³

⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 113. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 230.

⁴⁹ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 56. See also Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d’Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’, Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, para. 32.

⁵⁰ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-234, Decision on the ‘Filing of Updated Investigation Report by the Government of Kenya in the Appeal Against the Pre-Trial Chamber’s Decision on Admissibility’, Appeals Chamber, 28 Jul. 2011, para. 10; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-202, Decision on the ‘Filing of Updated Investigation Report by the Government of Kenya in the Appeal Against the Pre-Trial Chamber’s Decision on Admissibility’, Appeals Chamber, 28 Jul. 2011, para. 9; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d’Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’, Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, para. 32.

⁵¹ See for example, Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-239, Decision Requesting Further Submissions on Issues Related to the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 Dec. 2012; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-44, Decision on Further Submissions on Issues Related to Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 Aug. 2014.

⁵² See Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 56; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 44; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, paras. 57–58.

⁵³ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-185, Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Charles Blé Goudé for Insufficient Gravity, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Nov. 2014, para. 17 (where

15 For a number of cogent reasons, the burden of proof of demonstrating the inadmissibility of a case falls on the person or State making the challenge⁵⁴. First of all, it is a fundamental principle of law that the party making allegations concerning a matter in dispute has the legal burden of proof (onus probandi actori incumbit)⁵⁵. Second, the Prosecutor will have conducted an extensive review of the admissibility criteria and, given the limited resources available and the limited number of cases he or she will be able to investigate, the Prosecutor would be unlikely to decide to investigate a particular case without a strong basis. Third, most States will already have had an opportunity to challenge the admissibility of a case under article 18. Fourth, it is particularly appropriate to impose the burden on States making challenges to admissibility pursuant to article 17 paras. (a) and (b), since these States will have most of the information relevant to the determination in their possession. Indeed, another general principle of law is that when the matters at issue are exclusively or largely within the knowledge of one party, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on that party to provide a satisfactory explanation⁵⁶. The Court has accepted this notion – that the moving party bears the burden of proof in this context:

‘The Rome Statute framework does not expressly provide where the burden of proof lies on an admissibility [...] application [...] However, the compelling logic of the situation is that should an accused challenge the admissibility of the case under Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute [...], it falls to him to establish the facts and other relevant matters that are said to support the argument’⁵⁷.

the suspect submitted an admissibility challenge on the basis that the case against him was not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court).

⁵⁴ See Klefner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 227, (citing First Edition of this Commentary). Article 17 para. 1 does not allocate responsibility with respect to burdens of proof; it simply states the circumstances when the relevant Chamber must determine whether a case is admissible or inadmissible.

⁵⁵ Mawhinney (1993) CanYbIL 343, 354 (quoting a Canadian government brief citing ‘the fundamental principle of law expressed in the Latin maxim actori incumbit probatio – or, the burden of proof rests with the claimant’). See also Lillich (ed.), Fact-Finding Before International Tribunals (1990) 34; Kazazi, Burden of Proof and Related Issues: A Study on Evidence Before International Tribunals (1996) 369. Several states made this point clear during the drafting process. E.g., one of the first proposals concerning admissibility challenges provided that ‘[i]n every case, the State or person challenging a submission to the Court under paragraph 2 of this article [before initiation of the investigation] shall provide all information concerning the conduct of the investigations and the judicial procedures which may support a finding of inadmissibility in the case submitted to the Court’ and had to provide a memorandum in support of the challenge at the trial stage. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 161, 163 (articles 39 para. 5 and 116, para. 1). In the opening plenary session of the Rome Conference, the delegation of the Republic of Korea declared that ‘[t]he State Party that raised the question of complementarity should bear the burden of proof’, UN Diplomatic Conf. of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an ICC, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Official Records, Vol. 2, 69–70).

⁵⁶ See, e.g., Avşar v. Turkey, Judgment, Application No. 2567/94 [2001] ECHR, 10 Jul. 2001, para. 392; Salman v. Turkey, Judgment, Application No. 21986/93 [2000] ECHR, 27 Jun. 2000, para. 100; (‘Where the events in issue lie wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as in the case of persons within their control or custody, strong presumptions of fact will arise in respect of injuries and death occurring during such detention. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation’.) See also El-Masri v. the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Judgment, Application No. 39630/09 [2012] ECHR, 13 Dec. 2012, para. 152. Bleier v. Uruguay, Communication No. 30/1978, Human Rights Committee, UN Doc. CCPR/C/OP/1 at 109 (1985), para. 13.3. As the ICJ stated in its first case, Corfu Channel Case, 1949 ICJ Rep. pp. 4, 18:

‘By reason of this exclusive [territorial] control [exercised by a State within its own frontiers], the other State, the victim of the breach of international law, is often unable to furnish direct proof of facts giving rise to international responsibility. Such a State should be allowed a more liberal recourse to inferences of fact and circumstantial evidence’.

This strongly suggests that when the Prosecutor is seeking a determination that a case is admissible pursuant to article 19 para. 3, he or she should not bear the burden of proof or, if he or she does, then the standard of proof should be relatively low (see discussion of article 19 para. 3, margin No. 34 below).

⁵⁷ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 Jun. 2010, para. 201. See also Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the ‘Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Oct. 2011, para. 4. In addition, rule 58 sub-rule 1: ‘a request or application made under article 19 shall be made in writing and contain the basis for it’ (emphasis added).

The Appeals Chamber (with Judge Ušacka dissenting⁵⁸) has held likewise when States have challenged admissibility⁵⁹, although it may be reasonable, in certain circumstances, to place an evidentiary burden on the Defence to sufficiently substantiate allegations that they make⁶⁰.

With respect to the standard of proof required on admissibility questions, a number of factors suggest that it may differ to some extent depending on the stage of proceedings involved⁶¹. The standard of proof under article 19 para. 2 for a State or the person concerned to demonstrate inadmissibility should be a balance of probabilities or a preponderance of the evidence standard⁶² (rather than simply a prima facie case or beyond a reasonable doubt). At least one Pre-Trial Chamber has explicitly addressed this issue and has expressly endorsed this proposition. In Bemba, when the accused filed an admissibility challenge, Trial Chamber III opined that:

‘As to the standard of proof in these circumstances, although the Rome Statute framework [...] does not provide guidance, the overwhelming preponderance of national and international legal systems apply what is frequently called the ‘civil standard’ of proof (a balance of probabilities) when the burden lies upon the defence in criminal proceedings. There is no reason to depart from that approach in these circumstances’⁶³.

In L. Gbagbo, on the other hand, the Pre-Trial Chamber, required ‘tangible proof’ of Mr Gbagbo’s assertions that a national investigation or prosecution was ongoing⁶⁴. Similarly, in ⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red-Anx2, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’ – Dissenting Opinion of Judge Ušacka, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 61: ‘I consider that placing the burden of proof to show that a State is investigating or prosecuting solely on the challenging State[...] appears unfair and undermines the principle of complementarity’. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565-Anx2, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’ – Separate Opinion of Judge Ušacka, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 16.

⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 61; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 62: ‘a State that challenges the admissibility of a case bears the burden of proof to show that the case is inadmissible’. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 178; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 166; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d’Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’, Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, paras 29, 128.

⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 167.

⁶¹ Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 232.

⁶² The last edition of this Commentary suggested, as an alternative, a ‘clear and convincing’ standard. At least one Pre-Trial Chamber has rejected this in admissibility proceedings: Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 Jun. 2010, para. 203.

⁶³ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 Jun. 2010, para. 203. This holding remained undisturbed on appeal: Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-962-Corr, Corrigendum to Judgment on Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 24 June 2010 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges’, Appeals Chamber, 19 Oct. 2010. For a list suggesting some of the factors relevant to the standard of proof for States and persons concerned to demonstrate inadmissibility in challenges pursuant to article 19 para. 2, see Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 235. However, these factors do not necessarily apply to the Prosecutor when seeking a ruling pursuant to article 19 para. 3 (see margin No. 34 below).

⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-436-Red, Decision on the ‘Requête relative à la recevabilité de l’affaire en vertu des Articles 19 et 17 du Statut’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Jun. 2013, paras. 24–25.

the Muthaura et al. and Ruto et al. cases, the Appeals Chamber when dealing with Kenya's challenge to the cases, held that in order to discharge its burden 'the State must provide the Court with evidence of a sufficient degree of specificity and probative value that it is indeed investigating the case'⁶⁵. This approach was reiterated in the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case⁶⁶ (albeit with Judge Ušacka dissenting⁶⁷) and the S. Gbagbo case⁶⁸. By deciding as they did, both the Pre-Trial Chamber and Appeals Chamber did not thereby pronounce themselves on the applicable standard of proof in the matters before them. Rather, they merely reiterated the fact that those who challenge the admissibility of a case bear the burden of proof and went on to suggest the nature and quality of evidence needed to discharge the burden. Nonetheless, there is evidently a need for the Appeals Chamber to clearly and definitively pronounce itself on this issue. It also needs to clarify whether the same standard applies to challenges brought by an individual or by a State. On this point there appears to be no rhyme or reason why there should be different standards.

2. Jurisdiction

- 17 Although challenges to admissibility are mentioned first in article 19 para. 2, rule 58 sub-rule 4 requires the Court to 'rule on any challenge or question of jurisdiction first and then on any challenge or question of admissibility'⁶⁹. Paragraph 2, like paragraph 1, does not define jurisdiction, but the concept is well understood and thus challenges can be made on any of the accepted jurisdictional grounds: territorial (ratio loci), subject matter (ratione materiae), personal (ratione personae) and temporal (ratione temporis) grounds. Grounds that fall outside of these parameters are not jurisdictional challenges and stand to be dismissed as such. This has been the case with challenges claiming abuse of process or ⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 61; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 62. See also Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-44, Decision on Further Submissions on Issues Related to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 Aug. 2014, para. 7.

⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 205.

⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red-Anx2, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi' – Dissenting Opinion of Judge Ušacka, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, paras. 60, 62: 'the materials provided [by the State] should be taken at their face value[...] [S]tringent standards would impose unnecessarily high requirements on States with a legal and judicial system in transition'. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565-Anx2, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi' – Separate Opinion of Judge Ušacka, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 16.

⁶⁸ See Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d'Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled 'Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo', Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, paras 29, 128.

⁶⁹ See Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-185, Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Charles Blé Goudé for Insufficient Gravity, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Nov. 2014, para. 10 (incorrectly citing rule 58 sub-rule 1). This requirement was based on the French proposed rules for Part 2 of the Rome Statute. U.N. Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGRPE/43, 23 Nov. 1999. An alternative proposal submitted by Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Peru and Spain, providing that the Court could reject in limine clearly unfounded admissibility challenges, was rejected. UN Doc. PCNICC/2000/WGRPE (2) DP.2, 20 Mar. 2000. See Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 321, 345–346.

violations of human rights⁷⁰ and challenges relating to the interpretation/definition of crimes under the *Statute*⁷¹.

Although the Court has not specifically pronounced on the matter, jurisdictional challenges should, like admissibility challenges, be determined on the basis of the facts as they exist at the time of the challenge. Unlike with admissibility challenges, circumstances relating to the Court's jurisdiction are not generally – with one exception herein discussed – susceptible to change. Should changes indeed occur subsequent to a challenge, then the person or State can avail themselves of article 19 para. 4. On the other hand, the Prosecutor cannot invoke article 19 para. 10 as this only relates to a decision that a case is inadmissible, rather than one concerning jurisdiction. However, this limitation is offset by the Prosecutor's ability under article 19 para. 3 to seek a ruling on jurisdiction and the fact that the Court is under an ongoing obligation under article 19 para. 1 to satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction over cases (which is also not the case with admissibility where the Court has only the discretionary power to make a determination). In this respect, there have been three instances where the Court has lost its jurisdiction (ratione personae) subsequent to the issuing of a warrant of arrest or summons to appear or the decision confirming the charges. These relate to the Kony et al. (specifically the suspect Lukwiya), Gaddafi et al. (specifically the suspect M. Gaddafi) and the Banda and Jerbo (specifically the accused Jerbo) cases, where the person concerned died or, in the case of Jerbo, was presumed on the evidence presented to have died⁷². In such circumstances the Defence would be in a position to challenge the Court's jurisdiction. However this has not been the practice. Instead, in the case of Jerbo, the Defence notified the Trial Chamber of the information in their possession that their client had died and the Court itself noted article 19 para. 1 in terminating the proceedings⁷³.

As with admissibility, the burden of demonstrating that the Court lacks jurisdiction falls on the person or State making the challenge. It is also particularly appropriate to impose the burden on States making challenges to jurisdiction, since these States often will have most of the information relevant to the determination in their possession (see margin No. 15 above). This ⁷⁰ See Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo Against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Appeals Chamber, 14 December 2006, paras. 20–24; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-321, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on Jurisdiction and Stay of the Proceedings, Appeals Chamber, 12 Dec. 2012, paras. 100–102.

⁷¹ See Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-414, Decision on the Appeals of Mr William Samoei Ruto and Mr Joshua Arap Sang Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 23 January 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute', Appeals Chamber, 24 May 2012, paras. 25–33; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-425, Decision on the Appeal of Mr Francis Kirimi Muthaura and Mr Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 23 January 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute', Appeals Chamber, 24 May 2012, paras. 32–38. But note the dissents of Judge Kaul in the preceding proceedings: Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute – Dissenting Opinion of Judge Kaul, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 Jan. 2012, paras. 23–40; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute – Dissenting Opinion of Judge Kaul, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 Jan. 2012, paras. 30–45.

⁷² See Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-248, Decision to Terminate the Proceedings Against Raska Lukwiya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 11 Jul. 2007; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi et al., ICC-01/11-01/11-28, Decision to Terminate the Case Against Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 22 Nov. 2011; Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-512-Red, Decision Terminating the Proceedings Against Mr. Jerbo, Trial Chamber IV, 4 Oct. 2013.

⁷³ Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-512-Red, Decision Terminating the Proceedings Against Mr. Jerbo, Trial Chamber IV, 4 Oct. 2013, para. 16. In the case of M. Gaddafi, no Defence had been appointed to represent the suspect and in the case of Lukwiya, the Court had appointed ad hoc Defence to represent and protect the interests of the defence in proceedings relating to victim participation only (see Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-134, Decision on Legal Representation, Appointment of Counsel for the Defence, Protective Measures and Time-Limit for Submission of Observations on Applications for Participation a/0010/06, a/0064/06 to a/0070/06, a/0081/06 to a/0104/06 and a/0111/06 to a/0127/06, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 1 Feb. 2007, paras. 14–15).

principle has been accepted by the Court in article 19 para. 2 jurisdictional challenges brought by an accused⁷⁴. As to the standard of proof, jurisdictional challenges suffer from the same lack of clarity as admissibility challenges as alluded to above. None of the decisions relating to jurisdictional challenges have adequately addressed this matter, with one Pre-Trial Chamber explicitly refusing to engage with the issue⁷⁵. Whatever the correct standard, unless convincing reasons are presented, it should apply equally in both admissibility and jurisdictional challenges.

3. Right to challenge

- 20 Paragraph 2 provides that two types of persons and two groups of States may challenge admissibility of a case on the grounds referred to in article 17 or the jurisdiction of the Court over a case, although the grounds on which each may make such challenges are not exactly the same. These categories are based upon, but slightly different from, those in the ILC Draft Statute.
- 21 a) Accused or persons sought. Subparagraph (a) authorizes '[a]n accused or a person for whom a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear has been issued under article 58' to challenge jurisdiction or admissibility. As in the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR, there is no definition of an accused in the Rome Statute, but paragraph 2 (a) distinguishes an accused from a person for whom an arrest warrant or summons has been issued, making clear that either may challenge jurisdiction or admissibility pursuant to article 19⁷⁶. During the Diplomatic Conference, the majority of States preferred limiting the right to challenge jurisdiction and admissibility to the accused (a person for whom charges had been confirmed). However, some States argued that suspects should have the right to challenge admissibility before the charges were confirmed and it may be that the wording of subparagraph (a) reflects a compromise between the two positions⁷⁷.

⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the 'Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Oct. 2011, para. 4.

⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the 'Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Oct. 2011, para. 5.

⁷⁶ Earlier versions of this procedure, at a time when the process would have involved confirming charges in an indictment, also permitted suspects to make such challenges. Article 34 of the ILC Draft Statute provided that challenges could be made to jurisdiction 'prior to or at the commencement of the hearing, by an accused or any interested State' and, 'at any later stage of the trial, by an accused'. The ILC Draft Statute also provided that the Court might, 'on application by the accused or at the request of an interested State, at any time prior to the commencement of the trial, or on its own motion, decide, having regard to the purposes of this Statute, that a case before it is inadmissible' on grounds which are now found, in a more detailed and modified form, in article 17 of the Rome Statute: ILC Draft Statute, article 35. The term 'accused' was not expressly defined, but it is clear that a suspect became an accused when the indictment was confirmed pursuant to article 28 para. 3 of the ILC Draft Statute, which occurred before the Prosecutor sought a warrant for that person's arrest (however, that person could have been previously subject to provisional arrest pursuant to article 28 para. 1). The 1996 Preparatory Committee's compilation of proposals included a variety of alternative proposals concerning challenges, but all of them provided that an accused could challenge either admissibility or jurisdiction. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 157–164. Article 36 in the Preparatory Commission's Dec. 1997 report provided that challenges could be made by an accused or, in square brackets, 'a suspect', who was defined in a footnote as including 'a person who is the subject to [sic] an investigation', but it noted that another option would be 'to limit the right to challenge to a suspect arrested on the basis of a pre-indictment arrest warrant'. Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 34 note 15. Identical formulations were included in article 12 [36] in the Zutphen Draft, p. 44 note 63 and in article 17 para. 2 of the New York Draft, p. 52 note 48.

⁷⁷ It is difficult to discern the reasons for the two positions since none of those who favoured extending this right to suspects explained their position in the Committee of the Whole and only two of those favouring limiting it to the accused gave any reasons and they are not particularly enlightening. UN Diplomatic Conf. of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an ICC, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Official Records, Vol. 2; United States, 22 June 1998, p. 215 (would complicate the Court procedures); Philippines, 22 June 1998, p. 216 (would be pointless). However, one of those involved in the drafting of article 19 has informed the authors that the reason for including persons for whom an arrest warrant or summons had been issued was to permit jurisdictional and admissibility challenges before the confirmation hearing, but not when a person had simply been identified as a suspect (a person for whom there are grounds to believe that he or she committed a crime).

The First Edition of this Commentary, published a year before the Preparatory Commission adopted the draft Rules of Procedure and Evidence, stated that it would be consistent with the structure of the Rome Statute, as well as with the approach at the time of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and ICTR, to define a person as an accused when he or she was identified in the document containing the charges referred to in article 61 para. 3(a), which must be provided to the person concerned at ‘a reasonable time before the [confirmation] hearing’⁷⁸. It was suggested that this moment would appear to be a better reference point than the later stage when the charges are confirmed in accordance with article 61 para. 7(a). Thus once a person was identified he or she should then be considered as an accused under the Statute unless the charges are not confirmed or the person is acquitted or convicted⁷⁹.

However, it appears that the drafters of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, noting that the first instance in the Rome Statute that the person charged is called an ‘accused’ is in article 61 para. 9 (after the charges have been confirmed), have identified the person charged simply as a ‘person’ or ‘person charged’ pending confirmation of the charges, and as an ‘accused’ thereafter⁸⁰. This exact matter arose in the Court’s first confirmation of charges hearing in Lubanga, when on the opening day Defence counsel objected to his client being referred to as ‘the accused’ in an official ICC newsletter. The following day the Pre-Trial Chamber clarified in court that Lubanga was not an accused but rather a suspect.⁸¹ A suspect only becomes an accused upon the charges being confirmed.

‘[A] person for whom a warrant of arrest [...] has been issued under article 58’ must be a person for whom ‘[t]here are reasonable grounds to believe [...] has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ and whose arrest ‘appears necessary’ on specified grounds (article 58 para. 1). ‘[A] person for whom [...] a summons to appear has been issued under article 58’ is someone who the Pre-Trial Chamber believes would appear upon such a summons being served upon him or her. As a practical matter, if the arrest warrant is sealed, the person subject to the warrant will not be able to avail himself or herself of the right to challenge jurisdiction or admissibility until he or she is in the custody of the Court or national authorities.

⁷⁸ The document containing the charges is similar to an indictment outlining the charges submitted in a common law system either to a grand jury or to a judge for confirmation, but with more information than included in the arrest warrant.

⁷⁹ Rule 2(A) of the ICTY Rules previously defined an accused as ‘[a] person against whom an indictment has been submitted in accordance with Rule 47’. Due to an amendment on 25 Jul. 1997, an accused is now defined as ‘[a] person against whom one or more counts in an indictment have been confirmed in accordance with Rule 47’. Rule 47 distinguishes the submission of the indictment by the Prosecutor to a Judge for confirmation from the confirmation of the indictment. The ICTR Rules have also adopted the latter definition of an accused in its rule 2(A) and have maintained the general structure of the ICTY’s rule 47 in its own rule 47. Rules 2(A) and 47 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Residual Special Court for Sierra Leone and rules 2(A) and 68 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon are similar. Rule 2(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals defines an accused as ‘[a] person indicted by the ICTY, the ICTR or the Mechanism in accordance with Article 1 of the [MICT] Statute’.

⁸⁰ Articles 58 and 59 use ‘the person’. With respect to the Rules, see, e.g., up to the confirmation hearing: rule 117 sub-rule 1 (‘the person’) and sub-rule 2 (‘the person arrested’); rule 118 sub-rule 1 (‘the person’), sub-rule 2 (‘a person’) and sub-rule 3 (‘the detained person’); rule 119 sub-rule 1 (‘the person’) and sub-rule 2 (‘[t]he person concerned’); rule 120 (‘the person in the custody of the Court’); rule 121 sub-rule 1 (‘[a] person subject to a warrant of arrest or a summons’), sub-rule 2(a) (‘[t]he person concerned’) and sub-rule 4 (‘the person’); rule 122 (title) (‘the person charged’); rule 123 (title) (‘the person concerned’) and (‘a person’); rule 124 sub-rule 1 (‘the person concerned’) and sub-rule 3 (‘the person’); rule 125 sub-rule 1 (‘the person concerned’); rule 126 (‘the person concerned’); rule 128 (‘the person concerned’) and, after the confirmation hearing: rule 128 (Amendment of the charges) (‘the accused’). However, the use of the terms is not entirely consistent. Rule 129 uses both ‘accused’ and ‘the person concerned’.

⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-32-EN, Transcript, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 Nov. 2006, p. 36, lines 15–22:

‘[T]he Presiding Judge would like to recall that it is inadmissible that, in this newsletter[] [...] the term ‘accused’ was used to refer to Thomas Lubanga Dyilo [...]. [T]he Chamber orders the Registrar to draft an explanatory note as soon as possible to inform the public that the status of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo [...] is a suspect, not an accused person.’

- 25 A witness or any other person, such as a person accused of an ‘offence against the administration of justice’ under article 70, would not be authorized under article 19 to challenge the admissibility of a case or the Court’s jurisdiction over a case because they would neither be accused nor believed to have committed ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’, as identified in article 5⁸². The Court has therefore on a number of occasions denied article 19 para. 2(a) standing for ad hoc defence counsel and the Office of Public Counsel for the Defence when no arrest warrant or summons to appear had been issued⁸³.
- 26 b) Investigating or prosecuting States. ‘A State which has jurisdiction over a case’ may challenge the Court’s jurisdiction over a case or the admissibility of a case ‘on the ground that it is investigating or prosecuting the case or has investigated or prosecuted’⁸⁴. This formulation is narrower and more precise than the one used during the drafting of this provision⁸⁵. Given the text’s plain language, paragraph 2(b) can only include those States that have vested their courts with jurisdiction under national law over the relevant case. Such ⁸² Article 70 has been implemented by rule 163 sub-rule 2, which provides that ‘[t]he provisions of Part 2 [of the Rome Statute], and any rules thereunder, shall not apply, with the exception of article 21 [concerning applicable law]’. However, since under article 19 para. 1 the Court has a duty to decide whether it has jurisdiction over a case and may, on its own motion, determine whether a case is admissible, there is nothing that prevents it from considering any information relevant to these questions in proceedings ancillary to a case where the prosecution of offences against the administration of justice are involved. Thus, in Bemba et al. the Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed proprio motu that it did indeed have jurisdiction over the case in their decision on the confirmation of charges: Prosecutor v. Bemba et al., ICC-01/05-01/13-749, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 11 Nov. 2014, para. 8. In contrast to article 17, which provides that a case is inadmissible when a State is able and willing to investigate or prosecute genuinely a crime within the Court’s jurisdiction, article 70 para. 4(b) requires States Parties to submit offences against the administration of justice to their competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution on request by the Court ‘whenever it deems it proper’, leaving little scope for any admissibility challenge when the Court decides to prosecute the case itself.

⁸³ See Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-93, Decision Following the Consultation held on 11 October 2005 and the Prosecution’s Submission on Jurisdiction and Admissibility Filed on 31 October 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 9 Nov. 2005, p. 4; Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-34, Décision relative aux conclusions aux fins d’exception d’incompétence et d’irrecevabilité, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 22 Nov. 2006, pp. 3–4; Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-111-Corr, Corrigendum to Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of Applicants a/0011/06 to a/0015/06, a/0021/07, a/0023/07 to a/0033/07 and a/0035/07 to a/0038/07, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 Dec. 2007, para. 25.

⁸⁴ In contrast, article 18 para. 1 uses a different formulation when it requires notice to all States Parties and to ‘those States which, taking into account the information available, would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned’.

⁸⁵ Article 34 (Challenges to jurisdiction) of the ILC Draft Statute provided that ‘[c]hallenges to the jurisdiction of the Court may be made, in accordance with the Rules: (a) prior to or at the commencement of the hearing, by an accused or any interested State’. This provision did not define the term ‘any interested State’, but the ILC explained in the 1994 ILC Report, commentary on article 34 that:

‘The court can be called on to exercise its powers under article 34 either by the accused or by any interested State. The term ‘interested State’ is not defined but is intended to be interpreted broadly. For example a State which has lodged an extradition request with respect to an accused would be an ‘interested State’ for this purpose, as also a State whose cooperation had been sought under part seven of the statute’.

Similarly, article 35 (Issues of admissibility) of the ILC Draft Statute provided that ‘an interested State’ could request the Court to determine that a case was inadmissible, but gave no further definition and it required no connection with the case. There does not seem to be any significant difference intended between the two provisions regarding which interested States might challenge jurisdiction and which ones might challenge admissibility, simply because the first article uses ‘any’ and the second uses ‘an’.

In the Preparatory Commission’s 1996 discussions, it was suggested that the term ‘any interested State’ be defined and several possibilities were advanced during the discussions, including: the State of the accused’s nationality, the State of the victim’s nationality, the State with custody of the accused, the territorial State or any other State which could exercise jurisdiction, however other States said that any State should be able to make such a challenge. 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39. However, only one of the compilation of proposals regarding article 35 (and none regarding article 34) suggested a definition. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 161 (French proposal limited challenges to any State party).

Article 36 para. 2 (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the draft proposed by the Preparatory Committee at its December 1997 session provided that admissibility and jurisdiction challenges could be made by ‘[A State] [An interested] [State Party] which has jurisdiction over the crime’. Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 34. This formulation was retained without change in article 12 jurisdiction can take the form of any of the different recognised jurisdictional bases: the territorial principle (or objective territorial principle), the nationality or active personality principle, passive personality principle, the protective principle, or the universality principle. It should be noted that attempts during the negotiations of this article to limit the right to make challenges to only States Parties failed⁸⁶. It would thus appear that any State – so long as it has jurisdiction over the relevant case – can file challenges under article 19 para. 2(b), including those States that are not States Parties to the Rome Statute.

The second limitation on States that may challenge the Court's jurisdiction or the admissibility of a case is inelegantly drafted, since whether a State is investigating or prosecuting a case has no bearing on the Court's jurisdiction, only on the admissibility of the case⁸⁷. Although the chapeau of paragraph 2 refers to '[c]hallenges to the admissibility of a case on the grounds referred to in article 17', subparagraph (b) appears to limit these grounds to those listed in article 17 para. 1 (a) and (b) (genuine State investigation or prosecution)⁸⁸ and para. (c) (ne bis in idem) (since a trial would necessarily have involved a prosecution), thus excluding para. (d) (insufficient gravity)⁸⁹. However, nothing in paragraph 2 prevents States that have referred a situation in their own territory to the Prosecutor from making an admissibility or jurisdictional challenge. Nevertheless, the State would have to demonstrate that circumstances have changed and that it is now able and willing to investigate and, if there is sufficient admissible evidence, to prosecute. It must also be noted that as per article 95, pending a ruling by the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, a State that submits an admissibility challenge may postpone complying with co-operation and judicial assistance para. 2(b) [36] (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the Zutphen Draft and article 17 para. 2(b) of the New York Draft.

⁸⁶ Those who favoured limiting the right to challenge to only States Parties argued that States who were not Parties 'did not share the burden of obligations under the Statute, to share the privilege of challenging the jurisdiction of the Court' (Italy), UN Diplomatic Conf. of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an ICC, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Official Records, Vol. 2, 23 June 1998, p. 220; and that the Court would not be able to determine whether they observed the principles of the Statute (Philippines). Ibid., p. 216. Those who favoured extending the right to States who were not Parties asserted that 'if a State that was not a party was carrying out an effective prosecution in its own territory, there was no reason for the Court to intervene and also conduct a prosecution' (United Kingdom), ibid., p. 215, and that it was more consistent with complementarity (Singapore). Ibid., p. 219.

⁸⁷ One of those involved in the drafting of this provision explained that the limitation to challenges by States with jurisdiction 'was intended to forestall situations where a State could challenge (and delay) the Court from proceeding with a case on the ground that it was investigating when in fact the investigation or prosecution was sure to fail because the State lacked jurisdiction even as far as its own courts were concerned'. Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute – Issues – Negotiations – Results (1999) 41, 67. However, whether the State concerned is investigating or prosecuting or has done so is not a ground to challenge the Court's jurisdiction, only the admissibility of the case.

⁸⁸ Paragraph 2(b), in contrast to article 17 para. 1(a) and (b), omits the qualifier 'genuinely'. However, the omission was probably inadvertent and in any event, in practice neither Pre-Trial Chamber I nor the Appeals Chamber omitted it in its analysis of the challenge by Libya (where genuineness was at issue). See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-344-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 31 May 2013; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Oct. 2013; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014.

⁸⁹ However, one Pre-Trial Chamber, instead of holding that a State cannot invoke gravity in an article 19 para. 2(b) challenge, has simply stated that: '[a]s to the second limb (gravity), since [...] Kenya does not contest this element, the Chamber shall confine its examination to [...] whether there are actually ongoing domestic proceedings (complementarity)'. See Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-96, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011, para. 45; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011, para. 49.

(Part IX) requests unless the Prosecutor has obtained specific authority from the Court under article 19 para. 8⁹⁰. As of 31 May 2015, three States – Kenya, Libya and Côte d’Ivoire have made challenges pursuant to article 19 para. 2 (b)⁹¹.

- 28 c) Article 12 States. Even if a State does not satisfy the requirements of subparagraph (b) (it is investigating or prosecuting the case or has done so) for making a challenge under article 19, it may still be able to do so if it is ‘[a] State from which acceptance of jurisdiction is required under article 12’. Such State acceptance is clearly not required if the Security Council refers a situation to the Prosecutor pursuant to article 13 para. (b). However, it is a prerequisite to a situation being referred to the Prosecutor by a State under article 13 para. (a) or to the Prosecutor initiating an investigation pursuant to articles 13 para. (c) and 15 para. 1. Such acceptance occurs pursuant to an article 12 para. 3 declaration by a State that is not a Party to the Rome Statute or when the State joins the Court (thereby accepting the Court’s jurisdiction). In turn, this makes them subject to articles 12 para. 2(a) and (b). However, it must be noted that article 12 para. 2(b) refers to an ‘accused’ person who is a national of a State Party or of the State that has lodged an article 12 para. 3 declaration. Since, as discussed in the context of article 19 para. 2(a), a suspect does not become an accused until the charges are confirmed, this suggests that a State can only challenge admissibility or jurisdiction under article 19 para. 2(c) upon that eventuality. This perhaps explains why Kenya did not file its challenge under this provision in the Ruto et al. and Muthaura et al. cases and instead opted for article 19 para. 2(b)⁹². On the other hand, Côte d’Ivoire’s challenge in the S. Gbagbo case before Pre-Trial Chamber I invoked article 19 para. 2(c) (in addition to article 19 para. 2(b)) when the confirmation of charges proceedings had not even begun⁹³. Unfortunately, in its decision, the Chamber did not address article 19 para. 2(c) but instead only relied upon article 19 para. 2(b)⁹⁴. Nevertheless, it should be noted that, as the Kenya example shows, a State capable of bringing forth an article 12 para. 2(c) challenge will also, by definition, be able to bring a challenge under article 12 para. 2(b). However, in contrast to paragraph 2(b), paragraph 2(c) is not drafted in a limiting fashion and thus a State could challenge admissibility on any ground under article 17, including insufficient gravity (article 17 para. 1(d)). It would be wise for the Court to adopt a liberal interpretation of the word ‘accused’ in this particular context. To adhere to a strict interpretation would incur the odd result that States that are not States Parties to the Rome Statute would be able to challenge admissibility whilst the relevant person is a suspect (although not on gravity grounds), whilst States Parties (or States that have filed an article 12 para. 3 declaration) would have to wait until charges are confirmed before they are able to file a challenge under paragraph 2(c).

⁹⁰ Article 95, however, has no application in article 19 appellate proceedings: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 27.

⁹¹ Côte d’Ivoire originally submitted an article 12 para. 3 declaration accepting the Court’s jurisdiction (subsequently becoming a State Party) and thus its filing refers both to article 19 para. 2(b) and para. 2(c): Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-11-Red, Requête de la République de Côte d’Ivoire sur la recevabilité de l’affaire le Procureur c. Simone Gbagbo, et Demande de sursis à exécution en vertu des Articles 17, 19 et 95 du Statut de Rome, Government of Côte d’Ivoire, 30 Sep. 2013, paras. 16–17.

⁹² See Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-19 and ICC-01/09-02/11-26, Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Government of Kenya, 31 Mar. 2011, para. 1.

⁹³ See Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-11-Red, Requête de la République de Côte d’Ivoire sur la recevabilité de l’affaire le Procureur c. Simone Gbagbo, et Demande de sursis à exécution en vertu des Articles 17, 19 et 95 du Statut de Rome, Government of Côte d’Ivoire, 30 Sep. 2013, paras. 16–17.

⁹⁴ See Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Dec. 2014, para. 26. This matter remained unaddressed on appeal: Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d’Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’, Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015.

As with subparagraph (b), States that fall within subparagraph (c) may also take advantage of article 95 and postpone the execution of co-operation and judicial assistance (Part IX) requests whilst the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber consider an admissibility challenge unless the Court has specifically authorized the Prosecutor to collect evidence pursuant to article 19 para. 8⁹⁵.

d) Certain aspects of the procedure for considering challenges. A request or application made under article 19 must be made in writing and must ‘contain the basis for it’ as per rule 58 sub-rule 1⁹⁶. Where a filing is devoid of the basis for a challenge, the Court has held that ‘no admissibility challenge has been made as required by rule 58 of the Rules’⁹⁷. Regulation 38 sub-regulation 1(c) stipulates that a challenge pursuant to article 19 para. 2 must not exceed 100 pages in length unless otherwise ordered⁹⁸. Rule 58 sub-rule 2 gives the Chamber (the Pre-Trial Chamber, unless a Trial Chamber has been designated) considering a challenge or question concerning jurisdiction or admissibility or when acting on its own motion, the discretion to ‘decide on the procedure to be followed’ and to ‘take appropriate measures for the proper conduct of the proceedings’. This includes the holding of a hearing and joining this matter with ‘a confirmation or trial proceeding as long as this does not cause undue delay, and in this circumstance shall hear and decide on the challenge or question first’⁹⁹. In light of this broad discretionary mandate, the Appeals Chamber has upheld various exercises of discretion including decisions not to hold hearings¹⁰⁰, to decide challenges prior to ⁹⁵ As pointed out earlier on, article 95 ceases to apply once the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber has disposed of the admissibility challenge: Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Dec. 2014, para. 80. Article 95 has no application in article 19 appellate proceedings: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Case No. ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 27.

⁹⁶ There does not appear to be any difference between a request or an application under article 19. The term ‘request’ in that article appears only in paragraphs 10 (Prosecutor request to review a decision that a case is inadmissible) and 11 (Prosecutor request to a State for information about its investigation or prosecution). However, rule 58 sub-rule 2, which was drafted to make sure that both terms used in article 19 were covered, makes no distinction between requests or applications raising a challenge or question concerning jurisdiction or admissibility.

⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-165, Decision on the Schedule for the Confirmation of Charges Hearing, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 22 Sep. 2014, para. 7 (where the Defence merely expressed its intention to raise an admissibility challenge).

⁹⁸ See Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-886-tENG, Decision on Urgent Application by Germain Katanga’s Defence for an Extension of the Page Limit, Trial Chamber II, 10 Feb. 2009, para. 2.

⁹⁹ Nevertheless, where a challenge is initiated in close proximity to the beginning of the confirmation of charges hearing, the Court has previously refused to entertain oral arguments relating to the challenge at that hearing: Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-T-5-Red-ENG, Transcript, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 Sep. 2014, p. 5, lines 10–14. Several rules clarify the procedure to be followed at each successive stage. ‘If a question or challenge concerning jurisdiction or admissibility arises’ at a confirmation hearing, rule 122 (2) provides that ‘rule 58 applies’. Rule 60 provides:

‘If a challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court or to the admissibility of a case is made after a confirmation of the charges but before the constitution or designation of the Trial Chamber, it shall be addressed to the Presidency, which shall refer it to the Trial Chamber as soon as the latter is constituted or designated in accordance with rule 130’.

Rule 133 provides that ‘[c]hallenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of the case at the commencement of the trial, or subsequently with the leave of the Court, shall be dealt with by the Presiding Judge and the Trial Chamber in accordance with rule 58’ (for the sole ground for a challenge permitted at this stage, see discussion of article 19 para. 4, margin No. 42 below).

¹⁰⁰ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 110–114; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., Case No. ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 108–112.

determining requests for assistance¹⁰¹, to deny further time for the parties to submit additional evidence¹⁰², to deny Defence requests for unredacted evidence¹⁰³, and with respect to the participation of the concerned person in proceedings¹⁰⁴. In determining appeals on such matters, the Appeals Chamber has spoken clearly:

‘[It] will not interfere with the [...] Chamber’s exercise of discretion [...] merely because the Appeals Chamber, if it had the power, might have made a different ruling. [...] [T]he Appeals Chamber will not interfere with the [...] Chamber’s exercise of discretion [...] save where it is shown that [the] determination was vitiated by an error of law, an error of fact, or a procedural error, and then, only if the error materially affected the determination. This means in effect that the Appeals Chamber will interfere with a discretionary decision only under limited conditions’¹⁰⁵.

- 31 Rule 58 sub-rule 3 requires the Court to transmit the request or application to the Prosecutor and (when the request or application has been made by a State) to ‘the person referred to in article 19, paragraph 2, who has been surrendered to the Court or who has appeared voluntarily or pursuant to a summons’. The relevant Chamber must then ‘allow them to submit written observations to the request or application within a period of time determined by the Chamber’. This right to submit observations ‘extends to all the evidence provided in support of the challenge, irrespective of whether it was filed together with the challenge or submitted thereafter in the course of the admissibility proceedings’¹⁰⁶. However, the wording of rule 58 sub-rule 3 is unfortunate, because it does not explicitly require the Court, as confirmed by the Appeals Chamber¹⁰⁷, to inform a person who has been arrested and is being detained by national authorities but has not yet been surrendered to the Court, ¹⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 122–124; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 120–122.

¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 97–101; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 95–99; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, paras. 159–180.

¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, paras. 78–81.

¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, paras. 145–158 (where Al-Senussi had not been able to meet or instruct the Defence).

¹⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/-5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute’ of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, paras. 79–80.

¹⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Dec. 2014, para. 38 (but holding that in the specific circumstances before it, submissions from the Prosecution on the additional evidence presented by Côte d’Ivoire was not necessary to ensure the fairness of the admissibility proceedings nor would it assist in disposing of the challenge).

¹⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 146: ‘[t]he right to participate under rule 58(3) [...], however, does not extend to any person in respect of whom a warrant of arrest or summons to appear has been issued; it only applies to suspects who have either surrendered to the Court or who have appeared before it’ (emphasis in original).

or a person subject to a summons who has not yet purchased an airline ticket to the seat of the Court, that the request or application has been made or afford them a right to file submissions. Rule 58 sub-rule 3 is in marked contrast to rule 59 sub-rules 1 and 3, which require that those who referred a situation and victims be informed of the challenge or question (see margin No. 33 below).

Nevertheless, as the Appeals Chamber has also made clear, '[s]ave for these express stipulations [in rule 58 sub-rule 3], the [...] Chamber enjoys broad discretion in determining how to conduct the proceedings relating to challenges to the admissibility of a case'¹⁰⁸. Thus in practice, the Court has permitted suspects who technically fall outside of rule 58 sub-rule 3 to be notified of challenges and to submit written filings.¹⁰⁹ But the wording of this rule has also had, arguably, a negative effect. In the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case – where the suspect had not been afforded the chance to communicate with or to instruct his Defence by the State authorities detaining him – the Appeals Chamber was able to point out, in dismissing his appeal, that the suspect did not have the right to submit his observations under the rule and that therefore the matter fell within the broad discretion of the Pre-Trial Chamber which had not exercised it erroneously¹¹⁰. This particular outcome is most unsatisfactory. Whilst correct in law on the most technical of grounds, both common sense and due process concerns indicate that such persons should be able to participate effectively and in a meaningful way in article 19 challenges by submitting written observations. Unfortunately, until the rule is amended, it has the potential to lead to further breaches of procedural fairness.

Sub-rule 4 requires that the Court (the relevant Chamber) 'rule on the challenge or question of jurisdiction first and then on any challenge or question of admissibility'. This had led one Pre-Trial Chamber to opine that it 'must dispose of the challenge to the admissibility of the case prior to [...] determin[ing] [...] whether to confirm or not the charges under article 61(7) of the Statute'¹¹¹. Additionally, rule 59 sub-rule 1 requires the Registrar to inform the ¹⁰⁸ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 87 and Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, para. 89. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 160; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 149.

¹⁰⁹ See Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-40, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the Application of the Government of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 4 Apr. 2011, para. 12 (where the suspects had not yet made their initial appearances before the Court); Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-131, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the Application of the Government of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 4 Apr. 2011, para. 12 (where the suspects had not yet made their initial appearances before the Court); Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-134, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the 'Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Pursuant to Article 19 of the Statute', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 May 2012, para. 11 (where the suspect was in custody in Libya); Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-325, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the 'Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 19 of the Statute', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Apr. 2013, para. 8 (where the suspect was in custody in Libya); Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-15, Decision on the Conduct of Proceedings Following Côte d'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 15 Nov. 2013, para. 8 (where the suspect was in custody in Côte d'Ivoire).

¹¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, paras. 145–158.

¹¹¹ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-185, Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Charles Blé Goudé for Insufficient Gravity, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Nov. 2014, para. 10 (incorrectly citing rule 58 sub-rule 1).

Security Council or State Party that referred a situation to the Court pursuant to article 13 and 'victims who have already have communicated with the Court in relation to that case or their legal representatives' of any challenge or question concerning jurisdiction or admissibility under article 19 paras. 1–3. In making that notification, sub-rule 2 requires the Registrar to do so 'in a manner consistent with the duty of the Court regarding confidentiality of information, the protection of any person and the preservation of evidence' and shall provide with the notification 'a summary of the grounds on which the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of the case has been challenged'. As the Appeals Chamber has found, this rule (together with other provisions) reflect 'an overarching concern to ensure that persons are not unjustifiably exposed to risk through the activities of the Court'¹¹². Since such considerations will vary greatly from case to case, so too will its application. Thus in the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case, the Court was content with notifying victims and the Security Council of Libya's admissibility challenge to Gaddafi's case in its public redacted form together with its public annexes¹¹³. Yet, when Libya challenged the admissibility of the case against Al-Senussi, the Security Council was only notified of the public redacted version together with its public annexes, whereas the victims had access to the confidential redacted version¹¹⁴. Sub-rule 3 permits those notified to 'make representation in writing to the competent Chamber within such time limit as it considers appropriate'. Such deadlines are obviously subject to the Chamber's wide discretion. However, where victims have not participated in jurisdiction and admissibility proceedings either before the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, they will be constrained from doing so in appeal proceedings under article 19 para. 6¹¹⁵.

III. Paragraph 3: Right to seek rulings and to submit observations

- 34 The right of the Prosecutor to 'seek a ruling from the Court regarding a question of jurisdiction or admissibility' permits the Prosecutor to obtain a prompt ruling from the Court on these questions at any stage¹¹⁶ and however many times it may be necessary, whether the question related to an entire situation (in certain circumstances described below) or to an individual case¹¹⁷. Pursuant to Regulation 38 sub-regulation 2(b), a request under this article ¹¹² Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statement', Appeals Chamber, 13 May 2008, para. 54.

¹¹³ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-134, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the 'Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Pursuant to Article 19 of the Statute', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 May 2012, para. 14.

¹¹⁴ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-325, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the 'Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 19 of the Statute', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Apr. 2013, para. 14.

¹¹⁵ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-400, Decision on 'Observations on the 'Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, paras. 12–15; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-390, Decision on 'Observations on the 'Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, paras. 12–15.

¹¹⁶ Where a case is found to be inadmissible by the Court, subsequent proceedings by the Prosecutor that seek to revisit the issue should proceed under article 19 para. 10 and not article 19 para. 3.

¹¹⁷ Neither article 34 (Challenges to jurisdiction) nor 35 (Issues of admissibility) of the ILC Draft Statute contained any provision expressly authorizing the Prosecutor to challenge admissibility or jurisdiction. Similarly, none of the Preparatory Commission's 1996 compilation of proposals regarding these articles included such a provision. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 152–164. However, apparently after the Office of the Prosecutor of the ICTY and the ICTR brought concerns to the attention of States, article 36 para. 2(b) (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the draft proposed by the Preparatory Committee at its Dec. 1997 session provided that '[t]he Prosecutor may seek a ruling from the Court regarding a question of jurisdiction or admissibility'. Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 34. This formulation was retained without change in article 12 para. 2(b) [36] (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the Zutphen Draft and article 17 para. 2(b) of the New York Draft.

must not exceed 50 pages in length unless otherwise ordered¹¹⁸. The Prosecutor has not, as of 31 May 2015, made a formal article 19 para. 3 request. Nevertheless, in accordance with the general principle of law that the party making allegations concerning a matter in dispute has the burden of proof (see margin No. 15 above), the Prosecutor would often have the burden of proof regarding jurisdiction and admissibility. However, in many instances the State or person concerned would have the exclusive, or almost exclusive, knowledge of the matters at issue and, therefore, the burden would appropriately shift towards that State or person under the equally important general principle of law that when the matters in issue are exclusively or largely within the exclusive knowledge of one party, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on that party to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation (see margin No. 15 above). In proceedings relating to admissibility challenges by States the Appeals Chamber has accepted such burden shifting¹¹⁹; there is no apparent reason why it should not apply equally in article 19 para. 3 proceedings. If either the State or the person concerned declined to provide the Prosecutor with information that was relevant to the existence or non-existence of jurisdiction or admissibility, and such information was not readily available from other sources, then jurisdiction and admissibility should be presumed¹²⁰.

Even if the ruling on the Prosecutor's motion did not have a res judicata effect on subsequent challenges, it would, as a practical matter, likely limit the scope of subsequent situation or case challenges (at least with respect to admissibility) to newly discovered information which could not have been discovered with due diligence or to significantly changed circumstances. If the Pre-Trial and Trial Chamber were to require that all challenges to jurisdiction or admissibility before the commencement of the trial had to be heard together with any application by the Prosecutor (see discussion below of paragraphs 4 and 5), this procedure could minimize the possibilities of delay and discourage frivolous State challenges made for the purpose of delay.

In contrast to the wording in paragraphs 1 and 2, the Prosecutor's ability under paragraph 3 to 'seek a ruling regarding a question of jurisdiction or admissibility' is not limited to a 'case'. Therefore, in certain circumstances, the Prosecutor could attempt to seek a ruling that the Court has jurisdiction over an entire situation or that the situation was admissible, although this view is not universally accepted¹²¹. In other words, the Prosecutor could perhaps seek a prompt determination that the Court has jurisdiction over crimes committed within a situation or, in certain clear-cut instances, that investigations and prosecutions were admissible in a situation where there is no doubt that the State's judicial system was unable or unwilling to genuinely investigate or prosecute, thus conserving the Court's resources so that these issues do not have to be relitigated case by case. Thus, the State concerned may still subsequently demonstrate to the Court that it is indeed able to investigate and prosecute genuinely in courts that function fairly and effectively. However, the Prosecutor has so far proceeded very cautiously and has not sought an early ruling pursuant to paragraph 3 on admissibility or jurisdiction with regard to any of the Court's situations. As a result, in the majority of cases it has been either a State or the accused that has challenged admissibility or jurisdiction.

The right guaranteed in the second sentence of paragraph 3 to those who have submitted a situation to the Prosecutor pursuant to article 13, as well as victims, to submit observations to the Court '[i]n proceedings with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility' ensures that all relevant points of view are heard (provided that the person subject to the proceedings is

¹¹⁸ See Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-717, Reasons for the Appeals Chamber's Decision of 16 November 2006 on the 'Prosecution's Request for an Extension of the Page Limit', Appeals Chamber, 17 Nov. 2006, para. 8.

¹¹⁹ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 167.

¹²⁰ See supra note 56.

¹²¹ Ideally, such a possibility should have been provided for in article 18. In any event, article 19 as a whole – as is apparent from its title – at least with respect to admissibility, applies to 'case[s]'.

informed, see discussion of rules 58 and 59 at margin Nos. 31–32 above)¹²². This includes the direct and verbatim views of individual victims, even where they make substantive or factual assertions relating to the merits of the crimes alleged (although these are only considered for the purposes of the jurisdiction or admissibility challenge)¹²³. This right is reinforced by rule 59 sub-rule 1, which requires the Registrar to inform ‘[t]hose who have referred a situation pursuant to article 13’ and ‘[t]he victims who have already communicated with the Court in relation to that case or their legal representatives’¹²⁴ about ‘any question or challenge of jurisdiction or admissibility which has arisen pursuant to article 19, paragraphs 1, 2 and 3’. However, in cases when it is not the State or the Security Council that referred the situation and the Prosecutor commences proceedings proprio motu, the Appeals Chamber has held that this rule does not apply. Nevertheless, the Chamber has also opined that soliciting the views of the relevant State or the Security Council falls within the Court’s discretion pursuant to rule 58 sub-rule 2¹²⁵. When informing those entitled to receive such information, rule 59 sub-rule 2 requires the Registrar to do so ‘in a manner consistent with the duty of the Court regarding the confidentiality of the information, the protection of any person and the preservation of evidence, with a summary of the grounds on which the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of the case has been challenged’. Where jurisdiction or admissibility matters arise at the arrest warrant stage, where proceedings and filings are under seal and ex parte (Prosecutor only), the Appeals Chamber has rightly held that the second sentence of paragraph 3 should have no application, as it would produce absurd results¹²⁶.

38 Although nothing in article 19 para. 3 limits observations to being submitted in written form, rule 59 sub-rule 3 provides only for written representations in article 19 proceedings. Nevertheless, in the exercise of their wide discretion under rule 58 sub-rule 2, some Chambers have held hearings (in addition to receiving written submissions), and have permitted oral presentations by the person(s) concerned, victims and States¹²⁷. The term

¹²² One should bear in mind that although this provision appears – somewhat awkwardly – in a provision that permits the Prosecutor to request a ruling on jurisdiction and admissibility, its application is not limited to only such a circumstance. Rather, the Court has consistently applied it in the context of challenges pursuant to article 19.

¹²³ See Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-185, Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Charles Blé Goudé for Insufficient Gravity, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 Nov. 2014, paras 13–15 (where the victims had made such assertions in their observations to the suspect’s admissibility challenge after the end of the confirmation of charges hearing).

¹²⁴ These victims encompass: ‘a) those victims who have been admitted to participate in the Case or their legal representatives; and b) those applicants who have submitted applications to be admitted to participate with respect to the Case or their legal representatives[.]’ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-320, Decision Initiating Proceedings under Article 19, Requesting Observations and Appointing Counsel for the Defence, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 21 Oct. 2008, p. 7. With respect to the latter group, the practice of the Court has been to appoint the Office of Public Counsel for Victims to make submissions on their behalf whilst their applications are considered. In addition, unlike article 68 para. 3 which permits victim participation ‘[w]here the[ir] personal interests [...] are affected’, article 19 para. 3 is not so constrained, thus ‘accord[ing] a specific right of participation to victims’: Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-101-tENG-Corr, Decision on the Application for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 17 Jan. 2006, para. 62.

¹²⁵ Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-321, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on Jurisdiction and Stay of the Proceedings, Appeals Chamber, 12 Dec. 2012, paras. 38–43 (holding that the Pre-Trial Chamber nevertheless erred by not further applying rule 103). See also Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-340, Decision on ‘Request by the Government of Kenya in Respect of the Confirmation of Charges Proceedings’, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Sep. 2011, para. 9.

¹²⁶ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor’s Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58’, Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006, paras. 30–31.

¹²⁷ See for example, Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1163-tENG, Order to Convene a Hearing (Rule 58(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence), Trial Chamber II, 22 May 2009; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-22-tENG, Transcript, Trial Chamber III, 27 Apr. 2010; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-207, Order Convening a Hearing on Libya’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 Sep. 2012. While the Security Council has yet to be asked to appear in a hearing, the language of this provision is wide enough to include its participation should the ‘proceedings with respect to [...] admissibility’ is arguably broad enough to include proceedings dealing with preliminary challenges to admissibility under article 18. However, the linear approach to articles 15, 18 and 19, the placement of the provision in article 19 (but not in article 18), and the drafting history of article 18 suggest that this provision applies exclusively to article 19 proceedings¹²⁸.

IV. Paragraph 4: Limits on the number of challenges

Paragraph 4 limits persons or States referred to in paragraph 2 to one challenge to jurisdiction or to admissibility. However, a challenge by the concerned person does not preclude a State with jurisdiction from mounting its own challenge; and vice versa. In other words, both the person and the State have at least one chance to bring a challenge independent of each other. Neither is the concerned person nor a State precluded under this paragraph from filing one challenge on jurisdiction and another subsequent separate challenge on admissibility¹²⁹. As Pre-Trial Chamber II has stated (which is equally applicable to jurisdictional challenges):

[T]he Statute does not rule out the possibility that multiple determinations of admissibility may be made in a given case. Whilst as a general rule the accused may only raise issues of admissibility once, and that is at the commencement of the trial or prior to it, the power to bring a challenge under this heading is vested with the accused and a State which has jurisdiction over the case or whose acceptance of jurisdiction is required under article 13 of the Statute. Nowhere is it said that a challenge brought by either of the parties forecloses the bringing of a challenge by another equally legitimate party, nor that the right of either of the parties to bring a challenge is curtailed or otherwise affected by the Chamber’s exercise of its proprio motu powers [under article 19 para. 1]¹³⁰.

Similarly, article 19 para. 4 does not preclude States from filing separate admissibility challenges with respect to multiple persons in the same case, as occurred in the Libya situation. Thus, Libya’s first challenge was ‘understood to only concern the case against Mr Gaddafi’, expressly excluding Al-Senussi¹³¹. In the second challenge which concerned Al-Senussi, the Pre-Trial Chamber emphasised that the challenge was independent from that concerning Gaddafi, noting ‘that the unfolding of the proceedings following the Admissibility Challenge [concerning Al-Senussi] cannot be made dependent upon procedural steps in, or relevant Chamber deem it necessary. On the other hand, other Chambers have rejected holding a hearing altogether: Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the ‘Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Oct. 2011, paras. 62–63; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011, paras. 36–42; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-96, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011, paras. 32–38.

¹²⁸ Proposals expressly authorizing victims to participate in admissibility proceedings conducted pursuant to article 18 were not adopted by the Preparatory Commission. See Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman (2000) 3 YblHumL 289, 315 note 160. However, the failure to provide such express authorization is, to some extent, offset by article 68 para. 3, which provides that ‘[w]here the personal interests of the victims are affected, the Court shall permit their views and concerns to be presented and considered at stages of the proceedings determined to be appropriate by the Court’, although this provision leaves the determination to the discretion of the Court.

¹²⁹ See Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-212, Decision on the ‘Corrigendum to the Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court on the basis of Articles 12(3), 19(2), 21(3), 55 and 59 of the Rome Statute filed by the Defence for President Gbagbo (ICC-01/11-01/11-129)’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 15 Aug. 2012 (resolving Gbagbo’s jurisdictional challenge); Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-436-Red, Decision on the ‘Requête relative à la recevabilité de l’affaire en vertu des Articles 19 et 17 du Statut’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Jun. 2013 (resolving Gbagbo’s admissibility challenge).

¹³⁰ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10. Mar. 2009, para. 25.

¹³¹ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-134, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the ‘Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Pursuant to Article 19 of the Statute’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 May 2012, para. 8.

conclusion of, proceedings [in the Gaddafi case] that, although related, are distinct'¹³². Kenya, on the other hand, took a different path. Rather than filing separate admissibility challenges for each of the accused, it filed one challenge that encompassed two separate cases involving multiple suspects¹³³.

40 Paragraph 4 also requires that a challenge 'take place prior to or at the commencement of the trial'¹³⁴. The Second Edition of this Commentary suggested that the Court should develop clear, easy to administer guidelines in their jurisprudence in this area. To date the Court has not been able to do so. The matter first arose in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, where the accused filed his challenge after the Trial Chamber had been constituted but before the parties had made their opening statements, thereby raising the question of what 'commencement of the trial' means. The Trial Chamber, after a lengthy analysis, held that these words referred to the time when the Presidency constitutes a Trial Chamber¹³⁵. However, the Appeals Chamber declined to rule on the correctness of this determination, holding that the Trial Chamber's findings were mere obiter dicta. The Chamber nevertheless stressed that this 'd[id] not necessarily mean that [...] it agree[d] with the Trial Chamber's interpretation'¹³⁶. Without any clear guidance from the Appeals Chamber, another Trial Chamber, when faced with the same situation opted for a different interpretation, 'namely, that the commencement of the trial occurs when the opening statements are made, immediately before the beginning of the evidence'¹³⁷. Which of these two positions is correct will ultimately depend

¹³² Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-325, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following the 'Application on Behalf of the Government of Libya Relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Apr. 2013, para. 10.

¹³³ See Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-19 and ICC-01/09-02/11-26, Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Government of Kenya, 31 Mar. 2011.

¹³⁴ The first proposals contained no limit on the number of challenges or their timing. Article 34 of the ILC Draft Statute did not expressly limit the number of jurisdictional challenges by interested States, but it did require that they be made 'prior to or at the commencement of the hearing', apparently, the trial. Article 35 of the ILC Draft Statute also did not expressly limit the number of admissibility challenges by interested States, but did require that they be made 'at any time prior to the commencement of the trial'. The Preparatory Commission's 1996 compilation of proposals regarding articles 34 and 35 did not contain any proposal expressly limiting the number of challenges. See Preparatory Committee II, pp. 152 -164 (as a practical matter, the French proposal requiring challenges by States Parties to be made within one month after notification of the Prosecutor's intent to investigate would have limited them to one such challenge). However, article 36 para. 3 (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the draft proposed by the 1996 Preparatory Committee at its Dec. 1997 session limited the number and timing of challenges:

'The admissibility of a case or the jurisdiction of the Court may be challenged only once by any person or State referred to in paragraph 2. The challenge must take place prior to or at the commencement of the trial. In exceptional circumstances, the Court may grant leave for a challenge to be brought more than once or at a time later than the commencement of the trial'.

Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 34. This formulation was retained without change in article 12 para. 3 [36] (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the Zutphen Draft and article 17 para. 3 of the New York Draft.

¹³⁵ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 Jun. 2009, para. 49. For academic criticism of this decision see Dov Jacobs, 'The Importance of Being Ernest: The Timeliness of the Challenge to Admissibility in Katanga' (2010) 23(2) LeidenJIL 331-342.

¹³⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 38.

¹³⁷ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 Jun. 2010, para. 210 (relying on Prosecutor v. Lubanga, Case No. ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, Decision on the Status Before the Trial Chamber of the Evidence Heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Trial Proceedings and the Manner in which Evidence shall be Submitted, Trial Chamber I, 13 Dec. 2007, para. 39 (where the same issue had arisen in the context of article 61 para. 9)). The Appeals Chamber was not asked to rule on the matter: Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-962-Corr, Corrigendum to Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 24 June 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Appeals Chamber, 19 Oct. 2010.

on the context of the relevant case; there is certainly support within the Statute for both positions as articulated by the two Trial Chambers. However, until the Appeals Chamber makes a definitive ruling on the issue, this area of the law remains uncertain.

Since article 19 para. 2(b) can encompass a number of States, the Chamber considering an admissibility challenge, which requires the Prosecutor, pursuant to paragraph 7, to suspend the investigation, should rule on it as rapidly as possible (see discussion of article 19 para. 7, margin Nos. 54–55 below). Any other approach could lead to endless delays, particularly where the relevant Chamber is seized of multiple or successive challenges by different States to the admissibility of a case¹³⁸. Although the possibility for States to delay, and, therefore, to undermine the effectiveness of investigations and prosecutions is a potential danger to the Court, the long-standing failure of States to investigate and prosecute international crimes committed since the Second World War suggests that the chances of a large number of such challenges is minimal. Indeed, as of 31 May 2015, not a single State in the world that is able to exercise domestic jurisdiction over such crimes committed in any of the situations currently before the Court – other than the situation State itself – has filed any such challenges.

Paragraph 4 further requires that challenges must be made only once and before or at the commencement of trial so as to ensure a degree of finality. The paragraph nonetheless permits the Court ‘in exceptional circumstances’ to ‘grant leave for a challenge to be brought more than once or at a time later than the commencement of the trial’. These circumstances are not spelled out and since, as of 31 May 2015, no State or individual has attempted a second challenge, the Court has yet to clarify the matter. Nevertheless, it would be consistent with judicial economy and with due process to limit ‘exceptional circumstances’ in a challenge to admissibility by adopting a standard similar to that in article 84 para. 1(a) for revision of convictions or sentences. It would require that the challenge be based on newly discovered information, that the failure to discover that information was not the fault of the State making the new challenge and that the information be sufficiently important so that the decision on admissibility would have been different¹³⁹. Given that both the State and the Court have concurrent jurisdiction over the crimes, if the Court has determined that a case is admissible, the right of the accused to a prompt trial would appear to outweigh the State’s interest in trying the case; a transfer of the case to the State’s court would lead to delay¹⁴⁰. Therefore, the closer a case is to trial the more exceptional the circumstances would have to be to permit a second challenge to admissibility under article 17 para. 1(a) or (b). It is possible to imagine a situation where records of a previous trial in a State where the judicial system has broken down were not available through no fault of the person concerned at the time of the first challenge based on article 17 para. 1(c) (which provides that cases are inadmissible when the person concerned has already been tried unless that trial was designed to shield the person or was not independent or impartial (as per article 20 para. 3)). On the other hand, it is difficult to imagine exceptional circumstances which would permit a second challenge pursuant to article 17 para. 1(d), where a suspect would have originally alleged that a ‘case was not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court’. This is owing to the reality that, as the Appeals Chamber has rightly pointed out, ‘a Chamber determines the gravity of a case only once in the course of the proceedings because the facts underlying the assessment of gravity are unlikely to change and a party may therefore be unable to raise the same issue again in future admissibility challenges’¹⁴¹. Furthermore, since the Court lacks the power to consider a case over which it has no jurisdiction and since it is under a continuing duty to satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction (as per article 19 para. 1), it would make less sense to read ‘exceptional circumstances’ more broadly in the case of a challenge to jurisdiction than to admissibility, particularly since such jurisdictional challenges cannot be used to force the Prosecutor to defer or suspend an investigation (see discussion of article 19 para. 7, margin Nos. 54–55 below).

¹³⁸ In addressing such successive challenges, the relevant Chamber should bear in mind that States will have had an opportunity to make a challenge to admissibility if the Prosecutor, pursuant to article 18 para. 1, had notified them that a situation has been referred to the Court, and should limit successive challenges to raising newly discovered information or significantly changed circumstances. It should also be pointed out that two of the key participants in the drafting of the Rules noted that ‘[t]he most contentious question’ regarding rules to implement article 19 ‘was whether the Court, for the purpose of efficiency, could prompt all those who are eligible to submit a challenge to do so at one and at the same time. No such mechanism could be developed, however, due to the fact that the Statute only allows very specific limitations to the right to make a challenge’ Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman (2000) 3 YblHumL 289, 328.

¹³⁹ A less satisfactory, but still relatively strict standard to minimize the possibility of abusive successive challenges which Chambers could employ would be that contained in article 18 para. 7, which permits a State that has unsuccessfully challenged admissibility under article 18 to make a second challenge under article 19 ‘on the grounds of additional significant facts or significant change of circumstances’.

¹⁴⁰ It is true that some persons would prefer a trial in a national court, thinking that such a court might be more likely to acquit. That ground, absent an improbable showing that the Court would be biased, would not be a valid reason for granting the challenge.

43 The final sentence of paragraph 4 limits, to some extent, the possibility of successive frivolous challenges to admissibility at the commencement of the trial or at later stages by providing, first, that such challenges ‘may be based only on article 17, paragraph 1(c)’ (ne bis in idem) and, second, by reiterating that after the commencement of the trial such challenges may only be made ‘with the leave of the Court’¹⁴². Thus, at this stage, a State making a challenge would not merely have to demonstrate that it had genuinely opened an investigation or commenced a prosecution, but also that it had obtained a final judgment of conviction or acquittal. In addition, the relevant Chamber would have discretion to refuse even to entertain such a belated challenge. These limitations make considerable sense to ensure finality, effectiveness and certainty in the Prosecutor’s investigations and prosecutions. They further serve to minimize disruptions, including the transfer of proceedings to a completely different jurisdiction particularly at the trial stage, which would seriously impede efforts to secure justice without undue delay¹⁴³.

44 Notwithstanding, it should be noted, as outlined earlier, that in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case the Trial Chamber found that an accused’s challenge was filed out of time, since it had held that a trial commenced when a Trial Chamber had been constituted. Ordinarily, such a challenge would have required leave, but due to the uncertainty surrounding the meaning of the words ‘commencement of the trial’ the Chamber exercised its discretion and proceeded to consider the challenge on its merits even though they did not concern article 17, paragraph 1(c) matters¹⁴⁴.

V. Paragraph 5: Prompt challenges by States

45 Paragraph 5 requires States which are permitted to make challenges to jurisdiction or admissibility pursuant to paragraph 2(b) (investigating or prosecuting State) and (c) (article 12

¹⁴¹ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute’ of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, para. 85.

¹⁴² Rule 133 provides that challenges at either stage ‘shall be dealt with by the Presiding Judge and the Trial Chamber in accordance with rule 58’.

¹⁴³ The same considerations restricting the scope of challenges at each stage of the proceedings and particularly after the commencement of a trial would apply to determinations by the relevant Chamber on its own motion concerning the admissibility of a case pursuant to article 19 para. 1, a request by the Prosecutor for a ruling on admissibility at any stage pursuant to article 19 para. 3 or a reconsideration by the Prosecutor pursuant to article 53 para. 2(b).

¹⁴⁴ See Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 Jun. 2009, paras. 56–58. See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 38: ‘the Trial Chamber did not dismiss the admissibility challenge on the basis that it had not been made in time. Instead, the Trial Chamber considered the merits of the challenge and found the case to be admissible’.

State) to ‘make a challenge at the earliest opportunity’¹⁴⁵. Whilst, regrettably, the provision itself does not provide further guidance, does not spell out any sanctions for dilatory challenges and a State challenge has yet to be rejected on these grounds, the Court has nonetheless issued some instructions for future cases where this possibility may arise.

The underlying rationale behind article 19 para. 5 was aptly articulated by a Trial Chamber 46 as being ‘clearly aimed at avoiding challenges to admissibility needlessly hindering or delaying the proceedings, which means that they must be brought as soon as possible, preferably during the trial phase’¹⁴⁶. This should occur ‘once [the State] is in a position to actually assert a conflict of jurisdictions’ and thus ‘[t]he provision does not require a State to challenge admissibility just because the Court has issued a summons to appear’ or a warrant of arrest; it ‘must be seen in the context of the other provisions on admissibility, in particular article 17(1) of the Statute’¹⁴⁷. ‘Therefore, as soon as a State can present its challenge in such a way that it can show a conflict of jurisdictions, it must be submitted’¹⁴⁸. In other words, a ¹⁴⁵ Article 34 para. (a) of the ILC Draft Statute required that jurisdictional challenges by an accused or by any interested State be made ‘prior to or at the commencement of the hearing [apparently, the trial]’, but article 34 para. (b) then permitted an accused to make such a challenge ‘at any later stage of the trial’. The ILC explained in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary on article 34:

‘Challenges under article 34 may be made, in accordance with procedures laid down in the rules, at any time after confirmation of an indictment up to the commencement of the hearing. In addition the accused may challenge the jurisdiction at any later stage of the trial, in which the court would have the discretion to deal with the challenge as a separate issue or to reserve it to be decided as part of its judgement at the conclusion of the trial’. Article 35 of the ILC Draft Statute provided that ‘[t]he Court may on application by the accused or at the request of an interested State at any time prior to the commencement of the trial [...] decide [...] that a case before it is inadmissible’. The ILC stated that ‘[i]ssues arising under article 35 should normally be dealt with as soon as possible after they are made’: 1994 ILC Draft Statute, Commentary to article 35 (presumably, it should have read: ‘after they arise’).

‘As for the time of raising the issue of admissibility’, during the 1996 discussions in the Preparatory Committee, ‘it was generally agreed that it should be prior to, or at the beginning of the trial and not later’. 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39. However, the Preparatory Commission’s 1996 compilation of proposals with regard to article 35 (Issues of admissibility) contained only one proposal, by France, imposing a deadline for challenges. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 161 (this proposal, requiring a State Party wishing to make such a challenge to do so within one month after receiving notice from the Prosecutor that he or she was planning to initiate an investigation, dropped out of the article 19 drafting process, but reappeared in a modified form in the US proposal which became article 18).

Article 36 para. 3 (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the draft proposed by the Preparatory Committee at its Dec. 1997 session limited the number and timing of challenges:

‘The admissibility of a case or the jurisdiction of the Court may be challenged only once by any person or State referred to in paragraph 2. The challenge must take place prior to or at the commencement of the trial. In exceptional circumstances, the Court may grant leave for a challenge to be brought more than once or at a time later than the commencement of the trial’.

Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 35. Paragraph 2(b) listed a variety of definitions of States who could make jurisdictional or admissibility challenges. In addition, newly added article 36 para. 3bis provided that ‘[a] State referred to in paragraph 2 (b) of the present article shall make a challenge at the earliest opportunity’ Ibid. These formulations were retained without change in article 12 paras. 3 and 3bis [36] (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the Zutphen Draft and article 17 paras. 3 and 4 of the New York Draft.

¹⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-TENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 Jun. 2009, para. 44.

¹⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 46, 100; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-274, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 Aug. 2011, paras. 45, 98. See also Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d’Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’, Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, para. 35.

¹⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against

State that is otherwise in a position to bring a challenge should not sit back, or vacillate and let proceedings before the Court continue, at cost in terms of time, human and financial resources, only to later come forward and abort them. States must act with due diligence.

- 47 In order to avoid such problems, the Court has a variety of approaches available, such as requiring that challenges be made by a particular date or before it considers an application by the Prosecutor under paragraph 3 for a ruling ‘regarding a question of jurisdiction or admissibility’. It would also be appropriate if the relevant Chamber determined that the longer the delay between notification of an investigation and the challenge, the less likely that it would be considered timely. Without effective criteria and procedures, States, particularly States hostile to the Court, could attempt to frustrate Court investigations and prosecutions by last-minute challenges to jurisdiction. And then, after such challenges are rejected, they may file new challenges to admissibility. Such challenges result in unwarranted delays and, ultimately, in a denial of justice. The dangers that a State could use such challenges prior to the arrest of a suspect to delay or prevent the arrest have been minimized by the provisions in article 19 para. 8.

VI. Paragraph 6: Allocation of responsibility and appeals

- 48 Article 36 para. 2 of the ILC Draft Statute envisaged that proceedings concerning jurisdiction and admissibility would ‘be decided by the Trial Chamber, unless it considers, having regard to the importance of the issues involved, that the matter should be referred to the Appeals Chamber’. The drafters of paragraph 6 decided, instead, that these matters would be decided by the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, with an automatic right to an interlocutory appeal to the Appeals Chamber¹⁴⁹. Paragraph 6 provides that prior to the confirmation of the charges (pursuant to article 61), challenges to the admissibility of a case or to the jurisdiction of the Court shall be referred to the Pre-Trial Chamber and that after the charges are confirmed, challenges on these grounds are to be referred to the Trial Chamber¹⁵⁰. Thus, in the Bemba case, the Pre-Trial Chamber held that since it ‘ha[d] decided to confirm some of the charges against [...] Bemba [...] the Defence ha[d] no more locus standi to challenge the admissibility of the case at the pre-trial level’ given that the Prosecutor’s leave to appeal that decision had been denied¹⁵¹. In conjunction with rule 60, the Chamber rejected the Defence’s motion for the disclosure of material for the purpose of an admissibility challenge.
- 49 Paragraph 6 also provides that ‘[d]ecisions with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility may be appealed to the Appeals Chamber in accordance with article 82’. Such decisions would include

Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 84. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-354, Decision on Libya’s Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Arrest and Surrender of Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute and related Defence Request to Refer Libya to the UN Security Council, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 Jun. 2013, para. 31:

‘The Chamber understands this reference [“at the earliest opportunity”] to indicate that a State shall seize the Chamber of an admissibility challenge as soon as there are grounds on the basis of which the case would be inadmissible before the Court. Indeed, a State is required to challenge admissibility without delay once in a position to demonstrate the inadmissibility of the case before the Court’.

¹⁴⁹ Article 36 para. 4 (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the draft proposed by the Preparatory Committee at its December 1997 session provided:

‘Prior to the confirmation of the indictment, challenges to the admissibility of a case or challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court, shall be referred to the Pre-Trial Chamber. After confirmation of the indictment, they shall be referred to the Trial Chamber’.

Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 35. The concept of confirmation of an indictment in article 28 of the ILC Draft Statute was replaced with the concept of confirmation of charges in article 61. Proposals by Australia, the Netherlands and by France introduced the interlocutory appeal. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 160-161.

¹⁵⁰ As noted in supra note 99, rule 60 provides that a challenge made after a confirmation of the charges, but before the Trial Chamber is constituted or designated, must be addressed to the Presidency, which will refer it to the Trial Chamber as soon as it is constituted or designated.

¹⁵¹ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-529, Decision on the ‘Requete aux fins divulgation des elements pertinents relatifs a l’admissibilite’, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 18 Sep. 2009, para. 14.

any decision with respect to challenges under article 19 and decisions on the Prosecutor's requests pursuant to paragraph 10 seeking review of an inadmissibility decision in the light of facts that have newly appeared. Article 82 para. 1(a) provides that "[e]ither party may appeal [...] (a) A decision with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility"¹⁵². Although the term 'party' generally refers to the Prosecutor and the Defence¹⁵³, the Court has permitted States to appeal rulings on their jurisdictional or admissibility challenges. The Appeals Chamber has:

'underst[ood] from the phrase "decision with respect to" that the operative part of the [impugned] decision itself must pertain directly to a question on the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case. It is not sufficient that there is an indirect or tangential link between the underlying decision and questions of jurisdiction or admissibility. [...] [T]he specific reference [in article 19 para. 6] to article 82 of the Statute and the use of identical language in articles 19(6) and 82(1)(a) of the Statute indicate that the right to appeal a decision on jurisdiction or admissibility is intended to be limited only to those instances in which a Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber issues a ruling specifically on the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of the case'¹⁵⁴.

This does not mean that the decision being appealed has to exclusively concern admissibility or jurisdictional matters. In one instance, '[a]lthough the impugned decision [wa]s a decision on an application for warrants of arrest, the decision by the Pre-Trial Chamber to reject the Prosecutor's application in respect of [...] Ntaganda was based on a ruling of the admissibility of the case against him'. As the Appeals Chamber held, 'to th[at] extent, the impugned decision [wa]s a decision 'with respect to [...] admissibility', as required by article 82(1)(a)'¹⁵⁵. In other words:

'it is the nature, and not the ultimate effect or implication of a decision, that determines whether an appeal falls under article 82(1)(a) of the Statute. Even if the ultimate impact of a decision of a Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber were to affect the admissibility of cases, that fact would not, in of itself, render the decision a 'decision with respect to [...] admissibility' under article 82(1)(a)'¹⁵⁶.

The Court has also clarified that since the scope of appeals proceedings is determined by the scope of the proceedings before the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, '[f]acts which postdate the [i]mpugned [d]ecision fall beyond the possible scope of the proceedings before the Pre-

50

¹⁵² As discussed earlier, the Court has ruled that arguments relating to human rights violations or to the definition of crimes are not matters relating to jurisdiction or admissibility. See supra notes 48, 70, 71.

¹⁵³ See for example, Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-1432, Judgment on the Appeals of the Prosecutor and the Defence Against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victims' Participation of 18 January 2008, Appeals Chamber, 11 Jul. 2008, para. 93 (in the context of article 69 para. 3).

¹⁵⁴ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-78, Decision on the Admissibility of the 'Appeal of the Government of Kenya Against the 'Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Appeals Chamber, 10 Aug. 2011, paras. 15–16. See also Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-270, Decision on the 'Appeal Against the Single Judge's Decision on the "Request by Ms. Moraa Gesicho to Appear as Amicus Curiae"', Appeals Chamber, 17 Aug. 2011, para. 4; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-250, Decision on the 'Appeal Against the Single Judge's Decision on the "Request by Ms. Moraa Gesicho to Appear as Amicus Curiae"', Appeals Chamber, 17 Aug. 2011, para. 4; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-74, Decision on the Admissibility of the 'Appeal Against Decision on Application under Rule 103' of Ms Mishana Hosseinioun of 7 February 2012, Appeals Chamber, 8 Mar. 2012, paras. 10–11; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-126, Decision on 'Government of Libya's Appeal Against the 'Decision Regarding the Second Request by the Government of Libya for Postponement of the Surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi'' of 10 April 2012, Appeals Chamber, 25 Apr. 2012, paras. 12–16; Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-3424, Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P0236, DRC-D02-P0228 and DRC-D02-P0350', Appeals Chamber, 20 Jan. 2014, paras. 32–34.

¹⁵⁵ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/05-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58', Appeals Chamber, 13 Jul. 2006, para. 18.

¹⁵⁶ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-78, Decision on the Admissibility of the 'Appeal of the Government of Kenya Against the 'Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Appeals Chamber, 10 Aug. 2011, para. 17.

Trial [or Trial] Chamber and therefore beyond the scope of the proceedings on appeal'¹⁵⁷. With respect to victims, it has been held that '[t]he legal instruments of the Court do not set out any specific procedure regarding the participation of victims in appeals brought under articles 19(6) and 82(1)(a) of the Statute'¹⁵⁸. However, the Court has adopted a scheme whereby 'only those victims who have made observations before the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber are invited to make observations before the Appeals Chamber'¹⁵⁹. Therefore, unless victims have participated in the earlier jurisdiction or admissibility proceedings before a first-instance Chamber they will not be entitled to participate for the first time at the appeal stage.

51 Rule 154 sub-rule 1 requires that an appeal under article 82 para. 1(a) be filed 'not later than five days from the date upon which the party filing the appeal is notified of the decision'. As a general rule, the party making the appeal would have the burden to demonstrate that the decision should be reversed¹⁶⁰. As per rule 156 sub-rule 3, such appeals are conducted in writing (unless the Appeals Chamber decides to convene an oral hearing). They are subject to regulation 38 sub-regulation 1(c) (not regulation 37 sub-regulation 1), which therefore means that appeals and responses in article 19 appellate proceedings must not exceed 100 pages in length unless otherwise ordered¹⁶¹. While the Court's regulations do

¹⁵⁷ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-234, Decision on the 'Filing of Updated Investigation Report by the Government of Kenya in the Appeal Against the Pre-Trial Chamber's Decision on Admissibility', Appeals Chamber, 28 Jul. 2011, para. 13; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-202, Decision on the 'Filing of Updated Investigation Report by the Government of Kenya in the Appeal Against the Pre-Trial Chamber's Decision on Admissibility', Appeals Chamber, 28 Jul. 2011, para. 12. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, paras. 40-44; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, paras. 55-59, 193, 244(g); Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Côte d'Ivoire Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled 'Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo', Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, paras 33, 43-45.

¹⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-390, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, para. 13; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-400, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, para. 13. But see the separate opinions of Judge Song: Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-390, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"' – Separate Opinion of Judge Sang-Hyun Song, Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, paras. 2-4; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-400, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"' – Separate Opinion of Judge Sang-Hyun Song, Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, paras. 2-4.

¹⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-390, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, para. 13; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-400, Decision on the 'Observations on the "Directions on the Submission of Observations Pursuant to Article 19(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 59(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"', Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2012, para. 13.

¹⁶⁰ See Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 227.

¹⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-717, Reasons for the Appeals Chamber's Decision of 16 November 2006 on the 'Prosecution's Request for an Extension of the Page Limit', Appeals Chamber, 17 Nov. 2006, paras. 6-9. However, where the Appeals Chamber invites observations under rule 103 (and responses thereto) or the appeals proceedings arise from a proprio motu decision of the Chamber pursuant to article 19 para. 1, then the page limit under regulation 37 sub-regulation 1 is applicable, that is, no more than 20 pages in length: Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/-5-408, Judgment on the Appeal of the Defence Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute' of 10 March 2009, Appeals Chamber, 16 Sep. 2009, paras. 20-21; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-266, Decision on Requests Related to Page Limits and Reclassification of Documents, Appeals Chamber, 16 Oct. 2012, para. 8; Prosecutor v. L. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-268, Decision Further to the 'Directions on the Submissions of Observations' Issued on 31 August 2012 and on the Clarification Request of Mr Gbagbo, Appeals Chamber, 18 Oct. 2012, para. 4.

not foresee the filing of replies to responses pursuant to rule 154 sub-rule 1, the Appeals Chamber has previously exercised its discretion under regulation 28 to allow the relevant participants to do so in article 19 appellate proceedings¹⁶². In contrast to article 18 para. 4 which states that '[t]he appeal may be heard on an expedited basis', paragraph 6 contains no similar language. However, rule 156 sub-rule 4 (which governs the procedure for an appeal pursuant to rule 154) requires that '[t]he appeal shall be heard as expeditiously as possible', thereby correcting a weakness and inconsistency in paragraph 6¹⁶³.

A practice has emerged in cases where a Pre-Trial Chamber makes an admissibility or jurisdiction decision in the course of proceedings relating to the Prosecutor's application for a warrant of arrest or summons to appear. It is that the person concerned or the relevant State files an independent admissibility or jurisdictional challenge and, if aggrieved by the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision, files an appeal. Whilst an appeal against a ruling on jurisdiction or admissibility in an arrest warrant or summons to appear decision is possible (once the person concerned or the relevant State learns of its existence), it would be a most ill-advised endeavour. This is because such a decision would have been made without the participation of the concerned party and any appeal at that point in time would deprive the appellants of the chance to make their full case before the Pre-Trial Chamber; it would also entail tight filing deadlines hanging over the preparation of submissions (which, as aforementioned, is limited to five days)¹⁶⁴.

¹⁶² Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-442, Decision on the Libyan Government's Request to File Further Submissions, Appeals Chamber, 12 Sep. 2013, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-508, Decision on Mr Al-Senussi's Request to File Further Submissions and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 6 Feb. 2014, para. 17.

¹⁶³ In this respect, the fastest time in which an admissibility appeal has been issued by the Court was two months and eleven days from the time when the decision was rendered (on 3 Oct. 2006) by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Lubanga case: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo Against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Appeals Chamber, 14 December 2006. In stark contrast, the longest time in which an admissibility appeal has been issued by the Court was just shy of one year(!) from the time when the decision was rendered (on 31 May 2013) by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014. In the latter case, the delay was of such concern that the Defence was compelled to file an urgent request seeking that a decision be issued by the Appeals Chamber: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-537, Urgent Request for the Immediate Issuance of the Judgment on Libya's Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi' with Public Annex A, Defence, 30 Apr. 2014.

¹⁶⁴ The experience in the Lubanga case is a good case study of the problems that can ensue by choosing this route. There, the suspect discovered the admissibility determination in his arrest warrant decision by the Pre-Trial Chamber after his arrival at the Court. Duty counsel treated this as notification of the decision pursuant to rule 154 sub-rule 1, triggering the five day deadline for the filing of an appeal and applied to the Pre-Trial Chamber for the disclosure of further information in order to prepare the appeal and for an extension of time in which to file the appeal. The Pre-Trial Chamber held that it was not competent to entertain the application: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-50, Decision on the Application by the Duty Counsel for the Defence dated 20 March 2006, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 22 Mar. 2006. The suspect then approached the Appeals Chamber but was denied an extension of time and was ordered to provide reasons in support of his appeal and to respond to the Prosecutor's submission that it was questionable whether the appeal should have been brought at that stage of the proceedings: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-129, Decision on the Appellant's Application for an Extension of the Time Limit for the Filing of the Document in Support of the Appeal and Order Pursuant to Regulation 28 of the Regulations of the Court, Appeals Chamber, 30 May 2006. The suspect then sought to discontinue the appeal without waiving his right to subsequently challenge the admissibility of the case and sought a formal acknowledgement of this position from the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber declined to treat this as a discontinuance because he sought to impose reservations, something that was not foreseen in the Statute or Rules and declined to grant an extension of time: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-176, Decision on Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's Brief Relative to Discontinuance of Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 3 Jul. 2006. Finally, the Appeals Chamber decided that it had no power to transfer the suspect's appeal back to the Pre-Trial Chamber, declined to rule on whether article 82 para. 1(a) gives a right to appeal an ex parte decision, deemed the appeal abandoned and dismissed it because the suspect's discontinuance still did not comply with the Rules: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-393, Decision on Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's Application for Referral to the Pre-Trial Chamber/In the Alternative, Discontinuance of Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 9 Sep. 2006.

53 In contrast to paragraph 7, which provides that in case of a State's challenge to admissibility the Prosecutor must suspend the investigation pending a decision by the Court, article 82 para. 3 provides that '[a]n appeal shall not of itself have suspensive effect unless the Appeals Chamber so orders, upon request, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'. Rule 156 sub-rule 5 provides that, '[w]hen filing the appeal, the party appealing may request that the appeal have suspensive effect in accordance with article 82, paragraph 3'¹⁶⁵. For this reason 'it is preferable that [the] request [...] be presented in the appeal together with the reasons in support of the request'¹⁶⁶. Whether or not the request will be granted is a matter within the discretion of the Appeals Chamber. 'Therefore, when faced with a request for suspensive effect, the Appeals Chamber will consider the specific circumstances of the case and the factors it considers relevant for the exercise of its discretion under the circumstances'¹⁶⁷. Such considerations include: that the impugned decision '(i) 'would create an irreversible situation that could not be corrected, even if the Appeals Chamber eventually were to find in favour of the appellant', (ii) would lead to consequences that 'would be very difficult to correct and may be irreversible', or (iii) 'could potentially defeat the purpose of the appeal'¹⁶⁸. Unless the Appeals Chamber decides otherwise, if the relevant Chamber has rejected the challenge, the Prosecutor would resume the investigation immediately, pending an appeal. However, the suspension of domestic or other proceedings that are independent of those before the Court will exceed the scope of a request for suspensive effect.¹⁶⁹ The Appeals Chamber has also held that a pending appeal does not have any implications for surrender requests. Therefore a State would continue to be obliged to surrender a suspect into the custody of the Court, should he or she be in their ¹⁶⁵ The draft Rules of Procedure and Evidence prepared by Australia, and submitted to the first session of the Preparatory Commission before the First Edition of this Commentary, did not refer to article 82 para. 3.

¹⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-499, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 3 Sep. 2009, para. 10. See also Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-817, Decision on the Request of Mr Bemba to Give Suspensive Effect to the Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Appeals Chamber, 9 Jul. 2010, para. 10; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, paras. 13–14.

¹⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-499, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 3 Sep. 2009, para. 11. See also Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-02/12-12, Decision on the Request of the Prosecutor of 19 December 2012 for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 20 Dec. 2012, para. 19; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 22; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-480, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and the Request to File a Consolidated Reply, Appeals Chamber, 22 Nov. 2013, para. 14.

¹⁶⁸ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-817, Decision on the Request of Mr Bemba to Give Suspensive Effect to the Appeal Against the 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Appeals Chamber, 9 Jul. 2010, para. 11. See also Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-391, Decision on the Requests of Mr Ruto and Mr Sang for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012, paras. 9–10; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-401, Decision on the Request of Mr Kenyatta and Mr Muthaura for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012, paras. 9–10; Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-2953, Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeals Against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations' and Directions on the Further Conduct of Proceedings, Appeals Chamber, 14 Dec. 2012, para. 82; Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-3344, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect of the Appeal Against Trial Chamber II's Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Appeals Chamber, 16 Jan. 2013, para. 6; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-56, Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Request for Suspensive Effect of its Appeal Against the 'Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo' of 11 December 2014, Appeals Chamber, 20 Jan. 2015, para. 13.

¹⁶⁹ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-480, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and the Request to File a Consolidated Reply, Appeals Chamber, 22 Nov. 2013, paras. 15–17 (where a request for the suspension of domestic criminal proceedings against the suspect was held to 'exceed[] the scope of an order for suspensive effect'). See also Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-56, Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Request for Suspensive Effect of its Appeal Against the 'Decision on Côte d'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo' of 11 December 2014, Appeals Chamber, 20 Jan. 2015, para. 14: 'Côte d'Ivoire does not explain why the surrender of Ms Gbagbo to the Court would necessarily result in a suspension of the domestic proceedings'.

detention, during an appeal of an admissibility decision¹⁷⁰. It cannot claim that surrender defeats or frustrates the purpose of the appeal in that it would prevent domestic criminal processes from proceeding¹⁷¹. Given the need for criminal investigations to proceed expeditiously so as to obtain evidence while it is still fresh and thereby ensure its preservation as well as other considerations, the Appeals Chamber has tended to reject requests for suspensive effect¹⁷².

VII. Paragraph 7: Suspension of investigation

Paragraph 7 was introduced at the Diplomatic Conference to replace a bracketed provision in the New York draft in article 54 (Investigation of alleged crimes) which would have prevented the Prosecutor from even initiating an investigation where it was challenged within one month after the Prosecutor notified States that he or she had received a referral from the Security Council, a State complaint or information from an individual¹⁷³. In contrast, this paragraph simply requires the Prosecutor to suspend an investigation after it has been initiated when an investigating or prosecuting State (paragraph 2 (b)) or an article 12 State (paragraph 2 (c)) has made a challenge until the relevant Chamber makes a determination in accordance with article 17;¹⁷⁴ the provision has no effect on domestic ¹⁷⁰ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, paras. 24–27 (holding that the Chamber had not been provided with information as to why the surrender of the suspect to the Court would prevent Libya from continuing with its domestic investigations and that article 95 did not apply to appellate proceedings); Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-446, Decision on the ‘Request for an Immediate Finding of Non-Compliance and Referral to United Nations Security Council’, Appeals Chamber, 17 Sep. 2013, para. 8.

¹⁷¹ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 24; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-56, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Request for Suspensive Effect of its Appeal Against the ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’ of 11 December 2014, Appeals Chamber, 20 Jan. 2015, para. 17.

¹⁷² See Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-817, Decision on the Request of Mr Bemba to Give Suspensive Effect to the Appeal Against the ‘Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges’, Appeals Chamber, 9 Jul. 2010 (where the Trial Chamber rejected the accused’s admissibility challenge); Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-391, Decision on the Requests of Mr Ruto and Mr Sang for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012, paras. 9–10 (where the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the accused’s jurisdictional challenges); Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-401, Decision on the Request of Mr Kenyatta and Mr Muthaura for Suspensive Effect, Appeals Chamber, 29 Feb. 2012 (where the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the accused’s jurisdictional challenges); Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, (where the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the State’s admissibility challenge); Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-480, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and the Request to File a Consolidated Reply, Appeals Chamber, 22 Nov. 2013 (where the Pre-Trial Chamber accepted the State’s admissibility challenge); Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-56, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Request for Suspensive Effect of its Appeal Against the ‘Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo’ of 11 December 2014, Appeals Chamber, 20 Jan. 2015 (where the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the State’s admissibility challenge).

¹⁷³ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, article 54 para. 3. That provision was based on article 26 para. 1*bis* (Investigation of alleged crimes) in the draft adopted by the Preparatory Committee at its Aug. 1997 session, which did not contain such a bar. Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 14.

¹⁷⁴ See Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-ENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 Jun. 2009, para. 45; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 166. See also Third Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), Office of the Prosecutor, 16 May 2012, para. 30; Fourth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), Office of the Prosecutor, 7 Nov. 2012, para. 12; Fifth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), Office of the Prosecutor, 8 May 2013, para. 15; Sixth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), Office of the Prosecutor, 14 Nov. 2013, para. 14.

investigations¹⁷⁵. Paragraph 7 in conjunction with paragraph 5, and in contrast to article 18 para. 2, does not impose any time limit for making such a challenge (but does mandate that it be filed ‘at the earliest opportunity’¹⁷⁶), thus leaving the Prosecutor and the relevant Chamber with a certain degree of uncertainty about whether an investigation might be suspended at any moment. Moreover, in further contrast to article 18 para. 2, there is no provision expressly authorizing the relevant Chamber to lift the suspension at the request of the Prosecutor pending a decision on the challenge. The possibility that a State might make a frivolous challenge to an investigation within this period is likely to encourage the Prosecutor to gather as much information as possible during the preliminary examination if he or she considers that there is a serious risk that the territorial State or another State might take this step¹⁷⁷. Of course, the adverse impact of a suspension on the investigation will encourage the relevant Chamber to reach a decision as quickly as possible on any challenges¹⁷⁸. The use of the word ‘suspend’, rather than ‘defer’, as in article 18 paras. 2 and 6, does not seem to have any significance (see discussion of article 19 para. 11, margin Nos. 69–70 below)¹⁷⁹.

- 55 The restrictive impact of this paragraph is mitigated in at least five significant respects. First, since article 17 addresses only admissibility, not jurisdiction, it is clear that any State challenge limited to jurisdiction¹⁸⁰ would not require the Prosecutor to suspend the investigation. Any other reading would mean that the Prosecutor would have to suspend the investigation until the Court makes a determination in accordance with article 17 – in effect indefinitely, since the Court would not be considering the question of admissibility (unless it did so on its own motion). The distinction can be explained, as governments would be more concerned with suspending an investigation that would be seen as disrupting past or current proceedings in their own courts than an investigation where the State had not taken any action. In any event, it is likely that in many cases where a State challenges the jurisdiction of the Court it would also challenge the admissibility of the case (unless it was seeking to delay the investigation or prosecution by successive frivolous challenges as noted above). Second, State challenges to jurisdiction or to admissibility do not require the Pre-Trial Chamber to suspend any investigative measures that it is taking on its own initiative pursuant to article 56 para. 3 relating to a unique investigative opportunity, since paragraph 7 expressly applies only to the Prosecutor¹⁸¹.

¹⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-480, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and the Request to File a Consolidated Reply, Appeals Chamber, 22 Nov. 2013, para. 16.

¹⁷⁶ For the Court’s jurisprudence on the meaning of ‘at the earliest opportunity’, see the above commentary to article 19 para. 5.

¹⁷⁷ Too much reliance on the sentiment that other non-territorial States might file a challenge, however, would be misplaced. As of 31 May 2015 only three States – Kenya, Libya and Côte d’Ivoire – have challenged the admissibility of cases before the Court and in all of these instances they were the same situation States from which the cases had arisen. That is, every admissibility challenge that has been lodged with the Court has come from territorial States.

¹⁷⁸ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014, para. 166.

¹⁷⁹ The drafting history of articles 18 and 19 suggests that terms like ‘suspend’ and ‘defer’ were used interchangeably or without any significant differences in meaning. For example, the term ‘suspend’ was first used before the first draft of article 19 or before the much later draft of article 18 was tabled. During the Ad Hoc Committee discussion in 1995 about the procedure for determining jurisdiction and admissibility, it was suggested that ‘if a case was being investigated or was pending before a national court, the international criminal court should suspend the exercise of its jurisdiction, even though it might subsequently resume consideration of the case in accordance with article 42 of the draft statute’. Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 51 (the rest of the reported discussion dealt primarily with substantive issues of admissibility and jurisdiction, see paras. 29–52). It could be argued that the word ‘defer’ refers to leaving a crime to the State to investigate and prosecute and that ‘suspend’ means dropping an investigation without the State taking any further action. However, the word ‘defer’ is used in article 18 to apply both when the challenging State ‘is investigating’ and when it ‘has investigated’ a crime and then closed the investigation without any intent to continue proceedings.

¹⁸⁰ As of 31 May 2015, no State has filed a challenge relating to the jurisdiction of the Court in any case.

¹⁸¹ Article 56 para. 1 provides that the Pre-Trial Chamber may authorize the Prosecutor to ‘take such measures as may be necessary to ensure the efficiency and integrity of the proceedings’. However, article 56 para. 3

Third, paragraph 8 (discussed below) permits the Prosecutor to seek permission from the Court to pursue a number of investigative steps pending a decision on admissibility. Fourth, challenges by the individual concerned do not require the Prosecutor to suspend an investigation. Fifth, suspension applies only to investigations, not prosecutions. As Pre-Trial Chamber II has stated, ‘under the Court’s statutory framework, lodging an admissibility challenge only results in the suspension of the Prosecutor’s investigation related to the case’. It does not stop the judicial proceedings before the Court¹⁸². A late challenge once a prosecution has begun would not suspend such a prosecution¹⁸³.

VIII. Paragraph 8: Permitted steps

If a State has made a timely challenge to admissibility, thus forcing the Prosecutor under paragraph 7 to suspend an investigation, paragraph 8, which was introduced at the Diplomatic Conference, expressly authorizes the Prosecutor, ‘[p]ending a ruling by the Court’ to ‘seek authority from the Court’ to continue to take the three types of significant investigative measures described below¹⁸⁴ (as demonstrated above, a challenge to jurisdiction does not require the Prosecutor to suspend an investigation). In marked contrast to the somewhat similar safeguard provision in article 18 para. 6 with respect to admissibility challenges, paragraph 8 does not limit the Prosecutor by requiring that he or she seek such measures only ‘on an exceptional basis’. This suggests that the granting of an article 19 para. 8 request is a less onerous affair than under article 18 para. 6¹⁸⁵. In addition, paragraph 8 is an exception to a State’s ability to postpone requests under Part IX of the Statute as per article 95. The Rules provide that the application by the Prosecutor shall be considered ex provides that when the Prosecutor has failed to seek to take such measures and the Pre-Trial Chamber determines that ‘such measures are required to preserve evidence that it deems would be essential for the defence at trial’ and that the Prosecutor’s failure is ‘unjustified’, ‘the Pre-Trial Chamber may take such measures on its own initiative’. Had the drafters intended that a State’s challenge would require suspension of measures that were ‘required to preserve evidence that [...] would be essential for the defence at trial’, they would have said so. It would be inconsistent with the scheme of article 19 para. 8, which is designed to permit the Prosecutor to take essential investigative steps during the suspension of an investigation pending a determination of a State challenge, to require a suspension of measures that the Pre-Trial Chamber had determined were essential and that the Prosecutor’s refusal to undertake them was ‘unjustified’. The measures that the Pre-Trial Chamber can take under article 56 para. 3 are not limited simply to measures safeguarding the rights of the defence during activities of the Prosecutor; they expressly include under article 56 para. 2(f), ‘such other action as may be necessary to collect or preserve evidence’. As explained in the First Edition of this Commentary, this provision is ‘an open-ended clause that empowers the Pre-Trial Chamber to create new measures or to expand the existing ones’.

¹⁸² Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-62, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, paras. 8–9; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-64, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, paras. 8–9.

¹⁸³ The moment when a prosecution begins is not spelled out in the Rome Statute, but since a suspect becomes an accused upon the confirmation of charges (see supra notes 80, 81), once that occurs any challenge cannot stop the subsequent prosecution and the proceedings before the Court.

¹⁸⁴ See Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-62, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, paras. 8, 19; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-64, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, paras. 8, 19.

¹⁸⁵ But note the view of one Pre-Trial Chamber that appears to suggest (erroneously) that the ‘exceptional’ criterion applies in both circumstances: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-163, Decision on the Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 Jun. 2012, para. 34 (emphasis added): ‘the Prosecutor may be exceptionally authorised to collect [evidence] pursuant to articles 18(6) and 19(8)(a) and (b) of the Statute’.

parte, in camera and on an expedited basis¹⁸⁶. The evidence collected pursuant to such an application is liable to disclosure to the Defence¹⁸⁷.

57 In the first edition of this Commentary it was stated that, given the possibilities for delay, it was to be hoped that the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber would decide admissibility challenges under articles 18 and 19 as a matter of priority and that the Rules would facilitate the rapid resolution of such challenges. The Rules, however, do not do so directly, but do go part way to addressing the problems that result from suspensions of investigations pending a determination of admissibility. First, they require that the Pre-Trial Chamber must rule on the application by the Prosecutor to take investigative steps pursuant to paragraph 8 ‘on an expedited basis’ (rules 61 and 57)¹⁸⁸. Second, the Rules permit the relevant Chamber to set time limits for the submission of written observations (rule 58 sub-rule 3) and representations (rule 59 sub-rule 3). Third, they provide that appeals, including appeals of article 19 determinations, ‘shall be heard as expeditiously as possible’ (rule 156 sub-rule 4). However, they do not expressly require that decisions on admissibility challenges or questions by the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber under article 19 must be reached expeditiously¹⁸⁹.

58 Although paragraph 8 expressly authorizes the Prosecutor to seek three specified measures, the Prosecutor may have an inherent right to seek authority from the relevant Chamber to take additional measures not expressly listed in this paragraph which are necessary to preserve the Court’s jurisdiction or its ability to render a fair decision¹⁹⁰. In deciding whether to grant the Prosecutor’s request for authorization to take steps under paragraph 8, the relevant Chamber should bear in mind that delays in investigations are almost always detrimental to justice from the perspectives of the victims, the suspects and the accused. Here it is also relevant to note that investigations that are undertaken after charges are confirmed would also cease. To address these concerns in a manner consistent with the object and purpose of the Rome Statute, the relevant Chamber should give an expansive interpretation of the scope of the measures that can be taken by the Prosecutor. Further, it should attempt to resolve the challenge as expeditiously as possible so as to minimize the harm to the investigation necessarily caused by a suspension. A speedy determination will enable the Prosecutor to continue the investigation with minimal damage if the challenge is ¹⁸⁶ Rule 61 provides that when the Prosecutor applies to the relevant Chamber to take measures pursuant to paragraph 8, rule 57 applies. That rule states that ‘[a]n application to the Pre-Trial Chamber in the circumstances provided for in article 18 para. 6, shall be considered ex parte and in camera. The Pre-Trial Chamber shall rule on the application on an expedited basis’. Pursuant to regulation 38 sub-regulation 2(c) the application is limited to no more than 50 pages in length unless otherwise ordered.

¹⁸⁷ See Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., ICC-01/09-01/11-62, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, para. 19; Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-64, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s Application Requesting Disclosure After a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya’s Admissibility Challenge’ and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 20 Apr. 2011, para. 19.

¹⁸⁸ A French proposal to require that the Chamber rule within three days was rejected on the ground that it would be better to leave flexibility to the Chamber and to avoid having an application fail because the time limit was not met. Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 321, 344.

¹⁸⁹ A key participant in the drafting of the Rome Statute and the Rules has claimed that ‘[t]he procedures at the jurisdiction and admissibility stage are intended to be expedited ones, and this objective is reflected in the Rules’. See Holmes, Jurisdiction and Admissibility, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 348. However, this intent is not always expressly stated in the Rome Statute or the Rules and it is up to the relevant Chamber to ensure that challenges to jurisdiction and admissibility are resolved as expeditiously as possible to prevent a series of frivolous challenges by States from delaying proceedings.

¹⁹⁰ In addition, as with regard to deferrals at the request of the Security Council pursuant to article 16, the Prosecutor may have the same power, as explained in the First Edition of this Commentary in the comment on that article (see margin No. 27), to apply article 54 para. 3(f) ‘to take steps for the necessary preservation of evidence’.

rejected and will enable the State to further continue with its investigation or prosecution as rapidly as possible if the challenge is successful¹⁹¹.

1. Necessity

The Court (Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber) may authorize the Prosecutor ‘[t]o pursue necessary investigative steps of the kind referred to in article 18, paragraph 6’. However, the power of the Prosecutor to take investigative steps during a suspension of an investigation pursuant to article 19 para. 8(a) is considerably greater than under article 18 para. 6¹⁹². First, under article 18 para. 6 the Prosecutor may only seek authority from the Pre-Trial Chamber or Trial Chamber to take investigative steps ‘on an exceptional basis’; article 19 para. 8 contains no such limitation and so the Prosecutor may seek authority to pursue such steps whenever he or she has to suspend an investigation pending determination of a State’s challenge to admissibility. Second, since paragraph 8(a) speaks of ‘investigative steps of the kind referred to in article 18 para. 6’ rather than ‘the same investigative steps’ referred to in that provision, the steps identified in this subparagraph could be seen as broader than those in article 18 para. 6. Third, the necessary investigative steps identified in article 18 para. 6, are subject to two conditions that, significantly, have been omitted in article 19 para. 8(a). Those measures under article 18 para. 6 must be either: ‘for the purpose of preserving evidence where there is a unique opportunity to obtain important evidence or there is a significant risk that such evidence may not be subsequently available’. Although these conditions are similar to those listed in article 56 para. 1 (which spells out the role of the Pre-Trial Chamber with respect to a unique investigative opportunity), they are not identical, and should be seen as an independent basis for the Prosecutor – as opposed to the Pre-Trial Chamber – to act¹⁹³. The broad wording of article 19 para. 8(a), together with the powers identified in subparagraphs (b) and (c), suggest that the Prosecutor is authorized to use most of the powers which he or she would have under article 54 and other articles to continue the investigation during a suspension pending a determination on the admissibility of a case¹⁹⁴.

2. Taking statements and completing prior steps

The Court (Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber) may also authorize the Prosecutor ‘[t]o take a statement or testimony from a witness or complete the collection and examination of evidence which had begun prior to the making of the challenge’. As in subparagraph (a), there is no requirement in subparagraph (b) that there be a unique investigative opportunity or a significant risk that evidence will be unobtainable. Given the separation by the word ‘or’, the Prosecutor appears authorized to take a statement or testimony from a witness at any time, even if the statement or testimony did not begin before the challenge. When the Prosecutor is relying only on subparagraph (b), the completion of the collection and

¹⁹¹ It should be emphasised that an admissibility challenge does not affect a State’s sovereign right to undertake its own investigation and prosecution: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-480, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and the Request to File a Consolidated Reply, Appeals Chamber, 22 Nov. 2013, para. 16.

¹⁹² The provision of broader powers to the Prosecutor under article 19 para. 8 to take investigative steps during the suspension of an investigation than under article 18 para. 6 makes perfect sense since the relevant Chamber will not have the same option under article 19 to lift the suspension pending a determination of the admissibility challenge that it does under article 18 para. 2.

¹⁹³ Despite the similar wording, there are significant differences between the two provisions. The first condition in article 18 para. 6 is that there be a unique opportunity to obtain evidence, but that evidence must be ‘important’; there is no such requirement in article 56 para. 1. The alternative condition in article 18 para. 6 is that there be a significant risk that evidence (which need not be ‘important’) may not be subsequently available; article 56 para. 1 requires that the information may not be available for trial, but without requiring that this unavailability be a significant risk.

¹⁹⁴ Indeed, it is difficult to envisage any of the powers that the Prosecutor has under article 54 para. 2 that he or she could not have under paragraph 7(a). The only requirement is that they be ‘necessary’, but that is implicit in the exercise of most powers.

examination of other types of evidence, however, must have begun before the challenge. Nevertheless, the investigative steps that the Prosecutor may take under subparagraph (a) are so broad that they would necessarily include collection and examination of such other evidence and subparagraph (b). The purpose of subparagraph (b), which was added somewhat hastily in the later stages of the Rome Conference, along with the other safeguards in paragraph 7 and in article 18 para. 6, seems simply to be to clarify that the specific evidence it mentions can be collected by the Prosecutor. Since statements or testimony of a witness would normally be completed in a matter of hours or days, it is unlikely that a challenge would interrupt them. As it will not be known until the relevant stage of pre-trial proceedings or the trial whether a particular person will be called as a witness, the term ‘witness’ in the context of an investigation should be read broadly. This should include anyone who might be called to testify during the pre-trial proceedings or at trial, even if the Prosecutor does not call them. Additionally, persons who provide ‘written or oral testimony’ pursuant to article 15 para. 2 and persons whose testimony or statements lead to other persons who do testify or to relevant information which could be used at trial should also be encompassed¹⁹⁵.

- 61 To minimize the disruption of an investigation, which could be harmful to a prosecution by the Prosecutor or by a State, if the relevant Chamber upholds the admissibility challenge, the term ‘complete the collection and examination of evidence’ under this subparagraph should be given a broad reading. For example, if the Prosecutor has been able to excavate one grave site among many in a single massacre, the Prosecutor should be able to complete the excavation of all the grave sites where victims of that massacre might be located and to conduct forensic examinations of all the bodies. Since it will not be known until the relevant point in the pre-trial preparations or even the trial itself whether information that has been gathered and examined with the intention that it would be submitted as evidence will actually be submitted, this provision should be read to mean information that was being gathered and examined with the view to possible submission as evidence. A necessary corollary would be that the Prosecutor should be able to take any measures under this subparagraph, with the assistance of Court requests or orders if necessary, which are needed to protect such evidence pending the determination by the relevant Chamber whether the case is admissible or not. The potentially expensive and cumbersome deployment of protective and evidence-gathering measures, as well as the need to minimize disruption to victims and witnesses, calls for such an approach.

3. Preventing of the absconding of persons

- 62 The Prosecutor may also be authorized, ‘[i]n cooperation with the relevant States, to prevent the absconding of persons in respect of whom the Prosecutor has already requested a warrant of arrest under article 58’. The authorization under this subparagraph thus appears to apply even if the person absconded after an application, but before the arrest warrant could be issued¹⁹⁶. This express grant of authority is limited to persons for whom an arrest warrant has been requested under article 58 and does not cover persons for whom the Prosecutor requested only a summons to appear. The First and Second Edition of this Commentary speculated that it was likely that the Prosecutor would, as a precautionary measure, always request arrest warrants in the alternative, even when a summons might otherwise be appropriate (to ensure that effective measures could be taken during the suspension of the investigation if the person absconded). This has not come to pass in practice¹⁹⁷. Nevertheless, should this be a concern for the Prosecutor, the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber could issue a request to States Parties under article 87 para. 1(a) for cooperation and a request to States not Parties to the Statute under article 87 para. 5 to assist in locating the fugitive. While in a number of cases the request for an arrest warrant has been made confidentially and, although the relevant Chamber is not be able to request that the person concerned be arrested during its deliberation, it certainly can request that the person be located and subjected to surveillance or other measures short of arrest sufficient to ensure arrest as soon as it determines that the case is admissible and issues a warrant. All States Parties have an obligation under article 86 to ‘cooperate fully with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes’ and this obligation would necessarily include an investigation which was continuing in a limited way pending a determination of an admissibility challenge.

¹⁹⁵ While the term ‘witness’ is not defined in the Rome Statute or in the Rules, a broad reading of the term with regard to paragraph 8 is consistent with the object and purpose of the Statute and paragraph 8 in particular.

¹⁹⁶ Since a State can only challenge a ‘case’ before the Court under article 19 (which suspends the Prosecutor’s investigation pursuant to article 19, para. 7 and triggers potential recourse to article 19 para. 8), this provision appears to suggest that a ‘case’ begins upon the Prosecutor’s request to the Pre-Trial Chamber to issue a warrant of arrest or summons to appear (otherwise the State would not be able to submit a challenge). Such a position would have to be reconciled with the Court’s existing jurisprudence that appears to indicate the contrary. See supra note 14.

Another reading of subparagraph (c) suggests that it can also potentially apply in cases where the relevant person is in State custody. This was raised during debates on whether Libya was obliged to hand over or retain the suspects in its custody during the duration of its admissibility challenges in the Gaddafi and Al-Senussi case. It is noteworthy that arrest warrants had in fact already been issued by the Court. Still, subparagraph (c) could be read to apply in such instances, since the Prosecutor would already have requested and obtained a warrant of arrest under article 58 as well. However, should a State wish to maintain a suspect in its custody while the Court considers its admissibility challenge, then the more appropriate approach would be to make use of article 95 to postpone such surrender¹⁹⁸ (at least during the initial consideration of the challenge by the Court¹⁹⁹). On the other hand, should the Prosecutor desire to have the suspect handed over to the Court, then he or she may overcome the article 95 postponement by invoking subparagraph (c). 63

IX. Paragraph 9: Acts of the Prosecutor or warrants not affected

Paragraph 9, which was introduced at the Diplomatic Conference, provides that ‘[t]he making of a challenge shall not affect the validity of any act performed by the Prosecutor or any order or warrant issued by the Court prior to the making of the challenge’. This means 64

¹⁹⁷ Indeed, the Prosecutor has only submitted one article 58 request where warrants of arrest were requested as an alternative to summonses to appear: Prosecutor v. Harun and Abd-Al-Rahman (Kushayb), ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Apr. 2007, para. 110. In two other cases, the Prosecutor requested summonses to appear with no arrest warrants as alternatives (but reserved the right to recommend such action): Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/09-30-Red2, Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, Office of the Prosecutor, 15 Dec. 2010, paras. 218, 220, 223; Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-31-Red, Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Office of the Prosecutor, 15 Dec. 2011, paras. 207, 209, 212. Further, the Prosecutor has submitted two other article 58 requests where summonses to appear were requested as alternative to arrest warrants: Prosecutor v. Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-15-AnxA, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 May 2009, para. 30 (but subsequently submitted that a summons to appear would be sufficient); Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-1, Second Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 Aug. 2009, para. 33 (but subsequently submitted that a summons to appear would be sufficient). For all other accused, the Prosecutor has submitted requests for warrants of arrest alone.

¹⁹⁸ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-163, Decision on the Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 Jun. 2012, paras. 23–41; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-354, Decision on Libya’s Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Arrest and Surrender of Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute and related Defence Request to Refer Libya to the UN Security Council, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 Jun. 2013, paras. 18–40; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-15, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 15 Nov. 2013, paras. 16–19.

¹⁹⁹ The Appeals Chamber has held that Article 95 does not apply to the appellate phase of admissibility challenges: Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 27.

that a prior order or warrant (issued before the challenge), including a warrant based on a sealed application, can still be executed after the challenge, thus preventing uncooperative States – which could include States not Parties to the Statute – from frustrating the investigation and obstructing international justice. However, it should be noted in this context that a State which would otherwise be obligated to hand over a suspect on the basis of an arrest warrant may rely on article 95 of the Statute to request for the postponement of its execution. Nevertheless, as the Pre-Trial Chamber has stated:

[T]he arrest warrant remains valid in accordance with article 19(9) of the Statute, and accordingly [the relevant State] must ensure that all necessary measures are taken during the postponement in order to ensure the possibility of an immediate execution [...] should the case be found admissible²⁰⁰.

The obligation to surrender is reactivated where the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber rules that a case is admissible²⁰¹. It is also noteworthy in this regard that article 95 does not apply to appellate proceedings²⁰². For the reasons noted above, this paragraph encourages the Prosecutor to take actions and seek orders and arrest warrants at the earliest possible time.

X. Paragraph 10: New facts for review

65 Paragraph 10 provides that the Prosecutor may seek a review of a decision that a case is inadmissible under article 17 when ‘he or she is fully satisfied that new facts have arisen which negate the basis on which the case had previously been found inadmissible’²⁰³. ‘Thus, [article 19 para. 10] is clear evidence that the Statute assumes that the factual situation on the basis of which the admissibility of a case is established is not necessarily static, but ambulatory’²⁰⁴. In the absence of paragraph 10, the Prosecutor would have been able to seek a new ruling on the ‘question of [...] admissibility’ pursuant to article 19 para. 3, which does not restrict the time or number of such requests. Under general principles of law (see margin No. 15 above), the Prosecutor would have the burden of proof under paragraph 10 to demonstrate admissibility, unless the relevant information is exclusively or largely within the control of the State or ²⁰⁰ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-163, Decision on the Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 Jun. 2012, para. 40. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Decision on the ‘Urgent Application on Behalf of Abdullah Al-Senussi for Pre-Trial Chamber to Order the Libyan Authorities to Comply with their Obligations and the Orders of the ICC’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 6 Feb. 2013, para. 29; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-354, Decision on Libya’s Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Arrest and Surrender of Abdullah Al-Senussi Pursuant to Article 95 of the Rome Statute and related Defence Request to Refer Libya to the UN Security Council, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 Jun. 2013, para. 40; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-15, Decision on the Conduct of the Proceedings Following Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 15 Nov. 2013, para. 19.

²⁰¹ See Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Dec. 2014, para. 80.

²⁰² Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-387, Decision on the Request for Suspensive Effect and Related Issues, Appeals Chamber, 18 Jul. 2013, para. 27.

²⁰³ This provision appears to have originated in a French proposal regarding articles 34 and 35 of the ILC Draft Statute included in the Preparatory Committee’s 1996 compilation of proposals. That proposal provided that if the Court had determined that a case was inadmissible, ‘the Prosecutor of the Court may, if new facts arise, submit a request to the Court for a review of the decision of inadmissibility’. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 161. At its Dec. 1997 session, the Preparatory Committee included article 35 para. 5 (in brackets) which read: ‘If the Court has decided that a case is inadmissible pursuant to article 35, the Prosecutor, may, at any time, submit a request for a review of the decision, on the grounds that conditions required under article 35 to render the case inadmissible no longer exist or that new facts arose’. Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 37. Apart from renumbering the references to what is now article 17, this formulation was retained without change in article 12 para. 5 [36] (Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case) of the Zutphen Draft and article 17 para. 6 of the New York Draft.

²⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 Sep. 2009, para. 56. See also Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on Admissibility of the Case under Article 19(1) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10. Mar. 2009, para. 27.

person concerned²⁰⁵. Rule 62 sub-rule 1 provides that the request for review is to be made to the Chamber that made the latest ruling on inadmissibility and that rules 58, 59 and 61 – those that concern proceedings under article 19 generally – will apply. Pursuant to those rules, the Prosecutor’s request must be in writing and must contain the basis for it. The relevant Chamber will have a wide discretion as to the modalities of the proceedings and may hold a hearing. One matter that is left uncertain is whether Rule 62 sub-rule 1 also requires the Prosecutor to approach the Appeals Chamber directly should it have issued a final ruling that a case was inadmissible before the Court. A plain reading would suggest that that is indeed the case. However, this would entail the Appeals Chamber engaging in factual determinations that is not normally its function, which in turn would complicate appeals proceedings after a decision is rendered. Therefore, the more sensible and proper course would be for the Prosecutor to approach either the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, depending on the stage of proceedings at which the case sits at the relevant time²⁰⁶. Rule 62 sub-rule 2 requires notification to the State or States that made the successful challenge and permits them to make representations within a time limit to be determined, presumably by the relevant Chamber. This would appear to exclude the person concerned as well as victims. However, since rules 58 and 59 are also applicable, it would be within the Chamber’s power to allow their views to be heard after being informed of the proceedings.

Although paragraph 10 is inelegantly worded, it appears to impose three requirements. 66
First, the Prosecutor be fully satisfied – largely a subjective test – that the other two requirements have been met. Second, it requires that ‘new facts have arisen’. A comparison with the French text, which requires that the Prosecutor be certain that ‘des faits nouvellement apparus’ (facts newly appeared), and the Spanish text, which requires that the Prosecutor be fully convinced ‘de que han aparecido nuevos hechos’ (that new facts have appeared)”, suggests that this means that the facts became known after the initial decision rather than that the facts had to have occurred since the initial decision²⁰⁷. This would be consistent with the approach taken with respect to reviews of convictions and sentences under article 84 para. 1 (‘[n]ew evidence has been discovered’). Third, these new facts must ‘negate the basis on which the case had been previously found inadmissible’. The standard of proof should, at the very least, be higher than that for admissibility determinations under article 19 para. 1, as the Prosecutor must not only be satisfied that that new facts have arisen, but must be *fully satisfied*²⁰⁸.

There is no provision in paragraph 10 expressly authorizing the Prosecutor to seek review 67 of a decision by the Court that it had no jurisdiction over a case. Presumably, this omission ²⁰⁵ One authority on complementarity has contended that, although the Prosecutor normally would bear the burden of proof under article 10, that rule might have to be qualified. He argues that Part IX (International cooperation and judicial assistance) of the Rome Statute would not apply once the investigation which had been opened was then suspended and that, therefore, States (which would include States Parties) were under no obligation to respond positively to requests pursuant to article 19 para. 11: Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 227–228 (for the argument that an obligation to cooperate fully with the Court in its investigations applies to investigations in suspension, see discussion of article 19 para. 11, mn 69–70 below).

²⁰⁶ But see El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008) 272 (suggesting that rule 62 sub-rule 1 ‘leaves room for the Appeals Chamber to rule on a request based on the emergence of new facts’).

²⁰⁷ Indeed, an Austrian proposal that was not accepted contained the following formulation: ‘by an accused or any State concerned only upon production of new relevant facts’. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 158.

²⁰⁸ Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 231. But see Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (2012) 212: ‘[t]he hurdle to be passed by the Prosecutor in order to reapply is rather high’. It has been asserted that ‘the standard of ‘fully satisfied’ should also be higher than the standard of proof under article 19 para. 2, because the standard for a successful request for review under article 19 para. 10 should be more demanding than the one applicable to the earlier finding of inadmissibility, which such a request seeks to have reviewed’. Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 237. However, it must be borne in mind that the reason the Prosecutor is seeking such a review is because the new facts which have appeared may well have been concealed by the State or the person concerned.

was an oversight. Notwithstanding, nothing in the Rome Statute prevents the Prosecutor, if he or she discovered information after the initial decision which could not have been expected to be found at the time of the litigation – for example, when an uncooperative State concealed information or evidence – from seeking a new ruling on the question of jurisdiction. This could be achieved pursuant to article 19 para. 3, which contains no restriction on the time for making the request or the number of times that such a request may be made by the Prosecutor. Otherwise, States which concealed relevant evidence or information could frustrate the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction. In any event, the Court is under an ongoing obligation under article 19 para. 1 to assure itself that it has jurisdiction over all cases before them. Thus, it may be enough for the Prosecutor to simply call to the Court’s attention new facts or matters that will trigger this obligation and invite it to make a ruling on jurisdiction *proprio motu*²⁰⁹.

- 68 As of 31 May 2015, there has been only one instance where a case has been held to be inadmissible by the Court (and upheld on appeal) (relating to the suspect Al-Senussi), and it was noted that the Prosecutor could seek a review of this decision pursuant to paragraph 10²¹⁰. The Prosecutor has to date not filed a paragraph 10 review request. As such, the Court is yet to be afforded the opportunity to explore this provision’s intricacies and application.

XI. Paragraph 11: Information after a deferral

- 69 If the Prosecutor defers an investigation based on article 17 (concerning admissibility), then paragraph 11, permits him or her to request ‘information on the proceedings’ from the relevant State. Paragraph 11 has several sources²¹¹. The scope of the information which can be requested under this provision appears to be more focused than the information expressly required to be provided under article 18 para. 5, which relates to ‘the progress of [the State’s]

²⁰⁹ This would be similar to the practice of the Defence in the Banda and Jerbo case whereby it merely informed the Court of the reported death of their client (Jerbo) (rather than file a jurisdictional challenge), after which the Court noted article 19, para. 1 in terminating the proceedings: Prosecutor v. Banda and Jerbo, ICC-02/05-03/09-512-Red, Decision Terminating the Proceedings Against Mr. Jerbo, Trial Chamber IV, 4 Oct. 2013, para. 16.

²¹⁰ See Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 Oct. 2013, para. 312; Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on Admissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber, 24 Jul. 2014, para. 201. See also Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-567, Decision Following the Declaration of Inadmissibility of the Case Against Abdullah Al-Senussi before the Court, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 Aug. 2014, para. 6.

²¹¹ This provision appears to have originated in a French proposal in the Preparatory Committee in 1996 regarding article 36 (Procedure under articles 34 and 35) of the ILC Draft Statute. It provided, first, in paragraph 5, that, ‘[i]n every case, the State or person challenging a submission to the Court under paragraph 2 of this article [providing for challenges by a State party wishing to prosecute the same case] shall provide all information concerning the conduct of the investigations and the judicial procedures which may support a finding of inadmissibility in the case submitted to the Court’. Second, in paragraph 6, that if the Court determined provisionally that a case was inadmissible on the ground of article 35 para. (a) [that the case had been properly investigated], then ‘the Prosecutor may question the State proceeding with the prosecution as to the status of the investigation and the action that will be taken on it’. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 161.

The Preparatory Committee did not include such a provision in articles 34, 35 or 36, dealing with challenges to jurisdiction and admissibility, but included something similar in provisions governing the initiation and deferral of investigations. At the Aug. 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, a somewhat similar provision was included in article 26*bis* para. (a), which supplemented article 26 (Investigation of alleged crimes) of the ILC Draft Statute. This provision stated:

‘In the event that the Prosecutor defers investigation on the ground that a State is proceeding with a national investigation, then the Prosecutor may request that the relevant State make available to the Prosecutor, either periodically or on a reasonable request, a report on the progress of its investigation, which shall be confidential to the extent necessary. The Prosecutor shall notify the complainant State of the decision to defer to a State and shall notify the complainant State of any known outcome of such national investigation or prosecution’.

Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 19. At its Dec. 1997 session, the Preparatory Committee included a similar provision in article 26*ter* (Deferral of an investigation by the Prosecutor). That article provided:

investigations and any subsequent prosecutions'. This makes sense since the Prosecutor would be seeking information concerning an individual case, rather than a situation²¹². Even though paragraph 11 does not expressly require a State to respond to the Prosecutor's request for information 'without undue delay', as in article 18 para. 5, if that State is a State Party to the Statute, it has an implicit obligation to respond positively and without undue delay. It would have made no sense to provide that the Prosecutor may request a State to make available information on the proceedings and yet exempt a State Party of any obligation to comply or to comply promptly. This provision would trigger the obligation of States Parties under article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and customary international law to comply with the request in good faith²¹³. However, save in the case of a Security Council referral (depending on the wording of the relevant resolution), a State that is not a State Party would not be under an obligation under the Statute to cooperate with the Court, but could nonetheless be approached pursuant to article 87 para. 5. Such information is essential for the Prosecutor to make an informed determination as to whether to continue the deferral.

The Prosecutor has a duty to keep the information confidential at the request of the 70 investigating State so that the State's investigation is not undermined by the release of sensitive information, such as sealed indictments. Presumably, the Prosecutor could share this information with the other organs of the Court. The Prosecutor also has a duty to inform the investigating State if he or she resumes the investigation. It is not entirely clear whether paragraph 11 addresses only a voluntary deferral by the Prosecutor of an investigation based on an assessment that the factors listed in article 17 exist, or also a suspension of an investigation pursuant to paragraph 7 after an admissibility challenge. In this context, it should be recalled that the provisions authorizing the Prosecutor to request States to provide information concerning their investigations and prosecutions, which were largely disconnected from the provisions that became articles 18 and 19, were drafted and adopted in haste during the closing days of the Diplomatic Conference. Given this fact, it is quite possible that the deferral mentioned in paragraph 11 was also intended to cover suspensions pursuant to article 19 para. 7. Such an interpretation would be consistent with the roughly parallel structure of articles 18 and 19 and the object and purpose of the Statute. It would not make sense to authorize the Prosecutor to seek such information from States only in mandatory deferrals under article 18 and when the Prosecutor voluntarily deferred an investigation

¹ In the event that the Prosecutor, having regard to the matters in article 35, defers an investigation, the Prosecutor [may request that] [may seek an order of the Court that] the relevant State shall make available to the [Prosecutor] [Court] information on the proceedings.

2. Any information so provided will, to the extent necessary, be kept confidential.

3. If the Prosecutor thereafter decides to proceed with an investigation, he or she shall notify the State in respect of whose proceedings deferral has taken place].

Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 27. In addition, at this session the Preparatory Committee included a completely different provision (subsequently abandoned) in article 26*bis*, which imposed a requirement on States Parties to keep the Prosecutor informed of all investigations and prosecutions of crimes within the Court's jurisdiction, permitted the Prosecutor to act on the basis of that information and then required States Parties to keep the Prosecutor regularly informed about national prosecutions of such crimes. Id., p. 26. The formulations in articles 26*ter* and 26*bis* were retained respectively and without change in article 49 and article 48 of the Zutphen Draft and articles 56 and 55 of the New York Draft.

²¹² But see El Zeidy, The Principle Of Complementarity In International Criminal Law (2008) 273, who argues that, inter alia, '[t]he fact that the required information is related to a case stage does not necessarily mean that the scope of information required under Article 19(11) is broader than that under Article 18(5), as this will depend on the circumstances of each situation and case'.

²¹³ A State Party also has a duty to cooperate with the Court under article 86, which necessarily incorporates a good faith obligation to respond without delay. The request is directly related to an investigation, albeit one that has been temporarily suspended, since the information requested is necessary to determine whether the provisionally suspended investigation, while investigative steps pursuant to paragraph 8 could be taking place, should remain in suspension or be resumed. But see Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 212, who contends that under paragraph 11 'a State [including a State party] would seem to be under no obligation to respond positively to request(s) to make available information on its domestic proceedings'.

under article 19, but not when there was a mandatory suspension of an investigation pursuant to article 19 para. 7. Such a situation would be particularly odd given that the Prosecutor could be authorized to take far more intrusive investigative steps under paragraph 8. In any event, the Prosecutor, the Pre-Trial Chamber or the Trial Chamber could request States, during an article 18 para. 2 deferral or an article 19 para. 7 suspension, to cooperate with the Court by providing information on the proceedings²¹⁴. This approach ensures that the appropriate Chamber can make an informed decision on admissibility with respect to the investigation based on all the relevant evidence and information²¹⁵.

²¹⁴ See for example Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-239, Decision Requesting Further Submissions on Issues Related to the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 Dec. 2012; Prosecutor v. S. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-44, Decision on Further Submissions on Issues Related to be Admissibility of the Case Against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 Aug. 2014.

²¹⁵ An authority on complementarity has argued that 'it appears reasonable to allow inferences in favour of admissibility to be drawn when States fail entirely to respond to requests of the Prosecutor to furnish information on their proceedings in accordance with Article [...] 19 (11), or to provide information, which is incomplete or too unspecific to assess admissibility'. He further suggests the converse is true when 'a State is forthcoming with comprehensive information or even invites the OTP to attend the domestic proceedings, etc.'. Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (2007) 229. However, while the first approach is an excellent way to constrain States from preventing a determination that a case is admissible (on that approach, see also Stigen, The Relationship Between the International Criminal Court and National Jurisdictions: The Principle of Complementarity (2008) 178), the willingness of a State to provide information or access has no bearing on the question of whether it is able or willing to investigate. For example, as Amnesty International and other organizations conducting trial observations have frequently discovered, many States that provide information and access to courts conduct unfair trials.

Article 20

Ne bis in idem

1. Except as provided in this Statute, no person shall be tried before the Court with respect to conduct which formed the basis of crimes for which the person has been convicted or acquitted by the Court.

2. No person shall be tried by another court for a crime referred to in article 5 for which that person has already been convicted or acquitted by the Court.

3. No person who has been tried by another court for conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7, 8 or 8bis shall be tried by the Court with respect to the same conduct unless the proceedings in the other court:

- (a) Were for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court; or
- (b) Otherwise were not conducted independently or impartially in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law and were conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, was inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice.

Literature: AIDP (ed), 'Resolution of Section IV Concurrent National and International Criminal jurisdiction and the Principle "Ne bis in idem"', adopted by the XVII. International Congress of Penal Law, 12–19 September 2004 in Beijing', (2004) 75 RIDP 802; Amar, A.R., 'Double Jeopardy Law Made Simple', (1997) 106 YaleLJ 1807; Bartsch, H.-J., 'Ne bis in idem: The European Perspective', (2002) 73 RIDP 1163; Bassiouni, M.C., International Extradition and World Public Order, iv (Oceana Publications 4th ed, 2002); Baum, L.M., 'Pursuing Justice in a Climate of Moral Outrage: An Evaluation of the Rights of the Accused in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2001) 19 WisconsinLLJ 197; Benzing, M. and Bergsmo, M., 'Some Tentative Remarks on the Relationship Between Internationalized Criminal Jurisdictions and the International Criminal Court', in: Romano C.P.R., Nollkamper, A. and Kleffner, J.K. (eds), Internationalized Criminal Courts (OUP 2004) 407; Bernard, D., "'Ne Bis in Idem": Protector of Defendants' Rights or Jurisdictional Pointsmen?', (2011) 9 JICJ 863; id., Juger et juger encore les crimes internationaux. Etude du principe ne bis in idem (Larcier 2014); Biehler, A., Knibühler, R., Lelieur-Fischer, J. and Stein, S. (eds), 'Freiburg Proposal on Concurrent Jurisdictions and the Prohibition of Multiple Prosecutions in the European Union' (2002) 73 RIDP 1185, available also at: <http://www.mpicc.de/shared/data/pdf/fa-ne-bis-in-idem.pdf> (accessed 1 September 2014); Birklbauer, A., 'Der Grundsatz "Ne bis in idem" in der Rechtsprechung europäischer Instanzen und die Auswirkung auf den Tatbegriff der öStPO', in: Moos, R., Jesionek, U. and Müller, O.F. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau, iii (StudienVerlag 2006) 45; Bogensberger, W., 'Die Anwendung des transnationalen Ne-bis-in-idem-Prinzips in Europa – und the Oscar for the development of standards goes to ... the Court', in: Moos, R., Jesionek, U. and Müller, O.F. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau, iii (StudienVerlag 2006) 91; Bohlander, M., 'Ne bis in idem', in: Bassiouni, M.C. (ed), International Criminal Law 541, iii (Nijhoff 2008); Burchard, C. and Brodowski, D., 'The Post-Lisbon Principle of Transnational Ne Bis in Idem: On the Relationship Between Article 50 Charter of Fundamental Rights and Article 54 Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement: Case Note on District Court Aachen, Germany, (52 Ks 9/08 – 'Boere'), Decision of 8 December', (2010) 1 NJECL 310; Campanella, S., 'Il Ne bis in idem nella giustizia internazionale penale: riflessioni su un principio in itinere', in: Cassese, A., Chiavario, M. and De Francesco, G. (eds), Problemi attuali della giustizia penale internazionale (G. Giappichelli Editore 2005) 253; Carter, L.E., 'The Principle of Complementarity and the International Criminal Court: the Role of Ne Bis in Idem', (2010) 8 SantaClaraJIL 165; Conway, G., 'Ne Bis in Idem in International Law', (2003) 3 ICLRev 217; id., 'Ne bis in idem and the International Criminal Tribunals', (2003) 14 CLF 351; Costa, J.E., 'Double Jeopardy and Non Bis in Idem: Principles of Fairness', (1998) 4 University of California Davis JIL&Policy 181; de la Cuesta, J.L., 'Concurrent National and International Criminal Jurisdiction and the Principle "ne bis in idem". General Report', (2002) 73 RIDP 707; Eicker, A., 'Der Grundsatz "ne bis in idem" – eine internationale menschenrechtliche Garantie?', in: Sutter, P. and Zelger, U. (eds), 30 Jahre EMRK-Beitritt der Schweiz: Erfahrungen und Perspektiven (Stämpfli 2005) 105; El Zeidy, M.M., 'The Doctrine of double jeopardy in International Criminal and Human Rights Law', (2002) 6 MediterraneanHumRts 183; id., 'Some Remarks on the Question of the Admissibility of a Case during Arrest Warrant Proceedings before the International Criminal Court', (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 741; id., 'The Principle of Complementarity: A New Machinery to Implement International Criminal Law', (2002) 23 MichJIL 869; Endriss, R. and Kinzig, J., 'Eine Straftat – zwei Strafen. Nachdenken über ein erweitertes "ne bis in idem"', (1997) Strafverteidiger 665; Epp, H., 'Der Grundsatz "ne bis in idem" im internationalen Rechtsbereich', (1979) ÖJZ 36; di Federico, G. (ed), The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights: From Declaration to Binding Instrument (Springer 2011); Eser, A., 'Non bis in idem', (1993) 11 NEP 48; Finlay, L., 'Does The International Criminal Court Protect Against Double Jeopardy: An Analysis of Article 20 of the Rome Statute', (2012) 15 University of California Davis JIL&Policy 221; Henzlin, M., "'Ne bis in idem", un principe à géométrie variable', (2005) 123 SchwZStR 345; Friedland, M., Double Jeopardy (Clarendon Press 1969); Heugas-Darraspen, E., 'Article 20' in: Fernandez, J. and Pacreau, X. (eds), Statut De Rome de la Cour Penale Internationale (Pedone 2012) 749; Holmes, J.T., 'Complementarity: National Courts versus the ICC', in: Cassese, A., Gaeta, P. and Jones, J.R.W.D. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 673; Holmes, J.T., 'The Principle of Complementarity' in: Lee, R.S. (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (Kluwer 1999) 41; Jung, H., "'Zur Internationalisierung" des Grundsatzes "ne bis in idem"' in: Albrecht, P.A. et al. (eds), Festschrift für Schüler-Springorum (Heymann 1993) 499; Kielwein, G., 'Der Verbrauch der Strafklage im englischen Strafverfahren', (1956) ZStW 163; Kleffner, J.K. and Nollkamper, A., 'The Relationship Between Internationalized Courts and National Courts', in: Romano, C.P.R., Nollkamper, A. and Kleffner, J.K. (eds), Internationalized Criminal Courts (OUP 2004) 359; Kleffner, J.K., Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions, (OUP 2008); Klip, A. and van der Wilt, H., 'National Report of the Netherlands', (2002) 73 RIDP 1091; Lagodny, O., 'Teileuropäisches "ne bis in idem" durch Art. 54 des Schengener Durchführungsübereinkommens (SDÜ)', (1997) NStZ 265; Lehouck, R.G., 'A Definition of Punishment for Implementing the Double Jeopardy Clause's Multiple-Punishment Prohibition,' (1981) 90 YaleLJ 632; Law Commission of England and Wales (ed), Double Jeopardy, consultation paper No. 156 (1999), www.lawcom.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/03/lc267_Double_Jeopardy_Report.pdf (accessed 1 September 2014); Liebau, T., 'Ne bis in idem' in Europa (NWV 2005); Mansdörfer, M., Das Prinzip ne bis in idem im europäischen Strafrecht (Duncker & Humblot 2004); Mayer, M., Ne-bis-in-idem-Wirkung europäischer Strafentscheidungen (Peter Lang 1992); Morosin, M.N., 'Double Jeopardy and International Law: Obstacles to Formulating a General Principle', (1995) 64 NordicJIL 261; Muhammad, N., 'Due Process of Law for Persons Accused of Crime', in: Henkin, L. (ed), The International Bill of Rights (Columbia University Press 1981) 136; Neagu, N., 'The Ne Bis in Idem Principle in the Interpretation of European Courts: Towards Uniform Interpretation', (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 955; Neuhaus, R., Der strafverfahrensrechtliche Tatbegriff – 'ne bis in idem' (Bochum 1985); Olusanya, O., Double Jeopardy Without Parameters: Re-characterization in International Criminal Law (Intersentia 2004); Pralus, M., 'Étude en droit pénal internationale et en droit communautaire d'un aspect du principe non bis in idem: non bis', (1996) RSC 551; Pierini, JP, 'Il principio del ne bis in idem nello Statuto della Corte', in: Argiró, F. (ed), La Corte Penale Internazionale: organi, competenza, reati, processo (Milano 2006) 1361; Renaud, A., 'Nouveaux instruments contre la fraude et la principe: Ne bis in idem' (1996) 12 Agon 9; Roth, R., 'Non bis in idem transnational: vers de nouveaux paradigmes?', in: Braum, S and Weyembergh, A. (eds), Le contrôle juridictionnel dans l'espace pénal européen = The judicial control in EU cooperation in criminal matters (Parution 2009) 121; Scheschonka, E., Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (Lit-Verlag 2004); id., 'Konkurrierende nationale und internationale Strafgerichtsbarkeit und der Grundsatz "Ne bis in idem"', in: Arnold J et al. (eds), Festschrift für Albin Eser (C.H. Beck 2005) 829; id., 'Internationales "ne bis in idem" nach Art. 54 SDÜ', (1997) StV 383; id., 'Strafrecht und Rechtshilfe im Geltungsbereich von Schengen II', (1995) NJW 1931; Schroeder, F.-C., 'Die Rechtsnatur des Grundsatzes "ne bis in idem"', (1997) JuS 227; Sedman, D., 'Article 20 ICCSt and the Principle of Ne bis in idem', in: Burchard, C., Triffterer, O. and Vogel, J. (eds), The Review Conference and the Future of the International Criminal Court: Proceedings of the first AIDP Symposium for Young Penalists in Tübingen, Germany, co-organized by the AIDP YP Committee (Wolters Kluwer/Carl Heymanns Verlag 2010) 277; Stein, S., Zum europäischen ne bis in idem nach Artikel 54 des Schengener Durchführungsübereinkommens (Peter Lang 2004); Specht, B., Die zwischenstaatliche Geltung des Grundsatzes ne bis in idem (Springer 1999); Spinellis, D., 'The ne bis in idem principle in "global" instruments', (2002) 73 RIDP 1149; Theofanis, R., 'The Doctrine of Res Judicata in International Criminal Law', (2003) 3 ICLRev 195; Van der Beken, T, Vermeulen, G. and Ongena, T., 'National Report of Belgium', (2002) 73 RIDP 811; Vervaele, J.A.E., 'The transnational ne bis in idem principle in the EU. Mutual recognition and equivalent protection of human rights', (2005) 1 UtrechtLRev 100; Walther, S., 'Cumulation of Offences', in: Cassese, A., Gaeta, P. and Jones, J.R.W.D. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 475; Wilkitzki, P., 'Völkerrechtliche Verbrechen und nationales Strafrecht, Tagungsbericht vom XIV. Internationalen Strafrechtkongress der Association Internationale de Droit Pénal' (1990), 102 ZStW 681; Wills, H.S., 'Cumulative Convictions and the Double Jeopardy Rule: Pursuing Justice at the ICTY and the ICTR', (2003) 17 EmoryILRev 341; Wise, E.M., 'Part 2: Non bis in idem and applicable law', (1998) 13*bis* NEP 43; Van den Wyngaert, C. and Stessens, G., 'The International non bis in idem Principle: Resolving Some of the Unanswered Questions', (1999) 48 ICLQ 779; Van den Wyngaert, C. and Ongena, T., 'Ne bis in idem Principle, Including the Issue of Amnesty', in: Cassese, A., Gaeta, P. and Jones, J.R.W.D. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 705; Zapatero, L.A. (ed), El principio de 'ne bis in idem' en el derecho penal europeo e internacional (Univ de Castilla La Mancha 2007); Zilli, M., "'Ne bis in idem' e coisa julgada fraudulenta: a posição da Corte Interamericana de Direitos Humanos', in: K. Ambos et al. (eds), Sistema interamericano de protección de los derechos humanos y derecho penal internacional (Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung 2011) 393, http://www.kas.de/wf/doc/kas_31766-1522-4-30.pdf?121011222421 (accessed 1 September 2014).

Content

A. General remarks	1
1. Introduction	1
2. Protected interests	5
3. Ne bis in idem in comparative, European and international law	7
4. The development up to the Rome conference	18
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	20
I. Paragraph 1	20
1. 'Except as provided in this Statute'	21
2. 'conduct which formed the basis of crimes'	22
3. 'convicted or acquitted by the Court'	23
II. Paragraph 2	25
1. 'by another court'	25
2. 'for a crime referred to in article 5'	27
3. 'convicted or acquitted by the Court'	29
III. Paragraph 3	30
1. 'has been tried'	35
2. 'by another court'	39
3. 'for conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8 [...] with respect to the same conduct'	40
4. 'the proceedings in the other court'	43
5. The different subparagraphs	45
a) 'for the purpose of shielding from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'	46
b) 'not conducted independently or impartially in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law and were conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, was inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice'	47
IV. Application	49
V. Consequences in cases of violation	50
VI. Conclusion	51
C. Special remarks	53
1. The minimum content of ne bis in idem : the principle of deduction	53
2. Relevance of genuine enforcement of sentences	54
3. Offences against the administration of justice	57

A. General remarks

1. Introduction

The core idea of the ne bis in idem principle is that nobody should be judged twice for the same offence. Ne bis in idem corresponds to most aspects of the common law prohibition against 'double jeopardy'¹. The content and scope of the principle are not uniformly defined. In particular, ways to interpret the two decisive factors 'idem' and 'bis' vary considerably. This relates to identifying what is 'the same', defining the finality of a decision as well as the question, at what stage a subsequent procedure shall be barred. The consequences of ne bis in idem are twofold. From a substantive point of view it shields a person from being punished twice. With regard to procedure, it blocks a new prosecution². Depending on the context, ne bis in idem can be referred to in such areas as recharging an accused with the same or another offence upon the same facts, framing an indictment, continuing offences, convicting and sentencing on multiple counts, new trials, appeals, revision, the relationship between courts in and between States, and the recognition of criminal judgements. It has, however, traditionally been held to be in force inside one jurisdictional regime only³.

¹ From the several distinct protections for criminal defendants embodied in 'double jeopardy', the pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict and prohibition of multiple punishment are referred to as the closest counterparts of ne bis in idem. This conceptual and terminological discussion has to be left aside here. See, e.g., Mayer, Ne-bis-in-idem-Wirkung europäischer Strafsentscheidungen (1992) 15; Lehouck (1981) 90 YaleLJ 632–3; Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 15–17.

² De la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 710; Spinellis (2002) 73 RIDP 1149–50. One commentator recently concluded that the continuing discussion whether ne bis in idem has to be considered as part of substantive or procedural law should be closed with a clear 'as well as' (Mansdörfer, Das Prinzip ne bis in idem im europäischen Strafrecht (2004) 244). For an in-depth analysis see Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das ISIGH-Statut (2004) 12 et seq., 30 et seq.

- 2 In the negotiations of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, ne bis in idem had to be considered in a sui generis context. On the one hand, as the jurisdiction of the ICC is added to the existing mechanisms of national and international jurisdiction, the various competencies cumulate⁴. On the other hand, however, the risk of cumulating jurisdictional claims needs to be observed against the general perception that the enforcement of international criminal law lacks comprehensiveness, suffering from the historical pattern of impunity. The particularity underlying the ICC jurisdiction lies in the fact that the relationship between the ICC and States is not the same as between States; equality of sovereigns and, in cases of competing claims, the presumption of concurrency. The ICC's complementary jurisdiction prevails over States that are unable or unwilling to genuinely exercise their jurisdiction on behalf of the international community as a whole (indirect enforcement model). As a consequence, ne bis in idem applies fully only with regard to the decisions of the ICC. In case of national decisions, a retrial may, in exceptional circumstances, take place. Ne bis in idem has, therefore, been linked with the discussion on jurisdiction from early on. Article 20 partly mirrors the provisions on jurisdiction and admissibility. Whether a case goes as far as bis in idem depends on the stage at which the cumulative interests of the national and international jurisdiction become concrete.
- 3 The substantively identical provisions of the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR served as important models for the formulation of ne bis in idem in the ILC Draft Statute. Their jurisdictional model is, however, decisively different from the Rome Statute. The ad hoc Tribunals have concurrent but primary jurisdiction with regard to national courts⁵. The ICC is deemed to be complementary to national courts, as expressed in paragraph 10 of the Preamble and in article 17. The ICC will attempt to gain universality and permanence, whereas the ad hoc Tribunals, by definition, exercise jurisdiction strictly limited in time and territory. In drafting the ICC Statute, it became evident that most States were not willing to accept the ad hoc solutions as permanent ones. As a result, article 20 differs considerably from the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals.
- 4 Article 20 was amended by the Kampala Review Conference⁶. Different from article 20 paras 1 and 2, which generically refer to crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with article 5, article 20 para. 3 explicitly enumerates the relevant articles of the Rome Statute defining the core crimes. Originally this list only referred to articles 6, 7 and 8. In order to provide full ne bis in idem protection to a person who 'has been tried by another court for conduct also proscribed' by the definition of the crime of aggression, a reference to article 8*bis* was included in the chapeau of article 20 para. 3.

2. Protected interests

- 5 Ne bis in idem protects two kinds of interests. Firstly, it protects an individual who was once prosecuted for an offence from being further troubled upon the same grounds (nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa) and being subject to punishment several times (ne

³ See e.g. Decision of the Human Rights Committee of 16 July 1986 in the case of A.P. v. Italy (Communication No.204/1986, CCPR/C/31/D/204/1986, para. 7.3.). For details see mn 8, 13.

⁴ See, e.g., Pralus (1996) RSC 552–554; Oehler, Internationales Strafrecht (1983) mn 906, concerning the crimes under the universality principle.

⁵ See article 9 of the ICTY Statute, article 8 of the ICTR Statute. The Secretary-General states in his Report on the creation of the ICTY, however, that the Security Council did not intend to 'preclude or prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by national courts [...] Indeed national courts should be encouraged to exercise their jurisdiction in accordance with their relevant national laws and procedures'. UN Doc. S/25704 (3 May 1993), p. 1176, para. 64. See also Bassiouni and Manikas (eds), The Law of the Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1996) 306–319; Weckel (1993) Annuaire Francais de Droit Internationale 232.

⁶ Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression, Resolution RC/Res.6 adopted by consensus on 11 June 2010, Annex I, para. 7.

poena in idem). ‘The State with all its resources and power should not be allowed to make repeated attempts to convict an individual for an alleged offence, thereby subjecting him to embarrassment, expense and ordeal and compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity, as well as enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty’⁷. This protection of the individual from State abuse and ad infinitum prosecutions is also the rationale behind the international recognition of the principle of ne bis in idem as a human right. Secondly, ne bis in idem has a function in protecting the authority and integrity of the legal system by confirming the finality of penal judgements. It thereby serves the ideal of legal certainty and helps prevent inconsistent results. A moot case must not be reopened (factum praeteritum) and a decision by a criminal court must not be obstructed by other criminal courts (res iudicata pro veritate habetur)⁸. It is to the first trial, therefore, that all efforts should be directed⁹. Lastly, the application of ne bis in idem serves the interest of judicial economy, by saving resources and court facilities.

The rationale of the principle changes when it is applied in a transnational context. State interests become more dominant while the individual has long been seen as the ‘object’ of interstate cooperation¹⁰. Also when examined with regard to international criminal jurisdiction, the bis in idem situation reflects a more general confrontation between domestic and international competencies. From the point of view of individuals, the internationalization of criminal justice creates paradoxical effects. On the one hand, an individual can – relying on his or her emerging legal competence under international law – refer to international instruments when challenging the judicial decisions or legislation of his or her own State. On the other hand, international jurisdiction may deprive the individual of the protection so far granted by his or her State of nationality. One example of this is the possibility of a second trial in the ICC after national criminal proceedings.

As a result, the principle of ne bis in idem occupies a central but controversial role in the ICC Statute. It can be viewed as the last safeguard in allocating the tasks of national and international criminal justice according to the notion of complementarity¹¹. As ne bis in idem is considered as absolute solely when it comes to the decisions of the ICC, the possibility of exceptions granted in paragraph 3 with regard to national decisions is the channel of the ‘international community’ for verifying the performance of national criminal justice. The explicit rationale is to avoid impunity, as stated in the Preamble of the ICC Statute, for example. Applying and interpreting the exceptions will draw the borderline between sufficient, bona fide criminal justice and ineffective or mala fide proceedings. It is clear that article 20 will be of different importance and acceptability to the parties concerned. The individual facing a second trial, the victim who was offered no justice or only a sham process nationally but who also bears the risk of re-victimisation; the State where the first trial was conducted and the ICC are destined to have contradicting views on the application of article 20.

3. Ne bis in idem in comparative, European and international law

National laws distinguish several aspects of ne bis in idem: the negative authority of judgements passed within the State, the reaction to judgements from other national jurisdic-

⁷ Justice Black for the U.S. Supreme Court, Green v. United States (1957) 355 U.S. 187–8. See also Crist v. Bretz (1978) 437 U.S. 34 et seq. A retrial increases the possibility that the accused will be found guilty: the person will not always have the stamina or the financial resources to effectively fight a second charge.

⁸ For the rationales of ne bis in idem see, e.g. de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 710; van den Wyngaert and Stessens (1999) 48 ICLQ 781 et seq. see also Conway (2003) 3 ICLRev 222 et seq.; Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004) 11 et seq.; Liebau, ‘Ne bis in idem’ in Europa (2005) 46 et seq. More with respect to ‘double jeopardy’, see Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 3–5.

⁹ See Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 4.

¹⁰ Van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 708. For developments towards a triangular relationship see e.g. Reisinger Coracini, in: Sluiter et al. (eds), International Criminal Procedure (OUP 2013) 95, 111–2.

¹¹ See Tallgren (1998) 67 NordJIL 107.

tions (horizontal or transnational ne bis in idem) and to those of international courts and tribunals (vertical ne bis in idem). These elements are shaped not only by a State's legal tradition but have become increasingly subject to international standardization. On the international level ne bis in idem is enshrined as a human right in regional and international documents and constitutes an important protection with regard to interstate cooperation in criminal matters, in particular extradition law. Against the background of the proliferating international adjudicating bodies, a further aspect has gained more and more importance, that of horizontal ne bis in idem between judgements of international courts and tribunals.

- 8 Ne bis in idem is part of most national legal systems. It is usually included in the 'general part' of substantive penal codes, codes of penal procedure, the constitution, or acknowledged as a general principle confirmed by case law¹². The roots of the principle can be traced back to antiquity. Its multifarious incarnations thereafter cannot be elaborated here in detail¹³. Some conceptual similarities can be frequently found in States affiliated either with the civil or common law tradition. In this context, the prohibition of appeals to the detriment of the accused in common law, the definition of idem on the basis of historic facts (conduct; ipsum factum) in civil law countries, and legal qualification (offence or charge; idem crimen) in the common law tradition are well known examples¹⁴. But also within these major legal systems differences in the domestic application of the principle exist. Jeopardy may attach at the stage when the jury is empanelled in jury trials, when the court starts to hear evidence, after termination of a trial – by a judgement on the merits of a case or also by other decisions – or only when all ordinary remedies have been exhausted. A res iudicata may bar the opening of subsequent procedures, permit a second judgement or may oblige to take into account previously served sentences when determining the punishment (principle of deduction)¹⁵. Exceptions to the principle also differ considerably¹⁶.
- 9 The recognition by a State of the negative authority of a judgement rendered abroad limits one of its most genuine, sovereign competences: the exercise of criminal jurisdiction according to its national law. States, therefore, are hesitant to accord general international validity to ne bis in idem. Its application is limited so far and, if recognized, varies decisively in different domestic legal systems, despite international attempts towards harmonization and regional integration¹⁷. States are parties to different, partly overlapping, bi- and multi-

¹² See de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 710. For an overview of constitutions guaranteeing ne bis in idem see Bassiouni (1993) 3 DukeJComp&IL 262; see also the various country reports in (2002) 73 RIDP 773 et seq.

¹³ For the origins of the principle 'bis de eadem re ne sit actio' and the motion 'exceptio rei iudicatae' ('exceptio rei in iudicium deductae') in Roman or even Attic law see e.g. Liebau, 'Ne bis in idem' in Europa (2005) 67; Mansdörfer, Das Prinzip ne bis in idem im europäischen Strafrecht (2004) 54 et seq., Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004), 3 et seq. with further references. On the history, see also Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 5–16; Mayer, Ne-bis-in-idem-Wirkung europäischer Strafscheidungen (1992) 15–17; Kielwein (1956) ZStW 163.

¹⁴ See van den Wyngaert and Ongena (1999) 48 ICLQ 710 et seq., 714; see also Amar (1997) 106 YaleLJ 1807, 1813 et seq., Conway (2003) 14 CLF 359 et seq., 363 et seq., 368 et seq.; El Zeidy (2002) 6 MediterraneanJHumRts 187 et seq.; Morosin (1995) 64 NordJIL 268, all with further references.

¹⁵ For examples see de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 711 et seq.; Costa (1998) 4 University of California Davis JIL & Policy 186; Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 187, note 53 with further references. See also comparative studies in Liebau, 'Ne bis in idem' in Europa (2005) 67 et seq., 237 et seq.; Mansdörfer, Das Prinzip ne bis in idem im europäischen Strafrecht (2004) 57 et seq., 274 et seq.; Stein, Zum europäischen ne bis in idem nach Artikel 54 des Schengener Durchführungsübereinkommens (2004) 197 et seq.; Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004), 156 et seq. With regard to the theory of 'continuing jeopardy', see e.g. Amar (1997) 106 YaleLJ 1838 et seq.

¹⁶ On exceptions see e.g. de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 714; Vander Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 814.

¹⁷ For details see de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 715 et seq.; Amnesty International, too, seems more inclined to make a contribution towards criminal repression than the rights of the individual, stating categorically that ne bis in idem 'applies only to retrials by the same jurisdiction', see Amnesty International, The International Criminal Court: Making the Right Choices – Part V (1998) 39. As Pralus observes, the application is far easier in question of the subsidiary competences. On the contrary, in the case of a competence regarded exclusive in the national law, like that of trying own national or crimes committed on the own territory, the recognition presupposes a lateral treaties providing detailed obligations, which are not uniform in substance. Generally, the acknowledgement of transnational ne bis in idem is limited to final foreign judgements; pending criminal proceedings do not block subsequent proceedings in another State. The actual enforcement of a penalty is normally taken into consideration. Ne bis in idem is commonly excluded for foreign judgements with regard to conduct for which a State can establish territorial jurisdiction itself, although in such cases, the initiation of national proceedings may depend on a special permit by national organs. Particular State interests or the commission of certain types of offences may further limit the authority granted to a foreign judgement. Some States basically deny the application of transnational ne bis in idem. Nevertheless, in such cases, the principle of deduction is generally acknowledged¹⁸.

With regard to vertical ne bis in idem, national standards are assumingly less divergent, since they derive directly from distinct international obligations. The Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR as well as the Rome Statute comprise regulations regarding the res iudicata effect of judgements of the international adjudicating body vis-à-vis domestic courts (downward ne bis in idem) as well as regarding the effect of national judgements on the international court or tribunal (upward ne bis in idem). By way of their establishment through Security Council Resolution, the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR are binding upon all member States of the United Nations. The same is true for the Rome Statute regarding its States parties. Nevertheless, these international obligations remain rudimentary and not fully enforceable if they are not supplemented by substantive as well as procedural implementation on the national level¹⁹.

Ne bis in idem is reflected in several regional multilateral treaties. The 7th Additional Protocol of the European Convention of Human Rights contains the principle, declaring it a fundamental right which cannot be derogated even in times of war or public emergency²⁰, as well as the *American Convention of Human Rights*²¹ and the *Arab Charter of Human Rights*²². The African Charter on Human and People's Rights does not mention ne bis in idem, however²³. Article 4 of the 7th Additional Protocol protects a person from being 'tried or punished again ... for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted'²⁴. Its scope of application is expressly limited to criminal proceedings. Article 8 remarkable confidence in foreign judgment(s), Pralus (1996) Rev. Science Criminelle 565. But see the rather – exceptional – case of the Netherlands, where foreign judgements are generally accepted as res iudicata, Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1100 et seq. See in this regard also e.g. the English common law tradition (for details see Conway (2003) 3 ICLRev 233); Law Commission of England and Wales (ed), Double Jeopardy, consultation paper No. 156 (1999), www.lawcom.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/03/lc267__Double_jeopardy_Report.pdf (accessed 1 September 2014) paras. 9.10–9.15; Vervaele (2005) 1 UtrechtLRev 100 and Egypt, El Zeidy (2002) 6 MediterraneanJHumRts 199.

¹⁸ For examples see de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 722 et seq., 724; Liebau, 'Ne bis in idem' in Europa (2005) 171 et seq.; van den Wyngaert and Stessens (1999) 48 ICLQ 782 et seq., 797 et seq.

¹⁹ In this regard AIDP (ed) (2004) 75 RIDP 805.

²⁰ Article 4 para. 3 Protocol No. 7 E.T.S. No. 117, article 15 ECtHR. The 1950 ECtHR does not explicitly refer to ne bis in idem but the European Commission for Hum. Rts. has suggested application of article 6 of the Convention under certain circumstances, see Frowein and Peukert, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention. EMRK-Kommentar (1996) Article 6, mn 173; Mayer, Ne-bis-in-idem-Wirkung europäischer Strafscheidungen (1992) 48–49.

²¹ San José, Costa Rica, 1969, 9 ILM 673 (1970).

²² Adopted by the League of Arab States on 15. Sep. 1994, see 18 Hum. Rts. L. J. 151 (1997); the Charter has not yet entered into force.

²³ Banjul 1981, 21 ILM 58 (1982).

²⁴ The ECtHR's jurisprudence on what constitutes an idem has not been coherent. Despite the wording, it applied a broad interpretation of the term 'offence', based on the 'same conduct' in Gradinger v. Austria (application no. 15963/90, judgment of 23 Oct. 1995, para 55). Later on, the court relied on the legal qualification of the underlying facts as the relevant criterion for establishing identity (Oliveira v. Switzerland, application no. 25711/94, judgment of 30 July 1998, para. 26). The ECtHR undertook to clarify its seemingly 'contradictory' jurisprudence in the case Fischer v. Austria (application no. 37950/97, judgement of 29 May 2001, para. 23). It confirmed the view that article 4 of Prot. No. 7 was not infringed by the fact that a single criminal act was split up into two separate offences and judged subsequently by two different courts. Nevertheless, the ECtHR was free to closely examine 'cases where one act, at first sight, appears to constitute more than one offence, whereas a closer para. 4 of the American Convention prohibits an accused ‘acquitted by a nonappealable judgment’ from becoming ‘subjected to a new trial for the same cause’²⁵. Article 16 of the Arab Charter states ‘no one shall be tried twice for the same offence’. A few conventions on international cooperation in criminal matters also make reference to the principle²⁶.

- 12 In the European Union context further parallel tracks of development still have to be considered. Ne bis in idem is enshrined in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, which gained the status of primary law with the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty²⁷. Its article 50 protects persons from being ‘tried or punished again in criminal proceedings for an offence for which he or she has already been finally acquitted or convicted’. As all provisions of the Charter, article 50 is ‘addressed to the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law’ (article 51.1 of the Charter, emphasis added). It must be highlighted that ne bis in idem as referred to in article 50 ‘applies not only within the jurisdiction of one State but also between the jurisdictions of several Member States’²⁸. This corresponds to the acquis in Union law: The Schengen Convention introduced a transnational ne bis in idem into the common area of its States Parties²⁹. Its article 54 protects ‘[a] person whose trial has been finally disposed of’ from examination shows that only one offence should be prosecuted because it encompasses all the wrongs contained in the others. ... Thus, where different offences based on one act are prosecuted consecutively, one after the final decision of the other, the Court has to examine whether or not such offences have the same essential elements’ (ibid., para 25). For an analysis see e.g. Birkbauer, in: Moos et al. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau (2006) 45, 47 et seq.; Mansdörfer, Das Prinzip ne bis in idem im europäischen Strafrecht (2004) 99 et seq. With regard to determining the finality of a judgement, article 4 of Prot. No. 7 relies on domestic ‘law and penal procedure’. But the Explanatory Report to Prot. No. 7 also refers to the definition underlying the European Convention on the International Validity of Criminal Judgments, E.T.S. No. 70. Thus, a decision is final ‘if, according to the traditional expression, it has acquired the force of res judicata. This is the case when it is irrevocable, that is to say when no further ordinary remedies are available or when the parties have exhausted such remedies or have permitted the time-limit to expire without availing themselves of them’ (Explanatory Report to Prot. No. 7 paras. 22 and 29).

²⁵ The IACtHR interprets the expression ‘the same cause’ as a much broader term in the victim’s favour than the notion ‘same offence’ as used for instance in article 14 para. 7 ICCPR, see IACtHR, Case of Loayza-Tamayo v. Perú, series C no. 33 para 66, Judgment, 17 Sep. 1997. With regard to ‘acquitted by a nonappealable judgment’ the Inter American Commission of Hum. Rts. held that the acquittal must be a final judgment, implying that ‘someone who, having been charged with a crime, has been exonerated from all criminal responsibility, since he has been acquitted because his innocence has been demonstrated, because his guilt has not been proven, or because it has been determined that the acts of which he is accused are not defined as crimes’. The term ‘nonappealable judgment’ is interpreted according to domestic law. However, any procedural act that is fundamentally jurisdictional in nature, and acquires the immutability and incontestability of res judicata, qualifies, García v. Perú, Case 11.006, Decision, 17 Feb. 1995, Report No. 1/95.

²⁶ Among the most important ones in Europe are the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, E.T.S. No. 24 and its two additional protocols, E.T.S. Nos. 86 and 98, the 1970 European Convention on the International Validity of Criminal Judgments, E.T.S. No. 70, and the 1972 European Convention on the Transfer of Proceedings in Criminal Matters, E.T.S. No. 73. See, e.g., Bartsch (2002) 73 RIDP 1166; Dugard and van den Wyngaert (1998) 92 AJIL 188; Epp (1979) ÖJZ 3. For the Americas, see e.g., the 1992 Inter-American Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (A-55, OAS Treaty Series No. 75) and the 1993 Inter-American Convention on Execution of Criminal Sentences Abroad (A-57, OAS Treaty Series No. 76). See also article V para. 1 of the extradition treaty of the League of Arab States, Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004) 59 et seq.

²⁷ Article 6.1 Treaty on European Union (OJ C 83, 30 March 2010). For details see di Federico, in: di Federico (ed), The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights: From Declaration to Binding Instrument (Springer 2011) 15 et seq.

²⁸ Explanations relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, p. 32 (O J C 303, 14 December 2007).

²⁹ Convention of 19 June 1990, applying the Schengen Agreement of 14 June 1985, Schengen, ILM 84 (1991). For details e.g. Lagodny (1997) NStZ 265; in extensu: Stein, Zum europäischen ne bis in idem nach Artikel 54 des Schengener Durchführungsübereinkommens (2004). The Schengen Convention has meanwhile been incorporated into the European Union framework by a Protocol attached to the Treaty of Amsterdam and forms part of the acquis communautaire. On the substantive differences between Art. 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Art. 54 SDÜ see Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 533*et seq.*

being ‘prosecuted in another Contracting Party for the same acts’³⁰. The Schengen Convention has meanwhile been incorporated into the European Union framework by a Protocol attached to the Treaty of Amsterdam³¹. It should also be mentioned that in the framework of the European Political Cooperation, the member States of the (former) European Communities have concluded a convention on double jeopardy³². Furthermore, the accumulation of administrative and penal sanctions to be imposed by national and community organs has generated regulation of ne bis in idem, for example, in the context of the protection of the financial interests of the Union³³. Other legal acts adopted within the area of freedom, security and justice, former third pillar, also refer to the ne bis in idem principle³⁴. Article 3 para. 2 of the 2002 Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant, for instance, allows a refusal of the execution of a European arrest warrant with regard to a person who has been finally judged by a member State³⁵.

Ne bis in idem was not included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, unlike 13 some other minimum guarantees on criminal procedure. The UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights covers ne bis in idem in its article 14 para. 7. According to this provision, ‘[n]o one shall be liable to be tried or punished again for an offence for which he has already been finally convicted or acquitted’³⁶. A few international instruments on crime prevention

³⁰ Regarding the notion ‘finally disposed of’, the ECJ ruled that article 54 Schengen Convention applies to certain out of court settlements, final acquittals based on statutory limitation or lack of evidence (Gözütok et Brügger, Case C-187/01 et C-385/01, Judgement, 11 Feb. 2003, para. 48; Gasparini, Case C-467/04, Judgement, 28 Sep. 2006, para. 33; van Straaten, Case C-150/05, Judgement, 28 Sep. 2006, para 61) but not to a Prosecutor’s decision not to ‘pursue the prosecution on the sole ground that criminal proceedings have been started in another member State against the same defendant and for the same acts, without any determination whatsoever as to the merits of the case’. (Miraglia, Case C-469/03, Judgement, 10 Mar. 2005, para 34). Idem has to be understood in a broad way, ‘as the existence of a set of facts which are inextricably linked together, irrespective of the legal classification given to them or the legal interest protected’ (van Esbroeck, Case C-436/04, Judgement, 9 Mar. 2006, paras. 36 and 42). For details see e.g. Birkbauer, in: R. Moos et al. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau (2006) 54 et seq.; Bogensberger, in: Moos et al. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau (2006) 91, 95 et seq.; Schomburg, in: Arnold et al. (eds), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 835; Stein, Zum europäischen ne bis in idem nach Artikel 54 des Schengener Durchführungsübereinkommens (2004) 73 et seq.; Vervaele (2005) 1 UtrechtLRev 110 et seq. for exceptions to the application of ne bis in idem see article 55 Schengen Convention.

³¹ On its relationship to article 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights see ‘The Post-Lisbon Principle of Transnational Ne Bis in Idem: On the Relationship Between Article 50 Charter of Fundamental Rights and Article 54 Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement: Case Note on District Court Aachen, Germany, (52 Ks 9/08 – ‘Boere’), Decision of 8 December’ (2010) 1 New Journal of European Criminal Law 310.

³² See Bulletin of the European Communities, Year 20. No. 5, 113 (1987). It has been ratified by few States, has not entered into force but is provisionally applicable in some EU member States. The Convention, largely identical to the Schengen Convention, can be seen as a first attempt to introduce Schengen into the framework of the European Communities, Bartsch (2002) 73 RIDP 1169.

³³ See Corpus Iuris introducing Penal Provisions for the Protection of the Financial Interests of the European Union (1997); Renaud (1996) 12 Agon 9; Vervaele (2005) 1 UtrechtLRev 106 et seq.; article 7 of the Convention on the Protection of the European Communities’ Financial Interests (OJ C 316, 27 November 1995); article 10 of the Convention on the fight against corruption (OJ C 195, 25 June 1997).

³⁴ Article 4 of the Treaty of the Functioning of the European Union, C 83/47, 20 March 2010; Articles 9 of Protocol No. 36 on transitional provisions OJ 115, 9 May 2008, p. 322.

³⁵ Council Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender Procedure between member States of 13 June 2002 (OJ L 190, 18 July 2002, p. 1). See e.g. Bartsch (2002) 73 RIDP 1170, Schomburg, in: Arnold et al. (eds), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 840; Vervaele (2005) 1 UtrechtLRev 116 et seq. See also the Initiative of the Hellenic Republic with a view to adopting a Council Framework Decision concerning the application of the ‘ne bis in idem’ principle, OJ C 100, 26 Apr. 2003, p. 24; and the Green Paper on Conflicts of Jurisdiction and the Principle of ne bis in idem, Criminal Proceedings COM(2005) 696 final of 23 Dec. 2005, p. 3, neither of them having led to new legislation. For details see e.g., Bogensberger, in: Moos et al. (eds), Strafprozessrecht im Wandel, Festschrift für Roland Miklau (2006) 104 et seq.

³⁶ The last requirement ‘finally convicted or acquitted’ is to be judged ‘in accordance with the law and penal procedure of each country’ M. Nowak, article 14, UN CCPR Commentary mn 99 (2005). A deviating proposal requiring for the term ‘finally convicted or acquitted’ that all ordinary methods of judicial review and appeal have been exhausted and that all waiting periods had expired, was suggested but not adopted (id. mn 98).

refer to the principle³⁷. The United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition declares it a mandatory ground for refusal of an extradition when a final judgement has been rendered against the same ‘person in the requested State in respect of the offence for which the person’s extradition is requested’³⁸. Article 86 Geneva Convention III and article 117 para. 3 Geneva Convention IV prohibit the double punishment of prisoners of war and civilian internees ‘for the same act or on the same charge [count]’³⁹. Article 75 para. 4 (h) Add. Prot. I contains a more detailed regulation: ‘no one shall be prosecuted or punished by the same Party for an offence in respect of which a final judgement acquitting or convicting that person has been previously pronounced under the same law and judicial procedure’. The question whether ne bis in idem could be regarded as a general principle of international law or a customary norm has to be left aside here⁴⁰.

- 14 The fact that ne bis in idem is included in national laws, and in regional and international conventions could be seen as evidence of its internationally recognized position. It could also be seen as evidence of the way human rights ideology has influenced criminal law since World War II. The ne bis in idem principle differs, however, decisively from the other cornerstones of a criminal trial such as the principle of legality or the presumption of innocence: it is generally held to be in force inside one jurisdictional regime only. With the exception of European Union law, the relevant provisions of the international human rights conventions, the regional as well as the universal ones do ‘not guarantee ne bis in idem with regard to the national jurisdictions of two or more states’⁴¹. They provide for an international guarantee of the principle but not for its international application⁴². This ‘nationalisme pénal, soucieux de souveraineté plus que d’équité’ has been the target of considerable criticism⁴³.
- 15 Against this background, the principle of ne bis in idem has undergone a distinct development in the context of international criminal law enforcement. In the doctrine following the establishment of the ICC, international and national courts, when prosecuting crimes under international law, are sometimes seen to exercise the ius puniendi of the ‘international community’ as a whole to defend its highest values, ‘the peace, security and well-being of the world’ (Preamble para. 3). Final decisions taken within this system of

³⁷ See e.g. rule 30 para 1, Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, adopted by the First United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held at Geneva in 1955, and approved by the Economic and Social Council by its Res. 663 C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957 and Res. 2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977; article 36 para. 2 lit. a (iv) Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs. For further references see M. Pralus (1996) RSC 565–566.

³⁸ Article 3 lit. d. Adopted by GA Res. 45/116, subsequently amended by GA Res. 52/88.

³⁹ For details see El Zeidy (2002) 6 Mediterranean JHumRts 227.

⁴⁰ See in this regard e.g. Cassese, analysing that ‘[w]hile the ‘internal’ ne bis in idem principle may be held to be prescribed by a customary rule of international law, the legal status of the ‘international’ equivalent principle is still controversial’. However, although a customary rule with regard to all crimes has not yet crystallized, he ascertains that such a rule arguably has evolved with regard to international crimes, Cassese, International Criminal Law (2003) 319–20. On the question whether or not ne bis in idem can be regarded as a ‘general principle of law recognized by civilised nations’ according to article 38 ICJ Statute see e.g. Conway (2003) 3 ICLRev 229 et seq. (238); Morosin (1995) 64 NordJIL 262 et seq.; Theofanis (2003) 3 ICLRev 195. For both aspects see also Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004) 113 et seq. (145), 146 et seq. (205).

⁴¹ A.P. v. Italy, above note 3, § 7.3 of 2 Nov. 1987. See, e.g., Muhammad, in: Henkin (ed), The International Bill of Rights (1981) 136, 156. For a critical voice, see Nowak, above note 36, article 14, mn 99 with further references. On the discussion concerning the European Convention, see, e.g., Mayer, Ne-bis-in-idem-Wirkung europäischer Strafscheidungen (1992) 47–50; Pralus (1996) RSC 566–568. But see Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004) 63 et seq. interpreting article 8 American Convention on Hum. Rts. including a transnational protection.

⁴² See Bartsch (2002) 73 RIDP 1164.

⁴³ See Jung, who regards the avoidance of multiple judgements as ‘aus international-strafrechtlicher Sicht inzwischen als ein vorrangig zu lösendes Problem’, in: Albrecht et al. (eds), Festschrift für Schüler-Springorum (Heymann 1993) 500; Pralus (1996) RSC 564. See in this regard also the recommendation of the AIDP to incorporate international ne bis in idem as a human right into international and regional conventions (for references see de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 710; AIDP (ed.) 75 RIDP 803, II 1.2).

international criminal justice establish ne bis in idem as long as the ius puniendi of the international community is properly administered; national decisions are thereby ultimately under the scrutiny of organs of the international community⁴⁴. A vertical res iudicata effect has been subsequently acknowledged in statutes of international courts and tribunals. The acceptance of a general, transnational, ne bis in idem, however, is still de lege ferenda.

In the early efforts to exercise criminal jurisdiction internationally, not much concern was expressed on possible violations of ne bis in idem. Article 11 of the Nuremberg Charter expressly allowed for retrials and additional punishment of persons convicted by the international military tribunal for membership in a criminal group or organization for any other crime⁴⁵. Article 51, 1951 ILC Draft Statute and article 50, 1953 ILC Draft Statute provided that '[n]o person who has been tried and acquitted or convicted before the Court shall be subsequently tried for the same offence'. But this downward ne bis in idem was limited to courts within the jurisdiction of those States which have conferred jurisdiction upon the Court with respect to the offence in question⁴⁶.

The Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals establish ne bis in idem for a person who 'has been 16 tried' for 'acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law'⁴⁷. These points of reference are identical regarding national judgements and those of the ad hoc Tribunals. Downward ne bis in idem is fully acknowledged by the Statutes⁴⁸. In cases of non-compliance by a national court, rule 13 authorizes a Trial Chamber to 'issue a reasoned order requesting that court permanently to discontinue its proceedings. If that court fails to do so, the President may report the matter to the Security Council'. Regarding upward ne bis in idem, a subsequent trial before an ad hoc tribunal is permissible in two cases. The 'ordinary crime exception' foresees that acquittals or convictions upon the same facts but for different crimes do not bar proceedings before an ad hoc tribunal⁴⁹. The second exception allows a ⁴⁴ Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 39 et seq.; id. (2006), in: Austrian Federal Ministry for Foreign Affairs/Salzburg Law School on International Criminal Law, Humanitarian Law and Human Rights Law (eds), The Future of the International Criminal Court – Salzburg Retreat (2006) 26, 32, For an emerging customary rule on transnational ne bis in idem regarding international crimes, see Cassese, International Criminal Law (2003) 319-20.

⁴⁵ Argumentum a contrario it was argued that a conviction would have barred a retrial for the same crime before another court, see van den Wyngaert and Ongena, (1999) 48 ICLQ 718. The risk of multiple trials was not regarded as a problem to be focused on in the context of the earlier international prosecutions, see Lombois, Droit Pénal Internationale (1979) No. 41. Occasional references to the principle were made in the Nuremberg trials, see, e.g., Der Prozess gegen die Hauptkriegsverbrecher vor dem Internationalen Militärgerichtshof, Vol. XXII, 569 (1948). In the trial against the industrial leaders of Germany, the Tribunal stated: 'We conceive the only purpose of this Tribunal is to bring to trial war criminals that have not already been tried'. TWC before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Vol. VI, 1213 (1952). In the trial against German jurists criticism was raised that a case was 'again tried in violation of the fundamental principles of justice that no man should be tried twice for the same offence', ibid., Vol. III, 1147-8 (1951).

⁴⁶ Article 50, 1953 ILC Draft Statute 'Double jeopardy'. The previous text of article 51, 1951 ILC Draft Statute, though then titled 'Subsequent Trial', had not been altered except for minor redactional chances.

⁴⁷ See article 10 ICTY Statute and article 9 ICTR Statute respectively.

⁴⁸ The ad hoc Tribunals have not yet explicitly ruled on the scope of idem, defined as 'acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law'. The Secretary-General understood that '[a]ccording to the principle of non-bis-in-idem, a person shall not be tried twice for the same crime. In the present context, given the primacy of the International Tribunal, the principle of non-bis-in-idem would preclude subsequent trial before a national court'. See Report of the Secretary-General, note 5, para. 66. This guideline seems to support a narrow interpretation of idem relating to the same offence (see e.g. Bassiouni and Manikas (eds), The Law of the Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1996) 319; Spinellis (2002) 73 RIDP 1155-6; see also rule 13 ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence referring explicitly to criminal proceedings 'instituted against a person before a court of any State for a crime for which that person has already been tried by the Tribunal'. However, with a view to the primacy of the ad hoc Tribunals a wide interpretation referring to the underlying conduct has also been advocated (see e.g. Schomburg, in: Arnold et al. (eds), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 839-40; Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das ISIGH-Statut (2004) 224).

⁴⁹ For Court practice see e.g. Prosecutor v. Bagosora, Case-No. ICTR-96-7-D, Decision on the Application by the Prosecutor for a Formal Request for Deferral, Trial Chamber, 17 May 1996; Prosecutor v. Musema, Case-No. ICTR-96-5-D, Decision on the Formal Request for Deferral presented by the Prosecutor, 12 March 1996. See

substantive review of national proceedings and a retrial, if the former were ‘not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility, or the case was not diligently prosecuted’. Upward ne bis in idem obliges the ad hoc tribunals to ‘take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served’.

As for court practice, in the Tadić case before the ICTY the defence tried to establish a bis in idem situation because proceedings had already commenced in Germany. The claim was dismissed by the Trial Chamber, reasoning that ‘the accused has not yet been the subject of a judgement on the merits on any of the charges for which he has been indicted’⁵⁰. Since only a final judgement on the merits of the case establishes res iudicata, decisions not to prosecute, termination of proceedings on procedural or formal grounds or interlocutory decisions do not bar further proceedings⁵¹. In the Ntuyahaga case, the ICTR dismissed the Defence’s request to render an acquittal on formal grounds, arguing that ‘an acquittal can only be considered at the stage where the Prosecutor has presented all her evidence, and the Chamber finds that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction on any one count’. Lacking a judgement of the Tribunal, a subsequent national prosecution would not have been barred⁵².

Ne bis in idem also plays a role with regard to cumulative convictions, when one act of criminal conduct constitutes more than one separate offence (concoirs idéal d’infractions). Earlier decisions of the ad hoc tribunals did not oppose cumulative convictions and dealt with the issue of cumulative penalties at the sentencing stage, although jurisprudence was not fully consistent⁵³. Clarifying the issue, the Appeals Chamber in Delalić concluded ‘that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other’⁵⁴. Where this test is not met, the Chamber will convict under the more specific provision: ‘Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision’⁵⁵.

- 17 The ne bis in idem of the Statutes of the ad hoc tribunals largely correspond to the respective provisions of the 1993 and 1994 ILC Draft Statutes. They were also exemplary for article 9 of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, while section 11 of the Statute of the Special Panels with exclusive jurisdiction over serious criminal offences in East Timor is thereto e.g. van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 719; Vander Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 837.

⁵⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-T, Decision on the Defence Motion on the Principle of Non-Bis-In-Idem, Trial Chamber, 14 November 1995, para. 24.

⁵¹ De la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 729, 730. But see Prosecutor v. Barayagwiza, Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Request for Review or Reconsideration, Appeals Chamber, 31 March 2000, where the Appeals Chambers held that a final judgement in the sense of article 25 ICTR Statute and rule 120 ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence is one which terminates the proceedings, including one dismissing an indictment (ob. cit. para 49); thereto Theofanis (2003) 3 ICLRev 204 et seq.

⁵² Prosecutor v. Ntuyahaga, Case No. ICTR-98-40-T, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Motion to Withdraw the Indictment, Trial Chamber, 18 March 1999. See thereto van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 720; Vander Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 814.

⁵³ For a discussion of the jurisprudence, see Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 395 et seq., 402 et seq. See also Conway (2003) 14 CLF 363, 369 et seq. Walther, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 475; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2005) mn 527 et seq.; Wills (2003) 17 EmoryILRev 341.

⁵⁴ See Delalić et al., above note 53, para. 412, applying the ‘Blockburger-test’ (Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932), para. 409). In the same decision, the Appeals Chamber confirmed the validity of the practice of cumulative charges (ibid., para. 400).

⁵⁵ Delalić et al., above note 53, para. 413. For a detailed analysis of the speciality test see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, ii (2014) 254 et seq.

based on article 20 Rome Statute⁵⁶. The 1996 ILC Draft Code contains an interesting article 12 on *ne bis in idem*⁵⁷. Its paragraph 1 contains an absolute ne bis in idem provision with regard to final acquittals and convictions of the international criminal court ‘for a crime against the peace and security of mankind’. Paragraph 2 provides that ‘[a]n individual may not be tried again for a crime of which he has been finally convicted or acquitted by a national court’. This regulation does not only concern upward ne bis in idem, but also constitutes a codification of transnational *ne bis in idem*⁵⁸. It contains exceptions similar to the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, allowing a retrial before an international criminal court. In addition, with regard to national courts, an individual tried by a State could be retried for a crime under the Draft Code by the territorial State or by a State that had been the main victim of the crime. The commentary envisages even the right of both of them to institute subsequent proceedings⁵⁹. Since such retrials are not restricted to exceptional cases of miscarriage of justice (as with regard to the ICC), ne bis in idem is nullified to a large extent. However, the ILC Draft Code is the first international document that tackles the problem of multiple trials for crimes under international law on the national level and enshrines a provision respecting transnational ne bis in idem.

4. The development up to the Rome conference

Four aspects of article 20 attracted major interest during the preparation work. The first 18 concerns the article’s relationship with the notion of complementarity. Starting with the report of the Ad Hoc Committee in 1995, a frequent concern was that the article ‘conferred upon the ICC a kind of supervisory role vis-à-vis national courts’⁶⁰. The second aspect of great interest had to do with the drafting of the exceptions to the principle, which raised the issue of subjectivity versus objectivity of language. The distinction between ordinary crimes and crimes of international concern, used in article 42 para. 2 (a) ILC Draft Statute, proved particularly problematic, since such a distinction ‘was not common to all legal systems and could cause substantial legal problems’⁶¹. As for the third, the scope of the principle was controversial. The commentary of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute states that the first condition for the application of the principle would be that ‘the first court actually exercised jurisdiction and made a determination on the merits with respect to the particular acts constituting the crime’; and the second condition would require there to be ‘a sufficient measure of identity between the crimes which were the subject of the successive trials’⁶². Discussion was devoted to the question of what, exactly, should be seen as the same act, conduct, offence or crime⁶³. A further problem

⁵⁶ It should be noted that article 9 para. 1 Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone as well as section 11 para 2 of the Statute of the Special Panels limit downward ne bis in idem protection to retrials before a national court of Sierra Leone and East Timor, respectively. This is due to the establishment of these adjudicating bodies by a treaty between the United Nations and the government of Sierra Leone, which cannot impose obligations on third parties, and, respectively, by a regulation of the United Nations transitional administration in East Timor; nonetheless, the Statutes’ protection of the individual is significantly reduced. For case law see e.g. The Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes v. Wiranto et al., Case No. 05/2003, Legal Ruling Concerning the Applicability of Ne bis in Idem at the Arrest Stage of the proceedings. See also Kleffner and Nollkaemperin, in: Romano et al. (eds), Internationalized Criminal Courts (2004) 359, 373 et seq.

⁵⁷ 1996 ILC Draft Code. For the discussion on the 1991 version, see 1991 ILC Draft Code. For the changes in the Report of the Special Rapporteur, see Thirteenth Report on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, by Mr. Doudou Thiam, 24 Mar. 1995, UN Doc. A/CN.4/466.

⁵⁸ For a further analysis see Swart (1993) 11 NEP 173 et seq.; Specht, Die zwischenstaatliche Geltung des Grundsatzes ne bis in idem (1999) 66 et seq. 87 et seq.; Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das IStGH-Statut (2004) 54 et seq. See also Morosin (1995) 64 NordJIL 266.

⁵⁹ 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 71. Article 55 of the Schengen Convention contains comparable exceptions to the general ne bis in idem expressed in article 54, see mn 11.

⁶⁰ Ad Hoc Committee Report, p. 9, para. 43.

⁶¹ Ibid., see also para. 179.

⁶² 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 118.

⁶³ For an analysis of the concept of the ‘same act’ in a national context, see Neuhaus, Der strafverfahrensrechtliche Tatbegriff – ‘ne bis in idem’ (1985); Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 89–115.

concerning the scope of ne bis in idem was caused by the differences between legal systems with regard to prosecutorial appeal and revision. Finally, the placement of the principle was debated: was it to be regarded as a general principle of criminal law, part of the procedural rules or part of the jurisdictional mechanism of the ICC⁶⁴.

- 19 As already mentioned above, article 42 'Non bis in idem' 1994 ILC Draft Statute was largely based on the corresponding regulations of the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals. It consisted of three paragraphs dealing with the res iudicata effect of judgements of the ICC with regard to other courts and vice versa (paragraphs 1 and 2). For the latter, it formulated exceptions relating to the legal qualification of a conduct as an 'ordinary crime' as well as with a view to proceedings that were not conducted impartially or independently, or with the purpose of shielding a person from international criminal responsibility (paragraph 2 literae a and b). Paragraph 3 permits the ICC to take into account served sentences when considering the penalty in a retrial. The 1995 ad hoc Committee underlined the paramount importance of the concepts of admissibility and non bis in idem for implementing the principle of complementarity⁶⁵. The most decisive phases of the preparatory work for the formulation of the ne bis in idem principle in the Rome Statute were the sessions of the Preparatory Committee in 1996 and 1998⁶⁶. The 1996 Preparatory Committee I discussed technical aspects of non bis in idem in the context of complementarity⁶⁷. In the compilation of all proposals, Preparatory Committee II 1996 the principle appears firstly as article D under 'General Principles of Criminal Law' and secondly as article 42 under 'The Trial'⁶⁸. Article 13 [42] of the Zutphen Draft, which was the basis for the discussions in the sixth session of the Preparatory Committee in 1998, reproduced article 42 of the ILC Draft Statute and the majority of the proposals contained in the Preparatory Committee II 1996 in the section on jurisdiction⁶⁹. During the final session of the Preparatory Committee in 1998, the article was largely rewritten and consolidated as well as renamed 'ne bis in idem' (article 18)⁷⁰. At the Diplomatic Conference, the compromise of article 18 Preparatory Committee Draft was successfully maintained. No remarkable discussion on the substance of the provision took place. The draft article remained unchanged except for the editorial modifications in the references to crimes; a qualifier was added to paragraph 3 (b), and a minor addition was made to the chapeau of paragraph 3, as will be discussed below. Article 19 Preparatory Committee Draft, allowing for retrials by the ICC in cases where sentences were not properly enforced, was not included in the final package⁷¹.

Before analysing the elements of article 20 in detail, it shall be noted that while departing from a rather uniform language with regard to the constituent elements of ne bis in idem in all cases ('for acts constituting a crime', 'has [already] been tried') in article 42 of the 1994

⁶⁴ The 1994 ILC Draft Statute had placed its article 42 on ne bis in idem in 'Part 5. The Trial'. The 1996 Preparatory Committee II additionally listed the principle as article D under 'Part 3bis General Principles of Criminal Law'. The article was finally moved to 'Part 2. Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law' in the Zutphen Draft. See e.g. Saland, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 213.

⁶⁵ Ad Hoc Committee Report, p. 20, para. 92.

⁶⁶ A French proposal was introduced in August 1996 (Draft Statute of the ICC, UN Doc. A/AC.249/L.3). It dealt with aspects of the jurisdictional model and ne bis in idem in a different setting. France proposed that it should always be possible to indict again based on new evidence. Major parts of the French proposal were endorsed by the various compilation papers prepared by informal groups during the August session that had been collected in the Preparatory Committee II 1996.

⁶⁷ Preparatory Committee I 1996, paras. 170–174.

⁶⁸ Preparatory Committee II 1996, pp. 86 and 202. During the August 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee the principle of ne bis in idem was marginally touched upon informal consultations on issues of admissibility (see Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 10–12, Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 56.

⁶⁹ Zutphen Draft, pp. 46–47.

⁷⁰ See article 18 Preparatory Committee Draft, pp. 45–46.

⁷¹ For details see mn 51 et seq. See also Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 51–56, 59–60.

ILC Draft Statute, the compromise established during the final session of the Preparatory Commission and subsequently adopted by the Rome Conference provides for evident variations in the wording regarding idem ('conduct which formed the basis of crimes', 'crime referred to in article 5', 'conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8') as well as bis ('has [already] been convicted or acquitted', 'has been tried').

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

The 1994 ILC Draft Statute had not foreseen an express regulation prohibiting the Court from trying somebody already convicted or acquitted by the Court itself. In the 1998 Preparatory Committee, some delegations expressed concern about this lack of a general statement according to which the ICC would be bound by the ne bis in idem principle in relation to earlier decisions of its own. Although this was understood as self-evident by other delegations, the general feeling was that it would provide clarification and would do no harm⁷². Drafting was proposed by Portugal: '1. No person shall be tried before the Court without prejudice to article 75 [revision, footnote omitted] or before another court for acts constituting a crime of the kind referred to in article 5 (20) for which that person has already been tried by the Court'⁷³. The U.S. delegation put forward the following proposal: 'Except as provided in this Statute, no person shall be tried before the Court for acts for which he has already been convicted or acquitted by the Court'⁷⁴. Their proposals were deemed useful and a paragraph was added to the draft article.

1. 'Except as provided in this Statute'

This is a catch clause to avoid listing the provisions in the Statute enabling subsequent proceedings in a case, such as appeal and revision (on the reformulation of charges, see mn 24). Some delegations believed that no further drafting would have been needed to state that the means expressly provided for the ICC by the Statute do not contradict ne bis in idem. The substantive discussion on what exactly should be provided was conducted in the negotiations on Part 8 (Appeal and Revision) of the Statute. It reflected the general differences between the continental law and common law views on the acceptability of appeals by the prosecutor and of revision in general. The right of appeal was granted almost identically to the accused and the prosecutor, see article 81. This would not constitute an 'exception' to ne bis in idem for many civil law countries, where appeals are often considered as part of a proceeding and ne bis in idem only applies after all ordinary remedies have been exhausted (see also infra mn 23). However, although the Rome Statute allows for prosecutorial appeal, which is generally prohibited in common law systems, the language of this paragraph labelling it 'exceptional' seems at least to reflect the restraint of common law⁷⁵. It should be noted in this context that the Appeals Chamber may either reverse or amend a judgement itself, thereby enjoying all

⁷² Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 58.

⁷³ Portugal also argued that the title of the article should be changed from 'non bis' to 'ne bis' in idem, and that it should be in the part on 'the General Principles of Law', see UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.2/DP.6 (25 Mar. 1998), notes 1 and 2. This follows the commentary of Wise (1998) 13*bis* NEP 43 as well as the systematic of the 1996 ILC Draft Code. See also Eser (1993) 11 NEP 48, note 16.

⁷⁴ U.S. Delegation, 3/8/981.

⁷⁵ van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 722. See also e.g. Costa (1998) 4 University of California Davis JIL&Policy 198 et seq.; Baum (2001) 19 WisconsinILJ 222 argues that the absence of jury trials before the ICC may justify the ICC Prosecutor's right to appeal acquittals even from a double jeopardy perspective. For an analysis of relevant international provisions see e.g. Brady and Jennings, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 294.

powers of the Trial Chamber, or order a new trial before a different Trial Chamber, see article 83 para. 1 and 2 lit. a and b. Revision of a conviction or sentence may be claimed by or on behalf of a convicted person, if new evidence has been discovered, decisive evidence was false, forged or falsified, or in case of a serious misconduct of serious breach of duty by a judge, article 84, lit. a–c. A proposal to permit the prosecutor to seek revision on the basis of newly discovered evidence also to the detriment of the accused was met with strong criticism for being contrary to ne bis in idem and was omitted.

2. ‘conduct which formed the basis of crimes’

- 22 When should a second prosecution for a different offence be barred? It became evident in the negotiations that no single, mechanical test could cope with the variety of situations that might arise. Each of the paragraphs of article 20 contains a different formulation to describe the scope of *ne bis in idem*⁷⁶. The wording of paragraph 1, defining idem by the same historical facts, leaves room for a broad interpretation of the protection. Accordingly, a subsequent trial for a different qualification based on the same historical facts would be prohibited. If a person was acquitted for genocide, a new trial for crimes against humanity with respect to the same conduct would constitute an idem. Certainly, this broad protection is inherently confined to the subject matter jurisdiction of the ICC⁷⁷. The Court has no competence to try crimes other than those listed in article 5 and defined in its Statute. In order to avoid acquittals on the ground of wrong legal qualification of the facts, the Prosecutor benefits from the fact that the categories of crimes under the jurisdiction are partly overlapping. It was standard practice of the prosecutor of the ad hoc Tribunals to include several types of charges for each alleged incident and leave the classification to the judges. One might wonder whether this policy does not complicate the work of the defence and prolong the trials considerably. Forthcoming case law might slowly ease the problem as the definitions of the crimes become more concrete and the borders between the categories become more established⁷⁸

3. ‘convicted or acquitted by the Court’

- 23 The application of ne bis in idem involves determining the point in time and the circumstances in which it can be said that the first ‘jeopardy’ has been attached. Even proceedings terminated before judgement might raise the question of a bis in idem in the same court. The drafters of the ICC Statute, however, did not think that the protection should cover such cases⁷⁹. Paragraph 1 restricts the scope of the protection to a person ‘convicted or acquitted by the Court’. It targets the final decision of the ICC⁸⁰. However, the Rome Statute gives no clear indication of whether a conviction or acquittal rendered by the first instance is regarded as such a final decision or whether only a non-appealable judgment can establish res iudicata. The latter would be in conformity with the application of ne bis in idem by regional human rights organs, as well as the civil law tradition who consider a judgment as final only

⁷⁶ Critical Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 58 who comments that ‘[t]he rationale of this difference was never fully explained’.

⁷⁷ ‘The broad and the narrow interpretation coincide’, Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 722.

⁷⁸ The judges of the ICC expressed the view that they are bound by the facts underlying the charges against an accused but not by their legal qualification (iura novit curia): ‘In its decision under article 74, the Chamber may change the legal characterisation of facts to accord with the crimes under articles 6, 7 or 8, or to accord with the form of participation of the accused under articles 25 and 28, without exceeding the facts and circumstances described in the charges and any amendments to the charges’. (Regulation 55 para. 1). For the practice of the ICTY see above note 53.

⁷⁹ Similarly also the Trial Chamber of the ICTY: ‘there can be no violation of non-bis-in-idem, under any known formulation of that principle, unless the accused has already been tried’, Tadić, above note 50.

⁸⁰ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, para. 170.

after all ‘ordinary remedies’ have been exhausted⁸¹. According to this view, only decisions of the Appeals Chamber and those of a Trial Chamber against which no appeal has been filed within a period of 30 days (extendable) after notification of the appealing party could be considered as final (see rule 150). But relying on the wording and the discussion during the drafting process, it seems arguable that not only revision but also appeal is an exceptional measure with regard to the prohibition of a retrial after conviction or acquittal by the Court⁸². Hence, a Trial Chamber’s judgement on the merits of the case may suffice to trigger ne bis in idem. Appeal and revision before the ICC would still be in conformity with article 20 due to their exceptional character, but any other proceedings would be already barred through the Trial Chamber’s judgement. The latter interpretation is more favourable to the individual, in particular regarding its application under para. 2 (infra mn 29).

Before the final decision is taken, however, paragraph 1 is not applicable. It covers neither a ruling on inadmissibility nor decisions on amendment, withdrawal, reclassification⁸³ or non-confirmation of charges, see, e.g., article 61 para. 7 (c) (ii) and article 53 para. 4. Furthermore, it was made clear during the negotiations that res iudicata should not apply for proceedings discontinued for technical reasons⁸⁴. As there are no provisions on statutory limitations, it seems that new evidence found any time after such proceedings may reactivate investigation and lead to a new surrender and procedure on the confirmation of the charges⁸⁵.

II. Paragraph 2

1. ‘by another court’

Paragraph 2 establishes that a decision by the ICC is final with regard to any other proceeding before any other national or international court. This protection is absolute in terms of opening no exceptions⁸⁶. The focus during the negotiations was exclusively on national courts. The wording encompasses all civilian and military courts, be they permanent or ad hoc. At the Preparatory Committee 1998, attention was drawn to the fact that ‘by another court’ could mean courts of States parties only, as the Statute as a whole can in any case address parties only⁸⁷. This can, understandably, lead to unsatisfactory results from the point of view of the individual. There is, however, hardly anything the Statute could have done about it. It depends on the general respect for the ICC judgements whether an individual is – after conviction or acquittal by the ICC – to face secondary proceedings in a non-State party⁸⁸. It should be kept in mind that the notion ‘any other court’ is in not limited ⁸¹ See above notes 25 and 26. This was also the approach adopted by the 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 68–9 ‘finally convicted or acquitted’ applies ‘only to a final decision on the merits of the charges against the accused which was not subject to further appeal or review’. See also AIDP (ed) (2004) 75 RIDP 802, I 5.2.

⁸² See mn 21; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 722; Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1121; Staker, article 81, mn 7. See also e.g. travaux préparatoires, above note 36, the CCPR and Prosecutor v. Barayagwiza, Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Request for Review or Reconsideration, Appeals Chamber, 31 March 2000, para. 49.

⁸³ A reclassification may even occur at the latest possible time of the proceedings, Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, Decision on the implementation of regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and severing the charges against the accused persons, Trial Chamber II (21 November 2012).

⁸⁴ See e.g. 1996 Preparatory Committee I, article 42, para 170, p. 39; 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 69.

⁸⁵ Critical e.g. Costa (1998) 4 University of California Davis JIL&Policy 199; Conway (2003) 3 ICLRev 382 arguing for a strict construction of the provisions on prosecutorial appeal and revision.

⁸⁶ De la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 732, van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 723.

⁸⁷ The same is true with regard to States that have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to a situation by declaration (article 12 para. 3, rule 44, see thereto e.g. Bassiouni (1999) 32 CornellILJ 443, 453–4 and States involved in a situation, which is referred to the ICC by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations (article 13 lit. b).

⁸⁸ See also e.g. Palmisano, in: Lattanzi and Schabas, Essays on the International Criminal Court (1999) 391, 415. On the evolution of a customary ne bis in idem rule with regard to international crimes see Cassese, per se. Its restrictive application only to States parties derives from the international law maxim pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt, also enshrined in article 34 VCLT. Therefore, in a reversed situation, namely a first trial in a non-State party, the ICC will have to conform to paragraph 3 and exercise jurisdiction only if the criteria for exceptions of that paragraph are fulfilled⁸⁹. Truth and reconciliation commissions, even if organised as quasi-judicial bodies, do not qualify as courts in the sense of article 20⁹⁰.

- 26 As already mentioned, ‘by another court’ also encompasses international or internationalized courts. Courts in this context are to be understood as international adjudicating bodies, including, e.g., the ad hoc international criminal tribunals, other mixed or hybrid courts and tribunals⁹¹ and potential regional criminal courts⁹². As a result of their distinctly temporary jurisdiction, jurisdictional conflicts between the ICC and the ICTR are categorically excluded, but with regard to the ICTY, at least theoretically possible⁹³. Due to the particular nature of the ICTY, established by Security Council Resolution under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as its speciality, the ICTY would prevail already at the stage of establishing jurisdiction⁹⁴. Therefore, it is most unlikely that the question of the res iudicata effect of an ICC decision towards the ICTY would come up in practice. If such a case occurred, the ICTY Statute, since it was drafted before the establishment of an international criminal court, does not acknowledge any ne bis in idem protection from ICC judgements. The same is true e.g. with regard to the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. It has been suggested in this regard that the ICC, based on the interpretation of its complementary jurisdiction as an extended national jurisdiction, should be treated the same way as a national court⁹⁵. However, this practical solution may not completely capture the particular nature of the ICC jurisdiction. To avoid loopholes, it would be advisable to include reference to the res iudicata effect of ICC judgements in Statutes of international, regional, mixed or hybrid courts and tribunals, should they be established

2. ‘for a crime referred to in article 5’

- 27 Until the last session of the Preparatory Committee in 1998, the draft on this part read as follows: ‘for conduct constituting a crime referred to in article 5’⁹⁶. During the discussions, International Criminal Law (2003) 320. A related problem on whether a conviction or acquittal on the merits by a court without jurisdiction bars subsequent proceedings, is recognized in and between States, see Friedland, Double Jeopardy (1969) 77–86.

⁸⁹ See e.g. Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1123, referring to Lattanzi, in: Politi and Nesi (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. A Challenge to Impunity (2002) 181; Meißner, Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof nach dem Römischen Statut (2003) 70; Palmisano, in: Lattanzi and Schabas, Essays on the International Criminal Court (1999) 39, 395 et seq. See also articles 18 and 19 Rome Statute providing a possibility for non States-parties to challenge the admissibility of a case before the ICC. For details see e.g. Broomhall, International Justice and the International Criminal Court (2003) 88; El Zeidy (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 741; Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 77.

⁹⁰ Scharf (1999) 32 CornellILLJ 507, 525; see also Dugard, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 702.

⁹¹ A classification of mixed or hybrid courts and tribunals as rather international or national is not necessary with regard to article 20, but may be relevant in the context of article 17. See thereto e.g. Benzing and Bergsmo, in: Romano et al. (eds), Internationalized Criminal Courts (2004) 407, 411 et seq.

⁹² See e.g. efforts of the African Union to establish a criminal chamber at the (proposed) African Court of Justice and Human Rights, Draft Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights as adopted by the African Union: Summit 2014, Doc. No. Ex.CL/846 (xxv) Annex 5.

⁹³ The temporal jurisdiction of the ICTR is limited to violations committed between 1 Jan. 1994 and 31 Dec. 1994 while the ICC’s jurisdiction ratione temporae concerns crimes committed after the entry into force of the Rome Statute on 1 July 2002. The ICTY’s jurisdiction for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991, on the other hand, is open-ended.

⁹⁴ See Bohlander, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 688 et seq. Given the absence of a respective provision in the Rome Statute as well as in the ICC Rules Bohlander op. cit. 690 suggested an amendment to the Rules to this effect.

⁹⁵ De la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 735.

⁹⁶ This formulation was introduced by a Chairman’s working paper. Article 12[42] Zutphen Draft, p. 46 had used the formulation ‘acts’ instead of ‘conduct’, see also mn 39.

the question arose of whether this paragraph prohibited a national court from prosecuting somebody for murder or injury if the ICC had previously acquitted the same person for genocide, e.g. because of insufficient proof of his or her genocidal intent. If that was the proper interpretation, the reduction of wording was necessary. According to this view, a State should always have the right to charge for, e.g., murder or injury afterwards. References to various national legislations were made, emphasizing that they widely recognize the right to prosecute a person tried abroad. As a further justification it was supposed that the sentence imposed in the earlier trial is usually taken into account. In addition, it was suggested that the wording 'conduct constituting a crime' would restrict the right of interpretation by national courts, in a manner that contradicts the notion of complementarity. The fear was expressed that loopholes were inserted in the system of criminal repression because a national court could not try anew even if new evidence were found. This logic is, of course, somewhat in contradiction with the consequence of complementarity, according to which the ICC will only have jurisdiction if the national courts are unwilling or unable to prosecute. If the State obtains evidence and conducts a trial, the ICC has no jurisdiction to start with. The proposed scenario might become plausible only in cases where the domestic attitude or capability towards prosecution changes, after the ICC has already tried the case.

A proposal was made to improve the draft, but several delegations were of the view that additional drafting would just complicate matters. The result was to be achieved by merely interpreting the paragraph as it was: national courts can try crimes outside the jurisdiction of the ICC. Some delegations suggested that the proposed additions would undermine the protection of ne bis in idem completely. It was also pointed out that the accused should not be forced to bear the consequences of the fact that evidence was not found early enough. After elaborate discussions, the compromise 'for a crime referred to in article 5' was accepted. The idea is that since the ICC does not have jurisdiction over crimes under national law, there is a need to ensure that a person who commits such a crime does not escape responsibility simply because in the ICC trial it is not proven beyond reasonable doubt that the acts amounted to a crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC⁹⁷. As a result of this change, however, a person convicted by the ICC may consequently also be tried for crimes under national law for the same conduct⁹⁸. The wording even allows retrials for 'a crime referred to in article 5' that was not subject to the final judgement of the ICC. Furthermore, the Rome Statute is silent with regard to multiple subsequent procedures in different national systems. Considering the international character of the crimes in question, different States may be able to establish jurisdiction. The protection of the individual in these cases solely lies on the domestic acceptance of transnational ne bis in idem, which is limited⁹⁹.

⁹⁷ Amnesty International, above note 17, 39, supporting the drafting.

⁹⁸ Critical thereto, demanding that downward 'idem' also has to be determined by the same facts, barring a national court to retry the accused on the basis of the same conduct which constituted the basis of the trial before the ICC, AIDP (ed) (2004) 75 RIDP 806 at III 2.1.; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 724 also referring to the missing obligation to deduct the sentence imposed by the ICC; de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 732. In this line also Baum (2001) 19 WisconsinILJ 197, 223–4 claiming that the ICC downward ne bis in idem opens a loophole, although it is to be seen in conformity with the US Double Jeopardy Clause's dual sovereignty exception. Relying on a teleological interpretation Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das ISiGH-Statut (2004) 270 argues against the possibility of a national retrial after conviction by the ICC: the purpose of the provision was only to avoid impunity of a perpetrator acquitted by the ICC e.g. for lack of genocidal intent although the actus reus was beyond reasonable doubt.

⁹⁹ Although the Rome Statute is arguably not the proper instrument to encounter shortcomings in the general acceptance of transnational ne bis in idem, it is unfortunate that the chance to regulate at least issues directly linked to the prosecution of core crimes has not been taken up. It has been suggested that national implementation acts comprise a detailed regulation regarding ne bis in idem to counter such shortcomings and provide for a complete protection of the individual. See e.g. de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 733; AIDP (ed) 75 RIDP 804 et seq., I 1, III 4 and 806, III 2.1.

3. ‘convicted or acquitted by the Court’

- 29 The term ‘convicted or acquitted by a final judgement of the Court’ was introduced by a proposal in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II¹⁰⁰ with regard to paragraph 2 as an alternative to the wording ‘has already been tried’ originally foreseen in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute. The implications of this change in language will be discussed in the context of paragraph 3 (infra mn 34). The term is to be understood identically as in paragraph 1, referring to a final decision on the merits of the case¹⁰¹. Before this decision has been rendered, ne bis in idem does not apply. An interpretation proposed by the U.S. Delegation suggested that ‘convicted or acquitted’ in the context of paragraph 2 means that national criminal systems can act also when the case has been withdrawn or stayed in the ICC. This would mean that in addition to the general right of States to always try the same conduct as crimes not falling under the jurisdiction of the ICC, they could also try a crime referred to in article 5, unless a conviction or acquittal was issued by the Court. This reveals a major imbalance with regard to article 17. A case will be inadmissible before the ICC as long as it is being investigated or prosecuted by a State (para. 1) or if a State has conducted an investigation and decided not to prosecute the person in question (para. 2). Besides, neither proceedings before the ICC, nor the ICC Prosecutor’s decision not to proceed bar the opening of national investigations and prosecution¹⁰².

III. Paragraph 3

- 30 Paragraph 3 contains the most complicated and controversial part of article 20. Providing the possibility of exceptions to ne bis in idem, it confirms that the protection does not cover national and international decisions equally. In the case of national decisions, the presumption of the application of ne bis in idem can be overruled by the ICC. The core idea is that certain criteria concerning the quality of criminal justice need to be fulfilled by national proceedings. This thesis contains an implication of the primacy of the ICC and was vehemently contested by some delegations. Others held it as an indispensable element if the system of international repression is to gain any credibility. The credo was: If criminal justice is said to be done, it is to be done properly.
- 31 The exceptions to ne bis in idem were difficult to define. It has been suggested that they will also be burdensome to prove. The most frequent question during the negotiations was: who has the competence to decide on the exceptions? Who has the burden of proof on whether the national decision is flawed in the way described? How to overcome the fears that exceptions expose national jurisdictions to unauthorized and summary evaluation by an international organ? How to define the exceptions in a way that is not ‘subjective’ but ‘objective’¹⁰³?
- 32 As noted earlier, article 42 of the ILC Draft Statute was built on the model of the ad hoc tribunals. Its paragraph 2 contained the exceptions: ‘(a) the acts in question were characterized by that court as an ordinary crime and not as a crime which is within the jurisdiction of ¹⁰⁰ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, article D, p. 86; article 42, p. 202. It may be noteworthy that at the same time the 1996 ILC Draft Code, referring in its non bis in idem provision uniformly to ‘convicted or acquitted’, was released and might have been a source of new language, see above mn 17.

¹⁰¹ For further consideration with regard to the finality of a judgment by the Court see above mn 23.

¹⁰² Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1121. See under this aspect also the possibilities of States to retry a person after ICC proceedings, whereas the ordinary crime exception was deleted also because of ne bis in idem arguments (see mn 33); Conway (2003) 14 CLF 358.

¹⁰³ The discussion seemed to take it for granted that objectivity of language as such could be achieved, if only the correct wording were found. See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, paras. 172 and 174; ‘article 42 (b) should not include any wording which could be conducive to subjective interpretation’. See also Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 50; Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 673 et seq.

the Court; or (b) the proceedings in the other court were not impartial or independent or were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted'. These grounds resemble to a great extent the grounds of deferral of a case in the Statutes of the ad hoc tribunals¹⁰⁴. Both the deferrals and the exceptions to ne bis in idem seem to stem from the basic raison d'être of international jurisdiction: it is to step in when national justice fails.

Subparagraph (a) was contested throughout the preparatory work¹⁰⁵. As pointed out in the ILC report, many legal systems do not recognize the distinction between 'ordinary' and other crimes. In many cases 'ordinary' crimes include very serious crimes subject to the most serious penalties¹⁰⁶. The exception boldly seemed to obligate a State to qualify these acts as 'international crimes'. It was held by some delegations that, according to the notion of complementarity, national and international courts must have the right to evaluate the facts differently without ICC interference. It was also not accepted that the person concerned should bear the risk of being tried twice because of the categorization of the crime in his or her trial¹⁰⁷. In the Preparatory Committee 1998, a deletion or modification of the wording of the exception was generally requested¹⁰⁸. A redrafting of litera a was proposed, based on the Commentary of the ILC Draft¹⁰⁹. Another proposal made the severity of the sentence imposed in the first trial an indicator of its appropriateness. As the only plausible compromise, the exception was deleted completely. Nevertheless, significant undercharging of conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 and 8 as well as inadequacy of the sentence may be regarded as falling under one of the exceptions of paragraph 3¹¹⁰.

As for the remaining two exceptions, both previously contained in litera b, it was deemed that the least controversial way to define them was to adopt the language of complementarity in article 17, already agreed upon¹¹¹. The emphasis of the paragraph was reversed so as to underline the generality of the ne bis in idem principle and the marginality of the exceptions. A simple reference to article 17 was also proposed but rejected as it would have meant also ¹⁰⁴ According to article 9 of the ICTY Statute, its Prosecutor may formally request that the national courts defer where it appears to him (rule 9 ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence) 'that in any such investigations or criminal proceedings instituted in the courts of any state (i) the act being investigated or which is the subject of those proceedings is characterized as an ordinary crime; (ii) there is a lack of impartiality or independence, or the investigations or proceedings are designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility, or the case is not diligently prosecuted; ...'.

¹⁰⁵ Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 43; 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 171, which records some support for the formulation as well. See also Amnesty, inquiring whether 'the ICC should not be able to retry a person who killed 500 people and was convicted in a national court or manslaughter, for which the maximum sentence is much shorter than for genocide?', above note 17 and 42.

¹⁰⁶ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 118.

¹⁰⁷ Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 57 et seq.; Conway, (2003) 14 CLF 358; Morosin, (1995) 64 NordicJIL 264 et seq. See also mn 32.

¹⁰⁸ See Wise (1998) 13*bis* NEP 44, who believes that this exception 'seems to put too much weight on labels. If the first sentence was sufficiently severe, why should it matter, for instance, that a soldier who unlawfully killed civilians was prosecuted for murder rather than a violation of the laws of war?' The problem of this example is that the ICC was denied any explicit competence to determine whether the sentence was 'sufficiently severe'. The proposals to that effect were deleted. The severity of the penalty must be, however, one element in deciding whether the 'proceedings [...] were for the purpose of shielding the person', article 20 para. 3 (a). Critical with regard to the abolition of the ordinary crime exception, see e.g. AIDP (ed) (2004) 75 RIDP 806, III 3.

¹⁰⁹ On the reasons of the ILC to include this exception, see 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 118, para. 6. The redrafting was proposed already in Preparatory Committee in 1996, see 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, para. 171. See also the Updated Siracusa Draft, pp. 87–88. See in this regard still Preparatory Committee Draft, p. 45, fn. 59.

¹¹⁰ Mn 46; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 725 et seq.; Vander Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 842–3. The ILC, using a comparable formulation in its 1996 Draft Code saw the possibility of fraudulent administration of justice as falling under the exception: 'The failure to impose a punishment that is proportional to the crime or to take steps to enforce a punishment may indicate an element of fraud in the administration of justice', see 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 69.

¹¹¹ On the discussion on article 42 para. 2 (b) of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, see 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, paras. 172–174; Ad Hoc Committee Report, p. 35, paras. 177–8 and 180.

including the additional complementarity criteria, such as delay and inability. Several delegations supported the idea that the compromise of August 1997 on complementarity should be introduced for article 20 as well, so as to avoid the reopening of endless debates. The interpretation of the exceptions under article 20 para. 3 was consequently meant to be in accordance with article 17 para. 2 lit. a and c. Point of reference with regard to establishing the threshold for exceptions will be the usual national practice in comparable cases¹¹². The exceptions are discussed below.

1. 'has been tried'

35 In contrast to paragraphs 1 and 2, both referring to 'convicted or acquitted by the Court', paragraph 3 provides ne bis in idem for a person who 'has been tried by another court'. The different wording suggests a different meaning, taking into account not only another court's final decision on the merits of the case, an acquittal or a conviction, but also other decisions terminating criminal proceedings¹¹³. With reference to interpreting the clause in conformity with the notion of complementarity, it was proposed that a bona fide effort by national authorities to prosecute would suffice in order to bar the ICC from exercising jurisdiction. A national decision not to proceed because of insufficient evidence or because prosecution would not serve the interest of justice would suffice¹¹⁴. But would this satisfy the requirement that a trial in fact has been conducted and a final decision has been reached?

To clarify which court decisions, other than acquittals or convictions, may fall under the notion 'has been tried', a closer look at article 17 where the same notion is used in litera c could be helpful. It is assumed that the three situations described in article 17 literae a to c cover a State's complete range of activities with regard to criminal procedure from the opening of an investigation until the final judgement, leaving no loopholes¹¹⁵. Ongoing criminal procedures at whatever stage fall under litera a ('is being investigated or prosecuted')¹¹⁶. Litera b covers situations where a procedure has come to an end ('has been investigated ... and ... decided not to prosecute'). The wording suggests that e.g. a decision not to proceed to trial falls under *litera b*¹¹⁷. Litera c therefore deals with procedures that have been terminated after reaching the trial stage. In this regard, the transfer of the decision-making competence from the prosecuting authority to the judicial organ has been identified as the decisive element¹¹⁸. Following this approach, any Court decision terminating proceedings according to the respective domestic criminal procedural law would fall under the notion 'has been tried'. This suggestion seems plausible under article 20 as well as under article 17¹¹⁹. It has further been suggested that a national decision is to be regarded as final even before all possible remedies are exhausted¹²⁰.

¹¹² In this regard also e.g. Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 679.

¹¹³ In this regard see e.g. de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 732, Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1121; Meißner, Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof nach dem Römischen Statut (2003) 78.

¹¹⁴ See I. Tallgren, Article 20, First Edition of this Commentary, mn 26.

¹¹⁵ Meißner, Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof nach dem Römischen Statut (2003) 77.

¹¹⁶ For the requirement of criminal proceedings see e.g. Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 77; Meißner, Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof nach dem Römischen Statut (2003) 76; Scharf (1999) 32 CornellILJ 507.

¹¹⁷ In this regard e.g. Broomhall (1999) 13 quarter NEP 146.

¹¹⁸ Meißner, Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof nach dem Römischen Statut (2003) 77. The author further argues that there are no reasons why any decision by a prosecuting authority not to proceed should suffice under article 17 lit. b but not a Court's decision terminating proceedings under litera c (id., 78).

¹¹⁹ The issue is not yet finally solved See e.g. de la Cuesta (2002) 73 RIDP 732 referring i.a. to plea-bargains, diversion and out-of-court settlements.

¹²⁰ Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1121; El Zeidy (2002) 23 MichJIL 869, 939. For a comparable proposal regarding the reverse situation see above mn 23.

However, the view that ‘convicted or acquitted’ and ‘has been tried’ differ in substance, is not uncontested¹²¹. This alternative interpretation has also been voiced and is supported by the drafting process, which seems to have used the two notions interchangeably. The 1994 ILC Draft Statute had originally foreseen similar wording ‘has [already] been tried’ defining the ‘bis’ with regard to national decisions as well as those of the ICC. In its Commentary the ILC expressly refers to situations ‘where the first court actually exercised jurisdiction and made a determination on the merits’. With regard to the Court it further explained that either acquittal or conviction should be regarded a final decision barring any subsequent prosecution¹²². The ICTY jurisprudence backs this approach. In the Tadić case, expressly referring to article 42 para. 2 1994 ILC Draft Statute, the ICTY held that ‘there can be no violation of non-bis-in-idem, ... unless the accused has already been tried. Since the accused has not yet been the subject of a judgement on the merits on any of the charges for which he has been indicted, he has not yet been tried for those charges’¹²³. The ILC used the same line of argument with regard to article 12, 1996 Draft Code when determining the scope of ‘convicted or acquitted’¹²⁴. On this basis, the 1996 Preparatory Committee I emphasized that the protection ‘should apply only to res iudicata and not to proceedings discontinued for technical reasons’¹²⁵. The notion ‘convicted or acquitted’ with regard to paragraph 2 was introduced by an alternative proposal and made its way into the Zutphen Draft, finally being decided upon in the concluding session of the Preparatory Committee¹²⁶. Paragraph 3 on the other hand remained with the originally proposed language. This may also be due to the delegations’ desire not to reopen the compromise reached for article 17 para. 1 (c) which confirms that ‘a trial by the Court is not permitted under article 20, paragraph 3’ when ‘the person concerned has already been tried for conduct which is the subject of the complaint’¹²⁷.

Whatever approach the Court will follow, it is clear that the ICC will be barred from exercising jurisdiction as soon as national authorities will undertake a bona fide effort to prosecute. This follows from the rules of admissibility implementing the principle of complementarity in article 17. Whether the Court’s jurisdiction will be precluded on grounds of ne bis in idem will depend on its interpretation of the notion ‘has been tried’. The ICC will need to carefully scrutinize the national decision in question, also taking due account of domestic provisions regarding the finality of decisions and judgements (article 21 para. 1 lit.

¹²¹ For Broomhall ‘previous trial’ means ‘a previous investigation and prosecution has taken place and led either to conviction or acquittal’, Broomhall (1999) 13*quarter* NEP 146; see also Bassiouni (2000) 71 RIDP 1, 21; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2005), mn 546. Further in this line above note 18, AIDP (ed.) (2004) 75 RIDP 806, III 2 (referring to article 20 para. 2); Spinellis, (2002) 73 RIDP 1155 (interpreting the notion ‘has been tried’ in the context of the Statutes of the ad hoc tribunals); Bernard (2011) 9 JICJ 863, 877.

¹²² 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 118.

¹²³ Tadić, above note 50, para. 24.

¹²⁴ ‘The phrase ‘finally convicted or acquitted’ is used in paragraphs 1 and 2 to indicate that the non bis in idem principle would apply only to a final decision on the merits of the charges against an accused which was not subject to further appeal or review. In particular, the word ‘acquitted’ is used to refer to an acquittal as a result of a judgement on the merits, not as a result of a discharge of proceedings’, 1996 ILC Draft Code, pp. 68-9.

¹²⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, para. 170. This view on the other hand contradicts note 21, introduced in the Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, article 35 (results of informal consultations on article 35), p. 11, identically still to be found in the Preparatory Commission Draft, article 15 (Issues of Admissibility), p. 41, note 42. This note relating to the article on issues of admissibility stated that it ‘should also address, directly or indirectly, cases in which there was a prosecution resulting in conviction or acquittal, as well as discontinuance of prosecutions and possibly also pardons and amnesties. A number of delegations expressed the view that article 42 [ne bis in idem], as currently worded, did not adequately address these situations for [purpose] of complementarity. It was agreed that these questions should be revisited in light of further revisions to article 42 to determine whether the reference to article 42 was sufficient or whether additional language was needed in article 35 to address these situations’.

¹²⁶ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, Article D, p. 86 et seq.; see also Zutphen Draft, article 13 [42], p. 46.

¹²⁷ See above note 111. Backing the view that the two notions are being used interchangeably, see article 42, paragraph 2 bis lit. c., 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 203, where a proposal relating to what is now article 17 uses the notion ‘acquitted or convicted’ where today we read ‘tried’. See also article 13 [42] Zutphen Draft, p. 47.

c). The distinction of the different notions used in articles 17 and 20 will be of relevance, e.g. with regard to article 19 para. 4 limiting '[c]hallenges to the admissibility of a case, at the commencement of a trial, or subsequently with the leave of the Court' to article 17 para. 1 lit. c.¹²⁸ ICC jurisprudence has so far concentrated on distinguishing ne bis in idem from other complementarity scenarios under article 17. Occasional references to the substance of the principle's elements emphasized 'decision on the merits' and 'final decision or acquittal' aspects of the notion 'has been tried'¹²⁹. While the exceptional relevance of other decisions was not categorically excluded, the ICC underlined that a trial was intrinsically related to a competent organ and decisions taken during pre-trial proceedings would not trigger article 20¹³⁰.

- 38 As already mentioned above, truth and reconciliation commissions do not qualify as courts in the sense of article 20. Furthermore, procedures before truth and reconciliation commissions, even those designed to be quasi-judicial, independent investigation commissions, fall short of the notion 'has been tried'¹³¹. Blanket amnesties granted without formal investigation or prosecution do in no way bar the ICC from exercising its jurisdiction¹³²; for amnesties at the enforcement level after the conduct of national criminal proceedings, see infra mn 54.

2. 'by another court'

- 39 The term 'by another court' is to be understood as in paragraph 2. With regard to the particularities of upward ne bis in idem, some points should be underlined. As elaborated above, another court refers to national courts of States parties, as well as those of non-States parties¹³³. The court, however, is assumed to be of a penal nature, conducting procedures with a view to 'bringing the person concerned to justice'¹³⁴. It also comprises international, internationalized and regional courts and tribunals. Due to the primacy of ad hoc tribunals

¹²⁸ See e.g. Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the oral decision on the Motion challenging the admissibility of the Case, Trial Chamber II (16 June 2009) paras. 49–50. Broomhall (1999) 13 quarter NEP 147; mn 48.

¹²⁹ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, No. ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the admissibility and abuse of process challenges, Bemba Gombo, Trial Chamber III (24 June 2010) para. 248. Article 20 ICCSt has so far not been at the core of an ICC decision. An initially introduced admissibility challenge on ne bis in idem was eventually not followed up, see Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-T-33, Initial Appearance of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui (11 February 2008) p. 22–3. For a summary account see Carter (2010) 8 Santa Clara Journal of International Law 165, 185–6.

¹³⁰ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, No. ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the admissibility and abuse of process challenges, Bemba Gombo, Trial Chamber III (24 June 2010), para. 248.

¹³¹ See e.g. Dugard, above note 90, 702; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 727; Vander Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 844; Scharf (1999) 32 CornellILJ 525. Even the question of whether the procedure before quasi judicial truth and reconciliation commissions might be considered relevant for the admissibility of a case according to article 17 paras. 1 and 2 is judged rather sceptically. Restorative justice therefore may be best taken into account at an earlier stage, when the Prosecutor decides not to initiate an investigation because it would not serve the interest of justice (article 53 para. 1 lit. c) see e.g. Dugard, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 701–2; Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 77; Scharf (1999) 32 CornellILJ 524; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 726–7. For a wide discretion of national decisions not to prosecute (article 17 para. 1 lit. b) including for reasons of national reconciliation see e.g. Nseroko (1999) 10 CLF 87, 119.

¹³² E.g. Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 77; Nseroko (1999) 10 CLF 119; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 726. With regard to a customary law prohibition of amnesties for certain crimes see in extenso above Dugard, above note 90, 695 et seq. But see on this question also e.g. Schabas (2004) 11 University of California Davis JIL&Policy 145.

¹³³ See above mn 24, text before note 88.

¹³⁴ See in this regard article 17 para. 2 (b) and (c), as well as preambular paragraph 10 and article 1: the ICC 'shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions' (emphasis added); see also Scharf (1999) 32 CornellILJ 525..

established by Security Council Resolution under chapter VII and the speciality of mixed and hybrid courts, it is unlikely that a case falling under the jurisdiction of these adjudicating bodies would be tried before the ICC. If that was the case, article 20 para. 3 would apply.

3. ‘for conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8 [...] with respect to the same conduct’

At the Preparatory Committee 1998 the Chairman’s working paper stated: ‘A person who has been tried by another court for conduct constituting a crime referred to in article 5 [...]’. As in paragraph 2, an issue was raised with regard to ‘conduct constituting a crime’. Some States emphasized that conduct can constitute a crime only if a court has determined that that conduct constitutes a crime. This would not be logical in the case of an acquittal. The chairman proposed reintroducing the language of the ILC Draft Statute ‘acts constituting a crime of the kind referred to in [...]’ (article 42 para. 2). It was also proposed that the word ‘offence’ should be introduced; or that ‘constituting a crime’ should just be deleted. Some delegations preferred the original version, explaining that ‘conduct constituting a crime’ was not problematic as the estimation would be first ‘purely qualification de facto’, and only thereafter qualification de jure in the trial. The compromise proposal, ‘conduct also proscribed’, was a way out of the debate. The term is to be understood broadly¹³⁵. If a national trial has taken place for the conduct – falling under the jurisdiction of the ICC – the person shall not be tried again by the ICC. The categorization used in the national trial, i. e., whether it relied on definitions derived from international law or crimes under national law, e.g. murder or rape, is not relevant. It is accepted that specific elements defining the international character of the crime may not be fully reflected under national law¹³⁶. Another issue is that reducing the national charge to a minimum so that it does not correspond to the conduct in question might fall under the exceptions in lit. a or lit. b.

The proposal submitted by Japan at the Conference¹³⁷, and modified to read: ‘with respect to the same conduct’, was added to the chapeau. This seems to clarify the obvious: a person could be tried before the ICC for conduct other than the one for which the national proceedings had been taken against him or her. Following the same rationale in the context of challenges to the admissibility of a case, ICC jurisprudence relies on a ‘same person, same conduct’ test also when determining ‘a case’ in accordance with Article 17 para. 1 lit. a and *b*¹³⁸.

At the Rome Conference, the originally proposed formulation ‘conduct constituting a crime referred to in article 5’ was changed to ‘conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8’¹³⁹. The ¹³⁵ Spinellis (2002) 73 RIDP 1159. For an approach understanding ‘conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8’ as holding an intermediate position between the notions ‘conduct which formed the basis of crimes’ and ‘crime referred to in article 5’ see Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem im Völkerstrafrecht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Kodifizierung durch das ICTY-Statut und das ISiGH-Statut (2004) 272 et seq.

¹³⁶ For a different approach see e.g. Broomhall, International Justice and the International Criminal Court (2003) 91–2 supporting the admissibility of a case when a State has exercised its jurisdiction on narrower grounds; El Zeidy (2002) 23 MichJIL 933–4. With a view to the jurisprudence of other international courts, e.g. the ECtHR developing an ‘essential element’ test (above note 25), or the ICTY applying the Blockburger-test (above note 54), it will be interesting to observe in what way the ICC will take into account the contextual elements of ‘conduct also proscribed under articles 6, 7 and 8’ when evaluating national prosecutions for ‘ordinary crimes’ under the viewpoint of ne bis in idem.

¹³⁷ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.18 (24 June 1998), proposing ‘for the same conduct’.

¹³⁸ Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-262, Decision on the Evidence and Information Provided by the Prosecution for the Issuance of a Warrant Arrest for Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Pre-Trial Chamber I (6 July 2007), para 21; Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-8-Corr 17-03-2006, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for an Arrest Warrant, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I (10 February 2006) para. 31; most recently Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled ‘Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi’, Appeals Chamber (24 July 2014) paras. 98 et seq.

¹³⁹ The question of this change has never been made clear (Van der Beken et al. (2002) 73 RIDP 842). One explanation could be that since upwards idem is defined by ‘conduct constituting a crime’ meaning the historical latter language evidently differs from paragraph 2 which maintains a reference to article 5. While paragraph 3 refers to genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, it manifestly calls upon its lacuna on the crime of aggression. This silence of the Statute may give the impression that national judgments on charges of aggression would never become res iudicata vis-à-vis the ICC. In other words, the ICC would have a higher power to control and reopen national proceedings regarding charges of aggression, even if none of the exceptions applied. This presumption may support the – rarely expressed – opinion that there should be no national proceedings involving the crime of aggression. Nevertheless, to assume such intent behind the formulation would go too far¹⁴⁰. The lack of reference could simply go back to the fact that the exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression was postponed at the Rome Conference. States parties addressed this imbalance in an amendment adopted at the first Review Conference¹⁴¹. Considering the adoption of the amendments on the crime of aggression in accordance with article 5 para. 2 and their entry into force for ratifying or accepting states as foreseen in article 121 para. 5, this intended unification will only be accomplished when all states parties have ratified the amendments¹⁴². Until that time, the two versions of Article 20 para. 3 will co-exist.

4. ‘the proceedings in the other court’

- 43 This phrase contains the core reference for the ICC to determine whether a State is shielding a person from criminal responsibility or whether norms of due process recognized by international law have been violated. Not only the decision terminating a national proceeding, be it a final judgement on the merits or a decision not amounting to a conviction or acquittal, is under scrutiny. Emphasis is put on the conduct of a procedure in the other court as such¹⁴³. If one of the exceptions applies, the other court’s decision does not trigger ne bis in idem vis-à-vis the ICC and the Court may retry the person concerned

The drafting history of article 20 shows that the origin of this phrase is to be found in article 17 para. 2, where ‘[t]he term ‘proceedings’ covers both investigations and prosecutions’¹⁴⁴. Being specified as ‘court proceedings’, however, the question may arise whether the same broad understanding can be maintained with regard to article 20. On the one hand, a literal reading of the phrase might suggest a narrower view¹⁴⁵. While prosecution is facts relevant for subsumption under the legal qualification, the reference to those articles precisely defining the conduct elements which constitute criminal behaviour might have seemed more appropriate than referring to the article merely listing the groups of crimes. On the different notions see also Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1122 et seq.

¹⁴⁰ See also van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 725. Even more, considering the fact that a number of States have implemented the customary crime of aggression into national criminal law, see Reisinger Coracini, in: Bellelli (ed), International Criminal Justice (2010) 547 et seq.

¹⁴¹ See the amended chapeau of Article 20 para. 3, Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression, Resolution RC/Res.6 adopted by consensus on 11 June 2010, Annex I, para. 7.

¹⁴² The Kampala compromise submits all amendments related to the crime of aggression to a uniform amendment regime. It is based upon the exceptional status of the crime of aggression in the unamended Rome Statute and the wide discretion provided under article 5 para. 2 for adopting a provision on the crime of aggression and defining the conditions for the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction. For details see Zimmermann on Art. 8bis and 15bis, ter. In this context, changes to the reference to articles 6, 7 and 8 in articles 9 and 20 were considered as ‘consequential amendments’ of the introduction of a new article 8bis. See Report of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression, February 2009, Report of the Seventh Resumed Session of the Assembly of States Parties of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/7/20/Add.1, Annex II, heading of para. 26. It remains to be seen whether this approach might have an impact on potential future additions to the list of crimes in article 5. Literally, amendments to article 20 on the basis of article 121 para. 5 seem to transgress the boundaries of the three distinct amendment procedures foreseen in articles 121 paras. 4 and 5 and article 122.

¹⁴³ Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1121.

¹⁴⁴ Preparatory Committee Draft, p. 41, note 45; for the drafting history see above mn 18.

¹⁴⁵ See El Zeidy (2002) 23 MichJIL 935 for such a scenario.

necessarily a procedure before a court¹⁴⁶, only particular types or stages of an investigation – if at all – are governed by a court, depending on domestic criminal procedure. On the other hand, with a view to the structure of article 17, embracing article 20 para. 3, as well as the object and purpose of the rules on admissibility, it seems unjustifiable that the investigation stage should be excluded from the ICC's scrutiny. In particular, since the evidence produced by such an investigation will be used during the court procedure¹⁴⁷.

Court procedures usually end with a judgment and the determination of the sentence in case of conviction. The question whether or not the term proceedings also cover the stage of enforcement of penalties is questionable. The Rome Statute does not give a clear answer. Considering the drafting history, it needs to be recalled that article 19 Preparatory Committee Draft was deliberately not included in the final text¹⁴⁸. However, a broad interpretation is not fully excluded by the wording. National proceedings at the enforcement level therefore might be taken as a reference for determining whether a State is unable or unwilling to bring a person to justice¹⁴⁹. But considering the fact that national proceedings have indeed taken place, it has been underlined that the 'onus will be higher on the Prosecutor' in such cases¹⁵⁰. 44

5. The different subparagraphs

The 'sham proceedings' exception to the application of ne bis in idem with respect to national and international criminal courts had already been envisaged at the XIV International Congress of Criminal Law in Vienna in 1989¹⁵¹. Apart from the 'ordinary crimes' exception, the ILC considered three possibilities for a retrial before an international criminal court, if the national court proceedings were 'not impartial or independent or were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted'¹⁵². In the commentary to its 1994 Draft Statute, the ILC explained how the exception in article 42 para. 2 (b) was designed 'to deal with exceptional cases only'¹⁵³. Furthermore, the words 'the case was not diligently prosecuted' were 'not intended to apply to mere lapses or errors on the part of the earlier prosecution, but to a lack of diligence of such a degree as to be calculated to shield the accused from real responsibility for the acts in question.'¹⁵⁴. The ILC draft thus had a comprehensive view of the different aspects that were later separated in the ICC Statute. 45

The exception is justified as follows: 'the court should be able to try an accused if the previous criminal proceeding for the same acts was really a 'sham' proceeding, possibly even designed to shield the person from being tried by the court'¹⁵⁵. The 1996 Draft Code of Crimes names 'the abuse of power or improper administration of justice by the national authorities' as examples of such a sham¹⁵⁶.

¹⁴⁶ See e.g. the definition of prosecution in Black's Law Dictionary, 6th edition, 1221 (1997): 'A criminal action, a proceeding instituted and carried on by due course of law, before a competent tribunal, for the purpose of determining the guilt or innocence of a person charged with crime'.

¹⁴⁷ See in this regard also El Zeidy (2002) 23 MichJIL 937. The author further notes that 'any other construction [than a wide interpretation of 'proceedings'] might lead to a complete blocking of the Court's jurisdiction'.

¹⁴⁸ See mn 53.

¹⁴⁹ See e.g. van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 727; reluctant e.g. El Zeidy (2002) 6 Mediterranean JHUMRts 239.

¹⁵⁰ Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 678.

¹⁵¹ See Wilkitzki (1990) 102 ZStW 681.

¹⁵² Article 42 para. 2 (b) of the 1994 Draft Statute, Article 12 para. 2 (b) of the 1996 Draft Code of Crimes.

¹⁵³ See 1994 ILC Report p. 119, para. 7.

¹⁵⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵⁵ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶ See ILC Commentary on article 12, para. 11, 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 70. See also Amnesty International, above note 17, 39, criticizing that by requiring a 'purpose' to shield a person from criminal responsibility, the provision would not cover proceedings where a prosecutor, acting in good faith, was unable to secure a

This comprehensive provision was separated into two subparagraphs only during the last session of the Preparatory Commission in 1998, when its original co-exception on retrials after national proceedings for charges of ‘ordinary crimes’ was deleted. Still, their common root is evident in the exceptional character of both paragraphs. Also with a view to detecting sham trials, any deviations from usual national procedures, extraordinary jurisdictions or martial courts might more easily than regular proceedings draw attention under both literae a and b¹⁵⁷. The same is true with regard to even stronger indicators, such as the appointment of special investigators politically aligned with the accused or the establishment of secret tribunals¹⁵⁸.

46 a) ‘for the purpose of shielding from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’. Shielding a person from criminal responsibility is one way of not bringing that person to justice. Insofar as subparagraphs a and b overlap in their scope of application, subparagraph a may serve as a catch clause for situations where the purpose of shielding a person from criminal responsibility is realized without fulfilling the criteria listed under (b). It is difficult to decipher what kind of situations fall under this clause. An example of an exception under (a) might be a case where an atrocity amounting to genocide is charged as an evidently disproportionate ordinary crime, such as an assault¹⁵⁹. In this case, the process would be a ‘sham’, even if the court were acting independently, impartially and in accordance with due process rights.

Subparagraph (a) has been under strong criticism for the subjectivity involved in determining a ‘purpose of shielding’ from the preceding proceedings, as well as the difficulties and costs related to providing evidence on an eventual ‘sham’¹⁶⁰.

47 b) ‘not conducted independently or impartially in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law and were conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, was inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice’. This exception combines two elements. First, a lack of independence or impartiality as determined in accordance with the due process norms and second, a general appreciation on whether the manner in which the procedures were conducted was consistent or not with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice. The difficulties in interpreting this provision, in particular regarding the required ‘intent’ to bring a person to justice are similar to those mentioned under (a) above.

48 It was the proposal of Mexico concerning article 17 to qualify the words ‘independently and impartially’ with the phrase ‘in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law’¹⁶¹. As the formulations of article 17 were agreed to be taken to article 20 as well, the amendments of Mexico followed accordingly. No discussion took place on this addition in article 20. It seems to anchor the margin of appreciation of the ICC on human rights law and on the practice of the bodies interpreting that law. Most likely the ICC would have searched for practice and arguments from that direction anyway when determining the more detailed content of ‘independently and impartially’. The addition may in any case ease the worries by Amnesty that the terms ‘independently’ and ‘impartially’ could be read so narrowly as to exclude cases where the independence of the prosecutors and judges was not conviction because the court, in practice, lacked the powers to seize evidence or compel witnesses to testify, for example, because of unsettled conditions in the country.

¹⁵⁷ See Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions, (2008), note 249; Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 675.

¹⁵⁸ Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 675.

¹⁵⁹ See mn 33.

¹⁶⁰ See Bernard, Juger et juger encore les crimes internationaux. Etude du principe ne bis in idem (2014) 248–249, providing analysis on some of these criticisms.

¹⁶¹ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.14 (22 June 1998).

threatened and they acted impartially, but the procedures fell far short of international standards for a fair trial¹⁶².

As mentioned above, the indications of lack of independence or impartiality have to be read cumulatively with the rest of the subparagraph: ‘conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, was inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice’. In 1998, Amnesty worried that the term ‘intent’ could be read narrowly, so as to exclude those outside the proceedings. As a consequence, the provision would fail to address situations of threats to the prosecutor, the judges, lawyers, victims and witnesses, directly or indirectly, by external persons¹⁶³. This kind of restrictive reading does not seem plausible. A wide margin of appreciation remains for the Court, however, to decide what content it will give to this exception. This has provoked concern about the Court potentially turning into ‘a body for the protection of individuals and their basic human rights against States’¹⁶⁴.

As potential examples falling under this exception, one could think of a biased court that seems to act properly, the charge being adequate and the proceedings efficient. However, the members of the court have a preset opinion of the outcome of the trial. In such an example, the difference to the exception under subparagraph (a) is not clear-cut. One could further think of a State official exercising pressure on the court conducting the trial or of a biased investigative authority. A ‘sham’ proceeding ‘inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice’ could go both ways: a bias in favour of the accused, ‘for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility’, as well as a bias against the accused in a ‘show trial’.

IV. Application

Article 17 para. 1 (c) determines the duty of the Court itself to take into account *ne bis in idem*¹⁶⁵. Article 19 determines the right of any person or State to challenge the admissibility of a case or the jurisdiction of the Court. Contrasting with other grounds for inadmissibility according to article 17, a challenge on grounds of ne bis in idem can be brought before the Court not only at the pre-trial phase but also thereafter (see article 19 para. 4)¹⁶⁶.

Article 89 para. 2 discusses the possibility that the person sought for surrender brings a challenge before a national court on the basis of the principle of ne bis in idem. After immediate consultation with the Court to determine if there has been a relevant ruling on admissibility, the requested State shall proceed with the execution of the request, if the case is admissible. ‘If an admissibility ruling is pending, the requested State may postpone the execution of the request for surrender of the person until the Court makes a determination on admissibility’. Rule 181 further elaborates that ‘the Chamber dealing with the case, if the admissibility ruling is still pending, shall take steps to obtain from the requested State all the relevant information about the ne bis in idem challenge brought by the person’. Article 95

¹⁶² Amnesty International, above note 17, 39–40.

¹⁶³ Ibid.

¹⁶⁴ van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 725 referring to the fact that the separation of the exemptions originally combined e.g. in article 10 para 2 lit. b ICTY Statute widens the margin of interpretation; see also Nsereko (1999) 10 CLF 87, 116; Spinellis (2002) 73 RIDP 1160; Bernard, Juger et juger encore les crimes internationaux. Etude du principe ne bis in idem (2014) 242-7. The human rights emphasis of this provision has also been underlined in early ICC jurisprudence, see e.g. Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the oral decision on the Motion challenging the admissibility of the Case, Trial Chamber II (16 June 2009), para. 85.

¹⁶⁵ See also article 19 para. 1 first sentence: ‘The Court shall satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction in any case brought before it’.

¹⁶⁶ Mn 37. See also Sadat and Carden (2000) 88 GeorgetownLaJ 420 et seq. Generally see Hall, Nsereko and Ventura on Art. 19.

also enables a requested State to postpone the execution of a request for cooperation while an admissibility challenge is under consideration¹⁶⁷.

Article 20 might find application also in cases of competing requests. In article 90 para. 6 lit. c '[t]he possibility of subsequent surrender between the Court and the requesting State' appears as an inducement for cooperation with the ICC. When determining whether to surrender a person to a non-State party after its own trial, the ICC should, however, pay attention to ne bis in idem. Article 108 protects a person sentenced by the Court and in custody of the State of enforcement from becoming subject to prosecution, punishment or extradition to a third State without approval by the ICC.

V. Consequences in cases of violation

- 50 No explicit provision addresses violations of article 20. All that can be said here derives from article 87 paras. 5 and 7: If a State fails to comply with the requests by the Court, the matter may be referred to the Assembly of States Parties or to the Security Council. This relates to States parties and States who have entered into an ad hoc arrangement or arrangement with the Court¹⁶⁸.

VI. Conclusion

- 51 Article 20 confirms the important position of ne bis in idem as a judicial guarantee in the context of international criminal law. It covers three distinct situations involving the ICC. Paragraph 1 enshrines a general protection of a person convicted or acquitted by the Court from retrials before the Court itself. It defines idem by conduct (idem factum) and thereby implements a broad interpretation, which, however, is inherently limited by the subject matter jurisdiction of the Court. Only acquittals and convictions by the ICC establish res iudicata, whereby the Rome Statute leaves some flexibility with regard to interpreting the finality of such a judgment on the merits of a case. Paragraph 2 implements a downward ne bis in idem protection from subsequent national prosecution also upon convictions and acquittals of the ICC. This protection is absolute in terms of opening no exceptions, but its application is narrowly confined by 'crimes referred to in article 5'. Relying on the same legal qualification seems understandable, since an ICC judgment cannot establish ne bis in idem for crimes over which the Court does not have jurisdiction. However, as a consequence, an individual may face – even multiple – trials in third States as well as in States parties for the same conduct after having been finally judged by the ICC. This possibility is even more regrettable from the point of view of the individual, considering the absence of a prescription to deduct potential ICC sentences. Paragraph 3 relates to upward ne bis in idem. Idem is again broadly defined by the same conduct. A national bona fide prosecution bars subsequent proceedings before the ICC, if one of the exceptions does not apply. Res iudicata is established for a person who 'has been tried'. This formulation arguably encompasses not only judgments on the merits of a case but also other final court decisions. The protection is not absolute but subject to exceptions regarding the proper administration of international justice under the scrutiny of the Court. Again, also with regard to subsequent trials before the ICC, no mandatory deduction of sentences is prescribed.

¹⁶⁷ On the applicability of Article 95 to requests for arrest and surrender, see Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Seussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-163, Decision on the postponement of the execution of the request for surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi pursuant to article 95 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I (1 June 2012), para. 37.

¹⁶⁸ See also Regulation 109; for details see Reisinger Coracini, above note 10, 105 et seq. The Rules of the ad hoc tribunals contain a particular procedural provision on this issue. Rather than making a finding and referring the matter, rule 13 ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence requests a Trial Chamber to issue a reasoned order requesting the other court to permanently discontinue its proceeding.

Article 20 serves not only as an important guarantee of individual rights in criminal proceedings. Closely linked to questions of admissibility according to article 17, the provision has to primarily be seen in a jurisdictional context, distributing and balancing the competences of the ICC and those of national courts according to the principle of complementarity. Judging article 20 from the perspective of the protection of human rights and state sovereignty, the latter has prevailed. 52

C. Special remarks

1. The minimum content of ne bis in idem: the principle of deduction

The principle of ne bis in idem is sometimes understood to have two aspects; the prohibition of a retrial, and the prohibition of a punishment for the same conduct that does not take into account the previous punishment already served. The principle of deduction forms part of most national legal systems. It usually finds application between States that do not acknowledge transnational ne bis in idem (mn 8). It is also included in the Statutes of the ad hoc tribunals, in the ILC Draft Code and Draft Statute¹⁶⁹. 53

The Preparatory Committee Draft, however, omitted paragraph 3 of the draft article on ne bis in idem suggested in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute as superfluous¹⁷⁰. It confined the matter to Part 7 of the Statute dealing with penalties. Article 78 para. 2 mandates that the ICC deduct any time ‘previously spent in detention in accordance with an order of the Court’. But the duty to ‘take into account the extent to which a penalty imposed by another court on the same person for the same act has already been served’ (article 42 para. 3, 1994 ILC Draft Statute) was watered down to optional deduction. This solution was criticised strongly by many delegations in the Preparatory Committee in 1998¹⁷¹. No return to the more definitive expression of the principle of deduction, however, took place. Article 78 para. 2, sentence 2 reads: ‘The Court may deduct any time otherwise spent in detention in connection with conduct underlying the crime’. The provision leaves too wide a margin of appreciation for the ICC. It must be expected that the ICC will apply this provision in accordance with the other international instruments referred to above. In the exceptional cases of a retrial by the ICC, a denial to deduct at least any deprivation of liberty fully would be difficult to justify.

2. Relevance of genuine enforcement of sentences

Criminal proceedings that have been conducted in a wholly appropriate manner may turn into a de facto sham trial at the stage of enforcement. A national judgement can be made a mockery of by an action which makes the sentence non-existent in practice. This issue was discussed already in the Siracusa Draft¹⁷², and referred to in the 1996 Preparatory Committee Report¹⁷³. At the March – April Preparatory Committee in 1998, Portugal proposed additions to paragraph 3, whereby a concluded trial before another court would not bar the ICC from exercising its jurisdiction when: ‘(c) the sentence was manifestly disproportionate to the gravity of the crime; (d) there was a manifestly unfounded decision on the suspension of the enforcement of a sentence or on a pardon, a parole or a commutation of sentence’¹⁷⁴. Likewise, the ILC believed in the Commentary to the Draft Code that ‘[t]he failure to impose a 54

¹⁶⁹ See articles 10 para. 3 and 9 para. 3 of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes, article 12 para. 3 of the 1996 ILC Draft Code and article 42 para. 3 of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

¹⁷⁰ The Zutphen Draft suggested giving further consideration as to whether paragraph 3 was already covered by article 70[BCE] (2) (Determination of the sentence). This article at the time provided only for optional deduction of ‘any time otherwise spent in detention in connection with conduct underlying the crime’.

¹⁷¹ See in this regard also Preparatory Committee Draft, p. 45 footnote 60.

¹⁷² It proposed ‘to clarify that the exception [...] for sham proceedings extends beyond trial, and includes clemency, parole, amnesty, pardon, and other proceedings ...’, see the Siracusa Draft, p. 45.

¹⁷³ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 39, paras. 173–4.

¹⁷⁴ See the Portuguese proposal, above note 73.

punishment that is proportional to the crime or to take steps to enforce a punishment may indicate an element of fraud in the administration of justice¹⁷⁵.

- 55 The comparison of the severity of sentences as a clear-cut rule was deemed too ambitious and controversial because of the differences of criminal policies internationally. Consequently, Portugal and Belgium put forward a renewed proposal to include at least the (d) of the earlier Portuguese proposal, containing the enforcement aspect. Several States supported the core idea of the proposal. It was also met with strong criticism, however. The application of the provision would have entailed stronger cooperation from States and their officials than many of them were ready to commit themselves to. The discussion resulted in a draft article 19 which was also included in the Preparatory Committee Draft:

‘Without prejudice to article 18, a person who has been tried by another court for conduct also proscribed under article 5 may be tried by the Court if a manifestly unfounded decision on the suspension of the enforcement of a sentence or on a pardon, a parole or a commutation of the sentence excludes the application of any appropriate form of penalty’.

Not surprisingly, a considerable number of delegations contested the inclusion of this article in the Rome Statute. Upon recommendation of the Coordinator the article was deleted in Rome on account of being too controversial¹⁷⁶. It remains to be seen whether the ICC will ever extend the temporal scope of its consideration of the exceptions in paragraph 3 (a) and (b) beyond the judgement by a national court¹⁷⁷.

- 56 Another open issue is the application and scope of ne bis in idem in relation to the definition of crimes. It needs to be asked whether the combined weaponry of the national and the ICC prosecutors might be too powerful from the perspective of the accused. In the field of the large-scale crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC, the factual situation might be very complex and obscure. There are diverse national and international offences which may apply to a given course of conduct. In a national system there might already be two applicable systems: civil courts and military courts. In addition, it needs to be considered that the national ways to break the offences down into various degrees of participation are different from those of the ICC Statute. It is against the background of frequent impunity for international crimes that the ICC will have the difficult task of reflecting these genuine concerns.

3. Offences against the administration of justice

- 57 According to article 70 the ICC has jurisdiction over offences against its administration of justice when committed intentionally. These offences, e.g. giving false testimony or presenting false or forged evidence, are exclusively listed in article 70 para. 1 literae a to f. At the same time, paragraph 4 mandates each State Party to extend its criminal laws penalizing the listed offences when committed on its territory or by one of its nationals¹⁷⁸. Prosecution by competent States Parties is foreseen upon request by the ICC. To avoid retrials and double punishment also with regard to these offences¹⁷⁹, Rule 168 was introduced:

¹⁷⁵ See 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 69.

¹⁷⁶ For details see Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court. Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 60. He mentions in particular that some delegations ‘argued that the proposal was not absolutely necessary, as the provisions on admissibility could give the Court sufficient breadth to examine cases of pardons or amnesties made in bad faith’.

¹⁷⁷ For such a possibility see e.g. Holmes, in: Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court (1999) 76 et seq.; Scheschonka, Der Grundsatz ne bis in idem (2004) 289; van den Wyngaert and Ongena, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 727. See also mn 44.

¹⁷⁸ Klip and van der Wilt (2002) 73 RIDP 1119 refer to the particular position of the host country in this regard.

¹⁷⁹ While it might be argued that offences according to article 70 may be subsumed under the wording of article 20 para. 1 (‘crimes’) it is literally excluded with regard to paras. 2 and 3 (‘crime referred to in article 5’, ‘conduct also proscribed under article 5, 7 or 8’). But even with regard to paragraph 1, the purpose of this provision as comprising article 70 is rather questionable.

‘In respect of offences under article 70, no person shall be tried before the Court with respect to conduct which formed the basis of an offence for which the person has already been convicted or acquitted by the Court or another court’.

In substance, this rule provides for a wide ne bis in idem based on ‘conduct’, which is acknowledged for convictions and acquittals by the ICC as well as for those of other courts. On the other side, this broad protection is inherently limited to offences listed in article 70, since the granted protection relates exclusively to retrials before the Court. The rule lacks a provision regarding downward ne bis in idem. This may be reasoned by the fact that national prosecution is foreseen ‘upon request’ (article 70 para. 4 litera b). However, this obligation to prosecute upon request does not interfere with a State’s right to prosecute without such a request according to its national laws. Retrials of offences against the administration of justice before another court after a proceeding before the ICC are not expressly excluded. Furthermore, despite constituting a competence to prosecute for at least two State Parties, the rule does not prevent both States from using their jurisdiction subsequently. The regulation of these competing competences is left to the laws of inter-state cooperation.

Article 21 Applicable law

1. The Court shall apply
 - (a) In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence;
 - (b) In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict;
 - (c) Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.
2. The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions.
3. The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion, or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

Literature: Arsanjani, M.H., 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (1999) 93 AJIL 22; Bitti, G., 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources of Law in the Jurisprudence of the ICC', in: Stahn C. and Sluiter G. (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2009); Bitti, G., 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and The Respect for the Hierarchy of Sources of Law Before the ICC', in: C. Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (forthcoming 2014); Cassese, A., 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections', (1999) 10 EJIL 144; Cheng, B.B., General Principles of Law as Applied By International Courts And Tribunals (1987); Cryer, R., 'Royalism and the King: Article 21 of the Rome Statute and the Politics of Sources', (2009) 12 NCLRev 390; D'Amato, A.A., The Concept of Custom in International Law (1971); Danilenko, G.M., Law-making in the International Community (1993); Darcy S. and Powderly J. (eds), Judicial Creativity at the International Criminal Tribunals (2010); Degan, V.D., Sources of International Law (1997); Edwards, G.E., 'International Human Rights Law Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: The Search and Seizure Right to Privacy', (2001) 26 Yale JIL 323; Fan, M., 'Custom, General Principles, and the Great Architect Cassese', (2012) 10 JICJ 1063; Heinze, A., International Criminal Procedure and Disclosure (Duncker and Humblot 2014); Henkin, L. et al., International Law: Cases and Materials 51–148 (3rd ed. 1993); Edwards, G.E., 'International Human Rights Law Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: The Search and Seizure Right to Privacy', (2001) 26 YaleJIL 323; Grover, L. Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2014); Herczegh, G., General Principles of Law and the International Legal Order (1969); Jennings, R. and Watts, A. (eds.), Oppenheim's International Law, vol. 1 (9th ed. 1992); Pellet, A., 'Applicable Law', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary 1051, ii (2002); Rosenne, S., 'Poor Drafting and Imperfect Organization: Flaws to Overcome in the Rome Statute', (2000) 41 VandJIL 164; Sadat, L.N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millenium (2002); id., 'Custom, Codification and Some Thoughts About the Relationship Between the Two: Article 10 of the ICC Statute', (2000) 35 DepaulLRev 909; Saland, P., 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: R. S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189; Schabas, W.A., An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2001); id., The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010); Schachter, O., International Law in Theory and Practice, in: L. Damrosch et al. (eds.), International Law: Cases and Materials (2001) 118.; Simma, B. et al. (ed.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd ed., 2012); Stephens, P.J., 'Collective Criminality and Individual Responsibility: The Constraints of Interpretation', (2014) 37 FordhamLLJ 501; Stephens, P.J., 'Collective Criminality and Individual Responsibility: The Constraints of Interpretation', (2014) 37 FordhamLLJ 501; Triffterer, O., 'Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law – A New Position of Power to Fight Abuse of Power?', (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCL&Prac 811, at 838; id., Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des materiellen Völkerstrafrecht seit Nürnberg (1966); id., 'Can the Elements of Crimes Narrow or Broaden Responsibility for Criminal Behavior Defined in the Rome Statute', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2008).

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	11
I. Paragraph 1: 'The Court shall apply'.....	11
1. 'In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence'.....	11
2. 'In the second place, where appropriate'.....	19
a) 'applicable treaties'.....	20
b) 'principles ... of international law'.....	23
c) 'rules of international law'.....	28
d) Established principles of the international law of armed conflict.....	33
2. Sources applicable in the absence of (a) or (b).....	34
a) 'general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of the States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime'....	34
b) 'provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards'.....	42
II. Paragraph 2: 'The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions'.....	43
III. Paragraph 3: 'The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender ...'.....	48

A. Introduction/General remarks

Article 21 establishes a hierarchy of applicable law for the judges of the ICC to apply in adjudicating cases. The sources of law elaborated in article 21 derive generally from those contained in article 38 of the ICJ statute, which represents the most authoritative statement of the sources of general international law¹. Article 38 lists as sources: treaties, custom, general principles recognized by 'civilized' nations, and, as a subsidiary means for determining the law, judicial decisions and scholarly publications. Article 21 is generally modeled on this list, with modifications to account for the particularities of criminal law, in particular the need for clarity and specificity. For instance, article 21 departs from article 38 in establishing a hierarchy among sources of law.

Article 21 also reflects compromises reached in the negotiations. The principal issue at stake in drafting article 21 was how much discretion should be granted to the ICC's judges in light of the conflicting demands of the principle of legality on the one hand, and, on the other, the inevitability of lacunae in a nascent legal system. Two principal schools of thought emerged at the Preparatory Committee meetings regarding the appropriate degree of judicial discretion in discerning applicable law. A minority of states took the position that the principle of legality requires that judicial discretion be limited strictly in the criminal law context². Any doubt as to the relevant legal provision should be resolved, according to this view, by direct application of the appropriate national law. The majority position, on the other hand, sought to accommodate the unique nature of the international legal order by allowing the judges to discern and apply general principles of international criminal law. Article 21 represents a compromise between these two approaches: when all other sources fail, the Court must apply general principles derived from national laws, including, as the Court deems appropriate, those of the states that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime.

The negotiating history of article 21 reveals an evolution that led to the adoption of this compromise. The ILC's final Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court listed three sources of law, without specifying a hierarchy of application. The Court was to apply (a) the statute; (b) treaties and principles and rules of general international law; and (c) applicable rules of national law³. No guidance was provided as to which national laws should be considered applicable. The 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee noted the extensive discussion of ‘whether the Court should be empowered to elaborate/legislate further the general principles of criminal law that are not written in the Statute’⁴. Among the proposals favouring wide judicial latitude was one that would have empowered the judges to elaborate elements of crimes and principles of liability and defences not included in the Statute⁵. These elements and principles would then be submitted to the States Parties for approval⁶. Some delegations, however, rejected the notion that the judges should be empowered to ‘legislate’ general principles of criminal law⁷. One delegation proposed that where the Statute itself did not contain the relevant law, the Court should apply directly the national law of the territorial state, the state of nationality of the accused, or the custodial state – in that order⁸.

¹ While article 38 is binding only with respect to cases before the ICJ, it is considered evidence of customary law. See Jennings and Watts (eds.), Oppenheim's International Law, vol. 1 (9th edition 1992).

² See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 105 ('It was stated by some delegations ... that the Court should not be empowered to legislate principles of criminal law').

- 4 At the Rome Conference, as in the earlier negotiations, contentious debate surrounded paragraph 1 (c) – the final source of law, which was divided into two vastly different options in the final draft of the Statute⁹. Option 1, broadly supported at the Conference¹⁰, provided that the Court would apply general principles of law derived from national laws of the legal systems of the world. Option 2, endorsed by a substantial minority¹¹, provided that the Court would apply national laws directly, and specified a hierarchy for determining which State’s laws would apply¹².
- 5 The compromise reached essentially melding the two options. On 8 July, the Working Group on Applicable Law issued a Working Paper stating: ‘Most delegations favoured option 1, but some still favour option 2. A view was expressed that the laws indicated in option 2 could be given as examples of the national laws referred to in option 1, so that the two options be combined’¹³. On 11 July, the Working Group transmitted to the Committee of the Whole the text of what was to become article 21, with the exception of paragraph 3, which was still under discussion¹⁴. The final text of paragraph 1 (c) reflects the compromise proposed in the Working Paper – options 1 and 2 are combined.
- 6 The Report of the Working Group shows that neither side of the debate felt completely vindicated by this solution. The Report notes that ‘[s]ome delegations were of the view that the phrase ‘including, as appropriate’ should be replaced by the word ‘especially’¹⁵. On the other hand, ‘[s]ome delegations express the view that, as a matter of principle, no reference to any national laws of States should be made. The Court ought to derive its principles from a general survey of legal systems and their respective national laws’¹⁶. Despite these lingering objections, the Committee of the Whole endorsed the Working Group’s compromise, adopting paragraph 1(c) without modification¹⁷.

³ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 33, p. 103.

⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 104.

⁵ See ibid., pp. 104–05.

⁶ See ibid.

⁷ See ibid., p. 105.

⁸ See ibid.

⁹ In contrast, the first two sources in paragraphs 1 (a) and (b) were generally uncontroversial and paragraphs 2 and 3 were completely without brackets in the Final Draft. See Preparatory Committee Draft, article 20, p. 54. Note that article 20 became article 21 in the Rome Statute.

¹⁰ See Author’s notes of debate, Committee of the Whole (23 June 1998) (on file with author).

¹¹ See id.

¹² The Court would apply first the law of the State where the crime was committed, second, the law of the State of nationality of the accused, and finally, the law of the custodial state. See Preparatory Committee Draft, article 20, p. 54.

¹³ Working Paper on article 20, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGAL/L.1 (8 July 1998), p. 2, para. 3.

¹⁴ Report of the Working Group on Applicable Law, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGAL/L.2 (11 July 1998).

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 2, para. 3.

¹⁶ Ibid., p. 2, para. 4.

¹⁷ Compare id., with Rome Statute, article 21.

Article 21 constitutes the first codification of the sources of international criminal law. The sources of general public international law have become well established since the adoption of the ICJ statute¹⁸. However, until the ICC was created, international criminal law lacked a permanent international forum. Moreover, the statutes of the ICC's predecessor international criminal tribunals contain no provisions specifying the applicable law. Hence, when the ICC Statute was adopted, limited relevant precedent or scholarly analysis existed regarding the sources of international criminal law.

In practice, the ad hoc international criminal tribunals generally apply first their statutes and rules of procedure and evidence, and, if those sources prove inconclusive, customary international law and general principles derived from the legal systems of the world.¹⁹ Although the U.N. Secretary General decreed that the ICTY should apply only rules 'which are beyond any doubt part of customary law',²⁰ the tribunals have unquestionably effectuated significant developments in international criminal law. These include, notably, the ICTY's holding that war crimes can be committed in internal armed conflict.²¹ Some commentators have been critical of the tribunals in this regard, arguing that they are insufficiently respectful of the principle of legality.²² In fact, some participants in the Rome Conference apparently feared that the ICC would follow what they called the 'Cassese approach', referring to the judge responsible for many of the ICTY's legal innovations.²³

Such fears stemmed not only from concerns about fairness to defendants, but also from the reluctance of some states to relinquish control over the law that could be applied to their nationals.

Some delegations preferred to safeguard this aspect of their sovereignty by mandating that, when faced with lacunae in the applicable statutory and customary law, the Court would apply directly the national law of relevant states. Other delegations felt strongly, however, that it would be inappropriate for an international court to apply anything other than international law. They argued that direct application of national law would involve inconsistent justice and would hinder the development of a coherent body of international criminal law.

Article 21 resolves this debate by requiring that the judges apply international law exclusively but granting them discretion to consider the national law of the states that would normally exercise jurisdiction in ascertaining general principles of law. This is an awkward compromise because of the inconsistency inherent in determining 'general principles' by references to specific national laws.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: 'The Court shall apply'

1. 'In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence'

The primacy of the Statute and Rules was never questioned in the negotiations. The Court has confirmed the hierarchy, holding that when faced with a lacuna in paragraph 1(a), the ICC must first seek to fill it by applying the Vienna Convention's rules of treaty interpreta-

¹⁸ See Statute of the ICJ, article 38; see also Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 64 et seq.

¹⁹ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 7 October 1997, para. 40, at 28 (Joint Separate Opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah). See Fan (2012) 10 JICJ 1063.

²⁰ See, e.g., ICCPR, entered into force 23 Mar. 1976, 999 UNTS 171, 6 ILM 368 (1967), article 15 para. 1 ('No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed').

²¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, paras. 96-137, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/866e17/>.

²² Fan (2012) 10 JICJ 1063, 1065 (citing Degan (2005) 4 Chinese JIL 45).

²³ Id. 1068.

tion and article 21(3)'s admonition to remain compliant with human rights norms. Only if this approach proves inadequate may the Court turn to the sources listed in paragraphs 1(b) and (c)²⁴. However, the hierarchy is less rigid than it appears because the rules of treaty interpretation enable the Court to refer to general principles and customary law in interpreting provisions of the Statute.²⁵ Hence, as William Schabas has noted, '[i]n practice, all of the sources listed in article 21 will be helpful to the Court in its effort to interpret the Statute'.²⁶

- 12 The most controversial aspect of this provision in the negotiations was whether elements of crimes should be elaborated for the Court or developed through the jurisprudence.²⁷ The delegation from the United States argued strongly for the elaboration and codification of elements on the grounds that they would serve the principle of *nullum crimen sine lege*²⁸. Many delegations opposed this proposal, preferring to afford the judges greater discretion to develop the elements of crimes. Ultimately, an accommodation was reached whereby Elements of Crimes would be adopted to 'assist' the Court rather than as binding supplements to the Statute.
- 13 This compromise resulted in an inconsistency in the Statute's references to the Elements. While article 9 defines the purpose of the Elements as merely to 'assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6, 7, and 8',²⁹ article 21 states that the Court 'shall apply' the Elements. These provisions should be reconciled by reading them together. That is, the Court 'shall apply' the Elements for the purpose of 'assisting the Court ...'. This interpretation of the Statute comports with the intent of the majority of delegations that the Elements should not bind the Court, but should instead be used to assist the Court in interpreting the Statute.
- 14 However, even this reading of the Statute does not provide the judges with clear guidance with regard to Elements that add to, rather than clarifying, the definitions of crimes in the Statute. This issue arose in the Bashir case. In deciding whether to issue an arrest warrant for Sudanese president Omar Al Bashir for genocide, Pre-Trial Chamber I considered the elements of that crime. The Elements of Crimes for genocide include a contextual element that is not present in the Statute or in other definitions of the crime. This element requires that the conduct in question 'took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction'.³⁰ The Chamber was unable to agree about how to address this element. The majority held that the Court must apply the Elements of Crimes unless it finds 'an irreconcilable contradiction' between the Elements of crimes and the Statute.³¹ Since the contextual element does not contradict the Statute, the majority held that it must be applied. A dissenting judge, however, took the position that '[s]ince article 9(3) of the Statute requires that the Elements of Crimes be consistent with the Statute, it can be inferred that only the Statute outlines the operative definition of the crime'.³² She did not reach the question of whether the contextual element is consistent with the Statute because she found that, in any event, the contextual element was met.³³

²⁴ Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Omar Al Bashir, Pre-trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, para. 126, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d66468/>.

²⁵ Cryer (2009) 12 NCLRev 390, 393.

²⁶ Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 385.

²⁷ See Gadirov, revised by Clark, article 9.

²⁸ See U.S. Reference Paper: Elements of Offenses for the International Criminal Court, submitted to Preparatory Committee (27 March 1998) (on file with author) ('We believe criminal elements can give teeth to the concept of nullum crimen sine lege').

²⁹ This inconsistency has been cited as a failure in the drafting of the Rome Statute. See Rosenne (2000) 41 VandJIL 164, 167–68.

³⁰ Elements of Crimes, Genocide.

³¹ Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest Against Omar Al Bashir, Pre-trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, para. 128, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d66468/>.

³² Id. paras. 17–18.

³³ Id. para. 20.

Robert Cryer has criticized the majority's approach, arguing that the Court should have interpreted the Statute in line with the customary international law definition of genocide and found that the contextual element is inconsistent with that definition.³⁴ He points out that the majority's approach effectively renders the Elements of Crimes binding, contrary to the will of the majority of the drafters.³⁵ While Cryer is correct that the drafters did not intend the Elements to be binding, the judges are understandably reluctant to decline to apply Elements of Crimes that do not contradict the statutory definitions. As a result, where the Elements of Crimes add requirements not present in customary international law, as they do for genocide, the Court's jurisprudence will likely contribute to the fragmentation of international criminal law.

Although paragraph 1 (a) does not specify a hierarchy for the application of these three sources, other articles of the Statute make clear that the Statute takes precedence over the Elements of Crimes and Rules. Article 9 paragraph 3 states that '[t]he Elements of Crimes and amendments thereto shall be consistent with this Statute'. Similarly, article 51 paragraph 5 provides that '[i]n the event of conflict between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Statute shall prevail'. The relationship is further clarified in an explanatory note to the Rules, which provides that the Rules are 'subordinate in all cases' to the Statute.³⁶

Interestingly, although both the Rules and the Elements rank below the Statute, the Court has, in a sense, treated the Rules as more subordinate to the Statute than the Elements. As explained above, the Court has held that the Elements of Crimes can be applied in a way that restricts the definitions of crimes. On the other hand, the same Pre-Trial Chamber of the Court has held that the Rules cannot be interpreted 'in such a way as to narrow the scope of an article of the Statute'.³⁷ On that basis the Chamber rejected the prosecutor's argument that the language of one of the Rules of Procedure implicitly excludes victims from participating during the investigation stage of a situation.³⁸

Paragraph 1 (a) also encompasses unlisted sources created under the Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence, such as the Court's regulations and codes of conduct. Thus, for instance, the Appeals Chamber has noted that the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, which is mandated in the Rules, is 'part of the Court's applicable law under article 21 (1) (a) of the Statute'.³⁹ Some of these instruments specify their position in the hierarchy of sources, but for others the judges will have to decide where they rank when conflicts arise.⁴⁰

The Court has sometimes taken the view that the law and procedures provided for in the Statute and Rules represent the universe of applicable law and procedures. For instance, the Appeals Chamber relied on this position to deny the prosecutor's request for 'extraordinary review' of the above-mentioned decision regarding victim participation.⁴¹ The prosecutor had argued that the absence from the Statute of a mechanism for review of a decision

³⁴ Cryer (2009) 12 NCLRev 390, 396-7.

³⁵ Id. 400.

³⁶ International Criminal Court, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, UN Doc. PCNICC/2000/1/Add.1, Explanatory Note (2000).

³⁷ Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-101, Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, Pre-trial Chamber I, 17 January 2006, para. 47, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2fe2fc/>.

³⁸ Id. para. 49.

³⁹ Prosecutor v. Muthaura & Kenyatta, ICC-01/09-02/11-365 OA3, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II dated 20 July 2011 entitled 'Decision with Respect to the Question of Invalidating the Appointment of Counsel to the Defence', Appeals Chamber, 10 November 2011, para. 48.

⁴⁰ Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 387 (noting that 'the relationship between these different forms of subordinate legislation has not been clarified, and in the event of conflict judges will have to find solutions based upon general principles of interpretation of legal texts ...'); Bitti, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Brill 2009) 285, 291-92.

⁴¹ Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-168, Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 13 July 2006, para. 39, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/004842/>.

denying leave to appeal is a lacuna that should be remedied by applying general principles of law as provided in article 21 (1) (c). The Appeals Chamber rejected this argument, holding that the Statute exhaustively sets forth when parties may appeal decisions of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers.⁴² The Appeals Chamber also applied this reasoning to reject a defendant's argument that his case should be found inadmissible under the doctrine of 'abuse of process' because he was 'unlawfully detained and ill-treated' by the national authorities that arrested him.⁴³ The Chamber held that 'abuse of process' is not a ground for finding a case inadmissible under article 17.⁴⁴ Although the Chamber recognized that some powers not explicitly granted in the Statute inhere in the judicial function, it held that the power to stay proceedings based on abuse of process is not such a power.⁴⁵

In other circumstances, however, the Court has taken a more liberal approach to applying its primary sources of law. For instance, a Trial Chamber has held that the Court has the implied power to subpoena witness testimony, even though the Statute only refers to the voluntary appearance of witnesses.⁴⁶ The Appeals Chamber has also controversially held that an accused need not be present during his or her trial under some circumstances⁴⁷ even though the Statute states that '[t]he accused shall be present during the trial'.⁴⁸ Some scholars have criticized the Court for such broad interpretations of the Statute.⁴⁹

2. 'In the second place, where appropriate'

- 19 The inclusion of the phrase 'where appropriate' serves to emphasize the discretion the Court enjoys in determining when treaties or principles and rules of international law are applicable.
- 20 a) 'applicable treaties'. The debate with regard to this provision surrounded whether to include 'relevant' treaties or to limit the source to 'applicable' treaties⁵⁰. In particular, the delegates debated whether the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and the Convention Against Torture are applicable or merely relevant⁵¹. The drafters have been criticized for ultimately settling on the term 'applicable'⁵². As one commentator has pointed out, '[a] narrow reading of the term could prevent the Court from referring to the ICCPR or the European Convention on Human Rights on the grounds they are not 'applicable', but only relevant'⁵³. However, this fear is somewhat allayed by the requirement in paragraph 3 that

⁴² Id.

⁴³ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Appeals Chamber, 14 December 2006, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1505f7/>.

⁴⁴ Id. para. 34.

⁴⁵ Id. para. 35.

⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Ruto and Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Corr2, Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and resulting Request for State Party Cooperation, Trial Chamber V(A), 17 April 2014.

⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Ruto and Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Appeals Chamber, 25 October 2013, para. 56, available at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc1669852.pdf>.

⁴⁸ Rome Statute art. 63.

⁴⁹ See e. g., Bitti, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2009) 285.

⁵⁰ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making Of The Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 215.

⁵¹ See id.

⁵² See Pellet, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1067–70; Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium (2002) 177, para. 12.

⁵³ Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium 177.

the application of law under the Statute must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights.

Applicable treaties include, for instance, the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, 21 which are incorporated into the definition of war crimes. Moreover, the Court has held that the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties applies to its interpretation of the Rome Statute.⁵⁴ Other applicable treaties include those to which the Court is a party, such as the treaty governing the Court's relationship with the Netherlands.⁵⁵ The Court should avoid following the practice of the ad hoc tribunals, which have applied international agreements that are binding on the states that would normally have jurisdiction over the offence. Given the ICC's wide-ranging jurisdiction, this approach would contribute to the fragmentation of international criminal law.⁵⁶

In practice, the choice of the term 'applicable' may be less important than the drafters 22 believed because the Court is free to refer to all treaties in its search for the principles and rules of international law referenced in paragraph 1 (b). While treaties that are merely 'relevant' to the work of the Court cannot be applied directly, therefore, they can nonetheless provide evidence in support of the other sources. This makes sense because, as Leila Sadat has noted, it is unlikely that the drafters wished to deprive the Court of the possibility of referring to international treaties to assist them in deciding novel issues⁵⁷.

b) 'principles ... of international law'. The inclusion of 'principles ... of international 23 law' in paragraph 1 (b) as a source of law distinct from 'general principles' derived from national laws in paragraph 1 (c) has generated confusion. The Statute clearly defines the source of paragraph 1 (c)'s 'general principles': they are derived 'from national laws of legal systems of the world'. However, the Statute fails to identify the provenance of 'principles ... of international law' in paragraph 1 (b), raising the question of how these principles differ from the general principles in paragraph 1 (c).

There is widespread agreement that paragraph 1 (b) at a minimum includes customary 24 international law. The drafters may have used this formulation, rather than a direct reference to customary law, out of concern that the latter is insufficiently precise in the context of criminal law.⁵⁸ Commentators have taken different views of the meaning of 'principles' in this provision, however. Allain Pellet asserts that the inclusion of 'principles' in paragraph 1 (b) was a mistake, a 'verbal tic', and that subparagraph (b) is simply an awkward reference to customary international law⁵⁹. William Schabas, on the other hand, interprets this provision as encompassing not only custom but also general principles of law derived from the national legal systems of the world.⁶⁰ He finds support for this position in the drafting history. The 1993 draft Statute of the ILC contains a commentary explaining that 'principles and rules of general international law' includes 'general principles of law'.⁶¹ According to Professor Schabas, paragraph 1 (c)'s 'general principles' refer not to the general principles of international law but to principles derived from comparative law.⁶²

A third possibility, and the one that is most supported by the Court's case law, is that 25 paragraph 1 (b) includes both customary international law principles and other kinds of

⁵⁴ DRC (Appeals Chamber Judgment on Prosecutor's Application), note 41, para. 33.

⁵⁵ Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 390.

⁵⁶ See id., 1069, para. 104 (citing decisions of the ICTY and criticizing this approach as 'open[ing] the way to an 'à la carte' jurisdiction').

⁵⁷ Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium (2002) 177, para. 12.

⁵⁸ Id. 384.

⁵⁹ Pellet, in: Cassese, Gaeta, and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1072.

⁶⁰ Id.

⁶¹ Id. citing ILC, 'Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its 45th Session (3 May-23 July 1993) UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1993/Add.1 (Part 2) 111 para. 2.

⁶² Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 391.

principles that are not derived from national laws.⁶³ Oscar Schachter has identified five categories of general principles reflected in international legal discourse:

- (1) The principles of municipal law 'recognized by civilized nations'.
- (2) General principles of law 'derived from the specific nature of the international community'.
- (3) Principles 'intrinsic to the idea of law and basic to all legal systems'.
- (4) Principles 'valid through all kinds of societies in relationships of hierarchy and coordination'.
- (5) Principles of justice founded on 'the very nature of man as a rational and social being'⁶⁴.

The first category corresponds roughly to article 38 paragraph 1 (c) of the ICJ Statute, although the latter does not refer expressly to national laws but rather to 'the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations'. Article 38 (1)(c) has given rise to much controversy and a vast literature⁶⁵. The debate primarily pits those who believe general principles are derived exclusively from national laws against those who view this provision as encompassing principles derived from the international legal conscience, not linked to any particular domestic system⁶⁶. The travaux préparatoires reveal divergent views on this question among the drafters of the ICJ Statute⁶⁷.

The other four categories reflect general principles that are not derived from national laws. The second category – principles derived from the nature of the international community – includes such principles of coexistence as pacta sunt servanda, territorial integrity and self-defence⁶⁸. Similarly, the third category – principles intrinsic to the idea of law – includes principles of interpretation such as the maxim that later law supersedes earlier law if both have the same source⁶⁹. Finally, the last two categories reflect natural law doctrine and encompass such 'natural justice' concepts as equity and respect for human rights⁷⁰. The inclusion of 'principles ... of international law' as a source of law distinct from 'general principles' seems to reflect the drafters' intention to enable the Court to apply such principles even when they are neither derived from national laws nor part of customary international law.

- 26 Although the Court has yet to address directly whether the principles in subparagraph (b) extend beyond those contained in custom and national laws, there is some indication that the Court may answer this question affirmatively. For instance, in determining the meaning of 'sufficient gravity' for admissibility under article 17, Pre-Trial Chamber I considered under the heading 'principles and rules of international law' the rules and practice of the ad hoc tribunals concerning case selection.⁷¹ The Chamber made no attempt to establish that the rules and practices of the ad hoc tribunals in this regard are part of custom. Instead, the discussion suggests that the ad hoc tribunals are following principles derived from the nature of the legal system – in this case, principles that require international courts to prosecute only senior leaders responsible for widespread or systematic criminality. Although the Appeals

⁶³ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 76.

⁶⁴ Schachter, in: Damrosch et al. (eds.), International Law: Cases and Materials (2001) 118.

⁶⁵ See, e.g., Danilenko, Law-making in the International Community (1993) 174, para. 1; Jennings and Watts (eds.), Oppenheim's International Law 37.

⁶⁶ See Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals (1987) 2–4; Danilenko, Law-making in the International Community (1993) 173–76; Degan, Sources of International Law (1997) 14–15; Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law (1995) 512. The view that principles may be derived from the international legal conscience is also reflected in the Martens Clause. See Hague Convention (No. IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, entered into force 26 January 1910, preamble, para. 8, 36 Stat. 2277 ('principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience').

⁶⁷ Schachter, in: Damrosch et al. (eds.), International Law: Cases and Materials (2001) 118.

⁶⁸ See id., 121.

⁶⁹ See id., 122.

⁷⁰ See id., 122–23.

⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-8-US-Corr, Decision Concerning Pre-trial Chamber I's Decision of 10 February 2006 and the Incorporation of Documents into the Record of the Case against Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Pre-trial Chamber I, 24 February 2006, paras. 55–60, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c60aaa/>.

Chamber overturned the decision, it did not address the Pre-Trial Chamber's approach to principles and rules as a source of law.⁷²

Likewise, in deciding on an application for participation from victims, one judge held that it is a general principle of law 'that the burden of proof of elements supporting a claim lies on the party making the claim' and that 'indirect proof' is admissible.⁷³ This decision also indicates that general principles may derive from the nature of the legal system and not only from custom or national laws.

The case law also indicates that the prosecutor and judges believe that article 38's 'general principles,' are reflected in paragraph 1 (c), rather than in paragraph 1 (b) as Professor Schabas has suggested. For instance, in requesting 'extraordinary review' of the denial of a request to appeal, the Prosecutor cited article 21(1)(c) as the relevant source of the alleged 'general principle' that such review is permitted; and the Appeals Chamber likewise cited paragraph 1 (c) in rejecting the argument.⁷⁴

c) 'rules of international law'. Paragraph 1 (b)'s reference to 'rules of international law' is curious in that it omits the word 'customary,' even though custom is the primary source of international law rules other than treaties. As already noted, the drafters may have eschewed the term out of concern that the concept of gradually evolving custom is too imprecise for the purposes of international criminal law. Oppenheim describes the crystallization of a customary rule in the following terms: 'Wherever and as soon as a line of international conduct frequently adopted by States is considered by States generally legally obligatory or legally right, the rule which may be abstracted from such conduct is a rule of customary international law'⁷⁵. As Oppenheim asserts, '[c]ustom is the oldest and the original source of international law ...'⁷⁶. As such, the phrase 'rules of international law' must be interpreted as a reference to customary rules.

The Court has not made significant use of customary rules as a source of law to date. In one case, a Pre-Trial Chamber found the customary law regarding modes of liability to be inapplicable because the Statute contains a provision directly on point.⁷⁷ With regard to the decision of the ICTY to follow the customary rule on the question, the Chamber noted: 'This is a good example of the need not to transfer the ad hoc tribunals' case law mechanically to the system of the Court'.⁷⁸

The Court has also resisted arguments that it should follow procedural rules adopted at the ad hoc tribunals when the ICC Statute is silent on a matter. Thus, in the Lubanga case, Trial Chamber I rejected the prosecutor's argument that the ICC should permit 'witness proofing' because it is common practice at the other tribunals. The Chamber asserted that the procedural rules and ICC jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals is not 'automatically applicable to the ICC' and that the Statute 'created a procedural framework which differs markedly from the ad hoc tribunals'.⁷⁹

⁷² See Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-169 23-09-2008 1/49 CB PT OA, Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58', Appeals Chamber, 13 July 2006, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/87f8fe/>.

⁷³ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05, Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation a/0010/06, a/006406 to a/0070/06, a/0081/06 to a/0104/06 and a/0111/06 to a/0127/06, Pre-trial Chamber II, 10 August 2007, paras. 13, 15, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/957bbf/>.

⁷⁴ DRC (Pre-trial Chamber Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application), note 72, para. 39.

⁷⁵ Jennings and Watts (eds.), Oppenheim's International Law 30. For the admissibility of customary rules as sources of international criminal law see Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des materiellen Völkerstrafrecht seit Nürnberg (1966) 35 et seq.; id. (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCL&Prac 811, at 838.

⁷⁶ Jennings and Watts (eds.), Oppenheims's Internatonal Law 25.

⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Germain Kantanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-trial Chamber I, 30 September 2008, paras. 506–508.

⁷⁸ Id. para. 508.

⁷⁹ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Trial Chamber I, 30 November 2007, paras. 43–45, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac1329/>.

- 31 The Court has been somewhat more willing to cite the precedent of the other international tribunals with regard to substantive questions not addressed in the ICC Statute.⁸⁰ For instance, in the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges decision, Pre-Trial Chamber I adopted a number of holdings from the ICTY jurisprudence, including the ‘overall control’ test for determining when a conflict is international in nature.⁸¹
- 32 Interestingly, while article 21 enables the Court to use customary international law as a source of law, the drafters also provided for the development of a body of international law that would exist alongside the Statute⁸². Article 10 states that nothing in Part 2 of the Statute ‘shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than [the] Statute’. The drafters’ intent in including this provision was apparently to ensure that the Statute is not treated as the definitive codification of international criminal law such that it operates to limit the application or development of international law outside the Statute⁸³. However, this provision is likely to have limited practical effect⁸⁴. In spite of article 10, other international courts look to the Rome Statute and jurisprudence to elucidate and apply customary international law⁸⁵.
- 33 d) Established principles of the international law of armed conflict. Some of the law of international armed conflict is directly applicable under paragraph 1 (a) because the Geneva Conventions are incorporated into the definition of war crimes as noted above. This paragraph serves to ensure that customary international law concerning armed conflict is also a source of law for the Court. The Court has yet to make significant use of this provision.

3. Sources applicable in the absence of (a) or (b)

- 34 a) ‘general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of the States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime’. As discussed in the introduction, this provision was the most controversial aspect of article 21 during the drafting process. The language of the article represents a compromise between delegates who argued that the Court should apply national laws directly and those who felt that ‘general principles’ ought to be entirely divorced from any reference to particular national systems. This compromise is rather awkward. As Per Saland, chairman of the Working Group that negotiated article 21 in Rome, has noted: ‘There is of course a certain contradiction between the idea of deriving general principles, which indicates that this process could take place before a certain case is adjudicated, and that of looking also to particular national laws of relevance to a certain case; but that price had to be paid in order to reach a compromise’⁸⁶. Although this compromise raises the spectre that the Court will apply inconsistent law in different cases, that danger may be largely averted through the exercise of the Court’s broad discretion to decide when it is ‘appropriate’ to refer to particular national laws. The less often the Court considers such reference appropriate, the more likely it will be to develop a cogent body of international law⁸⁷.
- 35 Furthermore, paragraph 1 (c) is clear that the ICC judges are not to apply the national laws of any particular State directly, but rather, to apply the principles underlying the laws of ‘the

⁸⁰ Bitti, in: C. Stahn & G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2009).

⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment Pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 541.

⁸² See Sadat (2000) 49 DepaulLRev 909, 918.

⁸³ See Triffterer, article 10.

⁸⁴ Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium (2002) 923.

⁸⁵ See id. 920–22.

⁸⁶ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189, 215.

⁸⁷ The Conference rejected the view of some delegations that the phrase ‘including, as appropriate’ should be replaced with ‘especially’. See note 15 and accompanying text. The weight to be accorded to any particular national laws is therefore entirely in the discretion of the judges.

legal systems of the world'. This provision reflects the practice of other international courts, in particular the ICJ. As one ICJ judge explained: 'In my opinion, the true view of the duty of international tribunals [respecting the application of 'general principles'] is to regard any features or terminology which are reminiscent of the rules and institutions of private law as an indication of policy and principles rather than as directly importing these rules and institutions'⁸⁸. Judges of the ad hoc Tribunals have taken a similar approach to deriving general principles of law. In the Erdemović case, two ICTY judges described their task as follows: '[O]ur approach will necessarily not involve a direct comparison of the specific rules of each of the world's legal systems, but will instead involve a survey of those jurisdictions whose jurisprudence is, as a practical matter, accessible to us in an effort to discern a general trend, policy or principle underlying the concrete rules of that jurisdiction which comports with the object and purpose of the establishment of the International Tribunal'⁸⁹.

The ICJ has only rarely resorted to general principles as a source of law⁹⁰. Nonetheless, a number of international tribunals, treating article 38 as declaratory of customary law, have relied on general principles in deciding cases⁹¹. The general principles of law referred to in article 21 include such widely recognized principles as the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)⁹² and the principle of proportionality⁹³. 36

The drafters of the ICJ Statute described the role of article 38's provision regarding 'general principles' as, in part, to avoid a situation of *non liquet*⁹⁴. Paragraph 1 (c) similarly serves to address the unavoidable occurrence of interstices in international criminal law. As a developing body of law, international criminal law does not currently contain answers to every legal question likely to arise in a criminal trial. One area in which the drafters anticipated such lacunae is the law governing grounds for excluding criminal responsibility. While the Statute elaborates some defences in article 31, it also specifies that: 'the Court may consider a ground for excluding criminal responsibility other than those referred to in paragraph 1 where such a ground is derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21'⁹⁵. In developing the international criminal law relating to defences, it will be important for the judges to draw on principles of criminal law derived from national legal systems. 37

⁸⁸ South West Africa Case, Advisory Opinion, 1950 ICJ 28, at 148 (11 July) (separate opinion of Judge McNair).

⁸⁹ Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgment Appeals Chamber, para. 57, at 40.

⁹⁰ Jennings and Watts (eds.), Oppenheim's International Law, 37–38. For citations to cases where this source has been applied, see id., 37–38, para. 5.

⁹¹ See id., 39.

⁹² The ICCPR specifies that the notion of general principles does not conflict with the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, stating that the principle of legality 'shall [not] prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations'. note 20, ICCPR, article 15 para. 2.

⁹³ As discussed above in reference to paragraph 1 (b), the inclusion of both 'principles ... of international law' and 'general principles of law' in the Statute leaves open to debate whether particular principles fall under paragraph 1 (b) or paragraph 1 (c). For example, while most of the world's legal systems recognize the principles of equity and legality, one could also argue that these principles are derived from natural law or the 'legal conscience of humanity'.

⁹⁴ Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, para. 57, at 39, citing P.C.I.J., Advisory Committee of Jurists, Procès-verbaux of the Proceedings of the Committee, 16 June – 24 July, 336 (1920).

⁹⁵ Rome Statute, article 31 para. 3. In including this provision, the drafters may have been influenced by the experience of the ICTY when it addressed the defence of duress in the Erdemović Judgement. In that case, the ICTY found that 'no rule may be found in customary international law regarding the availability or the non-availability of duress as a defence to a charge of killing innocent human beings'. Prosecutor v. Erdemović, No. IT-96-22-A, Judgment Appeals Chamber, para. 55, p. 38. Furthermore, after a survey of relevant national laws, the court found that '[i]t is clear from the differing positions of the principal legal systems of the world that there is no consistent concrete rule which answers the question whether or not duress is a defence to the killing of innocent persons'. Ibid., para. 72, p. 63. Although the Statute provides for the defence of duress in article 31, the drafters anticipated that similar questions would arise with regard to the availability of other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility under international law.

- 38 The language of article 21 leaves a great deal of discretion to the judges in determining which national laws to consider in deriving ‘general principles’. ICJ article 38 limits the relevant principles to those ‘recognized by civilised nations’. This provision was probably originally intended to refer to the most ‘developed’ nations, though it is now taken to refer to all States⁹⁶. Article 21 similarly includes all of the world’s legal systems within its scope. Nonetheless, it is clear that an applicable principle need not be accepted unanimously by all the world’s legal systems⁹⁷. Rather, ‘[t]here must be evidence that it is applied by a representative majority’, including the world’s principal legal systems⁹⁸. In identifying general principles, therefore, the judges of the ICC are required to engage in comparative law analysis, but have broad discretion to decide which national laws to include in that analysis.
- 39 In particular, the judges have discretion to make the important decision of when to refer to the laws of the States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime. Article 21 provides no guidance as to which States should be considered to fall into this category⁹⁹. Earlier proposals to apply national laws directly were more specific in this regard, directing the Court first to the national law of the State where the crime was committed, second to the laws of the State of nationality of the accused, and third to the laws of the custodial State¹⁰⁰. The first two represent widely recognized grounds of jurisdiction – territoriality and nationality – and the Court can be expected to refer to the law of these States when applying article 21 paragraph 1 (c). With respect to other less accepted bases of jurisdiction, including custody of the defendant and nationality of the victim, the Court will have to decide whether such States would ‘normally exercise jurisdiction’.

At least one commentator has argued that since the crimes in the Rome Statute are crimes of universal jurisdiction, any state can be considered one that ‘would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime.’¹⁰¹ The legislative history shows that this was not what the statute’s drafters intended and it is unlikely that the Court will take this approach.

- 40 There is little jurisprudence applying paragraph 1(c) to date. In a few cases, the Court has rejected arguments based on this provision. In the Lubanga case, Trial Chamber I rejected the prosecutor’s argument that a general principle exists permitting ‘witness proofing’ noting that the practice is only accepted in two common law systems, and that the prosecutor had not cited any evidence of the practice in Romano-Germanic systems.¹⁰² Likewise, the Appeals Chamber rejected a request to disqualify defense counsel who previously worked for the prosecutor’s office, noting that the prosecution had cited only five jurisdictions in support of its claim that a general principle exists supporting such disqualification.¹⁰³

In a dissenting opinion, one judge has criticized his colleagues for their heavy reliance on German law to support the conclusion that the statute includes the ‘control theory’ of co-perpetration. Although the majority’s holding does not rest on paragraph 1(c), Judge Fulford asserts that the decision’s effect is to import a national law doctrine without determining ‘whether the policy considerations underlying the domestic legal doctrine are applicable at [the ICC] ...’.¹⁰⁴

⁹⁶ Bernhardt (ed.), MPEPIL (2003) 517.

⁹⁷ See id.; Heinze, International Criminal Procedure and Disclosure (2014), 48–50.

⁹⁸ Id.

⁹⁹ This issue arises in a number of places in the Rome Statute including, for example, articles 17–19.

¹⁰⁰ See notes 8, 12 and accompanying text.

¹⁰¹ See e.g., Edwards (2001) 26 YaleJIL 323, 408.

¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 41, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>.

¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jerbo Jamus, ICC-02/05-03/09-252 OA, Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor Against the Decision of Trial Chamber IV of 30 June 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecution’s Request to Invalidate the Appointment of Counsel to the Defence’, Appeals Chamber, 11 November 2011, para. 33, available at http://www.legal-tools.org/uploads/tx_ltpdb/doc1266895_06.pdf.

¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, para. 10, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>.

The Court has also been reluctant to engage the law of the state that would normally exercise jurisdiction. For instance, in the Kenya situation, defendants requested an oral hearing, relying on Kenyan legal instruments. In declining the request, the Appeals Chamber noted that it is not permitted to apply national laws directly and that it has discretion to decide whether to consider the national laws of the states that would normally exercise jurisdiction. The Chamber found no reason to depart from Rule 156's presumption against an oral hearing.¹⁰⁵

b) 'provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards'. Assuming that the Court conducts broad comparative law analysis in arriving at general principles, this provision should prove relatively unimportant since such general principles will inherently conform with international law, norms, and standards.¹⁰⁶

However, if the Court decides in the future to apply principles derived from the national systems that would normally exercise jurisdiction it will have to be careful to ensure that those principles are compatible with the Statute and with other relevant international norms.

II. Paragraph 2: 'The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions'

This paragraph provides for the discretionary use of precedent by the Court. The Court is not obligated to adhere to its prior decisions through a binding rule of stare decisis. Rather, paragraph 2 permits the judges, in their discretion, to accord precedential value to principles and rules of law identified in prior decisions. This provision represents a compromise between the common law approach to judicial decisions as binding precedent, and the traditional civil law view that judicial pronouncements in specific cases bind only the parties before the court.

The language of paragraph 2 stands in contrast to that of article 59 of the ICJ Statute, which specifies that 'the decision of the Court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case'. Article 59 evidenced the reluctance on the part of the international community when drafting the ICJ Statute to accord a significant law-making role to the judges. In practice, however, the ICJ has looked to its prior holdings as evidence of relevant rules and principles of law. By explicitly suggesting the judges of the ICC may consider the Court's prior holdings, article 21 indicates an evolution in the attitude of the world community in this area¹⁰⁷. As a developing body of law, without the benefits of legislative guidance, international criminal law requires a certain amount of judicial discretion. In suggesting the judges may take into account their prior holdings, article 21 paragraph 2 contributes to the development of a consistent and predictable body of international criminal law, and thus serves the principle of legality.¹⁰⁸

The Court has frequently cited its prior decisions as important authority. For instance, in deciding on victims' applications to participate in proceedings, one judge explained that he ¹⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Muthaura, Kenyatta, and Hussein Ali, ICC-01/09-02/11 OA 4, Decision on the 'Request to Make Oral Submissions on Jurisdiction under Rule 156(3)', Appeals Chamber, 1 May 2012, para. 11, available at http://www.legal-tools.org/uploads/tx_ltpdb/2012-05_1406077_01.PDF.

¹⁰⁶ In fact, this provision was in brackets in Option 1 of the Draft Statute debated in Rome. See note 9, Preparatory Committee Draft, article 20.

¹⁰⁷ Another commentator has perceived in this change simply a recognition that the difference between precedential and non-precedential systems of law is less significant in practice than in theory. See Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium 179.

¹⁰⁸ There is some controversy in the scholarship on this point. Compare Cassese (1999) 10 EJIL 144, 164 (arguing that the judges can and should adopt stare decisis) with Pellet, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1066 (rejecting this view).

would ‘whenever appropriate, take into account the principles established and the practices followed so far by the Court in the area of victims’ participation.’¹⁰⁹ The Appeals Chamber used even stronger language when it declined to disqualify defense counsel who previously worked for the prosecution, relying on its prior interpretation of the relevant provision of the Code of Professional Conduct for counsel.¹¹⁰ The Appeals Chamber held that the question of what ‘privy to confidential information’ means was ‘resolved’ by its early decision.¹¹¹

In confirming charges against Katanga and Chui Pre-Trial Chamber I relied on many of its holdings in its decision confirming charging against Lubanga.¹¹² Chambers have also relied on decisions of other chambers. For instance, in a decision considering whether to grant the prosecutor leave to appeal a decision concerning victim participation, Pre-Trial Chamber I referred extensively to the relevant holdings of Pre-Trial Chamber II.¹¹³ Pre-Trial Chamber III likewise followed the holdings of Pre-Trial Chamber II with regard to the meaning of ‘policy’ in the definition of crimes against humanity.¹¹⁴

46 In other instances, however, the Court has departed from its prior holdings. This has been the case, for instance, with regard to the question of whether counsel may prepare witnesses for trial. While several trial chambers have disallowed the practice, Trial Chamber V has permitted witness preparation.¹¹⁵

47 As some scholars have argued, it is probably advisable for the judges of the pre-trial and trial chambers generally to follow holdings of the Appeals Chamber to promote consistency and coherence in the development of the law.¹¹⁶ It remains unclear, however, whether the ICC judges will accord special deference to the case law of the Appeals Chamber. In determining when leave to appeal should be granted, the Trial Chamber in the Bemba case asserted that it was ‘guided by the established jurisprudence of this Chamber and of the Court, citing appellate jurisprudence for the latter.’¹¹⁷ It gave no indication, however, that Appeals Chamber jurisprudence is entitled to special deference.

¹⁰⁹ Prosecutor v. Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05, Decision on Victims’ Applications for Participation a/0010/06, a/006406 to a/0070/06, a/0081/06 to a/0104/06 and a/0111/06 to a/0127/06, Pre-trial Chamber II, 10 August 2007, para. 5, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/957bbf/>.

¹¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jerbo Jamus, ICC-02/05-03/09 OA, Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor Against the Decision of Trial Chamber IV of 30 June 2011 Entitled ‘Decision on the Prosecution’s Request to Invalidate the Appointment of Counsel to the Defence’, Appeals Chamber, 11 November 2011, para. 32, available at http://www.legal-tools.org/uploads/tx_ltpdb/doc1266895_06.pdf.

¹¹¹ Id.

¹¹² Prosecutor v. Katanga and Chui, ICC-01/04-1/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-trial Chamber I, 30 September 2008, para. 65, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/> (the evidentiary standard of ‘substantial grounds to believe’) para. 249 (‘national armed forces’) para. 250 (‘active participation in hostilities’) para. 520 (‘co-perpetration’).

¹¹³ Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01-04-135-tEN, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for Leave to Appeal the Chamber’s Decision of 17 January 2006 on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Pre-trial Chamber I, 31 March 2006, para. 18, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/902494/>.

¹¹⁴ Situation in the Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to ‘Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011, paras. 43–6, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>.

¹¹⁵ See Prosecutor v. Muthaura and Kenyatta, ICC-01/09-02/11-588, Decision on witness preparation, Trial Chamber V, 2 January 2013, para. 30 and fn. 7, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d907bd/>.

¹¹⁶ See, e.g., Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 395; Gideon Boas (ed.), International Criminal Law: Developments in the Case Law of the ICTY (2003) 8.

¹¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-2487-Red, Public Redacted Version of ‘Decision on ‘Defence Request for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Temporary Suspension of the Proceedings Pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court and related Procedural Deadlines’ of 11 January 2013, Trial Chamber III, 16 January 2003, para. 12, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/91962c/>.

III. Paragraph 3: ‘The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender ...’

Although this paragraph was included without brackets in the Final Draft Statute debated in Rome¹¹⁸, it became one of the more contentious provisions of the Statute at the Conference. There was virtual unanimity among delegations as to the desirability of stipulating that the interpretation of law ‘must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights’¹¹⁹. The need for the Court to adhere scrupulously to international human rights standards in exercising its functions is beyond question. In particular, the rights of the accused must be strictly respected¹²⁰.

The debate regarding this paragraph centred instead on the desirability of specifying the prohibited grounds of discrimination. This elaboration may be technically unnecessary since the prohibition of discrimination on the listed grounds is clearly encompassed in ‘internationally recognized human rights’. Most instruments related to human rights and humanitarian law, however, have included such a non-discrimination clause. Many delegations therefore felt strongly that it was important to reaffirm the international community’s commitment to the principle of non-discrimination in the context of the international criminal court.

The most contentious issue to emerge at the Conference with respect to this provision concerned the use of the term ‘gender’. This debate affected not only article 21, but also several other articles where the term gender is used. A number of delegations argued adamantly that the term ‘gender’ is imprecise and should not be employed in the Statute¹²¹. In particular, a few delegations felt that the term gender incorporated a reference to homosexuality¹²². In order to avoid use of the term ‘gender’, some delegations favoured ending the paragraph with the words ‘human rights’¹²³. However, many other delegations felt equally strongly about the importance of reaffirming in the Statute the prohibition against gender discrimination¹²⁴. An intense debate followed regarding whether the term ‘gender’ should be replaced with the more traditional term ‘sex’. On one occasion the debate became so heated that the Chairman closed the meeting and reconvened it without the presence of non-governmental organizations for the only time during the conference¹²⁵. The majority view, which ultimately prevailed, was that the term ‘gender’ should be employed in order to clarify that sex is not simply a biological matter but involves the social construction of roles and power disparities¹²⁶. A definition of the term ‘gender’ was included in article 7, the first place where the term appears, stating: ‘The term “gender” refers to the two sexes, male and female, within the context of society’¹²⁷. Thus, the ¹¹⁸ Preparatory Committee Draft, article 20, note 9.

¹¹⁹ See Zutphen Draft, p. 64, para. 117 (noting support for a proposal stating: ‘The application and interpretation of the general sources of law must be consistent with international human rights standards and the progressive development thereof, which encompasses the prohibition on adverse discrimination of any kind, including discrimination based on gender’).

¹²⁰ The Final Draft Statute contains a footnote stating: ‘It was generally agreed that consistency with internationally recognized human rights would require that interpretation by the Court be consistent with the principle of nullum crimen sine lege’. Preparatory Committee Draft, article 20, note 9, para. 63.

¹²¹ Part of the problem appears to have been related to translation – there is no exact translation for ‘gender’ in Arabic. See ‘Gender Dispute Haunts Rome Conference to the End’ (11 July 1998) 1 On the Record, issue 18 (Whereas the French and Spanish translation for gender is ‘male and female’, the Arab translation reportedly comes out as a ‘type of sex’).

¹²² Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189, 216.

¹²³ See, e.g., Proposal Submitted by Guatemala, Option 1, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGAL/L.4 (14 July 1998).

¹²⁴ See Author’s personal notes of debate, Working Group on Applicable Law (13 July 1998) (on file with author).

¹²⁵ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189, 216.

¹²⁶ See Author’s personal notes of debate, Working Group on Applicable Law (13 July 1998) (on file with author).

¹²⁷ Rome Statute, article 7 para. 3. For an interpretation of this provision, see the commentary of Ch. K. Hall.

conference ultimately adopted the view that in applying and interpreting the law, the Court should be concerned not only with discrimination based on ‘sex’ but also with any discrimination related to socially constructed roles and power differentials.

51 This provision has the potential to broaden the Court’s powers significantly¹²⁸. As written, the provision applies to all sources of law in article 21. Thus, the Court could, for example, refuse to apply one of the Elements of Crimes or a Rule of Procedure and Evidence, if it found the provision to be inconsistent with the standards in paragraph 3¹²⁹. This paragraph is therefore one of the more important provisions of the Rome Statute. Indeed, Gilbert Bitti argues that the effect of the provision is to make internationally recognized human rights an additional source of law for the Court.¹³⁰

52 The ICC’s jurisprudence references this provision frequently, particularly with respect to the human rights of defendants and victims. Such references have occurred in the context of both interpreting and applying the law. In the Lubanga case, after declining to interpret the statute to include ‘abuse of process’ as a ground of inadmissibility, as discussed above, the Appeals Chamber nonetheless asserted that article 21 paragraph 3 requires the dismissal of any case in which a fair trial has become impossible due to breaches of the rights of the accused.¹³¹ Likewise, the Appeals Chamber has used this provision to interpret provisions of the statute in ways that protect people within the Court’s orbit. For instance, the Appeals Chamber interpreted Rule 81(4), which protects the identities of ‘witnesses, victims and members of their families’ prior to trial, to also include ‘persons at risk on account of the activities of the Court.’¹³² The Chamber cited jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and held, ‘that the circumstances under consideration in the present appeal may give rise to a situation in which the withholding of certain information from the Defence may be necessary so as to preserve the fundamental rights of an individual put at risk by the activities of the ICC.’¹³³

One Trial Chamber has even declined to apply an article of the Statute, citing article 21 paragraph 3, although the decision was overturned on appeal. In the Katanga case, the trial chamber decided not to implement article 93(7)(b)’s requirement that witnesses transferred from state custody be returned when the purpose of the transfer has been fulfilled on the basis that the witnesses had asylum claims pending in the Netherlands.¹³⁴ The Chamber held that transferring them would violate in their human right to apply for asylum.¹³⁵ The Appeals Chamber disagreed, however, asserting that it was up to the Netherlands to determine whether the witness’ asylum claims required the Netherlands to intervene to take control of the witnesses until their claims were adjudicated.¹³⁶ Nonetheless, this decision and others indicate that the judges are willing to use this provision to reach outcomes they believe conform to human rights norms, even if this requires interpreting the Court’s sources of law expansively or even disregarding them entirely.

¹²⁸ See Arsanjani (1999) 93 AJIL 22, 29.

¹²⁹ See id.

¹³⁰ Bitti, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (forthcoming 2014).

¹³¹ Lubanga (Appeals Chamber Judgment on Jurisdiction Appeal) note 43, para. 37.

¹³² Prosecutor v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-475 OA, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled ‘First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements’, Appeals Chamber, 13 May 2008, para. 57, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4042e3/>.

¹³³ Id. para. 58.

¹³⁴ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-3003-tENG, Decision on an Amicus Curiae Application and on the ‘Requête Tendante à Obtenir Présentations des Témoins DRC-D02-P-0350, DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 aux Autorités Néerlandaises aux fins d’asile’ (Articles 68 and 93(7) of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 9 June 2011, para. 73, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e411d5/>.

¹³⁵ Id.

¹³⁶ Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, ICC ICC-01/04-02/12-158, Order on the implementation of the cooperation agreement between the Court and the Democratic Republic of Congo concluded pursuant article 93 (7) of the Statute, Appeals Chamber, 20 January 2014, para. 29, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d554f7/>.

PART 3
GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW

Article 22
Nullum crimen sine lege

1. A person shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court.
2. The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted.
3. This article shall not affect the characterization of any conduct as criminal under international law independently of this Statute.

Literature: Acquaviva, G., 'At the Origins of Crimes Against Humanity: Clues to a Proper Understanding of the Nullum Crimen Principle in the Nuremberg Judgment', (2011) 9 JICJ 881; Ambos, K., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute', (1999) 10 CLF 1; id., 'Current Issues in International Criminal Law', (2003) 14 CLF 225; id., 'Judicial Creativity at the Special Tribunal for Lebanon: Is There a Crime of Terrorism Under International Law?', (2011) 24 LeidenJIL 655; Bassiouni, M.C., 'Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind', (1993) 11 NEP; id., 'The International Criminal Court: Observations and Issues before the 1997-98 Preparatory Committee; and Administrative and Financial Implications', (1997) 13 NEP; Broomhall, B., International Justice and the International Criminal Court: Between Sovereignty and the Rule of Law (Oxford University Press 2003); Cassese, A., 'Balancing the Prosecution of Crimes Against Humanity and Non-Retroactivity of Criminal Law: The Kolk and Kislyiy v. Estonia Case Before the ECHR', (2006) 4 JICJ 410; Catenacci, M., 'The Principle of Legality', in: F. Lattanzi and W.A. Schabas (eds.), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Vol. I (il Sirente 1999) 85; Currat, P., 'L'interprétation du Statut de Rome', (2007) 20 RQDI 137; Di Filippo, M., 'Terrorist Crimes and International Co-Operation: Critical Remarks on the Definition and Inclusion of Terrorism in the Category of International Crimes', (2008) 19 EJIL 533; Gallant, K., The Principle of Legality in International and Comparative Criminal Law (Cambridge University Press 2009); Glaser, S., 'Nullum Crimen Sine Lege', (1942) 24 JCLIL 29; Glennon, M., 'The Blank-Prose Crime of Aggression', (2010) 35 YaleJIL 71; Henckaerts, J.-M., and Doswald-Beck, L. (eds.), Customary International Humanitarian Law (ICRC and Cambridge University Press 2005); Hogg, P.W. and Zwibel, C.F., 'The Rule of Law in the Supreme Court of Canada', (2005) 55 TorontoLJ 714; Jeffries, J.C., 'Legality, Vagueness and the Construction of Penal Statutes', (1985) 71 VirgLRev 189; Kirsch, S. and Oehmichen, A., 'Judges Gone Astray: The Fabrication of Terrorism as an International Crime by the Special Tribunal for Lebanon', (2011) 1 DurhamLRev 1; Kreß, C., 'Nulla Poena Nullum Crimen Sine Lege', in: R. Wolfrum (ed.), The Max Planck Encyclopedia of Public International Law (2008-), <<http://www.mpepil.com>>; Lamb, S., 'Nullum Crimen, Nulla Poena Sine Lege in International Criminal Law', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (Oxford University Press 2002) 733; Meron, T., 'Revival of Customary Humanitarian Law', (2005) 99 AJIL 817; Milanović, M., 'Is the Rome Statute Binding on Individuals? (And Why We Should Care)', (2011) 9 JICJ 25; id., 'Aggression and Legality: Custom in Kampala', (2012) 10 JICJ 165; Nilsson, J., 'The Principle Nullum Crimen Sine Lege', in: O. Olusanya (ed.), Rethinking International Criminal Law: The Substantive Part (Europa Law Publishing 2007) 37; Paulus, A., 'Second Thoughts on the Crime of Aggression', (2010) 20 EJIL 1117; Robinson, P.H., 'Fair Notice and Fair Adjudication: Two Kinds of Legality', (2005) 154 UPALRev 335; Saul, B., 'The Special Tribunal for Lebanon and Terrorism as an International Crime: Reflections on the Judicial Function', (2012) Legal Studies Research Paper No. 12/64; Shahabuddeen, M., 'Does the Principle of Legality Stand in the Way of Progressive Development of Law?', (2004) 2 JICJ 1007; Triffterer, O., 'Efforts to Recognize and Codify International Crimes (General Report, Part I)', in: International Crimes and Domestic Criminal Law, (1989) 60 RIDP 29; Van Schaack, B., 'Crimen Sine Lege: Judicial Lawmaking at the Intersection of Law and Morals', (2008-2009) 97 GeorgetownLJ 119.

Content

A. Introduction/general remarks	1
I. Historical development	2
II. Purpose.....	9

III. Scope	14
IV. Sources	23
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	28
I. Paragraph 1	28
1. Criminal responsibility ‘under this Statute’	28
2. ‘conduct in question’	31
3. ‘the time it takes place’	32
4. ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’	33
II. Paragraph 2	36
1. ‘The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed’	36
2. No extensions by analogy	40
3. Case of ambiguity	46
III. Paragraph 3	49
C. Special remarks	52
I. Relationship between articles 11 para. 1, 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1	52
II. Application of nullum crimen to treaty crimes	54
III. Aggression and terrorism	59

A. Introduction/general remarks

- 1 Article 22 sets out the application to the Statute of nullum crimen sine lege (‘no crime without law’). This maxim, along with that of nulla poena sine lege (‘no penalty without law’) reflected in article 23, comprises the principle of legality, a fundamental component of any criminal justice system aspiring to conform to the rule of law.¹ The article sets out the core prohibition of retroactive application of the criminal law, as well as two major corollaries of this prohibition, namely the rule of strict construction (including the forbidding of extension by analogy of the definitions of crimes) and the requirement that ambiguities be construed in favour of the suspect or accused.

I. Historical development

- 2 The 1994 Draft Statute of the International Law Commission² applied the nullum crimen principle so as to reflect that Draft’s proposed jurisdictional distinction between crimes under general international law and treaty crimes. With respect to the latter, see mns 54–58. With respect to the former, article 39 (a) provided that an accused would not be held guilty of genocide, aggression, serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflict or crimes against humanity unless the act or omission in question constituted a crime under international law at the time it occurred. It therefore does no more than apply the prohibition against retrospective application of the criminal law. Provided the conduct was criminal under international law at the time of its occurrence, the ICC would be able to exercise jurisdiction, even where national courts, because of a failure to incorporate the relevant prohibitions into national law³ or because of national laws contrary to them, could not.
- 3 As a constraint on law-making, the principle of legality was relied upon by those seeking to have the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court defined expressly in the Statute, rather than leaving the Court to interpret general international law. The rationale was that general international law might not set out the elements of the offences with sufficient precision, particularly where the crime in question was not defined by treaty (as with aggression).⁴ The

¹ Cf. Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013), pp. 88 et seq.

² International Law Commission, ‘Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court’, in: Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session, UN GAOR, 49th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/49/10 (1994), 43, p. 112; reprinted in: Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 721, 734. Bassiouni omits the ILC’s running commentary to its Draft Statute.

³ Commentary to article 39, ILC Draft, note 1, paras. 2 and 4, pp. 113–114.

⁴ That international law does in fact meet nullum crimen standards has often been asserted, and incorporation by reference of definitions under international law (as proposed in the ILC Draft), has been allowed under result was a move towards the vision, finally affirmed in the Rome Statute, of a Court of which the subject-matter jurisdiction is exhaustively defined in its constitutive instrument. Motivated in part by legitimate uncertainty as to customary international law's definitions of the offences in question, the move also resulted from the awareness of governments that they were designing an institution which could possibly bring indictments against even their highest-ranking officials. This awareness put a premium on the clear delimitation of the Court's jurisdiction.

Responding to such pressures, the ILC replaced its earlier proposal to define the Court's jurisdiction by reference to 'crimes under general international law'⁵ with a list specifying four such crimes (as well as treaty crimes).⁶ Despite acceding to Sixth Committee criticisms on this point, the ILC maintained that the Statute should be primarily adjectival and procedural, and was not intended to codify or define crimes.⁷

Thus, the Court would determine the exact contents of the listed prohibitions by resorting to the relevant sources of international law. Concerns about this approach were raised in the 1995 Ad Hoc Committee, where the view was expressed that the principle of legality required the definition and not merely the enumeration of crimes, and indeed that it required definitions of general principles, defences and the applicable procedural and evidentiary law as well.⁸ At the 1996 Preparatory Committee, there was widespread agreement that 'the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court should be defined with the clarity, precision and specificity required for criminal law in accordance with the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)' and that the fundamental principles of criminal law and the 'general and most important rules of procedure and evidence' should be clearly set out in the Statute for the same reason.⁹

The 1996 Preparatory Committee text contained three proposals. The first changed little of the content of the ILC Draft,¹⁰ but introduced the precursor to present article 22 para. 3 and a stipulation that the more lenient law would apply in case of an amendment between the commission of the offence and final judgment. It also introduced the requirement that any commission of a 'core' crime occur after the entry into force of the Statute. The second and third proposals also contained this latter requirement.¹¹ The second proposal contained a further prohibition on the use of analogy in construing punishable conduct or imposing sanctions.

With the moving of the provisions on jurisdiction ratione temporis into a separate provision, the February 1997 Preparatory Committee text reflected a modified version of the first 1996 proposal, with a two-pronged paragraph on non-retroactivity of 'core' crimes and treaty crimes, a bracketed paragraph prohibiting analogy and a precursor to article 22 para. 3.¹² This version, the basis for the present article, appeared without significant changes in the text both national and international law: see Paust, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 275, 275-276 and 282-288; also mn 15.

⁵ For the previous Draft to emerge from the ILC, see 'Report of the Working Group on the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court', Annex to Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Fifth Session, UN GAOR, 48th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/48/10 (1993), reprinted in: 33 ILM 256 (1994).

⁶ 1994 ILC Report, note 1, para. 60, p. 36; Commentary to ILC Draft, note 1, paras.5-6, 66-67 and para. 1, p. 71.

⁷ Commentary to article 20, ILC Draft, note 1, para. 4, p. 71.

⁸ Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995), paras. 52 and 57, pp.10 and 12; reprinted in: Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 667, 677 and 678.

⁹ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), 2 Vols., paras. 52, 180 and 185, pp. 16, 41 and 42 (Vol. I), reprinted in: Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 363, 383-384 and 408-409. For contemporary commentary, see Wise, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 267. The extent to which the principle of nullum crimen would require such a codification of the general part is controversial.

¹⁰ 'Article A' of Part 3bis of the 1996 Preparatory Committee Report was compiled by an informal group and did not represent a text agreed by delegates: ibid., Vol. 2, p. 79; Bassiouni, Compilation (1998), 500.

¹¹ The third proposal was the precursor of current article 11 (Jurisdiction ratione temporis).

¹² Decisions Taken by the Preparatory Committee at its Session Held from 11 to 21 February 1997, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1997/L.5 (1997), article A (Nullum crimen) and article Abis (Jurisdiction ratione temporis, as it was to prepared at the inter-sessional Zutphen meeting in January 1998.¹³ The same wording appeared with insubstantial changes in the final Preparatory Committee Draft which was placed before the Diplomatic Conference.¹⁴

- 8 At the Diplomatic Conference, the basic structure devised for article 22 by the Preparatory Committee underwent little change. The suggested text of Per Saland, Chair of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law,¹⁵ added to the prohibition on analogy in the second paragraph the requirement of strict construction and disallowed the proscription of conduct not clearly prohibited by the Statute.¹⁶ A note pointed out that the principle of legality would apply equally to all crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, including crimes against the integrity of justice.¹⁷ The Working Group report which followed¹⁸ incorporated the strict construction requirement and, with the changes made by the Drafting Committee subsequently,¹⁹ resulted in the wording of the Bureau's Draft Statute²⁰ and finally of the adopted text. The Working Group, Drafting Committee and Bureau versions reflected the growing sense that treaty crimes would not be included in the initial Statute, and so omitted provision for them.

II. Purpose

- 9 The principle of legality reinforces a legal system's legitimacy by limiting the interventions of the criminal justice process to those which have been clearly prescribed by law in advance. It assumes a rational, autonomous legal subject and a known or knowable law. It posits that the deterrent effect of the law, which is its power to influence the decision-making of individuals in a socially constructive way, arises from its rational and knowable character. Where legal subjects make choices relying on the apparent sense of the law, and nonetheless find themselves tried and convicted, the law has effectively been applied ex post facto to them, and the administration of justice is accordingly brought into disrepute.²¹ A system supporting retroactivity and vagueness in definition lends increasing discretion to the judiciary and (in national systems) the police. In its extreme form, neglect of this principle coincides with an abandonment of the rule of law and is a characteristic of unfettered authoritarianism.²²
- 10 The principle plays a 'constitutional' role in maintaining the separation of powers as well. As a principle of legislation, nullum crimen sine lege constrains lawmakers to set out their intentions clearly and in advance of the conduct over which they wish the courts to exercise jurisdiction.²³ It thereby seeks to protect the subjects of the law from indeterminate executive become known); Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 343, 355. Article Abis included the proposal to apply the more lenient version in the event of amendment.

¹³ Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, The Netherlands, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/L.13 (1998), article 15[A], p. 51; reprinted in: Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 143, 173.

¹⁴ Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, Part 1 of the Addendum to the Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 (1998), article 21, p. 57; reprinted in: Bassiouni, Compilation (1998) 7, 39.

¹⁵ Chairman's suggestions for articles 21, 26 and 28, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WG.GP/L.1 (15 June 1998).

¹⁶ This stipulation was dropped, presumably as being superfluous, from subsequent versions.

¹⁷ Article 22 does not apply to article 70 (Offences against the administration of justice) as such: see mn 34–35.

¹⁸ Report of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4 (18 June 1998), article 21, p. 2.

¹⁹ Draft report of the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.65/Rev.1 (14 July 1998), article 21, p. 1.

²⁰ Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.3 (16 July 1998), p. 1.

²¹ See the discussion in Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 57–61 and in Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLR 189, 205–210.

²² See Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 320–322, for a description of how the National Socialist government reversed Germany's traditional affirmation of the principles of legality.

²³ This constraint is constitutionally enforced in some jurisdictions, such as the United States and Canada, where judges are empowered to strike down legislation for vagueness and retroactivity: see Hogg and Zwibel (2005) 55 TorontoLJ 714, 722–723; Robison (1995) 154 UPALRev 335, 356–359.

interference. The principle reflected in article 22 of the Statute reminds States Parties of the need for care in drafting amendments or additions to the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, as the Court will have only such scope of jurisdiction as the reasonably ascertainable and non-retroactive meaning of the words defining it (on the crime of aggression, see mn 60).

As a principle of interpretation, nullum crimen aims to limit the power of the (unelected) judiciary to interfere with liberty beyond the extent that a reasonable individual could understand from the words of the relevant prohibition. Just as legal subjects are presumed capable of knowing and have a duty to obey the law, so too is the lawmaker responsible for making the law clear and ascertainable, while the judiciary is obliged in principle to refrain from penalizing conduct not made criminal by the legislator through the wording of the law in question,²⁴ and is thus confined to interpreting and applying, but not making the law.²⁵

In the case of the ICC, the principle aims to provide certainty to both individuals and States. Individuals face the possibility of prosecution only with respect to the crimes which States Parties have clearly and exhaustively provided for in the Statute. For their part, States Parties are under an obligation to cooperate with the Court and to surrender jurisdiction to it in accordance with the complementarity provisions only in clearly delineated statutory circumstances. This is not because the provisions relating to the obligation to cooperate (for example) are subject to the rule of strict construction (mns 36–39), but because such provisions will only come into play when crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, which are so subject, are being addressed. It was largely because of this ability to clarify and to limit the obligations of States, and because of the likelihood that many defendants will be State agents, that the principle of legality was incorporated into the Statute as explicitly as it was during negotiations.

The principle derives in part from a consciousness of the serious consequences for the accused that may flow from the criminal justice process, and therefore of the need to protect relatively powerless individuals from the interference of State (or inter-State) legal machinery.²⁶ In international law, the principle adds to this the certainty it provides to States as to the extent of the obligations they have undertaken.

III. Scope

The principle of nullum crimen sine lege as it exists under general international law can be distinguished from its manifestation in article 22 of the Statute.

As to the former (mn 25–27), nullum crimen sine lege has long been recognized as a principle of international law, and has had considerable influence on the process leading up to the adoption of the Rome Statute (see mn 2–8 and 27).²⁷ As a principle of general international law, nullum crimen is frequently referred to in asserting that a given form of conduct does or does not give rise to the criminal responsibility of individuals under international law. Such reference has been made notably in the jurisprudence of the ICTY and of the Special Court for Sierra Leone.²⁸ In this role, the principle is adapted to the ²⁴ See Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 58 and Wise, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 267, 272. The line between the ‘legislative’ and the ‘judicial’ is a matter of judgement and is never fixed however: Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLR 189, 189 and 202–205.

²⁵ Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 69.

²⁶ The same policy motivation pertains to the presumption of innocence and the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt: Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 71.

²⁷ For a summary history of the development of the principle at international law, see Lamb, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Commentary (2002) 733, 735–742; see also Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 22–36.

²⁸ In the context of the ICTY, ‘...the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law....’: Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), UN Doc. S/25704 (3 May 1993), para. 34. The ICTY has examined the customary basis of various crimes cases that include Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, IT-94-1, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal particular means of establishing norms under international law, determining the existence (or non-existence) of crimes by reference to treaties, declarations, jurisprudence and other indicia of State practice and opinio juris, rather than simply by reference to legislative acts, as typically suffices at the national level. The principle is broader and considerably more tolerant of imprecision under general international law than it is under the Rome Statute and, a fortiori, under national law.²⁹ Professor Bassiouni asserts that it encompasses a broader allowance for prohibitions by analogy than do most domestic systems and is, in general, less rigid than its article 22 manifestation.³⁰ The reasons for this comparative breadth of the international principle lie both in the nature of international law, and in the fundamental interests being protected by international criminalization – namely, the protection of international peace and security and the affirmation of ‘the collective conscience of mankind’ – that require a different balance to be struck between substantive justice and the demands of legality at the international level.³¹ Thus, while continental jurists have a tendency to speak of the requirement that the law (usually meaning national law) be foreseeable (lex praevia), precise (lex stricta) and set down in writing (lex scripta),³² care must be taken to apply this articulation of the principle only mutatis mutandis to the Rome Statute and to general international law, where each of these requirements may be satisfied only in a comparatively broad sense.³³

- 16 Furthermore, to ensure the effective safeguard of these interests, the nullum crimen principle permits the prosecution of the acts of individuals regardless of whether national on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995; Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001; and Prosecutor v. Enver Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, Appeals Chamber, 16 July 2003. For the Sierra Leone Special Court, see Prosecutor v. Sam Hinga Norman, SCSL-2004-14-AR72, Decision on Preliminary Motion Based on Lack of Jurisdiction (Child recruitment), Appeals Chamber, 31 May 2004; Prosecutor v. Brima, SCSL-2004-16-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 22 February 2008, paras. 197–198 (determining forced marriage as the crime against humanity of ‘other inhumane acts’). For a discussion of the methods applied in assessing customary law in the jurisprudence of the ICTY, see Lamb, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Commentary (2002) 733,742–746; Nilsson, in: Olusanya (ed.), Rethinking (2007) 37; Meron (2005) 99 AJIL 817.

²⁹ ‘International law is the product of multipartite treaties, conventions, judicial decisions and customs which have received international acceptance or acquiescence. It would be sheer absurdity to suggest that the ex post facto rule, as known to constitutional states, could be applied to a treaty, a custom, or a common law decision of an international tribunal, or to the international acquiescence which follows the events. To have attempted to apply the ex post facto principle to judicial decisions of common international law would have been to strangle that law at birth’: Prosecutor v. Milan Milutinović et al., IT-99-37-AR72, Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanić’s Motion Challenging Jurisdiction – Joint Criminal Enterprise, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2003, para. 39, quoting United States of America v. Altstötter et al., Trials of War Criminals Before The Nuremberg Tribunals Under Control Council Law No. 10, vol. III (‘the Justice case’), 974–975.

³⁰ [‘International criminal law’] as it is now, and certainly as it was in 1945, requires the existence of a legal prohibition arising under conventional or customary international law, which is deemed to have primacy over national law and which defines certain conduct as criminal, punishable or prosecutable, or violative of international law. This minimum standard of legality has permitted the resort to the rule ejusdem generis [‘permitting analogy’] with respect to analogous conduct, as well as permits the application of penalties by analogy...’: Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 306.

³¹ Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 24–27. See also Broomhall, International Justice and the International Criminal Court (2003) 9–62. As Bassiouni has stated, ‘... the principles of legality in [international criminal law] ... are necessarily sui generis, because they must balance between the preservation of justice and fairness for the accused and the preservation of world order, taking into account the nature of international law, the absence of international legislative policies and standards, the ad hoc processes of technical drafting, and the basic assumption that [international criminal law] norms will be embodied into the national criminal law of the various states’: Crimes (2011) 304–305. Outside of the ICC regime, this state of affairs cannot be expected to change very quickly.

³² Ambos (1999) 10 CLF 1, 4; id. (2003) 14 CLF 225, 229–233; Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 23. See note 38 for the reference made to these terms in the confirmation of charges decision by Pre-Trial Chamber I in the case against Thomas Lubanga before the ICC.

³³ For example, Ambos discusses the application of the civil law-derived fourth element of ‘lex certa’ to Article 22 in a supple manner, notably because of the relative imprecision of certain crimes (e.g. ‘widespread, long term and severe damage’ to the environment (Article 8(2)(iv)): Treatise (2013), 92.

law required, permitted, or was silent as to the relevant conduct. Any objection based on prior legality or on the fact that national law did not prohibit the international crime in question at the time it was committed can only be the result of misunderstanding the principle's proper scope.³⁴ The international criminal law that has pertained to the 'core crimes' from the Charter and Judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal through the Rome Statute and up to the present is based on the principle that individual responsibility arises directly under international law. As such, the international principle of nullum crimen,³⁵ at least with respect to these crimes, does not require prohibition by national law. To allow otherwise would allow States to legislate their own agents out of their international responsibilities – something that the international community has deemed to be intolerable ever since Nuremberg.

Regarding the Statute's manifestation of the nullum crimen principle, article 22 is of limited application, and its scope is to be determined above all by reference to its wording. The article requires that conduct under consideration by the Court come within the definition of 'crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court' (mns 33) as interpreted narrowly in light of the corollary principles listed in article 22 (strict construction and the prohibition of extension by analogy),³⁶ and in principle bars a finding of criminal responsibility if it does not (mns 28). It does not apply to the rest of the Statute (e.g. to offences against the administration of justice, mns 34–35, or to article 87 para. 7 findings of non-cooperation), nor does it apply to the definition of crimes under international law outside the Statute (article 22 para. 3, mns 49–51). It should be noted, however, that the broader nullum crimen principle as it exists under general international law (mns 15–16) may come to bear before the ICC, as part of its applicable law defined by article 21, for purposes of interpreting other parts of the Statute (offences against the administration of justice, notably).³⁷

Like its counterpart under general international law, article 22 does not require that conduct be defined as criminal under the national law of any given State in order to give rise to criminal responsibility before the Court. Such a requirement would make the Court hostage to the legislative (in-)activity of States Parties, contrary to the fundamental conception of the ICC as a 'jurisdiction of last resort' in cases where States are ineffective.

Regarding the customary international law status of 'crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court', the situation is more complex. On the one hand, article 22 para. 1, in requiring that a given crime be within the jurisdiction of the Court, does not require that the Court determine that the crime in question gave rise to individual responsibility as a matter of customary international law at the time of its alleged commission, nor is any such duty imposed elsewhere in the Statute. On its face, article 22 requires only simple inclusion of a given crime in the Statute and the finding of temporal and other requisite aspects of jurisdiction. Indeed, Pre-Trial Chamber I, in its decision confirming the charges against Thomas Lubanga, found that the principle of legality was satisfied by the way in which the relevant crimes were included in the Statute.³⁸ Thus, one might anticipate that the ICC would not need to build on

³⁴ See Triffterer (1989) 60 RIDP 29, 60 for statements to the effect that national prohibition is required even with respect to 'core' international crimes in order for nullum crimen to be satisfied.

³⁵ On the application of the international principle of nullum crimen to any 'treaty crimes' incorporated into the Statute in future, see mn 54–58.

³⁶ Each of these corollaries is in turn subject to limited application (mn 36 et seq. and 40 et seq.).

³⁷ It has also been argued that international law allows criminalization of individual conduct by analogy in broader circumstances than does national law: Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 306. This could affect the application of nullum crimen as a principle of international law outside the scope of the Statute where it comes into play in accordance with article 21 (Applicable law) (see mn 50 et seq.).

³⁸ 'Having regard to the principle of legality, the terms enlisting, conscripting and using children under the age of fifteen years to participate actively in hostilities are defined with sufficient particularity in articles 8(2)(b)(xxvi) and 8(2)(e)(vii), 22 to 24 and 77 of the Rome Statute and the Elements of Crimes, which entered into force 1 July 2002, as entailing criminal responsibility and punishable as criminal offences. ... Accordingly, there is no infringement of the principle of legality if the Chamber exercises its power to decide whether Thomas Lubanga Dyllo ought to be committed for trial on the basis of written (lex scripta), pre-existing criminal norms approved by States Parties to the Rome Statute (lex praevia), defining prohibited conduct and setting out the related

the jurisprudence developed in other international and hybrid courts and tribunals since the seminal 1995 Tadić decision.³⁹

- 20 Such a conclusion would be misleading, however. First, the need to determine the customary law basis for the crimes contained in the Rome Statute might arguably be derived from the ‘treaty crime’/‘core crime’ distinction (mns 54–58) that led to the exclusion of the former from the Statute. The Statute was confined to the latter on the assumption that these would already be applicable to the accused, i.e. on the basis of custom. Moreover, as a matter of fairness, the need to determine the customary nature of Rome Statute crimes would arise where the Court was called upon to exercise its jurisdiction over crimes allegedly committed on the territory and by the nationals of non-States Parties, in the case either of a Security Council referral under article 13 para. b, or of an ad hoc acceptance of ICC jurisdiction under article 12 para. 3. In such scenarios, the only legitimate basis for establishing the criminal responsibility of individuals would presumably – in the absence of relevant national criminal prohibitions at the time of the alleged conduct – be that of customary law. In future, therefore, the Court may well consider the customary law nature of Statute crimes in such cases.⁴⁰ In so doing, the Court will presumably begin by reviewing the criteria developed for such an examination, most influentially by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.⁴¹ While the Statute does not expressly require this, the interests of justice, the human rights of the accused and the reputation of the Court all arguably rely upon it.
- 21 It is noteworthy that, while the nullum crimen principle under general international law is normally understood to include an element of notice (permitting an accused to have real or constructive knowledge that certain conduct was prohibited before the act alleged against him or her was committed) it appears that in the context of the Rome Statute this notice will arise under the separate provision on error of law (article 32).⁴²
- 22 Finally, given that nullum crimen acts as a principle of legislation as well as of interpretation (mn 10–11), it may be interesting to note that the Court is not given the power to strike down crimes of indeterminate scope. There is no ‘void for vagueness’ doctrine in the ICC. The absence of such a remedy for vagueness is presumably the result of both the general tendency towards limiting rather than expanding the power of the ICC judges vis-à-vis States Parties, and the feeling that States Parties as legislators could be trusted to delineate clearly the crimes which might ultimately be charged against their own agents.⁴³ The latter feeling is sentence (lex certa), which cannot be interpreted by analogy in malam partem (lex stricta)’, Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, paras. 302–303, citing Ambos, in: Haveman and Olusanya (eds.), Sentencing and Sanctioning in Supranational Criminal Law (2006) 17–22.

³⁹ See the sources at note 28.

⁴⁰ Indeed, while the Lubanga confirmation of charges decision relied primarily on inclusion of a sufficiently clear definition of the relevant crime within the Statute, it also went on to demonstrate that the relevant prohibition had emerged as a matter of international customary and treaty law before the alleged crimes of the accused had taken place: note 38, paras. 308–311. See also Schabas, Introduction (2011), 73–74; Meron (2005) 99 AJIL 817, 832; and in particular, Milanović (2011) 9 JICJ 25, 36–38.

⁴¹ The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY held that, in order for an offence to become subject to prosecution under article 3 of its Statute (Violations of the laws and customs of war), the following conditions had to be fulfilled: ‘(i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law; (ii) the rule must be customary in nature or, if it belongs to treaty law, the required conditions must be met ...; (iii) the violation must be ‘serious’, that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim. ...; (iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule’: Tadić, note 28, para. 94. This formulation remains the starting point for subsequent discussions, with the fourth criterion being determinative. In Tadić, the Appeals Chamber analysed the latter by looking at ‘State practice indicating an intention to criminalize the prohibition, including statements by government officials and international organizations, as well as punishment of violations by national courts and military tribunals’: ibid., para. 128 et seq. On the relationship between international treaty norms and individual criminal responsibility, see mn 54–58.

⁴² Lubanga (Confirmation of Charges), note 36, paras. 294–316.

⁴³ As one commentator has pointed out, this state of affairs has not prevented international judges from stepping in, as a matter of fact, to ‘legislate’ through gap-filling in the face of unclear norms: Van Schaack (2008–2009) 97 GLJ 199, 137, fn. 73 (discussing the first edition of this commentary).

given weight by the exhaustive attention paid to definitions during negotiations – a product, in large measure, of nullum crimen arguments (see mns 2–8). Proper judicial application of article 22 para. 2 should ensure, in any case, that vagueness is substantially reduced.

IV. Sources

As with most criminal law doctrine, the principle of legality and its corollaries originated 23 in domestic law. Its lineage can be traced back to Roman law, although in its modern manifestation it is a product of the Enlightenment. Its entrenchment as a cornerstone of national law took place over the course of the late 18th and 19th centuries.⁴⁴ By the start of the First World War, it was recognized in the legal systems of all developed countries and their dependent territories, although not always in the same way.

In particular, there was a major difference between common law jurisdictions – in particular 24 the United Kingdom – and Civil Code-based systems. For the former, the rule against retroactivity was a presumption which could be refuted by clear statutory wording. In the latter, the principle was more firmly adhered to. In the former, crimes could be developed by analogy as part of the gradual development of the law, while in the latter, such development was strictly limited to minor infractions. Its Constitution made the United States an exception among the common law systems, since retroactivity was constitutionally prohibited.⁴⁵

The movement from being a principle primarily of national law to being one clearly and 25 firmly entrenched in international law was a product of the Second World War and its aftermath. Between the wars, the principle was retreated from in some jurisdictions as totalitarian governments sought to extend the powers of a politicized judiciary by recognizing broad powers to criminalize by analogy.⁴⁶ The Nuremberg Tribunal, however, rejected defence arguments that ‘there can be no punishment of crime without a pre-existing law,’ holding that ‘the maxim nullum crimen sine lege is not a limitation on sovereignty [i.e. a binding rule of international law], but is in general a principle of justice,’ even as it justified its own proceedings on the basis that the defendants ‘should have known’ that they would be held accountable for their role in serious violations of international law.⁴⁷ Against this background, the War’s end led to the recognition of the principle of legality in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), the European Convention on Human Rights (1950) and, later, in the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights (1966) as well as other instruments.

Article 15 para. 1 of the ICCPR recognizes nullum crimen in its usual form as protecting 26 against retroactivity, and echoes article 11 para. 2 of the UDHR.⁴⁸ Article 15 para. 2 emphasizes that absence of criminal prohibition under national law is no bar to prosecution for conduct

⁴⁴ ‘Although there may have been ancient antecedents, the categorical insistence on advance legislative crime definition is clearly a modern phenomenon. In fact, the legality ideal is an explicit and self-conscious rejection of the historic methodology of the common law’: Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLR 189, 190. For the development, see also Glaser (1942) 24 JCLIL 29, and Triffterer, Untersuchungen (1966) 35 et seq. with further references.

⁴⁵ See generally Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 296–301; Krefß, in: Wolfrum (ed.), Max Planck Encyclopedia (2008-) para. 12.

⁴⁶ See Glaser (1942) 24 JCLIL 29, 32–33; Krefß, in: Wolfrum (ed.), Max Planck Encyclopedia (2008-) paras. 13–14.

⁴⁷ International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg), Judgment (1 October 1946), reprinted in (1947) 41 AJIL 172, 217 et seq. For analysis of this passage and the Nuremberg Tribunal’s approach to questions of non-retroactive punishment, see Van Schaack (2008–2009) 97 GLJ 199, 125–130; as well as Acquaviva (2011) 9 JICJ 881, who argues that the French version of the Nuremberg Judgment affirms, or comes close to affirming, nullum crimen as an international legal rule.

⁴⁸ The first sentence of ICCPR article 15 para. 1 reads: ‘No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed [emphasis added]’. But for using the word ‘penal’ instead of ‘criminal’, article 11 para. 2 of the UDHR is the same.

criminal under international law at the time of its commission.⁴⁹ Regional human rights instruments are similar in formulation to the ICCPR and UDHR,⁵⁰ with the European system providing the most elaborate jurisprudence.⁵¹ This stems from complaints related to the application of national criminal-law prohibitions and, like its ICTY counterpart,⁵² rests upon the fundamental requirements of the accessibility and reasonable foreseeability of the prohibitions in question.⁵³

- 27 When nullum crimen was brought to bear as a principle of legislation upon the processes of both the Preparatory Committee and Diplomatic Conference (mns 2–8), it offered negotiating States a means both of limiting exposure to the obligations imposed by the Statute and of fostering codification and development of the law, encouraging clear stipulation of procedural detail, exhaustive definitions of crimes, movement of general principles from the proposed Rules to the Statute, and much else.⁵⁴ This function of the principle was merely a continuation of its role in driving efforts to codify international criminal law through the work of the International Law Commission from 1946 onwards.⁵⁵ It similarly reflected a desire to forestall any repetition of the criticisms aimed at the Nuremberg Tribunal, which had already been taken into account in the establishment of the ICTY and ICTR.⁵⁶

⁴⁹ Article 15 para. 2 reads: ‘Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations’.

⁵⁰ The ACHR, article 9, reads in part: ‘No one shall be convicted of any act or omission that did not constitute a criminal offence, under the applicable law, at the time it was committed’. Article 7(2) of the African Charter of Human and Peoples’ Rights reads in turn: ‘No one may be condemned for an act or omission which did not constitute a legally punishable offence at the time it was committed’.

⁵¹ ECHR, article 7 para. 1: ‘No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed...’. Article 7 para 2 is substantially the same as article 15 para. 2 of the ICCPR, note 49. For the jurisprudence, see in particular European Court of Human Rights, Maktouf and Damjanović v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, Judgment (18 July 2013), application nos. 2312/08 and 34179/08, paras.65–76; European Court of Human Rights, Kononov v. Latvia, Judgment (17 May 2010), application no. 36376/04, paras.185–246; European Court of Human Rights, Streletz, Kessler and Krenz v. Germany, Judgment (22 March 2001), application nos.34044/96, 35532/97 and 44801/98, paras.49–107; European Court of Human Rights, C.R. v. the United Kingdom, Judgment (22 November 1995), Ser. A 335-C (1995), para. 34.

⁵² ‘The Tribunal ... must be satisfied that the criminal liability in question was sufficiently foreseeable and that the law providing for such liability must be sufficiently accessible at the relevant time for it to warrant a criminal conviction and sentencing under the heading of responsibility selected by the Prosecution’: Milutinović et al., Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanić’s Motion, note 28, para. 37.

⁵³ For a concise discussion of the European jurisprudence from the point of view specifically of the ‘precision’ factor, with comparison to the case law of the ICTY, see Nilsson, in: Olusanya (ed.), Rethinking (2007) 37; for a discussion of the European Court’s approach to article 7 para. 2 of the ECHR and the allegedly retroactive prosecution of international crimes, see Cassese (2006) 4 JICJ 410; see also Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 403.

⁵⁴ Wise, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 267, 271, concedes that nullum crimen may not require the definition of general principles in addition to those of crimes, but arrives at the same effect by speaking of more general ‘requirements of precision and certainty expected in criminal proceedings’. Criminal prohibitions under general international law have often been declared sufficiently precise and their incorporation by mere reference into national law satisfactory for purposes of the nullum crimen principle: see Paust, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 275, esp. 275–276 and 282–288. Article 22 para. 3 (mn 49–50) makes clear that the Statute will not affect such prohibitions (which will continue to apply, notably, to the agents of non-States Parties).

⁵⁵ Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Eighth Session, 6 May–26 July 1996, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/51/10 (1996), paras. 30–46, pp. 9–13. For the ICC process to 1996 in this context, see Wise, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 267. For views from a wide range of countries on codification efforts as they stood at the time, see generally Triffterer (1989) 60 RIDP 29.

⁵⁶ See Morris and Scharf, Insider’s Guide (1995) 39–42 and esp. 124–132, demonstrating that the ICTY Statute, being based on acknowledged customary law, satisfied the nullum crimen principle at the time of its establishment, and that the ICTR Statute, although initially less certain, soon did no more than reflect such custom.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. Criminal responsibility ‘under this Statute’

This clause indicates the consequences that will flow from a finding that any given conduct did not constitute, at the time it took place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. Such a finding would prevent conviction by acting as a bar to the imposition of criminal responsibility as defined in article 25, whether after an admission of guilt under article 65 or following a full trial, as provided for in Part 6. 28

Although article 22 para. 1 makes criminal responsibility the reference point with respect to the rule of non-retroactivity, objections based on the nullum crimen principle will in the normal course of events first be raised long before the conviction stage. The majority of article 22 para. 1 challenges are likely to be brought when the jurisdiction of the Court is being decided, either in challenges under article 19 or during hearings for the confirmation of charges under article 61.⁵⁷ 29

As for article 70 (Offences against the administration of justice), see mns 34–35. 30

2. ‘conduct in question’

‘Conduct’ may include both acts and omissions, as appropriate. An example of the latter can be found in article 28 para. 1 on command responsibility. Conduct will ‘constitute’ a crime when it comprises all the necessary elements of the crime, including the mental element under article 30. 31

3. ‘the time it takes place’

This stipulation requires that the Court determine that the conduct and the relevant prohibition (‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’) existed simultaneously. In the case of crimes arising from a continuing course of conduct, it will have to be shown that all the elements of the crime were present during the period in which the prohibition applied. 32

4. ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’

A ‘crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ is a crime listed in article 5, defined in articles 6–8 respectively (and to include article 8bis on the crime of aggression, once this enters into force), as interpreted in accordance notably with article 22 para. 2, article 9 (Elements of crime) and article 30 (Mental element).⁵⁸ The word ‘jurisdiction’ in the heading to article 5, is to be understood in its full sense as encompassing all articles that the Court would consider in making a jurisdictional ruling under article 19, including articles 10–13, 22, 24 and others (such a ruling might also include a determination as to whether given 33 charges constituted crimes under customary international law at the time of their alleged commission, mn 19–20).

⁵⁷ As was done in the Lubanga case: Lubanga, (Confirmation of Charges), note 36, paras. 290–216.

⁵⁸ Pre-Trial Chamber I has held that the Elements ‘[further] the nullum crimen sine lege principle ... by providing a a priori legal certainty on the content of the definition of the crimes provided for in the Statute’: Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, para. 131. Pre-Trial Chamber II has specified that its restrictive interpretation of article 30 – excluding ‘dolus eventualis, recklessness or any lower form of culpability’ from its scope – ‘aims to ensure that any interpretation given to the definition of crimes is in harmony with the rule of strict construction set out in article 22(2) of the Statute’ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, No. ICC-01/05-01/08, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute of the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 June 2009, para. 369.

- 34 A question arises whether article 22 applies only to crimes under article 5, or whether it encompasses offences against the administration of justice under article 70. The use of the words ‘criminally responsible’ and ‘crime’ in article 22 para. 1 makes clear that it includes only crimes under article 5. ‘Criminal responsibility’ is treated in article 25, where it expressly applies to ‘crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’. A ‘crime’ in this sense is one of those prohibited acts listed under article 5 (Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court) and defined in articles 6–8 as well as 8bis once it enters into force. The acts under article 70 (Offences against the administration of justice) are distinguished as ‘offences’ rather than ‘crimes’. Article 22 is therefore applicable by its own terms only to the crimes listed under article 5.
- 35 The non-applicability of article 22 to the offences against the administration of justice listed in article 70 should not be understood to imply that the Court will allow itself considerably greater latitude in interpreting these offences than it does with the crimes under article 5. As a principle of general international law (mn 15–16), nullum crimen applies to the article 70 offences by virtue of article 21 (applicable law). Moreover, the aims of justice served by the principle of legality (see mn 9–13) are just as applicable to situations involving such offences. As such, it is to be expected that the ICC judiciary will apply the more supple nullum crimen rule under general international law to proceedings under article 70 as well.

II. Paragraph 2

1. ‘The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed’

- 36 The requirement of strict construction of criminal statutes is said to form part of the nullum crimen principle. To that extent, its express inclusion here simply reassures States as to the moderation with which the Court will interpret its Statute.
- 37 The rule of strict construction aims to protect the person subject to investigation or prosecution by ensuring that the potential of infringing their liberty is restricted to legislatively and not to judicially defined crimes (see mns 10–11).
- 38 However, the formulation and status of the rule in common law jurisdictions is not free from uncertainty, and it has been irregularly applied.⁵⁹ Like the principle requiring the resolution of ambiguities in favour of the defence (see mns 46–48), which is sometimes treated as a part of the rule of strict construction, the rule is based on notions of fair warning to the subjects of potential criminal sanction and on an awareness of the inequality of power between the individual and (under municipal law) the State.⁶⁰ Strict construction does not, however, stand in the way of progressive judicial clarification of the contents of an offence.⁶¹
- 39 This paragraph applies only to the definitions of crimes in articles 6–8 (and 8bis, once it enters into force). The judges of the Court will therefore be entitled in other instances to apply more liberal methods of construction in giving effect to the object and purpose of the Statute. It should be noted, however, that the absence of a rule of strict construction applicable to the grounds for excluding criminal responsibility under article 31 does not mandate a boundless ‘liberal’ approach that would render admissible defences excluded by ⁵⁹ The rule is said to be applied in confirmation of decisions reached on other grounds: Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLR 189, 198–200, who adds (p. 219): ‘The rule [of strict construction] is still invoked, but so variously and unpredictably, and it is so often conflated with inconsistencies, that it is hard to discern widespread adherence to any general policy of statutory construction’. See also Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013), 67–69.

⁶⁰ Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 67.

⁶¹ European Court of Human Rights, C.R., note 49, para. 34: ‘Article 7 [of the ECHR, note 51,] cannot be read as outlawing the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case, provided that the resultant development is consistent with the essence of the offence and could reasonably be foreseen’. See the discussion in Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 30–33.

the Statute or by fundamental principles of international criminal law, such as the defence of prior legality under national law or that of superior orders beyond the terms of article 33. A rule of interpretation generous to the accused might arguably apply to other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility where, in particular, a reasonable person might rely upon such ground in deciding their course of conduct before the fact. The justification of self-defence may be the chief example.⁶²

2. No extensions by analogy

The prohibition on extension by analogy is shared by most modern legal systems. 40 Historically, it has been less rigorously observed in common law than in Civil Code-based jurisdictions, but there is apparently more convergence at present.⁶³ The rule arose during the era of liberal reform of criminal law doctrine in the early nineteenth century. It is today largely taken for granted.⁶⁴ It was the product of the perception that the common law had been unjust in allowing judges to define criminal acts by analogy to existing crimes, absent a statute or common law crime covering the conduct. It was felt that such a practice violated the nullum crimen principle, failed to give fair notice to potential accused, was retrospective and robbed the criminal law of its power to deter.

These policy grounds continue to define the purpose and scope of the rule. For the 41 Prosecutor to bring charges on previously unknown crimes on the basis of their similarity to known ones, and for the judges to confirm them, would be to apply the law retroactively against the individual concerned. The rule against analogy prevents nullum crimen being interpreted – as it has been – so as to allow this.

The prohibition on analogy bars its use as a basis for imposing criminal responsibility in 42 what amount to substantially new crimes. The intention of the drafters of the Statute was that additional crimes be brought within the jurisdiction of the Court only by the Assembly of States Parties; it was apparently the perceived willingness of the ICTY to engage in liberal reasoning-by-analogy that contributed, in part, to the adoption of article 22 para. 2.⁶⁵ That the ICC States Parties are slow to modify the definitions of crimes contained in the Statute, even in the face of pressing international need, does not give the judges the power to supplant the authoritative law-maker. While the scope of crimes at customary or treaty law beyond the realm of the Statute may potentially change (mns 49–50), the scope of the Court’s jurisdiction ratione materiae should not, barring deliberate action of the Assembly of States Parties.

The rule does not, however, bar all use of analogy in the process of interpretation. While 43 judges cannot properly pre-empt the decision of legislators by deciding what conduct is criminal and what is not, ‘where the judicial innovation is smaller, less controversial, and consistent with the pattern of legislative action, there is less risk of frustrating considered legislative choice’.⁶⁶ Analogy therefore remains a valid and indeed necessary tool with which to construe the definition of crimes within the Statute.

Like the rule of strict construction, analogy is in this respect an interpretative technique 44 used as the last in a series of steps. A judge will not assume that a statutory definition ⁶² For the argument that the rationale does not extend to excuses such as mental disease or intoxication, on the grounds that these are not based on the reasonable reliance of the putatively rational and autonomous legal subject, see Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 60; and Wise, in: Bassiouni, Observations (1997) 267, 272.

⁶³ See Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 299, fn.13. The United States has constitutional protections against ex post facto legislation, as well as against vagueness and ambiguity. Nevertheless, a residual judicial power to create offences was employed, with decreasing frequency, up to 1900. Judicial creation of new offences all but disappeared in the 20th century: Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLRev 189, 190–193. Canada eliminated common law offences (but for contempt of court) through 1955 reforms to its Criminal Code.

⁶⁴ ‘Penal legislation exists in such abundance that wholesale judicial creativity is simply unnecessary’: Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLRev 189, 202 (speaking of the United States).

⁶⁵ Schabas, Introduction (2011) 94.

⁶⁶ Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLRev 189, 205. See also Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 34–35; as well as Currat (2007) 20 RQDI 137, 152 (citing the first edition of this commentary).

contains gaps. If a reading of the ordinary meaning of the text in its context and in light of the object and purpose of the Statute reveals such a gap, however, she or he may use analogy to fill it by reference to other articles or to other paragraphs of the same article. Such a need might arise, for example, where a non-exhaustive list is provided, or where the Statute and the Elements of Crimes do not provide a clear explanation of the elements to be found on a particular set of facts. Such situations are bound to arise, and a narrow use of analogy is a standard interpretative tool with which to deal with them, without prejudice to the rights of the defence. The Statute expressly anticipates such a controlled use of analogy when it refers to ‘other inhumane acts of a similar character’ (article 7(1)(k)), and to ‘any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity’ (article 7(1)(g)).⁶⁷

- 45 As with the strict construction rule (see mn 39), the prohibition on extension by analogy applies only to the definitions of crimes. Whether its use will be appropriate in other circumstances will depend upon judicial interpretation of the terms of the Statute, the applicable law, and the principles to be applied in a given situation.

3. Case of ambiguity

- 46 That ambiguities be read in favour of the accused is an accepted consequence of the rule of strict construction (and of the overlapping maxim, in dubio pro reo – ‘when in doubt, favour the accused’). It is said to have had its origin in the presumption of common law judges in favorem vitae, used to ameliorate the effect of statutes requiring the death penalty. Like the rule of strict construction in general, the rule relating to ambiguities is neither uniformly held to nor clearly defined in national systems.⁶⁸
- 47 As with strict construction generally, the rule regarding ambiguities is one to be applied not as a first but as a final step in an interpretative sequence. Ordinary rules of interpretation apply with a presumption that negotiating States would not have intended an ambiguity. Once such a reading has revealed an ambiguity, the present rule will resolve it in favour of the defence.⁶⁹
- 48 Like the rule of strict construction and the prohibition on extension by analogy (mns 39 and 45), the requirement that ambiguities be resolved in favour of the person being investigated or prosecuted applies only with respect to the crimes in articles 6–8. Its application outside this context will depend upon the judges’ interpretation of the applicable law and relevant principles.

III. Paragraph 3

- 49 By ensuring that article 22 will not affect the characterization of any conduct as criminal under international law independently of the Statute, this paragraph makes clear that, while the nullum crimen principle is one of general international law, the effects of its particular embodiment in this article are limited to the Statute. This need not have been said, inasmuch as article 22 para. 1 clearly states that it applies to findings of criminal responsibility ‘under this Statute’. Nonetheless, article 22 para. 3 prevents any misconceptions that might arise as to whether the Statute exclusively codifies or exhausts international criminal prohibitions.

⁶⁷ For the application of the eiusdem generis principle to determine the contents of the crime against humanity of ‘other inhumane acts’ in the jurisprudence of the ICTY, see Nilsson, in: Olusanya (ed.), Rethinking (2007) 37, 58–59; see also Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga et al., No. ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 30 September 2008, para. 448; Ambos, Treatise (2013) 91; Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013), 34; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 409; and Van Schaack (2008–2009) 97 GLJ 199, 138–139.

⁶⁸ Jeffries (1985) 71 VirgLR 189, 219: ‘Some instances of exculpatory construction are necessary to avoid dangerous openness in the criminal law; others are not’. This commentator adds (pp. 220–222) that judges should consider resolving ambiguities so as to maximize the certainty of the law in question.

⁶⁹ Ashworth and Horder, Principles (2013) 68.

It will therefore remain the case that individual responsibility arises directly under international law as it did before the entry into force of the Statute, and that the principle of legality, as a principle of international law apart from article 22, will be applied with respect to the relevant crimes to determine their existence and their scope (mn 15 and 16). The existence of such prohibitions will be determined by national courts or international tribunals through the kind of reasoning developed in recent years in particular by the ICTY (and which will, mn 20, be adapted mutatis mutandis and in limited circumstances by the judges of the ICC). 50

Although the purpose of article 22 para. 3 is similar to that underlying article 10, the two provisions are clearly distinct in their scope and effect. Article 22 para. 3 applies to limit any perceptions as to the impact of article 22 alone; article 10 does so with respect to all of Part 2. Article 22 para. 3 applies only to the characterization of conduct as criminal under international law; article 10 applies to all existing and developing rules of international law insofar as the Statute might be thought to impact on them. Finally, article 10 is limited by the words ‘for purposes other than this Statute’. This merely emphasizes the mutual independence of the Statute and the general international law with respect to which it creates a kind of semi-autonomous regime establishing the ICC. Articles 10 and 22 para. 3 were inserted to prevent the perception that the Statute would rob general international law of its power to criminalize behaviour, or would narrow the scope of any such criminalization outside the ICC regime, such that non-States Parties could then claim a greater degree of impunity than would be the case had the Statute not been adopted at all. 51

C. Special remarks

I. Relationship between articles 11 para. 1, 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1

The wording of article 22 para. 1 bears a close resemblance to that in article 24 para. 1,⁷⁰ and the sense of each is to some degree coextensive with that of article 11 para. 1.⁷¹ Given the clear overlap in the sense of these provisions, there is little point in seeking out distinctions in application among them. Article 22 para. 1 focuses on the finding of criminal responsibility with respect to given conduct, which must constitute, ‘at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’. If ‘criminally responsible’ and ‘conduct’ invoke the Court’s jurisdiction ratione personae and ratione materiae, the reference to ‘time’ and ‘jurisdiction’ summon up other aspects. Article 24 para. 1 forbids imposition of criminal responsibility under the Statute for conduct prior to its entry into force. This reference to the non-retroactivity of the Statute is obviously encompassed by article 22 para. 1’s words ‘within the jurisdiction’. Article 24 para. 1 therefore has the virtue only of emphasizing the obvious. Moreover, articles 22 and 24 are contained in Part 3 (General principles of criminal law) of the Statute, while article 11 is under the logically prior Part 2 (Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law), and is therefore the definitive clause relative to temporal jurisdiction. 52

Although they are unlikely ever to make it onto the agenda of a Review Conference convened in accordance with article 123, in principle these overlapping provisions should eventually be harmonized. 53

II. Application of nullum crimen to treaty crimes

In the unlikely event that the Statute were amended at some future date to incorporate crimes set out in international treaties, nullum crimen as a principle of general international 54 law may be interpreted so as to impose special requirements with respect to such crimes. These latter requirements might then in turn call for the amendment of article 22 (mn 58).

⁷⁰ ‘No person shall be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute’.

⁷¹ ‘The Court has jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute’.

55 The ILC Draft adapted nullum crimen to the particular needs of treaty crimes in its article 39 (b). This provided that no accused would be held guilty of one of these crimes unless the treaty in question was applicable to his or her conduct at the time of the relevant act or omission. Thus, a specification of applicability was added to the prohibition on retrospectivity that article 39 (b) shared with article 39 (a) (mn 2). The ILC understood that for the nullum crimen principle to be satisfied in the case of treaty crimes, the conduct in question would not only have to come within the words of the treaty's prohibition, but the treaty itself would have to apply to the conduct of the accused through the relevant state(s) being party to the instrument and, crucially, through the prohibition having been made a part of the law of the relevant State Party.⁷²

56 This acknowledges that not all treaties which call for the prohibition of certain conduct also entail the internationally enforceable criminal responsibility of individuals, absent some form of incorporation of the international agreement into national law.⁷³ Agreements to prohibit conduct are relatively common between States, with the parties agreeing to penalize certain behaviour in their national legal systems and otherwise to cooperate in its suppression. Such 'suppression conventions' create law of a different sort from prohibitions directly entailing individual responsibility under general international law. With respect to treaty crimes, the ILC Draft intended in essence to provide international enforcement for national prohibitions. Under this vision, States would agree to the ICC as a supplementary enforcement mechanism, with no intention of creating – through the mere fact of inclusion of these crimes in the Rome Statute – international responsibility as such. Where the latter exists – for example, in the case of the 'core crimes' or 'international crimes sensu stricto' which originated in the Nuremberg Charter⁷⁴ – there is no need for the prohibition to be made applicable to the accused under national law (mn 16). But such a requirement does exist for many conventions including, to name but one, the 1988 Vienna Convention on Narcotic Drugs.⁷⁵

57 Thus conduct falling within a treaty prohibition may not entail individual criminal responsibility if the prohibition did not apply as law to the accused. The Court would have to decide in a given case whether the treaty in question was applicable to the individual. There is no single means by which international agreements come so to apply. Ratification and the passage of implementing legislation carrying the prohibition into national law is one, but not the only method. A State might not be party to a treaty or, being party, might not have made it part of domestic law.⁷⁶ A treaty prohibition may become applicable to an individual through the action of custom or through the application of 'general principles of law'. It may be applicable to an accused on more than one basis of jurisdiction (national, territorial, etc.), and the Court would have to examine each case individually to construe the intention of the drafters and to determine whether the treaty provisions were applicable to the conduct of the individuals in question either directly (through the intention of the parties

⁷² See the commentary to article 39 (b), ILC Draft, note 2, paras. 3–4, pp. 113–114.

⁷³ While international criminal law is in large measure derived from conventions, the majority of these 'do not meet the test of legality under contemporary standards of Western European legal systems' owing, inter alia, to the fact that it was foreseen that the prohibitions called for would be promulgated into national law in accordance with the principles of legality applicable under that law: Bassiouni, Crimes (2011) 303–304.

⁷⁴ The distinction between 'international crimes sensu stricto' entailing individual responsibility directly under international law (essentially the 'core' or 'Nuremberg' crimes) and 'international crimes sensu largo' not doing so (crimes under 'suppression conventions') was generally accepted at the meetings of the Association Internationale de Droit Pénal, reported in: Triffterer (1989) 60 RIDP 29, 40, 42, 52–53 and 69–70.

⁷⁵ 1994 ILC Report, note 1, para. 8, p. 68. The ILC gives the opinion that cases where a treaty definition of a crime is insufficient to make the treaty applicable to individuals, thereby giving rise only to State responsibility, are 'likely to be rare, and may be hypothetical ...': ibid., para. 4, pp. 113–114. This appears to be overstated: see note 77. The ILC acknowledged that it proposed to include in its Draft Statute '... treaties which explicitly envisage that the crimes to which the treaty refers are none the less crimes under national law': ibid., para. 3, p. 104.

⁷⁶ Ibid., para. 3, p. 113.

that the treaty so apply) or through the national implementing law or constitutional principles of the relevant states.⁷⁷ In the case that the treaty was intended only to entail State responsibility (i. e. for any failure to prohibit the conduct under national law),⁷⁸ and where the State or States in question failed to fulfil their obligation to make the norms in question applicable to individuals within their jurisdiction, the individual could not in principle be held criminally responsible on the basis of the treaty. In arriving at such a finding, ICC judges may have had to engage in extensive review of national law and constitutional principles, and might at least strongly imply that a given State had not fulfilled a treaty obligation to implement a given norm into national law. One can readily see how States would be disinclined to confer such a role on judges of the ICC.⁷⁹

In any event, article 22 in its present form is better suited to the ‘core crimes’ now listed in article 5 of the Statute. In the (unlikely) event that treaty crimes are ever incorporated into the Statute, article 22 will have to be amended to give expression to the requirement that the treaty be ‘applicable’ to the conduct of the accused, as foreseen in the International Law Commission (mn 55–56). Article 21 (Applicable law) might also have to be amended to provide an expanded role for national law where treaty crimes are concerned.

III. Aggression and terrorism

Two major developments regarding the substantive scope of international criminal law stricto sensu have recently occurred. One is the adoption of amendments to the Rome Statute adding the crime of aggression to the ‘crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’ listed in article 5.⁸⁰ The other is the controversial assertion by the Appeals Chamber of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon that terrorism now constitutes a ‘core crime’ giving rise to individual responsibility under customary international law (and not merely a ‘treaty crime’ requiring implementation into national law).⁸¹ Both developments raise questions relating to the nullum crimen principle.

Debate has arisen as to whether the amendments to the Rome Statute relating to the crime of aggression and adopted at the 2010 Kampala Review Conference are in conformity with the nullum crimen principle enunciated in Article 22.⁸² For some, the definition is unconscionably vague, with questions raised about the firmness and determinacy of the crime of aggression under customary law and of the jus ad bellum norms that underlie it; about the precision of the crime’s definition as formulated at Kampala, in particular with regard to its requirement that the ‘act of aggression, by its character, gravity and scale, constituted a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations;’ and about its potential ex post facto application to nationals of non-States Parties.⁸³ For others, the Kampala definition rests upon ⁷⁷ Such difficulties, as well as the fact that ‘in most cases, treaty provisions will only provide for the prohibition of a certain conduct, not for its criminalization, or the treaty provision itself will not sufficiently define the elements of the prohibition they criminalise’ may lead a court to prefer searching for a customary law basis either as well as or rather than an ‘applicable’ treaty, as the ICTY has done: see Prosecutor v. Stanislav Galić, No. IT-98-29-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 30 November 2006, para. 83; Prosecutor v. Dario Kordić & Mario Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 December 2004, paras. 41–42, 59–66; see also Nilsson, in: Olusanya (ed.), Rethinking (2007) 37, 57.

⁷⁸ 1994 ILC Report, note 2, para. 3, p. 113.

⁷⁹ For a critique of the ICTY jurisprudence treating the notion, first presented in Tadić (note 41), that individual criminal responsibility might arise from applicable treaty law alone (without it being a reflection of custom), see Milanović (2011) 9 JICJ 25, 42–45.

⁸⁰ ‘The Crime of aggression’, in: Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Official Records (Kampala, 31 May–11 June 2010), ICC Doc. No. RC/9/11, Part II: Resolutions and declarations adopted by the Review Conference, Resolution RC/Res.6, 17. For the details of these complex amendments, and the modalities governing their eventual entry into force, see the commentary elsewhere in this volume.

⁸¹ Special Tribunal for Lebanon, No. STL-11-01/I/AC/R176bis, Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law: Terrorism, Conspiracy, Homicide, Perpetration, Cumulative Charging, Appeals Chamber, 16 February 2011, para. 85.

⁸² See the discussion in Ambos, Treatise ICL II (2014), at 184 et seq., esp. 196–211.

⁸³ Glennon (2010) 35 YaleJIL 71; Paulus (2010) 20 EJIL 1117. The citation is from ‘The Crime of aggression’, note 80, at Annex II Amendments to the Elements of crimes, Element 5.

a customary basis to which State practice sufficiently attests, and its acknowledged vagueness is not so great that it cannot be left to judges for clarification.⁸⁴ One way of resolving the debate would be to demonstrate that the ‘manifest violation’ requirement – however vague in itself – merely serves to narrow the Rome Statute definition of aggression compared to that under customary law, thereby rendering it acceptable in terms of the ‘legality rights’ of defendants. Such an affirmation – with its assumption of agreement on the scope and status of the underlying customary crime – is most unlikely to generate consensus in the foreseeable future, however.⁸⁵ Given the remoteness of this crime’s eventual entry into force and prosecution, further comment at this time would only be speculative.

61 The argument of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon that terrorism now constitutes a ‘core crime’ of international criminal law rests largely on ‘nullum crimen’ assertions about the alleged clarity and determinacy of the offence. Writing for the Appeals Chamber, President Cassese repeated arguments developed in his respected textbook.⁸⁶ He asserts essentially that, in light of State practice (adoption and ratification of international treaties, adoption and application of national laws, international declarations, etc.) acts of international terrorism now give rise to international criminal responsibility directly under international law. Moreover, the persistent inability of States to adopt a general definition of this crime in negotiations on a proposed Comprehensive Convention against terrorism under United Nations auspices has not, in Cassese’s eyes, prevented the emergence of a general criminal norm prohibiting a clearly-defined set of conduct when committed in times of peace and with a transnational element.⁸⁷ If widely accepted, this argument would allow States Parties, if they so choose, to amend the Rome Statute to include an agreed-upon definition of the crime of terrorism (with consequential amendments as appropriate), without needing to confront the issues of ‘applicable law’ (mn 54–58) that were assumed to arise with respect to this crime when its inclusion was first proposed during the negotiation of the Statute.

62 The existence of an international ‘core crime’ of terrorism is far from attracting consensus, however. Commentators object in essence that international disagreement about the scope and content of an offence of terrorism is sufficient to prevent it from joining the ranks of the other ‘core crimes’ under customary international criminal law, that the Appeals Chamber lacked clear evidence of State will to impose individual criminal responsibility for a general crime of terrorism, and that it underestimated the implications of persistent disagreement over how to address crimes committed by those engaged in self-determination struggles (‘freedom fighters’) and by State forces.⁸⁸ It should be noted in conclusion that the Assembly of States Parties has not yet agreed on how to proceed on the issue of an eventual crime of terrorism. It set aside as premature the proposal of the Netherlands – made in the run-up to the 2010 Kampala Review Conference and ‘in light of the absence of a generally accepted definition of terrorism’ – to follow path taken with respect to the crime of aggression (listing of the crime of terrorism in article 5 para. 1 of the Statute and establishment of a working group to flesh out its definition).⁸⁹ As of mid-2012, the Assembly of States Parties has yet to adopt a process for dealing with this crime amidst ongoing concern that no agreed definition exists. In this light, the better view remains that the existence of international consensus on a ‘core’ crime of terrorism cannot be affirmed.

⁸⁴ Milanović (2012) 10 JICJ 165, responding to Glennon and Paulus, ibid., inter alia.

⁸⁵ See Milanović: ibid., 183–186.

⁸⁶ Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 146–157.

⁸⁷ Special Tribunal for Lebanon, Interlocutory decision, note 81, paras.85 (basic elements of supposed crime), 90 (transnational element), and 107 (times of peace).

⁸⁸ Ambos (2011) 24 LJI 655; Kirsch and Oehmichen (2011) 1 DurhamLRev 1; Saul (2012) Legal Studies Research Paper No. 12/64. See also Di Filippo (2008) 19 EJIL 533.

⁸⁹ ‘Report of the Working Group to the Review Conference’, Annex I of Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Official Records (eighth session, 18–26 November 2009), ICC Doc. No. ICC-ASP/8/20, Vol.I, paras.40–51 and Appendix III, Netherlands.

Article 23

Nulla poena sine lege

A person convicted by the Court may be punished only in accordance with this Statute.

Literature: D’Ascoli, S., Sentencing in International Criminal Law – The UN Ad Hoc Tribunals and Future Perspectives for the ICC (Oxford, Portland: Hart, 2011); Henham, R., ‘Developing Contextualized Rationales for Sentencing in International Criminal Trials – A Plea for Empirical Research’, (2007) 5 JICJ 757–778.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	5

A. Introduction/General remarks

The prohibition of retroactive penalties, known by the Latin phrase nulla poena sine lege, is usually approached in tandem with the prohibition of retroactive offences, nullum crimen sine lege. Together, the two are usually described as the ‘principle of legality’, although the two principles have to be distinguished in that nullum crimen refers to the existence of a – clearly and strictly defined – penal provision at the time of the commission of the respective conduct, while nulla poena to the punishment to be provided for by this penal provision. Thus, in other words, punishment (poena) presupposes a crime (crimen) and, therefore, the nulla poena principle is predicated on the nullum crimen principle¹. Article 23 provides for the nulla poena principle while the nullum crimen principle is dealt with in Articles 22 and 24 of the Statute and therefore commented upon in these provisions.

While it is generally agreed that nulla poena requires less than nullum crimen it is unclear what exactly is required by nulla poena. International law does not provide for precise guidance.² The international human rights instruments, in a non-derogable provision, prohibit the imposition of a criminal sanction that is heavier than the one applicable at the time the offence was committed,³ thereby establishing non-retroactivity regarding the punishment. Article 15(1) second clause ICCPR complements the prohibition of a retroactive (heavier) penalty with the lex mitior principle, i. e., the offender’s right to have the new penalty applied if it is lighter than the previous one. Human rights law is relatively silent, however, with regard to the precise determination of sentences. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights does not prohibit the death penalty in the case of ‘the most serious crimes ...’⁴. The European Court of Human Rights has ruled that capital punishment as well as a sentence of life imprisonment without any possibility of release constitutes inhuman or degrading treatment prohibited by article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁵ Thus, the other elements of nullum crimen, especial the lex certa element, are absent from *nulla poena*⁶.

¹ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), p. 271.

² Cf. Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), pp. 271 et seq.

³ On the death penalty, Al Nashiri v. Poland, no. 28761/11, § 577, 24 July 2014. On life imprisonment: Vinter and Others v. the United Kingdom [GC], nos. 66069/09, 130/10 and 3896/10, § 113, 9 July 2013; Öcalan v. Turkey (No. 2), nos. 24069/03, 197/04, 6201/06 and 10464/07, § 197, 18 March 2014; László Magyar v. Hungary, no. 73593/10, § 58, 20 May 2014.

⁴ Article 6(2) ICCPR, Article 2(1) ECHR.

⁵ International CCPR, 999 UNTS 171, entered into force 23 Mar. 1976, article 15 para. 1; ECHR, 213 UNTS 221, entered into force 3 Sept. 1953, article 7 para. 1; American Convention on Hum. Rts., 1144 UNTS 123, entered into force 18 July 1978, article 9. Also: Universal Declaration of Hum. Rts., GA Res. 217 A (III), UN Doc. A/810 (1948), article 11 para. 2.

⁶ For a different maximalist position see Dana, in: Klip et al., Liber Amicorum Prakken (2004), pp. 350 et seq. (applying the four attributes of nullum crimen, including lex certa and stricta, to nulla poena); see for this view also Ambos, Treatise on ILC II (2014), pp. 276-7.

- 3 This uncertainty is also confirmed by the customary law of war crimes. It recognizes that penalties may include death or such lesser punishment as a court might deem appropriate⁷. The principle was codified in the IMT Charter, which authorized the Nuremberg court to impose upon a convicted war criminal ‘‘death or such other punishment as shall be determined by it to be just’’⁸. Given that the offences set out in article 6 of the Rome Statute correspond by and large to customary law, it would seem relatively clear that there can be no problem with the nulla poena rule, as far as war crimes, crimes against humanity (including genocide) and aggression (crimes against peace) are concerned. The ICTY Appeals Chamber has rejected arguments that claim the nulla poena principle is violated because the ICTY Statute does not set out precise sentences, as is the case in some national codes. According to the Chamber, the Statute ‘does not require that the law prescribes a precise penalty for each offence depending on the degree of gravity. Be it a common law system or a civil law system, it is not the case that national legislation anticipates every possible offence with a prescribed sentence. On the contrary, it is a fact that a penal code frequently prescribes a range for sentencing with regard to an offence; that is, it often sets out both the maximum and minimum sentences. Within the range, judges have the discretion to determine the exact terms of a sentence, subject, of course, to prescribed factors which they have to consider in the exercise of that discretion’⁹.

Moreover, there is no need to prescribe a minimum penalty because ‘‘an accused must have been aware that the crimes for which he is indicted are the most serious violations of international humanitarian law, punishable by the most severe of penalties’’¹⁰. In the only sentencing judgments of the ICC so far the Lubanga Trial Chamber only mentions nulla poena but does not elaborate on it¹¹; the Appeals Chamber does not even mention the principle.¹² In Katanga, the majority of the Trial Chamber refers to the ‘principle of legality’ as a principle to be followed in imposing sentence, citing article 23 of the Statute in the footnote.¹³

- 4 During early efforts by the ILC and the General Assembly to draft a statute for an international criminal court, it was sometimes argued that precise sentencing norms were required, similar to those often found in domestic penal codes. A 1951 proposal from the ILC for the Draft Code of Offences Against The Peace and Security of Mankind that said the penalty ‘shall be determined by the tribunal exercising jurisdiction over the individual accused, taking into account the gravity of the offence’¹⁴ was challenged as being contrary to the principle *nulla poena sine lege*¹⁵. The Romanian jurist Vaspașian V. Pella said that the ⁷ Levie, Terrorism In War – The Law Of War Crimes (1992) 264–266; Schabas (1997) 60 Albany LJ 736; id., The Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (3rd ed., 2003) 235–258.

⁸ Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis, London, 8 Aug. 1945, 8 UNTS 279, Annex, Charter of the International Military Tribunal (8 Aug. 1945), article 27.

⁹ Prosecutor v. Kunarać et al., Case No. IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 372.

¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Blaškić, Case No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 29 July 2004, para. 681. Also: Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2001, paras. 817–818. Issues concerning the nulla poena sine lege principle have arisen before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in the context of referral proceedings of cases to the courts of Bosnia and Herzegovina as part of the Tribunal’s completion strategy. The law in force at the time the alleged acts were committed provided for maximum sentences of twenty years’ imprisonment, or capital punishment. New legislation, enacted in 2004, and upon which the national prosecutions are based, allows for a maximum sentence of forty-five years’ imprisonment. Judges at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia have rejected arguments based upon the principle of legality, saying this is a matter to be dealt with by the courts of Bosnia and Herzegovina: Prosecutor v. Stanković, Case No. IT-96-23/2-PT, Decision on Referral of Case Under Rule 11bis, 17 May 2005, paras. 42–45; Prosecutor v. Janković, Case No. IT-96-23/2-PT, Decision on Referral of Case Under Rule 11bis, 22 July 2005, paras. 27–32.

¹¹ ICC, TC I, Prosecutor v. Lubanga, Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute, 10 July 2012, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, para. 18.

¹² ICC, AC, Prosecutor v. Lubanga, Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the ‘Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute’, 1 December 2014, ICC-01/04-01/06 A 4 A 6.

¹³ Prosecutor v. Katanga, Décision relative à la peine (article 76 du Statut), 23 May 2014, ICC-01/04-01/07, para. 39.

¹⁴ 2 YbIL C 134 et seq. (1951), UN Doc. A/1858, para. 59. Also: 1951 Draft Statute Report, paras. 110–111.

¹⁵ 1953 Draft Statute, para. 118.

nulla poena sine lege principle applied to international criminal law as much as to domestic law ‘par la force de l’équité et de la raison’¹⁶. However, a General Assembly committee was unimpressed with the criticism although it agreed ‘that it would be desirable that the court, in exercising its power to fix penalties, should take into account the penalties provided in applicable national law to serve as some guidance for its decision’¹⁷.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

The Draft Statute submitted by the ILC to the General Assembly in 1994 contained a general 5 sentencing provision, allowing for terms of detention up to life imprisonment, a specified period of incarceration, and a fine. In fixing the sanction, the Court was invited to consider the law of the State of which the offender was a national, the State where the crime was committed, and the State with custody of and jurisdiction over the accused¹⁸. These references to national law echoed provisions in the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals¹⁹ that had been inserted out of consideration for the nulla poena rule²⁰. The reference to national legal standards was eventually dropped by the Working Group on Penalties during the drafting of the Rome Statute²¹. The ILC’s 1996 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind was somewhat more laconic, and did not specify any precise penalties, saying only that ‘punishment shall be commensurate with the character and gravity of the crime’²². The accompanying commentary explained that it was ‘not necessary for an individual to know in advance the precise punishment so long as the actions constitute a crime of extreme gravity for which there will be severe punishment. This is in accord with the precedent of punishment for a crime under customary international law or general principles of law as recognized in the Nürnberg Judgment and in article 15 para. 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights’²³ (and, we can add, in Article 7(2) ECtHR, the so-called Nuremberg clause).

In the Ad Hoc Committee of the General Assembly, which met during 1995, the view was 6 expressed that a procedural instrument enumerating rather than defining the crimes might not respect *nulla poena sine lege*²⁴. Article 47 of the ILC Draft Statute was criticized as being in conflict with nulla poena, some delegates stating that minimum as well as maximum penalties were required²⁵. There was also a suggestion that the Statute include detailed provisions concerning sentencing of minors, aggravating or attenuating circumstances, cumulative penalties for multiple crimes, although some delegations expressed support for the more flexible approach reflected in the ILC Draft Statute²⁶. The Working Group on General Principles of the Preparatory Committee, which met in February 1997, proposed a text recognizing the norm nullum crimen sine lege. It did not speak directly to the nulla poena portion of the principle of legality except indirectly, stating that ‘[c]onduct shall not be construed as criminal and sanctions shall not be applied under this Statute by a process of analogy’²⁷.

¹⁶ 2 YbIL C 314 (1950). See also: Pella (1952) RGDIP 337.

¹⁷ Supra note 16. See also: Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, Troisième rapport de J. Spiropoulos, rapporteur spécial, UN Doc. A/CN.4/85; UN Doc. A/CN.4/SR.268, paras. 45, 52.

¹⁸ ILC Report on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session, UN Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A/1994/Add.1, Vol. II, article 47.

¹⁹ Statute of the ICTY, UN Doc. S/RES/827, Annex (1993), articles 24 and 25. See: Schabas (1997) DukeJComp&IL 461.

²⁰ Corell et al., Proposal for an International War Crimes Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1993) 68–69.

²¹ Report of the Working Group on Penalties, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGP/L.14, p. 4.

²² 1996 ILC Draft Code, pp. 29–30.

²³ Ibid. See also Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (1966) 92 et seq., in particular 139.

²⁴ Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 57, p. 11.

²⁵ Ibid., para. 187, p. 36.

²⁶ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 304, p. 63. Also: ibid., para. 180, p. 41; ibid., para. 189, p. 43.

²⁷ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, Annex II, p. 18, para. 1; UN Doc. A/AC.249/1997/WG.2/CRP.1.

- 7 Midway through the Diplomatic Conference, on 1 July, Mexico proposed that the Working Group on Penalties adopt a provision stating the nulla poena rule: ‘No penalty shall be imposed on a person convicted of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, unless such penalty is expressly provided for in the Statute and is applicable to the crime in question’²⁸. Mexico felt that the provision could be placed either in Part 2, in tandem with the nullum crimen provision (article 21 in the Draft, which was renumbered to article 22 in the Rome Statute), or in Part 6, as part of the sentencing provision (article 74). The Mexican text was subsequently reformulated by the chair of the Working Group, who felt it belonged with article 21: ‘Nulla poena sine lege. A person convicted by the Court may be punished only as provided under this Statute’²⁹. The proposal appeared to be uncontroversial and enjoyed broad support. However, its adoption was stalled for some time by the debate on capital punishment. The text proposed by the Chair was adopted by the Working Group on Penalties accompanied by a footnote: ‘The Working Group draws the attention of the Drafting Committee to the possibility of including this provision as a separate article or as a provision of article 21’³⁰. The Drafting Committee agreed that the nulla poena text belonged in the general principles section, and that it should be placed immediately after the nullum crimen provision³¹.
- 8 Concern with the nulla poena principle is expressed in the Rome Statute not only in the specific provision, article 23, but also throughout the sentencing provisions of Part 7. The Statute does not set specific penalties for the four offences, opting instead for a series of general provisions applicable to the four crimes that make up the Court’s subject matter jurisdiction. Thus, the Statute specifies the terms of imprisonment and the criteria for their imposition, as well as the possibility of fine and forfeiture of proceeds, the role of time served prior to sentencing, and the treatment of multiple sentences. Aggravating and mitigating circumstances have been developed in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. With this the Statute offers more than the law of the Ad Hoc Tribunals and, a fortiori, meets the standards of international law (cf. supra mn. 3).
- 9 Article 23 serves as a limit on the discretionary powers of the Court, which cannot impose punishment that is not set out in the Statute, or provided in accordance with its delegated legislation, and specifically the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. It also prevents States Parties from imposing additional punishment upon those who have already been convicted by the Court. The ramifications of this remain to be determined, but offenders may argue that civil sanctions such as deprivation of the right to vote, or prohibition of holding office, constitute additional punishment and are therefore prohibited by article 23³². Thus, in sum, Article 23 reaffirms the international practice in that it contains the lex praevia and lex scripta attributes of the principle of legality but it does not demand certain (lex certa) and strictly construed (lex stricta) sentences³³.

²⁸ Proposal submitted by Mexico, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGP/L.4.

²⁹ Chairman’s Working Paper on Article 21*bis*, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGP/L.8. See also: UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.24, para. 33; UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.26, para. 31.

³⁰ Supra note 21, Report of the Working Group on Penalties, Add.1, p. 1, fn. 1.

³¹ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.65/Rev.1, p. 2.

³² A square-bracketed provision in the Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 120 contemplated allowing the Court to impose disqualification from public office, but was dropped by the Working Group on Penalties at an early stage of its work (note 21, p. 2).

³³ cf. Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), p. 273.

Article 24

Non-retroactivity ratione personae

1. No person shall be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute.

2. In the event of a change in the law applicable to a given case prior to a final judgment, the law more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted shall apply.

Literature: Meltzer, B.D. ‘War Crimes: The Nuremberg Trial And The Tribunal For The Former Yugoslavia’, (1996) 30 ValULRev 895; Shklar, J., Legalism: Law, Morals and Political Trials (Harvard University Press 2nd edition 1986).

Content

A. General remarks	1
1. Functions in relation to articles 22 and 23	3
2. History	9
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	12
I. Paragraph 1	12
1. Acts and omissions prior to the entry into force	12
2. Moment of occurrence and ‘continuing violations’	13
II. Paragraph 2	21
1. ‘Change in the law’; rationale	21
2. Persons entitled to the benefit of more favorable law	23

A. General remarks

Article 24 forms part of the provisions establishing the requirements of legality as a ‘General Principle of Criminal Law’ governing the Court. The other provisions are article 22, principle nullum crimen sine lege, and article 23, principle nulla poena sine lege. As one author has summarized:

‘Articles 22– 4 of the ICC Statute go beyond the generally recognized lex praevia and lex certa components of the principle of legality. These articles provide a comprehensive conceptualization of nullum crimen, including all four of its elements generally recognized in civil law jurisdictions As a result, one can only be punished for a certain conduct if this conduct has been criminalized by written law (lex scripta) in a clear and unambiguous manner (lex certa) at the time of commission (lex praevia); the law must not be applied to similar conduct by analogy (lex stricta).’¹

Article 24 para. 1 embodies the element of lex praevia. The Draft Statute prepared by the ILC subsumed these elements together under the broader title ‘Principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)’², reflecting the ‘centrality of the nullum crimen principle in the debates about international criminal jurisdiction’³. The difficulty in applying this principle in international law has been recognized, in contrast to domestic law where the sources of law are more determinate⁴. In the present Statute, its several aspects have been unbundled,

¹ Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 90.

² 1994 ILC Draft Statute (Part 2), in: 2 YbILC (1994), Part Two. See Advisory Opinion No. 65, Consistency of Certain Danzig Legislative Decrees with the Constitution of the Free City, 1935 P.C.I.J. (Ser. A/B), No. 65 (holding the nullum crimen principle as required under domestic constitutional law). See, generally, Shklar (1986); Bassiouni, The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (1994) 19, 132; Rehnagel, The Maxim of Nulla Poena Sine Lege: A Historical and Comparative Legal Study (1959); Fisch (1997) 110 HarvLRev 1055; Borchers (1997) 60 AlbLRev 653.

³ Crawford (1995) 89 AJIL 404.

⁴ Meltzer (1996) 30 ValULRev 895. Recalling the plea against the ‘strict and automatic application of the principle against retroactivity’, he states that the ‘rule has flourished in comparatively well-developed legal systems but not in primitive or immature one’.

namely ascertaining the legally binding character of the norm itself, article 22; the specificity of the obligation and of the consequences of its breach, articles 22 and 23; and, finally, its applicability to the acts in question or its opposability vis-à-vis the defendant ratione temporis, article 24, or the lex praevia.

- 2 The Court's jurisdiction ratione personae is established generally in article 1, 'jurisdiction over persons', and article 25, 'jurisdiction over natural persons'. Its jurisdiction ratione temporis is established in article 11, 'only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute' and, vis-à-vis a State that becomes a Party after the Statute has entered into force, 'only with respect to crimes committed after [its] entry into force ... for that State'. As will be discussed below, the ratione temporis requirements have also been referred to by international criminal tribunals as the rule against ex post facto laws, which embodies the prohibition against the retroactive application of laws, recognized in domestic constitutions as an indispensable element of the right of the accused to the due process of law⁵. The difference, however, is that these tribunals, and the Statute as well, cast the rule as a requirement of legality – which focuses on whether a norm has been embodied by the community in valid laws and enforced through legitimate institutions – and not as a right of the accused⁶ – which focuses on whether the individual is treated fairly and is able to know beforehand whether his acts are lawful⁷.

1. Functions in relation to articles 22 and 23

- 3 Accordingly, the rationale of article 24 para. 1 is distinct from that of articles 22 and 23. This distinction can be drawn from judgments of earlier international criminal tribunals, all of which significantly have been ad hoc in character and established ex post facto. Consistently, it has been held that the nullum crimen sine lege principle was satisfied as long as the act for which the defendant is charged was punishable as a crime by law at the time it was committed, and that the ex post facto exercise of jurisdiction was deemed merely a question of procedure that did not detract from the legality of the proceedings.
- 4 The International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was established in 1945⁸, yet the Indictments⁹ all pertained to acts prior to its establishment¹⁰. The Tribunal, responding to the ex post facto argument, stated that the 'maxim nullum crimen sine lege is not a limitation of sovereignty but is in general [merely] a principle of justice'. This principle was deemed satisfied as long as there was no criminalization ex post of acts already committed, thus focusing on the lex scripta requirement of the principle of legality but construing it rather liberally.¹¹

'The Charter is not an arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the victorious nations, but ... the expression of international law existing at the time of its creation, and to that extent is itself a contribution to international law. [...]

In interpreting the words of the pact, it must be remembered that international law is not the product of an international legislature, and that such international agreements ... have to deal with general principles of law, and not with administrative matters of procedure. The law of war is to be

⁵ See, e.g., Kobrick (1987) 87 ColumbiaLR 1515–1538 (stating the 'fair warning' and the safeguard against 'legislative vindictiveness' rationales).

⁶ These are covered elsewhere in the Statute, inter alia in articles 55 and 67.

⁷ See also Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16 Nov. 1998, paras. 402–407, which affirms this requirement ('nullum crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege are well recognised in the world's major criminal justice systems as being fundamental principles of criminality') but distinguishes national from international law ('different methods of criminalisation of conduct in national and international criminal justice systems').

⁸ Charter of the International Military Tribunal (6 Oct. 1945), annexed to the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis (8 Aug. 1945), 82 UNTS 279 (London Agreement).

⁹ Indictment, International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, U.S. Dept. of State, TWC 23, Dept. of State Pub. No. 2420 (1945).

¹⁰ The Indictments included for all Counts include wording like, '... during a period of years preceding 8th May, 1945' or 'between 1st September, 1939, and 8th May, 1945' or 'since 1st September, 1939'. Ibid.

¹¹ Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 89 ('in a somewhat loose fashion' through 'judicial creativity').

found not only in treaties, but in the customs and practices of states which gradually obtained universal recognition, and from the general principles of justice applied by jurists and practiced by military courts. This law is not static, but by continual adaptation follows the needs of a changing world. Indeed, in many cases treaties do no more than express and define for more accurate reference the principles of law already existing¹².

The jurisdiction of the Tokyo War Crimes Tribunal¹³ was likewise challenged on the 5 ground that the 'provisions of the Charter [were] ex post facto' legislation and therefore illegal¹⁴. The Tribunal rejected the challenge, stating that the 'law of the Charter is decisive and binding on the Tribunal'¹⁵ and stating its 'unqualified adherence'¹⁶ to the Nuremberg reasoning. Even the dissenting opinion, which found the Charter inconsistent with the nullum crimen principle, would ask only whether the acts were already punishable by law at the time they were committed but not the power of the Tribunal to try acts committed prior to its creation¹⁷. The dissent refers to the Charter which 'clearly intended to provide a court for the trial of offenses ... in respect of past acts' – asking '[w]hether it is within the competence of the [Charter] so to define the crimes'¹⁸. It concludes: 'If however, it refers to the right to 'define the law "such 'court is to administer", I respectfully [dissent]'¹⁹.

The Tribunal's verdict was subsequently challenged before the U.S. Supreme Court, and 6 was upheld²⁰. The dissenting opinions focused on whether the offenses charged constituted a crime recognized by law²¹. These tribunals thus focused on the lex scripta pertaining to existence of the rule that criminalizes an act, but not the lex praevia element pertaining to when the act was committed.

More recently, however, the ICTY has been presented with the issue. Its Statute similarly 7 provides for retroactive jurisdiction²², but the travaux préparatoires merely reaffirm the principle that nullum crimen sine lege required the Tribunal to apply only such 'rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law'²³, and was silent on retroactive jurisdiction. This issue, however, was confronted in one preliminary study which, affirming the established notion on the nullum crimen principle, suggests the test of foreseeability²⁴ which is central to the fairness approach²⁵. But the authors proceeded to distinguish the element of lex from the mere 'procedural' question of which court may try the acts²⁶. They concluded that nullum crimen is satisfied provided 'no act is criminal unless

¹² The Trial of Major War Criminals: Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal- Nuremberg (HMSO, London, 1950, Pt. 22).

¹³ International Military Tribunal for the Far East (Judgment, 1 Nov. 1948), implementing the Cairo Declaration of 1 Dec. 1943, the Declaration of Potsdam of 26 July 1945, the Instrument of Surrender of 2 Sept. 1945, and the Moscow Conference of 26 Dec. 1945.

¹⁴ International Military Tribunal for the Far East (Judgment, 1 Nov. 1948), in: Pritchard and Zaide, (eds.), 20 The Tokyo War Crimes Tribunal 48 (1981) 436 a.

¹⁵ Id., 48, 435.

¹⁶ Id., 48, 439.

¹⁷ The Dissenting Opinion of the Member from India (B. Pal Rabhabinod), note 14, 21 The Tokyo War Crimes Tribunal.

¹⁸ Id., 33.

¹⁹ Id., 51–53.

²⁰ Hirota v. MacArthur, 338 U.S. 197 (20 Dec. 1948). The jurisdiction of military commissions to try Japanese war criminals was challenged in Yamashita v. Styer, 327 U.S. 757 (4 Feb. 1946).

²¹ See for instance, Murphy, note 15, dissenting, and J. Rutledge, dissenting, in Yamashita.

²² Statute of the ICTY, annexed to the Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Res. 808 (1993), at article 1, 'committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991', and article 8, 'The temporal jurisdiction of the International Tribunal shall extend to a period beginning on 1 January 1991'.

²³ Report of the Secretary-General, note 20.

²⁴ Proposal for an International War Crimes Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia under the CSCE Moscow Human Dimension Mechanism to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia (by Rapporteurs Corell/Turk/Thune), UN Doc. S/25307 (9 Feb. 1993).

²⁵ Ibid., p. 52, citing the Rapporteurs' earlier report on Croatia.

²⁶ Ibid., pp. 54–55.

this is laid down by law and no act be punished unless punishment is prescribed by law²⁷. Finally, this issue was squarely addressed by the ICTY itself, which reconciled retroactive jurisdiction with nullum crimen using the ‘fair trial guarantees’ under article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights²⁸. ‘[W]hat is important is that it be set up by a competent organ in keeping with the relevant legal procedures, and that it observes the requirements of procedural fairness’²⁹.

- 8 In conclusion, the dominant approach is to emphasize the prospective character of legislative power, while accepting the retroactive character of judicial power. Hence the focus of the decisions on the lex scripta element of the nullum crimen sine lege principle, which is covered in articles 22 and 23, rather than the lex praevia, which is covered in article 24 para. 1. Stated otherwise, while these related articles all have a temporal aspect, articles 22 and 23 pertain to the punishability of crime, while article 24 para. 1 pertains to the occurrence of the conduct itself. While articles 22 and 23 preclude the retroactive application of legislative power, article 24 para. 1 limits the retroactive exercise of judicial power to the applicable date of entry into force.

2. History

- 9 The principle of the non-retroactivity of criminal law, broadly construed, is embodied in a number of international instruments, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights³⁰, the ICCPR³¹, the European Convention on Human Rights³², and the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War³³. The requirement of a ‘competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law’ has been codified in the ICCPR³⁴ and the Human Rights Committee, in interpreting this clause, has recognized ‘serious problems’ with ‘special courts’ – though referring solely to the trial of civilians – that allow ‘exceptional procedures’ that fall below the ‘strict guarantees of the proper administration of justice’³⁵.
- 10 Two antecedent documents contain articles that closely track the current article 24 para. 1. The ILC Draft Code³⁶ contains an article on ‘Non-retroactivity’ as regards ‘acts committed before its entry into force’³⁷. However, the clause appears in a criminal code, making non-retroactive legislation rather than a court’s exercise of jurisdiction. As stated above, the ILC Draft Statute contains a separate article entitled ‘Principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)’. Consistent with the established pattern, the Commentary³⁸ on this article addresses the retroactivity of legislation but not of the exercise of jurisdiction.
- 11 The Preparatory Committee’s Draft Statute³⁹ contains articles on ‘Temporal Jurisdiction’ (which barred jurisdiction unless the ‘crime was committed after the date of entry into

²⁷ Ibid., p. 41.

²⁸ Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 Oct. 1995. See also Prosecutor v. Krajisnik, Case No. IT-00-39-PT, Decision on Motion Challenging Jurisdiction—with Reasons, Trial Chamber, 22 Sept. 2000; Prosecutor v. Vojislav Seselj, Case No. IT-03-67-PT, Decision on the Accused’s Requests for an Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice, 15 Dec. 2004.

²⁹ Id. See also Proposal for an International War Crimes Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia under the CSCE Moscow Human Dimension Mechanism to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, UN Doc. S/25307 (1993), citing Articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR.

³⁰ Article 11.

³¹ See mn 7.

³² Article 7.

³³ Article 99.

³⁴ See mn 7.

³⁵ General Comment No. 13 of the Human Rights Committee of the ICCPR (Twenty-first session, 1984), in: Bassiouni, The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice (1994) 19, 132.

³⁶ ILC Report on the Work of its Fortieth Session, UN Doc. A/43/10, in: (1988) 2 YbILC, Part Two, UN Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A/1988/Add.1 (Part 2).

³⁷ Article 8.

³⁸ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, note 1.

³⁹ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft.

force⁴⁰) and on 'Non-Retroactivity' (which barred jurisdiction for 'conduct committed prior to its entry into force'⁴¹). Both articles are based on the same concept as the present article 24 and limit the reach of jurisdiction to acts committed as of a certain date.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. Acts and omissions prior to the entry into force

Article 24 refers to 'conduct prior to the entry into force', not 'conduct committed ...'. The word 'committed' is not used specifically in order to cover both acts and omissions. The Preparatory Committee's Draft Statute had expressly covered both acts and omissions in a separate article entitled 'Actus reus (act and/or omission)⁴². Because this draft article has not been included in the Statute, the culpability of omissions has been incorporated into the definition of specific crimes, i. e., as substantive rather than general (or structural) provisions. An example is the principle of command responsibility, which pertains to the 'failure to take all necessary and reasonable measures ... to prevent or repress the [...] commission of crimes'⁴³ or 'failure to exercise control properly over [...] subordinates'⁴⁴.

2. Moment of occurrence and 'continuing violations'

Certain acts may be committed prior to the entry into force but have effects that continue even afterwards. At the same time, certain acts may be commenced prior to the entry into force but may be deemed to be 'continued' afterwards. This issue was addressed, though in the context of state responsibility and not of individual criminal responsibility, by the European Court of Human Rights, which distinguished between a 'continuing situation [and] an instantaneous act' and recognized 'the notion of a continuing violation of the Convention and its effects as to temporal limitations of the competence of Convention organs'⁴⁵.

This issue has also arisen before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, whose Statute provides, in article 7 (Territorial and Temporal Jurisdiction), that its jurisdiction 'shall extend to a period beginning on 1 January 1994 and ending on 31 December 1994'⁴⁶. In several cases, the defendants sought to exclude ratione temporis allegations pertaining to the period prior to 1994. The Trial Chamber allowed such pre-1994 allegations that 'provide[d] a relevant background and a basis for understanding the accused's alleged conduct in relation to the Rwandan genocide of 1994'⁴⁷ and which 'may have probative or evidentiary value' to subsidiary or interrelated allegations⁴⁸. However, the Appeals Chamber

⁴⁰ Article 8.

⁴¹ Article 22.

⁴² Article 28, Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, note 37.

⁴³ Article 28 para. 1.

⁴⁴ Article 28 para. 2.

⁴⁵ Loizidou v. Turkey, Judgment (Merits), App. No. 00015318/89, 18 Dec. 1996. See also Case Comment, Loizidou v. Turkey, (Merits), No. 40/1993/435/514, ECtHR, 18 Dec. 1996, (1997) 91 AJIL 532.

⁴⁶ UN Doc. S/RES/955, Establishment of an International Tribunal for Rwanda and adoption of the Statute of the Tribunal, 8 Nov. 1994.

⁴⁷ The Prosecutor v. Ngeze, Case No. ICTR-97-27-I, Decision on the Prosecutor's Request for Leave to Amend the Indictment, 5 Nov. 1999, para. 3. For a full discussion of this point, see van den Herik, The Contribution of the Rwanda Tribunal for the Development of International Law (2005).

⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Case No. ICTR-96-11-T, Decision on the Prosecutor's Request for Leave to File an Amendment Indictment, 5 Nov. 1999, para. 28.

affirmed that ‘an accused [may] not be held accountable for crimes committed prior to 1994’, and that these events may not be referred to ‘except for historical purposes or information’⁴⁹.

Significantly, a concurring opinion by Judge Mohamed Shahabuddeen said that evidence about pre-1994 crimes may be received in the following situations: (a) to draw inferences with regard to intent to commit crimes committed within the limits of the temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal; (b) to establish a ‘pattern, design or systematic course of conduct by the accused’; and (c) with regard to a conspiracy agreement made prior to but continuing in the period of 1994, to show that the parties constantly renewed their agreement with acts contemplated by the conspiracy⁴⁸. Another separate opinion by Judges Lal Chand Vohrah and Rafael Nieto-Navia interpreted the Tribunal’s temporal jurisdiction restrictively, recognizing that it is difficult to apply restrictions ratione temporis to ‘continuing or inchoate’ crimes such as conspiracy of incitement because these are based ‘not just [on] one defined event occurring on a specific date but upon a series of events or acts which [take] place over an extended period of time’⁵⁰.

- 15 In another ICTR case, a Trial Chamber held that ‘inchoate offenses that culminate in the commission of acts in 1994’ fall within the Tribunal’s jurisdiction ratione temporis due to the ‘continuing nature of a conspiracy agreement’, and applied this as well to the crime of incitement. The Chamber excluded only those ‘acts completed prior to 1994’⁵¹.
- 16 In 2009, the ICTR Appeals Chamber held that the ‘temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal do[es] not preclude the admission of evidence on [pre-1994] events’ in the case of continuing crimes. Accordingly, the Chamber may still admit such evidence if these are ‘relevant and of probative value and there is no compelling reason to exclude it.’ However, ‘where [the] conduct commenced before 1994 and continued during that year, a conviction may be based only on that part of such conduct having occurred in 1994’⁵².
- 17 The European Court of Human Rights has held that enforced disappearances are continuing crimes, and persist until such time as the victim’s fate or whereabouts is known. Even if the initial disappearance transpired before the critical date of its ratione temporis jurisdiction, the Eur. Ct. H.R. has held that it had jurisdiction so long as the violation continued up until the critical date⁵³. The court further held, however, that even if a complaint is based on a continuing crime, the action must still be brought to court within a reasonable time⁵⁴.
- 18 The Human Rights Committee has recognized that it has jurisdiction over a disappearance, even if it occurred before the critical date of its ratione temporis jurisdiction provided the State committed any further action that would constitute ‘a confirmation of the enforced disappearance’. Although the Committee found it had no jurisdiction ratione temporis over the actual death of the victim, the state had subsequently failed to investigate the death, and to prosecute those responsible in a just and speedy trial, all of which transpired after the victim’s death⁵⁵.
- 19 The Inter-American Court of Human Rights⁵⁶ has enumerated the human rights violations that were continuing in character, inter alia, forced disappearances, the absence of an

⁴⁹ Prosecutor v. Ngeze and Nahimana, Decision on the Interlocutory Appeals, 5 Sep. 2000, p. 6. See also Aloys Simba v. The Prosecutor, Case No. ICTR-01-76-AR72.2, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Regarding Temporal Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 29 July 2004 (affirming Prosecutor v. Ngeze and Nahimana).

⁵⁰ Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, note 47,.

⁵¹ Ibid., Joint Separate Opinion of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah and Judge Rafael Nieto-Navia, para. 7.

⁵² Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, Case No. ICTR-99-52-T, Judgment and Sentence, Trial Chamber, 3 Dec. 2003.

⁵³ Varnava and others v. Turkey, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), App No. 16064/90, European Court of Human Rights, 18 Sept. 2009, affirmed in Sulygov and others v. Russia, Judgment, App Nos. 42657/07, 53679/07, 311/08, 424/08, 3375/08, 4560/08, 35569/08, 62220/10, 3222/11, 22257/11, 24744/11, 36897/11, European Court of Human Rights, 9 Oct. 2014.

⁵⁴ Varnava and others v. Turkey, n. 53.

⁵⁵ Sankara et al. v. Burkina Faso, Communication No. 1159/2003, UN Doc. CCPR/C/86/D/1159/2003, 28 March 2006. See also Surat Davud Oglu Huseynov v. Azerbaijan, Communication No. 2042/2011, UN Doc. CCPR/C/111/D/2042/2011, 21 July 2014.

⁵⁶ Rio Negro Massacres v. Guatemala, Judgment of 4 September 2012, Preliminary objection, Merits, Reparations and Costs, Series C No. 250, IACtHR, 4 Sept. 2012. See also Blake v. Guatemala, Judgment of July 2, 1996, impartial and effective investigation into the facts of this case, the adverse effects on the personal integrity of the next of kin and survivors in relation to investigation of the facts, and the failure to identify those who were executed and disappeared.

As regards omissions, however, article 24 is not helpful in ascertaining the moment of occurrence for the purpose of determining whether it was ‘prior to the entry into force’ of the Statute. On the other hand, fixing the moment of the omission, as with the problem of defining the omission itself, can be determined in relation to the substantive obligation itself. For instance, as regards the omissions mentioned above, the critical moments are when the crimes were actually committed by the forces under the officer’s command and when the officer should have taken the ‘measures’ or acts of ‘control’ for which he or she is being held accountable.

II. Paragraph 2

1. ‘Change in the law’; rationale

Article 24 para. 2 prohibits the retroactive application of more severe legislation. It derives from the Preparatory Committee’s Draft Statute which states: ‘If the law as it appeared at the commission of the crime is amended prior to the final judgment in the case, the most lenient law shall be applied’. It is akin to articles 22 and 23, which bar the retroactive application of legislation.

While the Nuremberg and Tokyo verdicts used both terms – nullum crimen and ex post facto – interchangeably, it is this article which is equivalent to the domestic law rule against ex post facto laws⁵⁷, which is defined as follows:

‘A law that impermissibly applies retroactively, esp. in a way that negatively affects a person’s rights, as by criminalizing an action that was legal when it was committed’⁵⁸.

Its rationale is that the community may punish persons only for acts which it has declared by law to be evil. That moral judgment must be transformed into a specific obligation with defined consequences for its breach. This article accepts the reality that the community may change that moral judgment. But it can do so only through law, i. e., via legislation of general application. When that more severe morality becomes a law while a person is being tried, and that law is applied to him or her, the community’s judgment in that context loses its general character. The danger therefore is that, when a community decides to punish an offense more sternly, a parliamentary act can effectively ‘target’ an individual and thus partake of a judicial character, and the law, though general on-its-face, becomes a bill of attainder⁵⁹ as applied. On the other hand, focusing on the fairness standard, an ex post facto law fails the test of foreseeability⁶⁰ in that the individual is unable to know beforehand the full consequences of his act, and can be held to account only under the terms by which the act was punishable at the time it was committed.

2. Persons entitled to the benefit of more favorable law

However, Article 24 para. 2 actually requires the retroactive application of ‘the law more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted, convicted’, embodying the element of lex mitior.⁶¹ There are two aspects to the temporal requirements for the application of the Preliminary Objections, Series C No. 27, IACtHR, 2 July 1996; Serrano-Cruz Sisters v. El Salvador, Preliminary Objections, Judgment of November 23, 2004, Series C No. 118, IACtHR, 23 Nov. 2004.

⁵⁷ E. g., U.S. Const., article I § 9.3 states DukeJComp&IL: ‘No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed’. See also Bassiouni (1993) 3 235.

⁵⁸ Garner and Black (eds.), Black’s Law Dictionary (Thomson West 9th edition 2009) 661.

⁵⁹ Id. defines bills of attainder as: ‘1. A special legislative act that imposes a death sentence on a person without a trial. 2. A special legislative act prescribing punishment, without a trial, for a specific person or group’ (188).

⁶⁰ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, note 35.

⁶¹ See Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 90.

lex mitior. The first is that there must be ‘a change in the law applicable to a given case prior to a final judgement.’ The second is that, by extending the lex mitior to ‘the person being ... convicted’, this provision can be invoked at any stage of the proceedings, provided the first requirement is met, that is to say, even after the person has been convicted, provided that the finding of guilt is still susceptible to or, or subject of, an Appeal under article 81.

Article 25

Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute.

2. A person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute.

3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

- (a) Commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;
- (b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;
- (c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;
- (d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:
 - (i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or
 - (ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;
- (e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide;
- (f) Attempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions. However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

3bis. In respect of the crime of aggression, the provisions of this article shall apply only to persons in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State.

4. No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.

Literature: Agbor, A. A., 'The Substantial Contribution Requirement: The Unfortunate Outcome of an Illogical Construction and Incorrect Understanding of Article 6(1) of the Statute of the ICTR', (2012) 12 ICLRev 155; id., 'The Problematic Jurisprudence on Instigation under the Statute of the ICTR: The Consistencies, Inconsistencies and Misgivings of the Trial and Appeal Chambers of the ICTR', (2013) 13 ICLRev 429; Ambos, K., 'Tatherrschaft durch Willensherrschaft kraft organisatorischer Machtapparate', (1998) 145 GA 226; id., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute', (1999) 9 CLF 1; id., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Criminal Law', in: McDonald, G.K. and Swaak-Goldman, O. (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law, Vol. I: Commentary (Kluwer Law International 2000) 1; id., 'Beihilfe durch Alltagshandlungen', (2000) 32 JA 721; id., 'Verbrechenselemente' sowie Verfahrens- und Beweisregeln des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', (2001) 54 NJW 405; id., 'Immer mehr Fragen im internationalen Strafrecht', (2001) 21 NSZ 628; id., 'Superior Responsibility (Art. 28)', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 805; id., 'Other Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility', in: ibid. (OUP 2002) 1003; id., 'Some Preliminary Reflections on the Mens Rea Requirements of the Crimes of the ICC-Statute and of the Elements of Crimes', in: L.C. Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man's Inhumanity to Man – Essays in Honour of A. Cassese (Kluwer Law International 2003) 11; id., 'Zwischenbilanz im Milosević-Verfahren', (2004) 59 JZ 965; id., La parte general del derecho penal internacional (Temis 2005); id., 'Remarks on the General Part of International Criminal Law', (2006) 4 JICJ 660; id., 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility', (2007) 5 JICJ 159; id., 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision', (2009) 22 LeidenJIL

715; id., 'Amicus Curiae Brief in the Matter of the Co-Prosecutors' Appeal of the Closing Order Against Kaing Guek Eav 'Duch' Dated 8 August 2008', (2009) 20 CLF 353; id., 'Command Responsibility and Organisation-sherschaft', in: A. Nollkaemper and H. van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality in International Law (CUP 2009) 127; id., 'What does "Intent to Destroy" in Genocide Mean?', (2009) 91 IRevRC 833; id., The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court (Springer 2010); id., 'The Crime of Aggression after Kampala', (2010) 53 GYbIL 463; id., 'Zur Organisation bei der Organisationsherrschaft', in: M. Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 80. Geburtstag am 15. Mai 2011 (De Gruyter 2011) 837 [in spanish: 'Sobre la "organización" en el dominio de la organización', (julio de 2011) (3/2011) In Dret (Revista para el análisis del derecho) 25 et seq., <www.indret.com>]; id., 'The Fujimori Judgment: A President's Liability for Crimes against Humanity as Indirect Perpetrator by Virtue of an Organized Power Apparatus', (2011) 9 JICJ 137; id., 'Some Considerations on the Eichmann Case', in: K. Ambos et al. (eds.), Eichmann in Jerusalem – 50 Years After (Duncker & Humblot 2012) 123; id., 'The First Judgment of the International Criminal Court (Prosecutor v. Lubanga): A Comprehensive Analysis of the Legal Issues', (2012) 12 ICLRev 115; id., 'A Workshop, a Symposium and the Katanga Trial Judgment of 7 March 2014', (2014) 12 JICJ 219; id., 'The ICC and Common Purpose: What Contribution is Required Under Article 25(3)(d)?', in: C. Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court: A Critical Account of Challenges and Achievements (OUP 2015) 592–607; Ambos, K. and Malarino, E. (eds.), Jurisprudencia latinoamericana sobre derecho penal internacional (KAS 2008); id., 'Adolf Eichmann', in: W. Schabas (ed.), The Cambridge Companion on International Criminal Law (CUP 2016) 275–294; Ambos, K. and Njikam, O., 'Charles Taylor's Criminal Responsibility', (2013) 11 JICJ 789; Ambos, K. and Othman, M. (eds.), New Approaches in International Criminal Justice: Kosovo, East Timor, Sierra Leone and Cambodia (MPIL 2003); Ambos, K. and Wirth, S., 'The Current Law of Crimes Against Humanity: An Analysis of UNTAET Regulation 15/2000', (2002) 13 CLF 1; American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries, Part. I, Vol. II (1985); Ashworth, A., 'The Scope of Criminal Liability for Omission', (1989) 105 LQRev 424; id., Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (Hart Publishing 2013); Bartel, R., 'Two Cheers for the ICTY Popovic Et Al. Appeals Judgement: Some Words on the Interplay between IHL and ICL', (2015) EJIL:TALK!, <<http://www.ejiltalk.org/two-cheers-for-the-icty-popovic-et-al-appeals-judgement-some-words-on-the-interplay-between-ihl-and-icl/>>, accessed 9 February 2015; Berster, L.C., Die völkerstrafliche Unterlassungsverantwortlichkeit (Herbert Litz 2008); id., 'Duty to Act and Commission by Omission in International Criminal Law', (2010) 10 ICLRev 619; Boed, R., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility for Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of Additional Protocol II Thereto in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda', (2002) 13 CLF 293; Blumenstock, T. and Pittman, W., 'Prosecutor v. Naser Orić: The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia Judgment of Srebrenica's Muslim Wartime Commander', (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 1077; Burchard, C., 'Ancillary and Neutral Business Contributions to "Corporate-Political Core Crime" – Initial Enquiries Concerning the Rome Statute', (2010) 8 JICJ 919; Burghardt, B., Die Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit im völkerrechtlichen Straftatsystem (BWV 2008); Caro, C., 'Prosecuting international crimes in Peru', (2010) 10 ICLRev 583; Cassese, A., 'The Proper Limits of Individual Responsibility under the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise', (2007) 5 JICJ 109; id. and Members of the Journal of International Criminal Justice, 'Amicus Curiae Brief of Professor Antonio Cassese and Members of the Journal of International Criminal Justice on Joint Criminal Enterprise Doctrine', (2009) 20 CLF 289; Černić, J.L., 'Shaping the Spiderweb: Towards the Concept of Joint Commission through another Person under the Rome Statute and Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Court', (2011) 22 CLF 539; Clapham, A., 'Extending International Criminal Law beyond the Individual to Corporations and Armed Opposition Groups', (2008) 6 JICJ 899; Coco, A., and Gal, T., 'Losing Direction. The ICTY Appeal Chamber's Controversial Approach to Aiding and Abetting in Perisic', (2014) 12 JICJ 345; Cryer, R., 'Imputation and Complicity in Common Law States. A (Partial) View from England and Wales', (2014) 12 JICJ 267; Danner, A.M. and Martinez, J.S., 'Guilty Associations: Joint Criminal Enterprise, Command Responsibility and the Development of International Criminal Law', (2005) 93 CallRev 75; DeFalco, R.C., 'Contextualizing Actus Reus under Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute – Thresholds of Contribution', (2013) 11 JICJ 715; Dencker, F., Kausalität und Gesamttat (Duncker & Humblot 1996); id., 'Beteiligung ohne Täter', in: C. Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen zum 70. Geburtstag (2002) 525; Di Martino, A., 'Täterschaft und Teilnahme im Statut des IStGH und Anpassungsbedarf der italienischen Regelung', (2007) 119 ZStW 430; Dreher, E., 'Der Paragraph mit dem Januskopf', in: K. Lackner et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Wilhelm Gallas zum 70. Geburtstag (De Gruyter 1973) 307; Duttwiler, M., 'Liability for Omission in International Criminal Law', (2006) 6 ICLRev 1; Eldar, S., 'Indirect Co-Perpetration', (2014) 8 CrimL&Philos 605; Eser, A., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility (Art. 25)', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 767; Eser, A., Lagodny, O. and Triffterer, O., Alternative General Part <http://www.department-ambos.uni-goettingen.de/index.php/component?option=com_docman&Itemid,56/gid,142/task,cat_view/> accessed 10 February 2014; Farrell, N., 'Attributing Criminal Liability to Corporate Actors – Some Lessons from the International Tribunals', (2010) 8 JICJ 873; Finnin, S., Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability. Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2012); Fletcher, G.P., 'New Court, Old Dogmatik', (2011) 9 JICJ 179; Fletcher, G.P. and Ohlin, J.D., 'Reclaiming Fundamental Principles of Criminal Law in the Darfur Case', (2005) 3 JICJ 539; Gil Gil, A. and Maculan, E., 'Current Trends in the Definition of "Perpetrator" by the ICC: From the Decision of the Confirmation of Charges in the Lubanga case to the Katanga Judgment', (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 349; Graven, J., 'Les crime contre l'humanité', (1950) 76 RCADI 433; Goy, B., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility before the International Criminal Court', (2012) 12 ICLRev 1; Greenawalt, A., 'Rethinking Genocidal Intent: The Case for a Knowledge-Based Interpretation', (1999) 99 CollRev 2259; Greenwood, C., 'Command Responsibility and the Hadžihasano-vić Decision', (2004) 2 JICJ 598; Haan, V., 'The Development of the Concept of Joint Criminal Enterprise at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', (2005) 5 ICLRev 167; id., Joint Criminal Enterprise: Die Entwicklung einer mittäterschaftlichen Zurechnungsfigur im Völkerstrafrecht (Duncker & Humblot 2008); Hale, K. and Cline, D., 'Holding Collectives Accountable', (2014) 25 CLF 261; Hamdorf, K., Beteiligungsmodele im Strafrecht. Ein Vergleich von Teilnahme- und Einheitstätersystemen in Skandinavien, Österreich und Deutschland (Ed. iuscrim 2002); Heller, K.J., 'Retreat from Nuremberg: The Leadership Requirement in the Crime of Aggression', (2007) 18 EJIL 477; id., 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', in: K.J. Heller and M.D. Dubber (eds.), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (SUP 2011) 593; Herzig, A., 'Die Täterschaftslehre in der Rechtsprechung des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', (2013) 4 ZIS 189; Heyer, A.K., Grund und Grenze der Beihilfstrafbarkeit im Völkerstrafrecht – Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Entwicklung eines Wirtschaftsvölkerstrafrechts (Books on Demand 2013); Hinek, S., 'The Judgment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in Prosecutor v. Pavle Strugar', (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 477; Jain, N., Perpetrators and Accessories in International Criminal Law – Individual Modes of Responsibility for Collective Crimes (Hart 2014); Jakobs, G., Theorie der Beteiligung (Mohr Siebeck 2014); Jescheck, H.-H., 'Die internationale Genocidium-Konvention vom 9. Dezember 1948 und die Lehre vom Völkerstrafrecht', (1954) 66 ZStW 193; Jessberger, F. and Geneuss, J., 'On the Application of a Theory of Indirect Perpetration in Al Bashir', (2008) 6 JICJ 853; Jones, J., 'Whose intent is it anyway?', in: L.C. Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man's Inhumanity to Man – Essays in Honour of A. Cassese (Kluwer Law International 2003) 467; Jones, J.R.W.D., Heller, K.J. and van Sliedregt, E., 'Milestones in International Criminal Justice: Recent Legal Controversies at the UN Yugoslav Tribunal' (2013) <<http://www.chathamhouse.org/sites/files/chathamhouse/public/Meetings/Meeting%20Transcripts/161013Yugo-slavl.pdf>> accessed 22 October 2014; Jordash, W., 'Joint Criminal Enterprise Liability – Result Orientated Justice', in: W.A. Schabas et al. (eds.), The Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law-Critical Perspectives (Ashgate 2013) 133; Kacker, D., 'Coming Full Circle: The Rome Statute and the Crime of Aggression', (2010) 33 SuffolkTransatl.Rev 257; Kearney, M.G., 'Any other Contribution? Ascribing Liability for Cover-Ups of International Crimes', (2013) 24 CLF 331; Kolb, R., 'Droit international pénal', in: id. and D. Scalia (eds.), Droit International Penal (Helbig und Lichtenhahn 2nd edition 2012), 1; Kremnitzer, M., 'A Possible Case for Imposing Criminal Liability on Corporations in International Criminal Law', (2010) 8 JICJ 909; Krefß, C., 'Die Kristallisation eines Allgemeinen Teils des Völkerstrafrechts: Die Allgemeinen Prinzipien des Strafrechts im Statut des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', (1999) 12 HuV-I 4; id., 'Claus Roxins Lehre von der Organisationsherrschaft und das Völkerstrafrecht', (2006) 153 GA 304; id., 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent', (2005) 3 JICJ 562; Kunz, J.L., 'The United Nations Convention on Genocide', (1949) 43 AJIL 732; Laucci, C., Digest of Jurisprudence of the Special Court for Sierra Leone 2003–2005 (2007); Lemkin, R., 'Genocide as a Crime under International Law', (1947) 41 AJIL 145; Manacorda, S. and Meloni, C., 'Indirect Perpetration versus Joint Criminal Enterprise: Concurring Approaches in the Practice of International Criminal Law?', (2011) 9 JICJ 159; Mantovani, F., 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law: The viewpoint of a national criminal lawyer', (2003) 1 JICJ 26; Marsh, L. and Ramsden, M., 'Joint Criminal Enterprise: Cambodia's Reply to Tadić', (2011) 11 ICLRev 137; Marxen, K., 'Beteiligung an schwerem systematischem Unrecht. Bemerkungen zu einer völkerstrafrechtlichen Straftatlehre', in: K. Lüderssen (ed.), Aufgeklärte Kriminalpolitik oder Kampf gegen das Böse?, iii: Makrodelinquenz (Nomos 1998) 220; Meyer, F., 'Multinationale Unternehmen und das Völkerstrafrecht', (2013) 131 SchwZStR 56; Milittello, V., 'The personal nature of individual criminal responsibility and the ICC Statute', (2007) 5 JICJ 941; Mitgutsch, I., 'Die Beteiligungsregelung des Römischen Statuts im Lichte der jüngsten Rechtsprechung des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', in: C. Geisler et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Geyfert (De Gruyter 2011) 357; Murmann, U., 'Problems of Causation with Regard to (Potential) Actions of Multiple Protagonists', (2014) 12 JICJ 283; Nserere, D.N., 'Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2002) 4 NordJIL 497; Obote-Odora, A., 'Complicity in Genocide as Understood through the ICTR Experience', (2002) 2 ICLRev 301; Ohlin, J.D., 'Three Conceptual Problems with the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise', (2007) 5 JICJ 69; id., 'Joint Criminal Confusion', (2009) 12 NCLRev 406; id., 'Searching for the Hinterman. In Praise of Subjective Theories of Imputation', (2014) 12 JICJ 325; Ohlin, J.D., van Sliedregt, E. and Weigend, T., 'Assessing the Control-Theory', (2013) 26 LeidenJIL 725; Olásolo, H., 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and its Extended Form: A Theory of Co-Perpetration giving rise to Principal Liability, A Notion of Accessorial Liability, or a form of Partnership in Crime?', (2009) 20 CLF 263; id., The Criminal Responsibility of Senior Political and Military Leaders as Principals to International Crimes (Hart Publishing 2009); Osiel, M., 'The Banality of the Good: Aligning Incentives against Mass Atrocity', (2005) 105 CollRev 1751; Park, G., Rechtsnatur, Konkrete Voraussetzungen und Legitimität der Beteiligungsform gemäß Art. 25 Abs. 3 lit. (d) IStGHs (Duncker & Humblot 2016 [forthcoming]); Pelletier, H. and Perfetti, J., Code Pénal 1997–1998 (Litec 10th edition 1997); Piacente, N., 'Importance of the JCE Doctrine for the ICTY Prosecutorial Policy', (2004) 2 JICJ 448; Provost, R., 'Amicus Curiae Brief on Joint Criminal Enterprise in the Matter of the Co-Prosecutors' Appeal of the Closing Order against Kaing Guek Eav "Duch" Dated 8 August 2008', (2009) 20 CLF 331; Rackow, P., Neutrale Handlungen als Problem des Strafrechts (Peter Lang 2007); Radtke, H., 'Mittelbare Täterschaft kraft Organisationsherrschaft im nationalen und internationalen Strafrecht', (2006) 153 GA 350; Rayfuse, R., 'The Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind: Eating Disorders at the International Law Commission', (1997) 8 CLF 43; Robinson, P.H., 'Criminal Liability for Omissions: A Brief Summary and Critique of the Law in the United States', (1984–1985) 29 NYLSchLRev 101; Rotsch, T., 'Einheitstäterschaft' statt Täterschaft (Mohr Siebeck 2009); id., 'Neues zur Organisationsherrschaft', (2005) 25 NSiZ 13; Roxin, C., Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil, i: Grundlagen. Der Aufbau der Verbrechenslehre (C.H. Beck 4th ed. 2007); id., Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil, ii: Besondere Erscheinungsformen der Straftat (C.H. Beck 2003); id., 'The Dogmatic Structure of Criminal Liability in the General Part of the Draft Israeli Penal Code – A Comparison with German Law’, (1996) 30 IsLRev 60; id., ‘Organisationsherrschaft als eigenständige Form mittelbarer Täterschaft’, (2007) 125 SchwZStR 1; id., ‘Organisationssteuerung als Erscheinungsform mittelbarer Täterschaft’, in: K. Amelung et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Volker Krey zum 70. Geburtstag am 9. Juli 2010 (Kohlhammer 2010) 449; id., ‘Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures’ (2011) 9 JICJ 193; Sadat, L.N. and Jolly, J.M., ‘International Criminal Courts and Tribunals – Seven Canons of ICC Treaty Interpretation: Making Sense of Article’s 25 Rorschach Blot’, (2014) 27 LeidenJIL 755; Saland, P., ‘International criminal law principles’, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute. Issues, Negotiations, Results (Kluwer Law International 1999) 189; Satō, H., ‘International Criminal Responsibility Concerning “Control over an Organization” and Command Responsibility’, (2012) 12 ICLRev 293; Schabas, W.A., ‘General Principles of Criminal Law in the International Criminal Court Statute (Part III)’, (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 400; id., The Crime of Genocide in the Jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, in: H. Fischer et al. (eds.), International and National Prosecution of Crimes Under International Law (Berlin Verlag Arno Spitz 2001) 447; id., The UN International Criminal Tribunals (CUP 2006); Schünemann, B., Grund und Grenzen der unechten Unterlassungsdelikte (Schwartz 1971); id., ‘Schrumpfende Basis, wuchernder Überbau? – Zum Schicksal der Täterschaftsdoktrin nach 50 Jahren’, in: M. Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 80. Geburtstag am 15. Mai 2011 (De Gruyter 2011) 799; Sereni, A., ‘Individual Criminal Responsibility’, in: F. Lattanzi (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Comments on the Draft Statute (Editoriale Scientifica 1998) 139; Spinedi, M. and Simma, B., United Nations Codification of State Responsibility (Oceana 1987); Stahn, C., ‘Justice Delivered or Justice Denied? The Legacy of the Katanga Judgment’, (2014) 12 JICJ 809; Stegmiller, I., The Pre-Investigation Stage of the ICC (Duncker & Humblot 2011); Stewart, J.G., ‘The End of “Modes of Liability” for International Crimes’, (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 165; id., ‘The Important New Orthodoxy on Complicity in the ICC Statute’, 21 January 2015, <<http://jamesgstewart.com/the-important-new-orthodoxy-on-complicity-in-the-icc-statute/>> (last visited 31 January 2015); Stewart, M.J., ‘How Making the Failure to Assist Illegal Fails to Assist: An Observation of Expanding Criminal Omission Liability’, (1998) 25 AmJCrImL 385; Stree, W. and Bosch, N., ‘Vorbemerkungen zu den §§ 13 ff.’, in: A. Eser et al. (eds.), Schönke/Schröder Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014); Stuckenberg, C.-F., ‘Problems of “Subjective Imputation” in Domestic and International Criminal Law’, (2014) 12 JICJ 311; Triffterer, O., Österreichisches Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil (Springer 2nd edition 1994); id., ‘Bestandsaufnahme zum Völkerstrafrecht’, in: Hankel, G. and Stuby, G. (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschheitsverbrechen (Hamburger Edition 1995) 169; id., ‘Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law – A New Position of Power to Fight Abuse of Power’, (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 811; id., ‘Genocide, its Particular Intent to Destroy in Whole or in Part the Group as Such’, (2001) 14 LeidenJIL 399; id., ‘Kriminalpolitische und dogmatische Überlegungen zum Entwurf gleichlautender “Elements of Crimes” für alle Tatbestände des Völkermords’, in: M. Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 80. Geburtstag am 15. Mai 2011 (De Gruyter 2011) 1438; id., ‘Command responsibility, Article 28 Rome Statute. An Extension of Individual Criminal Responsibility for Crimes within the Jurisdiction of the Court – Compatible with Article 22, nullum crimen sine lege?’, in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (C.F. Müller 2004) 213; id., ‘“Command Responsibility” – Crimen Sui Generis or Participation “as Otherwise Provided” in Art. 28 Rome Statute’, in: J. Arnold et al. (eds.), Menschengerechtes Strafrecht. Festschrift für Albin Eser zum 70. Geburtstag (C.H. Beck 2005) 901; United Nations Conference for the Adoption of a Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, Official Records, ii (United Nations Publications 1988); United Nations War Crimes Commission (ed.), Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, xv (1948); van den Wyngaert, C., ‘The Structure of the Draft Code and the General Part’, in: M.C. Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the International Law Commission’s 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Érés 1993); van den Herik, L. and Letnar Cernic, J., ‘Regulating Corporations under International Law – From Human Rights to International Criminal Law and Back Again’, (2010) 8 JICJ 725; van der Wilt, H., ‘Genocide v. War Crimes in the Van Anraat Appeal’, (2008) 6 JICJ 557; id., ‘The Continuous Quest for Proper Modes of Criminal Responsibility’, (2009) 7 JICJ 307; van Sliedregt, E., The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (CUP 2003); id., ‘System Criminality at the ICTY’, in: A. Nollkaemper and H. van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality in International Law (CUP 2009) 183; id., Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (OUP 2012); Vest, H., ‘Humanitätsverbrechen – Herausforderung für das Individualstrafrecht?’, (2001) 113 ZStW 457; id., Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate. An der Grenze von individueller und kollektiver Verantwortlichkeit (Nomos 2002); id., ‘Business Leaders and the Modes of Individual Criminal Responsibility under International Law’, (2010) 8 JICJ 851; id., Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (Nomos 2011); id., ‘Kurswechsel am Jugoslawientribunal’, (2014) 132 SchZStR 61; id., ‘Problems of Participation – Unitarian, Differentiated Approach, or Something Else?’, (2014) 12 JICJ 295; Weigend, T., ‘Article 3: Responsibility and Punishment’, in: M.C. Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the International Law Commission’s 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Érés 1993) 113; id., ‘Bemerkungen zur Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit im Völkerstrafrecht’, (2004) 116 ZStW 999; id., ‘Intent, Mistake of Law, and Co-perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on Confirmation of Charges’, (2008) 6 JICJ 471; id., ‘Societas delinquere non potest?’, (2008) 6 JICJ 927; id., ‘Perpetration through an Organization: The Unexploited Career of a German Legal Concept’, (2011) 9 JICJ 91; id., ‘Problems of Attribution in International Criminal Law. A German Perspective’, (2014) 12 JICJ 253; Weißer, B., Täterschaft in Europa: Ein Diskussionsvorschlag für ein europäisches Tätermodell auf der Basis einer rechtsvergleichenden Untersuchung der Beteiligungssysteme Deutschlands, Englands, Frankreichs, Italiens und Österreichs (Mohr Siebeck 2011); Weltz, K., Die Unterlassungshaftung im Völkerstrafrecht, eine rechtsvergleichende Untersuchung des französischen, US-amerikanischen und deutschen Rechts (Edition Iuscrim 2004); Werle, G., ‘Individual Criminal Responsibility in Article 25 ICC Statute', (2007) 5 JICJ 953; id., 'Establishing Degrees of Responsibility: Modes of Participation in Article 25 of the ICC Statute', in: E. van Sliedregt and S. Vasiliev (eds.), Pluralism in International Criminal Law (OUP 2014), 301; id., 'Täterschaft und Teilnahme im Statut des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', in: M. Heger, B. Kelker, and E. Schramm (eds.), Festschrift für Kristian Kühl zum 70. Geburtstag (C.H. Beck, 2014), 851; Werle, G. and Burghardt, B., 'Die mittelbare Mittäterschaft – Fortentwicklung deutscher Strafrechtsdogmatik im Völkerstrafrecht?', in: R. Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald zum 75. Geburtstag (Duncker & Humblot 2011) 849; Williamson, J., 'Command Responsibility in the Case law of the International Criminal Tribunal of Rwanda', (2002) 13 CLF 365; Wirth, S., 'Co-Perpetration in the Lubanga Trial Judgment', (2012) 10 JICJ 971; Wise, E.M., 'Part 3: General Principles of Criminal Law', in: Sadat Wexler, L. (ed.), Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court Based on the Preparatory Committee's Text to the Diplomatic Conference (Érés 1998) 39.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	4
I. Paragraph 1.....	4
II. Paragraph 2.....	5
III. Paragraph 3.....	6
1. Perpetration, co-perpetration and perpetration by means.....	7
a) 'commits ... as an individual ... jointly with another or through another person'.....	7
b) '... regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible' ..	16
2. 'orders, solicits or induces' an (attempted) crime.....	18
3. 'For the purpose of facilitating aids, abets or otherwise assists ...'	20
a) 'aids, abets or otherwise assists ... including providing the means'.....	21
b) 'For the purpose of facilitating'.....	27
4. 'In any other way contributes' to the (attempted) commission ... 'by a group ... acting with a common purpose'.....	28
a) General.....	28
b) Objective contribution.....	29
c) Subjective level: intentional contribution.....	30
aa) 'with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group ...'	33
bb) 'in the knowledge of the intention of the group'	34
5. 'directly and publicly incites ... to commit genocide'.....	35
6. 'attempt'.....	40
a) 'by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step...'	40
b) 'a person ... shall not be liable ... for the attempt ... if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose'.....	43
IV. Paragraph 3bis ('in respect of the crime of aggression...')	46
V. Paragraph 4.....	47
C. Special remarks.....	48
I. Issues of delimitation.....	48
II. Complicity after commission.....	51
III. Individual criminal responsibility and omission, in particular command responsibility.....	53

A. Introduction/General remarks

The provision, in particular paragraphs 1 and 2, confirms the universal acceptance of the principle of individual criminal responsibility as recognized by the International Military Tribunal¹ and reaffirmed by the ICTY in the Tadić jurisdictional decision with regard to individual criminal responsibility for violations of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions². The drafting history has been described elsewhere³.

¹ In The Trial of the Major War Criminals (Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg, Germany, H. M. Attorney General by HMSO, London 1950, Part 22, 447) it was held that individual criminal responsibility has 'long been recognized' and further stated: 'enough has been said to show that individuals can be punished for violations of International Law. Crimes against International Law are committed by men not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of International Law be enforced'.

- 2 Subparagraphs (a)–(c) of paragraph 3 establish the basic concepts of individual criminal attribution⁴. Subparagraph (a) refers to three forms of perpetration: on one's own, as a co-perpetrator or through another person (perpetration by means, mittelbare Täterschaft). Subparagraph (b) contains different forms of participation: on the one hand, ordering an (attempted) crime, on the other soliciting or inducing its (attempted) commission. Subparagraph (c) establishes criminal responsibility for 'aiding and abetting' as the subsidiary form of participation. Thus, in contrast to the ILC Draft Codes of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind⁵, the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals and the so-called mixed tribunals (Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Cambodian Extraordinary Chambers)⁶, paragraph 3 distinguishes between perpetration (subparagraph (a)) and other forms of participation (subparagraphs (b) and (c)), with the latter establishing different degrees of responsibility⁷. This approach confirms the general tendency in comparative criminal law to reject a pure unitarian concept of perpetration (*Einheitstätermo*del) and to distinguish, at least on the sentencing level, between different forms of participation⁸. The approach is also followed, albeit less elaborate, by the internationalized panels for East Timor⁹; for example the act of providing the means for the commission of a crime is not made explicitly punishable¹⁰. In fact, article 25 differentiates already at the level of allocation of responsibility, at least terminologically, between different forms of participation and thereby follows a unitarian

² Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-AR-72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, paras. 128–137 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/866e17/>> (134): 'All of these factors confirm that customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of common Article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflict, and for breaching certain fundamental principles and rules regarding means and methods of combat in civil strife'. For an analysis on the case law since Nuremberg, see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 78 et seq.; id., in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 1, 7 et seq. See also Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschenverbrechen (1995) 169, 211–213; Bassiouni, Introduction to ICL (2013) 17, 49, 60–1, 66 et seq.; Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 18 et seq. For an analysis of the ICTR's case law, see Boed (2002) 13 CLF 293, 296 et seq.

³ Cf. Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 6 mn. 21; Bassiouni, Legislative History (2005) 3–40; Schabas (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 400. For a good critique of the misnomer 'modes of liability' Stewart (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 165, 166 with fn. 2 (who, however, uses the expression then all over his paper).

⁴ See also Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 7 mn. 3. For a comprehensive treatment of article 25(3) see id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 144 et seq.

⁵ 1954 ILC Draft Code, article 2 para. 13; 1991 ILC Draft Code, article 3; 1996 ILC Draft Code, article 2.

⁶ See article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute (UN Doc. S/RES/827 (1993)), in: 14 HRLJ 211) and (the identical) article 6 para. 1 ICTR Statute (UN Doc. S/RES/955 (1994)): 'A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime ...'. See also article 6 para. 1 Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) Statute in Laucci, Digest of Jurisprudence (2007) 63, as well as article 29 of the Law on the Establishment of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia for the Prosecution of Crimes Committed During the Period of Democratic Kampuchea in Ambos and Othman (eds.), New Approaches (2003).

⁷ Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 788 with fn. 86.

⁸ Cf. Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschenverbrechen (1995) 169, 226; Pradel, Droit Pénal Comparé (2008) 317 et seq.; Fletcher, Basic Concepts of Criminal Law (1998) 188 et seq. In a similar vein also Mantovani (2003) 1 JICJ 26, 34; Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 43–4. There are also different approaches. See e.g. Rotsch, 'Einheitstäterschaft' (2009) who renounces any differentiation between forms of participation and instead advocates, contrary to a traditional unitarian system, a uniform system of imputation that only recognizes the distinction between immediate (direct) and mediate (indirect) violations of legally protected goods. For a even more radically different approach Jakobs, Beteiligung (2014) who argues that participation constitutes only a reason of imputation ['Zurechnungsgrund'] and the form of participation – perpetration or secondary participation – only a kind of competence in quantitative terms ['Zuständigkeitsquantitäten']; competence in turns depends on or is linked to certain spheres of organisation ['Organisationskreise'] each person is competent for and must not extend to the detriment of others. This negative duty is complemented by a positive one according to which one has to establish or maintain certain institutions.

⁹ Section 14 of UNTAET Regulation 2000/15 (On the Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction over Serious Criminal Offences) of 6 June 2000 in: Ambos and Wirth (2002) 13 CLF 1–90.

¹⁰ Unlike article 25, paras.3 (c) and (f) of the ICC Statute respectively.

concept of perpetration in a functional sense (funktionelle Einheitstäterschaft)¹¹ as known, for example, in Austrian and Swedish law¹².

Subparagraphs (d), (e) and (f) provide for expansions of attribution: contributing to the commission or attempted commission of a crime by a group, incitement to genocide, attempt.

Thus, in sum, article 25 para. 3 contains, on the one hand, basic rules of individual criminal responsibility and, on the other, rules expanding attribution (which may or may not still be characterized as specific forms of participation). A grosso modo, an individual is criminally responsible if he or she perpetrates, takes part in or attempts to commit a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court (articles 5–8). It must not be overlooked, however, that criminal attribution in international criminal law has to be distinguished from attribution in national criminal law: while in the latter case normally a concrete criminal result caused by a person's individual act is punished, international criminal law creates liability for acts committed in a collective context and systematic manner; consequently the individual's own contribution to the harmful result is not always readily apparent¹³.

¹¹ Advocating a four-layer-system of participation Werle (2007) 5 JICJ 953, 957; id. and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 853; id., in: van Sliedregt and Vasiliev (eds.), Pluralism in ICL (2014), 301, 315 et seq.; id., in: Heger, Kelker, and Schramm (eds.), Festschrift für Kristian Kühl (2014), 851, Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 197. Vest (2010) 8 JICJ 851, 856 with fn. 19 addresses the peculiarity of Article 25 (3) by defining it as 'a differentiating model with uniform (unified) range of punishment'. See also id., Völkerrechts-verbrecher verfolgen (2011) 179; id. (2014) 12 JICJ 295, 305 et seq.; conc. Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 351, 362. The Lubanga TC followed this approach Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, paras. 996–9 (998: '...predominance of principal over secondary liability, which, in turn, supports a notion of principal liability that requires a greater contribution than accessory liability') <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>. In the same vein, the Lubanga AC distinguishes (confusing terminologically, however, 'commit' and 'perpetrate') between perpetration and accessorial responsibility, the former being more blameworthy than the latter (para. 462), which makes it necessary to determine the basis of this distinction (para. 463), cf. Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 462 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>; adopting this view Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 135 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>. The Katanga TC (Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, paras. 1386–7, 1394 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>) recognizes the inherent distinction between perpetrators and accomplices in the Statute (para. 1387, 1395) and the control-over-the-act approach (1394–5), but rejects the normative hierarchy between them (1386–7); contra also Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, paras. 6–12, who rejects 'a hierarchy... between the modes of liability' (9), which 'were not intended to be mutually exclusive' (7) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>; Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-02/12-4, Judgment, TC, Concurring Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 18 December 2012, paras. 5–6, 17, 22 et seq. 66, 70 (who although recognising 'a conceptual difference between principal and accessorial criminal responsibility', rejects their 'different legal treatment' (22)) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7d5200/>> and Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3464-AnxI, Judgment, TC, Minority Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 7 March 2014, paras. 279–81 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9b0c61/>>; contra also Ohlin, van Sliedregt and Weigend (2013) 26 LeidenJIL 725, 728 et seq., 740 et seq., 745–6; Sadat and Jolly (2014) 27 LeidenJIL 755, 758, 775, 782, albeit with a too formalistic, international law based reading of article 25 without going into any substantive discussion of the respective forms of participation (785); descriptive on the whole discussion about the structure of Article 25 (3), Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 822 et seq.; conc. with Katanga Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 364 et seq. (rejecting 'hierarchy of blameworthiness' [at 365] and focusing on the 'accessory or autonomous nature of the contribution' [366] as the key distinguishing criterion [cf also 363, 370]). In favour of the unitarian model Stewart (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 165, 205 et seq. who, however, argues on the basis of some incorrect and imprecise assumptions (most importantly the 'Hitler-as-accomplice' assumption, at 167, which runs through the whole paper), takes the Austrian system as his model of a unitarian system (at 205; apparently, despite fn. 194, not fully grasping its functional unitarian orientation similar to Article 25, see next fn.) and, most importantly, does neither provide an analysis of article 25 (apparently assuming that it is based on the differentiated system) nor further elaborates on his (alternative) 'theory'; previously Kreß (1999) 9 HuV-I 4, 12 (interpreting article 25 as a unitarian model). Leaving it open Mitgutsch, in: Geisler et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Geppert (2011) 357, 373–4 (concluding that article 25 could be understood either as a unitarian or a differentiated model).

¹² For profound comparative studies see Hamdorf, Beteiligungsmodelle (2002) 43 et seq., 75 et seq., 104 et seq.; Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 543 et seq.; Weißer, Täterschaft in Europa (2011); on the English and German law Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 103 et seq. and 166 et seq. (perpetrator), 155 et seq. and 176 et seq. (accessory).

¹³ See – for a first attempt to develop a theory of attribution in international criminal law – Marxen, in: Lüderssen (ed.), Aufgeklärte Kriminalpolitik (1998) 220, 226 et seq. On the peculiarities on attribution in

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

- 4 As far as the jurisdiction over natural persons is concerned, paragraph 1 states the obvious. Already the International Military Tribunal found that international crimes are ‘committed by men not by abstract entities’¹⁴. However, the decision whether to include ‘legal’ or ‘juridical’ persons within the jurisdiction of the court was controversial. The French delegation argued strongly in favour of inclusion since it considered it to be important in terms of restitution and compensation orders for victims¹⁵. The final proposal presented to the Working Group was limited to private corporations, excluding States and other public and non-profit organizations¹⁶. Further, it was linked to the individual criminal responsibility of a leading member of a corporation who was in a position of control and who committed the crime acting on behalf of and with the explicit consent of the corporation and in the course of its activities. Despite this rather limited liability, the proposal was rejected for several reasons, which as a whole are quite convincing. The inclusion of collective liability would detract from the Court’s jurisdictional focus, which is on individuals. Furthermore, the Court would be confronted with serious and ultimately overwhelming problems of evidence. In addition, there are not yet universally recognized common standards for corporate liability; in fact, the concept is not even recognized in some major criminal law systems¹⁷. Consequently, the absence of corporate criminal liability in many States would render the principle of complementary (article 17)¹⁸ unworkable. Despite these reasons, there are increasingly voices who advocate the recognition of the responsibility of legal persons in international criminal law and under the ICC Statute¹⁹.

II. Paragraph 2

- 5 The provision repeats the principle of individual criminal responsibility. A person may ‘commit’ a crime by the different modes of participation and expansions of attribution set out in the following paragraph 3. In other words, commission in this context is not limited to perpetration within the meaning of paragraph 3 (a). ‘A crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ refers to genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the recently defined crime of aggression according to articles 5 to 8*bis*. The possible ‘punishment’ follows from article 77: imprisonment up to a maximum of 30 years or life imprisonment, additionally a fine and forfeiture of proceeds²⁰.

international criminal law see also Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 539 et seq. and passim.; id. (2006) 4 JICJ 660, 663; Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 7, mn. 11.

¹⁴ See already note 1.

¹⁵ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.3 (1998), article 23 paras. 5 and 6. See also Wise, in: Sadat Wexler (ed.), Model Draft Statute (1998) 39, 42; Sereni, in: Lattanzi (ed.), The ICC: Comments (1998) 139, 145–6; Schabas (1998) 6 EJCCLCJ 400, 409 et seq.

¹⁶ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.5 (1998).

¹⁷ Cf. Eser et al. (eds.), Einzelverantwortung und Mitverantwortung (1998); Pradel, Droit Pénal Comparé (2008) 163 et seq.

¹⁸ Cf. Schabas and El Zeidy, article 17, mn. 1 et seq. and 21 et seq. (in this volume).

¹⁹ Clapham (2008) 6 JICJ 899, 926; van den Herik and Letnar Cernic (2010) 8 JICJ 725; Farrell (2010) 8 JICJ 873; Kremnitzer, 2010) 8 JICJ 909; crit. Weigend (2008) 6 JICJ 927, 944–5.

²⁰ See also rules 145–148 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence as finally adopted by the Preparatory Commission, PCNICC/2000/1/Add.1, 2 November 2000. For a study on sentencing in international criminal law see Nemitz, Strafzumessung im Völkerstrafrecht (2002).

III. Paragraph 3

The chapeau repeats paragraph 2 and serves as an introduction to the modes of participation and commission set out in subparagraphs (a) to (f). 6

1. Perpetration, co-perpetration and perpetration by means

a) ‘commits ... as an individual ... jointly with another or through another person’. The first part of subparagraph (a) distinguishes between three forms of perpetration: direct or immediate perpetration (‘as an individual’), co-perpetration (‘jointly with another’) and perpetration by means (‘through another person’). 7

The characterization of direct perpetration as committing a crime ‘as an individual’ is unfortunate since it does not make clear that the direct perpetrator acts on his or her own without relying on or using another person²¹. As it stands, the formulation only repeats the principle of individual responsibility. While the original French version (‘à titre individuel’) was more precise, the new one (‘individuellement’) is identical to the English one; thus, only the Spanish version (‘por sí solo’) clearly refers to the concept of direct perpetration²². This view was also taken by ACs of the ad hoc Tribunals. In Tadić, it was held that the word ‘committed’ as used in article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute means ‘first and foremost the physical perpetration ... by the offender himself’²³. Similarly, in Celebici it was stated that ‘commission’ constitutes primary or direct responsibility²⁴. It must not be overlooked, however, that the term ‘committed’ as such is broad enough to include the other forms of perpetration contained in subparagraph (a), especially if they are not explicitly mentioned, as is the case with articles 7 para. 1 and 6 para. 1 of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes respectively²⁵. In fact, the case law of the ad hoc Tribunals employs such a broad definition as will be seen below (mn. 9).

²¹ See American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 2.06 (1): ‘committed by his own conduct’; good introduction by Dubber, Criminal Law: Model Penal Code (2002) 1 et seq., Spanish Penal Code (Código Penal, Ley Orgánica 10/1995, de 23 November 1995), article 28: ‘por sí solo’; German Penal Code (trans. by Darby, Penal Code of the Federal Republic of Germany. The American Series of Foreign Penal Codes (1987) § 25 (1): ‘selbst ... begeht’ (‘acting himself’).

²² Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 789 with fn. 89.

²³ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 188 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>. Conc. Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2001, para. 376: ‘direct personal or physical participation’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d4fedd/>>; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 73 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>; Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-T, Judgment, TC, 29 November 2002, para. 62 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8035f9/>>; Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 62 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfef/>>; Prosecutor v. Blagojević and Jokić, No. IT-02-60-T, Judgment, TC, 17 January 2005, para. 694 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7483f2/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 463 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>. See recently Prosecutor v. Haradinaj et al., TC, TJ, No. IT-04-84bis-T, 29 November 2012, para. 615 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1bad7b/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, para. 884 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Sainović et al., No. IT-05-87-A, Judgment, AC, 23 January 2014, para. 265 with fn. 761 (referring to the principal perpetrators as the physical perpetrators) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/81ac8c/>>; Prosecutor v. Karemera and Ntirumpatse, No. ICTR-98-44-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 2 February 2012, para. 1432 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b9068/>>.

²⁴ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, AC, 20 February 2001, paras. 342 et seq. (346) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/051554/>>.

²⁵ See Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, paras. 438 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>, esp. 439 where ‘committing’ is defined as participating ‘physically or otherwise directly or indirectly’. The AC of Prosecutor v. Seromba, No. ICTR-2001-66-A, Judgment, AC, 12 March 2008 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b4df9d/>>, also clarified, that ‘committing is not limited to direct and physical perpetration’ (para. 161). The correct legal standard has to ask if the actions done were as much ‘an integral part’ of the crime as the direct and physical actions (para. 206), citing Prosecutor v. Gacumbitsi, No. ICTR-2001-64-A, Judgment, AC, 7 July 2006, para. 60 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/aa51a3/>>. See recently Prosecutor v. Haradinaj et al., TC, TJ, No. IT-04-84bis-T, 29 November 2012, para. 615 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1bad7b/>>; Prosecutor v. Stanisic and Simatović, No. IT-03-69-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 30 May 2013, paras. 1254 et seq.

- 8 Co-perpetration is no longer included in the complicity concept, but rather is recognized as an autonomous form of perpetration²⁶. It is characterized by a functional division of the criminal tasks between the different (at least two) co-perpetrators, who are normally inter-related by a common plan or agreement. Every co-perpetrator fulfils a certain task which contributes to the commission of the crime and without which the commission would not be possible. The common plan or agreement forms the basis of a reciprocal or mutual attribution of the different contributions holding every co-perpetrator responsible for the whole crime²⁷.
- 9 The ICTY has in the meantime decided a significant number of cases dealing with this form of participation. First and foremost, the Tadić AC, inter alia referring to article 25 para. 3 Rome Statute, held that co-perpetration is contained in article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute and constitutes a form of participation that is particularly necessary in order to cope with international crimes since ‘most of ... these crimes do not result from the criminal propensity of single individuals but constitute manifestations of collective criminality: the crimes are often carried out by groups or individuals acting in pursuance of a common criminal design’²⁸. It further distinguished three categories of collective criminality on the basis of the case law thereby, creating the today infamous Joint Criminal Enterprise (‘JCE’) liability: first, the basic form where the participants act on the basis of a ‘common design’ or ‘common enterprise’ and with a common ‘intention’²⁹; second, the systemic form, i. e., the so-called concentration camp cases where crimes are committed by members of military or administrative units such as those running concentration or detention camps on the basis of a common plan (‘common purpose’)³⁰; third, the so called ‘extended’ joint enterprise where one of the co-perpetrators actually engages in acts going beyond the common plan, but his or her acts still constitute a ‘natural and foreseeable consequence’ of the realization of the plan³¹. On the basis of these categories and the national law of various States, the objective requirements of the responsibility as a co-perpetrator can be stated as follows³²: There must be a plurality of persons who act on the basis of a – explicit or implicit – common plan or purpose, and the accused must take part in this plan, at least by supporting or aiding its <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/698c43/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, paras. 25 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>; Karemera and Ngirumpaise, No. ICTR-98-44-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 2 February 2012, para. 1432 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b9068/>>; Prosecutor v. Nahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-A, Judgment, AC, 16 December 2013, para. 201 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7034a5/>>.

²⁶ Conc. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 185; van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility (2003) 71 et seq.

²⁷ For a similar definition invoking Roxins opus Täterschaft und Teilnahme see now Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, paras. 440 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>. See also Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 789 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger (2007) 5 JICJ 953, 958; id., Principles (2014) 205 et seq.

²⁸ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 191 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>. In a similar vein most recently Prosecutor v. Krajisnik, No. IT-00-39-T, Judgment, TC, 27 September 2006, para. 876: ‘JCE is well suited to cases such as the present one, in which numerous persons are all said to be concerned with the commission of a large number of crimes’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/62a710/>> Cf. Zahar and Sluiter, ICL Introduction (2008) 255–257; on Tadić and JCE, see also Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 28 et seq.

²⁹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 196–201 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>.

³⁰ Ibid., paras. 202–3.

³¹ Ibid., paras. 204–19; Prosecutor v. Martić, No. IT-95-11-T, Judgment, TC, 12 June 2007, para. 439 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/06634c/>>; Prosecutor v. Haradinaj et al., No. IT-04-84-T, Judgment, TC, 3 April 2008, para. 138 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/025913/>>; recently Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, para. 906 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>. Crit. Eser, in Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 792 with fn. 104; conc. Cassese and Gaeta, ICL (2013) 168–172. In Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2005, para. 86 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/006011/>>, the AC affirmed that an accused may be responsible for crimes committed beyond the common purpose of the systemic joint criminal enterprise (i. e. the second category of cases), if they were a natural and foreseeable consequence thereof.

³² Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 227 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>.

realization³³. Subsequent decisions³⁴ have taken up these considerations and refined the JCE liability.³⁵ In Brdjanin, an appeal by the Prosecution was successful since the TC erred in law and adopted a too narrow definition of JCE when it required (1) that physical perpetrators need to be JCE members for JCE liability to attach to high-level officials, (2) that there should be direct agreement between each JCE member regarding the commission of the crimes, and (3) that JCE is appropriate for ‘small’ cases only³⁶. Furthermore, special emphasis was laid on the criminal character of the enterprise: The contours of the common criminal purpose ought to be ‘properly defined’ and ‘supported by the evidence beyond reasonable doubt’³⁷. The JCE doctrine also served as a form of attribution to impute, inter alia, to Slobodan Milošević the genocide committed by Serb forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina³⁸ and to Ante Gotovina the alleged crimes of Croat forces committed during ‘Operation Storm’³⁹.

³³ Similarly Cassese et al., ICL (2013) 163; crit. on the low threshold for participation in the common plan, Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 171; conc. Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 55–6.

³⁴ See the references in the previous edition and for more recent decisions notes 36 et seq.

³⁵ For my view on JCE see Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 159–183 and id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 123 et seq. According to Danner and Martinez (2005) 93 CallRev 75, 107, 64 % of the indictments submitted in the ICTY between 25 June 2001 and 1 January 2004 relied on this doctrine. On the importance of JCE, also see Piacente (2004) 2 JICJ 448; Osiel (2005) 105 ColLR 1751, 1786 et seq. and Haan (2005) 5 ICLR 167–201. See also Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 356 et seq.

³⁶ Prosecutor v. Brđjanin, No. IT-99-36-A, Judgment, AC, 3 April 2007 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/782cef/>> para. 414 with regard to ground 1 (‘principal perpetrator as a member of JCE’); para. 419 with regard to ground 2, second part (‘requirement of an additional understanding or agreement’), para. 425 with regard to ground 2, first part (‘JCE applicable to small cases only’); see further the declaration of Judge van den Wyngaert, 164, para. 1 et seq.; partly dissenting Judge Shahabuddin, 170 et seq., who states that ‘link’ between the accused member and the crime can only be provided by showing that the physical perpetrator was himself a member of the JCE and therefore within the intention of the accused member to take responsibility for certain crimes when committed by fellow members (para. 18).

³⁷ Ibid., para. 424. See also Prosecutor v. Haradinaj et al., TC, TJ, No. IT-04-84bis-T, 29 November 2012, paras. 628 et seq. (rejecting the requirement of the ‘existence of a common purpose’ for lack of evidence, paras. 625 and 668) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1bad7b/>>.

³⁸ Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, No. IT-02-54-T, Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, TC, 16 June 2004, paras. 144 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d7fb46/>>. See Ambos (2004) 59 JZ 956, 966; see also the indictment of Radovan Karadžić taking recourse to JCE concerning, inter alia, the Srebrenica genocide: Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, No. IT-95-5/18-PT, Third Amended Indictment, 27 February 2009, paras. 5–10, 20–30 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/858aef/>>.

³⁹ Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., No. IT-06-90-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 15 April 2011, paras. 1948 et seq., 2322 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86922c/>>. The AC acquitted both Gotovina and Markac since it considered it not to be proved beyond reasonable doubt that the alleged JCE was implemented by way of unlawful military attacks, see Prosecutor v. Gotovina and Markac, No. IT-06-90-A, Judgment, AC, 16 November 2012, paras. 91–3, 96–8 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/03b685/>>; See also Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, paras. 1095, 1129 (finding that the accused was responsible for extermination [para. 1183], murder [para. 1187], forcible transfer as an inhumane act [para. 1187], persecution [para. 1193] and deportation [para. 1198] as a member of a JCE to forcibly remove and murder the Bosnian Muslim population [paras. 1095 and 1129] <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; the Accused was also found responsible for the crime of genocide pursuant to JCE III liability [para. 1173]); Prosecutor v. Stanišić and Zupljanin, No. IT-08-91-T, Judgment Vol. 2, TC, 27 March 2013, para. 131 et seq. (finding that a common plan to forcibly transfer the non-Serb population existed [para. 313] of which the two accused have been members [para. 520, 729 et seq.] so that they are responsible for the crimes of forcible transfer as an inhumane act and as an underlying act of persecution under JCE I and for other crimes under JCE III [paras. 770 et seq., 799 et seq.]) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cbc02a/>>; Prosecutor v. Stanišić and Simatović, No. IT-03-69-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 30 May 2013, paras. 2337 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/698c43/>> in casu acquitting both Stanišić and Simatović since it could not to be proved beyond reasonable doubt that they shared the intent to further the common criminal purpose; on this Vest (2014) 132 SchZStR 86 et seq. See also Prosecutor v. Sainović et al., No. IT-05-87-A, Judgment, AC, 23 January 2014, paras. 604 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/81ac8c/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, paras. 22 et seq., 161 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>; Prosecutor v. Nāhimana, No. ICTR-01-68-A, Judgment, AC, 16 December 2013, paras. 187 et seq. (finding that the accused as the ‘bourgmestre’ was responsible for crimes committed by his subordinates, i.e. policemen, under JCE I since he was voluntarily present during a part of the alleged attack [para. 197] with requisite intent of the alleged crimes [para. 195] and committed the alleged crimes through participation in a JCE

As to the mens rea, the requirements differ according to the form of the JCE: The basic form requires the shared intent of the (co-) perpetrators. The systemic form derives this shared intent from personal knowledge of the system of ill-treatment⁴⁰. The extended form requires the intention to participate in the criminal purpose and further it and to contribute to the commission of a crime by a group. Responsibility for a crime which was not part of the common purpose arises if the commission of this crime was foreseeable and the accused (willingly) took that risk⁴¹. In particular, the objective foreseeability ('reasonably foreseeable') standard is dubious since it brings JCE III dangerously close to strict liability and thus interferes with the principle of culpability. In fact, it amounts to a 'negligence' standard, which, except for superior responsibility, has not been provided for in the Statutes of International Criminal Tribunals⁴². According to the Brđjanin AC, the extended JCE may even give rise to the responsibility of a JCE participant for genocide without having the specific intent to destroy a protected group⁴³.

The JCE doctrine has also been applied by the Special Court for Sierra Leone⁴⁴ and the East Timorese Special Panel for Serious Crimes⁴⁵. In contrast, the ECCC PTC found that the

I by providing moral support to the policemen as physical perpetrators [paras 198 et seq.] <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7034a5/>>.

⁴⁰ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2005, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/006011/>>. Treating JCE II as JCE I without this derivation of intent Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 78 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>, Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC 31 July 2003, paras. 488 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>. Criticizing JCE II (as employed in Kvočka) for violating the presumption of innocence cf. Haan, Joint Criminal Enterprise (2008) 274 et seq.

⁴¹ Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana and Ntakirutimana, Nos. ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, Judgment, AC, 13 December 2004, para. 467 with further references <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af07be/>>; also Prosecutor v. Mrksić et al., No. IT-95-13/1-T, Judgment, TC, 27 September 2007, para. 542 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32111c/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, paras. 896, 897, 1130 et seq., 1173 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Stanišić and Zupljanin, No. IT-08-91-T, Judgment Vol. 2, TC, 27 March 2013, para. 131 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cbc02a/>>; Crit. as to the negligence standard, Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 381-2.

⁴² See for criticism of JCE III, i.a., Mettraux, International Crimes (2005) 215, 264-5, 289. Haan, Joint Criminal Enterprise (2008); Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 309. Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5 mn. 80; van Sliedregt, in: Nollkaemper and van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality (2009) 183, 197; Vest (2010) 8 JICJ 851; Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 7 mn. 32 with further references in fn. 180.

⁴³ Prosecutor v. Brđjanin, No. IT-99-36-A, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal, 19 March 2004, para. 6 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/acb003/>>: '... to establish that it was reasonably foreseeable to the accused that an act specified in Art. 4 (2) [ICTYS] would be committed and that it would be committed with genocidal intent'. Crit., but not clear, the separate opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, who, on the one hand, takes the view that 'specific intent always has to be shown' (para. 4), but, on the other hand, states 'that intent is shown by the particular circumstances of the third category of joint criminal enterprise' (para. 5 at the end). Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, No. IT-02-54-T, Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, TC, 16 June 2004, para. 219 adopts without more the majority opinion of Brđjanin <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d7fb46/>>; on JCE III foreseeability with regard to special intent crimes see also Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, No. IT-95-5/18-AR72.4, Decision on Prosecution's Motion Appealing TC's Decision on JCE III Foreseeability, AC, 25 June 2009 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6f4a/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, paras. 898, 1173 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, paras. 22 et seq., 73 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>. Crit. Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 63 et seq.

⁴⁴ Cf. Prosecutor v. Kondewa, No. SCSL-03-12-PT, Decision and Order on Defence Preliminary Motion for Defects in the Form of the Indictment, 27 November 2003, para. 9 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/71a5d3/>>; Prosecutor v. Brima et al., No. SCSL-04-16-PT, Decision and Order on Defence Preliminary Motion for Defects in the Form of the Indictment, 1 April 2004, para. 49 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/80b122/>>; Prosecutor v. Sesay et al., No. SCSL-04-15-A, Judgement, AC, 26 October 2009, paras. 394, 400 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/133b48/>>. Cf. also Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 66 et seq.; as to the indictments before the SLSC invoking JCE III see Danner and Martinez (2005) 93 CallRev 75, 155 et seq.

⁴⁵ See Prosecutor v. Perreira, No. 34/2003, Judgment, Special Panel for Serious Crimes, 27 April 2005, pp. 19-20 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5ce1a8/>>. Concurring also ibid., Separate Opinion of Judge Phillip Rapoza, pp. 4-5, paras. 17-18, 25. See also Prosecutor v. de Deus, No. 2a/2004, Judgment, Special Panel for Serious Crimes, 12 April 2005, p. 13 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9b1be5/>>; Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 69-73.

authorities relied on by Tadić with regard to the customary law status of JCE III did not ‘provide sufficient evidence of consistent state practice or opinio juris at the time relevant’ to the case before it⁴⁶.

The ICC, interpreting the second alternative of subparagraph (a) (‘jointly with another’), adopted the mode of co-perpetration in its narrow sense explicitly in the Lubanga case⁴⁷ and approved especially the German doctrine of ‘functional control over the act’ (‘funktionelle Tatherrschaft’)⁴⁸, rejecting both the so called ‘objective’⁴⁹ and ‘subjective’⁵⁰ theories:

⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Khieu et al., No. 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/OCIJ, Decision on the Appeals against the Co-Investigative Judges Order on Joint Criminal Enterprise (JCE), PTC, 20 May 2010, para. 77 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/320587/>>. In essence, the Chamber followed this author: Ambos (2009) 20 CLF 353, 366 et seq.; for the opposite view see Cassese et al. (2009) 20 CLF 289, 327 et seq.; Provost (2009) 20 CLF 331, 332 et seq., 346. Against JCE III as a form of co-perpetratorship see also Olásolo (2009) 20 CLF 263, 278 et seq.; Marsh and Ramsden (2011) 11 ICLRev 137, 152 et seq. See recently Prosecutor v. Khieu and Nuon, No. 002/19-09-2007/ECCC/TC, Judgment, TC, 7 August 2014, para. 691 (holding that JCE III did not exist in customary international or Cambodian law by 1975) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4888de/>>.

⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, paras. 326 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. Cf. in detail Olásolo, Criminal Responsibility (2009) 291 et seq.; Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 85 et seq.

⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 341 (‘joint control’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. This was confirmed by Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, paras. 1003–5 (although not explicitly using the term ‘functional’ control) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>> and Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 469, 471, 473 (requiring ‘a normative assessment of the role of the accused person’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 135 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>; crit. on the (in their view methodologically flawed and too expansive) Lubanga approach Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 350, 353 et seq. See also Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil II (2003) § 25 mn. 188 et seq.; Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 45; Prosecutor v. Gacumbitsi, No. ICTR-2001-64-A, Judgment, AC, Separate Opinion of Judge Schomburg, 7 July 2006, para. 17 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/aa51a3/>>. Against the application of the control of the act theory see Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, paras. 10–12, 21 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>> and Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-02/12-4, Judgment, TC, Concurring Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 18 December 2012, paras. 5–6, 17, 67 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7d5200/>>. Discussing and essentially rejecting Fulford’s view, at 141–7. Judge van den Wyngaert’s opinion also deserves a more detailed treatment which is impossible here for reasons of space. At this juncture, it suffices to say that, while it is, of course, possible not to read the control over the act theory into Art. 25 (3), a pure or naturalistic ‘plain’ reading of the text encounters the limits pointed out in my critique of Fulford and, above all, does not provide for a theory which allows for the imputation of the ‘crime base’ to the ‘most responsible’ who, normally, belong to the top level of the respective state or organization. Indeed, if van den Wyngaert does not only reject the control over the act theory, in particular Organisationsherrschaft, but also JCE, one fails to see how she wants to hold these top level people responsible; summing up Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 822 et seq. See also Ambos (2014) 12 JICJ 219, 227 with fn. 11; on the persuasiveness of the control theory, which emphasizes the objective approach, but is still ‘broad enough to include subjective elements’, Werle and Burghardt, in: van Sliedregt and Vasiliev (eds.), Pluralism in ICL (2014), 301, 316 et seq.; id., in: Heger, Kelker, and Schramm (eds.), Festschrift für Kristian Kühl (2014), 851, 862–3. Crit. on the incorporation of the control theory also Sadat and Jolly (2014) 27 LeidenJIL 755, 757–8, 781.

⁴⁹ The ‘objective approach’, focusing in a naturalistic fashion on the physical perpetration with one’s own hands, is, in the Chamber’s correct view, to be rejected because ‘the notion of committing an offence through another person cannot be reconciled with the idea of limiting the class of principals to those who physically carry out (...) objective elements of the crime.’ (Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 333 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>; confirmed by Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1391 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

⁵⁰ The ‘subjective approach’, focusing on the mental state of the actor (animus auctoris), is, in the Chamber’s view, to be rejected because subparagraph (d) explicitly recognizes accomplice liability despite a mens rea standard (‘furthering’ or ‘knowledge of the intention of the group’) which, according to this approach, would convert the accomplice into perpetrator (possessing the required animus auctoris instead of a mere animus socii). Thus, the PTC stated that ‘the latter concept [enshrined in subparagraph d)] – which is closely akin to the concept of joint criminal enterprise or the common purpose doctrine adopted by the jurisprudence of the ICTY – would have been the basis of the concept of co-perpetration within the meaning of article 25(3)(a), had the drafters of the Statute opted for a subjective approach for distinguishing between principals and accessories’ (cf. Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I,

‘The concept of co-perpetration based on joint control over the crime is rooted in the principle of the division of essential tasks for the purpose of committing a crime between two or more persons acting in a concerted manner. Hence, although none of the participants has overall control over the offence because they all depend on one another for its commission, they all share control because each of them could frustrate the commission of the crime by not carrying out his or her task’⁵¹.

On an objective level the PTC established two requirements, namely the existence of an agreement or common plan between two or more persons⁵² and a co-ordinated essential contribution by each co-perpetrator resulting in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime⁵³. This contribution can be made, as now determined by the Lubanga AC, not only at the execution stage of the crime, but also at ‘its planning or preparation stage, including when the common plan is conceived’⁵⁴. The agreement might also be inferred from subsequent concerted action of the co-perpetrators⁵⁵. As to the subjective side, the PTC generally states the obvious, i. e., that the suspect must fulfil the subjective elements of the crime in question⁵⁶. More concretely, the suspects must all be mutually aware and mutually accept that implementing their common plan may result in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime⁵⁷; they must be aware of the factual circumstances enabling him or her to jointly 29 January 2007, para. 335 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 483 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>; Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1392 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

⁵¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 342 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>> quoting Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, para. 440 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>.

⁵² Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, paras. 343–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. The TC relied heavily on the PTC's decision, especially on its findings with regard to the requirements of co-perpetration; concerning the common plan see Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, paras. 980–8 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>. For an analysis of this part of the judgment see Ambos (2012) 12 ICLRev 115, 138 et seq. The agreement, which ‘may take the form of a “common plan”’, was confirmed by the Lubanga AC, cf. Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 445 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 134 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>.

⁵³ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, paras. 346–8 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. Arguably, the requirement of ‘ability to frustrate the commission of the crime’ (ibid., para. 347) asks for too much, at least at the second level of collective criminal hierarchies where a co-perpetrator's contribution appears to be more easily replaceable. Thus, instead one may require something less, for example the ‘ability to substantially shape the crime’ (Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 351, 359 preferring therefore the concept of Tatmacht [power over the act] instead of Tatherrschaft [control over the act]). The requirement of an essential contribution was confirmed by Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, para. 999 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>, while the ability to frustrate the commission of the crime was not explicitly demanded. Crit. on the Lubanga TC's failure to precisely define the object of the essential contribution (the common plan or the specific crime) Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 87–9; crit. on the essential contribution requirement and its expansive interpretation Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 357–359, 367–68, 369 (even arguing, at 367–68, that the Katanga TJ rejected this requirement although the Chamber did not deal with co-perpetration).

⁵⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 7, 469, 473 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 134 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>. Generally critical regarding the application of co-perpetration to the preparatory stage Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 355, 363–64, 370 (arguing that a contribution made at this stage is ‘accessory in nature’ and should therefore ‘be charged under accessory liability’).

⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 345 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. Cf. van der Wilt (2009) 7 JICJ 307, 310.

⁵⁶ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, paras. 349–60 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>.

⁵⁷ Ibid., paras. 361–5. The Chamber, at para. 352, extends the volitional element contained in Article 30 to the awareness ‘of the risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or actions....and [he/she] accepts such an outcome by reconciling himself or herself with it....’. However, arguably, Article 30 only control the crime⁵⁸. The Bemba Confirmation Decision followed this approach⁵⁹, but at least the last element is questionable since, apart from not being adopted by the Katanga/Ngudjolo Chui confirmation decision⁶⁰ and the Lubanga TC⁶¹, it demands too much from a co-perpetrator who rarely has full control and thus hardly can be completely aware of the factual circumstances of his control⁶². In addition, some further clarification is required with regard to the ‘common’ plan element: Does the plan encompass both objective and subjective or merely objective components⁶³? Is it really sufficient, as argued by the Lubanga PTC⁶⁴, that the plan must only ‘include an element of criminality’ and not be specifically directed at the commission of a crime⁶⁵? The Lubanga AC spoke to the latter, holding that it is ‘sufficient for encompasses the conscious taking of substantial risks on the basis of an objective ex ante examination (cf. Weigend (2008) 6 JICJ 471, 481 et seq.). See also Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, paras. 1009 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>.

⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, paras. 366–7 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>> and Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 534 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>; Prosecutor v. Kenyatta et al., No. ICC-01/09-02/11-382, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 297 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4972c0/>>; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 292 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 121 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 240 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>.

⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, No. ICC 01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, paras. 348–351 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/07965c/>>.

⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 534–5 (‘last requirement does not apply’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>.

⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, para. 1013 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>.

⁶² See Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 719–20, also elaborating on the dolus eventualis intricacies of this decision. See also Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 169; Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 89 et seq.

⁶³ Critical on the Lubanga approach qualifying the common plan as a pure objective element Weigend (2008) 6 JICJ 471, 480 with fn. 37. See also Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-02/12-4, Judgment, TC, Concurring Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 18 December 2012, paras. 32–4 who considers the common plan to be a purely subjective element <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7d5200/>>.

⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 344 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>.

⁶⁵ The TC in Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment, TC, 14 March 2012, para. 984 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>> required ‘a critical element of criminality, namely ... a sufficient risk that ... a crime will be committed’; crit. Ambos (2012) 12 ICLRev 115, 140; Herzig (2013) ZIS 189, 195; Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 359–62 (arguing that the Lubanga interpretation lowers the mens rea threshold and takes us back to jce III and therefore calling for a restrictive interpretation whereby only the crimes part of the plan are covered and ‘an objective contribution to the specific crime’ is required [emphasis in the original]). Cf. also Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, paras. 271 and 291 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. Unclear in this respect Prosecutor v. Kenyatta et al., No. ICC-01/09-02/11-382, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 399 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4972c0/>>; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 301 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 105 with fn. 426 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>. Recently Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 230 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>, an implicit ‘common plan to maintain Laurent Gbagbo in power at any cost, including through the use of force against civilians’ was inferred from the objective circumstances, i.e. Laurent Gbagbo’s close relations with his so-called ‘inner circle’, his public statements and his involvement in the ‘alleged’ preparatory activities of the use of violence (paras. 78 et seq. and 231). However, this inference appears circular and it is not clear which concrete crimes have been used by ‘the pro-Gbagbo force against civilians’. Therefore, it is questionable whether the common plan of using force against civilian ‘inherently’ includes the common plan to intentionally commit all ‘the crimes charged’, i.e. murder, rape, persecution and other inhumane acts. In this respect see Dissenting Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, ibid., paras 5–6. Cf. also Ohlin (2014) 12 JICJ 325, 331 et seq., who criticizes the approach of the current ICC’s control theory as ‘over-correction’ and as ‘deemphasis of the subjective elements’. In fact, however, in the most

the common plan to involve “a critical element of criminality”⁶⁶, i. e. ‘that it [is] virtually certain that the implementation of the common plan led to the commission of the crimes at issue’⁶⁷.

- 11 The perpetration by means mode, i. e., as more exactly expressed by the third alternative of subparagraph 3 (a), perpetration ‘through another person’, presupposes that the person who commits the crime (intermediary, intermédiaire, Tatmittler) can be used as an instrument or tool (Werkzeug) by the indirect perpetrator (auteur médiateur) as the master-mind or ‘man in the background’ (Hintermann)⁶⁸⁶⁹. The Hintermann is also considered a principal in common law⁷⁰. The direct perpetrator is normally an innocent agent, not responsible for the criminal act. A typical example is the case where the individual agent or instrument acts erroneously⁷¹, or is not culpable because he or she is a minor, or because of a mental defect. Additionally, situations in which the direct perpetrator acts under ‘duress’ (Art. 31 (1) (d)) and is therefore excused may give rise to an indirect perpetration by the person who controls this direct perpetrator by way of threats or violence amounting to this situation of duress (Nötigungsherrschaft).⁷²
- 12 However, especially in the field of ‘macrocriminality’, i. e., systematic or mass criminality organized, supported or tolerated by the State⁷³, the direct perpetrator or executor normally performs the act with the necessary mens rea and is fully aware of its illegality. Thus, the question arises if perpetration by means always presupposes that the direct perpetrator has a ‘defect’, or if it is also possible with a fully responsible or culpable direct perpetrator, i. e., in the case of a ‘(indirect) perpetrator behind the (direct) perpetrator’ (Täter hinter dem Täter). This has been affirmed for cases in which the Hintermann dominates the direct perpetrators by virtue of a hierarchical organizational structure, i. e., where he or she has ‘Organisationsherrschaft’ (autoría mediata por dominio de la voluntad en aparatos de poder organizados/mittelbare Täterschaft kraft Willensherrschaft in organisatorischen Machtapparaten).⁷⁴ recent Katanga judgment the ICC takes a mixed objective-subjective approach, see Ambos (2014) 12 JICJ 219, 226–7.

⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, para. 446 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>.

⁶⁷ Ibid., para. 451; in a similar vein, for the Blé Goudé PTC I, the common plan should be neither any plan nor a fully criminal one, but it suffices that the criminal element is inherent to it, Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 140 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>.

⁶⁸ The translation of the German ‘Hintermann’ as ‘master-mind’ (by Silverman, in: Roxin (1996) 30 IsLR 60, 71) may omit cases in which the dominance of the ‘Hintermann’ is physical (e.g., by coercion) rather than intellectual. Michael Bohlander employs in his translation of the German Criminal Code (Bohlander, The German Criminal Code – A Modern English Translation (2008) § 84) the term ‘hinterman’ referring to other words borrowed from German into English terminology, such as ‘hinterland’, which suggest that English native-speakers will be familiar with the connotations of the prefix ‘hinter-’ and be able to adapt it to new combinations.

⁶⁹ See generally for perpetration by means Fletcher, Basic Concepts (1998) 197–200; Jescheck and Weigend, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil (1996) § 62, 662 et seq. and Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 154 et seq. In French criminal law the ‘auteur médiateur’ is not codified, but exceptionally recognized if the direct perpetrator is used as a ‘simple instrument’ (cf. Czepluch, Täterschaft und Teilnahme im französischen Strafrecht (1994) 30–33). With regard to article 25 see also (conc.) Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 793 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility (2003) 71.

⁷⁰ See American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 2.06 and comment.

⁷¹ Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 573.

⁷² See, for an exemplary case of duress, Prosecutor v. Erdemović, No. IT-96-22-T, Sentencing Judgment, TC, 29 November 1996 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/eb5c9d/>>. However, in this case the liability of the Hintermann, i. e., the person forcing Erdemović to commit the crimes, was not at stake. Cf. for an analysis of this case Olásolo, Criminal Responsibility (2009) 114 et seq.; Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 1003, 1042 et seq.; id., Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 263 et seq. For a scrutiny of indirect perpetration in situations of duress ibid., 574 et seq., and for the normative reasons of attribution Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 7 mn. 24.

⁷³ See Jäger, Makrocriminalität (1989).

⁷⁴ See the fundamental work of Roxin, Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft (2006) 242–52, 704–17; see also Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 590 et seq. with further references; with regard to genocide Krefß, Münchener Kommentar StGB (2003) § 220a/§ 6 VStGB, mn. 100 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 207 et seq.

Although there are no precedents in the post-WW II case law international case law that refer explicitly to this doctrine, it may be argued that the judgment in the Justice Trial was implicitly based on it since the accused were held responsible because of their ‘conscious participation in a nationwide government-organized system of cruelty and injustice’⁷⁵, i. e., because of their commission of crimes by way of a hierarchical organizational structure⁷⁶. Further, the doctrine has been recognized by national tribunals. In Eichmann, the Jerusalem District Court invoked – for the specific macro-crimes in question – a type of organizational responsibility or domination of the act by the man at the desk and thereby developed the concept used in the *Justice trial*⁷⁷. In the Argentinean trial against the former commanders of the military junta the Appeals Court argued with a form of perpetration based on Organisationsherrschaft: ‘The accused dominated the acts since they controlled the organization which carried them out ... who dominates the system dominates the anonymous will of all the men who constitute it’⁷⁸. In the German trials for shootings at the East German border, the Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof) employed the doctrine to hold members of the National Defence Council (‘NDC’) and generals of the National People’s Army responsible as indirect perpetrators for the killings directly committed by border guards⁷⁹. The theory has also been applied widely in Latin America, in particular in Colombia and Peru⁸⁰. In 2009, Alberto Fujimori, the former president of Peru, was convicted by the Trial and ACs of the Peruvian Supreme Court for serious violations of international human rights law amounting to crimes against humanity which were committed under his presidency in 1991 and 1992⁸¹. The convictions of Fujimori as an indirect perpetrator are based on the theory of control/domination of the act by virtue of an organized power apparatus. Both chambers of the Supreme Court set out five requirements for indirect perpetration by virtue of such an organized power structure: as a general requirement the existence of a hierarchical organization and as specific requirements a responsible command (‘poder de mando’, ‘Befehlsgewalt’) of the indirect perpetrator, the detachment of the organization from the law (‘desvinculación’

The doctrine is not uncontroversial, for a critique see Rotsch (2005) 25 NStZ 13 et seq. With references on this discussion cf. Krefß (2006) 153 GA 304 et seq.; also Radtke (2006) 153 GA 350 et seq. For a reply Roxin (2007) 125 SchwZStR 1, 3 et seq. and Schünemann, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 799, passim. See for a good explanation in English, Osiel (2005) 105 CollRev 1751, 1829 et seq. See further van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility (2003) 70; for a more detailed explanation Ambos, in: Nollkaemper and van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality (2009) 127, 142 et seq.; id. (2011) 9 JICJ 137, 145 et seq.

⁷⁵ U.S. v. Altstötter (Justice Trial), Judgment, U.S. Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, Germany, 4 Dec. 1947, 4 LRTWC 1 (H.M.S.O. 1947) para. 985: ‘conscious participation in a nationwide government-organized system of cruelty and injustice’ (emphasis added). Critical Werle and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 853 with fn. 15.

⁷⁶ Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 93-4; id., in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 1.

⁷⁷ Judgment 12 December 1961, 36 ILR 5 and 18, at 236-7, para. 197: ‘... the degree of responsibility generally increases as we draw further away from the man who uses the fatal instrument with his own hands and reach the higher levels of command ...’; for a more detailed analysis see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 184 et seq.; id., in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 1, 17-8; id., in: Ambos et al. (eds.), Eichmann in Jerusalem (2012) 123, 125 et seq.

⁷⁸ Cámara Nacional de Apelaciones etc., Sentencia 9 December 1985, in: Fallos CSJ Vol. 309-I/II 33, at 1597-8, 1601-2 (emphasis added; own translation from Spanish). For a more detailed analysis see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 234 et seq.; id., in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 1, 18-9.

⁷⁹ 40 Bundesgerichtshof-Entscheidungen in Strafsachen, 218, 237-8 (1994). For a more detailed analysis see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 243 et seq.; id., in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 1, 20-1; Weigend (2014) 12 JICJ 253, 259.

⁸⁰ See Ambos and Malarino (eds.), Jurisprudencia (2008) with reports on the case law of the most important Latin American Countries.

⁸¹ Corte Suprema de Justicia de la República del Perú, Sala Penal Especial (Special Criminal Chamber), judgment of 7 April 2009, Exp. No. AV 19-2001 (Cases Barrios Altos, La Cantuta, Sótanos SIE) (for an English translation see (2010) 25 AmUILRev 657-842; for a German translation of Part III see (2009) 4 ZIS 622-57); CSJ, Primera Sala Penal Transitoria (First Transitory Criminal Chamber), Exp. No. AV 19-2001 (Cases Barrios Altos, La Cantuta, Sótanos SIE), Judgment of 30 December 2009. – The theory was already applied before, inter alia, against Shining Path leader Abimael Guzman, see Caro (2010) 10 ICLRev 583, 598-9.

del derecho, 'Rechtsgelöstheit'), the interchangeability or replaceability ('fungibilidad', 'Fungibilität') of the direct perpetrators and the direct perpetrator's (pre-)disposition to commit the act ('disposición', 'Tatgeneigtheit')⁸².

- 13 At the ICC, the general concept of perpetration 'through another person' was for the first time taken up in the Lubanga Confirmation Decision: The PTC recognized that those who have 'control over the commission of the offence' are perpetrators ('auteur') since, inter alia, they 'control the will of those who carry out the objective elements of the offence (commission of the crime through another person, or indirect perpetration)'. Further, the PTC affirmed that the most typical manifestation of the 'control over the act theory' is 'the commission of a crime through another person', as explicitly provided for in article 25 para. 3 (a) ICC Statute⁸³. However, the Lubanga PTC neither applied this concept to the defendant nor did it contain the notion of perpetration by virtue of an organization. It was only with the case of *Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui*⁸⁴ that the organizational element found its way into the deliberations of the PTC, calling those cases most relevant to international criminal law 'in which the perpetrator behind the perpetrator commits the crime through another by means of 'control over an organization''⁸⁵. As set out by the Chamber, liability for this mode of attribution depends on a hierarchical organization in which the orders of the perpetrator are automatically complied with by interchangeable executors⁸⁶. Regarding the requirement of interchangeability, or fungibility, the Chamber is rightly aware of the problem that direct perpetrators acting fully responsible and culpable cannot, from a naturalistic perspective, without further ado be regarded as mere fungible mediators of the criminal acts. In order to overcome this problem, the fungibility criterion is substituted by the requirement of 'automatic' compliance. Thus, it suffices, in the PTC's view, that the perpetrator 'secures automatic compliance through intensive, strict, and violent training regimes, for example, by abducting minors and subjecting them to punishing training regimens in which they are taught to shoot, pillage, rape and kill'⁸⁷, or through payment and punishment mechanisms⁸⁸. This criterion arguably captures better the typical lack of institutional autonomy of a direct ⁸² See for a detailed analysis of the relevant facts and the law, Ambos (2011) 9 JICJ 137–158.

⁸³ See Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 332 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>.

⁸⁴ For a concise summary of the case cf. Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 92; Olásolo, Criminal Responsibility (2009) 318 et seq.

⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 498 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>. The Chamber mainly relies on German and Spanish doctrine and the acceptance of this new mode of liability in 'numerous national jurisdictions' (para. 502). Critical in this respect Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 105 et seq.; Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 169–70; Werle and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 854 et seq.; Ohlin et al. (2013) 26 LeidenJIL 725, 734 and 742 ('clash of legal cultures'); for an analysis of the development of indirect co-perpetration see Eldar (2014) 8 Crim. L. and Philos. 605, 606 et seq.

⁸⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 512–7 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>. The decision does not mention the two requirements 'detachment of the organization from the law' and 'disposition of the direct perpetrator to commit the act', cf. Werle and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 856 et seq.; Herzig (2013) ZIS 189, 196–7. See on these (and the other) requirements already mn. 12. For the German roots of the doctrine cf. Jessberger and Geneuss (2008) 6 JICJ 853, 859 et seq.; Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 92, 94 et seq. and the seminal article by Roxin (2011) 9 JICJ 193–205.

⁸⁷ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 518 (in abstract terms) and 547 (on the concrete case) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>. See, all concurring with this reasoning, van der Wilt (2009) 7 JICJ 307, 312; Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 172; Ambos, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 837, 846; see for the necessary elements for non-state organizational hierarchies ibid., 847 et seq.

⁸⁸ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, paras. 320–3 and 324–36 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 120 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 102–3, 107, 139, 146 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>.

perpetrator acting in a macro-criminal context given the institutionalist pressure exercised by the criminal system or organization upon him⁸⁹.

In Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, the PTC merged the concepts of co-perpetration and indirect perpetration to a form of indirect co-perpetration (mittelbare Mittäterschaft)⁹⁰ which however does not constitute a new (fourth) mode of attribution, but is only the result of the 'factual coincidence of two recognized forms of perpetration'⁹¹. Consequently, this form of perpetration easily fits into subpara. (a), in particular a recourse to international custom is unnecessary⁹². In the case at hand, the PTC found that the defendants had agreed, as commanders of their respective hierarchical organizations (paramilitary groups), on a common plan (the attack on the village of Bogoro) and both had made an essential contribution to the realization of this plan by way of their organizations⁹³. Thus, the PTC extended the criminal responsibility of each defendant, being indirect and co-perpetrator at the same time, to the crimes committed by the members of the other defendant's organization⁹⁴. Of course, the principle of culpability demands in the case of such a reciprocal vertical/horizontal imputation a solid proof of each defendant's mens rea towards the criminal acts committed by the other organization respectively.

Arguably, a different form of indirect co-perpetration has been adopted in the Al-Bashir arrest warrant decision⁹⁵, and most recently in the Blé Goudé Confirmation Decision⁹⁶, ⁸⁹ Cf. Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 362 with further references in fn. 42.

⁹⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 492, 521–2 and passim <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>.

⁹¹ Cf. Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 110; see also Eldar (2014) 8 CrimL&Phil 605, 611–3. This also follows from the very explanation of the PTC speaking of a 'combination of (...) committing crimes through other persons together with the mutual attribution among the co-perpetrators (...)' (Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 492 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>). In the same vein already Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, paras. 492–4, 741 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>. See also Olásolo, Criminal Responsibility (2009) 307–16 (313–4); Černič (2011) 22 CLF 539, 558.

⁹² Thus, the fact that the just mentioned Stakić TC Judgment was overturned by Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-A, Judgment, AC, 22 March 2006, para. 62 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/09f75f/>> for lack of basis in customary international law is irrelevant in the context of the ICC Statute, see correctly Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 508 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>; more recently Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 289 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>.

⁹³ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 548–60 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>. See for the same approach Prosecutor v. Bemba, No. ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, PTC III, 10 June 2008, paras. 69–72 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fb80c6/>>. However, in the Confirmation Decision, the Chamber restricted the mode of liability to simple co-perpetration, see Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, No. ICC 01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, para. 348 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/07965c/>>.

⁹⁴ Critical Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 174 et seq. (arguing that the concept could 'overly broaden' the thresholds of liability for perpetration and therefore would need further clarification in the upcoming case law). Werle and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 861 correctly claim that a correct application of the 'control over the act' theory requires that only the crimes committed jointly by the different organizations (and not also those committed by one organization alone) shall be attributed to the co-perpetrators. Welcoming the Chamber's findings and relating them to the Preamble's call against impunity ('the most serious crimes ... must not go unpunished') Černič (2011) 22 CLF 539, 558, 565 (calling this mode 'joint commission through another person'). Against this 'radical expansion of Article 25(3)(a)' in such cases, Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-02/12-4, Judgment, TC, Concurring Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 18 December 2012, paras. 58–64 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7d5200/>>.

⁹⁵ Cf. for the relevant findings Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-1, Decision on the the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, PTC I, 4 March 2009, paras. 209–223 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/814cca/>>, charging Al Bashir as an indirect perpetrator or indirect co-perpetrator; cf. also Eldar (2014) 8 CrimL&Phil 605, 610–1.

⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, paras. 136 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>; dissenting ibid., Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, para. 5, with fn. 3 (the 'notion [of indirect co-perpetration] is incompatible with article 25(3)(a) of the Statute').

namely a form of joint indirect perpetratorship ('Mittäterschaft in mittelbarer Täterschaft')⁹⁷. Accordingly, as opposed to indirect co-perpetration, there exists only one (criminal) organization led and dominated by (various) co-perpetrators acting with a common purpose. In other words, this combination of indirect perpetration with co-perpetration does not encompass cases where various organizations collaborate, but only those cases where various leaders, as indirect perpetrators, exercise joint control over one hierarchical organization. That is the case in the Blé Goudé decision where 'Blé Goudé is charged with having committed the alleged crimes jointly with Laurent Gbagbo and the latter's inner circle'⁹⁸, i. e., having 'exercised control, jointly with the other co-perpetrators, over the pro-Gbagbo forces, which were organised and hierarchical in nature and through which the crimes charged were committed'⁹⁹. It is, however, questionable if this combined mode of perpetration can really be inferred from the mentioned Al-Bashir decision. For the only paragraph dedicated to indirect co-perpetration in that decision reads that Al Bashir and other 'leaders directed the branches of the "apparatus" of the State of Sudan that they led, in a coordinated manner, in order to jointly implement the common plan'¹⁰⁰, i. e., it seems as if the PTC assumes that there are various sub-organizations ('branches') in the broader state organization. Be that as it may, a joint indirect perpetratorship is certainly conceptually possible and has indeed been recognized in other subsequent PTC-decisions¹⁰¹.

The Katanga TC, with Judge van den Wyngaert dissenting, confirmed the control over the act theory¹⁰². In fact, the TC does not only acknowledge the importance of this theory, but explicitly recognizes the ensuing forms of control¹⁰³ and, in particular, elaborates on the Organisationsherrschaftslehre ('contrôle sur l'organisation'), giving extensive credit to its founder Claus Roxin and suggesting two criteria for its application: the nature of the ⁹⁷ Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 92, 111; Werle and Burghardt, in: Bloy et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Manfred Maiwald (2011) 849, 853, 862 et seq.; cf. also Eldar (2014) 8 CrimL&Philos 605, 606 et seq., 611-3.

⁹⁸ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 136. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>.

⁹⁹ Ibid., para. 149.

¹⁰⁰ Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-1, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, PTC I, 4 March 2009, para. 216 (emphasis added) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/814cca/>>. Indeed, the alternatively charged mode of pure 'indirect perpetration' seems to capture Al Bashir's responsibility better since he is alleged to have had 'full control of all branches of the apparatus of the State of Sudan' (para. 222). As to the element of 'co-perpetration' (i. e., in the notion of indirect co-perpetration), Judge Anita Usacka expressed doubts whether the alleged co-perpetrators were in full capacity to frustrate the execution of the common plan and therefore only found reasonable grounds to charge Al-Bashir as an indirect perpetrator, cf. her Partly Dissenting Opinion, ibid., para. 104. Cf. for the same doubts Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 169, 175. Preferring either indirect perpetration or co-perpetration van der Wilt (2009) 7 JICJ 307, 310, 314.

¹⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Kenyatta et al., No. ICC-01/09-02/11-382, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 408 (referring to the Mungiki organization) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4972c0/>> and Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 315 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>; Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-3, Warrant of Arrest for Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, 27 June 2011, 6 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1bcca2/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 101 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>> and Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 230 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>.

¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, paras. 1393-5 (arguing that this theory, being objective and subjective at the same time, fits best to Art. 25(3) and makes a distinction between the different forms of participation possible) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>; for this reason the Chamber retains this theory (ibid., paras. 1382, 1396). The Chamber then applies it to define perpetrators ('auteurs') as persons 'qui ont un contrôle sur la commission dudit crime et qui ont connaissance des circonstances de fait leur permettant d'exercer ce contrôle' (ibid., § 1396) and the indirect perpetrator ('auteur indirect') as 'celui qui a le pouvoir de décider si et comment le crime sera commis dans la mesure où c'est lui qui détermine la perpétration' [ibid., emphasis in the original, fn. omitted]) while the accomplice ('complice') 'n'exerce pas un tel contrôle' (ibid.). For the (other) original French quotes see Ambos (2014) 12 JICJ 219, 227, 228; see also Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 822-5.

¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, paras. 1402-3 ('contrôle sur la volonté' pursuant, inter alia, to 'contrainte' or 'erreur', and control pursuant to an 'appareil de pouvoir organisé') <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

organisation and its effective control by the persons who employ it for the commission of crimes¹⁰⁴. With the recent confirmation of this theory as ‘a convincing and adequate approach’ by the Lubanga AC¹⁰⁵ it is fair to say that this theory is indeed now the guiding principle to distinguish between perpetration and accessorial responsibility (secondary participation) in the Court’s case law¹⁰⁶. The AC’s reasoning starts by recognizing the existence (and liability) of a perpetrator behind direct (physical) perpetrators, even in cases where the latter ‘are themselves fully criminally responsible for that crime’; it calls for ‘a normative assessment of the relationship between the person actually carrying out the incriminated conduct and the person in the background, as well as of the latter person’s relationship to the crime’¹⁰⁷. The Chamber applies the same normative assessment to indirect co-perpetration¹⁰⁸ (given that it is just a special form of indirect perpetration) with a view to distinguish co-perpetration from accessorial responsibility¹⁰⁹.

Of course, the fundamental problem of any theory of indirect perpetration over fully responsible direct perpetrators, including the Organisationsherrschaftslehre, remains the convincing explanation of the indirect perpetrator’s control given that the direct perpetrator’s conduct is imputed to the Hintermann as though it were his own¹¹⁰. Generally speaking, perpetration by means requires a sufficiently tight control by the ‘Hintermann’ over the direct perpetrator, similar to the relationship between superior and subordinate in the case of command responsibility (article 28)¹¹¹. Although it cannot be denied that the ‘man in the ¹⁰⁴ Ibid., paras. 1404–16 with the development of the two criteria in § 1407 et seq. These ground-breaking considerations deserve a much more detailed analysis but for reasons of space can only be summarized here as follows: § 1404 (‘contrôle sur l’organisation’ with explicit reference to Roxin), 1405 (‘l’exercice d’un contrôle sur un appareil de pouvoir rend possible un contrôle sur les crimes commis par ses membres’), 1408 (‘interchangeabilité’ of the direct perpetrators and their automatic execution of the crimes), 1409 (‘automatisme fonctionnel’), 1410 (general applicability to modern forms of criminal organizations), 1411 (as to the control of the Hintermann it is necessary that he uses ‘au minimum une partie de l’appareil’ to have the crimes committed), 1412 (effective control over the organization only possible by those ‘qui contrôlent, effectivement et sans interférence possible’ at least a part of it; adopting this writer’s position as quoted in fn. 3211; see also Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 159–60, 1413–15 (general subjective requirements with regard to the crimes and knowledge with regard to the ‘éléments fondamentaux’ which allow for the exercise of the said organizational control). Against this background, the caveat that the theory of organizational control is not the only ‘réponse juridique’ in interpreting Art. 25(3)(a) Alt. 3 (para. 1406) appears as a mere concession to internal disagreements or discussions given Judge van den Wyngaert’s continuing rejection of this theory; discussing her view Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 94 et seq. More important in this regard is the Chamber’s clarification that other forms of participation may be relevant at the level of the internal structure of the organization (para. 1410). In casu, the Chamber rejected the control requirement (paras. 1417 et seq.) and convicted Katanga pursuant to Art. 25(3)(d) ICC Statute (paras. 1643 et seq.). Cf. also Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 824 who holds that the Katanga TC invoked a relatively high threshold for indirect perpetration than the Lubanga PTC; conc. with the Katanga approach Gil and Maculan (2015) 28 LeidenJIL 364 et seq. (focusing regarding Organisationsherrschaft on the effective control, at 367).

¹⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 469, 473 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>.

¹⁰⁶ Cf. also Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 135, quoting the Lubanga AC Judgment <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>.

¹⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, paras. 458, 465 (responsibility without personal commission (own hands)) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>.

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., para. 466 (‘it is not required that a person actually carries out directly and personally the incriminated conduct in order to be a co-perpetrator. Rather, in order to determine whether a person is a co-perpetrator, a normative assessment of that person’s role is required.’).

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., para. 469. This assessment should be ‘primarily based on the objective criterion of the accused person’s extent of contribution to the crime’ (468). ‘The contribution of a co-perpetrator must be of greater significance’ than that of accessories (467).

¹¹⁰ Crit. for example Weigend (2011) 9 JICJ 91, 92, 103 (disapproving of the concept’s ‘vagueness of dominance’, in essence rejecting the organizational element in Article 25 (3) (a) and instead militating for assessing an indirect perpetrator’s control over the executor on a case-by-case basis, independent from the existence of organizational structures). Focusing on the person controlling the organisation as ‘the Zentralgestalt in the course of events leading up to the crimes’, Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014) 141 et seq.

¹¹¹ Conc. Eser, in Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 795 with fn. 111; id. (2007) 5 JICJ 953, 964. On the proximity between command responsibility and Organisationsherrschaft see also Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 300.

background' exercises only limited control over a fully responsible direct perpetrator – he or she may, at any time, decide to abandon the criminal plan – this lack of control is compensated by the control of the criminal organization, which produces an unlimited number of potential willing executors. In other (more 'dogmatic') words, although direct perpetrators acting with full criminal responsibility cannot be considered mere 'fungible mediators of the act' (fungible Tatmittler), the system provides for a practically unlimited number of replacements and thereby for a high degree of flexibility as far as the personnel necessary to commit the crimes is concerned¹¹². For this 'system' or organizational reason, one can also argue, as already done above (mn. 13), that the individual perpetrator has less institutional autonomy than the one acting outside a system or organization. Another, more normativist explanation of Organisationsherrschaft follows, with regard to state organizations, from the state's special duty of protection vis-à-vis its citizens which entails its special duty to limit and control its violating power (Verletzungsmacht) with regard to citizens' rights. If the state orders to violate these rights or fails to prevent such violations, it does not live up to this special duty and thus its highest representatives incur criminal responsibility being part of the state organization¹¹³.

Still, it is clear that only very few persons command the control necessary to immediately replace one (failing) executor by another, namely only those who belong to the leadership of the criminal organization or who at least control a part of the organization; only they can dominate the unfolding of the criminal plan undisturbed by other members of the organization¹¹⁴. Although these persons are generally far away from the actual execution of the criminal acts and are therefore normally considered indirect perpetrators or even accessories before the fact, they are in fact, from a normative perspective, the main perpetrators while the executors (the direct perpetrators) are merely accessories or accomplices in the implementation of the criminal enterprise¹¹⁵. In contrast, mid-level perpetrators lack unlimited control, their actions might always be 'disturbed' by superiors; therefore, they rather qualify as co-perpetrators than indirect perpetrators assuming that they have an, at least, silent agreement with the direct, low-level perpetrators¹¹⁶.

Thus, it becomes clear that the system of individual attribution of responsibility, as used for ordinary criminality, must be modified in international criminal law aiming at the development of a mixed system of individual-collective responsibility in which the criminal enterprise or organisation as a whole serves as the entity upon which attribution of criminal responsibility is based (so-called Zurechnungsprinzip Gesamttat)¹¹⁷. In this sense, the individual criminal contributions of the participants must be assessed in the light of their effect on

¹¹² Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2002/2004) 594 et seq. (597–8), 614 with further references; in a similar vein Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 141–2.

¹¹³ Cf. for more details Ambos, in: Nollkaemper and van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality (2009) 127, 148 et seq. with further references in fn. 98 and Ambos (2011) 9 JICJ 137, 155–6.

¹¹⁴ Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2002/2004) 602 et seq., 614; id., in: Nollkaemper and van der Wilt (eds.), System Criminality (2009) 127, 154; Ambos, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 837, 850 et seq.

¹¹⁵ Cf. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 220, 249; id., Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 375.

¹¹⁶ For a different view Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 430 et seq.; id. (2014) 12 JICJ 295, 304 who considers 'ordering' as the appropriate mode of liability for the top-level perpetrators and applies indirect-perpetration to the mid-level perpetrators since only they (and not the top-level agents) dispose of fungible direct executors.

¹¹⁷ On this fundamental concept of attribution for collective criminality see the seminal work of Dencker, Kausalität und Gesamttat (1996) 125 et seq., 152 et seq., 229, 253 et seq. and passim; id., in: Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen (2002) 525, 534 et seq. The concept was further elaborated by Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 214 et seq., 236 et seq., 303, 304 et seq., 359 et seq. (referring in particular to the crime of genocide) and id., Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 373 et seq., 414 et seq.; see also Ambos, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 837, 846 et seq. For a discussion on the ICC's challenge to develop a consistent system of attribution see also Fletcher (2011) 9 JICJ 179–190; cf. also Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014) 138–149. On the limitations of the indirect modes of liability cf. also Eldar (2014) 8 Crim. L. and Philos. 605, 613 et seq.

the criminal plan or purpose pursued by the criminal apparatus or organization. Contributions without any effect may be excluded and the contributors exempted from responsibility. One can speak of a system of ‘organizational domination in stages’ (stufenweise Organisationsherrschaft), where domination requires, however, at least some form of control over part of the organization¹¹⁸. Thus, taking up the distinction between main perpetrators and accomplices made above, there are in fact three levels of participation: the first and highest level is composed of those (main) perpetrators who plan and organize the criminal events as a whole and as such belong to the leadership level (Führungstäter); at the second level we find those (still main) perpetrators of at least the mid-level of the hierarchy who exercise some form of control over a part of the organization (Organisationstäter); the third and last level consists of the accomplices who merely execute the crimes (Ausführungstäter)¹¹⁹. Thus, in a nutshell, the participant’s influence on the macro-criminal event depends, from a normative perspective, on his or her rank and influence within the collective system responsible for the criminal events as a whole.

b) ‘... regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible’. It is not clear 16 from the English original wording if ‘that other person’ refers to both co-perpetration and perpetration by means or only to the latter. The travaux do not offer an explanation, since the problem was simply not addressed in Rome. The French (‘celle-ci’) and Spanish (‘éste’) versions indicate, however, that the reference applies only to the intermediary. This is confirmed by a teleological interpretation.

As explained above (mn. 8), in the case of co-perpetration all persons involved fulfil a 17 certain function and are, therefore, criminally responsible. Thus, the reference cannot apply to co-perpetration. On the other hand, in the case of perpetration by means, it is typical that the person used (‘the instrument’) is not criminally responsible. The express recognition of this fact is superfluous. Yet it makes sense in the exceptional case that the instrument is criminally responsible, e. g., in the above mentioned ‘Organisationsherrschaft’ by the indirect perpetrator. For in this case the reference confirms that a perpetration by means is even possible if the direct perpetrator is criminally responsible¹²⁰. This was confirmed by the *Lubanga AC*¹²¹ as explained above (mn. 14).

2. ‘orders, solicits or induces’ an (attempted) crime

A number of very different forms of participation are established in this subparagraph. A 18 person who orders a crime is not a mere accomplice but rather an indirect perpetrator, using a subordinate to commit the crime¹²². Indeed, the identical article 2 para. 1 (b) of the 1996 Draft Code was intended to provide for the criminal responsibility of mid-level officials who order their subordinates to commit crimes¹²³. The ICTR, in the Akayesu judgment, held that ‘ordering implies a superior-subordinate relationship’ whereby ‘the person in a position of ¹¹⁸ See already Ambos (1998) 145 GA 226, 237-8; also available in Spanish: ‘Dominio del hecho por dominio de voluntad en virtud de aparatos organizados de poder’ 37–8 (Bogotá 1998, Universidad Externado) = 3 Revista de Derecho Penal y Criminología (Universidad Nacional de Educación a Distancia, Facultad de Derecho, Spain) 133 (Jan. 1999, 2^{na} Epoca) = 9 Cuadernos de Doctrina y Jurisprudencia Penal (Argentina) 367 (1999). Conc. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 239. On the nature of the organization see Ambos, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 837 et seq. (spanish in <www.indret.com>); cf. also Jain, Perpetrators and Accessories in ICL (2014), 144, for whom organisation can have a very broad meaning including ‘informal networks of power with weak links’.

¹¹⁹ Cf. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 29–30, 240 et seq., 302; id., Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 409 et seq.

¹²⁰ Conc. van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility (2003) 71. See recently Roxin, in: Amelung et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Volker Krey (2010) 449, 451-2.

¹²¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, Judgment, AC, 1 December 2014, para. 465 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/585c75/>>.

¹²² Contrary Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 214 arguing that ‘ordering’ constitutes a sub-category of instigation; also Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 61.

¹²³ 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 25 (para. 14).

authority uses it to convince (or coerce) another to commit an offence'¹²⁴. Such a – at least *de facto*¹²⁵ – ‘superior-subordinate relationship’ is also the first and basic requirement of command or superior responsibility as first confirmed in the ‘Celebici’ case¹²⁶ and adopted by the subsequent case law of the ad hoc Tribunals¹²⁷. The ICC case law so far also requires a ‘position of authority’ from which the person responsible has to ‘instruct’ another person to commit a crime¹²⁸, but, apart from that, it does not distinguish ordering from the other forms of accessorial liability of subparagraph (b)¹²⁹. In any case, the first alternative in subparagraph (b) ([o]rders’) complements the command responsibility provision (article 28): in the latter case the superior is liable for an omission, in the case of an order to commit a crime the superior is liable for commission for having ‘ordered’. In conclusion, the first alternative in subparagraph (b) actually belongs to the forms of perpetration provided for in subparagraph (a), being a form of commission ‘through another person’¹³⁰, as a consequence, any additional subjective requirement, such as the ‘intent to destroy’ in Article 6, must be fulfilled¹³¹.

¹²⁴ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 483 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b8d7bd/>>. In the same vein Prosecutor v. Krstić, No. IT-98-33/T, Judgment, TC, 2 August 2001, para. 601 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/440d3a/>>; Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, para. 445 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>; see also Prosecutor v. Mrksić et al., No. IT-95-13/1-T, Judgment, TC, 27 September 2007, para. 550 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32111c/>>; Prosecutor v. Martić, No. IT-95-11-T, Judgment, TC, 12 June 2007, para. 441 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/06634c/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, para. 905 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Stanisic and Simatovic, No. IT-03-69-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 30 May 2013, para. 1263 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/698c43/>>.

¹²⁵ Cf. for example, Prosecutor v. Boskoski and Tarculovski, No. IT-04-82-A, Judgment, AC, 19 May 2010, para. 164 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/54398a/>> and Prosecutor v. Ntawukulilyayo, No. ICTR-05-82-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 3 August 2010, para. 416 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbc983/>>.

¹²⁶ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, paras. 348 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>. Cf. Zahar and Sluiter, ICL Introduction (2008) 261 et seq.

¹²⁷ Cf. Prosecutor v. Renzaho, No. ICTR-97-31-T, Judgment, TC, 14 July 2009, paras. 744 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9bbd8a/>>; Prosecutor v. Bizimungu, No. ICTR-00-56B-A, Judgment, AC, 30 June 2014, para. 73 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4c5065/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-T, Judgment, TC, 23 February 2011, para. 1881 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/653651/>>; Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., No. IT-06-90-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 15 April 2011, para. 1963 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86922c/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, para. 905 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Brima et al., No. SCSL-2004-16-PT, Further Amended Consolidated Indictment, 18 February 2005, para. 36 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c3dc48/>>; see also with regard to ECCC Prosecutor v. Khieu and Nuon, No. 002/19-09-2007/ECCC/TC, Judgment, TC, 7 August 2014, para. 715 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4888de/>>. For a summary of the earlier case law see Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICL (2002) 815 et seq. and Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 375 et seq. For case law references since World War II see Finnin, Accessory Modes of Liability (2012) 43 et seq.

¹²⁸ Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, No. ICC-01/04-01/12-1Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, PTC II, 13 July 2012, paras. 63–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ecfae0/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 145 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 243, 245 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>.

¹²⁹ See especially Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 243 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>> where PTC I puts the forms of liability of subparagraph (b) on an equal footing with the exception of a position of authority as a special element of ordering. In its application to the case it does not distinguish between ordering and (normally) instigating either (esp. para. 246: ‘... instructed or otherwise instigated ...’); in the same vein, Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 159 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>, holding that ‘soliciting’, ‘inducing’ and ‘ordering’, are all form of instigation, and overlap with each other ‘with the exception of the requirement of a position of authority held by the person vis-à-vis the perpetrator(s) of the crime, which is particular to ‘ordering’ and is not a necessary element of ‘soliciting’ or ‘inducing’.

¹³⁰ In the same vein Eser, in Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 797 who, however, correctly clarifies (in fn. 123) that the Akayesu TC considers ‘ordering’ as a form of complicity. See also Satō (2012) 12 ICLRev 293, 297–300, who considers ordering within the meaning of Article 25(3)(b) as a form of principal responsibility as recognized by Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui PTC by Organisationsherrschaft. cf. also Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 379.

¹³¹ Contrary Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 215–6.

Soliciting a crime means, inter alia, ‘urging, advising, commanding, or otherwise inciting another to commit a crime’¹³². Similarly, inducing entails the ‘enticement or urging of another person to commit a crime’¹³³. Thus, both terms basically refer to a situation where a person is influenced by another to commit a crime¹³⁴. In fact, the French version of the Statute speaks of ‘solicite ou encourage’, thereby using a form of solicitation to express the English term ‘induce’. In substance, in both cases a person is caused to commit a crime¹³⁵. Such ‘causal’ influence is normally of a psychological nature (persuasion), but may also take the form of physical pressure (coercion) within the meaning of *vis compulsiva*¹³⁶. It may also occur in a chain, i. e., a person induces another to induce a third person to commit a crime¹³⁷. In contrast to cases of ‘ordering’, a superior-subordinate relationship is not necessary¹³⁸. In both cases, however, the conduct must have a ‘direct effect on the commission or attempted commission of the crime’¹³⁹.

3. ‘For the purpose of facilitating aids, abets or otherwise assists ...’

Subparagraph (c) codifies any other assistance not covered by subparagraph (b). Generally speaking, participation as defined by subparagraph (b) implies a higher degree of responsibility than in the case of subparagraph (c).

a) ‘aids, abets or otherwise assists ... including providing the means’. ‘Aiding and abetting’ as the weakest form of complicity covers any act, which contributes to the commission or attempted commission of a crime¹⁴⁰. The difficult task is to determine the minimum requirements of this mode of complicity. Article 2 para. 3 (d) of the 1996 Draft Code requires that the aiding and abetting be ‘direct and substantial’; i. e., the contribution should facilitate the commission of a crime in ‘some significant way’¹⁴¹. The ICTY referred to these criteria in the Tadić case and held that the act in question must constitute a direct and substantial contribution to the commission of the crime¹⁴². ‘Substantial’ means that the contribution has an effect on the commission; in other words, it must – in one way or

¹³² Black (ed.), Black’s Law Dictionary (1999) 1398; American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 5.02 (1).

¹³³ Black (ed.), Black’s Law Dictionary (1999) 779.

¹³⁴ See also Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 243 (even including ‘ordering’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 153 (inducing as exerting influence over another person) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>.

¹³⁵ Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 481 et seq. I do not longer follow the view of the First Edition, that a meaningful terminological distinction between both terms can be made. For an ‘umbrella’ function of soliciting also Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 797 with fn. 117. Different Militello (2007) 5 JICJ 941, 947. See also Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 213-4.

¹³⁶ Unlike vis absoluta, vis compulsiva leaves the person still a certain freedom to act and decide (cf. Jescheck and Weigend, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 224).

¹³⁷ Cf. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 203 et seq., 238.

¹³⁸ In this sense, see also Prosecutor v. Nchamihigo, No. ICTR-01-63-A, Judgment, AC, 18 March 2010, para. 188 (‘a position of authority is not a required element under this mode of liability’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4b3598/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, para. 902 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>; Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 159 (‘the requirement of a position of authority... is not a necessary element of “soliciting” or “inducing”’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>; Heller, in: Heller and Dubber, Handbook (2011) 593, 607.

¹³⁹ Prosecutor v. Mudacumura, No. ICC-01/04-01/12-1Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, PTC II, 13 July 2012, para. 63 (regarding ordering) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ecfae0/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, paras. 145, 153 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 247 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>.

¹⁴⁰ Cf. Finin, Accessory Modes of Liability (2012) 73 et seq., 90–1 (‘virtually no limits on the type of act’, 91).

¹⁴¹ 1996 ILC Draft Code, 24 (para. 10).

¹⁴² Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, TC, 7 May 1997, paras. 674, 688–92 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0a90ae/>>.

another – have a causal relationship with the result¹⁴³. However, this does not necessarily require physical presence at the scene of the crime. In Tadić, TC II followed a broad concept of complicity based on the English ‘concerned in the killing’ theory¹⁴⁴. In fact, the Chamber did not take the ‘direct and substantial’ criterion very seriously since it included within the concept of aiding and abetting ‘all acts of assistance by words or acts that lend encouragement or support’¹⁴⁵. This position was confirmed by a TC in ‘Celebici’¹⁴⁶ and, more recently, in *Naletilić and Martinović*¹⁴⁷. The AC stressed that the aiding and abetting must have a substantial effect on the main act¹⁴⁸.

- 22 In Furundžija the ICTY took a more sophisticated view¹⁴⁹. The TC distinguished between the nature of assistance and its effect on the act of the principal (main perpetrator). Regarding the former it stated that the assistance need not be ‘tangible’ but that ‘moral support and encouragement’ is sufficient. Mere presence at the scene of the crime suffices if it has ‘a significant legitimizing or encouraging effect on the principals’. The term ‘direct’ – used by the ILC – in qualifying the proximity of the assistance is ‘misleading’ since it implies that the assistance needs to be ‘tangible’¹⁵⁰. Regarding the effect of the assistance the Chamber does not consider a causal relationship in the sense of the conditio sine qua non formula necessary but holds that the acts of assistance must ‘make a significant difference to the commission of the criminal act by the principal’. Thus, it is, for example, sufficient that a person continues to interrogate the victim while it is being raped by another person¹⁵¹. The ‘significant’-requirement, however, implies that it would not be sufficient if the accomplice has only ‘a role in a system without influence’¹⁵². With regard to the Rome Statute, the Chamber explicitly states that it is ‘less restrictive’ than the ILC Draft Code 1996 since it does not limit aiding and abetting – as article 2 para. 3 (d) Draft Code does – to assistance which ‘facilitate[s] in some significant way’, or ‘directly and substantially’ assists the perpetrator. Rather, subparagraph (c) contemplates ‘assistance either in physical form or in the form of moral support. ... “abet” includes mere exhortation or encouragement’¹⁵³. In sum, aiding and abetting requires ‘practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime’¹⁵⁴. The AC endorsed this view¹⁵⁵.

¹⁴³ Ibid., para. 688. On the substantial effect as a ‘form of causation’ see also Stewart (2012) 25 *LJIL*165, 203.

¹⁴⁴ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, TC, 7 May 1997, para. 687: ‘... not only does one not have to be present but the connection between the act contributing to the commission and the act of commission itself can be geographically and temporally distanced’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0a90ae/>>. For the ‘concerned in the killing’ doctrine, see: (1948) 15 LRTWC 49-51; also: Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 691 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>.

¹⁴⁵ Ibid., para. 689.

¹⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, paras. 325-9 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>.

¹⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 726 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfef/>>, see also Prosecutor v. Blagojević and Jokić, No. IT-02-60-T, Judgment, TC, 17 January 2005, para. 726 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7483f2/>>.

¹⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, AC, 20 February 2001, para. 352 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/051554/>>. As to the concrete case the Chamber held that the position as a camp guard is not per se sufficient (para. 364).

¹⁴⁹ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, paras. 190-249 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>.

¹⁵⁰ Ibid., paras. 199, 232.

¹⁵¹ Ibid., paras. 273-4; confirmed by the AC in Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1 A, Judgment, AC, 21 July 2000, para. 126 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/660d3f/>> and Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 63 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfef/>>.

¹⁵² Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, paras. 217, 233-4 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>.

¹⁵³ Ibid., para. 231.

¹⁵⁴ Ibid., paras. 235, 249.

¹⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1 A, Judgment, AC, 21 July 2000, paras. 117 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/660d3f/>>.

The subsequent case law of the ICTY has confirmed the broad concept of aiding and abetting developed in Tadić, Celibici and *Furundžija*¹⁵⁶. The Aleksovski TC required an ‘effect important’ on the main act¹⁵⁷ and allowed the act of support to be given at any time¹⁵⁸. In *Prosecutor v. Strugar*¹⁵⁹ the TC declined to enter convictions against Pavle Strugar for aiding and abetting on the grounds that there was no settled jurisprudence on whether, and in what circumstances, an omission may constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting. Further, it found that Strugar’s failure to carry out an investigation into the offences committed and punish the perpetrators thereof occurred well after the commission of the offences and thus could not have had a requisite direct and substantial effect on them¹⁶⁰. As to the issue of a causal relationship between the aiding and the final criminal result, the TCs in Aleksovski, Blaškić, Krnojelac, Vasiljević, and Naletilić and Martinović followed Furundžija renouncing this requirement¹⁶¹. Presence at the scene of the crime would (only) be sufficient if the accused had an ‘autorité incontestée’ that encouraged the direct perpetrator to commit the crime¹⁶². At a minimum, the presence of a superior constitutes a ‘probative indication’ in ¹⁵⁶ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, TC, 25 June 1999, paras. 60 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/52d982/>>; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 245 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., Nos. IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, TC, 22 February 2001, paras. 391–3 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fd881d/>>; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2001, paras. 395 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d4fedd/>>; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, paras. 88 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>; Prosecutor v. Limaj et al., No. IT-03-66-T, Judgment, TC, 30 November 2005, para. 516 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4e469a/>>; confirmed by Prosecutor v. Limaj et al., No. IT-03-66-A, Judgment, AC, 27 September 2007, paras. 90 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6d43bf/>>; Prosecutor v. Mrksić et al., No. IT-95-13/1-T, Judgment, TC, 27 September 2007, paras. 551 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32111c/>>; Prosecutor v. Haradinaj et al., No. IT-04-84-T, Judgment, TC, 3 April 2008, para. 145 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/025913/>>; Prosecutor v. Oric, No. IT-03-68-A, Judgment, AC, 3 July 2008, para. 43 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e053a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Mrksić et al., No. IT-95-13/1, Judgment, AC, 5 May 2009, paras. 48, 81, 146, 159 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/40bc41/>>; Prosecutor v. Popović et al., No. IT-05-88-T, Judgment, TC, 10 June 2010, paras. 1014, 1018 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/481867/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-T, Judgment, TC, 23 February 2011, paras. 1873–4 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/653651/>>; Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., No. IT-06-90-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 15 April 2011, para. 1960 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86922c/>>; Prosecutor v. Lukić and Lukić, No. IT-98-32/1-T, Judgment, TC, 20 July 2009, para. 901 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af5ad0/>>; Prosecutor v. Perišić, No. IT-04-81-T, Judgment, TC, 6 September 2011, para. 126 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f3b23d/>>; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, TC, 12 December 2012, paras. 907–8 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/445e4e/>>. Regarding the ICTR see Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 482 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 470 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>. With regard to the SCSL, Prosecutor v. Taylor, No. SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, TC, 18 May 2012, para. 6904 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8075e7/>> (for an analysis Ambos and Njikam (2013) 11 JICJ 789, 792 et seq., 799 et seq.; Prosecutor v. Taylor, No. SCSL-03-01-A, Judgment, AC, 26 September 2013, paras. 362 et seq., 401 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3e7be5/>>).

¹⁵⁷ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, TC, 25 June 1999, paras. 60–1 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/52d982/>>.

¹⁵⁸ Ibid., para. 62. See also Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>.

¹⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Strugar, No. IT-01-42-T, Judgment, TC, 31 January 2005 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/927ba5/>>.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Hinek (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 477.

¹⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, TC, 25 June 1999, para. 61 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/52d982/>>; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 88 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>; Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 63 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfef/>>; Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-T, Judgment, TC, 29 November 2002, para. 70 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8035f9/>>; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, AC, 29 July 2004, para. 48 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/88d8e6/>>; Prosecutor v. Blagojević and Jokić, No. IT-02-60-T, Judgment, TC, 17 January 2005, para. 726 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7483f2/>>.

¹⁶² Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, TC, 25 June 1999, paras. 63 et seq. (65) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/52d982/>>; similarly Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 89: ‘significant legitimising or encouraging effect’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>; also Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-T, Judgment, TC, 29 November 2002, para. 70 <<http://www.legal-tool->

this respect¹⁶³. Most recently, the debate about ‘specific direction’ as a constitutive element of aiding or abetting¹⁶⁴ brought again the question of a reasonable limitation of this form of liability to the fore. While it is controversial whether specific direction has always been, either as part of the actus reus or of the mens rea, an element of aiding and abetting in the ICTY/ICTR case law¹⁶⁵, it serves as an important qualifier in establishing a culpable link between the assistance provided by the accomplice and the crimes of the principal perpetrators¹⁶⁶. In this sense, specific direction may also be invoked to more precisely determine the relevant assistance or contribution in the context of the discussion about neutral acts, especially with regard to Article 25(3)(d)¹⁶⁷.

- 24 The ICTR defined aiding in Akayesu as ‘giving assistance to someone’ and abetting as involving ‘facilitating the commission of an act by being sympathetic thereto’¹⁶⁸. The separate definitions of aiding and abetting do not mean, however, that individual responsibility within the meaning of article 6 para. 1 ICTR Statute is only incurred if both forms of participation – aiding and abetting – have been realized; aiding or abetting is sufficient¹⁶⁹. Subsequent case law, however, does not distinguish between aiding and abetting but requires for both, taking the same approach as the ICTY, any form of physical or moral support which contributes substantially to the commission of a crime¹⁷⁰. Similarly, the ICC PTC in Blé Goudé does not

s.org/doc/8035f9/;>; Prosecutor v. Blagojević and Jokić, No. IT-02-60-T, Judgment, TC, 17 January 2005, para. 726, fn. 2177: ‘Mere presence’ at the scene of the crime is not conclusive of aiding and abetting unless it is demonstrated to have a significant encouraging effect on the principal offender’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7483f2/>>.

¹⁶³ Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 63 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfeb/>>; Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., No. IT-06-90-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 15 April 2011, para. 1960 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86922c/>>. In Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>, the AC explicitly left open the possibility that ‘in the circumstances of a given case, an omission may constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting (para. 47)’.

¹⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Perišić, No. IT-04-81-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2013, para. 36 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f006ba/>> (‘no conviction for aiding and abetting may be entered if the element of specific direction is not established beyond reasonable doubt, either explicitly or implicitly’); para. 73 (‘... where an accused individual’s assistance is remote from the actions of principal perpetrators, specific direction must be explicitly established’). Conc. Stanisić and Simatović, No. IT-03-69-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 30 May 2013, para. 1264. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/698c43/>>; Prosecutor v. Ndahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-A, Judgment, AC, 16 December 2013, para. 147 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7034a5/>>. Contra Prosecutor v. Perišić, No. IT-04-81-T, Judgment, TC, 6 September 2011, para. 126 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f3b23d/>>; conc. Taylor, No. SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, TC, 18 May 2012, para. 484 with fn. 1141 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8075e7/>>; Taylor, No. SCSL-03-01-A, Judgment, AC, 26 September 2013, paras. 475 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3e7be5/>>; Sainović et al., No. IT-05-87-A, Judgment, AC, 23 January 2014, paras 1617–51 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/81ac8c/>>; Popović et al., No. IT-05-88-A, Judgment, AC, 30 January 2015, para. 1758 (welcoming this decision Bartels (2015) EJIL: Talk!); Khieu and Nuon, No. 002/19-09-2007/ECCC/TC, Judgment, TC, 7 August 2014, para. 710 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4888de/>>. For a discussion see Ambos and Njikam (2013) 11 JICJ 789, 804–8; Jones et al., Milestones (2013); Coco and Gal (2014) 12 JICJ 345, 357 et seq.

¹⁶⁵ Cf. Ambos and Njikam (2013) 11 JICJ 789, 806 with further references.

¹⁶⁶ Crit. of the concept being too imprecise Vest (2014) 132 SchZSR 61, 82 et seq.

¹⁶⁷ See notes 187 and 217 and main text.

¹⁶⁸ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 484 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>. For an analysis of the ICTR’s complicity concept with regard to genocide see Obote-Odora (2002) 2 ICLRev 301, 375, in particular on the distinction between aiding and abetting 391–2, 400.

¹⁶⁹ Similarly already Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschenverbrechen (1995) 169, 229.

¹⁷⁰ Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, No. ICTR-96-3-T, Judgment, TC, 6 December 1999, para. 43 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f0dbbb/>>; Prosecutor v. Musema, No. ICTR-96-13-T, Judgment, TC, 27 January 2000, paras. 125–6 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1fc6ed/>>; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, para. 33 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, TC, 15 May 2003, para. 385 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7e668a/>>; Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, TC, 22 January 2004, para. 597 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ac346/>>; Prosecutor v. Bisengimana, No. ICTR-00-60-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 13 April 2006, paras. 32 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/694dd8/>>; Prosecutor v. Karera, No. ICTR-01-74-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 7 December 2007, para. 548 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7bc57f/>>; Prosecutor v. Mpambara, No. ICTRdistinguish between the different forms of subparagraph (c), and only requires ‘for this form of responsibility ... that the person provides assistance to the commission of a crime and that, in engaging in this conduct, he or she intends to facilitate the commission of the crime’¹⁷¹. Thus, the contribution need neither ‘always’ be ‘tangible’¹⁷² nor need it be indispensable (in the sense of a conditio sine qua non)¹⁷³. Although it is not necessary that the aider or abettor be present during the commission¹⁷⁴, presence may indicate moral support, especially if the accused possesses a degree of authority entailing ‘a clear signal of official tolerance’¹⁷⁵. Aiding and abetting may also consist in an omission¹⁷⁶; in such cases it may be interpreted as moral support by encouraging¹⁷⁷.

01-65-T, Judgment, TC, 11 September 2006, para. 16 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ce61de/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 471 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>; Prosecutor v. Seromba, No. ICTR-2001-66-A, Judgment, AC, 12 March 2008, para. 530 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b4df9d/>>; Prosecutor v. Renzaho, No. ICTR-97-31-T, Judgment, TC, 14 July 2009, para. 742 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9bbd8a/>>; Prosecutor v. Bagaragaza, No. ICTR-2005-86-S, Sentencing Judgment, TC, 17 November 2009, para. 22 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3d2d48/>>; Prosecutor v. Munyakazi, No. ICTR-97-36A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 5 July 2010, para. 417 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9b9ee3/>>; Prosecutor v. Kalimanzira, No. ICTR-05-88-A, Judgment, AC, 20 October 2010, paras. 74, 86 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fad693/>>; Prosecutor v. Kanyarukiga, No. ICTR-02-78-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 1 November 2010, para. 621 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/415384/>>; Prosecutor v. Ntawukulilyayo, No. ICTR-05-82-A, Judgment, AC, 14 December 2011, para. 214 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/42d81d/>>; Prosecutor v. Ndahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 30 December 2011, paras. 824–32 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d8e4f2/>>; Prosecutor v. Karemera and Ngirumpatse, No. ICTR-98-44-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 2 February 2012, paras. 1429–30 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b9068/>>; Prosecutor v. Nzabonimana, No. ICTR-98-44D-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 31 May 2012, para. 1697 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/00cb8e/>>; Prosecutor v. Nizeyimana, No. ICTR-2000-55C-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 19 June 2012, para. 1466 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f8cdd9/>>; Prosecutor v. Ngirabatware, No. ICTR-99-54-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 December 2012, para. 1294 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/393335/>>; Prosecutor v. Ndahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-A, Judgment, AC, 16 December 2013, para. 147 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7034a5/>>; Prosecutor v. Nindiliyimana et al., No. ICTR-00-56-A, Judgment, AC, 11 February 2014, paras. 370 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4c5065/>>.

¹⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 167 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>.

¹⁷² Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, No. ICTR 95-1-T, Judgment, TC, 21 May 1995, para. 200 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0811c9/>>.

¹⁷³ Ibid., para. 201; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, para. 33 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Bisengimana, No. ICTR-00-60-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 13 April 2006, para. 34 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/694dd8/>>.

¹⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 484 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>; Prosecutor v. Musema, No. ICTR-96-13-T, Judgment, TC, 27 January 2000, para. 125 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1fc6ed/>>; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, para. 33 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, TC, 15 May 2003, para. 385 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7e668a/>>.

¹⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 484 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, paras. 34–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, TC, 15 May 2003, para. 386 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7e668a/>>; Prosecutor v. Brđjanin, No. IT-99-36-A, Judgment, AC, 3 April 2007, para. 273 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/782cef/>>; Prosecutor v. Ndahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 30 December 2011, paras. 824–32 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d8e4f2/>>; cf. Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 372.

¹⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 548: ‘... may consist in failing to act or refraining from action’ (unlike complicity in genocide) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>; see also Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, TC, 22 January 2004, para. 597: ‘The act of assistance may consist of an act or an omission’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ac346/>>; Prosecutor v. Bisengimana, No. ICTR-00-60-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 13 April 2006, para. 34 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/694dd8/>>; Prosecutor v. Mpambara, No. ICTR-01-65-T, Judgment, TC, 11 September 2006, para. 22 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ce61de/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 470 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>; Prosecutor v. Ndahimana, No. ICTR-01-68-A, Judgment, AC, 16 December 2013, para. 147 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7034a5/>>.

¹⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, No. ICTR 95-1-T, Judgment, TC, 21 May 1995, para. 200 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0811c9/>> referring to Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC,

- 25 Summing up this case law, aiding and abetting encompasses any assistance, physical or psychological, that has a substantial effect on the commission of the crime, i.e., that constitutes a causal contribution to the main act¹⁷⁸. Thus, the only limiting element is the substantial effect or the specific direction requirement. This case law, in particular these two requirements, should also be taken into account when defining the actus reus of subparagraph (c) of Article 25 (3)¹⁷⁹. The lack of an explicit reference to these requirements in the text of the provision cannot be interpreted as a conscious departure from this standard¹⁸⁰ for Articles 7 (1) ICTY and 6 (1) ICTR Statute do not contain this reference either. The concept of assistance as expressed by the words ‘aids, abets or otherwise assists’ in subpara. (c) or ‘otherwise aided and abetted’ in the ICTY/ICTR Statutes is a general concept in criminal law and thus must be interpreted consistently. Clearly, the ‘ad hoc tribunal jurisprudence can be of assistance’¹⁸¹ in defining such universal concepts notwithstanding the differences in the details of the respective provisions.
- 26 Of course, both standards need to be clarified further in the future case law. The substantiality standard is far from precise, and the case law has not contributed to its clarification, instead leaving the decision to each individual case. If one takes the principle of legality seriously, i.e., the requirements of legal certainty and foreseeability (nullum crimen sine lege)¹⁸², a general theory of imputation in international criminal law must be developed in order, inter alia, to determine, on an abstract level, when an effect is ‘substantial’ and, thus, when aiding and abetting should entail criminal responsibility¹⁸³. From a theoretical perspective, this is ultimately a normative question, which can best be answered by taking into account the modern theories of attribution¹⁸⁴. Accordingly, to incur criminal responsibility the aider and abettor must, with her contribution, create and increase the risk that the crime will be committed and thereby fundamental legal interests violated (Risikoerhöhung)¹⁸⁵. The risk must be realized through the commission of the (main) crime (Risikorealisation) or, in other words, the risk-creation or increase must be causal for the commis-

10 December 1998 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>; Prosecutor v. Bisengimana, No. ICTR-00-60-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 13 April 2006, para. 34 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/694dd8/>>.

¹⁷⁸ See already mn. 21.

¹⁷⁹ I hereby reaffirm my earlier view in mn. 22 of the second edition (‘... “otherwise assist” would also require a substantial effect on the commission ...’), give up the view expressed in mn. 23 (‘... the word “facilitating” confirms that a direct and substantial assistance is not necessary ...’) and adopt the view argued before the Mbarushimana PTC (see Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 281 with reference in fn. 663) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. For the same view Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 216–8; id. (2007) 5 JICJ 953, 969 (‘... reasonable to interpret the actus reus of assistance in this way.’); Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 801 calling this standard a ‘sort of a monitor’; Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 199 (referring to the gravity threshold of Article 17 and arguing that the ‘substantial effect’ might not necessarily influence the outcome, but the way of execution of the crime).

¹⁸⁰ For this view see Schabas, Introduction to the ICC (2011) 228.

¹⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 280 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>.

¹⁸² See for the interpretation of article 7 ECHR in this respect Sunday Times v. UK, Series A 30 Judgment of 26 April 1979, para. 49; S.W. v. UK, Series A 335-b, 27 October 1995, para. 36; C.R. v. UK, Series A 335-c, 27 October 1995, para. 34 and most recently Streletz, Kessler, Krenz v. Germany, Judgment of 22 March 2001, paras. 77 et seq., 105.

¹⁸³ Stewart (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 165, 204 votes for a combination of causation and normative contribution in order to create a ‘defensible notion of complicity’.

¹⁸⁴ See, generally, Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil I (2006) para. 11; Jakobs, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1993) 185 et seq. Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 801 with fn. 141; Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 200 et seq.

¹⁸⁵ The theory of risk increase has been applied by the Bemba Confirmation Decision in the context of command responsibility, holding the superior liable because his failure to intervene increased the risk with regard to the commission of the crimes: Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, No. ICC 01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, para. 425 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/07965c/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, para. 174 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>. See also Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 721–2 and id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 164 et seq. See also Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 253.

sion of this crime (kausale Risikosteigerung). Finally, the risk created or increased must be disapproved by the legal order, i. e., it must be a forbidden risk (Risikomißbilligung)¹⁸⁶. This approach gains particular importance in identifying liability for the so-called 'neutral' acts, i. e., contributions which are not per se criminal, e. g., delivering weapons to a conflict zone or providing food to a detention camp¹⁸⁷. – On the delimitation between co-perpetration and aiding and abetting see mn. 48.

b) 'For the purpose of facilitating'. This wording introduces a subjective threshold which goes beyond the ordinary mens rea requirement within the meaning of article 30¹⁸⁸. It is borrowed from the Model Penal Code. While the necessity of this requirement was controversial within the American Law Institute, it is clear that 'purpose' generally implies a specific subjective requirement stricter than mere knowledge¹⁸⁹. The formula, therefore, sets aside the – above quoted – jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, since this jurisprudence holds that the aider and abetter must only know that his or her acts will assist the principal in the commission of an offence¹⁹⁰. Additionally, knowledge may be inferred from all relevant circumstances¹⁹¹, i. e., it may be proven by circumstantial evidence¹⁹².

In sum, the formulation confirms the general assessment that subparagraph (c) provides for a higher subjective than objective threshold (in any case higher than the ordinary mens ¹⁸⁶ For a detailed discussion see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 619 et seq., 663-4.

¹⁸⁷ See for the problem of neutral acts in macrocriminal contexts Rackow, Neutrale Handlungen (2007) 551 et seq. In the Van Anraat case, the defendant was convicted for delivering mustard gas to the Iraqi regime, see for a good analysis, especially regarding the issue of imputation van der Wilt (2008) 6 JICJ 557, 563 et seq. The problem has also been recognized by Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 277 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. Crit. vis-à-vis Art. 25 to cover neutral acts Burchard (2010) 8 JICJ 919, 935. In general see Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil II (2003) § 26 mn. 218 et seq. and Ambos (2000) 32 JA 721-25. According to Prosecutor v. Perisic, No. IT-04-81-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2013, para. 44 acts that can be both lawful and unlawful constitute aiding and abetting when 'a direct link between the aid provided by an accused individual and the relevant crimes committed by principal perpetrators' can be established <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f006ba/>>; regarding neutral acts and Art. 25 (3)(d) Ambos, in: Stahn (ed.), Law and Practice (2015) 604 et seq.

¹⁸⁸ See Piragoff and Robinson, article 30, mn. 9 et seq. and 17 et seq. (in this volume); generally about the mental element in international criminal law, cf. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 889; Ambos, in: Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man's Inhumanity (2003) 11, 12 et seq.; id., Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 757 et seq.; id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 266 et seq.; Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschverbrechen (1995) 169, 221-4; Goy (2012) 12 JCLRev 1, 63; Stuckenberg (2014) 12 JICJ 311 et seq.

¹⁸⁹ American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 2.06. Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 801. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 62; Schabas, The ICC (2010) 436 wants to infer the purpose from abetting conduct, but not from mere physical support.

¹⁹⁰ Cf. Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 281 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, TC, 7 May 1997, para. 692 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0a90ae/>>. Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, paras. 326, 328 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>. Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, paras. 236-49 (236, 245-6, 249 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>. Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 90 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>. Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-A, Judgment, AC, 25 February 2004, para. 102 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e35d81/>>. Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, AC, 29 July 2004, para. 49 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/88d8e6/>>. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, paras. 476-9 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>. Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, TC, 15 May 2003, para. 388 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7e668a/>>. Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, TC, 22 January 2004, para. 599 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ac346/>>.

¹⁹¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, TC, 7 May 1997, para. 676 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0a90ae/>>. Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, para. 328 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>. Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 478 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>. Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, TC, 22 January 2004, para. 600 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ac346/>>.

¹⁹² Cf. Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, TC, 7 May 1997, para. 689: 'if the presence can be shown or inferred, by circumstantial or other evidence, to be knowing ...' <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0a90ae/>>. Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, para. 386 with regard to command responsibility: '... such knowledge cannot be presumed but must be established by way of circumstantial evidence' <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>.

rea requirement according to article 30)¹⁹³. However, it must be noted that the stronger purpose requirement only refers to the act of facilitation, not to the main crime ('such a crime'); insofar the assistant only needs to possess the mental element required by that crime¹⁹⁴. This follows from a literal interpretation and the doctrinal requirement of a double mental element in acts of secondary participation (complicity) – with regard to the actual act of participation and with regard to the main crime – which has been long recognized in criminal law doctrine¹⁹⁵. For questions of delimitation see infra mn. 45.

4. 'In any other way contributes' to the (attempted) commission ... 'by a group ... acting with a common purpose'

- 28 a) General. The whole subparagraph (d) is an almost literal copy of a 1998 Anti-terrorism convention¹⁹⁶ and presents a compromise with earlier 'conspiracy' provisions¹⁹⁷, which since Nuremberg have been controversial¹⁹⁸. The 1991 ILC Draft Code held punishable an individual who 'conspires in' the commission of a crime, thereby converting conspiracy into a form of 'participation in a common plan for the commission of a crime against the peace and security of mankind'¹⁹⁹. The 1996 Draft Code extends to a person who 'directly participates in planning or conspiring to commit such a crime which in fact occurs'²⁰⁰. Thus, it restricts liability compared to the traditional conspiracy provisions in that it requires a direct participation – already discussed above – and an effective commission of the crime. Subparagraph (d) takes this more restrictive approach even further, eliminating the term conspiracy altogether and requiring at least a contribution to a collective attempt of a crime²⁰¹. The special feature of subparagraph (d) undoubtedly lies in the reference to 'a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose'. This ensuing disparity as compared to subparagraph (c) has been elaborated by the ICTY in Furundžija, stating that these provisions confirm that international (criminal) law recognizes a distinction between aiding and abetting a crime and participation in a common criminal plan as 'two separate categories of liability for criminal participation'²⁰²

¹⁹³ Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 801 with fn. 145; for a different view Vest (2010) 8 JICJ 851, 862 arguing that the purpose standard can be subsumed under article 30 since 'intent' must be interpreted as encompassing this standard. Critical of this requirement as an overly high threshold, which eventually may lead to 'serious underpunishment', see Stewart (2012) 25 LeidenJIL 165, 197.

¹⁹⁴ See for a good discussion advancing this 'new interpretation' (although it is not that new) see Stewart, <<http://jamesgstewart.com/the-important-new-orthodoxy-on-complicity-in-the-icc-statute/>>, especially the reference to Weigend's entry, <<http://jamesgstewart.com/how-to-intepret-complicity-in-the-icc-statute/>> (both last visited 31 Jan. 2015).

¹⁹⁵ See only Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil II (2003) § 26 mn. 130 et seq., 267 et seq.

¹⁹⁶ International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, UN Doc. A/RES/52/164 (1998), Annex (37 ILM 249 (1998)), article 2 para. 3 (c).

¹⁹⁷ For example: Preparatory Committee Draft, article 23 para. 7 (e) (ii). See Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 159, 168 with further references.

¹⁹⁸ See, for example, Pella (1950) 2 YbILC 278–362, 357; Graven (1950) 76 RCADI 433–605, 502–3; Jescheck (1954) 66 ZStW 193–217, 213; Rayfuse (1997) 8 CLF 43, 52; Cassese et al., ICL (2013) 201–3; Hale and Cline (2014) 25 CLF 261, 265 et seq. See also the statement of the German delegate O. Katholnigg at the Diplomatic Conference for the Adoption of the 1988 Drug Convention (United Nations Conference for the Adoption of a Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, Official Records (1988) para. 52: 'common law concept unknown in civil law systems'). The concept was, however, in principle recognized by the ILC Special Rapporteur Thiam ((1990) 2 YbILC, Part 1, 16, para. 66) and also exists today in civil law jurisdictions in a similar form (see, e.g., § 30 para. 2 alt. 3 of the German Strafgesetzbuch).

¹⁹⁹ 2 YbILC, Part 2, p. 99 (commentary to article 3) (1991).

²⁰⁰ 1996 ILC Draft Code, article 2 para. 3 (e).

²⁰¹ For the drafting history cf. Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The ICC (1999) 189, 199 et seq. According to Heyer, Beihilfestrafbarkeit (2013) 450 et seq. the distinctive characteristic of Art. 25 (3)(d) is that attribution is based on the common purpose, i.e. one of the core crimes (and not the individual act). Cf. also Park, Beteiligungssform (2015 forthcoming) who interprets subparagraph (d) as a special form of accessory liability which focuses on the contribution to the general criminal activity of a collective entity.

²⁰² Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, paras. 216, 249 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>; recently Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, paras 56 et seq. and 829 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>.

(on the issue of delimitation see further infra mn. 49). Recently, the application of this form of attribution to business leaders has been discussed²⁰³.

b) Objective contribution. The expression ‘in any other way’ seems to suggest that subparagraph (d) displays the lowest objective threshold within the different modes of attribution of article 25²⁰⁴. Indeed, this commentator has taken this view earlier²⁰⁵ and recently the Kenya PTC II has called it the correct view²⁰⁶. However, apart from the slight difference in wording between subparagraphs (c) and (d) – assistance ‘otherwise’ vs. ‘in any other way’²⁰⁷ –, upon further reflection I fail to see a normatively convincing reason to distinguish between these two subparagraphs as to the (objective) contribution required.²⁰⁸ On the contrary, both the principle of culpability and the gravity threshold embodied in Articles 17 (1)(d) and 53 (1)(b), (c), (2)(b), (c)²⁰⁹ militate against substantially lowering the objective threshold of subparagraph (d) as compared to subparagraph (c)²¹⁰. Thus, in principle, the ‘substantiality’ requirement and the theory of risk increase as set out above (mn. 25) should also apply to subparagraph (d).²¹¹ The case law’s newly invented ‘significance’ standard²¹², derived from the structurally similar JCE liability²¹³, does not contradict this view. In fact, the Mbarushimana PTC I, as the first PTC ever dealing more thoroughly with subparagraph (d), has convincingly

²⁰³ In favour Farrell (2010) 8 JICJ 873, 880 et seq.; Heyer, Beihilfestrafbarkeit (2013) 520 et seq. Contra Burchard (2010) 8 JICJ 919, 944 (arguing that ‘the most likely scenarios of “ancillary and neutral” business contributions to “corporate-political core crimes” do not fall within the parameters of Article 25(3)(d)(ii)’); Meyer (2013) 131 SchwZStR 70-1. For neutral contributions in general see mn. 25 with fn. 174.

²⁰⁴ Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 802 et seq.; Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 63; van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility (2003) 107; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 219 calling it the ‘least grave’ mode of participation. Manacorda and Meloni (2011) 9 JICJ 159, 176 refer to the ‘lowest degree of responsibility’; Heyer, Beihilfestrafbarkeit (2013) 513.

²⁰⁵ See previous edition, mn. 25 p. 758.

²⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 354 with fn. 560 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>.

²⁰⁷ A virtual identical terminology is used in the French, Russian, Chinese and Arabic versions of the Statute: toute autre forme – toute autre manière; либоинымобразом -- любымдругимобразом; 以其他方式 -- 以任何其他方式; بطريقة اخرى -- اية طريقة اخرى. In contrast, the Spanish version uses identical terminology (in both subparagraphs ‘algún modo’).

²⁰⁸ For detailed analysis see Ambos, in: Stahn (ed.), Law and Practice (2015) 596 et seq.; Park, Beteiligungsform (2015 forthcoming).

²⁰⁹ For the different standard of gravity cf. Stegmler, Pre-Investigation Stage (2011) 332 et seq., 425 et seq.; Ambos, Colombian Peace Process (2010) 44 et seq. See recently Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 276 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>.

²¹⁰ For the same conclusion cf. Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 349 who argues that subparagraph (d), due to its lower subjective standard as compared to subparagraph (c) (see mn. 49), could even cover contributions which may, in objective terms, more serious than those covered by subparagraph (c).

²¹¹ For the application of the theory of risk increase in this context see also Heyer, Beihilfestrafbarkeit (2013) 513 et seq.

²¹² Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, paras. 283, 285 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. Not explicitly referring to ‘significance’, but establishing a threshold ‘less than substantial’ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 354 (with respect to Sang) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>; explicitly referring to ‘contribution significative’, Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, paras. 1632-6 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>. More recently Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, paras. 158 et seq. (161) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>> and Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 252 et seq. (255) did not discuss the ‘substantial contribution’ requirement, but only applied the plain wording of subparagraph (d) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>; contra Gbagbo, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine van den Wyngaert, ibid., para. 8 (failing to see sufficient evidence for a group acting with a common purpose).

²¹³ PTC I argues that both subparagraph (d) and JCE, although not identical modes of liability, focus on group criminality and that JCE requires a lower threshold than a substantial contribution required for aiding and abetting (Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, paras. 280-2 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>). Critical Park, Beteiligungsform (2016 forthcoming).

argued that the contribution ‘cannot be just any contribution’ and thus introduced the significance standard as a minimum threshold ‘below which responsibility (...) does not arise.’²¹⁴ It further found that the contribution must ‘be at least significant.’²¹⁵ As to the concrete assessment of a contribution as ‘significant’ the PTC proposed a case-by-case analysis of the person’s conduct in the given context²¹⁶ taking into account several factors²¹⁷. In casu, PTC I held that the defendant’s actions, essentially as the FDLR’s secretary general issuing press releases and directing media campaigns from France, do not amount to significant contributions to the alleged FDLR crimes in the Democratic Republic of Congo²¹⁸. Thus, in essence, PTC I clearly tries, driven by a liberal, culpability based approach, to avoid an overly broad interpretation of the contribution requirement; it only implicitly suggests that the significance standard is lower than the substantiality one²¹⁹. In a similar vein, the Katanga TC, taking no position on the comparison of the two standards, requires a significant contribution, i. e. a contribution that, on the one hand, influences the occurrence of the crime or how it was committed but, on the other, the contribution need not depend on it²²⁰. In contrast, PTC II explicitly compares the two standards and holds that ‘subparagraph (d) is satisfied by a less than “substantial” contribution’²²¹.

²¹⁴ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 283 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. See also DeFalco (2013) 11 JICJ 715, 728 et seq., 734; Kearney (2013) 24 CLF 331, 364 et seq.

²¹⁵ Ibid. The AC (Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-514, Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of PTC I of 16 December 2011 entitled ‘Decision on the Confirmation of Charges’, 30 May 2012 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/256bb2/>> did not address this issue for procedural reasons (arguing that even if the PTC erred with regard to the significance of the contribution this would not have materially affected the decision as the PTC found that the group element of art. 25(3)(d) was lacking and that Mr. Mbarushimana did not contribute at all to the alleged crimes and that therefore addressing the merits would lead to ‘a purely academic discussion’, paras. 65–69), but Judge Fernández de Gurmendi disagreed with the ‘significance threshold’ in her Separate Opinion (at paras. 9–15, arguing that esp. the PTC’s arguments with regard to the gravity threshold of art. 17(1)(d) and the recourse to JCE liability were not convincing as they are not supported by the Statute; accordingly, liability under art. 25(3)(d) should not require a minimum threshold with regard to the contribution and the problem of neutral contributions could better be ‘addressed by analysing the normative and causal links between the contribution and the crime’ (para. 12)). Cf. Ambos, in: Stahn (ed.), Law and Practice (2015) 604 et seq.

²¹⁶ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1634 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

²¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 284: ‘(i) the sustained nature of the participation after acquiring knowledge of the criminality of the group’s common purpose, (ii) any efforts made to prevent criminal activity or to impede the efficient functioning of the group’s crimes, (iii) whether the person creates or merely executes the criminal plan, (iv) the position of the suspect in the group or relative to the group and (v) perhaps most importantly, the role the suspect played vis-à-vis the seriousness and scope of the crimes committed.’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; cf. also Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, Minority Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 7 March 2014, para. 287, arguing that in the context of article 25(3)(d)(ii) specific direction should be a decisive factor to qualify a contribution as significant ‘because there may otherwise be almost no criminal culpability to speak of in case when someone makes a generic contribution with simple knowledge of the existence of a group acting with a common purpose.’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

²¹⁸ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, paras. 303, 315, 320, 339 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>. But compare Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 355, confirming the charges against Sang for his allegedly broadcasting of hate messages and false news via Kass FM, a regional radio station, inflaming the violent atmosphere <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>.

²¹⁹ Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 282 (discussing JCE and stating that it requires ‘a lower threshold of contribution than aiding and abetting...’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>.

²²⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, paras. 1632–3 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

²²¹ Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 23 January 2012, para. 354 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>.

As to the ‘group of persons’ it is controversial whether the person making the contribution must belong to the respective group,²²² i. e., be an insider (intraneus) or could also be a non-member (outsiders, extraneus).²²³ The chapeau of para. 3 only refers to ‘that person’ who participates in a crime in one or several of the forms of participation mentioned in the subparagraphs; this does not limit the contributing person in subparagraph (d) to insiders. In addition, such a restrictive view would limit the provision’s scope too far rendering it almost meaningless because normally ‘that person’ does not belong to the group. Indeed, it is the rationale of the provision to extend punishability to contributions from outside of the group since these may otherwise remain exempt from punishment. Thus, the Mbarushimana PTC’s broader interpretation²²⁴ followed by subsequent case law,²²⁵ is to be welcomed.

c) Subjective level: intentional contribution. The distinction between subparagraphs (c) and (d) gains particular importance on the subjective level. While aiding and abetting generally requires the knowledge that the assistance contributes to the main crime²²⁶ and subparagraph (c) adds to this the ‘purpose of facilitating’ (mn. 26), participation in a group crime within the meaning of subparagraph (d) requires, on the one hand, a ‘common purpose’ of the group²²⁷ and, on the other, an ‘intentional’ contribution of the participant, complemented by alternative additional requirements (lit. (i) and (ii)) to be discussed below (mn. 32 and 33).

As to the ‘intentional contribution’, the intentionality must not be reduced to the conduct²²⁸, but rather ‘include an additional element, linking the contribution with the crimes alleged’,²²⁹ i. e., the contributor’s intent must extend to these crimes. But what is meant by ‘intentional’²³⁰? Does it refer to the traditional use of ‘intent’²³¹ – as dolus

²²² For the delimitation to subparagraph (a), see mn. 49.

²²³ For a concise discussion see Ohlin (2009) 12 NCLRev 406, 410 et seq., 415.

²²⁴ Cf. Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 274 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>.

²²⁵ Cf. Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1631 (‘l’accusé soit membre du groupe ou extérieur à celui-ci.’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>; in essence also conc., Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 176, considering the pro-Gbagbo forces ‘a group within the meaning of article 25(3)(d)’ and Blé Goudé a non-member, who (among others) was controlling it (63, 176) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>. Conc. also Goy (2012) 12 ICLRev 1, 66.

²²⁶ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, para. 246 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>. Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-A, Judgment, AC, 25 February 2004, para. 102 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e35d81/>>; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, AC, 29 July 2004, paras. 45, 49 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/88d8e6/>>; Prosecutor v. Brđjanin, No. IT-99-36-T, Judgment, TC, 1 September 2004, para. 273 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4c3228/>>; Prosecutor v. Rutaganira, No. ICTR-95-1C-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 14 March 2005, paras. 92–3, 97 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cd2a8f/>>; Prosecutor v. Seromba, No. ICTR-2001-66-A, Judgment, AC, 12 March 2008, para. 56 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b4df9d/>>; Prosecutor v. Popović et al., No. IT-05-88-T, Judgment, TC, 10 June 2010, paras. 1014, 1016 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/481867/>>; Prosecutor v. Kanyarukiga, No. ICTR-02-78-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 1 November 2010, para. 621 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/415384/>>; Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., No. IT-06-90-T, Judgment Vol. II, TC, 15 April 2011, para. 1960 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86922c/>>.

²²⁷ Cf. Park, Beteiligungsforn (2015 forthcoming) who regards the existence of the ‘common criminal purpose’ as proof of the criminal intentions of the respective group.

²²⁸ Fletcher and Ohlin (2005) 3 JICJ 539, 549 warn that, reducing the intent to the conduct, the ‘culpability nexus between the contribution and the ultimate criminal harm’ would remain rather ‘vague’.

²²⁹ Cf. Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 288, demanding that the person must ‘(i) mean to engage in the relevant conduct that allegedly contributes to the crime and (ii) be at least aware that his or her conduct contributes to the activities of the group of persons (...)’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; confirmed by Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1639, citing in note 3602 Mbarushimana <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

²³⁰ For a comparative analysis in the context of the genocidal ‘intent to destroy’ see Ambos (2009) 91 JRevRC 833, 842–5. For the different views regarding the subjective elements of Art. 25 (3)(d) Goy (2012) 12 ICLRev 1, 67 et seq.

²³¹ LaFave and Scott, Substantive Criminal Law (1986) § 3.5., 302–3. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 22; Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 7 mn. 63. Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5 mn. 19.

(Vorsatz)²³² – including knowledge (Wissen) and intention or purpose (Wollen) or is it limited to the latter, i. e., the first degree *dolus directus*²³³? This view seems to be supported by the Spanish version (‘intencional’) since Spanish doctrine, based on German thinking, starts from the general concept of dolus (see article 10 of the 1995 Código Penal: ‘dolosas’) and reserves the notion of ‘intención’ or ‘intencional’ for the ‘delitos de intención’ or the first degree *dolus directus*²³⁴. The French version (‘intentionnelle’), however, does not support this restrictive interpretation since in French thinking²³⁵ ‘l’intention’ consists of two elements: the foreseeability (element of knowledge) and the wish (element of will) of the criminal act. Thus, although the ‘faute intentionnelle’ is characterised by the ‘volonté orientée vers l’accomplissement d’un acte interdit’, i. e., rather by will than knowledge, the latter is also contained in the concept of ‘intention’; thus, ‘intentionnelle’ in this general context is to be understood broadly in the sense of dolus. Also the official German translation of this subparagraph reads ‘vorsätzlich’, i. e., refers to dolus in its general sense²³⁶. Further, the ICTY considers that the mens rea of participation in a JCE is ‘intent to participate’, i. e., apparently understands intent in the traditional sense²³⁷.

- 32 The correct understanding of ‘intentional’ depends in the final analysis on the context in which the notion is used. If it is used as an expression of the general mental element it has to be understood also in a general sense as dolus; if it is used in a specific context to express a specific intention, aim or purpose of the perpetrator it has to be understood as first degree dolus directus. Thus, article 6 of the Statute, referring to genocide, speaks of ‘intent to destroy’ and means first degree dolus directus, at least if one follows the still prevailing view that genocide requires a dolus specialis (specific intention)²³⁸. Consequently, the French version speaks of ‘l’intention de détruire’, the Spanish one of ‘intención de destruir’ and the official German translation of ‘absichtlich’²³⁹. On the other hand, the general mens rea provision (article 30) is based on the distinction between ‘intent’ and ‘knowledge’ defining the former – in relation to a consequence – as ‘means to cause that consequence’ or as being ‘aware’ that it will occur; thus, it understands intent in the traditional sense including knowledge²⁴⁰. The word ‘intentional’ in the subparagraph under examination is used in the same general sense²⁴¹. This also follows from the fact that lit. (i) and (ii) contain additional specific subjective requirements which put the general notion of ‘intentional’ in more concrete terms. On this subjective level subparagraph (d) must also be clearly distinguished from the third,

²³² Cf. Fletcher, Basic Concepts (1998) 112.

²³³ To avoid confusion this author uses ‘intent’ in the sense of dolus in general and ‘intention’ in the sense of first degree dolus.

²³⁴ Most explicitly Rodríguez Devesa and Serrano Gomez, Derecho Penal Español. Parte General (1995) 459 et seq., 460: ‘El dolo directo comprende aquellos casos en que el resultado ha sido perseguido intencionalmente ... Se habla entonces de un dolo directo de primer grado ...’. See also Cobo del Rosal and Vives Antón, Derecho penal. Parte General (1999) 371, 621 et seq., 625.

²³⁵ See Larguier, Droit pénal général (2001) 49, 51; Soyer, Droit pénal et procédure pénale (2000) 99.

²³⁶ Bundestag-Drucksache 14/2682 (14 February 2000) = Bundesgesetzblatt p. 1394 (Vol. II 2000).

²³⁷ See Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, para. 249 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>.

²³⁸ This view, however, has been challenged recently by different authors, see Gil Gil, Derecho Penal Internacional (1999) 231 et seq.; Greenawalt (1999) 99 CollRev 2259, 2265 et seq.; Triffterer, in: Heinrich et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2011) 1438 et seq.; id. (2011) LeidenJIL 399, 403 et seq.; Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 101 et seq.; id., Humanitätsverbrechen (2001) 113 ZStW 457, 480 et seq.; for a discussion of these views see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 790 et seq.; id., in: Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man’s Inhumanity (2003) 11, 19 et seq. More recently also for a broader understanding of the specific intent (Absicht) Kreß (2005) 3 JICJ 562 et seq.

²³⁹ Bundestag-Drucksache 14/2682 (14 February 2000) = Bundesgesetzblatt p. 1394 (Vol. II 2000).

²⁴⁰ For analysis of the ICC’s handling of the intricate article 30 problems such as ‘dolus eventualis’ see Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715–719.

²⁴¹ In the same vein Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 288 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 145. However, Ohlin (2009) 12 NCLRev 406, 418 argues that the inclusion of the term ‘intentional’ therefore is ‘utterly mysterious’.

extensive category of JCE, since JCE III requires with ‘foreseeability’ a lower subjective standard than article 30²⁴².

The foregoing discussion demonstrates that a provision drafted without regard to basic theoretical (dogmatic) categories will create difficult problems of interpretation for the future ICC case law.

aa) ‘with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group 33 ...’. A contribution to a (attempted) group crime has – first possibility – to be made ‘with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group’ provided that this ‘activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’. The last part of the phrase does not require further examination since it only states the obvious; namely, that contribution to group crimes may only give rise to individual responsibility if these crimes belong to the subject matter jurisdiction of the Court (articles 5–8). Of course, the fact that this part refers to ‘a’ crime – instead of ‘the’ crime(s) as lit. (ii) – implies that the respective person must only possess a rather general – not specific – knowledge of the group’s criminal purpose;²⁴³ yet, it must not be overlooked that the focus of this lit. is on the volitional side of the person’s mens rea while the following lit. (ii) stresses the cognitive side.

According to the first part of the phrase the participant must pursue the ‘aim’ to further the criminal ‘activity’ or ‘purpose’ of the group. Thus, he or she must act with a specific dolus, i. e., with the specific intention to promote the ideas and acts of the group²⁴⁴.

bb) ‘in the knowledge of the intention of the group’. Alternatively (‘or’), the participant 34 must know the intention of the group to commit the crime, i. e., he or she must know that the group plans and wants to commit the crime. The question is whether positive knowledge with regard to the specific crime is required or whether it is sufficient that the participant is aware that a crime will probably be committed. The latter was considered sufficient with regard to aiding and abetting by a ICTY TC²⁴⁵ but this precedent is only applicable, if at all, to subparagraph (c). Subparagraph (d) clearly requires ‘knowledge of the intention ... to commit the crime’, i. e., the participant must be aware of the specific crime intended by the group²⁴⁶.

²⁴² Cf. Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 374; Schabas, The ICC (2010) 436; Gless, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) mn. 769, 777; Fletcher (2011) 9 JICJ 179, 188; generally distinguishing Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 282 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; dissenting Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 351, 386 who regards subpara. (d) similar to JCE and envisages that via subpara.(d), JCE could henceforth even comprise accomplice liability (379). Cassese (2007) 5 JICJ 109, 132 on the one hand considers ‘foreseeability’ as sufficient with respect to the intentional element in subparagraph (3) (d) second sentence but on the other hand explicitly separates JCE from this provision, see Cassese and Gaeta, ICL (2013) 175. Similarly, on the one hand Ohlin (2007) 5 JICJ 69, 78 et seq. and on the other (distinction) Ohlin (2009) 12 NCLRev 406, 414 et seq.

²⁴³ Cf. Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, Minority Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, 7 March 2014, para. 288, arguing that by referencing ‘a crime’, a more general understanding of the group’s criminal purpose suffices for liability <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>; in this vein Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, 16 December 2011, para. 128 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 252 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>; Heyer, Beihilfestrafbarkeit (2013) 519; Park, Beteiligungsforn (2016 forthcoming).

²⁴⁴ Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 803 with fn. 155. Burchard (2010) 8 JICJ 919, 944.

²⁴⁵ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, para. 246 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>.

²⁴⁶ Conc. Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1642 (‘La connaissance ... devra être démontrée pour chacun des crimes spécifiques et la connaissance d’une intention criminelle généralene s’avérera pas suffisante’, emphasis added) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>; ibid., Minority Opinion of Judge van den Wyngaert, para. 288; Schabas, The ICC (2010) 434; Burchard (2010) 8 JICJ 919; see also Vest (2010) 8 JICJ 851, 865 defining the knowledge as ‘the substantial likelihood that a certain crime will be committed’.

5. ‘directly and publicly incites ... to commit genocide’

- 35 The provision criminalizes direct and public incitement but only with regard to genocide. Identical to article III (c) of the 1948 Genocide Convention²⁴⁷ the provision gives rise to the same criticism. Some delegations felt that incitement as a specific form of complicity in genocide should not be included in the ‘General Part’ of the Statute but only in the specific provision on the crime of genocide (article 6) in order to make it clear that incitement is not recognized for other crimes²⁴⁸. This argument is questionable since incitement is covered by other forms of complicity, in particular – in the case of the Rome Statute – by soliciting and inducing as defined above²⁴⁹. Normally, the difference between an ordinary form of complicity, e. g., instigation, and incitement lies in the fact that the former is more specifically directed towards a certain person or group of persons in private while the latter is directed to the public in general²⁵⁰. The ILC rightly referred to the use of the mass media to promote the commission of genocide in Rwanda to justify the inclusion of direct and public incitement as subparagraph (f) of article 2 para. 3 of the 1996 Draft Code²⁵¹. The ICTR first confirmed the importance of incitement in relation to genocide in *Kambanda*²⁵² and *Akayesu*²⁵³; subsequent judgments have basically followed *Akayesu*²⁵⁴. The Akayesu AC, however, distinguished between incitement as a general form of participation within the meaning of article 6 para. 1 ICTR Statute and the specific form of incitement to genocide within the meaning of article 2 para. 3 (c) ICTR Statute²⁵⁵. Only the latter must be committed publicly and directly while the former does not necessarily require these additional elements²⁵⁶.
- 36 To incite ‘publicly’ means that the call for criminal action is communicated to a number of persons in a public place or to members of the general public at large, in particular by using technical means of mass communication such as radio and television²⁵⁷. The ICTR

²⁴⁷ 78 UNTS 277 (1951). See, e. g., Lemkin (1947) 41 AJIL 145; Kunz (1949) 43 AJIL 732, 738; Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 189 et seq.; Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 415 et seq.

²⁴⁸ Similarly Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 804.

²⁴⁹ See mn. 19.

²⁵⁰ Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 651, 653–4. The ICTR, however, considers that instigation under article 6 para. 1 ICTR Statute includes the direct and public elements of incitement under article 2 para. 3 (c) ICTR Statute (Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 481 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>).

²⁵¹ 1996 ILC Draft Code 26–7 (para. 16).

²⁵² Prosecutor v. Kambanda, No. ICTR 97-23-S, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 4 September 1998, para. 40 (count 3) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/49a299/>>.

²⁵³ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, paras. 672–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>.

²⁵⁴ Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, No. ICTR-96-3-T, Judgment, TC, 6 December 1999, para. 38 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f0dbbb/>>; Prosecutor v. Ruggiu, No. ICTR-97-32-I, Judgment, TC, 1 June 2000, paras. 13 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/486d43/>>; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, paras. 51 et seq. (55) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-T, Judgment, TC, 3 December 2003, paras. 1013, 1015 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/45b8b6/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 500 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>; Prosecutor v. Kalimanzira, No. ICTR-05-88-T, Judgment, TC, 22 June 2009, paras. 509–10 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3f8b23/>>; Prosecutor v. Bikindi, No. ICTR-01-72-A, Judgment, AC, 18 March 2010, para. 146 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e112dd/>>.

²⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-A, Judgment, AC, 1 June 2001, paras. 474 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c62d06/>>; also Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 678 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>. Crit. with regard to the jurisprudence of the ICTR in general Agbor (2013) 13 ICLRev 429, 458 et seq., who argues that the Chambers erroneously equated ‘instigation’ as a mode of participation (Art. 6 (1) ICTRS) with incitement to commit genocide (Art. 2 (3)(c) ICTRS).

²⁵⁶ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-A, Judgment, AC, 1 June 2001, paras. 478, 482 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c62d06/>>; Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 679 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>.

²⁵⁷ Cf. 1996 ILC Draft Code 26; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 556 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>.

considers the place where the incitement occurred and the scope of the assistance as particularly important²⁵⁸.

To incite ‘directly’ means that another person is concretely urged or specifically provoked to take immediate criminal action; a vague suggestion is not sufficient²⁵⁹. There must be a specific causal link between the act of incitement and the main offence²⁶⁰. The fulfilment of these requirements may also depend on the ‘cultural and linguistic’ context²⁶¹. What, for example, a Rwandan national understands as a ‘direct’ call to commit a crime might not be understood as such by a German and vice versa. The qualifier ‘direct’ brings the concept of incitement even closer to ordinary forms of complicity, such as instigation, solicitation or inducement. Thereby, the concept loses its original purpose²⁶², which is the prevention of an uncontrollable and irreversible danger of the commission of certain mass crimes²⁶³. For if an individual urges another individual known to him to take criminal action he or she has the same control over the actual perpetrator as an instigator or any other accomplice causing a crime.

One important difference still remains between subparagraph (e) and the forms of complicity found in subparagraphs (b), (c) and (d): incitement with regard to genocide does not require the commission or even attempted commission of the actual crime, i. e., genocide, and is therefore an inchoate crime²⁶⁴. It only requires the incitement ‘to commit genocide’ without the additional requirement that it ‘in fact occurs or is attempted’ (as, for example, is required in a general manner by subparagraph (b)). Thus, subparagraph (e) breaks with the dependence of the act of complicity on the actual crime, abandoning the accessory principle (Akzessorietätsgrundsatz) which governs – at least in the sense of factual dependence of the complicity on the main act²⁶⁵ – subparagraphs (b) to (d). A person who directly and publicly incites the commission of genocide is punishable for the incitement even if the crime of genocide per se is never actually committed²⁶⁶. This has been confirmed by the ICTR in Akayesu, where it was stated that incitement to commit genocide ‘must be punished as such, even where such incitement failed to produce the result expected by the perpetrator’²⁶⁷. This view is convincing since the act of incitement is as such sufficiently dangerous and blameworthy to be punished²⁶⁸.

²⁵⁸ Ibid.

²⁵⁹ Cf. 1996 ILC Draft Code 26; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 557 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>; Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 692 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>.

²⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 557 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>.

²⁶¹ Ibid., paras. 557–8. Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 700 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>.

²⁶² Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 805 with fn. 168.

²⁶³ The specific danger or risk implicit in the act of incitement lies in the possibility to trigger a certain course of events. It has been most convincingly described by Dreher who compares the inciter to a person who throws a torch and does not know if it will catch fire or not (Dreher, in: Lackner et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Wilhelm Gallas (1973) 307, 312).

²⁶⁴ Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 377. Cf. also Agbor (2012) 12 ICLRev 155, 158 et seq.

²⁶⁵ See on the accessory principle in a factual, quantitative and qualitative sense Hamdorf, Beteiligungsmodele (2002) 17 et seq.; Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 617–8.

²⁶⁶ Cf. Weigend, in: Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the ILC’s 1991 Draft Code (1993) (regarding the 1991 ILC Draft Code, article 2 para. 3) distinguishing between soliciting and aiding on the one hand, and inciting and conspiring on the other.

²⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, paras. 561–2 (562) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>. In the same vein Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 678 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>, explicitly emphasizing that ‘the Statute of the International Criminal Court also appears to provide that an accused incurs criminal responsibility for direct and public incitement to commit genocide, even if this is not followed by acts of genocide’.

²⁶⁸ Conc. Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 195. See Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, paras. 771 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>, for examples of articles which constitute direct and public incitement to genocide.

39 On the subjective level, the incitement must be accompanied by the intention (purpose) ‘to directly prompt or provoke another to commit genocide. It implies a desire on the part of the perpetrator to create by his actions a particular state of mind necessary to commit such a crime in the minds of the person(s) he is so engaging’²⁶⁹. In other words, the person who incites must have the specific intention (dolus specialis) to destroy, in whole or in part, a protected group him- or herself, i. e., he or she must possess the same state of mind as the main perpetrator²⁷⁰. According to the ICTR, this requirement also applies to other forms of participation in genocide but not to complicity under article 2 para. 3 (e) ICTR Statute²⁷¹. This differentiation is not convincing²⁷². Indeed, it was not followed by the Musema TC, which held that complicity in genocide – independent of its legal basis and form – requires only knowledge of the genocidal intent²⁷³; for aiding and abetting, even possible knowledge, i. e., culpable ignorance (‘had reason to know’), shall be sufficient²⁷⁴. This is correct in that it limits the accomplices’ mens rea to positive knowledge; yet it goes too far in admitting the ‘had reason to know’- standard for the aider and abettor since this standard introduces a negligence threshold and thereby violates the principle of culpability. Thus, in general, positive knowledge of the accomplice with regard to the genocidal intent of the (main) perpetrator(s) must be considered necessary but it is also sufficient. A higher threshold, i. e., specific genocidal intent, should only be required for those forms of commission which are similar to direct perpetration, i. e., the other forms of perpetration (co-perpetration, perpetration by means and ordering) and the specific forms of complicity (incitement and conspiracy), since they create a specific and autonomous risk for the protected groups²⁷⁵.

²⁶⁹ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 560 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>.

²⁷⁰ Explicitly Prosecutor v. Ruggiu, No. ICTR-97-32-I, Judgment, TC, 1 June 2000, para. 14: ‘... must himself have the specific intent to commit genocide ...’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/486d43/>>. See also Prosecutor v. Niyitegeka, No. ICTR-96-14-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 16 May 2003, para. 431 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/325567/>>; Prosecutor v. Kajelijeli, No. ICTR-98-44A-T, Judgment, TC, 1 December 2003, para. 854 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/afa827/>>; Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al., No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, AC, 28 November 2007, para. 1012 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4ad5eb/>>; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 12 September 2006, para. 505 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fa02aa/>>; Schabas, The ICC (2010) 439.

²⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, paras. 485, 540, 546–7 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>.

²⁷² For a critical view see also Greenawalt (1999) 99 CollRev 2259, 2282 et seq.; Schabas, in: Fischer et al. (eds.), Prosecution of Crimes (2011) 469–70.

²⁷³ Prosecutor v. Musema, No. ICTR-96-13-T, Judgment, TC, 27 January 2000, para. 183 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1fc6ed/>>.

²⁷⁴ Ibid., para. 182. See also Prosecutor v. Krstić, No. IT-98-33-A, Judgment, AC, 19 April 2004, paras. 140 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/86a108/>>. The subsequent case law abandoned the ‘had reason to know’- element, requiring ‘awareness’ of the direct perpetrator’s intent: 95-1A-T, Judgment, TC, 7 June 2001, para. 33 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6164a4/>>; Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, TC, 15 May 2003, paras. 388, 394 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7e668a/>>; Prosecutor v. Kajelijeli, No. ICTR-98-44A-T, Judgment, TC, 1 December 2003, para. 768 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/afa827/>>; Prosecutor v. Bisengimana, No. ICTR-00-60-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 13 April 2006, para. 36 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/694dd8/>>.

²⁷⁵ See for a detailed discussion Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 793 et seq.; id., in: Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man’s Inhumanity (2003) 11, 21 et seq. (23–4); id. (2001) 21 NSIZ 628, 632–2. This view is also shared by Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapparate (2002) 243 (with fn. 33), 248, 265 and 385; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 213 et seq., 319 et seq.; id. (2007) 5 JICJ 953, 970 and Kolb, in: id. and Scalia (eds.), Droit International Pénal (2012) 192 (both with regard to the aider and abettor); Jones, in: Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man’s Inhumanity (2003) 467, 479 arguing for an analogy with the mens rea requirement of crimes against humanity. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 806 only requires that the inciter ‘must merely know and want the incited persons to commit the crime’, but need not herself possess the genocidal intent. It is difficult to see, however, how this position may be reconciled with his – convincing – conclusion that the link between incitement and genocide is ‘a subjective “volitional” one in terms of being directed at the genocidal aim of the inciting act’. (ibid., 805). For a combined structure- and knowledge-based approach with regard to the special intent requirement in genocide (distinguishing according to the status and role of the low-, mid- and top-level perpetrators) and the consequences for participation in genocide see Ambos (2009) 91 IREVRC 833, 842–5.

6. ‘attempt’

a) ‘by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step...’.⁴⁰ Although attempt liability was not explicitly and autonomously recognized in Nuremberg or Tokyo or in the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR it was always implicit in the criminalization of the ‘preparation’ and ‘planning’ of a crime, especially a war of aggression²⁷⁶. With this form of criminalization even conduct still in the attempt stage was made punishable as a complete offence²⁷⁷. Thus, it is not surprising that all ILC Draft Codes contain an attempt provision²⁷⁸. The Rome Statute correctly follows this view; yet, it does not limit attempt to certain crimes – as proposed by the ILC²⁷⁹ – but refers to ‘such a crime’, i. e., to any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court (articles 5–8*bis*). This is convincing since the Statute only includes the core crimes which are all equally serious²⁸⁰ so that it would not be justified to admit attempt liability only for some, but not for others. So far the case law has only referred to attempted murders.²⁸¹

An attempted crime is incomplete (inchoate) since it lacks the (complete) objective elements of the respective crime while the subjective elements are complete.²⁸² The respective intent of the attempted crime is generally the same as the one of the respective consummated crime.²⁸³ The Statute defines attempt as the commencement of execution (of ‘such a crime’) by means of a substantial step²⁸⁴. This definition is a combination of French and American Law²⁸⁵ and was already used in the 1991 Draft Code (article 3 para. 3) and the 1996 Draft

²⁷⁶ See generally Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 233 et seq.; crit. with regard to the new Article 8*bis id.* (2010) 53 GYbIL. 463, 494–97.

²⁷⁷ Cf. Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschenverbrechen (1995) 169, 232–4. According to Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 264, attempt is part of customary international law.

²⁷⁸ 1954 ILC Draft Code, article 2 para. 13 (iv); 1991 ILC Draft Code, article 3 para. 3; 1996 ILC Draft Code, article 2 para. 3 (g).

²⁷⁹ The ILC could not reach consensus on a list of crimes which can be attempted yet many members and some governments considered an attempt only possible in case of war crimes or crimes against humanity ((1986) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 49, para. 128; (1990) 1 YbILC 6, 21, 70; (1990) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 16 (para. 71); (1991) 1 YbILC 188; (1991) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 99; (1994) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 77, 85 (para. 196); (1994) 1 YbILC 110, 121, 145 (para. 10)).

²⁸⁰ See also Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC, 2 September 1998, para. 470 considering that the ICTR Statute does not establish a hierarchy of norms, but rather puts all offences (genocide, crimes against humanity, violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of the Add. Prot. II) ‘on an equal footing’ <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b8d7bd/>>. Conc. Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-Abis, Judgment in Sentencing Appeals, AC, 26 January 2000, para. 69 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/df7618/>>. For a higher gravity of crimes against humanity Prosecutor v. Erdemović, No. IT-96-22-A, Judgment, AC, 7 October 1997, Joint Separate Opinion Mc Donald and Vohrah, paras. 20 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f91d89/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Erdemović, No. IT-96-22-A, Judgment, AC, 7 October 1997, Separate and Dissenting Opinion Judge Stephen, para. 5, <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f03ecc/>>; Prosecutor v. Kambanda, No. ICTR 97-23-S, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 4 September 1998, para. 14 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/49a299/>>; Prosecutor v. Tadić, Nos. IT-94-1-S/Tbis-R 117, Sentencing Judgment, TC, 11 November 1999, para. 28 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b1ca4d/>>. Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 748 with fn. 298 with further references.

²⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, paras. 35 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 17, 197 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>; Prosecutor v. Blé Goudé, No. ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC, 11 December 2014, para. 121 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0536d5/>>; excluding an attempt in the concrete case Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 1621 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

²⁸² Cf. Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 240 et seq.; also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 460 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>.

²⁸³ Ibid.; for a more nuanced treatment Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 243 et seq.

²⁸⁴ More detailed on this objective (conduct) element of attempt see Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 809 et seq. and Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 245 et seq.

²⁸⁵ See, on the one hand, the classical French formulation (‘commencement d’exécution’) already in § 2 of the Code Pénal of 1810 and now in article 121–5 Code Pénal; on the other hand, American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 5.01 (1) (c): ‘substantial step’. Cf. Wise, in: Sadat Wexler (ed.), Model

Code (article 2 para. 3 (g)). The crucial question was and still is when, according to this definition, an attempt actually begins. It is clear that preparatory acts are not included since they do not represent a ‘commencement of execution’. In fact, this was the only issue which was not controversial within the ILC when discussing attempt²⁸⁶. It is not clear, however, whether the German concept of the commencement of attempt by ‘immediately proceeding to the accomplishment of the elements of the offence’ (unmittelbares Ansetzen zur Tatbestandsverwirklichung)²⁸⁷ falls within the terms of this subparagraph. At first glance, the German concept seems to differ from the ‘commencement of execution’ since in the case of an ‘immediately proceeding’ the perpetrator must only be very close to the actual execution of a crime but not have partly executed it as apparently required in the case of the ‘commencement of execution’. However, this is only an apparent difference, not a real one²⁸⁸. The ILC commentary explained that ‘commencement of execution’ indicates that ‘the individual has performed an act which constitutes a significant step towards the completion of the crime’²⁸⁹. Consequently, there is no requirement that the crime in question be partly executed, i. e., the person need not have realized one or more elements of the crime. The French version of the Statute also speaks of ‘un commencement d’exécution’, employing the wording of article 121–5 of the Code Pénal. French legal scholarship has always understood the concept in a broad sense, covering ‘tout acte qui tend directement au délit’²⁹⁰. The Spanish version does not even speak of ‘commencement of execution’ but requires ‘actos que supongan un paso importante para su ejecución’. Thus, in practical terms, there is no difference between ‘commencement of execution’ and ‘immediately proceeding to the accomplishment of the elements of the offence’²⁹¹. Still, the latter definition is more precise and gives attempt liability by its wording much more weight since it is – at least theoretically – clearly distinguishable from liability for a complete crime²⁹².

- 42 At first glance it is difficult to understand the meaning of the last part of the first sentence of article 25 para. 3 (f)²⁹³. That ‘the crime does not occur’ seems already to follow from the concept of attempt as a non-completed (inchoate) offence. Further, the non-completion seems to be logically ‘independent of the person’s intentions’ since he or she intends (wants, desires) to commit the offence. In other words, the perpetrator has the normal mens rea (as in the case of a completed offence)²⁹⁴, what is lacking in the case of attempt is a complete actus reus, since ‘the harm is absent’²⁹⁵. In fact, however, the complicated wording goes back to the French law which conceives of abandonment as a negative element of the attempt definition²⁹⁶. Accord-

Draft Statute for the ICC (1998) 39, 44; Fletcher, Basic Concepts (1998) 171–2; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 151 et seq.; Heller, in: Heller and Dubber, Handbook (2011) 593, 609; crit. Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 264 et seq.; Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 380 (‘compromise’ formulation).

²⁸⁶ (1986) 2 YbILC 49 (para. 129).

²⁸⁷ See § 22 German Penal Code; more precisely expressed in § 15 section 2 of the Austrian Penal Code by the formula ‘eine der Ausführung unmittelbar vorangehende Handlung’ (an act that immediately precedes the execution of the crime). For the Austrian solution see Triffterer, Österreichisches Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 15, mn. 7 et seq.

²⁸⁸ Cf. Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5 mn. 107. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 70.

²⁸⁹ 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 27 (para. 17).

²⁹⁰ Cf. Pelletier and Perfetti, Code Pénal 1997–1998 (1997) 20.

²⁹¹ Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 812–3 with fn. 204.

²⁹² See also article 33 g para. 1 of the Alternative General Part, prepared by Eser et al. which uses the notion ‘substantial step’ instead of ‘commencement of execution’ since the former is more precise.

²⁹³ Crit. also Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 265 with fn. 581.

²⁹⁴ Cf. Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, paras. 458–64 (defendants had intent to kill civilians, this intent, ‘the dolus that embodies the attempt’, ‘is the same than the one that embodies the consummated act’, para. 460) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>. Cf. also Schabas, The ICC (2010) 440.

²⁹⁵ Fletcher, Basic Concepts (1998) 171.

²⁹⁶ Article 121–5 of the French Code Pénal reads: ‘La tentative ... n’a été suspendue ou n’a manqué son effet qu’en raison de circonstances indépendantes de la volonté de son auteur’. The French wording of the Statute is ingly, attempt implies the non-occurrence of the crime independent of circumstances intended by the perpetrator; e contrario this means that the perpetrator is not punishable if the crime does not occur because of circumstances intended by him or her. Thus, what this formulation does is to recognise the possibility of voluntary abandonment using a negative-implicit approach²⁹⁷.

b) ‘a person ... shall not be liable ... for the attempt ... if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose’. The possibility of abandonment was not provided for in the ILC Draft Codes of Crimes but was considered in the Preparatory Committee²⁹⁸. It is recognized in all modern legal systems and can, therefore, be truly considered a general principle of international law²⁹⁹. In theory, it creates an incentive for the perpetrator to withdraw from the commission³⁰⁰. In light of the first clause (mn. 41), however, it is doubtful whether this second clause is indeed necessary. While the first clause provides for an implicit formulation, the second one opts for a positive and explicit approach. It was included in the Rome Statute in the last minute, based upon a Japanese proposal and supported by Germany, Argentina and other like-minded States after informal consultations. In the heat of the negotiations, the drafters, including this author, overlooked the fact that the first clause already contained a rule on abandonment, albeit only an implicit one.

The formulation is based on the General Part of the updated Siracusa Draft³⁰¹ and the US-Model Penal Code³⁰². It is, however, less stringent than these provisions. In essence, omitting the redundant, the provision rewards the person if he or she – in objective terms – abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents its commission and – in subjective terms – completely and voluntarily gives up the criminal purpose. The reference to the criminal purpose is not indispensable since the raison d’être of an exemption from punishment in case of abandonment is that the perpetrator completely and voluntarily abandons the further execution or prevents the completion of the act. This presupposes that he or she has given up the criminal purpose.

The provision does not address the difficult problems related to abandonment, e.g., at what stage of the commission abandonment is still possible, what counter-activity the perpetrator must engage in so as to deserve an exemption from punishment or what the circumstances must be for the abandonment to be deemed engaged in ‘voluntarily’³⁰³. Further, the provision does not distinguish between abandonment in case of one or more than one participants; in the latter case, difficult questions of attribution regarding the act of abandonment of one participant vis à vis the other(s) arise³⁰⁴. These and other problems are left to the Court. Given the short time at the Rome Conference and the difficulty in reaching consensus about less complicated issues this was certainly a wise or, at least, practical solution.

almost identical: ‘... en raison de circonstances indépendantes de sa volonté’. For the Spanish law see article 16 para. 1 Código Penal and Mir Puig, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2011) 365-6.

²⁹⁷ For a more profound discussion see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 709 et seq.

²⁹⁸ Preparatory Committee Decisions February 1997, p. 22, fn. 12.

²⁹⁹ Cf. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 185; id., Basic Concepts (1998) 181. On its basic elements see Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 815 et seq.

³⁰⁰ See for the different theoretical justifications of abandonment: Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 186 et seq.; Jescheck and Weigend, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts. Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 538 et seq.

³⁰¹ Siracusa Draft, articles 33-8. See also article 33 g para. 1 of the Alternative General Part, prepared by Eser et al. Both rules are based on German law, cf. sect. 24 Strafgesetzbuch.

³⁰² American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 5.01 (4).

³⁰³ Cf. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) § 15 mn. 71.

³⁰⁴ Thereto Cryer, in: id. et al., Introduction to ICL (2014) 353, 380, emphasizing that liability for aiding and abetting or participating in a joint criminal enterprise might arise.

IV. Paragraph 3bis ('in respect of the crime of aggression...')

- 46 The provision transfers the leadership clause of the newly defined crime of aggression into the framework of Article 25³⁰⁵. While the clause has a solid basis in customary international law, it is not totally clear who is to be considered a person 'in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State' (insider, intraneus). Also, it remains to be seen whether and, if so, how the leadership concept, apparently based on a Weberian model of organization, can be satisfactorily applied to non-bureaucratic forms of organizations, as they normally exist in paramilitary or terrorist non-State actors. At any rate, taking the wording literally ('effectively'), the leadership concept focuses on de facto control rather than on a purely formal status. Thus, paragraph 3bis certainly comprises the senior political as well as other (military, economic) leaders with sufficient effective control over the state apparatus³⁰⁶. In turn, all lower ranking and less-influential actors, such as mid-level bureaucrats, military officers and a fortiori mere soldiers, must be regarded as outsiders (extranei) who cannot be prosecuted for participating in the crime of aggression³⁰⁷. This wide exemption benefiting a series of important people in an aggressive state apparatus may give rise to criticism if ever a case of aggression will come before the ICC. As to the punishable intranei article 25 with all modes of attribution applies; only subparagraph (d) will probably be of little relevance since the intranei normally constitute the common purpose group which lies at the heart of this provision and therefore will be liable as (indirect) co-perpetrators.

V. Paragraph 4

- 47 This paragraph repeats a formulation as old as the codification history of international criminal law³⁰⁸. It affirms the parallel validity of the rules of State responsibility, i. e., in particular the rules as embodied in the ILC Draft articles on State Responsibility³⁰⁹.

C. Special remarks

I. Issues of delimitation

- 48 The analysis of paragraph 3, subparagraphs (b) and (c), shows that it is hardly possible to delimitate the different forms of complicity mentioned in these subparagraphs. Thus, it may be sufficient and more reasonable to draft a rule limiting complicity (secondary participation) to inducement/instigation and other assistance ('aiding and abetting'). It is submitted that these forms of secondary participation cover any conduct which should entail criminal responsibility. 'Ordering' a crime should, as already argued (mn. 18), be dealt with under subparagraph (a), i. e., acting through another.
- 49 As to the delimitation of co-perpetration and aiding and abetting (assistance), the case law has developed some criteria. With regard to participation in torture, the Furundžija TC held ³⁰⁵ Review Conference, Resolution 6., 11 June 2010. The following considerations are based on my more detailed analysis Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 489-93.

³⁰⁶ Heller (2007) 18 EJIL 477, 479 et seq. correctly holds that the 'direct or control' criterion is stricter than the 'shape or influence' standard applied in the Nuremberg trials.

³⁰⁷ Kacker (2010) 33 SuffolkTransnatLRev 257, 266, arguing that the inclusion of participants would have weakened the leadership character of the crime of aggression.

³⁰⁸ See the 1954 ILC Draft Code, article 1; 1991 ILC Draft Code, article 3 para. 1; 1996 ILC Draft Code, article 2 paras. 1 and 4. See also Weigend, in: Bassiouni (ed.), ILC's 1991 Draft Code (1993) 113; Militello (2007) 5 JICJ 941, 951.

³⁰⁹ (1980) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 30-4; also in Spinedi and Simma, State Responsibility (1987) 325.

that it constitutes co-perpetration if the accused takes part in an ‘integral part of the torture and partake(s) of the purpose’; if he or she ‘only’ assists ‘in some way’ in the torture and knows of its existence, the accused is liable as an aider and abettor³¹⁰. According to the Tadić AC, the main difference between co-perpetration and aiding and abetting lies in the existence of a common plan in case of the former and the absence of such a plan in the latter. If such a plan exists, any contribution to its realisation constitutes co-perpetration³¹¹. In Krstić, TC I held that co-perpetration requires participation ‘of an extremely significant nature and at the leadership level’³¹². In Kvočka, the same Chamber made the delimitation using subjective criteria: while co-perpetrator shares the intent of the JCE, the aider and abettor merely has knowledge of the principal offender’s intent³¹³. However, in Krnojelac, TC II explicitly rejected this view and instead followed the more simplistic Tadić approach, which considers any participant in a criminal enterprise who is not a principal offender an accomplice but refers to him or her, oddly enough, as a co-perpetrator (sic!)³¹⁴. In substance, however, this Chamber pursued the same subjective approach as TC I in *Kvočka*³¹⁵. In the Vasiljević Appeal Judgment, the AC draws the following distinction between co-perpetration by means of a JCE and aiding and abetting:

(i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. By contrast, it is sufficient for a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furtherance of the common design.

(ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal. By contrast, in the case of participation in a joint criminal enterprise, i.e. as a co-perpetrator, the requisite mens rea is intent to pursue a common purpose³¹⁶.

This latter approach was confirmed by the AC in the Kvočka Appeal Judgment³¹⁷. In sum, however, the case law is still developing and far from uniform.

As to subparagraph (d) it is questionable whether – in practical terms – it is really 50 indispensable given the broad liability imposed by *subparagraph (c)*³¹⁸. On the objective level, ³¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, TC, 10 December 1998, para. 257 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6081b/>>; see also mn. 22.

³¹¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 229 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>.

³¹² Prosecutor v. Krstić, No. IT-98-33/T, Judgment, TC, 2 August 2001, para. 642 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/440d3a/>>. Cf. also already mn. 9.

³¹³ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2005, paras. 249, 284 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/006011/>>.

³¹⁴ Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, para. 77 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>.

³¹⁵ Ibid., para. 87 requiring that the accused – as a co-perpetrator – shares the state of mind necessary for the crimes committed as part of the criminal enterprise.

³¹⁶ Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, No. IT-98-32-A, Judgment, AC, 25 February 2004, para. 102 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e35d81/>>. See already Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 229 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>.

³¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2005, para. 89 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/006011/>>. See further para. 92, where the AC notes that ‘the distinction between these two forms of participation is important, both to appropriately describe the crime and to fix an appropriate sentence. Aiding and abetting generally involves a lesser degree of individual criminal responsibility than co-perpetration in a joint criminal enterprise.’ But see also Prosecutor v. Oric, No. IT-03-68-T, Judgment, TC, 30 June 2006, para. 281 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/37564c/>>, incorrectly assuming that (co)-perpetration demands the accused’s physical involvement in the commission of the crime and therefore establishing a too broad notion of aiding and abetting (every non-physical involvement) in cases where the ability to frustrate the crime would consequently lead to liability as (co)-perpetrator in the sense of Article 25 (3) subpara. (a). See on a cumulative conviction on the basis of a same act under both modes of liability Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, paras. 825 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>.

³¹⁸ According to Mantovani (2003) 1 JICJ 26, 35, subpara. (d) is superfluous. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 803 doubts its necessity and sees only ‘symbolic relevance’ of the provision, due to its ‘group factor’. Schabas, The ICC (2010) 436 speaks of its ‘minor role’. Ohlin (2009) 12 NCLR 406, subparagraphs (c) and (d) are quite similar, the only difference being that (c) is concerned with individual responsibility and (d) with group responsibility. A person who contributes to a group crime (or its attempt) will always be liable as an assistant to an individual crime pursuant to subparagraph (c). In other words, the group requirement of subparagraph (d) excludes liability for participation in individual crimes according to subparagraphs (a) to (c) but not vice versa. Thus, a significant difference between subparagraphs (c) and (d) lies, if at all, on the subjective level³¹⁹. As pointed out above (mn. 33–34), a participant in a group crime must either aim at furthering the criminal activity or purpose of the group (subparagraph (d) (i)) or must know of its criminal intention (subparagraph (d) (ii))³²⁰. Thus, a person acting without the specific intent of facilitating the commission within the meaning of subparagraph (c) may still be liable under subparagraph (d) (ii)³²¹. In fact, the Rome Statute provides, on the one hand, for a subjective limitation of aiding and abetting by the requirement of facilitating – in contrast, the case law of the ad hoc Tribunals only requires knowledge that the assistance contributes to the commission of crimes³²²; but, on the other hand, it takes this limitation away by the low knowledge threshold in subparagraph (d) (ii)³²³.

On another note, delimitating subpara. (d) from subpara. (a), the PTC considers the former as a kind of residual mode of participation in cases in which an alleged co-perpetrator lacks the ability to frustrate the commission of the crime³²⁴. Further, it seems that the Prosecution prefers to apply subpara. (d) (and not (a)), due to its arguably lower (objective) contribution requirement³²⁵. In any case, the increasing popularity of subpara. (d) calls for a careful legal analysis of the contribution requirement (see mn. 29).

II. Complicity after commission

- 51 Article 25 does not explicitly refer to acts of complicity after the commission of the crime. The ILC only wanted to include such acts within the concept of complicity if they were based on a commonly agreed plan; in the absence of such a plan the person would only be liable 416 regards it doctrinally incoherent (as Article 25 does not contain any ‘primary offense of direct participation in a group crime’ but only derivate accomplice liability for contributions to such a group crime) and calls for revision of the whole article. However, contrary to Ohlin’s opinion, the wording ‘jointly with another’ in subparagraph (a) as compared to the ‘common purpose group’ in subparagraph (d) does not render it inconsistent since the two expressions have, as explained above, different meanings.

³¹⁹ In the same vein Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 337 (‘Art. 25(3)(d) provides for a residual form of accessory liability [...], by reason of the state of mind in which the contributions were made.’) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>. Cf. Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen (2011) 379, 381; Park, Beteiligungsform (2016 forthcoming).

³²⁰ I thereby modify the view presented in the first edition (mn. 39).

³²¹ Vest (2010) 8 JICJ 851 reaching a similar conclusion, refers to subpara. (d) as a ‘rescue clause’. See also Jessberger and Geneuss (2008) 6 JICJ 853, 865; Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5, mn. 88.

³²² See mn. 27.

³²³ For a more detailed discussion see Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 641 et seq. drawing an analogy to Tadić. Park, Beteiligungsform (2016 forthcoming) subparagraph (d) calls for a mandatory sentence reduction because of the low mens rea standard and the lack of precision required with regard to the criminal purpose.

³²⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 337 (as quoted in note 319) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>; Prosecutor v. Ruto et al., No. ICC-01/09-01/11-01, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Summons to Appear, 8 March 2011, para. 44 (with respect to Joshua Arap Sang) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6c9fb0/>>; Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-2-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, PTC I, 28 September 2010, para. 36 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/27b448/>> and Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 279 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>; Prosecutor v. Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, TC, 7 March 2014, para. 283 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

³²⁵ In the arrest warrant against Harun, 50 out of 51 counts are based on Article 25(3)(d), see Prosecutor v. Harun et al., No. ICC 02/05-01/07-2, Warrant of Arrest for Ahmad Harun, 27 April 2007, passim <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7276ad/>>. Cf. also Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 829 et seq. who points out procedural problems in the Katanga case in which the majority convicted Katanga under article 25(3)(d) by using Regulation 55 at later trial stage.

pursuant to a distinct offence ('harbouring a criminal')³²⁶. During the Preparatory Committee deliberations an explicit provision was deemed necessary³²⁷ but this should not be interpreted to the effect that without such a provision liability for ex post facto contributions is a limine excluded³²⁸. To be sure, a prerequisite of accomplice liability is an 'attributory' nexus (Zurechnungszusammenhang) between the main offence and the act of assistance. Thus, assistance that occurs after the commission of the main offence may only entail criminal responsibility if there is a link to the accomplice's conduct before commission of the main offence, or more exactly, before its completion. In most cases such a link will consist in a prior common agreement which extends beyond the completion of the main offence. As to subparagraph (d) this means, as correctly held by the Mbarushimana PTC, that it 'can include contributing to a crime's commission after it has occurred, so long as this contribution had been agreed upon by the relevant group acting with a common purpose and the suspect prior to the perpetration of the crime.'³²⁹

This reasoning is also supported by the principle of culpability. Accordingly, a participant in a crime can only be liable for his or her own contribution to the crime, regardless of the liability of other participants. This implies that the responsibility of each participant has to be determined individually on the basis of his or her factual contribution to the crime in question. A form of vicarious liability of the accomplice for the principal is excluded³³⁰. If the accomplice, on the contrary, is liable only for his or her own contribution, this contribution determines the scope of attribution and guilt³³¹.

III. Individual criminal responsibility and omission, in particular command responsibility³³²

The alleged moral difference between action ('A') and omission ('non A') is the reason that criminal law theorists make criminal liability for an omission dependent upon a (legal) duty to act (Garantenpflicht)³³³. The person possessing such a duty may be called 'guarantor' (Garant in German, garante in Spanish); he/she has the respective position (Garantenstellung) which, in a way, is the flip side of the respective duty. But how can such a duty arise? The modern doctrine in civil law jurisdictions refers to two different sets of obligations as a basis for such a duty: on the one hand it is imposed on persons who because of his/her special protective position with regard to certain legal interests, e.g. the parents with regard to their children, the bank manager with regard to the money of the bank's clients, have a protective duty towards them (Schutz-/Obhutspflicht); they are 'protector guarantors'. On the ³²⁶ (1991) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 98; (1991) 1 YbILC, 188, para. 21 (Mr. Pawlak, chairman of the Drafting Committee). See also: (1990) 1 YbILC 17, 23, 28, 48; (1990) 2 YbILC, Part 1, 28 et seq. (paras. 28 et seq.); Vol. II, Part 2, 12 et seq. (para. 50). Cf. also: American Law Institute, Model Penal Code and Commentaries (1985) § 2.06; van den Wyngaert, in: Bassiouni (ed.), ILC's 1991 Draft Code (1993) 55–56; Weigend, in: Bassiouni (ed.), ILC's 1991 Draft Code (1993) 113, 116–7; Triffterer, in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschenverbrechen (1995) 169, 228.

³²⁷ Cf. Preparatory Committee Decisions March 1997, p. 21, fn. 9.

³²⁸ Cf. Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 December 2011, para. 286 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/63028f/>>.

³²⁹ Ibid., para. 287; conc. Prosecutor v. Khieu and Nuon, No. 002/19-09-2007/ECCC/TC, Judgment, TC, 7 August 2014, para. 713 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4888de/>>; contrary Kearney (2013) CLF 331, 334 et seq., arguing that subparagraph (d) can include ex post facto contributions without a prior agreement.

³³⁰ In American law, however, the doctrine of vicarious liability serves as the basis for the formal equivalence of perpetrators and accomplices (cf. Fletcher, Basic Concepts (1998) 190 et seq.).

³³¹ Cf. Wise, in: Sadat Wexler (ed.), Model Draft Statute (1998) 39, 42–3; Sereni, in: Lattanzi (ed.), The ICC (1998) 139. See also: Preparatory Committee Draft, article 23 para. 3: 'Criminal responsibility is individual and cannot go beyond the person and the person's possessions'.

³³² See for a more detailed treatment Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 180 et seq.

³³³ The duty requirement was apparently first mentioned by the German scholar Pauls Johann Anselm von Feuerbach in his textbook on criminal law of the beginning of the 19th century, see Feuerbach, Lehrbuch des Gemeinen in Deutschland gültigen Peinlichen Rechts (1812) 50 § 24.

other hand, it is imposed upon persons with a special responsibility over certain sources of danger, e.g., dangerous products or industrial plants, which entails that they have to secure and supervise them (Überwachungs-/Sicherungspflicht); they are ‘supervisor guarantors’³³⁴. These two sets of duties have as a common starting point that the criminal result brought about by the relevant omission is imputed to the guarantor because of his/her control over the relevant dangerous event, i.e., because of his ‘Kontrollherrschaft’³³⁵. While common law jurisdictions accept most of the individual duties arising from the twofold civil law approach they rather invoke formal sources (statute, contract, special status, voluntary assumption of care, prior dangerous act/creation of peril) as a basis of a duty to act³³⁶.

- 54 Crimes of omission can appear in two different forms. Either an offence of the special part (a special offence) makes a certain conduct constituting an omission punishable, thereby creating a genuine, authentic or separate offence of omission (délit de pure omission,³³⁷ echtes Unterlassungsdelikt); or there exists a provision in the general part (a general provision) which defines the requirements under which crimes of active conduct can be committed by omission (‘improper’ or ‘inauthentic offence of omission’, délit de commission par omission, unechtes Unterlassungsdelikt). This twofold distinction prevails in civil law jurisdictions³³⁸, but it is also acknowledged in common law jurisdictions³³⁹. In the case of a genuine or separate offence of omission the agent is held responsible for having fulfilled the conduct as defined in the respective offence. Several genuine crimes of omission can be found in criminal law statutes both in civil and common law jurisdictions³⁴⁰. The broadest liability in this regard is created by general failure to rescue offences, well known in most civil law jurisdictions³⁴¹ but traditionally rejected by the common law³⁴². In contrast, liability for genuine or proper offences of omission, liability for commission by omission, based on a general omission definition³⁴³, is derived from active result crimes and thus best captured by ³³⁴ Cf. Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil II (2003) § 32 mn. 33 et seq., 107 et seq. The same twofold distinction is made in Spanish and Italian doctrine (for Spain see Muñoz Conde and García Arán, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2010) 246; Mir Puig, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2011) 325; for Italy see Pulitanò, Diritto Penale (2013) 229 et seq.; for Portugal see de Figueiredo Dias, Direito penal: Parte general (2007) 938 et seq.

³³⁵ This theory has been originally developed by Schünemann, Unterlassungsdelikte (1971) 231 et seq.

³³⁶ For the English law see Ashworth (1989) 105 LQR 424, 439 et seq., id., Positive Obligations (2013) 31 et seq.; for the US see Kadish et al., Criminal Law and Its Processes (2012) 218 et seq. See also Duttwiler (2006) 6 ICLRev 1, 31–2, 33–4; for a similar approach in Islamic Sharia ibid., 43.

³³⁷ Sometimes also called ‘délit d’omission simple’ or ‘vraies infractions d’omission’, see e.g. Pradel, Droit Pénal Comparé (2008) 66.

³³⁸ See for the German-speaking jurisdictions Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil II (2003) § 31 mn. 16 et seq.; Jescheck and Weigend, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 605–8; for France see Pradel, Droit pénal général (2012) 312–3 (but note that liability for ‘commission par omission’ is not recognized, Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 159, 163 et seq. and main text); for the Spanish-speaking jurisdictions Muñoz Conde and García Arán, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2010) et seq.; Mir Puig, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2011) 318 et seq.; for Portuguese-speaking jurisdictions see de Figueiredo Dias, Direito penal: Parte general (2007) 913; for Italy see Pulitanò, Diritto Penale (2013) 221 et seq. From a comparative perspective Pradel, Droit Pénal Comparé (2008) 66–8. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 422, fn. 8 is referring to ‘pure’ (echte) and ‘impure’ (unechte Unterlassungsdelikte) omission, but rejects this terminology for being confusing; from an ICL perspective see Duttwiler (2006) 6 ICLRev 1, 4 et seq.

³³⁹ See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 422; id., Basic Concepts (1998) 46; conc. Allen, Textbook (2013) 26; see also Robinson (1984–1985) 29 NYLSchLRev 101–2; organizing his whole paper along the distinction and Ashworth (1989) 105 LQR 424, 433 distinguishing between ‘offences of failing to do certain required acts’, ‘offences phrased in terms of acts, for which omissions may suffice’ and, as a third middle-category, ‘hybrid act-omission offences’ (e.g. driving without licence or driving without due care).

³⁴⁰ See for Germany Stree and Bosch, in: Eser et al. (eds.), Schönke/Schröder Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch mn. 134 with an enumeration of the relevant offences); for France Leroy, Droit Pénal Général (2012) 203–4 (citing only six genuine offences of omissions: Art. 223–6 (1), (2) and Arts. 223–7, 227–5, 434–1, 434–11); for England see e.g. Allen, Textbook (2013) 27–8. For the USA see Stewart (1998) 25 AJIL 385, 25 406 et seq.

³⁴¹ See e.g. Art. 223–6 French CP; sect. 323c StGB; Art. 195 Spanish CP; Art. 593 Italian CP and Art. 162 § 1 Polish CC (Kodeksu Karnego).

³⁴² Kadish et al., Criminal Law and its Processes (2012) 219, 222 et seq.

³⁴³ For such a definition see e.g. section 13 StGB para. 1; Article 11 Spanish CP; Art. 40 (2) Italian CP; section 2 Austrian StGB; Art. 2 Polish CC; Art. 10 (2) Portuguese CP and Art. 18 Korean Penal Code (for further examples see Duttwiler (2006) 6 ICLRev 1, 39–41, 43–5, including Islamic Sharia at 42). However, in some civil the French concept of ‘commission by omission’ (commission par omission). The corresponding offences can rightly be termed ‘improper offences of omission’ for in fact they are punished rather as commissions than omissions, i. e., as the flip side of the active result offence. Take the classical example: A lets B drown and would be liable for homicide by omission if he is the father of B, i. e., has the position of (protector) guarantor vis-à-vis B’s life. It is important to note, however, that this kind of omission conflicts with a strict understanding of the legality principle as for example adopted by the French law as perhaps its most vocal opponent³⁴⁴.

The Rome Conference missed the opportunity to propose a *general rule on omission*³⁴⁵, although the final Draft Statute contained a general actus reus article³⁴⁶. This article was deleted³⁴⁷, basically, because it was not possible to reach a consensus on the definition of an omission³⁴⁸. Further, it was argued that liability for omission based on article 28 and on the crimes themselves may be sufficient³⁴⁹. However, if the Court takes the nullum crimen principle seriously it may have difficulties in basing liability for omission on provisions which do not clearly and explicitly provide for such liability³⁵⁰. While the case law of the ad hoc Tribunals has generally accepted that liability under article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute also encompasses commission by omission³⁵¹ and while such a liability is generally recognized in domestic jurisdictions and thus may amount to a general principle of law, it would make the life for the Court much easier if the States parties were to include a definition in the ICC Statute.

The wide range of liability established in article 25 para. 3 is complemented by a specific rule on command and superior responsibility (article 28)³⁵². Article 28 establishes a – in international criminal law unique – genuine offence of omission as defined above: the superior is punished for failing to prevent his or her subordinates from committing crimes or for failing to punish them for these crimes³⁵³. Thus, this provision establishes a very broad liability of the superior as a direct perpetrator (principal) for the acts of third persons (the law countries these cases are covered by liability for negligent conduct only, e. g. in Chile (Art. 492 Chilean CP; this is probably due to French influence (see next fn. and main text).

³⁴⁴ Cf. Pradel, Droit Pénal Comparé (2008) 312 (‘interprétation stricte’, art. 111–4 CP).

³⁴⁵ For a more detailed analysis of liability for omission in international criminal law Wetz, Unterlassungshaftung (2004) passim; Duttwiler (2006) 6 ICLRev 1–61; Berster, Unterlassungsverantwortlichkeit (2008) passim; id. (2010) 10 ICLRev 619–46.

³⁴⁶ Preparatory Committee Draft, article 28, reprinted in: Bassiouni, Legislative History of the ICC (2005) 195.

³⁴⁷ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPP/L.4/Add.1 (1998).

³⁴⁸ But see, for example, articles 33–5 Siracusa Draft, article 2 para. 2. Alternative General Part, prepared by Eser et al. For a general rule also Wise, in: Sadat Wexler (ed.), Model Draft Statute (1998) 39, 48–50; see also Mantovani (2003) 1 JICJ 26, 32.

³⁴⁹ See Schabas (1998) 6 EJCLCJL 400.

³⁵⁰ Conc. Eser, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 767, 819 with fn. 237.

³⁵¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, AC, 15 July 1999, para. 188 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8efc3a/>>; for a conviction cf. Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, TC, 16 November 1998, paras. 1092–6, 1101–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b4a33/>>; conc. Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2001, paras. 375–6 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d4fedd/>>; Prosecutor v. Musema, No. ICTR-96-13-T, Judgment, TC, 27 January 2000, para. 123 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1fc6ed/>>. For the possibility of aiding and abetting via omission cf. Prosecutor v. Orić, No. IT-03-68-T, Judgment, TC, 30 June 2006, para. 283 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/37564c/>>; Prosecutor v. Mrksić et al., No. IT-95-13/1-T, Judgment, TC, 27 September 2007, para. 553 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32111c/>>; Prosecutor v. Milutinović et al., No. IT-05-87-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2009, para. 90 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9eb7c3/>>; Prosecutor v. Popović et al., No. IT-05-88-T, Judgment, TC, 10 June 2010, paras. 1019–20 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/481867/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-T, Judgment, TC, 23 February 2011, para. 1875 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/653651/>>.

³⁵² Cf. Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 159, 163 et seq.

³⁵³ Cf. Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, No. ICC 01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, para. 405 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/07965c/>>; Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, para. 262 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>. See for a more detailed analysis Triffterer, in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 215 et seq.; id., in: Arnold et al. (eds.), Menschengerechtes Strafrecht (2005) 901, 902 et seq.; Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 805; id., Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 666 et seq.; id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 197 et seq. See also Triffterer and Arnold, Article 28; Werle and Jessberger, Principles subordinates), thereby creating a kind of vicarious liability (responsabilité du fait d'autrui) that comes very close to strict liability if one lowers the subjective threshold to a standard of mere negligence ('should have known') and infers the potential knowledge not from objective facts but mere presumptions ('constructive knowledge' in its worst form). It further puts liability for the failure to intervene in the commission of crimes on an equal footing with (accomplice) liability for not adequately supervising the subordinates and not reporting their crimes. Finally, the provision fails to distinguish between preventive (supervision, timely intervention) and repressive (reporting the crimes) countermeasures on the superior's part. In fact, liability is so broad that some kind of limitation must be imposed in order to avoid violating the principle of culpability. In the case of *Prosecutor v. Orić*³⁵⁴ the TC's application of the 'reason to know' standard of superior responsibility for the crimes of the subordinates pushed the boundaries of culpability to its farthest limits in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal³⁵⁵. To address the culpability problem, the German International Criminal Law Code (Völkerstrafgesetzbuch) distinguishes between liability as a perpetrator (principal) for the failure to prevent subordinates from committing crimes (Sect. 4), on the one hand, and accomplice liability for the (intentional or negligent) failure to properly supervise the subordinates (Sect. 13) and the failure to report crimes (Sect. 14), on the other³⁵⁶.

57 Moreover, although it is conceptually possible to make a clear distinction between liability for ordering (an affirmative or direct act) and for superior responsibility (an omission), these forms of responsibility are not clearly delimited in the case law of the ad hoc Tribunals. In fact, there is a tendency to use the superior responsibility doctrine (Articles 7 para. 3 and 6 para. 3 ICTY and ICTR Statutes respectively) as a kind of default liability for cases in which an affirmative or direct act (Articles 7 para. 1 and 6 para. 1) cannot be proven³⁵⁷. The issue was implicitly addressed for the first time in Kayishema and Ruzindana, where a TC held that article 7 para. 3 only becomes relevant if the accused did not order the alleged crimes³⁵⁸. It was also taken up in Blaškić, which held that 'l'omission de punir des crimes passés ... peut ... engager la responsabilité du commandant au titre de l'article 7 (1) ...'³⁵⁹. Only

(2014) 221 et seq.; Burghardt, Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit (2008) 185 et seq. Crit. Weigend (2004) 116 ZStW 999 et seq. On the ICTR case law Williamson (2002) 13 CLF 365.

³⁵⁴ Prosecutor v. Orić, No. IT-03-68-T, Judgment, TC, 30 June 2006, paras. 321–4 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/37564c/>>.

³⁵⁵ Cf. Blumenstock and Pittman (2006) 19 LeidenJL 1077. For the subsequent case law cf. Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al., No. ICTR-96-7, Judgment, TC, 18 December 2008, para. 2013 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6d9b0a/>>; Prosecutor v. Renzaho, No. ICTR-97-31-T, Judgment, TC, 14 July 2009, para. 746 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9bbd8a/>>; Prosecutor v. Ntwukulilyayo, No. ICTR-05-82-T, Judgment and Sentence, TC, 3 August 2010, para. 421 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbc983/>>; for a less restrictive handling of the criterion 'to be put on notice' cf. Prosecutor v. Delić, No. IT-04-83-T, Judgment, TC, 15 September 2008, paras. 63, 65 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/a34f45/>>; Prosecutor v. Sainović et al., No. IT-05-87-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2009, para. 120 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9eb7c3/>> and Prosecutor v. Popović et al., No. IT-05-88-T, Judgment, TC, 10 June 2010, para. 1042 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/481867/>>.

³⁵⁶ Bundesgesetzblatt 2002 I 2254; for translations of the text and motives, see <<http://www.department-ambos.uni-goettingen.de/index.php/Forschung/uebersetzungen.html>> accessed 18 December 2012.

³⁵⁷ Cf. Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil (2004) 670 et seq. (esp. 672); Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 835 et seq.; in this vein Prosecutor v. Bemba Gombo, No. ICC 01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, para. 402 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/07965c/>>; Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 9 June 2014, paras. 99, 100, 165 (in the context of alternative charging) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5686c6/>>. However, there is a certain inconsistency with regard to alternative charges under article 25(3)(a) or article 28; compare ibid., paras. 99, 100, 165 et seq. and Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 12 June 2014, paras. 260 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5b41bc/>>. In the latter case PTC I declined to confirm the alternative charges based on superior responsibility 'because the consideration of Laurent Gbagbo's responsibility under article 28 of the Statute would require the Chamber to depart significantly from its understanding of how events unfolded in Côte d'Ivoire during the post-electoral crisis and Laurent Gbagbo's involvement therein'.

³⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, No. ICTR 95-1-T, Judgment, TC, 21 May 1995, para. 223 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0811c9/>>.

³⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-T, Judgment, TC, 3 March 2000, para. 337 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e1ae55/>>.

recently, however, was the issue addressed explicitly. In Kordić and Čerkez, responsibility under article 7 para. 1 was characterized as ‘direct’ as compared to the rather ‘indirect’ responsibility under article 7 para. 3³⁶⁰. As a consequence, article 7 para. 1 constitutes a lex specialis that excludes simultaneous conviction on the basis of article 7 para. 3³⁶¹. Similarly, the Krstić TC held that ‘any responsibility under article 7 (3) is subsumed under article 7 (1)’, i.e., superior responsibility is only of subsidiary nature³⁶². Last but not least, the Krnjelac TC considers that, if responsibility under article 7 para. 1 can be established, conviction should only be entered under this provision and the accused’s position as a superior taken into account as an aggravating factor³⁶³. The TCs in *Naletilić and Martinović*³⁶⁴ and in *Stakić*³⁶⁵ follow this approach, the latter obiter adding that it would be a waste of judicial resources to discuss article 7 para. 3 if the accused can be convicted on the basis of article 7 para. 1³⁶⁶. In the meantime this position has been confirmed by the AC in various judgments³⁶⁷.

³⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, TC, 26 February 2001, paras. 366 et seq. (367, 369) <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d4fedd/>>.

³⁶¹ Cf. ibid., paras. 370-1.

³⁶² Prosecutor v. Krstić, No. IT-98-33/T, Judgment, TC, 2 August 2001, para. 605 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/440d3a/>>.

³⁶³ Prosecutor v. Krnjelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgment, TC, 15 March 2002, paras. 173, 496 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1a994b/>>.

³⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, No. IT-98-34-T, Judgment, TC, 31 March 2003, para. 81 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f2cfef/>>.

³⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgment, TC, 31 July 2003, paras. 463 et seq. <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/32ecfb/>>.

³⁶⁶ Ibid., para. 466.

³⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, AC, 20 February 2001, para. 745 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/051554/>>; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, AC, 29 July 2004, paras. 90–2 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/88d8e6/>>; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, No. IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, AC, 17 December 2004, paras. 33–5 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/738211/>>; Prosecutor v. Brđjanin, No. IT-99-36-A, Judgment, AC, 3 April 2007, para. 285 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/782cef/>>; Prosecutor v. Jokić, No. IT-01-42/1-A, Judgment on Sentencing Appeal, 30 August 2005, para. 27 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3cafa2/>>; Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-A, Judgment, AC, 22 March 2006, para. 411 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/09f75f/>>; Prosecutor v. Galić, No. IT-98-29-A, Judgment, AC, 30 November 2006, paras 411–2 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c81a32/>>; Prosecutor v. Krajisnik, No. IT-00-39-A, Judgment, AC, 17 March 2009, para. 787 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/770028/>>; Prosecutor v. Dragomir Milosević, No. IT-98-29/1-A, Judgment, AC, 12 November 2009, para. 302 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/44327f/>>; Prosecutor v. Sainović et al., No. IT-05-87-A, Judgment, AC, 23 January 2014, paras. 1802, 1813, 1823 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/81ac8c/>>; Prosecutor v. Djordjević, No. IT-05-87/1-A, Judgment, AC, 27 January 2014, para. 939 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e6fa92/>>. For a concise summary van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility of Individuals (2003) 192 et seq.; with regard to JCE liability and superior responsibility Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, AC, 28 February 2005, para. 104 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/006011/>>.

Article 26

Exclusion of jurisdiction over persons under eighteen

The Court shall have no jurisdiction over any person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the alleged commission of a crime.

Literature: The European Law Students' Association (ELSA) (ed.), Handbook on the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court 62 (2nd ed. 1998); Crane, D.M., 'Prosecuting Children in Times of Armed Conflict: The West African Experience', (2008) 15 (3) Human Rights Brief 11; Frulli, 'Jurisdiction ratione personae', in: Cassese, A. et al., The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 527; Holmes, J.T., 'The protection of children's rights in the statute of the International Criminal Court', in: Politi, M. and Nesi, G. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Challenge to Impunity (2001) 119; Nill-Theobald, C., 'Defences' bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeinen Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (1998) 358 et seq.; Ottenhof, R., 'Criminal Responsibility of Minors in National and International Legal Order', (2001), 72 RIDP 663; Saland, P., 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: Lee, R.S. (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute, Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189, 200–202; Schabas, W.A., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the ICC Statute', (1998) 6 EJCCLCJ 400; van Sliedregt, E., The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 301–306; Triffterer, O., 'The New International Criminal Law – Its General Principles Establishing Individual Criminal Responsibility', in: Koufa, K. (ed.), Thesaurus Acroasium, the New International Criminal Law, Vol. XXXII (2003) 639.

Content

A. General remarks	1
1. Historical overview	1
2. Reasons for '[e]xclusion of jurisdiction'	11
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	16
1. 'person ... under the age of 18'	17
2. 'time of the alleged commission of a crime'	20
C. Special remarks: No exclusion of national jurisdiction over persons under eighteen	23

A. General remarks

1. Historical overview

- 1 Early drafts for the establishment of an international criminal jurisdiction did not pay much attention to regulations concerning the general part¹. Correspondingly the Nuremberg Statute, Control Council Law No. 10 and Ordinance No. 7 did not contain provisions concerning the age when criminal responsibility should start. The Prosecutors perhaps assumed that, under international law, criminal responsibility begins at the age of 18, since in all these instances no one under the age of 18 was charged with any crime under any of these three jurisdictional provisions². Moreover, the 1948 Genocide Convention, the 1950 Nuremberg principles, the 1951 and 1954 ILC Draft Codes, the 1951 and 1953 ILC Draft Statutes as well as the 1949 Geneva Conventions, their 1977 Additional Protocols, and the 1972 Bellagio-Wingspread Drafts did not even mention this aspect³.
- 2 However, the 1979 ILA Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, confirmed at the Belgrade Conference 1980, included a relevant article 21, contained in Part 3, 'Competence', and headed 'Law to be applied by the Court'. The article referred, in the context of other questions 'concerning general provisions on defences' and 'complicity', to the laws concerning the 'minimum age of criminal responsibility in that country where the offence is alleged to have been committed or, when such country did not confer jurisdiction, in the country of citizenship of the suspect, provided that they are not in conflict with international law'⁴.

¹ For such documents see Triffterer, Preliminary Remarks (2008), mn 1 et seq.; see also id. (2003) Thesaurus Acroasium, the New International Criminal Law, Vol. XXXII, 639.

² Information confirmed by Benjamin Ferencz, one of the American Prosecutors at Nuremberg. For background information see Triffterer, in: Heer (ed.), Der Minsker Prozess II 3 f dd (forthcoming). Three accused persons (Hetterich, Höchtl, Fischer) were just eighteen at the time they committed the crimes, a fact which the Red Army tribunal hearing the case noted and considered as a partly mitigating circumstance.

³ See for those drafts Triffterer, 2nd edition (2008), Preliminary Remarks, fn. 5, 6 and 9.

More precise in this respect is a 'Draft International Criminal Code', presented by M. Cherif Bassiouni for the AIDP 1980. It contains for the first time in the drafting history of international documents relevant to the establishment of an international criminal jurisdiction, as an Appendix, a comprehensive 'General Part for an International Criminal Court Direct Enforcement Model'. In article 5, 'Responsibility', section 1 on individual responsibility commences with the sentence: 'A person is criminally responsible under this Code when he reaches the age of eighteen'⁵; this proposal is verbally repeated in Bassiouni's 'A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal' 1987⁶ as well as in later publications by that author. Neither Draft mentions whether this age has to be reached at trial or at the time when the act was committed. But since this question is answered by national laws in the sense that, when acting, the perpetrator has to have reached the age on which his or her criminal responsibility depends, it has to be assumed that this is the decisive fact in international criminal law as well.

In 1986 the ILA adopted Protocol II to its 1984 'Statute for an International Criminal Court' and also to its 'Statute for an International Commission of Criminal Inquiry' containing defences. In this Protocol II the ILA mentioned, beneath the heading 'Criminal liability' in section I, subsection (1), 'Immaturity', that '[e]veryone is exempt from criminal liability for his conduct prior to the attainment of 18 years of age'⁷.

It is surprising that even though all relevant proposals by non governmental organizations since 1980 mention immaturity, mostly in the context of other defences, later activities within the UN, like the 1991 ILC Draft Code and its 1994 Draft Statute did not touch upon the question of lack of responsibility of minors. Therefore, a Committee of Experts, commenting in its 'Siracusa Draft' on the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, mentions in a list of 'Open questions and elements of the crime to be regulated in a General Part' under objective elements of a crime (actus reus) the 'Age of responsibility', pointing out however, that some members thought this question was better dealt with as a defence (justification or excuse); the majority did not share this opinion⁸.

The Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, holding its Second Session in August 1995, where the Siracusa Draft was presented, did not include any provisions at all in its Report, but mentioned in its list of open questions the age of responsibility⁹. Responding to this, the Committee of Experts expanded upon its former list early in 1996, proposing in its Updated Siracusa Draft an article 33-3:

1. A person under the age of sixteen at the time of the commission of a crime shall not be responsible under this Statute.
2. A person between the age of sixteen and twenty-one at the time of commission of a crime shall be evaluated as to his maturity whether he is responsible under this Statute¹⁰.

⁴ See L. Kos et al., in: ILA, Belgrade Conference (1980), Appendix B, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court 15.

⁵ See Bassiouni, International Criminal Law. A Draft International Criminal Code (1980), Appendix – General Part, article V, section 1.1, 152. See also Triffterer, Preliminary Remarks (2008), mn 19 and 34.

⁶ Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987) Draft International Criminal Code, Part I, General Part, article V, section 1.1, p. 95.

⁷ ILA Seoul Conference 1986, Annex C, Protocol II, p. 10.

⁸ See Siracusa Draft, General Part, III. Elements of Crime, A. Objective (actus reus) No. 1, respectively IV. Defences (Justification and Excuse), p. 41 with fn. 2 there.

⁹ See for the Ad Hoc Committee Report, Annex II (Guidelines) B 3, p. 59.

¹⁰ Updated Siracusa Draft II, the relevant parts are reprinted in: Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts. Ansätze einer Dogmatisierung (2002) 942 et seq. For a widely corresponding proposal elaborated by Eser, Koenig, Lagodny and Triffterer, presented for consideration by the ILC when discussing its Draft Code 1996 see

6 The lack of agreement in the Preparatory Committee appears very clearly from the profusion of brackets in its proposals presented in 1996 under the heading 'Age of responsibility' and discussed in a Working Group on the General Principles of Criminal Law:

1. A person under the age of [twelve, thirteen, fourteen, sixteen, eighteen] at the time of the commission of a crime [shall be deemed not to know the wrongfulness of his or her conduct and] shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute, [unless the Prosecutor proves that the person knew the wrongfulness of his or her conduct at that time].
2. [A person who is between the age of [sixteen] and [twenty-one] at the time of the (alleged) commission of a crime shall be evaluated (by the Court) as to his or her maturity to determine whether the person is responsible under this Statute].

In addition, under a slightly different heading, 'Age of persons liable to punishment', an alternative proposal was presented:

[Persons aged 13 to 18 years at the time of the facts shall be criminally responsible but their prosecution, trial sentence and the regime under which they serve their sentence may give rise to the application of special modalities specified in the Statute]¹¹.

7 In a note, the Preparatory Committee pointed out that, especially with regard to the age of responsibility, different views were expressed. It was further mentioned 'that many international conventions (such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights, the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights) prohibit the punishment of minors'. The discussion, 'whether an absolute age of responsibility should be mandated or whether a presumptive age should be included with a means to rebut the presumption' did not (then) lead to any result, for instance on the question, 'as to what would be the criteria for the evaluation process' and if this should 'be left for the Court to develop in supplementary rules or by jurisprudence'. In addition, reference was made to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the definition in article 1 of a child as 'every human being younger than eighteen years of age and that, in its article 37, it lays down a series of limitations as regards the applicable penalties, ruling out the death penalty and life imprisonment without parole'¹². These proposals and the notes were confirmed at the February Session 1997¹³.

8 At the December 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, a somewhat different approach was pursued, not in the Working Group on the General Principles of Criminal Law but in the Working Group on Penalties. A proposal had been made there to deal with the sentencing of juveniles. Language drafted primarily by Argentina and Samoa suggested a 'jurisdictional' solution that would avoid the potentially intractable debate over substantive issues, both of criminal responsibility and of sentencing, by simply precluding the trial of any minors at all. As reported by the Committee in a footnote, the basic proposal read:

[The Court shall have no jurisdiction over those who were under the age of 18 years at the time they are alleged to have committed a crime which would otherwise come within the jurisdiction of the Court]¹⁴.

Ambos, ibid., and Triffterer, 'Annex 2: Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law' (1997) 4 Croatian Ann-CrimL&Prac 2, 872. It was argued by these authors that in many legal systems the general age of responsibility starts with fourteen and in many wars all over the world soldiers under sixteen could be found. They should not as such generally be excluded from responsibility and punishment. To start responsibility with fourteen would not place in jeopardy those 'children', who have been misused as soldiers in a war for instance. This is because when they are 'not mature enough to see the amount of damage they may cause or the illegality of their individual conduct, they are anyhow not responsible' (id.). See also Prosecutor v. Taylor, Case No. SCSL-2003-01-01, Amended Indictment, 17 Mar. 2003, p. 6.

¹¹ Cf. 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 87.

¹² 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 87 and 88.

¹³ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997.

¹⁴ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, Annex V (Penalties), fn. 4. The paragraph in the note was introduced by this comment: 'The following proposals were made which should be treated either under age of responsibility or the jurisdiction of the Court'.

To this, States which preferred to keep the possibility of prosecuting minors alive in this part of the Statute insisted on adding:

[; however, under exceptional circumstances, the Court may exercise jurisdiction and impose a penalty on a person aged 16 to 18 years, provided it has determined that the person was capable of understanding the unlawfulness of his or her conduct at the time the crime was committed]¹⁵.

This language, which by the end of the Preparatory Committee's work had significant support both from NGOs and Governments, was carried forward into the Zutphen Draft¹⁶ and the Consolidated Draft submitted by the Preparatory Committee to the Rome Conference¹⁷.

The Zutphen Draft, however, reprinted the proposals on age of responsibility that had 9 been before the Working Group on General Principles unchanged, aside from moving the explanatory note into the footnotes¹⁸. With regard to the framework for penalties, it included newly bracketed sentencing proposals. In the case of '[... a convicted person under the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of the crime, a specified term of imprisonment of no more than 20 years]' was provided as well as an alternative that '[... the Court shall determine the appropriate measures to ensure the rehabilitation of the offender]' under the age of 18. There was also a plea that this article, 68 [A] (a), 'Applicable penalties', 'should be harmonized with article 20 [E] (Age of responsibility)¹⁹. The Consolidated Draft forwarded to Rome corresponded to the Zutphen Draft in respect of the proposals on age of responsibility and penalties²⁰.

There was only a brief discussion of the various aspects of the matter in Rome. The 10 compromise offered by the first part of the footnote which emerged from the Working Group on Penalties in New York migrated both from the footnote into the text (with only minor drafting improvements) and from the Part of the Statute dealing with penalties into the Part dealing with general principles of criminal law²¹. It had apparently been accepted that prosecuting minors, which would inevitably involve trying to provide a special regime for them, was not a good way to use the Court's probably limited resources. This jurisdictional solution had the consequence that proposals in the drafts of the Preparatory Committee to include in Part 7 on Penalties reduced penalties for persons under eighteen became irrelevant. They were deleted²². However, the last word on the age of responsibility in international criminal law has not yet been said. This is shown by the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone in which the age of responsibility starts with fifteen. In theory perpetrators between fifteen and eighteen would be prosecuted but not go to jail if convicted; in practice, the Prosecutor decided not to prosecute any such persons²³. Also, the fact, that article 6 of the

¹⁵ Ibid.

¹⁶ Zutphen Draft, p. 127, article 68, fn. 233.

¹⁷ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 143, article 75, fn. 3.

¹⁸ Zutphen Draft, p. 56.

¹⁹ Ibid., pp. 127–128.

²⁰ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, pp. 61–62, (age of responsibility); ibid., pp. 142–143, (penalties).

²¹ See, generally, Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute, Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189, 201–202.

²² Fife, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute, Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 327.

²³ Article 7 Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, available under www.specialcourt.org/documents/Statute.html (internet), See also note 31. For further information see du Plessis, 'Children Under International Law', (2004) 13 AfricanSecurityRev 2, 110; Amnesty International, Sierra Leone: Recommendations on the Draft Statute of the Special Court (AI Index, AFR 51/083/2000), available under <http://web.amnesty.org/library/print/ENGAFR510832000>; I. Cohn, 'The Protection of Children and the Quest for Truth and Justice in Sierra Leone' (2001) 55 JLAff 1; Amann 'Message as Medium in Sierra Leone' (2001) 7 ILSA JI&CompL 237; Trittin and Weiß 'Das Sondergericht Sierra Leone', (2003) Menschenrechtsmagazin 3, 179, 180. On the decision not to prosecute, explained by the Prosecutor, see Crane (2008) 15 (3) Human Rights Brief 11. Those guilty of recruiting and using child soldiers in Sierra Leone were, however, tried and convicted. In the first trial completed before the ICC, Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, the accused was convicted in 2012 of conscripting and enlisting children under the age of fifteen years and using them to participate actively in hostilities.

ICTY Statute and article 5 of the ICTR Statute say nothing about the age of responsibility shows that the situation is not yet completely clear.

2. Reasons for '[e]xclusion of jurisdiction'

- 11 The reasons for this exclusion were to avoid a conflict with regulations in different national criminal jurisdictions about the age when criminal responsibility should start and how the period of growing maturity should be dealt with. It was argued that an absolute age of responsibility was equally unsatisfying as a presumptive age that included the possibility of rebutting such a presumption.
- 12 If an evaluation of maturity is needed, it should not be left exclusively with the trial judges. The reason for this is that conducting an investigation procedure concerning juvenile suspects could do as much harm to him or her as a trial. If evaluated at all, the Prosecutor right from the beginning of the case is endowed with the discretion to conclude that there is insufficient basis for a prosecution, owing to the immaturity of the alleged offender, under the same conditions as he could stop or proceed in other cases of doubt²⁴. In practice such an exercise would contribute to alleviating the negative effects caused by criminal proceedings on the rehabilitation of young offenders.
- 13 Besides, an evaluation of maturity strongly depends on the social surrounding in which the offender has grown up. Such investigations together with those concerning the whole scale of his or her behaviour need specific facilities and persons trained in juvenile delinquency and social influences for which the ICC is not likely to have the necessary equipment or the corresponding laws providing special proceedings for juveniles.
- 14 The execution of sentences on perpetrators who were under eighteen when committing the crimes, would require, in addition, specific care to take into consideration their whole behaviour and their former situations, their growing maturity since then as well as the social surrounding to which they will return.
- 15 It may seem – at first glance – contradictory to protect by article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) 'children under the age of fifteen years' (and not all minors under eighteen) against 'conscripting or enlisting ... into the national armed forces or using them to participate actively in hostilities' and not holding those older than fifteen responsible for crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. But taking into consideration that complementarity and thereby the priority of national criminal jurisdiction prevails anyhow, it appears not only justifiable but also preferable to leave the group under eighteen to the national courts. They are much better equipped to take care of the specific situation in which children have been when committing crimes under international criminal law²⁵.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

- 16 Article 26, situated in Part 3, General Principles of Criminal Law, regulates an aspect of substantive criminal law from its procedural side, by excluding the jurisdiction of the Court 'over persons under eighteen' thus showing the close connection between these two fields²⁶.

²⁴ See also Bergsmo and Kruger, article 53, mn 23 and 29. The age meant in article 53 para. 2 (c) does not refer to article 26. In cases of article 26 there exists no jurisdiction of the Court and therefore the Prosecutor has to proceed according to article 53 para. 1. If the perpetrator was just 18 when committing the crime, there is no discretion of the Prosecutor for a decision based on article 53 para. 2 (c).

²⁵ This opinion does not exclude a statement given by some scholars, including one of the authors of this article, that soldiers under sixteen 'should not as such generally be excluded from responsibility and punishment'. See to this point of view Triffterer 'Annex 2: Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law', (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 2, 872, for the context and the other authors holding this opinion. See also mn 23 and 24. – For the contrary opinion see Frulli, in: Cassese et al., The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 534 who suspects that 'it may happen that adults are brought to trial before the ICC in full respect of their rights whereas youngsters are tried by national courts without their rights being respected'.

²⁶ Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 14.

1. ‘person ... under the age of 18’

A person is ‘under the age of eighteen’ as long as he or she has not completed the eighteenth year of his or her life. The exact time is at 12.00 p.m. (24.00) of the day before the date of his or her birth appears again, for the eighteenth time. Even when born at the very end of the original birthday, the next birthdays are counted as such and not by the hour. When the day he or she was born begins again after eighteen years have passed, at 00.01 a.m., criminal responsibility starts even for those who have been born later in the day. Those born on 29 February in a ‘leap-year’ are ‘under the age of eighteen’ only until the end of the 28th eighteen years later, because the next day necessarily follows in a non leap-year and, therefore, is already the 1 March.

This time limit is an absolute border completely independent of maturity or immaturity. But responsibility of persons above the age of 18 may be excluded by a defence listed in article 31 para. 1 (a), when their immaturity results from a mental disease²⁷. In addition, the Court is free to mitigate the punishment in cases where the defendant reached this age of 18 very shortly before he committed the crime, by arguing that his or her maturity has not yet stabilized sufficiently. This follows because, included in the criterion ‘... individual circumstances of the convicted person’, mentioned in article 78 para. 1, is his or her status of maturity, which may be even above the age of 18 individually very differently developed.

Article 26 blocks the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court including the initiating of investigations proprio motu, pursuant to article 15, because the exercise of jurisdiction has to be, according to article 13, ‘in accordance with the provisions of this Statute’, which excludes the prosecution of persons under eighteen, according to article 26.

This question also has to be dealt with according to article 19 para. 1 by the Court ex officio. In addition, the Prosecutor and the defendants may challenge the jurisdiction of the Court according to article 19 para. 6 at any time ‘prior to the confirmation of the charges’. But this limitation does not mean that later, at trial, evidence on this question may not be brought in irrespective of whether it is new or earlier withheld²⁸.

2. ‘time of the alleged commission of a crime’

A crime is committed at the time when the perpetrator has acted or when he or she has omitted what should have done according to his or her legal duty. When the perpetrator needs more than one act to fulfill all material and mental elements of the crime, the last one is decisive for triggering or not triggering the jurisdiction of the Court. Because this part of the relevant behaviour causes the completion and when at that time he or she was not yet eighteen, they cannot have reached this age before. All earlier acts are insofar preparatory elements, independent whether they are a punishable attempt in the meaning of article 25 para. 3 (f), for which the jurisdiction of the Court is excluded.

The time when the result of the crime appears, is not decisive; neither is an action with which the perpetrator tries – in vain – to withdraw from an attempt²⁹. What in such situations counts is whether the perpetrator was eighteen when ‘taking action that commences its execution by means of substantial step, but the crime does not occur...’ article 25 para. 3 (f).

When during the investigation it appears that the alleged commission perhaps occurred earlier than originally assumed, the case has to be dismissed because of lack of jurisdiction of the Court by all court organs, independent of whatever stage of the proceeding the case may have reached, as already expressed in mn 12.

²⁷ See A. Eser, article 31, mn 17 et seq.

²⁸ See also mn 22.

²⁹ See also mn 19.

C. Special remarks: No exclusion of national jurisdiction over persons under eighteen

- 23 Only the jurisdiction of the ICC is excluded. As can be seen from the historical development of this article, criminal responsibility may not be excluded for persons under eighteen in general. Therefore, it cannot be assumed that persons under eighteen are not responsible for crimes under international law in general. Quite the opposite. They are responsible for crimes for which the ICC has jurisdiction according to article 5 before national courts under the principle of universality and insofar as national law provides for such a jurisdiction over minors³⁰. This proposition has indeed been acted upon in the creation of the Special Court for Sierra Leone which, on paper, had particular arrangements for juveniles³¹. Excluded according to article 26 is merely the jurisdiction of the ICC.
- 24 However, in the case of youngsters under the age of fifteen years who are conscripted or enlisted into the national armed forces in a criminalized way falling under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) or (e) (vii) such juveniles are indispensable victims of crimes violating international law and established to protect them; they should not be victimized a second time by being brought before a national criminal jurisdiction.

Persons over fifteen and those younger but not victimized in the sense of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) and (e) (vii) could be held responsible if the relevant national law so provides. This legal situation has the consequence that States contemplating prosecuting crimes of juveniles between sixteen and eighteen should proceed where the exceptions mentioned in article 17 para. 1 (a) and (b) are not applicable. However in cases where States are unable or unwilling to do so, the Court, nevertheless has no jurisdiction, because this lack of competence is expressly declared by article 26 for all crimes according to the Rome Statute under the jurisdiction of the Court.

³⁰ See also Triffterer, Preliminary Remarks (2008), mn 62; Ottenhof 72 RIDP 663 et seq., available under www.cairn.info/revue-internationale-de-droit-p%C3%A9nal-2001-3-page-669.htm.

³¹ Supra note 23.

Article 27

Irrelevance of official capacity

1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.

2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.

Specific Literature: Akande, D., 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al Bashir's Immunities', (2009) 7 JICJ 333; id. and Shah, S., 'Immunities of State Officials, International Crimes and Foreign Domestic Courts', (2011) 12 EJIL 815; Ambos, K., 'Punishment without a Sovereign? The Ius Puniendi Issue of International Criminal Law: A First Contribution towards a Consistent Theory of International Criminal Law', (2013) 33 OJLS 293; Bantekas, I., 'Head of State Immunity in the light of Multiple Legal Regimes and Non-Self-contained System Theories: Theoretical Analysis of ICC Third Party Jurisdiction against the background of the 2003 Iraq War', (2005) 10 JCSL 21; Bassiouni, M.C., A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1987); id., 'Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind', (1993) 11 NEP 197; Bianchi, A., 'Immunity versus Human Rights: The Pinochet Case', (1999) 10 EJIL 237; Burghardt, B. and Geneuss, J., 'Der Präsident und sein Gericht, Die Entscheidung des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs über den Erlass eines Haftbefehls gegen Al Bashir', (2009) ZIS 126; Cassese, A., 'When may Senior State Officials be Tried for International Crimes? Some Comments on the Congo v. Belgium Case', (2002) 13 EJIL 853; Frulli, M., 'The Question of Charles Taylor's Immunity', (2004) 2 JICJ 1118; Gaeta, P., 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity from Arrest?', (2009) 7 JICJ 316; id., 'Ratione Materiae Immunities of Former Heads of State and International Crimes: The Hissène Habré Case', (2003) 1 JICJ 186; Holvoet, M. in: De Hert et al. (eds.), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (Larcier Law Annotated 2013), Article 27; Jescheck, H.H., Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane nach Völkerstrafrecht (Bonn 1952); Jia, B. B., 'The Immunity of State Officials for International Crimes Revisited', (2012) 10 JICJ 1303; Kiyani, A. G., 'Al Bashir & the ICC: The Problem of Head of State Immunity', (2013) 12 ChineseJIL 467; Kloth, M., Immunities and the Right of Access to Court Under Article 6 of the European of Human Rights (Martinus Nijhof 2010); Kreicker, H., Völkerrechtliche Exemtionen, Vol. I and II (Berlin 2007); id., 'Immunität und IStGH, Zur Bedeutung völkerrechtlicher Exemtionen für den Internationalen Strafgerichtshof', (2009) ZIS 350; Pedretti, R., Immunity of Heads of State and State Officials for International Crimes (Brill Nijhof 2015); Senn, Immunitäten vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (Nomos 2010); Ssenyonjo, M., 'The International Criminal Court Arrest Warrant Decision for President Al Bashir of Sudan', (2010) 59 ICLQ 205; Tladi, D., 'The ICC Decisions on Chad and Malawi. On Cooperation, Immunities, and Article 98', (2013) 11 JICJ 199; id., 'The Immunity Provision in the AU Amendment Protocol: Separating the (Doctrinal) Wheat from the (Normative) Chaff', (2015) 13 JICJ 1; Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des Materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (E. Albert 1966); id., 'International Crimes and Domestic Criminal Law. Efforts to Recognize and Codify International Crimes, General Report Part I', (1989) RIDP 31; id., 'Irrelevance of Official Capacity' – Article 27 Rome Statute Undermined by Obligations under International Law or by Agreements, Article 98', in: I. Buffard et al. (eds.), International Law Between Universalism and Fragmentation: Festschrift in Honour of Gerhard Hafner (Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 571; Wirth, S., 'Immunities, Related Problems, and Article 98 of the Rome Statute', (2002) 12 CLF 429; id., 'Immunity for Core Crimes? The ICJ's Judgment in the Congo v. Belgium Case', (2002) 13 EJIL 877; Van Alebeek, R. The Immunity of States and their Officials in International Criminal Law and International Human Rights Law (Oxford University Press 2008); Zappalà, S., 'Do Heads of State Enjoy Immunity from Jurisdiction for International Crimes? The Ghadafi Case Before the French Cour de Cassation', (2001) 12 EJIL 595. – Also see the specific bibliography to the annotations to article 98.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
I. Content and context.....	1
II. History and drafting process.....	8
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	16
I. Paragraph 1.....	16
1. The irrelevance of immunity ratione materiae before international courts as an expression of customary international law.....	16

2. Equal application ‘to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity’	17
3. ‘In particular’	19
4. ‘shall in no case exempt ... from criminal responsibility’	21
5. ‘in and of itself’ no ‘ground for reduction of sentence’	22
II. Paragraph 2	23
1. The irrelevance of immunity ratione personae before international courts as an expression of customary international law?.....	23
2. ‘Immunities or special procedural rules ... shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction’	26

A. Introduction/General remarks*

I. Content and context

- Article 27 advances the rule that the official capacity of the accused is irrelevant in criminal proceedings before the Court: Official capacity neither substantively exempts the accused from international criminal responsibility nor mitigates it and does not procedurally bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction. In other words: Immunities of any kind (see infra mn 3) do not apply when the Court investigates, prosecutes or tries an accused itself (this has to be distinguished from the Court requesting state cooperation, article 98; see infra mn 5). Especially with regard to the Al Bashir scenario (the investigation of an incumbent Head of a Non-Party State after a Security Council Referral), in recent years much has been written on whether this rule must see an exception when the accused enjoys personal immunity granted by a Non-Party State, especially when he or she serves as its acting head of state, head of government or foreign minister;¹ the controversies ultimately pertain to the ‘nature’ of the Court as either a mere treaty based creature (deriving its ius puniendi solely from the States Party) or alternatively as an organ of the world community (wielding an independent ius puniendi). While theoretically and doctrinally important, this debate must not obfuscate that – at the end of the day – the application of article 27 is not too difficult to establish in case of a Security Council referral and that the truly problematic article 12(2)(a)-scenarios² have not become virulent (on the jurisdictional implications of article 27 see infra mn 6). This somewhat attenuates the heated discussions over whether article 27 declaratorily codifies an inherently limited customary international law on immunities in case of the prosecution of core crimes before international courts or whether, in the alternative, article 27 constitutively limits immunities that normally know no inherent limitations (see infra mn 16 and 23 et seq.).
- The main aim of article 27 still is to make explicit the scope of individual criminal responsibility for crimes committed in the name of or for a state under international law. This can only be explained in light of the traditional Westphalian notion that acts of state in general and certain persons representing the state were historically exempt from criminal prosecution outside this state. Without this notion, it would have been unnecessary to recognize or reaffirm that besides private individuals, subordinates and commanders (the subjects traditionally recognized by the laws and customs of war), also persons up to the highest level in the hierarchy of states or governments can and should be held responsible directly under international criminal law for the most serious violations of the highest values of the community of nations. In the words of TC V:

* Many thanks to cand. iur. Sonja Heimrath for updating and complementing the bibliography.

¹ For the arguably latest synopsis of the debate see Pedretti, Immunity of Heads of State and State Officials for International Crimes (2015) 257 et seq., 274 et seq. Also see Senn, Immunitäten vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (2010) 125 et seq. Further see, for example and with extensive references, Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 235 et seq.; Holvoet, in: De Hert et al. (eds.), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (2013), Article 27; Robinson, in: Cryer et al., Introduction (2014) 540 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) 270 et seq.; Akande (2009), 7 JICJ 333 et seq.

² For instance: The acting head of state of Non-Party State A commits core crimes on the territory of Party State B.

‘The central principle captured in article 27 then is that the official position of the accused does not shield him against the jurisdiction of the Court for purposes of inquiring into his or her own individual criminal responsibility for crimes proscribed in the Statute. Indeed, the struggle against impunity for crimes that shock the conscience of humanity, being the raison d’être of the ICC, is a hopelessly lost cause without that cardinal principle of modern international criminal law.’³

It follows that article 27 does not disallow to take the official capacity of the accused into account in other areas, like as an aggravating circumstance during sentencing (see infra mn 22) or in decisions to excuse an incumbent head of state ‘from continuous presence in an ongoing trial, when the excuse is recommended by the functions implicit in the office that he or she occupies’⁴.

Article 27 is intrinsically linked to the international law of immunities. In a nutshell:⁵ 3 Functional immunity (or immunity ratione materiae) exempts those performing acts of state⁶ from criminal⁷ prosecution in foreign courts of law. Functional immunity applies in an erga omnes manner, and its rationale was aptly summarized in Blaškić:

‘It is well known that customary international law protects the internal organization of each sovereign State: it leaves it to each sovereign State to determine its internal structure and in particular to designate the individuals acting as State agents or organs. Each sovereign State has the right to issue instructions to its organs, both those operating at the internal level and those operating in the field of international relations, and also to provide for sanctions or other remedies in case of non-compliance with those instructions. The corollary of this exclusive power is that each State is entitled to claim that acts or transactions performed by one of its organs in its official capacity be attributed to the State, so that the individual organ may not be held accountable for those acts or transactions. The general rule under discussion is well established in international law and is based on the sovereign equality of States (par in parem non habet imperium).’⁸

While immunity ratione materiae survives the end of office, immunity ratione personae (or personal immunity) does not, i. e. is only enjoyed by those who are currently in office.⁹ Further, other than functional immunity, personal immunity covers every act by those enjoying it, i. e. acts both private as well as official in nature. What is more, international law (both customary and treaty based) only grants immunity ratione personae to a limited group of persons: Under customary international law, it is well established that heads of state, heads of government and foreign ministers¹⁰ normally enjoy personal immunity in foreign

³ The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang, No. ICC-01/09-01/11, Decision on Mr Ruto’s Request for Excuse from Continuous Presence at Trial, TC V, 18 June 2013, para. 67 [doc1605793.pdf].

⁴ The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang, No. ICC-01/09-01/11, Decision on Mr Ruto’s Request for Excuse from Continuous Presence at Trial, TC V, 18 June 2013, para. 71 [doc1605793.pdf].

⁵ For an encompassing overview see Kreicker, Völkerrechtliche Exemtionen (2007).

⁶ Note that this must not be confused with the Act of State Doctrine, which is neither a rule of customary international law nor treaty law. This doctrine is recognized and adhered to especially by US courts, and one of its central rationales is judicial restraint, namely protecting the US executive’s prerogative in foreign affairs.

⁷ As to state immunity in civil matters see ICJ, Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening), Judgment, 3 February 2012.

⁸ Prosecutor v. Blaškić, No. IT-95-14, Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997, Appeals Chamber, 29 October 1997, para. 41. For further elaborations on the rationale of immunity ratione materiae see Werle/Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) 271. – As to the doctrinal controversy whether immunity ratione materiae prevent individual responsibility from arising, or whether it is a mere procedural defence, see Ambos, Treatise (2013) 410 with further references.

⁹ Akande and Shah (2011) 21 EJIL 815, 818; Wirth (2002) 12 CLF 429, 432.

¹⁰ On the inclusion of foreign ministers see the famous Arrest Warrant or Yerodia Case, Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), ICJ, Judgment, 4 February 2002; for a critique of this Decision see Cassese (2002) 13 EJIL 853 et seq. On the question of inclusion/exclusion of foreign ministers also see Akande/Shah (2011) 21 EJIL 815, 820–825; Jia (2012) 10 JICJ 1303, 1310; Wirth (2002) 13 EJIL 877 et seq. As to ministers other than foreign ministers see e.g. van Alebeek, The Immunity of States and their Officials in International Criminal Law and International Human Rights Law (2008) 192 et seq.

national criminal courts (outward erga omnes immunity)¹¹. In contrast, diplomatic immunity is treaty based, and diplomats only enjoy immunity ratione personae in their receiving states (outward inter partes immunity)¹². The rationale behind immunities ratione personae is not the par in parem non habet imperium-principle, but the upholding of functional international relations by guaranteeing that important state personnel can travel safely abroad while they are in office.¹³ – It has to be noted that functional and personal immunity can easily overlap, namely when a state official enjoying personal immunity carries out an official act of state¹⁴. – Finally, immunities (both ratione materiae and ratione personae) are no (longer¹⁵) personal rights of those enjoying them. Rather, they are privileges granted by the state for which the person concerned is acting or serving as an official; it follows that immunities can be rescinded domestically and waived internationally by said state, be it in advance or retroactively.

- 4 For the sake of doctrinal clarity, and in line with the jurisprudence of TC V¹⁶, the relationship between paragraphs 1 und 2 can be resolved as follows: article 27(1) implicitly does away with immunities ratione materiae; and article 27(2) renders irrelevant immunities ratione personae (as procedural bars for the exercise of jurisdiction while an official is in office)¹⁷.
- 5 Article 27 deals with the vertical top-down relationship between the Court and the state granting an immunity ratione materiae o personae to the accused. In contrast, article 98 regulates a triangular relationship: the vertical relationship between the Court and a state requested to cooperate with the Court (for instance, in the Al Bashir case, a State Party tasked with arresting and surrendering the head of state of a Non-Party State to the Court); and the horizontal relationship between the requested state and the state granting an immunity. Since article 27 and 98 were drafted by different working groups (see infra mn 15), they are not easily reconcilable: While article 27 renders immunities irrelevant, article 98 apparently revives their pertinence; after all, the Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested state to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person (article 98(1)) or would require the requested state to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that state to the Court (article 98(2)). – Taking both the drafting ¹¹ See Draft Article 5 on ‘Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction’ by the ILC, Report of the International Law Commission. Sixty-fifth session (6 May-7 June and 8 July-9 August 2013), General Assembly Official Records, Sixty-eighth session Supplement No. 10 (A/68/10), at 50: ‘The immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction that is enjoyed by Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs covers all acts, whether private or official, that are performed by such persons prior to or during their term of office.’ – On whether other ministers (like those of defence) are (to be) included as well see e.g. Pedretti, Immunity of Heads of State and State Officials for International Crimes (2015) 41 with further references.

¹² See Article 29 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and cf. Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 237 with further references.

¹³ See United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (United States of America v. Iran), ICJ, Judgment, 24 May 1980, para. 91: ‘There is no more fundamental prerequisite for the conduct of relations between States [...] than the inviolability of diplomatic envoys and embassies, so that throughout history nations of all creeds and cultures have observed reciprocal obligations for that purpose.’

¹⁴ Kreicker, Völkerrechtliche Exemtionen, Vol. II (2007) 747 et seq.

¹⁵ As was the case for the Sovereign Prince in Westphalian terms.

¹⁶ The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang, No. ICC-01/09-01/11, Decision on Mr Ruto’s Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial, TC V, 18 June 2013, para. 66 [doc1605793.pdf]: ‘The Chamber is of the view that the main aim of Article 27(1) is to align the ICC Statute with the contemporary norm of international law according to which public officials are no longer entitled to immunity for violation of international criminal law.’

¹⁷ On the doctrinally disputed, but eventually irrelevant relationship between Article 27(1) und (2), see Senn, Immunitäten vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (2010) 136 et seq. with further references, also on countervailing views. The distinction advanced here is supported inter alia by Gaeta, in: Cassese et al. (eds.) The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, i. (2002) 990 et seq.; Holvoet, in: De Hert et al. (eds.), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (2013), Article 27.

history and the systematic context of article 27 (in ‘Part III: General Principles of [International] Criminal Law’ of the Statute) seriously, and considering that criminal law and the law of international cooperation in criminal matters follow different rationales, articles 27 and 98 should, at the outset, be interpreted independently from each other.¹⁸ This means: That the Court has jurisdiction and is free to exercise it despite the official capacity of the accused (article 27) and that, at the same time, the Court may not proceed with a request for legal assistance in order to honor the horizontal immunity obligations of the requested state (article 98), are no self-contradictory statements. Of course, the former may inform the interpretation of the latter article. Article 98 may hence be interpreted in light of the overarching goal to end impunity (see mn 2). Or, to put it differently, the horizontal immunity obligations mentioned in article 98 would be inherently limited if article 27 were to articulate a general immunity exception for the prosecution of core crimes based on an international division of labor between the Court (as an organ of the international community) and the states (as members of this community). Yet this must primarily be resolved in the context of interpreting article 98.¹⁹ – As was already raised in the previous edition: article 98 excuses states for exceptionally not cooperating with the Court, when in doing so they would violate an international obligation. In such a situation the state also cannot be expected to violate just the same obligation by prosecuting the person concerned before its own courts. It therefore cannot be blamed for not investigating and prosecuting genuinely and thus trigger the jurisdiction of the Court. But by doing so, the circle starts again with the references to cooperate with the Court. Therefore, the legal basis and starting position for the Court is the following: Because article 27(2) regulates that ‘[i]mmunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person’, the Court may start preliminary proceedings, in particular investigation and prosecution. Only if the court needs the presence of the suspect, e.g. for the trial, and does not have him or her ‘available’, article 98 comes into play.

In focusing on the vertical relationship between the Court and the state granting immunity, and by taking into account that this immunity is disposable for said state (see mn 3), it becomes apparent why article 27 is so closely related to (but should not be treated alike)²⁰ the Court’s (basis of) jurisdiction,²¹ especially when it comes to the prosecution of individuals who benefit from immunities granted by Non-Party States:²²

¹⁸ This has not been considered in the Malawi Decision of PTC I in Al Bashir, where article 27 was cast as the ‘ruling provision’, thus neglecting the independent significance of article 98. As to this critique see Tladi (2013) 1 JICJ 199, 206. As to the aforementioned decision see The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision Pursuant to Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 12 December 2011, para. 44 [doc1287184.pdf], where the Chamber took the unconvincing ‘view that the unavailability of immunities with respect to prosecutions by international courts applies to any act of cooperation by States which forms an integral part of those prosecutions.’

¹⁹ Therefore, see the elaborate annotations by Kreß/Prost, Article 98.

²⁰ As, although in a slightly different context, correctly noted by the ICJ in Yerodia: ‘jurisdiction does not imply absence of immunity, while absence of immunity does not imply jurisdiction’. See Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), ICJ, Judgment, 4 February 2002, para. 59. It is open for discussion whether this was duly considered in Situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, No. ICC-01/11, Decision on the ‘Prosecutor’s Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi’, PTC I, 27 June 2011, para. 9 [doc1099314.pdf], where PTC I discussed the official position of an individual under the heading of the Court’s jurisdiction ratione loci and ratione personae.

²¹ Article 27 presupposes that the person in question is available to the Court if he or she is put on trial. In addition, article 27 does not alter the application of the rules on the ‘preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction’ in article 12 nor does it limit the possibility of challenging ‘the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case’ according to article 19.

²² The latter may be the more cumbersome formulation, which is however more precise than the formulation ‘national of a Non-Party State’. Think e.g. of a German national becoming the foreign minister of the United

- Where the Court seeks to try beneficiaries of State Party immunities, this can easily be justified on the ground that the States Parties have waived their immunity rights and thus their corresponding protection by ratifying the Rome Statute, including article 27. This line of reasoning can be labeled the ‘waiver’-theory (or more precisely: the ‘in advance waiver’-theory). For good or bad, under this theory it is moot whether article 27 constitutively limits the reach of functional or personal immunities before the Court, or whether article 27 declaratorily codifies the limits of such immunities for core crime trials before international courts.
 - A variant of this ‘waiver’-theory also holds water when the Court goes after beneficiaries of Non-Party State immunities, if this state formally accepts the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question (article 12(3)). This acceptance can be considered a retroactive waiver of immunities so that, once again, one does not have to probe whether article 27 deviates from customary international law on functional or personal immunities or whether, in contrast, it spells out the inherent limitations of these immunities when it comes to prosecutions before international criminal courts.
 - Only marginally more problematic are cases where the Court wishes to prosecute beneficiaries of Non-Party State immunities (e.g. the head of a Non-Party State) after a referral by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter (article 13(b)).²³ Be it that this referral contains the (explicit or implicit) imperative to waive all immunities or that the Security Council constitutively activates the ‘irrelevance of official capacity’-regime under article 27 by referring a situation to the Court in order to uphold international peace, in light of both lines of reasoning functional and/or personal immunities do not hinder the Court from meting out international justice (see infra mn 25).
 - The scenario where one finally has to ‘step up to plate’ can be found in article 12(2)(a), i.e. when the Court wants to prosecute the beneficiary of a Non-Party State immunity who allegedly committed core crimes in the territory (or on a vessel or an aircraft) of a State Party. In this scenario, because an international treaty like the Rome Statute cannot bind Non-Party States,²⁴ the Court’s (exercise of) jurisdiction can only be reconciled with public international law²⁵ if one accepts the view that articles 27(1) and (2) are but codifications of the current state of customary international law.²⁶ This argument can be termed the ‘international court limitation of immunities ratione materiae o personae’, an argument that rests on two aspects: first, on customary international law actually not granting (or foreseeing an exception to) functional and/or personal immunity before an international criminal court; and second, on the Court being such an international criminal court proper, i.e. it being more than a multilateral institution deriving its legitimacy and ius puniendi solely from the States Party.²⁷
- 7 The identification of the current state of play of customary international law is a volatile and delicate business at best, especially in light of the recent practice of African States and its legal effect,²⁸ and will be left to the individual annotations to article 27(1) und (2) (see infra mn 16 and 23 et seq.). Yet generally, and by way of a final preliminary remark, it has to be noted that we consider the Court an organ of the international community and thus an international criminal court proper. As such, it can, on an abstract level, partake in any States. Only because this individual is German does not allow Germany to dispose of his U.S. immunity ratione personae as it sees fit.

²³ As to the Al Bashir Case see e.g. Akande (2009) 7 JICJ, 333 et seq.; id. (2012) 10 JICJ, 299 et seq.; Burghardt and Geneuss (2009) ZIS 126, 139 et seq.; Kiyani (2013) 12 ChineseJIL 467 et seq.; Ssenyonjo (2010) 59 ICLQ 205 et seq.

²⁴ See article 34 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

²⁵ And this should indeed be an imperative for any interpretation of the Statute.

²⁶ See Holvoet, in: De Hert et al. (eds.), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (2013), article 27 at 3.2.2.

²⁷ On the foundation of the ICC’s ius puniendi see Ambos (2013) 33 OJLS 293, 298 et seq.

²⁸ On the immunity provision in the AU Amendment Protocol see Tladi (2015) 13 JICJ 1.

possible international criminal court exceptions to functional or personal immunities. As elaborately argued and concluded by Kreß/Prost in this Commentary:

‘The facts that the ICC Statute has attracted a very significant number of ratifications, that the Security Council has referred two situations threatening international peace and security to the ICC for investigation and that the UN have endorsed the vision behind article 2 of the Statute through the conclusion of the Relationship Agreement with the ICC, add further weight to the view that the ICC on substance, and despite its formal creation by treaty, derives its mandate from the international community. As a matter of principle, it is therefore possible to draw a distinction between national criminal proceedings and proceedings for the ICC with respect to international law immunities.’²⁹

II. History and drafting process

The historical development of article 27 has to be seen in light of the complex context of individual criminal responsibility under international criminal justice together with a variety of direct and indirect enforcement mechanisms. Core crimes are typically committed by direct or indirect participation of persons acting in their official capacity, for instance, military commanders, taking an active part in the commission of such crimes or by ordering their subordinates to carry out a criminal act, for instance by killing a prisoner of war or an unarmed civilian. Contrary to an international trend to derogate immunity of state officials, including for acts committed in the name of the state (see mn 9 et seq.), at least Head of State immunity and the immunity of the most senior representatives of the state in criminal proceedings is still very much accepted on the national level, as many cases illustrate.³⁰ Accordingly, article 98 was accepted as a political compromise at the Rome Conference to square the circle so as to, on the one hand, effectively fight impunity and, on the other hand, to honor the rationales of immunities ratione materiae o personae.

As to the historic roots of article 27, the killing of a prisoner of war or of an unarmed civilian by a military official had already been recognized in the Hague Conventions, for individuals for instance in article 41 of the 1899 Convention with regard to the violation of conditions of an armistice and with regard to commanders in articles 2 and 6 of the 1907 Convention³¹. – In addition, an International Investigating Commission established by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace with the task of searching for the causes and the responsibility for the Balkan Wars 1912 and 1913, confirmed the necessity of such regulations. It concluded in its report that with regard to all atrocities committed in these wars, one word from those in power would have stopped all cruelties committed during belligerent struggles³². Against this background it was almost unavoidable that after the First World War the Versailles Peace Treaty provided for the individual responsibility of the former German Emperor William II., a Head of State and Government³³. From that time on it became more and more undisputed that Heads of State and Government, their freedom from criminal responsibility dating from a time when Heads of State personified the state, could no longer hide behind the – at that times – almost absolute sovereignty of the state. This lack of immunity was even accepted for cases in which such persons were acting in their official capacity and therefore ‘in the name and on behalf’ of the state they represented. Even though the former Emperor William II. could not be put to trial, because he was not extradited by the Netherlands, the idea of holding Heads of State or Government responsible

²⁹ Kreß/Prost, Article 98, mn 29 (with further references, including to opposing views).

³⁰ For an overview cf. Kloth, Immunities and the Right of Access to Court Under Article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights (2010) 108.

³¹ See Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des Materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (1966) 85 et seq.; 1996 ILC Draft Code, commentary (1) to article 6.

³² See Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Intercourse and Education, Report of the International Commission to inquire into the causes and conduct of the Balkan Wars, Publication No. 4 (1914). Online available at <<https://archive.org/details/reportofinternat00inteuoft>> accessed 4 March 2015.

³³ See Jescheck, Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane nach Völkerstrafrecht (1952) 41 et seq.

has ever since then been continuously promoted. It is based on the proposition that they are the persons who have the authority to order plans and policies involving crimes of an exceptional gravity and magnitude. They have 'the power to use or to authorize the use of the essential means of destruction and to mobilize the personnel required for carrying out these crimes' by abusing 'the authority and power entrusted to' them³⁴. This knowledge based on practical experience was the reason why as early as in the middle of the 1920 s the ILA Draft provided that an official position of an individual as Head of State or Government should not preclude his criminal responsibility under international criminal law.³⁵

10 After the Second World War, the increasing acceptance of this principle was more precisely expressed in VII of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal:

'The official position of defendants, whether as Heads of States or responsible officials in Government Departments, shall not be considered as freeing them from responsibility or mitigating punishment.'

As the IMT famously held:

'The principle of International Law, which under certain circumstances protects the representatives of a State, cannot be applied to acts which are condemned as criminal by International Law. The authors of these acts cannot shelter themselves behind their official position in order to be freed from punishment in appropriate proceedings'³⁶.

Corresponding provisions are contained in VI of the Charter of the Tokyo Tribunal as well as in article 4 Control Council Law No. 10 even though the first did not make a specific reference to the position of the Head of State, presumably because of the (political) decision not to indict Emperor Hirohito. In accordance with its Charter the Nuremberg Tribunal rejected several times the plea of act of state and that of immunity. The argument that persons carrying out acts of state could not be held individually responsible 'but are protected by the doctrine of sovereignty of the State' was expressly rejected as not being applicable 'to acts which are condemned as criminal by international law'. It was emphasized that individuals have international duties which transcend the national obligations of obedience imposed by the individual State. He who violates the laws of war cannot obtain immunity while acting in pursuance of the authority of the State if the State in authorizing action moves outside its competence under international law³⁷.

These judgments were the basis for the Nuremberg principles unanimously confirmed on 11 December 1946 in Resolution 95 (I) of the General Assembly of the UN and in detail formulated and adopted by the ILC in 1950. They differed slightly in wording but not in substance except for the fact that the words 'or mitigating punishment' were no longer included³⁸. Nuremberg principle III was the basis for the recognition of the irrelevance of official position in article IV of the Genocide Convention and for article 3 of the 1951 ILC Draft Code, which recognized this responsibility in the same way except that it substituted a general reference to 'responsibility under international law' with 'any of the offences defined in this code'³⁹. Article 3 of the 1954 ILC Draft Code corresponds textually with the 1951 and in substance with other drafts. This Draft Code, submitted with commentaries to the Sixth ³⁴ See 1996 ILC Draft Code, commentary (1) to article 7.

³⁵ Article 21 of the 1926 ILA Draft. See ILA, Report of the Thirty-Fourth Conference held at the Imperial Palace and the Chamber of Commerce, Vienna, August 5-11, 1926 (London: Sweet & Maxwell, Ltd., 2 & 3 Chancery Lane, W.C.2., 1927).

³⁶ In re Goering and others, IMT, Judgment, 1 October 1946, in: The Trial of German Major War Criminals. Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg, Germany, Part 22 (22nd August 1946 to 1st October 1946) 447.

³⁷ See 1996 ILC Draft Code, commentary (3) to article 7; see also Triffterer (1989) RIDP 61 et seq. in the General Report on 'International Crimes and Domestic Criminal Law. Efforts to Recognize and Codify International Crimes'.

³⁸ See Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des Materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (1966), 15 et seq. and 75 et seq., and for the first formulation of the Nuremberg Principles, (1950) YbILC 374 et seq.

³⁹ For a commentary to article 3 see (1951) YbILC 137.

Session of the General Assembly in 1954 was postponed by the General Assembly until the Special Committee for drafting a definition of aggression had submitted its report. However, it took a further seven years after a definition of aggression has been adopted by consensus in 1974 for the General Assembly to once again invite the ILC to resume its work on the Draft Code. One of the first articles drafted after the special Rapporteur had delivered seven reports concerning the subject of jurisdiction ratione personae and ratione materiae was a new and relevant article 11⁴⁰. It differed from former drafts mainly because it mentioned heads of state as mere examples ('in particular') in order to broaden the scope of the provision. The Commission referred expressly to 'heads of States or Government, since they have the greatest power of decision'. But the retention of the words 'official position of an individual' should clarify that 'the article also relates to other officials'. The ILC saw in this broadening 'the real effect of the principle' so that the official position of an individual 'can never be invoked as a circumstance absolving him from responsibility or conferring any immunity upon him, even if he claims that the acts constituting the crime were performed in the exercise of his functions'⁴¹. It was further stated that the change from the official position to [t]he words 'he acts' apply to the exercise of both legal powers and factual powers. If a person was acting as though he were head of State or Government or a government official when in fact he was not, he would incur criminal responsibility just as much, if the acts he committed were criminal acts under the code'⁴².

The wording of article 11 was continued until the 1991 Draft Code was delivered to the General Assembly⁴³. By the early 1990 s, the norm was so sufficiently settled in international law as to be incorporated into the statutes of both the ICTY and the ICTR.⁴⁴

At the same time, mainly during the 1980's, the work of the ILC was accompanied by corresponding NGO endeavors, especially of the AIDP and the ILA. In 1972 the Foundation for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court presented its Bellagio-Wingspread Draft Statute. It contained in article 22 a very comprehensive regulation headed, 'Jurisdiction as to Persons', which covers all relevant aspects with the wording: 'The Court shall be competent to judge persons whether or not they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals'⁴⁵. M. Cherif Bassiouni on behalf of the AIDP in his Draft Code 1980 emphasized: 'A person who commits a crime is not relieved from responsibility by the sole fact that he was acting in the capacity of Head of State, responsible government official, acting for or on behalf of a state', a formulation which was repeated in his 1987 Draft⁴⁶. In 1986, the ILA at its Seoul Conference dealt with this subject matter, if not expressly, but as an adjunct under the heading 'Execution of public duty', it nominated as indispensable prerequisites for justification: 'acting on reasonable grounds and proportionality between force and purpose' and that '[a]ct under military law – which must of course be properly applied – and the lawful conduct of war are generally justified here'⁴⁷.

⁴⁰ See for this historical development, ILC Report on the Work of its Forty-Second Session, 1 May–20 July 1990, UN Doc. A/45/10 (1990), chapter II with references in fn. 13.

⁴¹ See ILC Report on the Work of its Fortieth Session, 9 May–29 July 1988, UN Doc. A/43/10 (1988); (1988) YbILC, Part 2, 71.

⁴² Ibid.

⁴³ For the repetition of this Draft during all the years from 1989 to 1991 see 2 YbILC, Part 2, 67 (1989); for the 1991 ILC Draft Code see also Bassiouni (1993) 11 NEP 197.

⁴⁴ Article 7(2) ICTYSt. provides: 'The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.' An identical provision appears in Article 6(2) ICTRSt., and a similar one in Article 6(2) SCSLSt.

⁴⁵ See 1st and 2nd International Criminal Law Conferences, The Establishment of an International Criminal Court (1972) 18.

⁴⁶ Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987) 95.

⁴⁷ See Addendum to the Seventh Interim Report of the International Criminal Law Committee, Annex C Protocol II, III 4 and Annex D Explanatory Report to Protocol II on Defences, ad III 4, at 12 and 18.

- 12 The 1991 Draft Code and especially its relevant article 13 (formerly 11) received new attention in the context of the discussion of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute. Since the latter contained no regulation on this question, even though the Statutes for the ICTY 1993 and the ICTR 1994 had meanwhile confirmed the principle of individual criminal responsibility irrespective of official position in their articles 7 and 6 respectively, a group of experts discussing the 1994 ILC Draft Statute proposed in the context of ‘Open questions and elements to be regulated in a General Part’ to deal with this aspect by reference to article 7 of the ICTY Statute. The result was a proposed article 33–2, the second paragraph of which corresponded with article 13 of the 1991 ILC Draft Code⁴⁸. This proposal was aimed at clarifying that criminal responsibility would also attach to the official levels below Heads of State or Government. In addition, the original Nuremberg formulation was emphasized, whereupon it was expressly reiterated that an official position and responsibility could not of itself constitute a ground for mitigating punishment. In this context it should also be kept in mind that those abusing their power are quite often even more culpable than their subordinates who actually only fulfill the demands of their governments or commanders. The 1996 ILC Draft Code emphasizes the historical tendency by substituting ‘particularly’ with the words ‘even if he acted as head of State or Government’ in article 7. The commentary to this article is in substance the most comprehensive, since it refers to many of the aspects mentioned in former drafts and especially to the background against which it was drafted.
- 13 Broad agreement on the irrelevance of official capacity made it neither necessary nor advisable to express an opinion on the question of whether immunity for Heads of State or Government under national or international law could influence the application of this principle. It appeared so obviously predominant that reference in some of the international documents to the irrelevance of official capacity for the exercise of jurisdiction of a permanent International Criminal Court was thought to be superfluous. This is the reason why the ILC mentioned rather generally that ‘the official position ... can never be invoked as a circumstance absolving him from responsibility or conferring any immunity upon him’⁴⁹. The 1994 ILC Draft Statute makes no reference either in article 33 or in its commentary to immunity. But from the wording ‘Applicable law’, it appears in article 33(1) that ‘principles and rules of general international law and special treaties’ shall be applicable only ‘insofar as not contradictory to it (the Statute)’. Equally article 7 of the ILC 1996 Draft Code does not mention immunity. However the commentary to this provision reiterates that:

‘[I]t would be paradoxical to allow the individuals who are, in some respects, the most responsible for the crimes covered by the Code to invoke the sovereignty of the State and to hide behind the immunity that is conferred on them by virtue of their positions particularly since these heinous crimes shock the conscience of mankind, violate some of the most fundamental rules of international law and threaten international peace and security [...]. The absence of any procedural immunity with respect to prosecution or punishment in appropriate judicial proceedings is an essential corollary of the absence of any substantive immunity or defence (there fn 56). It would be paradoxical to prevent an individual from invoking his official position to avoid responsibility for a crime only to permit him to invoke this same consideration to avoid the consequences of this responsibility’⁵⁰.

- 14 The endeavors within and without the UN to draft a Statute for a Permanent International Criminal Court were of great help to the Security Council when it decided to establish the ICTY and the ICTR. Vice versa, both ad hoc Tribunals promoted the idea of a permanent International Criminal Court. The ILC Draft Statute 1994 – and in a way also the Draft Code 1996 – mark the end of a historical development which partly overlaps with the immediate drafting process of the Rome Statute. The latter actually started when the 1995 ad hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court reviewed the 1994 ILC

⁴⁸ See the Siracusa respectively the Updated Siracusa Draft; the relevant parts are reprinted in Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 942 et seq.

⁴⁹ (1988) 2 YbILC, Part 2, 71.

⁵⁰ See for the quotations 1996 ILC Draft Code, commentary (1) and (6) to article 7.

Draft Statute. It merely mentioned ‘irrelevance of official position’ in Annex II to its report, which contained ‘guidelines for consideration of the question of general principles of criminal law’. In addition, it ‘drew attention to the principles of general criminal law addressed in article 7 of that Statute’ (for the ICTY) and to the fact that some delegations ‘indicated that they had not yet taken a final position on this question’⁵¹. When the Preparatory Committee continued this work, it summarized its first two sessions in August 1996 in Vol. I of its Report, expressing broad consensus ‘for the Statute to disallow any plea of official position as head of State or government or as a responsible government official’. It left undecided the question of whether ‘this issue could be included in relation to ‘defences’ and the question of diplomatic or other immunity from arrest and other procedural measures, taken by or on behalf of the Court’⁵². Later, in Vol. II, the Preparatory Committee proposed substituting the introductory wording in article 13 of the ILC Draft Statute, ‘the official position of an individual ...’ with a bracketed sentence according to which the Statute ‘shall be applied to all persons without any discrimination whatsoever’. In addition, a new paragraph denying a ‘plea of immunity for jurisdiction irrespective of whether on the basis of international or national law’ was drafted. The second proposal, headed ‘official capacity of the accused’ included new provisions dealing with ‘an elected representative and ... an agent of the State’ as well as ‘a member of ... parliament’ as additional examples of persons whose official capacity could in no case (per se) relieve them from criminal responsibility. In paragraph 2 it was stated that ‘[t]he special procedural rules, the immunities and the protection attached to the official capacity of the accused and established by internal law or by international conventions or treaties may not be used as a defence before the Court’⁵³. At its third session in February 1997 the Committee combined the two proposals and included an article B (e), ‘Irrelevance of official position’, wherein it eliminated the brackets for sentence 1 and ‘an agent of the State’, and rephrased paragraph 2 to read ‘[a]ny immunities or special procedural rules ... may not be relied upon to prevent the Court from exercising its jurisdiction in relation to that person’. The Committee pointed out in a footnote that paragraph 2 needed further discussion ‘in connection with procedure as well as international judicial cooperation’⁵⁴. Early in 1998, the Zutphen Draft repeated this article which it redesignated article 18 and included the same footnotes⁵⁵ as did the Consolidated Draft agreed upon at the sixth (and last) session of the Preparatory Committee in April 1998⁵⁶. How close the exchange of ideas between the UN, the AIDP, for instance, and other non-governmental organizations was can be discerned from the Model Draft Statute presented on behalf of the AIDP 1998 by M. Cherif Bassiouni and Leila Sadat Wexler⁵⁷. This Model Draft Statute eliminated from the above mentioned proposals the words ‘this Statute shall be applied to all persons without any discrimination whatsoever’. It was argued that the existence of a similar more general clause in article 23 – now article 25 – made the words redundant. Besides, those words were ‘inaccurate [...], since application of the criminal law does involve discriminating between persons on the basis of their guilt and innocence’⁵⁸.

The discussion at Rome dealt with all aspects considered during the historical development and the drafting process, including the references in the commentary to the Model Statute which underscored that no distinction ‘based on official capacity’ would be recog-

⁵¹ See Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 87 and Annex II B 1, p. 58. See for the mutual support of the UN and non-governmental organizations, Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 8 et seq.

⁵² 1996 Preparatory Committee I, § 193, p. 44; reprinted in Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Court Compilation of United Nations’ Documents and Draft ICC Statute before the Diplomatic Conference (1998) 411.

⁵³ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 85.

⁵⁴ See Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, Annex II, at 22 with fn. 14.

⁵⁵ See Zutphen Draft, at 54 and 55 with fn. 86.

⁵⁶ See Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, at 60 with fn. 9.

⁵⁷ See Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court based on the Preparatory Committee’s text to the Diplomatic Conference, Rome, 15 June–17 July 1998, AIDP, (1998) 13*ter* NEP.

⁵⁸ Ibid., at 44 et seq.

nized. The broad scale of examples listed in article 27 was preferred but as a compromise it was accepted that article 27 should only be applicable to ‘criminal responsibility under this Statute’⁵⁹. A compromise with regard to article 27 was rather easy to achieve, because of the excellent and thorough preparation conducted during the whole drafting process. In addition, part of the discussion had been transferred to the working group on Part 9, International cooperation and judicial assistance, which also had to deal in the context of article 98, ‘Cooperation with respect to waiver of immunity and consent to surrender’, with State obligations to respect immunities⁶⁰. Since this working group had to deal with the question of how the duty of States Parties to fulfill requests of the Court corresponded with their duty not to violate international treaties and the rules granting immunity on the domestic level, it was proposed to clarify within the context of article 27 both aspects: excluding exemption from criminal responsibility for crimes listed in this Statute and solving possible conflicts in the duties of states and preventing both from conflicting with each other. Correspondingly and as a compromise to avoid prejudicing principles and immunities applicable within the national criminal justice systems, it was clarified by article 27 that notwithstanding ‘[i]mmunities or special procedural rules’ an individual criminal responsibility for crimes under international law exists for everybody, including all persons acting in an official capacity whatsoever, paragraph 1, and that such ‘[i]mmunities or special procedural rules ... shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person’, paragraph 2.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. The irrelevance of immunity ratione materiae before international courts as an expression of customary international law

- 16 Under article 27(1), ‘official capacity ... shall no in case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute’. This effectively renders inapplicable any act of state defense or any immunity ratione materiae for core crimes committed in the name of a state (be it a Party or a Non-Party State). As rightly noted by Ambos, ‘[t]here is general agreement that [article 27] is only declaratory of international customary law as far as it excludes functional immunity’⁶¹. Indeed, since Nuremberg there is a long line of national (the most prominent of course being the *Pinochet*⁶²) as well as international judicial pronouncements to that end.⁶³ While the core crime exception to immunity ratione materiae (state officials do not enjoy functional immunity for crimes committed for or in the name of the state) may not be fully settled with regard to criminal proceedings before national courts,⁶⁴ and may indeed be treated as an open question,⁶⁵ acting as a state official does not relieve an individual of his or her core criminal responsibility before an international court like⁶⁶ the ICC. Customary international law hence knows an exception to the ⁵⁹ See mn 15.

⁶⁰ See Kreß/Prost, Article 98, mn 1 et seq.

⁶¹ Ambos, Treatise (2013) 414.

⁶² R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, Ex Parte Pinochet Ugarte (No 3), House of Lords, [2000] AC 147, [1999] 2 All ER 97.

⁶³ As was rightly pointed out by Kreß/Prost, Article 98, mn 19. For the latest analysis of case law see Pedretti, Immunity of Heads of State and State Officials for International Crimes (2015) 167 et seq. with extensive references.

⁶⁴ Cf. Kreß/Prost, Article 98, mn 20 rightly pointing out that the ICJ has failed to authoritatively settle the issue in the Arrest Warrant Case.

⁶⁵ Cf. Robinson, in: Cryer et al., Introduction (2014) 551.

⁶⁶ See mn 7.

traditional immunity protection ratione materiae; or perhaps more to the point, because it shifts the ‘burden of proof: customary international law does not provide state officials with functional immunity before an international court like the ICC, i. e. does not, as a default rule, exempt state officials from international criminal responsibility with regard to the most serious offences against international values and interests. Although delicate, because the determination of customary international law should not be overtly policy orientated, all of this is also normatively sound, because an international criminal court acting as an organ of the international community is not in conflict with the par in parem non habet imperium-principle.⁶⁷

2. Equal application ‘to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity’

The basic idea that no one, including those acting for the state, and also including nationals of Non-Party States, is exempt from criminal prosecution by the Court is aptly expressed in the formula that the ‘Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity’. This is also put forward in article 25(1), which stipulates that all persons committing ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute’. It is this endeavor to bring to court all offenders participating in one way or another in the commission of the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole, which has also shaped – in more detail – article 25(3). The principle is addressed by a few other articles, especially article 28 (‘Responsibility of commanders and other superiors’) and article 33 (‘Superior orders and prescription of law’). Together with article 25(3), these articles regulate criminal responsibility for the entire scale of possible crimes under international criminal law and the mode of engagement in their commission article 27 adds a further aspect to this coverage by guaranteeing that such appearances, which include abuse of power, will be brought under the jurisdiction of the Court to avoid impunity. Thus, article 27 is one of the clearest manifestations in the Statute of the determination in paragraph 5 of the Preamble ‘to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes’.

In relating to ‘all persons’, article 27(1) is addressed not only to state officials, but also inter alia to members of international organizations etc.⁶⁸ Article 27(1) is formulated openly and in a non-exhaustive manner; the second sentence of paragraph 1 only gives examples (see infra mn 19) of groups of persons included (like heads of state etc.). – That the Statute shall apply ‘equally’ clearly refers to a ‘distinction based on official capacity’ only. The drafting history indicates that this formula does not exclude distinctions based on individual culpability or the intensity of participation etc.⁶⁹. – According to article 27(1), ‘official capacity’ does not exempt anyone from criminal responsibility nor does it mitigate this responsibility. Again, the term ‘official capacity’ is formulated in an open manner in order to describe an overall concept (as illustrated by the non-exhaustive examples in paragraph 1 sentence 2). This legislative technique aims at including all official capacities that – according to the traditional Westphalian notion of immunity of acts of state – once allowed individuals to hide behind the shield of the sovereignty, and thus to attain impunity for crimes committed in the name of the state. The exercise of ‘official capacity’ encapsulates conduct approved or authorized by an internationally recognized authority (like a state or an international institution). In effect, the concept needs to be interpreted broadly in order to express that no official position derogates personal criminal responsibility for the crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court. For example, all military commanders, from the top to the lower level, are normally acting in official capacity (as long as they do not go ‘rogue’ and act ‘privately’).⁷⁰

⁶⁷ Inter alia for the reasons put forward by Kreß/Prost, Article 98, mn 19, the impeding and notorious Article 46A*bis* of the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights does not change this current state of customary international law, the more, since the African Court of Justice and Human Rights is a regional, not an international criminal court acting on behalf of the international community.

⁶⁸ It has to be further kept in mind that the Zutphen text of the corresponding article 18 was drafted a little more narrowly than the present paragraph 1, in that the types of persons with which it was concerned were listed exhaustively. They did, however, not cover the position of the removal of immunities that subsist for persons in respect to their membership of international organisations as well as in respect of States. In Rome, Article 18(2) of the Zutphen Draft was considered to cover such persons. Hence, it now appears that the importance of paragraph 2 relates to its interaction with article 98.

⁶⁹ See mn 15.

3. ‘In particular’ ...

- 19 The ‘In particular’ of paragraph 1 sentence 2 hails that this provision only contains a non-exhaustive list of examples for official capacities that are in turn of no relevance when deciding on the criminal responsibility of the accused. This list of examples includes the most typical and those whose political or administrative power makes them most susceptible to grave abuse through the commission, in every imaginable way, of crimes under the Statute. Aiming to express what is in any event irrelevant dispenses with the need to differentiate between legally accepted, de facto exercised and mere purported exercise of official capacities. This is the reason why one of the early proposals, to specify that the respective person had to act in his official capacity⁷¹, was finally rejected. It was argued that article 27 was applicable to both, legal and de facto powers, because ‘[i]f a person was acting as though he were Head of State or Government or a government official when in fact he was not, he would incur criminal responsibility just as much, if the acts he committed were criminal acts under the code’⁷².
- 20 Article 27(1) mentions the ‘Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official’: ‘Head of State or Government’ presupposes two positions, which often are held by different persons, as in Great Britain, Germany and Austria, but may be also exercised by one person like the president of the USA and France. Both expressions are mentioned alternatively; therefore, if occupied by one person, article 27 is equally applicable. The way in which a person becomes a ‘Head of State or Government’ is not important. Decisive is that he or she holds such a position in a state or government which is either established according to the law of the respective State or, if not, is at least broadly acknowledged by the international community. There can be no doubt that such a position is recognized for all persons heading a state or a government of Member States of the UN. Besides, for reasons given in mn 19, persons purporting to act in an official capacity fall under the jurisdiction of the Court and are included in the concept of article 27.⁷³ – ‘Members of a Government or parliament’ includes all persons having a seat in one of these two institutions, be they at a federal, state or local level and independent of whether such a person has been elected or nominated etc. Parliament is in general the expression for the (not necessarily democratically elected) body of representatives of the population of a state on the national level. But the level of any legislative body is not decisive. If it is a national or a state parliament or any other parliament on a local level as in cities or villages, all those persons may be included, because even if accepted as persons with an official capacity, article 27 provides ⁷⁰ Also cf. Prosecutor v. Blaškić, Case No. IT-95-14, Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997, Appeals Chamber, 29. October 1997, paras. 38 and 41; Prosecutor v. Furundžija, Case No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 140 and Prosecutor v. Milošević, Decision on Preliminary Motions, Trial Chamber, 8 November 2001, paras. 26 et seq.

⁷¹ See the 1988 ILC Report, (1988) YbILC, Part 2, 71.

⁷² Ibid.

⁷³ An example for the ‘top level’ is the indictment and trial of the ICTY in the case of the Former President of the FRY, Slobodan Milošević. He was indicted on the basis of individual responsibility (Article 7(1) ICTYSt.) and superior responsibility (Article 7(3) thereof). See Prosecutor v. Milošević, Case No. IT-01-54, Indictment, 8 Nov. 2001.

that their capacity is irrelevant. – Including the examples ‘elected representative or a government official’ takes care of the development of democratic institutions. These examples do not mark the lowest level but address the lower ranks of the hierarchy.⁷⁴ Both are broad enough concepts to cover all possibilities not falling under the other examples mentioned in paragraph 1. Elected means not only elected by the citizens on the national and on all other state levels but also an election by one of the governmental institutions or organs, for instance of a special Government ambassador to go abroad on a peace keeping mission or a lower ranking state officer. Persons from the last group are only government officials when supplied with the associated functions and powers. The first deals with a group different from the examples of members of parliament by excluding those, who have been appointed. This distinction also assists to differentiate the next category of ‘government official’. The wording clarifies that the limiting adjective ‘elected’ refers only to representative and not to a government official. The government official therefore may have reached his or her official capacity by being elected or appointed. Here again a broad conception poses no danger to the integrity of the criminal justice established under the Statute, because the enumeration in sentence 2 of paragraph 1 has only an exemplifying character and the general rule of sentence 1 states that persons having any ‘official capacity’ on the international or on the domestic level, should be treated equally in the sense that the nature of their capacity is irrelevant with regard to their responsibility under international criminal law.

4. ‘shall in no case exempt ... from criminal responsibility’

This formulation confirms, by way of the very strict wording (‘in no case’), that there is no exception to the irrelevance of official capacity: any official capacity a person may have by law or by fact, in reality or purported, is irrelevant as concerns the possible criminal responsibility of that person before the Court for crimes falling under its jurisdiction. The procedural consequence of this rule is that the Court does not have to make certain findings on the facts with regard to the position the defendant has held at the time when he committed the crime (except of course, this position is relevant in any other way, e.g. in order to establish command responsibility or to aggravate a sentence due the high official position of the accused). Rather it is, in cases of doubt, sufficient to state ex hypothesis that even if the accused held this or that position (or purported to act in an official capacity) it would not exempt him or her from criminal responsibility⁷⁵. Of course, persons falling under the broad conception of paragraph 1 have to be treated like all other suspects under the Statute and, therefore, may be free from criminal responsibility if, for instance, they lack the mental element required for a specific crime. 21

5. ‘in and of itself’ no ‘ground for reduction of sentence’

Article 27(1) forbids any mitigation of the sentence on the ground alone (‘in and of itself’) that the convicted person acted in an official capacity or believed he or she was doing so. On the contrary, the fact that a person abused his or her power may frequently be evaluated as an aggravating circumstance⁷⁶. In effect, article 27(1) leads to the ordinary sentencing process under article 78(1) and rule 145 RPE, where mitigating and aggravating circumstances are to be balanced, including that core criminal conduct was carried out under the flag of official 22

⁷⁴ As an example for a ‘government official’ at the lowest local level can serve the trial against Jean-Paul Akayesu, the mayor of Taba, who was sentenced on 2 October 1998 to twenty years of imprisonment for committing crimes against humanity, by superior responsibility mainly by non interfering to prevent their commission. See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, Case No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 October 1998 and Prosecutor v. Akayesu, Case No. ICTR-96-4-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 1 June 2001.

⁷⁵ See also Triffterer, in: Buffard et al. (eds.), International Law Between Universalism and Fragmentation: Festschrift in Honour of Gerhard Hafner (2008) 571 (especially at II.A und II.B.).

⁷⁶ See, for instance, ILC Report on the Work of its Thirty-Eighth Session, 5 May-11 July 1986, UN Doc. A/41/10 (1986), para. 170.

capacity. The sentencing assessments are based on the requirements of justice as far as the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person are concerned. With respect to the latter, it is conceivable that the individual circumstances of the convicted person' lead to a 'reduction of sentence', e. g. because the official capacity wielded by him or her were overpowering⁷⁷. However, rule 145(2)(b)(ii) RPE explicitly lists 'official capacity' as a possible aggravating circumstance; this holds true all the more when this coincides with an 'abuse of power' (rule 145(2)(b)(ii) RPE). The higher up the convicted person was in a core criminal organization and the more official capacity he or she wielded, has also to be given consideration according to rule 145(1)(c) RPE.

II. Paragraph 2

1. The irrelevance of immunity ratione personae before international courts as an expression of customary international law?

- 23 While it is more or less safe to assume that immunity ratione materiae (of any incumbent or former state etc. official) is irrelevant before an international court like the ICC,⁷⁸ and that article 27 is thus but a declaration of customary international law, it is very much open for debate whether the same holds true with regard for the irrelevance of immunity ratione personae under article 27(2). The notion that personal immunity is irrelevant before international courts in general has been advanced by the SCSL in Taylor. In qualifying itself an international criminal court proper, and in drawing inter alia on the ICJ Arrest Warrant decision, the SCSL Appeals Chamber (in-)famously held:

'[T]he principle seems now established that the sovereign equality of states does not prevent a Head of State from being prosecuted before an international criminal tribunal or court. We accept the view expressed by Lord Slynn of Hadley that 'there is ... no doubt that states have been moving towards the recognition of some crimes as those which should not be covered by claims of state or Head of State or other official or diplomatic immunity when charges are brought before international tribunals.' In this result the Appeals Chamber finds that article 6(2) of the [SCSL-]Statute is not in conflict with any peremptory norm of general international law and its provisions must be given effect by this court. We hold that the official position of [Charles Taylor] as an incumbent Head of State at the time when these criminal proceedings were initiated against him is not a bar to his prosecution by this court.'⁷⁹

In deviating from the rationale advanced in the Al Bashir Arrest Warrant Decision (see infra mn 25), PTC I adopted the Taylor approach (i. e. this international court exception to immunity ratione personae) in its Malawi Decision in Al Bashir. There, the Chamber rejected the argument

'that international law affords immunity to Heads of States in respect of proceedings before international courts' on the ground [on the ground, O.T./C.B.] that the principle in international law is that immunity of either former or sitting Heads of State cannot be invoked to oppose a prosecution by an international court. This is equally applicable to former or sitting Heads of States not Parties to the Statute whenever the Court may exercise jurisdiction.⁸⁰

⁷⁷ Consider, for instance, a case where the convicted person was just eighteen years of age when the crime was committed and that he was completely unprepared for and overawed by the power transferred to him in a position that nevertheless exposed him to a chain of command and the situation envisaged by Article 33.

⁷⁸ Gaeta (2003) 1 JICJ 186, 194.

⁷⁹ Taylor, SCSL, Rendering of decision on motion made under protest and without waiving immunity accorded to a head of state requesting the Trial Chamber to quash the indictment and declare null and void the warrant of arrest and order for transfer of detention 23 July 2003 (immunity motion), Appeals Chamber, 31 May 2004, paras 51 et seq. [SCSL-Doc SCSL-03-01-1-059]. For well-founded critique of this decision see Robinson, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 563 with further references; Frulli (2004) 2 JICJ 1118 et seq.

⁸⁰ The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision Pursuant to Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 12 December

The notion that customary international law does not grant the most senior officials of a state immunity ratione personae before international courts has found both scholarly acceptance⁸¹ and rejection.^{82, 83} Both positions advance sensible arguments, and as always, the identification of the current state of play of customary international law is delicate. This holds true all the more, since the methodology of identifying the pertinent custom is far from clear as well. Is one to look for custom granting senior state officials immunity ratione personae before international courts? Or for custom making it an exception that state officials, who do enjoy personal immunity before national courts, do not do so before international courts?⁸⁴ Even when accepting the latter and predominantly held position, an international court exception for immunity ratione personae should be approached with an open mind. First, it has to be noted that this does not pre-determine article 98; it is thus very well possible to believe that the irrelevance of personal immunity before the Court does not extend to the horizontal relationship between a State requested for cooperation and the Non-Party State granting personal immunity (e.g. to its head of state);⁸⁵ it is thus unnecessary to read article 27(2) or customary international law restrictively in order to uphold the very fabric and working order of inter-national relations between states. Second, the Special Rapporteur of the ILC on the subject of ‘Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction’ has supported the idea that ‘(i)mmunity from international criminal jurisdiction appears to be fundamentally different from immunity from national criminal jurisdiction’.⁸⁶ Normatively, this is not so much because the formula par in parem non habet imperium cannot be the rationale for personal immunity from international jurisdiction,⁸⁷ but rather because the international prosecution of an incumbent head of state or government or foreign minister, who is accused of core crimes, does not necessarily infringe upon diplomatic inter-state relations. In this respect it has to be noted that article 27(2) is not the place to delve into the peace versus/via justice debate, since the mere possibility to assume jurisdiction over an incumbent senior state official, who may in turn block peace building due to fear of international prosecution, must not be equated with the necessity to do so; an international court exception to immunity ratione personae hence does not pre-determine the peace versus/via justice debate. Third and finally, ‘[i]f further judicial rulings consistently support the proposition that personal immunity is no barrier before international courts, and that proposition is supported by State practice and opinio iuris, then such a rule could certainly become custom’⁸⁸.

As already mentioned in mn 6, the aforementioned debate is theoretically of the utmost importance, but its today’s practical bearing can be doubted as far as article 27 is concerned. Whether article 27(2) is an expression of customary international law is only relevant in an article 12(2)(b)-scenario, i.e. when the Court, without a Security Council referral, wishes to prosecute an individual benefitting from immunity ratione personae granted a Non-Party State, which has not accepted the Courts jurisdiction under article 12(3). Where the Court goes after the beneficiary of an immunity granted by a State Party or by a Non-Party State, 2011, paras. 18 and 36 [doc1287184.pdf]. One day later, on 13 December 2011, an identical decision was addressed to Chad [doc1384955.pdf].

⁸¹ See e.g. Gaeta (2009) 7 JICJ 315; Bantekas (2005) 10 JCSL 21, 41; Bianchi (1999) 10 EJIL 237, 261; Krefß/Prost, Article 98, mn 28 et seq. with further references.

⁸² See e.g. Pedretti, Immunity of Heads of State and State Officials for International Crimes (2015) 274 et seq., 304 et seq.; Robinson, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 562 et seq. with further references; Zappalà (2001) 12 EJIL 595, 605 et seq.

⁸³ Note that deciding on the reach of article 27 does not necessarily pre-determine the reach of Article 98.

⁸⁴ On this issue see Kreicker (2009) ZIS 350, 355.

⁸⁵ See Gaeta (2009) 7 JICJ 315.

⁸⁶ Kolodkin, Preliminary report on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, A/CN.4/601, 29 May 2008, para. 103.

⁸⁷ As it was seemingly suggested by Kolodkin, Preliminary report on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, A/CN.4/601, 29 May 2008, para. 103.

⁸⁸ As conceded by Robinson, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 564.

which has accepted the Courts jurisprudence, the irrelevance of any personal immunity can be explained via its waiver by these states. And where the Court's jurisdiction is based on a Security Council Referral, the (fourth and most convincing) reasoning of PTC I in the Al Bashir Arrest Warrant Decision is sound in and of itself⁸⁹:

'[B]y referring [a] situation to the Court, pursuant to article 13(b) of the Statute, the Security Council of the United Nations [accepts] that the investigation into the said situation, as well as any prosecution arising therefrom, will take place in accordance with the statutory framework provided for in the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the Rules as a whole'⁹⁰.

In the alternative, one may also argue that, when obliging all (including state) parties to a conflict to cooperate fully with the Court, the Security Council (at least implicitly) removes all personal immunities from the senior officials.⁹¹ This was indeed adopted by PTC II in a more recent ruling in *Al Bashir*⁹². Whatever the line of reasoning, the reconcilability of article 27(2) with customary international law does not become an issue, either because the Court can draw on the Security Council's activation of the Statute as a whole or because any immunity ratione personae is authoritatively waived by the Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN-Charter.

2. 'Immunities or special procedural rules ... shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction'

26 There is some controversy about the reach of paragraph 2, namely of the phrase the 'immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law'. As suggested in the previous edition, these immunities may include those ratione materiae and personae. Or one may distinguish between paragraph 1 capturing the former and paragraph 2 the latter (see mn 3). – In substance, it makes no difference whether such rules exclude criminal responsibility or only protect the respective person by a purely procedural rule against the exercise of domestic jurisdiction like arrest and prosecution before national courts. Since none of these rules are applicable, irrespective of whether they exist in national or in international law. Such rules include all national regulations even if they rank as constitutional law and all rules of general and special international law such as those contained in the Vienna Diplomatic Relations Treaty 1961, which deals, besides other Conventions, with the subject of immunities and privileges. It goes without saying that only those are relevant, which are attached 'to the official capacity of a person'. But here again, the structure of article 27 permits the Court to leave open in its finding (should it make a finding at all) the question of what kind of immunity or special procedural regulation may be applicable; all of them are irrelevant and, therefore, not material to the findings and the sentence.

27 All such rules and immunities 'shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction'. This formula comprehends that an official capacity does not exempt a person from criminal responsibility, nor shall such a position endow the person with impunity founded on procedural reasons. It thereby is, in principle, confirmed that the Court has jurisdiction in all these cases and can exercise it without for instance waiting for a waiver of immunity, which may in national jurisdictions be a condition precedent to activities within the criminal

⁸⁹ Concurring Robinson, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 562; Holvoet, in: De Hert et al. (eds.), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (2013), Article 27, at 3.2.1, with further references, also to more critical authors.

⁹⁰ The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 4 March 2009, para. 45 [doc639096.pdf].

⁹¹ See Ambos, Treatise (2013) 416 with further references, including references to authors critical of this argument.

⁹² The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, PTC II, 9 April 2014, para. 29 [doc1759849.pdf].

justice system. This basic concept makes, at least in principle, decisions like the indictment of the ICTY against the former President of the FRY, Slobodan Milošević, inherent also for the Court. The Court has the competence to start an investigation and prosecution in order to find out, whether there is already reasonable ground for a suspicion against an individual person. Because only such an investigation can clarify whether there is a specific suspicion for a certain crime falling within the jurisdiction of the Court and whether – in case there is – the suspect may have acted in an official capacity.

Article 28

Responsibility of commanders and other superiors

In addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court:

- (a) A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by forces under his or her effective command and control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces, where:
 - (i) That military commander or person either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes; and
 - (ii) That military commander or person failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.
- (b) With respect to superior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a), a superior shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates, where:
 - (i) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes;
 - (ii) The crimes concerned activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior; and
 - (iii) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

Literature: Abeyratne, R., 'Superior responsibility and the principle of legality at the ECCC', (2012) 44 GeoWashLLRev 39; Ambos' K., 'Superior Responsibility', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 823; id., 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility', (2007) 5 JICJ 159; id., 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision', (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715; Arnold, R., 'Command Responsibility: A Case Study of Alleged Violations of the Laws of War at Kham Detention Centre', (2002) 7 JCSL 191; id., 'The "Means Rea" of genocide under the Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2003) 14 CLF 127; id., The ICC as a new instrument for repressing terrorism, (Transnational Publishers 2004); id., 'Military Criminal Procedures and Judicial Guarantees: The Example of Switzerland', (2005) 3 JICJ 749; id., 'Book Review of Nybondas, M. L., "Command Responsibility and Its Applicability to Civilian Superiors"', (2013) 11 JICJ 943; Arnold, R. and Wehrenberg, S., 'Die Verantwortung des Vorgesetzten gemäss Art. 264 k StGB', (2013) 2 MLLWR (forthcoming); Aubert, J.F., 'La question de l'ordre supérieur et la responsabilité des commandants dans le Protocole additionnel aux Conventions de Genève du 12 août 1949 relatif à la protection des victimes des conflits armés internationaux (Protocole I) du 8 juin 1977', (2000) 770 RICR 109; Badar, M.E., 'Mens rea – Mistake of Law & Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunal', (2005) 5 ICLRev 203; Badar, M.E. and Karsten, N., 'Current Developments at the International Criminal Tribunals', (2007) 7 ICLRev 163; Bantekas, I., 'Contemporary Law of Superior Responsibility', (1999) 93 AJIL 577; id., 'L'intérêt des États par rapport à la doctrine de la responsabilité des supérieurs', (2000) 838 RICR 391; id., 'On Stretching the Boundaries of Responsible Command', (2009) 7 JICJ 1197; Bonafe, B.I., 'Find a proper role for command responsibility', (2007) 5 JICJ 599; Bothe, M., Partsch, K.J. and Solf, W.A., New Rules for Victims of Armed Conflicts (Martinus Nijhoff 1982); Burnett, W.D., 'Command Responsibility of Israeli Military Commanders for the Pogrom at Shatila and Sabra', (1985) 107 MillRev 71; id., 'Criminal liability for the actions of subordinates – the doctrine of command responsibility and its analogous in United States law', (1997) 38 HarvLLJ 272; Ching, A.B., 'Evolution of the command responsibility doctrine in light of the Celebici decision of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', (1999) 25 NCarolJILCR 167; Clark, R.S., 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences', (2001) 12 CLF 291; Crowe, C.N., 'Command Responsibility in the Former Yugoslavia: The Chances of Successful Prosecution', (1994) 29 URichLLRev 191; Eckhardt, W.G., 'Command Criminal Responsibility: A Plea for a Workable Standard',

(1982) 97 MillRev 1; Feith, K.M.F., 'The Mens Rea of superior responsibility as developed by ICTY jurisprudence', (2001) 14 LeidenJIL 617; id., 'Final Report of the Commission of Inquiry Into the Events at the Refugee Camps in Beirut', (1983) 22 ILM 473; Fenrick, B., 'Article 28: responsibility of commanders and other superiors', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Observer's notes, by (Nomos 1999) 515; Fiolka, G., 'Kommentar zu Art. 264k', in: M.A. Niggli and H. Wiprächtiger (eds.), Basler Kommentar zum StGB, ii (Helbing Lichtenhahn 2013) 2245-2264; Garraway, C.H.B., 'Command Responsibility: Victors' Justice or just Desserts?', in: R. Burchill et al. (eds.), International Conflict and Security Law: essays in memory of Hilaire McCoubrey (CUP 2005) 68; id., 'Responsibility of command: a poisoned chalice?', in: R. Arnold and P.A. Hildebrand (eds.), International Humanitarian Law and the 21st Century's Conflicts: Changes and Challenges (Editions interuniversitaires suisses 2005) 117; Green, L.C., 'Superior orders and command responsibility', (1989) 27 CanYbil 200; id., 'Command Responsibility in International Humanitarian Law', (1995) 5 TransnatL&ContempProbs 320; id., 'War Crimes, Crimes Against Humanity and Command Responsibility', (1997) 50 NavalWarCollegeRev. 26; Greenwood, C., 'Command Responsibility and the Hadzihasanovic Decision', (2004) 2 JICJ 598; Hart, F.A., 'Yamashita, Nuremberg and Vietnam: Command Responsibility Reappraised' (1972) 25 NavalWarCollegeRev 19; Herde, R., Command Responsibility: die Verfolgung der 'Zweiten Garde' deutscher und japanischer Generäle im alliierten Prozeßprogramm nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg (Nomos 2002); Howard, K.A., 'Command Responsibility for War Crimes', (1972) 21 JPubL 7; Husmann, M., 'Die neuen Bestimmungen in Art. 264k-n StGB zur Umsetzung allgemeiner Grundsätze des Römer Statuts', in: Jusletter, 23rd May 2011 < <http://jusletteradmin.zynex.ch/jusletter/GetJusletter.htm?title=Jusletter+23.+Mai+2011#maillink0> >; Jia, B.B., 'The Doctrine of Command Responsibility Revisited', (2004) 3 ChineseJIL 1; Keith, K.M.F., 'Superior responsibility applied before the ICTY', (2001) 14 JILPAC/HuV - 1 98; Kelsen, H., Peace through Law (UNC Press 1944); Landrum, B.D., 'The Yamashita War Crimes Trial: command responsibility then and now', (1995) MillRev 149; Laucci, C., in: J. Fernandez and X. Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale internationale, commentaire par, Vol. I (Pedone 2012) 864; Levie, H.S., 'Command Responsibility', (1997/1998) 8 JLS 1; Levine, E., 'Command Responsibility: The Mens Rea Requirement', (2005) Global Policy Forum 3; Lippman, M., 'The evolution and scope of command responsibility', (2000) 13 LeidenJIL 139; id., 'Humanitarian law: the development and scope of the superior orders defense', (2001) 20 PennStILRev 1; Maugeri, A.M., La responsabilità da comando nello Statuto della Corte Penale Internazionale (Giuffrè 2007); Métraux, G., The law of command responsibility (OUP 2009); Moloto, B.J., 'Command responsibility in International Criminal Tribunals', (2009) 3 BJILP 12; Nybondas, M., 'Civilian Superior Responsibility in the Kordić Case', (2003) 59 NethILRev 1; id., Command responsibility and its applicability to civilian superiors (Asser Press 2010); Parks, W.H., 'Command Responsibility for War Crimes' (1973) 62 MillRev 1; Perkins, S., 'The Failure to Protect: Expanding the Scope of Command Responsibility to the United Nations at Srebrenica' (2004) 62 UTFacLRev 193; Pilloud, C. et al., Commentary on the additional protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (ICRC 1987); Rogers, A.P.V., Law on the battlefield (MUP 1996); Röling B. and Ruter C.F. (eds.), The Tokyo Judgment (AUP 1977); Saland, P., 'International criminal law principles', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, the making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (Kluwer 1999) 189; Sandoz, Y., Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (ICRC 1987); Sarooshi, D., 'Command responsibility and the Blaškić case', (2001) 50 ICLQ 2; Shamsi, H. and Pearlstein, D., Command's Responsibility: Detainee Deaths in U.S. Custody in Iraq and Afghanistan (Human Rights First 2006); Von Sliedregt, E., The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (Asser Press 2003); Smidt, M.L., 'Yamashita, Medina, and beyond: command responsibility in contemporary military operations', (2000) 164 MillRev 155; Stuart, E. H., 'Command Responsibility and Superior Orders in the Twentieth Century – A Century of Evolution', (2003) 10 MurdochUElectronicJL 1; 111 Tinta, M.F., 'Commanders on Trial: the Blaškić case and the doctrine of Command Responsibility under International Law', (2000) 47 (3) NethILRev 293; Trechsel, S., 'Command responsibility as a separate offense', (2009) 3 BJILP 26; Triffterer, O., 'Zur Einschränkung der Menschenrechte und zur Anwendbarkeit von Verfahrensgrundsätzen bei freiheitsbeschränkenden Disziplinarmaßnahmen in "besonderen Gewaltverhältnissen"/Anmerkungen zum Engel-Urteil des EGMR vom 8.6.1976 (Teil I)', (1976) EuGRZ 363; id., Die Österreichische Beteiligungslehre, eine Regelung zwischen Einheitstäter- und Teilnahmesystemen? (Manz 1983); id., in: Landesbericht Österreich zum XII. Internationalen Kongress für Rechtsvergleichung Sydney 1986 Thema V A: Versuch und Rücktritt bei Beteiligung mehrerer an der Straftat, (1986) 27 ZJRv 105; id., 'Causality, a Separate Element of the Doctrine of Superior Responsibility as Expressed in Article 28 Rome Statute?', (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179; id., 'Command Responsibility' – Grundstrukturen und Anwendungsbereiche von Art. 28 des Rom Statutes Eignung auch zur Bekämpfung des internationalen Terrorismus?', in: C. Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen (Nomos 2002) 437; id., 'Command Responsibility, Article 28 Rome Statute, an Extension of Individual Criminal Responsibility for Crimes Within the Jurisdiction of the Court – Compatible with Article 22, nullum crimen sine lege?', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (Müller 2004) 213; id., 'Hans Kelsen Bedeutung für die Entwicklung des Völkerstrafrechts und einer Völkerstrafgerichtsbarkeit', in: Walter et al. (eds.), Hans Kelsen und das Völkerrecht (Manu 2004) 139; id., 'Command Responsibility – crimen sui generis or participation as otherwise provided?', in: O. Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (C.H. Beck 2005) 901; Vest, H. and Sager, C., 'Die bundesrätliche Botschaft zur Umsetzung der Vorgaben des IstGH-Statuts – eine kritische Bestandsaufnahme', (2009) 4 AJP 423; Vetter, G.R., 'Command responsibility of non-military superiors in the International Criminal Court (ICC)', (2000) 25 YaleJIL 1; Wallach, E. and Marcus, M., 'Command Responsibility', in: C.M. Bassiouni, International Criminal Law: International enforcement (Martinus Nijhoff 3rd edition 2008) 459; Weigend, T., 'Kommentar zu § 4 VStGB', in: O. Lagodny (ed.), Münchener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, Band 6/2 (C.H. Beck 2009) 511 (citation: MüKo-Weigend); id., ‘Bemerkungen zur Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit im Völkerstrafrecht’, (2004) 116 ZStW 999; Wenqi, Z., The doctrine of Command Responsibility as applied to civilian leaders: the ICTR and the ‘Kayishema’ case, in: S. Yee and W. Tieya, International Law in the Post-Cold War World (Routledge 2001) 373; Wu, T. and Kang, Y.S., ‘Criminal liability for the actions of subordinates – the doctrine of command responsibility and its analogues in United States law’, (1997) 38 HarvLLJ; Zahar, A., ‘Command Responsibility of civilian superiors for genocide’, (2001) 14 LeidenJIL 3.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks	1
I. Development/Overview	4
1. Changing paradigms: superiors, established and protected authorities gradually called to criminal responsibility also for violations committed by their subordinates	5
2. Silent toleration and failures to influence and interfere – two differently structured appearances and approaches.....	8
3. Slowly towards comprehensive definitions, in particular articles 86 and 87 Additional Protocol I 1977 and 28 Rome Statute.....	10
II. Practical Importance	25
1. Nuremberg, Tokyo and ‘follow up proceedings’ (Nachfolgeprozesse).....	29
2. Continuing to focus primarily on commanders increased the acknowledgement of an inherent superior responsibility, but did not crystallise elements ‘strictly construed’.....	39
3. Command responsibility, dominating the international and the transitional justice regimes up to the top of hierarchically based authorities, requiring more legal guaranties	45
III. Guidelines for investigation and prosecuting superior responsibility.....	76
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	85
I. Paras (a) and (b): Two alternatives with few deviating elements – general remarks	85
1. Military command (a) or other ‘superior and subordinate relationships’ (b)	86
2. Any of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court when – committed by forces under ...effective control ... or ... authority and control’, litera (a), or when – concerning ‘activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior’, litera (b) (ii).....	90
3. Minimum mental element for the second failure: – ‘should have known’, or – ‘consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated that the, subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes’.....	95
II. Paragraph (a).....	98
1. Qualification: ‘military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander’	98
2. Commanders and subordinates	101
a) Structure of ‘forces’	101
b) ‘[E]ffective command and control’	102
c) ‘[E]ffective authority and control’	103
3. ‘[F]ailure to exercise control properly’	104
a) Passivity and duty to become active.....	105
b) ‘Crimes committed’ as a result	106
aa) Completed or attempted crimes	106
bb) Committed in which modality of article 25 para. 3 ever	107
cc) Causality.....	109
dd) Accountability.....	111
c) Mental element: intent and knowledge	113
4. Failure ‘to take all necessary and reasonable measures’.....	116
a) ‘[K]new or should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes’	116
b) Dereliction of duty and power to react	117
c) Measures needed to avoid or to compensate ‘the result of’ the ‘failure to exercise control properly’	118
aa) Dependence on the stage of the commission	118
bb) ‘[T]o prevent or repress ... or to submit’	119
aaa) ex post or ex ante evaluation? – The objective comparable commander ‘in the situation at the time’, article 87 para. 2
Add. Prot. I.....	120
bbb) Hypothetical causation	121

- d) Threshold of unreasonable demands? 122
- III. Paragraph (b) 123
 - 1. '[S]uperior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a)'.. 123
 - 2. Subsidiarity based on a different notion of 'relationship' and 'effective authority and control' 124
 - 3. '[F]ailure to exercise control properly' 126
 - 4. Failure 'to take all necessary and reasonable measures' 127
 - a) '[K]new or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes' 127
 - b) Crimes concerning 'activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior' 128
 - c) The objective comparable superior 'in the situation at the time' 129
 - d) Threshold of reasonable demands?..... 130
- C. Special remarks 131
 - I. Assisting in command responsibility, a participation in the crime committed by subordinates? 131
 - II. Attempted command responsibility, an attempted crime within the jurisdiction of the Court? 133
 - III. Concurring responsibility? 136
 - 1. Authorities in a hierarchial chain all failing to fulfil their duties 136
 - 2. Command responsibility and participation according to article 25 137
 - IV. The customary nature of the doctrine of command responsibility 139

A. Introduction/General remarks

Article 28 contains the longest definition of a single modality concerning individual criminal responsibility under international law, even if the two alternatives, (a) and (b), are looked at separately. Already this and its extremely complicated, unusual and interlocked wording demand an extensive introduction and several 'general remarks', helpful for the interpretation of its structure and its major aspects concerning the application of this article by national and international courts.

In addition, ever since international criminal law started to develop, cases dealt with on an international level and even those handled by national jurisdictions, demonstrate that only very few crimes were committed by subordinated members of armed forces on their own initiative. More often such atrocities show some 'involvement' of superiors like silent toleration or lack of sufficient supervision. This picture and, in particular, the omissions that could be observed, led to the conclusion that at least most of these crimes were predictable or recognizable for military superiors, keeping a 'sharp eye' on the factual and the psychological situations of their subordinates. This is in particular true with regard to (legal or illegal) warfare resulting in war crimes.

Commanders may have other concerns like protecting their subordinates, gaining military advantages or even winning the battle. But this does not relieve them from the duty to observe their subordinates before and on the spot with regard to whether they obey international humanitarian law. This law takes due care of possible conflicts of interest, for instance by including into definitions of war crimes the element 'not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly', article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv).

The majority of cases reported after the Second World War and those, up till now pending before the ICTY, the ICTR and the ICC, concern superior/subordinate relationships, in which either the communication top down or bottom up is dealing with criminal behaviour or should have been (more) concerned about such issues. This is true, both from the point of view of the prosecution as well as from the defence. The prosecution may claim that though not committed in the sense of executed by the superior, in particular a military commander has the responsibility for certain crimes of subordinates under his effective authority and control. On the other side the defence may claim, that certain crimes, though and just because they are committed not by himself, but by his subordinates, are not accountable to the commander, who is quite often far removed from the place of the events and, in particular, because he was de facto unable to control all forces under his authority at the same time¹.

- 3 These and similar aspects play an important role in the genesis of article 28, showing a rather curved way of development², and, consequently, a highly disputed jurisprudence³. Both, genesis and jurisprudence have to be recalled, since they are equally needed for interpreting article 28 when to be applied on a national or the international level; because quite a few formulations of its wording still have to be clarified in order to establish whether all elements are ‘strictly construed’ in the sense of article 22⁴.

Clarity is, in particular, requested in politically highly ‘explosive’ cases; for instance when the chain of command reaches up to the top of military or government representatives still in power positions in their respective State. Because since their ‘official capacity’ is irrelevant for the ‘criminal responsibility under this Statute’ (article 27) every single one of them can be held, in principle, responsible according to article 28. But in practice such persons still in power or having their supporters still in power positions, may be able to prevent an adequate criminal investigation and prosecution before national, and, sometimes, even before international or ‘internationalized’ courts, for example when surrender to the ICTY is requested and de facto refused, as it occurred with regard to Karadžić and Mladić.

This raises the issue of political accountability as overlapping with criminal responsibility, in particular with regard to such appearances as in Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib, of which only the criminal responsibility will be dealt with here⁵.

I. Development/Overview

- 4 Superior responsibility, ‘in addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute’, raises not only general questions of whether the individual is a subject under international law, but, as such, has shaped the concept and notion of penal guilt as a requirement for criminal responsibility under international law⁶. It also demonstrates, how early in the history of international humanitarian law a responsibility ‘for crimes committed by others’ started to develop. This new and independent modality of individual responsibility surprises, because it partly neglects and reaches beyond the traditional concept of criminal liability and personal guilt, the well accepted and acknowledged, indispensable basis of criminal law and responsibility for centuries in all major legal systems of the world.

1. Changing paradigms: superiors, established and protected authorities gradually called to criminal responsibility also for violations committed by their subordinates

- 5 Before the individual was accepted as a subject of international law, a comprehensive responsibility of superiors for their subordinates was well known in national military law, but

¹ See Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2005) 375 et seq.

² See e.g. Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I(2002) 824 et seq.; Triffterer (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179 et seq. and for the difference between articles 27 para. 1 and 28 Rome Statute id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901 et seq.

³ See, in particular, the controversial interpretation of customary law by the ICTY on the absence of a causal element within the doctrine of command responsibility, Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., ‘Čelebići’, IT-96-21-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16. Nov. 1998, pp. 396 et seq., mn 1159 et seq. and Triffterer (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179 et seq.

⁴ More to these aspects Triffterer, in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 215 et seq. and id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901 et seq.

⁵ Note the difference between Bosnia-Herzegovina 2005 (Čelebići), Croatia and the torture in the prison of Abu Ghraib/Iraq 2004, for which U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald H. Rumsfeld took over full responsibility, but only in a political and not in a legal sense <<http://www.washingtonpost.com>>: Rumsfeld testifies before Senate Armed Services Committee (printout: 03.04.2006).

⁶ On this aspect e.g. Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (1966) 141 et seq.; Kelsen, Peace through Law (1944) 71 et seq.

also in other social institutions, called 'besondere Gewaltverhältnisse' (subordination dominated by hierarchical power positions), where subordinates received a high amount of protection, but enjoyed only a limited amount of personal freedom and were obliged to strict obedience, like in some boarding schools and, in particular, in prison⁷. For a long time, an unrestricted general responsibility of superiors was accepted, based on authority granted to such superiors and on their protection against any or at least against unjustified disobedience. The American Francis Lieber Code (1863), for instance, expressed such a model of granting authority over suspects by giving military commanders the right to shoot subordinates on the spot, when not stopping to commit crimes though expressly ordered to do so⁸.

From this starting point it was only a small step to hold commanders responsible for not effectively informing, educating, or, if necessary, ordering their subordinates in advance to obey the laws and customs of war, or for not stopping them at least to continue when the slightest sign for the commission of such crimes became discernable.

In order to contribute to the prevention of crimes by calling superiors to responsibility, it was indispensable to establish their duties by law. Accordingly, superiors should, in particular, 'ensure that members of armed forces under their control are aware of their obligations under the Conventions and this Protocol', article 87 para. 2, Add. Prot. I. At that time, an almost unlimited authority was combined with their duty to report to higher ranks in the military hierarchy

'if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude, in the circumstances at the time, that he (the subordinate) was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach', article 86 para. 2, Add. Prot. I. This duty was the consequence of the generally acknowledged experience, that grave breaches could 'result from a failure to act when under a (legal) duty to do so', article 86 para. 1 Add. Prot. I.

Mainly these aspects developed the general principle, that the commission of certain crimes 'by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be', article 86 para. 2 Add. Prot. I. A long time before it was defined and acknowledged in 1977, this principle was the basis for the installation of a legal institution called Command Responsibility, though, at the beginning, it was not yet concentrating on and only partly established as a criminal responsibility⁹.

It was a rather parallel appearance in the general concept of criminal law, developed and accepted in major legal systems of the world and international humanitarian law, that everybody who sets a condition for the commission of a certain crime, causes the crime and should be held individually responsible, if the resulting crime appears because of this contribution, though, perhaps in combination with others, in particular for the part of the principal perpetrator, as 'his product'¹⁰. At the same time, the theory of participation in crimes became more and more sophisticated and developed to a system, in which everybody, who initiated, supported or otherwise contributed in the commission of a crime, could be held himself responsible for committing the crime¹¹. This is up till now independent of

⁷ Triffterer (1976) EuGRZ 363 et seq.

⁸ See IV Hague Convention 1907, Article I of the annexed rules of warfare. For an example on the national level see the 1863 Lieber Code where article 44 states 'A soldier, officer, or private, in the act of committing such violence, and disobeying a superior ordering him to abstain from it, may be lawfully killed on the spot by such superior' and article 71 states, '[w]hoever intentionally inflicts additional wounds on an enemy already wholly disabled, or kills such an enemy, or who orders or encourages soldiers to do so, shall suffer death, if duly convicted, ...' (brackets added).

⁹ Supra note 8.

¹⁰ See e.g. Triffterer (1986) 27 ZfRV 105 et seq.

¹¹ See, for instance, Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 543 et seq.; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 41 et seq.; Triffterer, Die Österreichische Beteiligungslehre, eine Regelung zwischen Einheitstäter- und Teilnahmesystemen? (1983).

whether his contribution was an act or an omission and of the responsibility of the principal offender or other accomplices¹².

2. Silent toleration and failures to influence and interfere – two differently structured appearances and approaches

- 8 This variety of cooperation to commit crimes demonstrates the need to clearly define by ‘strictly construed’ elements concerning the borderline between punishable and non punishable cooperation as well as between the principal perpetrator and participation in a specific crime as an accomplice. Such a demand is independent of the fact, whether cooperation in the commission is evaluated as an independent commission of the crime (‘Einheitstäterschaft’) or as a mere cooperation in the crime of other persons¹³.

Independent of this theoretical basis, the differentiation by merely what behaviour should be made punishable, was in particular difficult with regard to persons, who had the duty to prevent crimes because of their authority and power over subordinates and failed to prevent such crimes committed by their subordinates. Were they principal perpetrators by merely ‘letting it happen’, what they ought to have prevented or only when they directly supported crimes of subordinates?

A general, well accepted differentiation was made possible by separating and demarcating against each other two criminological appearances: First, superiors who tolerate the commission of crimes by their subordinates in a way that could be interpreted by their subordinates as a tacit consent to the commission. Such a behaviour is supporting crimes of subordinates not expressly, however by conclusive behaviour, which obviously demonstrates the tendency not to interfere. It is participation in the crime, for instance by ‘twinkling eyes’. This was the reason, why ‘toleration’ of crimes committed by subordinates was the first pillar to base command responsibility upon¹⁴, though with another scope and notion as expressed now in article 28.

To a second group belong those superiors who fail to inform, educate or control their subordinates about the law and, in particular, about legal and illegal warfare; they do not support crimes of their subordinates by an active behaviour. But by remaining passive they do not intervene and thus indirectly support what they should have prevented. A crime may well result not only from silent toleration which can correctly be understood as consensus or even psychological support. It may equally ‘result from a failure to act’, as expressed in article 86 para. 1 Add. Prot. I. There the words ‘when under a duty to do so’, do not question the causality of omissions. They rather limit criminal responsibility to those failures, which by violating a (legal) duty of the perpetrators to act in a specific situation let crimes come to the mind of subordinates and develop, in particular from mere planning or preparation to an attempt or a completed crime.

- 9 The main difference of the above grouping therefore is: Silent toleration is active behaviour for which everybody, including superiors, can be held responsible, even if he or she has no special legal duty to react in specific situations in order to prevent crimes. A failure to educate, guide and control, on the opposite, is an omission for which everybody (and, in particular, superiors) can only be held responsible when there is a pre-established legal duty to do precisely what was needed to prevent (further) harm and what by being omitted resulted in the commission of a crime.

¹² On the equivalence of acts and omissions see for instance the jurisdiction of the ad hoc Tribunals Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-I-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 15. Jul. 1999, pp. 104 et seq., mn 228 and Čelebići, note 3, p. 160 mn 437; Badar and Karsten (2007) 7 ICLRev 163, 157 et seq. under chapter 3.3 Command Responsibility.

¹³ Triffterer, Die Österreichische Beteiligungslehre, eine Regelung zwischen Einheitstäter- und Teilnahmesystemen? (1983).

¹⁴ See for example Cassese, International Criminal Law (2003) 200 et seq. and Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2005) mn. 503 et seq.

3. Slowly towards comprehensive definitions, in particular articles 86 and 87 Additional Protocol I 1977 and 28 Rome Statute

Though articles 86 and 87 have already been briefly referred to when demonstrating under 10
1. above changing paradigms and the latest development before the Rome Statute, we have to keep in mind that there are earlier steps also important for shaping the concept and notion of command responsibility. They started already with article 8 of the 1864 Geneva Convention which demanded that '[t]he implementing of the present Convention shall be arranged by the Commanders-in-Chief of the belligerent armies following the instructions of their respective Governments and in accordance with the general principles set forth in this Convention'¹⁵. By assigning the arrangements for the implementation to 'Commanders-in-Chief', the Convention obliges this group of persons to ensure, though according to pre-established guidelines of their 'superior', that their subordinates know the (new) law and how to obey accordingly. The further elaboration of the codification of the ius in bello, culminated 1907 in the Hague Conventions. Of these, No. IV, requires in the annexed Rules of Warfare as the decisive criteria for the acknowledgement as 'armies, but also militia and volunteer corps' to be 'commanded by a person responsible for his subordinate'¹⁶. This rule implies that superiors could be held responsible for crimes of their subordinates. Responsible at that time indicated accountability according to national law and before its jurisdiction, thus covering disciplinary as well as criminal responsibility under national military law.

The most effective political impetus for the development of superior responsibility came shortly thereafter from the Investigating Committee installed by the International Carnegie Foundation for Peace 1913. The Committee was assigned the task, 'to inquire into the causes and conduct' of the Balkan Wars 1912/1913, and the atrocities committed during these wars. The Committee reported in detail and presented, not as an obiter dictum, but as one of its major findings, that it would have needed only one word of those in power, and all belligerent struggles as well as the atrocities committed along with them would have stopped immediately. This finding was confirmed by the Report of the Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties presented to the Preliminary Peace Conference, March 29, 1919¹⁷.

Partly as a result of these two well based and balanced statements, the Versailles Peace 11
Treaty after the First World War provided in articles 227 and 228 that the German Emperor should be held responsible for 'a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties'. Though charged personally for his ordering to commit certain crime, the accusation also included responsibility for all other crimes committed by his subordinates. It, therefore, was a fallback to international criminal law that the Emperor could not be brought to trial because the Netherlands refused to extradite him. In addition, the (new) German government finally convinced the Allied not to prosecute about 800 German suspects, which Germany was obliged to extradite, but to accept for all these cases the competence of the Reichsgericht in Leipzig¹⁸. There, however, under the aspect of international criminal law and the interest of justice the cases were not handled to the credit of post-war German jurisdiction. Command responsibility, in whatever broad concept and notion, though in ¹⁵ Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded in Armies in the Field. Geneva, article 8, 22 August 1864.

¹⁶ The IV Hague Convention 1907, Article I of the annexed rules of warfare.

¹⁷ See Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Report of the International Commission to Inquire into the Causes and Conduct of the Balkan Wars (1914) and see also the Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties, Report presented to the Preliminary Peace Conference, 29. Mar. 1919, reprinted in (1920) 14 AJIL 95 et seq.

¹⁸ Hankel, Die Leipziger Prozesse, deutsche Kriegsverbrechen und ihre strafrechtliche Verfolgung nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg (2003) and Wiggenhorn, Verlierjustiz, die Leipziger Kriegsverbrecherprozesse nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg (2005).

theory started to reach persons on the top of the hierarchy, was thus not yet put into practice after the First World War¹⁹.

- 12 The time between the two World Wars did not show any significant new development for command responsibility on the international level. Merely the 1929 Geneva Convention provided that: '[t]he Commanders-in-Chief of belligerent armies shall arrange the details for carrying out the preceding articles...'²⁰. It thus continued the line of the above mentioned 1864 Convention by increasing the specification of the duties of commanders though not yet in a manner sufficiently 'strictly construed' in the sense of article 22 para. 2 to base criminal responsibility on. But parallel, though highly disputed in its concept and notion, indirect individual responsibility of superiors was slowly accepted and more and more extended by national penal systems, thus preparing the possibility to also hold superiors responsible for crimes of their subordinates under international criminal law²¹.
- 13 According to this background, not well balanced theoretical considerations nor political compromises for drafting regulations led to a break through after the Second World War. Decisive were criminological appearances during and after this war, which made it necessary to handle with more care the different modalities of individual criminal responsibility, to avoid impunity of those persons, who by their own abuse of power and through their subordinates were responsible for all 'core crimes', committed again and again all over the world without being sufficiently investigated and prosecuted. However, though proving the need to call superiors independent of the traditional scope of participation with an additional inherent new theoretical institution to criminal responsibility, no agreement could be achieved about how to 'strictly construe' such responsibility, in order to avoid criticism raised against cases like Yamashita and High Command²².

Consequently, a definition or even hints in one or the other direction on the basic structures of command responsibility are missing in the Nuremberg Statute as well as in the Nuremberg Principles 1948, in the Genocide Convention 1948 and in the four Geneva Convention 1949. Though all confirm individual criminal responsibility directly under international law, and partly expressly even acknowledge criminal responsibility of all persons independent of their different official positions²³, no special modality for commanders concerning crimes committed by their subordinates could be agreed upon.

Consequently the Special Rapporteur of the ILC on a Draft Code devoted considerable effort on summarizing the status quo in the national legislation and the jurisprudence at that time. He, in particular, pointed out, like in a puzzle or a mosaic with uneven pieces, what aspects and issues had to be taken into consideration for establishing a generally accepted definition of command responsibility. In this context he emphasized in detail the historical importance of the responsibility of superiors for omissions resulting in crimes committed by their subordinates till 1950, a clear theoretical structure and the political need for such a possibility, to hold superiors responsible under international law, dealing with available alternatives and drafting definitions. His proposals, though with regard to the elements mentioned similar to the elements contained in article 28, deviated mainly in so far as he did not separate between a failure to control and supervise subordinates and the failure to ¹⁹ See, in particular, Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties, Report presented to the Preliminary Peace Conference, 29. Mar. 1919, reprinted in (1920) 14 AJIL 95, 117 and critical thereto the Memorandum of the U.S. Delegation, ibid. 127 (135 et seq., 143 et seq.).

²⁰ Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded in Armies in the Field. Geneva, article 26.

²¹ YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur 268 et seq., (A/CN.4/25), and Pilloud et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 (1987) and 1977 Report ILC; See also below II 1.

²² See for a compulsive survey on the different regulations and jurisprudence emphasizing more or less aspects to base command responsibility on, YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur 269 para. 97, (A/CN.4/25), and 1977 Report ILC.

²³ See Nuremberg Trial Proceedings, Charter of the International Military Tribunal, article 7.

interfere in an already ongoing process²⁴. However, even independent of this aspect, the ILC could not achieve a consensus on what elements in which definition should be the indispensable requirement to justify and apply responsibility of superiors for crimes of their subordinates. Consequently, the same lacuna characterizes not only the 1951 Draft Code but also the 1951 Draft Statute as well as the 1953/1954 Drafts²⁵.

It were those divergent opinions which led quite a few legal scholars like Hans Kelsen and Hans-Heinrich Jescheck to deal with this issue on a scientific basis, more in order to establish its theoretical basis than to decide in detail its requirements for a broadly accepted definition²⁶. Their qualified analysis led, for example, and in accordance with the statements of the 1919 War Crimes Commission, to the unavoidable conclusion that the Act-of-State-doctrine did no longer prevent responsibility of persons in official positions, acting on behalf of the State, at least in so far, as they committed grave violations of the 'laws and customs of war and the laws of humanity'²⁷ which were established as crimes under international law.

This general acknowledgement of a rather comprehensive limitation of the Act-of-State-doctrine was the breakthrough for establishing the criminal responsibility of military and civilian superiors failing to arrange the implementation and obedience to these laws, and, thus violating their already in 1864, 1907 and 1929 established duty to prevent by all means, in particular by information and supervision, that their subordinates violate such regulations by committing such crimes.

Both authors, like some others, opened the way for a more scientific and theoretically structured approach. This may well be the reason, why in the 1954 Draft Code and Draft Statute also not yet a relevant provision was included. In addition, unfortunately, the endeavours to codify international criminal law within the United Nations, came to a preliminary stop at the beginning of the Cold War; this delay was officially scheduled till there was an agreement on the definition of aggression in 1974²⁸.

However, before this aim was, at least partly, achieved the international community formally acknowledged in the 1968 Convention on non-statutory limitations of war crimes and crimes against humanity, the criminal responsibility of 'representatives of the State authority ... who, as principals or accomplices, participate in or who directly incite others to the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Besides these traditional modalities, a responsibility for 'representatives of the State authority was established ... who merely tolerate' the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity, thereby accepting responsibility not only for conclusive behaviour (= acts) but also for omissions²⁹.

When finally a definition of aggression was agreed upon by consensus of the G.A. in 1974, the time appeared favourable to work again on establishing command responsibility as an inherent, well accepted legal modality of accountability, which should 'contribute to the prevention of such crimes', Preamble paragraph 5. It should extend individual criminal responsibility by holding those accountable, who failed to fulfil their duty to prevent ²⁴ YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur 268 et seq., (A/CN.4/25).

²⁵ Report ILC, but the Rapporteur had – 1950 already at that time, devoted a broad section of his report to this new institution, YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur 268 et seq., (A/CN.4/25).

²⁶ See e.g. Triffterer, in: Walter et al. (eds.), Hans Kelsen und das Völkerrecht (2004) 139 et seq.

²⁷ Peace treaty of Versailles, 28. Jun. 1919 <<http://www.lib.byu.edu/~rdh/www/versailles.htm>>.

²⁸ See UN Res. 29th Sess., Supp. No. 19, A/3314 (1974).

²⁹ See article II of the 1968 Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity of 26. Nov. 1968:

'If any of the crimes mentioned in article I is committed, the provisions of this Convention shall apply to representatives of the State authority and private individuals who, as principals or accomplices, participate in or who directly incite others to the commission of any of those crimes, or who conspire to commit them, irrespective of the degree of completion, and to representatives of the State authority who tolerate their commission'. See also below III.

subordinates from committing war crimes and those crimes, which since Nuremberg are more and more punishable directly under international law³⁰.

- 16 This tendency was supported by the ICRC, which, always acting as an independent organization, was from its beginning strongly concerned to codify the ius in bello. It, therefore, started after 1974 again where it stopped or failed 1949, and afterwards all endeavours within the UN, with only the above under (b) mentioned small exception in 1968, which emphasized in the discussion the additional modality of responsibility for (silent) toleration. Thus, a practical implementation of superior responsibility, its permanent consideration and partly application of one and/or the other aspect of this new modality in quite a few international and national criminal proceedings after the Second World War, shaped the discussion.

All aspects together turned the issue favourable towards the creation of a sophisticated modality of responsibility for staying passive, letting an event occur or continue and, thus, causing and/or by not interfering at least objectively otherwise supporting crimes, committed by other persons, in this case their subordinates. The background in its complexity was demanding a comprehensive regulation in the interest of the rule of law, and, thus, favourable for drafting articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I.

- 17 This Article 86 para. 1 creates the basis for anchoring a general responsibility of everybody for breaches, ‘which result from the failure to act when under a duty to do so’. It, thus, in addition presupposes causality by passive behaviour and a legal pre-established duty, not to stay passive in a certain situation, but to become active in order to prevent harm. Of course, paragraph 1 presupposes also that harm can be caused by active behaviour, though this alternative is not expressly mentioned.

This is the first express international, general acknowledgement of criminal responsibility for omissions, a modality of human behaviour, which, in particular after the Second World War, was generally discussed and more and more ‘strictly construed’, also on the national level and finally accepted in its present notion in almost all major legal systems of the world³¹. It is based on the realisation that harm to legally protected values may be caused by and thus ‘result’ equally from acts and omissions, the punishability of the latter however appearing justified and necessary only when the perpetrator by the omission violated a pre-established legal duty to react in a way which would have prevented the result: the omission, thus, by not preventing it, is one of the conditions for and thus causes the harm.

- 18 Paragraph 2 of article 86 Add. Prot. I specifies for a qualified group (superiors) in their relation to their subordinates, a particular failure to act. It clarifies that a commission of a crime by a subordinate ‘does not absolve his superiors from penal and disciplinary responsibility, ... if they knew or had information which should have enabled them to conclude ... that he (the subordinate) was committing or was going to commit such a breach ...’. However this accountability should be triggered only, if the superiors ‘did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach’. Article 86 para. 2 Add. Prot. I thus establishes responsibility of superiors under certain conditions, for failures to prevent or to repress breaches of the Conventions and Add. Prot. I. In this paragraph 2 not the duty of superiors to interfere in order to prevent or repress is based, but merely the criminal responsibility as a consequence of the violation of an otherwise pre-established legal duty to do exactly what is necessary to hinder or suppress in this specific situation.

Therefore, it was necessary to define and clarify in article 87 Add. Prot. I the ‘duty of commanders’, defined in all paragraphs, partly as an enumerative list, partly as alternatives. While paragraph 1 obliges the Parties to ‘require military commanders, ... to prevent and, where necessary, to suppress and to report ...’, paragraph 2 clarifies that ‘[i]n order to prevent and suppress breaches’, superiors shall ‘ensure that members of the armed forces under their command are aware of their obligations under the Conventions and this Protocol’. This means, that they have to guarantee by all necessary measures such an awareness, in particular by information, education and also by supervision and control.

³⁰ This modality is not a crimen sui generis but extending expressly and in a way ‘strictly construed’ the modalities for participation amending those mentioned in article 25. See for details see Triffterer, in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 901 et seq.

³¹ Kaufmann, Die Dogmatik der Unterlassungsdelikte (1988) 23 et seq. and the 6th International Congress on Penal Law, Conference proceedings, AIDP, Rome (1953).

Paragraph 3 defines, in addition, obligations of a superior in cases where he ‘is aware that subordinates or other persons under his control are going to commit or have committed a breach’. He then is obliged ‘to initiate such steps as are necessary to prevent such violations of the Conventions or this Protocol, and, where appropriate, to initiate disciplinary or penal action against violators thereof’.

None of these regulations gives a clear indication how to interpret prevention, suppression and repression respectively the adjectives of this three subjective words. They describe a progressing situation, starting with proper control in order to avoid that anything like criminal activities comes to the mind of subordinates and ending with direct or indirect interferences in action, to avoid an attempt or the completion of an attempt³².

At the same time, there is no indication in articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I with regard to the issue, whether a non-interference described in articles 86 para. 2 and 87 para. 3 Add. Prot. I triggers superiors responsibility by itself or whether the failure to properly educate, control or supervise is merely one condition, but triggers criminal responsibility only in cases, where, in addition, the commander is aware of the results of his failure or he should and could have known them and nevertheless did not interfere in the necessary modality. The latest international regulation is contained in article 28, but it deviates, at least by the wording, from articles 7 para. 3 ICTY and 6 para. 3 ICTR Statute.

This difference surprises, because all three regulations take over, mainly verbally, formulations contained in articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I, though without giving any explanation in the preparatory work. With regard to article 28 Rome Statute this ‘copying’ of articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I is the most comprehensive, since two different behaviours are defined in detail: failing to properly control and failing to interfere.

The relationship between the two relevant regulations for the ad hoc Tribunals and article 28 Rome Statute needs to be clarified. At present, after the Rome Statute entered into force 1 July 2002, a double competence is still possible, since no time limit is provided in article 1 ICTY Statute. However, the Security Council ‘endorsed the ICTY’s strategy for completing investigations by the end of 2004, all trial activities at first instance by the end of 2008, and all of its work in 2010, by concentrating on the prosecution and trial of the most senior leaders suspected of being most responsible for crimes within the ICTY’s jurisdiction and transferring cases involving those who may not bear this level of responsibility to competent national jurisdictions, as appropriate, as well as the strengthening of the capacity of such jurisdictions’³³.

Summarizing, articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I could be interpreted that only if a commander fails to make his ‘subordinates or other persons under his control’ sufficiently aware of their obligations so that, as a ‘result’ from this dereliction of duties, they ‘are going to commit or have committed a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol’, the superior can be held responsible.

Consequently, the Parties ‘shall require any commander who is aware’ of such appearances, because he ‘knew’ or had reasons to know, to initiate the necessary steps ‘to prevent such violations ... and, where appropriate, to initiate ... action against the violators’³⁴.

In practice these elements of command responsibility for a ‘failure to act’ are based on the laws and customs of war and have shaped since then all further definitions up to the Consolidated Draft, which was presented at the Rome Conference as a basis for the discussion ‘with a view to finalizing and adopting a convention on the establishment of an International Criminal Court’³⁵. The Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries met five weeks in Rome, in June and July 1998³⁶. Its important, relevant result was to have combined ‘the failure to act’ (to control) in the sense of article 86 para. 1 Add. Prot. I and the several ‘duties of commanders’, as defined in article 87 Add. Prot. I, to serve as a ‘strictly construed’ definition of criminal responsibility, which clearly expresses the triggering basis upon and the framework within which prosecution of superior responsibility is admissible before the ICC³⁷.

³² See for details Triffterer, in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213 et seq.

³³ See for more details S/RES/1503 (2003).

³⁴ Article 87 para. 2 Add. Prot. I.

- 22 Only the combination of a (first) failure to control, resulting in criminal activities of subordinates with a (second) failure of the superior, to take the necessary measures, averts strict liability for not preventing what occurs, but could have already been avoided by a correct fulfillment of the first obligation of commanders, namely, to take responsibility for their subordinates by, in particular, informing, educating, supervising and controlling them as much as necessary, in order to ensure that they act in conformity with the laws and customs of wars and the laws of humanity. It were the highly disputed precedents after the Second World War which raised the need, to avoid further criticism by lifting the threshold of responsibility in the interest of justice by establishing more and precisely detailed requirements in the interest of the rule of law. To meet the demands of article 22 in the sense of ‘strictly construed’ definitions, was not only necessary for the crimes as such, but also for all modalities listed in articles 25 para. 3 or 28, to hold superiors individually responsible for crimes under international law, committed by their subordinates.

Therefore, it is not surprising, that the structure of article 28 is far more complicated and interwoven than those of earlier comparable regulations like article 7 para 3 ICTY Statute, drafted five years before. These different formulations demonstrate also the difficulties of the major legal systems of the world, to define superior responsibility in accordance with their usual theoretical structures for definitions of crimes and in a way satisfying the needs of the principle *nullum crimen sine lege*³⁸.

- 23 This legal situation raises the question, whether article 28 defines with regard to superior responsibility in the same binding way as all other definitions of crimes and modalities of individual criminal responsibility in the Rome Statute, the minimum requirements of what is the existing law, or whether articles 7 para. 3 ICTY and 6 para. 3 ICTR-Statute, describe the laws and customs of war ‘beyond any doubt’, but differently.
- 24 Before I can deal with this question in more detail (below II. 3.), can a legal situation with separate, differently phrased regulations, be characterised as a case of ambiguity? Is the ambiguity rule applicable though the regulations to be compared are not only different from

³⁵ Final Act para. 1.

³⁶ Already in 1981 the Implementation of the Draft Convention of Apartheid provided for the responsibility of a ‘person in authority in a State, group or organization, if he knew or could have reasonably foresee the commission of such crime and remain a member thereof’. See E/CN.4/1426 (1981), articles 21 para. 5 and 20 paras. 10 and 11.

Command responsibility subsequently made it into the Draft Code of Crimes then discussed within the ILC. The 1988 ILC Report relies on the Add. Prot. I and extends its scope to (all) crimes against the peace and security of mankind (see 1988 ILC Report, article 10); The regulation was then included as article 12 in the 1991 ILC Draft Code and remained with minor changes as article 6 in the 1996 ILC Draft Code.

1996 the Preparatory Committee II in its article C already contained a provision that included all relevant parts of article 28. As alternatives though the separation of military and other superiors was not yet formally established. This regulation including its brackets remained unchanged up till the Consolidated Draft. A more detailed discussion and a decision only took place during the Rome Conference. See also 1996 Preparatory Committee I, paras. 202 and 203, Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997 article C, Zutphen Draft article 19 (C) and Consolidated Draft article 25.

³⁷ The Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR have already combined these two aspects, but there the regulation does not apply to the standards of ‘strictly construed’.

³⁸ Triffterer, in: Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen (2002) 437 et seq. See also the new German ‘Völkerstrafgesetzbuch’, 30.06.2002, which uses there different matters of fact to catch all alternatives contained in article 28.

each other and are not defined in one, but in two separate contexts, which, in addition, belong to different codes, though both deal with the same substantive law issue concerning crimes under international law committed in a certain modality? In case this principle is applicable, does not the notion of article 28 deserve priority, not only as lex posterior, but because its application requires proof of more elements and, thus, is more favourable to the suspect? Can the question of ambiguity be answered by interpreting article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute in the sense, that the mere fact that crimes were committed by subordinates in a context where such persons are under the authority and influence of their superiors, implies a failure of the superior to control properly?

This conclusion does not have to be drawn expressly or precisely proven, but can be assumed by circumstantial evidence. It, therefore, can be denied by the defence by presenting relevant evidence. If the ambiguity rule implies also with regard to different regulations and even in cases, when those regulations are contained in different statutes, article 28 prevails; because it is more favourable for suspects, demanding two failures, a lack of control and a lack of interference, while the ad hoc Statutes, at least according to the wording, require only a failure to interfere.

II. Practical Importance

The fact that in the history of international humanitarian and criminal law so much attention and energy concentrated rather early on command and superior responsibility is due to the observations that its practical importance for ensuring respect and obedience to humanitarian law and, thereby, its contribution to the prevention of crimes under international law, was obvious right from the beginning. It, therefore, does not surprise, that already in the fifteenth century a definition of command responsibility was issued which L. C. Green described as ‘almost foreshadowing’ Add. Prot. I 1977. The relevant Ordinance of Charles VII of Orleans provides that:

‘Each Captain or Lieutenant be held responsible for the abuses, ills and offences committed by members of his company and that as soon as he receives any complaint concerning any such misdeed or abuse, he bring the offender to justice ... If he fails to do so or covers up the misdeed or delays taking action, or if, because of his negligence or otherwise, the offender escapes and thus evades punishment, the Captain shall be deemed responsible for the offence as if he had committed it himself and be punished in the same way as the offender would have been’³⁹.

This definition contains mainly objective requirements but at least mentions also on the mental side negligence as one cause for letting the subordinates escape and, thus ‘supporting’ the perpetrator after the crime has been committed.

Ever since then, even though this definition does not mention expressly failures to control, supervise or to prevent, but only refers to ‘bring the offender to justice’, commanders, because of their hierarchically established position appeared with regard to subordinates as the multiplying factor. Such an influence could be either in favor or against committing grave and other breaches of the laws and customs of war, depending on the visible attitude of the superior towards such violations. At the same time, their criminal responsibility appeared as a deterrent effect, not only with regard to their own future behaviour and to other superiors, but also for subordinates; because when realizing that their superiors are called to criminal responsibility, they could not expect or rely on going unpunished for their own commission of or contribution to such crimes. On the opposite, impunity of superiors may promote violations of humanitarian law by subordinates; because when such a lack of legal reactions on serious failures of superiors can be observed, subordinates may expect and count on equally not to be held responsible.

³⁹ Emphasis added; quoted from Green (1997) 1 NavalWarCollegeRev 26 et seq. with further references in footnote 2 there.

- 27 It was this diversity of de facto and mental dependency and the practically unlimited power and influence of superiors over ‘forces’, as experienced, in particular, during the already above mentioned Balkan Wars 1912/1913, which had demonstrated that silent toleration or failures of superiors to educate, prohibit, interfere or to stop criminal activities were decisive factors, resulting in or otherwise supporting violations of international humanitarian law. Nevertheless, their responsibility was, despite of the above mentioned excellent historical example, at the beginning not yet shaped in a way, required by principles like nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege. But as criminal sanctions appeared more and more indispensable as ultima ratio, also for international criminal law, such basic pillars to install criminal responsibility were needed more precisely defined and, therefore stronger founded according to the rule of law.
- 28 The experience, that crimes under international law were mainly committed because of conclusive (= active) behaviour of superiors, for instance, ‘silent toleration’⁴⁰, or, at least, by omitting to supervise properly or to stop the subordinates, was ever since it has been articulated at the beginning of the last century in the context with the Peace Treaty of Versailles, discussed in connection with the protection of international peace and security of mankind. The debacle of international criminal justice after the First World War and in between the two World Wars, therefore, led to increased endeavours to call those to criminal responsibility, who beyond traditional pattern of participation merely by their position appeared equally responsible for unlawful harm. The experience had demonstrated that superiors by an indifferent attitude may cause crimes by simply letting them appear through the hands of others. Thus, by abusing their political, military and/or de facto power, they violated basic rules of the international community as a whole in a way, as if they had themselves committed such crimes. The need to call superiors to responsibility for such passive behaviour had already been promoted and accepted in the 15th century, as mentioned above. It, therefore, surprises that not more of this definition had been acknowledged before it partly appeared 1977 in Add. Prot. I. In particular, its concept and notion ‘as if he had committed it himself’, has since than nowhere else been expressed in any other definition, not even in a comparable way.

1. Nuremberg, Tokyo and ‘follow up proceedings’ (Nachfolgeprozesse)

- 29 The Nazi Regime demonstrated worldwide by the dimension of its crimes, committed to establish and maintain its domination in one way or the other, how much the abuse of political, military and administrative power of superiors up to top State levels could violate legally protected values and, in addition, endanger peace and the world legal order⁴¹. This experience made it rather easy to unite the world opinion for the prosecution of superiors as major war criminals in Nuremberg and Tokyo. Responsibility of commanders and other superiors, therefore, predominated in all criminal proceedings after the Second World War. Though command responsibility was not expressly mentioned in either of the Statutes, it was acknowledged that official positions of perpetrators should be irrelevant and that the fact, the crime had been committed by subordinates, should not free their superiors from criminal responsibility and liability to punishment. The Tribunals prosecuted however commanders on the basis of article 1 Hague Convention IV 1907, which (merely) provides that armed forces must ‘be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates’⁴². There was no definition comparable to the one issued 1439 to which I just have referred to. Convictions in Nuremberg and Tokyo did not need such a reference. They were anyhow rather easy to achieve; because commanders there were mainly charged with active participation in one of the traditional modalities, quite often for ordering or otherwise ‘aiding and abetting’ the execution of violations of international humanitarian law by their subordinates⁴³.

⁴⁰ See also above I. 2.

⁴¹ See for instance Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 20 et seq.

⁴² The IV Hague Convention 1907, note 8, Article I of the annexed rules of warfare and see also ICRC, Commentary on the Add. Prot. I, para 3531.

Only a few cases dealt with responsibility for omissions; and of those none strictly separated between failures of superiors to control their subordinates properly, resulting in the commission of one of the core crimes, and failures to take the necessary measures to prevent what was already on its way to violate legally protected values. But there were careful tendencies towards requiring such a failure as the starting point and also towards a mental element⁴⁴. This at that time still rather unspecified notion of command or superior responsibility demanded, for instance, a failure to take steps ‘as were within their power to prevent the commission of such crimes’, if the superior, in addition, ‘had knowledge that such crimes were being committed’ or, as an alternative to knowledge, the ‘fault in having failed to acquire knowledge’⁴⁵.

While the Nuremberg-Trial against civilians like Krupp did not call on superior responsibility, the IMTFE addressed military and civilian superiors⁴⁶. Subsequent trials conducted by the ‘Besatzungsgerichte’ in Germany and by the US Military Commission of the Far East, though mainly concerned about the responsibility of military commanders, confirmed this tendency to differentiate between military and civilian superiors.

In addition, they emphasized, almost equally for both, two slightly different basic pillars: First, a failure to control subordinates properly. This could be required, because it was generally accepted that those commanders were responsible under international and disciplinary military law and had the duty to control their ‘forces’ properly. But the final step towards the present notion of superior responsibility was not yet done⁴⁷. The failure of a commander to control properly was not established on a subjective, a mental, but on an objective basis, proven by ‘the extensive and widespread atrocities specified’⁴⁸. The Tribunal took, for instance, as prima facie evidence, that, by the mere appearance of such crimes, frequently in different areas and widespread, it was proven that the commander must have omitted to fulfill his duties. Thus, it was assumed that such an omission had, most probably, caused the crimes of the subordinates. For the defence, denying such a causal connection, the burden of proof thus was shifted to the accused⁴⁹.

There was however, already at that time, a slowly but more precisely developing second element, concerning the mens rea. It established responsibility for not reacting properly though there was information to conclude that something should happen to avoid or to prevent the commission of crimes by subordinates. It was called ‘negligent’ behaviour and as such had to be confirmed by the evidence presented at trial⁵⁰. Already this argumentation

⁴³ On General Tomoyuki Yamashita, see Green (1997) 1 Naval War College Rev. 26 et seq., Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur with Reference to Trial of War Criminals IX mn 71 et seq. and 1950 YbILC Vol. II, see also Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Part I (viii), p. 12 (1948).

⁴⁴ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part I, viii 12.

⁴⁵ Quoted from YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur mn 98., (A/CN.4/25).

⁴⁶ Fenrick in the First Edition of this Commentary (1999), article 28, mn 3. See also Röling and Ruter, The Tokyo Judgment (1977) 446 et seq.; The Government Commissioner of the General Tribunal for the French Zone of Occupation in Germany v. Directions of the Roehling Enterprises, XIV Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1949) 1116.

⁴⁷ Yamashita would have needed further reasoning to avoid the criticism of vicarious criminal responsibility, see for further information Herde, Command Responsibility (2001) 325 et seq. and Levine (2005) Global Policy Forum 3 et seq.

⁴⁸ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948), Part I, viii (1948) 43.

⁴⁹ Trial of S.S. Brigadeführer Kurt Meyer (The Abbaye Ardenne Case), UNWCC, XXII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Part IV, see under headline 9. Summing up of the Judge advocate, p. 108 (1948).

⁵⁰ In this regard the judge advocate in the Belsen Trial, pointed out that it did not matter ‘whether he [Kramer] acted wilfully or merely with culpable neglect: the question was whether the Prosecution had proved that Kramer did not carry out his duties as far as he was able to do so and that he had caused at any rate physical suffering ...’ See Trial of Josef Kramer and 44 others (The Belsen trial), UNWCC, X Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Vol. II (1947) Part XI, see under headline K. The summing up of the Judge advocate, p. 120.

shows that responsibility exclusively based on ‘strict liability’ was rejected⁵¹. This requirement, through which the Tribunal refused ‘strict liability’, demands an element of personal guilt on the side of the commander. He could only be held responsible if he knew or should have known about the commission of crimes by his subordinates and, nevertheless, did not interfere with the criminal appearances of a certain behaviour of his subordinates which was on the way to be realized or already producing criminal harm⁵².

- 33 It in this context, up and on a few additional arguments were presented in order to more and more shape superior responsibility as a separate and independent modality of individual criminal responsibility: in the case of Yamashita, for instance, the perpetrator had neither committed nor directed acts that were subject of the judgment. The US Supreme Court based its decision on the sentence: ‘[t]he gist of the charge was that he had committed an unlawful breach of his duty as an army commander to control the operations of the members of his command by “permitting them to commit” the extensive and widespread atrocities specified’⁵³. Describing the relevant behaviour as ‘permitting’, the Supreme Court presupposes a causal link between the passivity of Yamashita and the crimes committed by his subordinates, though, this conclusion was not expressly mentioned anywhere. However, such an interpretation may well be the reason, why the defence argued that Yamashita did not commit a specific violation of a particular duty nor any specific act or omission which could be interpreted as ‘permitting’ the crimes of the troops⁵⁴. The defence, thus, denied any conclusive and express behaviour and thereby not only a causal link, but also any mental attitude of Yamashita with regard to the crimes committed by his subordinates.
- 34 The mental side was, however, emphasized by the prosecution, who blamed Yamashita ‘that he did not make an adequate effort to find out. It was his duty to know what was being done by his troops under his orders’⁵⁵. It was this substitution of knowledge or awareness by the failure to access or collect information to conclude that crimes were committed, which according to the prosecution should be sufficient for personal guilt. But again, the US Supreme Court refers to a causal connection when it argues ‘for his failure to take such measures when violations result’⁵⁶ and thus using once more an objective standard.
- 35 Also in the Abbaye Ardenne Case (= Kurt Meyer) the shifting of the burden of proof was confirmed. The prosecution had already charged the evidence that ‘the accused ordered the commission of war crimes, or verbally or tacitly acquiesced in its commission, or knowingly failed to prevent its commission’⁵⁷. In addition, the court emphasized the intentional failure to control properly. It mentions ‘willfully failed in his duty’ and thus practically gives a hint with regard to the first alternative of article 28 Rome Statute, which implies an intentional failure to control; because according to article 30 non-intentional behaviour is only sufficient when mentioned expressly, as later on in article 28 in the context with the failure to take the necessary measures by the wording ‘knew or should have known’⁵⁸.
- 36 The ‘Hostages Case’ equally refers to such an alternative by requiring that the commander ‘knew or ought to have known about’ the criminal behaviour of his subordinates. The Tribunal further emphasized that commanders must in such a situation ‘be held responsible for the acts of his subordinate—commanders in carrying out his orders’⁵⁹.

⁵¹ See for instance Badar (2005) 5 CLRev 203, 213 et seq. and Clark (2001) 12 CLRev 291, 301 et seq. on the issue of strict liability compared with dolus eventualis.

⁵² See for instance Clark (2001) 12 CLRev 205 et seq.

⁵³ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part IV, v 43.

⁵⁴ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part III, under the headline 12. The Verdict and Sentence 34 et seq.

⁵⁵ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part III, under the headline: 11. The closing address for the Prosecution 30.

⁵⁶ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part IV 43 and 86 et seq.

⁵⁷ The Abbaye Ardenne Case, note 49.

⁵⁸ The Abbaye Ardenne Case, note 49.

⁵⁹ Trial of Wilhelm List et al. (Hostages Trial) UNWCC, VII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Part VI, under the headline 2. The extent of the Responsibility of commanding Generals (1949) 89.

The German High Command Tribunal refuses also expressly strict liability by finding that criminal responsibility can ‘not automatically attach to him for all acts of his subordinates. There must be an unlawful act on his part or a failure to supervise his subordinates constituting criminal negligence on his part’. The Tribunal, thus, diminishes the threshold of intent and knowledge, by demanding merely that the mental side must be ‘amounting to a wanton, immoral disregard of the action of his subordinates amounting to acquiescence’⁶⁰.

At the Trial of Takashi Sakai, the Tribunal thought ‘it was inconceivable that he [the commander] should not have been aware of the acts of atrocity committed by his subordinates ...’⁶¹. This argument, however, is not convincing. It comes close to charging the accused with ‘strict liability’; because it assumes the mental element without proving it. What is conceivable for the judges may nevertheless not have come to the mind of the accused. The Court could and should have argued, for instance, that it has not been convinced by the argument of the defence that the superior has not been aware of what the subordinates committed; because such a neglecting of obvious evidence appears inconceivable and, therefore, the Court believes, that the accused has in fact been aware⁶². In the later trial of Kurt Student this argumentation was expressed by the statement that ‘the repeated occurrence of offences by troops under one command [is] ... prima facie evidence of responsibility of the commander for those offences’. But this wording still does not point out clearly enough the differentiation between what everybody would and should have known and why the Court does believe that the defendant has had the same awareness as everybody would have had in the same situation, even though the perpetrator denies any such awareness⁶³.

Looking at this small survey on post war decisions presented here, the diversity in describing elements required for an inherent responsibility of commanders surprises⁶⁴. In addition, though many aspects expressed in the regulation of 1439 – except ‘as if he had committed it himself’ – show up in the later discussion, no element of command responsibility was finally sufficiently clear formulated and, consequently, no ‘strictly construed’ definitions became available. It obviously needed more theoretical work and practical experience to come to a satisfying agreement.

2. Continuing to focus primarily on commanders increased the acknowledgement of an inherent superior responsibility, but did not crystallise elements ‘strictly construed’

The relevant comprehensive jurisprudence in the context with the crimes committed during the Second World War reminds us on a puzzle with tiny little mosaic pieces: when you see them isolated, you know they ought to be filled into ‘the picture’ of requirements for superior responsibility, though together with others not yet known. It, therefore, is not so easy to deposit them in the right place; because they are not only shaped very individually, but are also of different size, colour and importance for a ‘strictly construed’ definition of an independent modality for individual criminal responsibility of superiors under international law, which characterizes all its specificities in comparison with the traditional modes of participation.

The relevant but rather small development on the national level after the ‘Nuremberg-era’ did not contribute much to solve the task, to define and structure the minimum requirements for command responsibility as an additional mode of criminal liability beyond traditional ⁶⁰ YbILC 1950, Vol. II, Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind – Report by J. Spiropoulos, Special Rapporteur mn 97., (A/CN.4/25) and Trial of Wilhelm von Leeb et al. (The German High Command Trial), UNWCC, XII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) 76 et seq.

⁶¹ Trial of Takashi Sakai (Nanking), UNWCC, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, under the headline 4. The accused’s guilt as to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity (1948) 7.

⁶² Triffterer, Österreichisches Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) 94 et seq.

⁶³ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part VI, v 85 (brackets added).

⁶⁴ See also Weigend (2004) 116 ZStW 999, 1001.

boundaries. The main common approach was to also or even mainly address commanders when crimes were committed by their ‘forces’. Therefore it was not surprising that, whenever spectacular war crimes or crimes against humanity were committed after Nuremberg, the public opinion demanded individual criminal responsibility of those commanders, who were ‘in charge’ of the persons, suspected for committing such crimes and, therefore, had to have the responsibility for their behaviour.

But they were primarily accused of direct participation in the execution of such crimes, together with ordering or at least ‘permitting the commission’ in the sense of ‘tolerating them’ by not fulfilling their duty to supervise and guarantee that their subordinates obey to the law. Thus all these alternatives were subsumed under one of the traditional modalities of supporting crimes and therefore, required intentional acts or omissions.

- 40 This rather neutral attitude towards a missing definition became, for instance, obvious in the context with the massacre in My Lai, Vietnam, 1968. The commanding Lieutenant was charged with killing the victims as principal perpetrator. He claimed as a defence to have acted on superior orders⁶⁵. His superior also was charged with a traditional mode, namely to have ordered the massacre. He argued, to have ‘only subsequently learned of the outrage’ but confessed that he ‘decided to hush it up instead of taking steps to report its perpetration or punish those responsible’⁶⁶.

On this occasion the presiding judge gave guidelines to the jury, emphasizing that even after ‘issuing an order a commander must remain alert and make timely adjustments as required by a changing situation’. The judge demanded further ‘actual knowledge plus a wrongful failure to act’, and continues, ‘[t]hus mere presence at [the] scene will not suffice. That is, the commander–subordinate relationship alone will not allow an inference of knowledge’⁶⁷.

Green points out in this context: ‘It might even be felt that lack of knowledge in such circumstances amounts to criminal indifference equivalent to a failure to exercise proper command’. In general, the superior ‘has actual knowledge, or should have knowledge, through reports received by him or through other means’.

- 41 The four elements Green mentions from the information of the presiding judge to the jury are an attempt to structure the charge, however by giving more consideration to the facts than to the legal approaches. He requires as the first element, ‘[t]hat [the] deaths resulted from the omission of the accused in failing to exercise control’, but ‘after having gained knowledge that his subordinate were killing noncombatants’. In addition, ‘this omission must constitute culpable negligence and an unknown number of victims must have been killed by subordinates under his control’⁶⁸.

Green further reports in the context with the My Lai massacre of a Major General who has been held responsible, though he ‘may not have deliberately allowed an inadequate investigation to occur, but he let it happen, and he had ample resources to prevent it from happening’⁶⁹. Green refers in this context also to the demand that ‘the military commander who acts to prevent future war crimes ... is criminally liable only if he did not act promptly enough when he learned of subordinates’ crimes’⁷⁰.

- 42 The case of Eichmann is sometimes reported in this context. But Eichmann was a superior giving orders to organize the transportation of Jews to the concentration camps and thus was one of the principles. He claimed not to have known what happened there to the detainees but the circumstantial evidence obviously appeared to be beyond reasonable doubt sufficient to sentence him⁷¹.

⁶⁵ Green (1997) 1 NavalWarColleg Rev 26 et seq. with further references in footnote 44.

⁶⁶ Id., with further references in footnote 46.

⁶⁷ Id., with further references in footnote 45.

⁶⁸ For all these quotations see Green (1995) 5 TransnatL&ContempProb 320, 354 with other references in footnotes 110 et seq.

⁶⁹ Ibid. 355 with further references in fn. 114.

⁷⁰ Ibid. 356 with further references in fn. 116.

⁷¹ Ibid. 356 with further references in footnotes 119 and 120.

The Kafr Qassem ‘incident’ also is an example for traditional responsibility of commanders, but not for a new independent modality. The Court states, for instance, that ‘[t]here is no doubt that the death of all victims who fell at Kafr Qassem was the probable result of M’s order, even though as regards some of them, and perhaps most of them, there was no intention of murder in the sense of [the Criminal Code]. For these reasons we must uphold the conviction for murder’⁷². 43

Besides emphasizing the recklessness of the order, the Kahan Report on the massacre in the refugee camps Sabra and Shatila in Lebanon points out ‘that the Israeli military authorities were aware of the killings that were taking place, but took no step to order the Israeli troops to stop the massacre, nor was any action taken by the Minister of Defence to this end’. The requirement of these two elements comes closer to the regulations of an inherent responsibility for commanders. This assessment is confirmed by the further statement: Finally, ‘no attempt was made to seek out or punish any of those responsible for what happened’⁷³.

Though most of the reported regulations, statements and decisions refer to one or more singular aspects which later have been defined in articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I 1977, (and in article 28 Rome Statute) none of them offers not even an approximately comprehensive scope and notion of a consistent definition for command responsibility. However, this small outline (under 2.) confirms in a similar manner as those presented before (under 1. and I. 3.), how strong the theoretical and the practical development, in particular after the Second World War, concentrated to hold superiors more and more responsible, in particular for ordering, committing or participating in the commission of one of the classical Nuremberg Crimes. But on these occasions it quite often became equally obvious, that the cases for the indictments did not catch the complete spectrum of responsibility of superiors. The investigators obviously could get hold of situations, in which superiors merely silently tolerate or ‘letting such crimes just happen’ through their subordinates. Command responsibility as an independent, additional responsibility therefore becomes more and more important, in particular, when none of the traditional modalities of participation could be proven by sufficient evidence. 44

Starting to develop its scope and notion out of this case to case experience, Add. Prot. I finally represents the main results of this development. Articles 86 and 87 define an accepted number of elements in order to have them ‘strictly construed’. They contain a political compromise which did not clearly differentiate command responsibility from traditional modalities of participation, in which superiors are involved together with their subordinates. This task was therefore left, with all due respect to the value of Add. Prot. I, to future developments by international Tribunals and their jurisprudence.

3. Command responsibility, dominating the international and the transitional justice regimes up to the top of hierarchically based authorities, requiring more legal guaranties

Keeping this background in mind, it does not surprise, that since 1977, more than fifteen years not much has been changed or moved in one or the other direction: There were actually no new cases brought before the judiciary to promote solutions for the open questions. It therefore was practically the result of a delayed development, when the Statutes for the ICTY and the ICTR, adopted under time pressure in 1993 and 1994, included some, though not all, of the formulations contained in articles 86 and 87 of Add. Prot. I, as a definition of an additional responsibility for superiors. Concept and notion appeared broadly accepted and quickly available, because provisions were needed, according to which higher ranking superiors could be held responsible even beyond the limits of traditional ordering or 45

⁷² Quoted according to ibid. 360 with further references in fn. 130.

⁷³ Ibid. 363 et seq. with further references in fn. 137.

other participation, and which by its acceptance through the Security Council received an additional worldwide approval.

The situation on the territory of Former Yugoslavia had demonstrated since 1991, what everybody knew since the Balkan Wars 1912/13 and the World Wars, namely that commanders as well as other superiors play the most important role for ongoing atrocities and for stopping them immediately. They, therefore, should be targeted with regard to end their impunity and thus to contribute to the prevention of crimes committed by their subordinates.

- 46 The relevant provisions in articles 7 para. 3 and 6 para. 3 ICTY and ICTR Statutes try to achieve this aim, together with paragraphs 1 and 2, defining all traditional modalities. They were at that time the only binding international definitions applicable in a ‘direct enforcement model’.

Even after article 28 Rome Statute had defined in 1998 a more comprehensive regulation for all superiors who could by their political, military, legal, administrative and de facto power contribute in various ways to one of the core crimes, those new regulations were not yet available, because the Rome Statute came into force only on 1. July 2002 and even then it took more than 3 years before the first cases, from which till now only one is in the trial phase, were pending at the ICC. Therefore the ad hoc Statutes and the jurisprudence of the Tribunals dominated the situation for more than one decade.

In addition, the Tribunals had clearly confirmed again and demonstrated the practical importance of an institution like command responsibility for those persons, not on the spot but pulling the strings from behind and thus taking responsibility for what was beyond the traditional modalities of participation. I recall only the indictments against Milosević, Mladić and Karadžić as well as the relevant final jurisprudence of the ICTY and, after the first case of Akayesu was pending, also before the ICTR. These decisions are listed above together with the literature and other jurisprudence.

- 47 But it was not only the shortness of the formulations in these Statutes which make them preferable in comparison with article 28 Rome Statute, which is much more extensive. States in transition need worldwide accepted regulations and jurisprudence when looking for an international legal basis upon which to create Special Courts or Commissions to deal with past atrocities (post-conflict justice). They, therefore, rather prefer and copy articles 7 or 6 of the ad hoc Statutes instead of article 28 Rome Statute.

This preference was further backed by the fact, that the decisions of the Security Council to accept these regulations represented the legal opinion of all members of the UN, while the Rome Statute is up till now only in force for 105 States.

- 48 It is self evidence, that relevant decisions of the ad hoc Tribunals will play an important role for the cases pending and coming up to the ICC. According to article 21 para. 2 Rome Statute the previous decisions of the Court and even more those of other courts or the Tribunals are not binding. But they will play an important role for the interpretation and application of the Rome Statute. It, therefore, is necessary, shortly to deal with the scope and notion of the relevant provisions in the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals that cover command responsibility.

- 49 When for the first time in history two (‘really’) international ad hoc Tribunals were established to prosecute genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity, it became quite obvious that the Security Council, when referring to the laws and customs of war, used, partly verbally, the concept and notion of articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I to define criminal responsibility of superiors in articles 7 para. 3 ICTY and 6 para. 3 ICTR Statute⁷⁴. The Secretary-General in his Report of 23 May 1993 to the Security Council expresses the opinion, that ‘the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international Tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law, which are beyond any doubt part of customary law⁷⁵.’

⁷⁴ For further information see Res. 808 (1993) and Res. 955 (1994) of the SC.

⁷⁵ Rep. of the Secretary General pursuant to para. 2 of SC Res. 808 (1993), para. 34.

He further emphasizes that ‘virtually all of the written comments received ... draw upon the precedents following the Second World War’, and confirm ‘the irrelevance of official capacities’⁷⁶. Therefore, not only the ‘unlawful order to commit a crime’ should trigger superior responsibility, but also a ‘failure to prevent a crime or to deter the unlawful behaviour of the subordinates. This imputed responsibility or criminal negligence is engaged if the person in superior authority knew or had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit or had committed crimes and yet failed to take the necessary and reasonable steps to prevent or repress the commission of such crimes or to punish those who had committed them’⁷⁷.

According to the interpretation suggested above (under I. 3.) two failures are listed in the just mentioned quotations, namely ‘to prevent a crime or to deter ...’ on the one side, and ‘failure to take ... steps to prevent or repress’ on the other side. These two omissions should be separated, at least in theory⁷⁸ though they may be interwoven in praxis. This dependency is needed to establish personal guilt, the indispensable element for all modes of criminal responsibility. Because only when a ‘failure to prevent a crime or to deter the unlawful behaviour’ results in an action, where ‘subordinates were about to commit or had committed crimes’, liability can be triggered. It is further based on the fact that the superior, though he knew or had reasons to know about it, ‘yet failed to take the necessary and reasonable steps to prevent or repress the commission’, which he had not prevented and thus caused, for instance by not ensuring that his subordinates were sufficiently informed and motivated to obey the law. This passive behaviour of the superior appears as a whole to be of sufficient gravity to trigger his responsibility for the crime committed by the subordinates⁷⁹.

However, it has to be admitted that article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute, as well as 6 para. 3 ICTR Statute, do not express this underlying structure by requiring a link between the failure to exercise control properly and the crimes of the subordinates. Both regulations, therefore, may be interpreted, at first sight, in a way, that the failure to take the necessary and reasonable measures ... or to punish’, may by itself trigger superior responsibility even if the superior has not caused these criminal actions of his subordinates.

To investigate whether such an interpretation is admissible and acceptable under the aspect, that the Secretary-General intended to define ‘laws which are beyond any doubt part of customary law’, is the purpose of the following considerations. They therefore have to deal, for instance, with the issue, whether article 28 Rome Statute also defines what is accepted ‘beyond any doubt’, even though its requirements establish a much higher threshold for superior responsibility which has to prevail. This priority is justified because article 28 is more favourable to the accused than article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute, at least when both regulations express what is acknowledged in international customary law and only defined in Add. Prot. I as well in the ad hoc Statutes and the Rome Statute.

For answering this question and with regard to the general notion of command responsibility in its historical context it has to be kept in mind that the competence of the ICTY and of the ICTR is created by the Security Council. But the law ‘to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, ... in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute’, article 1, is statutory and customary international law, as far as such regulations are generally accepted and acknowledged by the international community as a whole⁸⁰, as referred to above. It is not created by the Security Council because this organ is not the legislative body of the UN. The Security Council merely accepted what has been proposed by the Secretary-General as the already existing law and accepted his formulation.

⁷⁶ Ibid. para. 55.

⁷⁷ Ibid.

⁷⁸ Triffterer, in: Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen (2002) 437, 448 et seq.

⁷⁹ Id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 912 et seq. and id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 228 et seq.

⁸⁰ Rep. of the Secretary General pursuant to para. 2 of SC Res. 808 (1993), para. 32.

Created has the Security Council only the ad hoc Tribunals and their competence with those regulations to guarantee the getting into operation and the functioning of the Tribunals.

- 53 While article 2 ICTY Statute establishes the right and duty of the Tribunal ‘to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed grave breaches’, article 3 defines liability for all persons, violating the laws or customs of war. Genocide, article 4, mentions expressly for these crimes besides committing, conspiracy, complicity as well as direct and public incitement, while article 5 (as 3) does not refer to any mode of participation for crimes against humanity. All these definitions describe either the direct commission or presuppose personal activities, which have at least material contact with or some psychological influence on the commission of the crime, a context, which characterizes participation and complicity in most of the legal systems of the world.
- 54 The enumeration of the crimes in articles 2 to 5 ICTY Statutes puts the main emphasize on describing material elements. A general statement concerning the mental element is missing. This justifies according to general principles of law recognized by all major legal systems the conclusion that, as far as nothing else is otherwise provided in the Statute, these crimes and all their appearances expressly mentioned in the Statutes have to be committed intentionally. Such an interpretation is confirmed by some definitions, using expressly words like ‘wilful’ or ‘wanton’, which exclude negligent behaviour, or tacitly by formulations like ‘compelling’ or ‘plunder’.
- With regard to genocide the requirement of an intentional act becomes evident by the additionally required special mental element, namely the ‘intent to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such’. Such an intent presupposes that the act as such needs to be committed intentionally; because who kills negligently, cannot intent to destroy a protected group just by his negligent behaviour. Negligent behaviour, therefore, is in principle excluded as basis for international criminal responsibility under these Statutes, equally for committing and for participation, unless ‘otherwise provided’. This principle is clearly expressed also in article 30 Rome Statute.
- 55 With regard to omissions, the situation is similar, though in the outcome different. Omissions are not mentioned either expressly in articles 2–5 ICTY Statute. But the consequences described there, like ‘causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health’, respectively, ‘seriously bodily or mental harm’ can be equally – without difference to the victims – achieved by an act or by an omission; for instance, by denying access to food or information about further cruel treatment by the guards or an execution without any proceeding according to the rule of law.
- 56 The requirement of a legal duty for holding somebody responsible for a failure to act, is acknowledged expressly already in article 86 para. 1 Add. Prot. I. Such an element serves the purpose to establish and to guarantee equality of crimes committed by active or passive behaviour. They have to be comparable not only with regard to the consequences they may trigger. But since an active violation of the law needs a decision to step out of passivity, while an omission is the continuance of an already existing status quo, not all passivity is comparable with an aimed action. To compensate this deficit, a violation of a pre-established legal duty is required, to equalize an omission with active behaviour.
- 57 Article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute describes, partly repeating or including modalities already mentioned in articles 2–5, all relevant appearances of committing crimes or participating in crimes as accomplices. For all of them the above statements with regard to intent and omission are applicable, as far as, for instance, like with regard to ordering or planning, a commission by omission does not appear per se impossible, because the definition describes an actus reus and thus, exclude omissions.
- 58 Article 7 para. 2 ICTY Statute only clarifies, that ‘the official position of any accused person ... shall not relieve such a person of criminal responsibility ...’. This means, all modalities listed in the definitions of the crimes or in article 7 para. 1, are equally applicable on persons with any ‘official position’, thus including superiors as well on the military as on the administrative level.

Article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute presupposes and is based on these principles, which provide responsibility for different modalities, when committed intentionally and individually, whether by an act or an omission and independent of the official position. None of these regulations, however, is recalled by article 7 para. 3. It, on the opposite, deviates partly from these principles and establishes an additional (new) criminal responsibility for superiors⁸¹, though under certain conditions, which deviate from what is the basis for a general criminal responsibility otherwise provided with regard to all perpetrators in these Statutes. For instance, article 7 para. 1 establishes that ‘a person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime’. Individual criminal responsibility means to be personally responsible for his own behaviour and the caused harm. It does not mean responsibility for behaviour of others, unless someone supports the principle perpetrator through, for instance, ‘otherwise aiding or abetting’ in the commission of the crime⁸².

According to these basic rules, the mere fact that any of the crimes referred to in articles 2–5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate, does, in principle, ‘relieve his superior of criminal responsibility’. This is true, however, only as long as he does not himself fulfil the requirements of article 7 para. 1 by participating in one of the modalities provided for in this regulation or in articles 2–5 ICTY Statute.

In addition, in its second half article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute expresses a further exception: Responsibility of a superior for crimes of other persons, his subordinates, if the superior ‘knew or had reason to know’ about their criminal activities and, nevertheless, ‘failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures’ to effectively interfere. Article 7 para. 3, thereby, establishes an additional individual criminal responsibility beyond the traditional modalities mentioned in articles 7 para. 1 or 2–5 ICTY Statute.

Such an extension, transgressing traditional boundaries, creates practically a ‘new crime’ in the sense of an additional modality of the crime committed by the subordinate⁸³. It, therefore, needs to meet the requirements of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, as established by customary international law and expressed in article 22 Rome Statute. The ICTY, therefore, had and has to face the question whether this additional modality of criminal responsibility is ‘strictly construed’ in the sense of article 22 Rome Statute. Does article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute mirror the law ‘beyond any doubt’ – as it was defined in 1993? Or is this law expressed in 1998, when 146 States of the world community drafted and with a great majority adopted article 28 Rome Statute, the correct definition of what is generally acknowledged?

The wording of article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute is fairly clear, though at the end of the day, finally, it may leave room for doubt. In case it does, the general rule may become applicable, that in case of ambiguity an interpretation in favour of the accused has to prevail, article 22 para. 2 Rome Statute.

The basic law in both regulations, articles 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute and 28 Rome Statute, is beyond doubt: no responsibility of superiors for crimes of their subordinates in principle, but exceptionally yes, if ‘he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof’, article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute. The difference constitutes an additional requirement, expressly formulated in article 28 Rome Statute, namely an additional failure to control resulting in criminal activities of subordinates, which is not mentioned in article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute, but perhaps needs to be interpreted into this regulation, in case it is ambiguous.

⁸¹ Triffterer, in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 902 et seq. and id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 230 et seq.

⁸² Instead of ‘and’ in the original text, there must be ‘or’, see for further Ambos, Article 25, mn 17 et seq.

⁸³ See Triffterer, in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 215 et seq.

- 63 One condition for accepting such an extension of individual criminal responsibility is in both regulations clearly formulated: ‘knew or had reason to know’ about a concrete criminal behaviour of his subordinates. This means, that the superior must not intent to support, by what act or omission ever, such behaviour of his subordinates. Because if this is the case, one of the traditional modalities according to article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute combined with those expressly mentioned in articles 2–5 ICTY Statute would be applicable. ‘Knew’ or ‘reason to know’, therefore, does not mean an intent to participate by an omission. It must be less, which it is, when interpreted as describing only the intellectual part of ‘intent and knowledge’, namely awareness as defined in article 30 Rome Statute⁸⁴, of a criminal situation characterised by the behaviour of his subordinates.
- 64 The failure to take the necessary measures, must as such, as far as concerning the passivity of the superior, be intended. But it is sufficient that the superior did not intend more than just doing nothing, though he should and could have been motivated by the triggering situation to become active. Article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute specifies the mental approach of the superior to the criminal behaviour of the subordinate in a way, which is different from the mental element needed with regard to all other modes of individual criminal responsibility for perpetrators and accomplices as described in article 25 para. 3 Rome Statute⁸⁵.
- While in so far ‘intent and knowledge’ is required, here obviously awareness of the situation without an emotional, a voluntative decision or a negligent approach to the situation and its demands is sufficient. This means, the superior knew but – for whatever reasons – did not react to get an emotional approach, or had reason to know, but was not aware of the situation requiring ‘to take the necessary and available measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof’. His state of mind, ‘knew’ or ‘reason to know’, means, though he ‘knew’ or though he had ‘reason to know’, he did not conclude, or did not have the idea, that he could and should take action. The situation was not motivating him to prevent or interfere with the criminal behaviour of his subordinates. Whatever this lack of a mental decision to take action in the necessary and relevant direction means, it is sufficient that the superior draws no conclusion in this direction. He is ‘not open’ for the situation, for being addressed by the situation which triggers his duty to react, and therefore he fails to take the required measures.
- 65 Is this structure comparable with the one underlying ‘direct and public incitement’ in article 4 ICTY Statute? Comparable is that with regard to incitement, the mere act, and with regard to command responsibility, the mere failure to act triggers criminal responsibility. But there is a difference, because in the second case it must be established that the superior had the power, which means, was in fact capable to take the required measures, had he ‘correctly’ reacted on what he ‘knew’ or ‘had reason to know’. Incitement, on the opposite, requires only to address persons in a certain way at all, independent of whether the act has persuaded the addressee, while failures to take necessary measures implies that such actions would have caused a result, if not omitted, namely to prevent or repress the criminal activities of the subordinates.
- 66 Though not mentioned expressly in the definitions of crimes or in the general principles, there are such further elements tacitly included by the structure of the definitions of crimes or of the responsibility according to article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute. Shall the superior really be responsible for the crime, which the subordinate was about to commit, though the subordinate did not yet reach the state of an attempt, a possibility not excluded in article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute, though in article 28 Rome Statute? Such a situation may occur, if, for instance, a third person stops the criminal attempt of the subordinate by taking the necessary measures, shortly after the superior failed to do so, or if the subordinate gave up his plan to complete the crime or abandons his activities before he reached the status of a punishable attempt.

⁸⁴ See for more details id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 909 et seq.

⁸⁵ See for further information id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 215 et seq.

The situation requiring counter-actions of the superior is described in article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute as the subordinate ‘was about to commit such acts or had done so’, a formulation, corresponding in its first part, ‘about to commit’ with those in article 28 Rome Statute. There it does not mean ‘only’, but includes an attempt which is defined differently to article 25 para. 3 (f) Rome Statute⁸⁶. 67

For the answer it has to be taken into consideration that two different formulations in the same law cannot have the same meaning, because otherwise no two divergent expressions would have been chosen. ‘About to commit’, therefore, does describe first a behaviour very close to the commission, for instance one second before a criminal attempt occurs, but it includes also an attempt, by which, in the ordinary course of events, a crime is about to be completed.

Such an interpretation is convincing independent of whether the attempt is incomplete or finalized, as long as the crime is not yet completed. In all these intermediate, different situations, the superior has ‘to prevent such acts’. This means, he has to prevent further activities of his subordinates, which either are already an attempt or could lead to an attempt, or which could bring an attempted crime to completion. This means, in other words, the superior has to stop all activities by which the subordinates were ‘about to commit’ relevant crimes. Because otherwise his failure to stop the subordinates would cause either the continuance of their ‘criminal’ behaviour and, thereby, further activities leading to an attempt, or cause an already existing criminal attempt to develop towards a completed crime. Is this the requirement of causality to be proven by the Prosecutor before criminal responsibility of superiors can be established? The answer is yes, because only when it can be established that the superior was capable to take the necessary measures and thus could have prevented, or repressed the crime or initiated criminal investigation, he can be blamed for the failure to do so and, thus, for the failure to achieve such an effect, which means for not causing it.

The alternative ‘or had done so’ refers to ‘had committed’ and thus comprehends a final or interrupted attempt and a completed crime. In both cases the criminal activities of the subordinate have already come to an end and the superior, therefore, can no longer by his failure to take action ‘support’ or just ‘let happen’ the criminal activities of the subordinates in a way, which establishes a causal connection between his failure and the perpetration of the crime. This is the reason why the superior in such cases has to take (mere) measures ‘to punish the perpetrator thereof’. 68

While, with regard to the first alternative, ‘to prevent’, what was about to be committed, an action to control or an order to stop may be sufficient to reach impunity of the superior, the second situation, ‘or had done so’, describes a rather static situation which cannot be changed anymore. It, therefore, only has to be evaluated by the superior with regard to its criminal importance in order to trigger preventive influence on future behaviour of the same or other subordinates. 69

There is for both alternatives no word on causality in the ad hoc Statute. But this element is inherent to all omissions, because the duty to prevent presupposes and means the power to prevent, since nobody can be obliged by law to do what is for him or her ultra vires. The superior therefore must have prevented or at least taken measures which appear to be in principle adequate to achieve such a result⁸⁷. Who fails to take the necessary measures to prevent or to punish is responsible for what occurs in a situation, in which it was his duty to hinder further developments towards the commission of the crime or the impunity of the perpetrator. This hypothetical causality has to be established; because (a) it must have been not ultra vires, what was demanded, and (b) the necessity is only proven, when the omission causes what would have been avoided by the omitted act, in case it would have been executed. 70

⁸⁶ Also to the following considerations id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 911 et seq. and id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 217 et seq.

⁸⁷ To these considerations above and below see id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 238 et seq. and id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 917 et seq.

71 Even if these considerations are accepted it remains with regard to article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute still open, whether the superior, in addition, must have caused the departing situation, the criminal behaviour of his subordinates. Triggers merely his former omission to control, educate and inform his subordinates ‘properly’ and its result, illegal activities of his subordinates, the duty of the superior to react, when his subordinates ‘commit or are about to commit crimes’? At first sight, the answer is no. In article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute no such requirement is mentioned. But is an interpretation of the mere wording sufficient? No, because a teleological interpretation, taking into consideration the historical background and the ratio legis of this regulation may close a lacuna, and thus come to a different result.

It can, for instance, be argued that article 7 para. 1 ICTY Statute extends the responsibility for committing crimes by including certain behaviour, which aids or abets the execution as an additional modality. Such an extension broadening the scope and notion of the crimes, needed to be ‘strictly construed’; because otherwise it would violate the principle nullum crimen sine lege. In addition, it is self evidence, that since all crimes listed within the above mentioned Statute can be committed only on the mental side intentionally, also participation as being a specific modality of such a crime, equally requires such a mental element.

72 Article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute contains also such an extension of the responsibility for crimes, but one applicable exclusively for superiors. This means, the superior is responsible, as ‘if he had committed it (the crime) himself’, a formulation, already quoted in mn 25. It implies, in addition, that command responsibility demands as a specific modality of participation, in principle, also an intentional behaviour, unless (and as far) as not otherwise provided.

73 Article 7 para. 3 ICTY Statute is based on articles 86 and 87 Add. Prot. I. Though not expressly referring to these regulations, some of them are quoted more or less verbally. For instance, a superior should be relieved from responsibility, except when ‘he knew or had reason to know’ about the criminal behaviour of his subordinate and nevertheless failed to react. But is such a ‘low’ mental element really sufficient, though for all other modalities a much higher mental threshold closer to the harm, namely an intentional behaviour, mentally ‘dealing’ with and ‘considering’ the harm, whether caused by a failure or an actus reus, is required?

Is this special ‘lower’ mental element, required for command responsibility, comparable with negligence? Is it the only one and as such sufficient, while all other modalities for the commission of crimes demand a stronger mental ‘affiliation’ of the mind of the perpetrator to the material elements?

74 Already this aspect makes it desirable and perhaps indispensable, in the interest of equality before the law, to consider at least an equally high threshold for command responsibility, which would otherwise establish a more remote relation to the harm than most of the other modalities for participation.

In addition, a high threshold on the mental side could compensate the fact that superiors are without exception responsible and liable for punishment beyond the traditional modalities, which means, even for such omissions, which do not fulfil the objective or mental requirements for a punishable participation.

This implies that the requirement of ‘strictly construed’ elements needs to be independently established, in particular, when command responsibility reaches the top level of the hierarchy, perhaps located far away from the actual events.

75 All these aspects have led already to a more precise definition in article 28 Rome Statute. It, therefore, seems to be necessary and justified to include the additional element demanded there, namely an ‘intentional failure to control properly’ resulting in criminal activities of their subordinates, in favour of the superior via interpretation also in articles 7 para. 3 ICTY and 6 para. 3 ICTR Statute.

III. Guidelines for investigation and prosecuting superior responsibility

The considerations above have pointed out some aspects which may serve as guidelines 76 when dealing with situations, in which the commission of crimes, falling within the jurisdiction of the Court, is shaped by a hierarchically structured superior/subordinates relationship⁸⁸. In order to locate whether such a relationship is involved, it is recommendable to investigate first, whether a failure of the superior to exercise control properly over his subordinates can be established.

For the concept and notion of such a failure, a list of elements has been published in the 77 First Edition, which still may be helpful to find out, what the commander should have done to fulfil his duties. He must, in particular,

- ensure his forces are adequately trained in international humanitarian law,
- ensure that due regard is paid to international humanitarian law in operational decision making,
- ensure that an effective reporting system is established so that he or she is informed of incidents when violations of international humanitarian law might have occurred,
- monitor the reporting system to ensure it is effective, and
- take corrective action when he or she becomes aware that violations are about to occur or have occurred⁸⁹.

A similar list of relevant aspects is available for finding out, whether the superior ‘knew’ or 78 ‘should have known’ about the criminal activities of his subordinates. In this context it was pointed out by W. Fenrick that ‘actual knowledge may be established by direct or circumstantial means’. But with regard to ‘determining whether or not the commander did have the requisite knowledge’ a variety of indicia may be, in addition, helpful, including

- the number of illegal acts,
- the type of illegal acts,
- the scope of illegal acts,
- the time during which the illegal acts occurred,
- the number and type of troops involved,
- the logistics involved, if any,
- the geographical location of the acts,
- the widespread occurrence of the acts,
- the tactical tempo of operations,
- the modus operandi of similar illegal acts,
- the officers and staff involved, and
- the location of the commander at the time⁹⁰.

With regard to the further elements, in particular the intent covering the failure to control 79 properly, it has to be taken into consideration, that command responsibility is an additional, inherent responsibility ‘for crimes within the jurisdiction of the court’, and not for a *crimen sui generis*⁹¹. Further decisive is the aspect that command responsibility is not merely an extending mode of the traditional responsibility for participation, though it comes close to facilitating or

⁸⁸ For more details concerning basic principles for such guidelines see id., in: Prittwitz et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Klaus Lüderssen (2002) 437, 438 et seq.; id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 229 et seq. and id., in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 919 et seq. with references.

⁸⁹ Fenrick in the First Edition of this Commentary (1999), article 28, mn 9.

⁹⁰ Ibid. article 28, mn 10; see also Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 386. See also the Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 June 2009, para 444 at 431 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/07965c/>>.

⁹¹ This aspect also has already broadly discussed on another occasion see Triffterer, in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 903 et seq.

supporting crimes of subordinates in a way, similar to ‘otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission’⁹².

- 80 When applying these guidelines to locate command responsibility it therefore has in addition to be taken into consideration, that this modality of responsibility is based on omissions only. It combines an intentional omission of the superior, violating pre-established duties with a kind of negligent passivity in a way, that the influence of the first failure shapes the activities of the subordinates. This is the reason why the second failure, to take the necessary measures, aggravates the situation and, therefore, triggers the responsibility of the superior, when he knew or should have known about its criminal character: the superior misses his chance to compensate his first violation by preventing what could and should have been avoided already earlier.
- 81 The last guideline to be mentioned in this non exhausting summary, concerns another trigger mechanism: there must be a ‘crime within the jurisdiction of the court committed by subordinates’ which means at least an attempted crime, to base command responsibility upon. The responsibility then is according to article 28 ‘for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’. This means that the commander has to be sentenced for committing, for instance, a specific war crime or for genocide ‘per command responsibility’. The commission of the crime by the subordinates, thus, has to be established beyond any doubt.
- 82 According to the concept and notion developed above, it follows that the commander does not need to have the genocidal intent himself. It is sufficient, when he includes in ‘his mind’ that the crimes possibly resulting from his failure to control properly, could be war crimes, crimes against humanity or even genocide. Later on, when defined and accepted by the Assembly of States Parties, a similar structure will be applicable with regard to aggression.
- 83 With regard to the second failure it is sufficient that the superior is aware (‘knew’), that there are atrocities committed by the subordinates, which possibly are attempted or completed crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court, perhaps even genocide, or that he should have known because of available leading information to such conclusions. Command responsibility thus shows on the material and on the mental side lesser ‘involvement’ than traditional participation of superiors, for which a stronger influence in the actual committing of the actus reus of the principal perpetrator and a more precise mental element of the superior is required.
- 84 All these aspects should be taken into consideration when a situation of passivity of a superior has to be analysed and interpreted in order to find out, whether article 28 Rome Statute or, still for a while, article 7 para. 3 ICTY or article 6 para. 3 ICTR Statute has to be applied.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paras (a) and (b): Two alternatives with few deviating elements – general remarks

- 85 Article 28 ICC Statute provides for three categories of persons that may fall under the doctrine of command responsibility: (a) military commanders or persons effectively acting as such (so-called military-like commander); and (b) other superiors. Rank and status are of limited relevance,⁹³ the key element is the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship. It is also the first requirement of the three stage test adopted by the ICTY to hold someone accountable under the doctrine:
- (i) the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship;
 - (ii) that the superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and ⁹² This aspect also has already broadly discussed on another occasion see id., in: id. (ed.), Gedächtnisschrift für Theo Vogler (2004) 213, 236 et seq.

⁹³ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras. 647, 704 and 742.

(iii) that the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the perpetrator thereof⁹⁴.

The existence of these different categories of commanders/superiors is not without consequences for the determination of the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship. The distinction is a conscious one, since the underlying assumption is that military and military-like commanders on the one hand, and non-military, i.e. civilian superiors, on the other have different possibilities and ways to control third parties alleged to have committed international crimes. Therefore, different requirements apply and different evidentiary elements may prove the existence of such relationship.

1. Military command (a) or other ‘superior and subordinate relationships’ (b)

Paragraph (a) refers to military commanders or persons effectively acting as such (military-like commanders). Paragraph (b), by default, refers to superiors holding a superior-subordinate relationship not covered by paragraph (a), i.e. civilian superiors. The underlying idea of both is that a person exercising effective authority or command over another one can be held responsible for the conduct of the latter, if also the other requirements of the doctrine are met. 86

In case (a), the assumption is that the military, by definition, is organised hierarchically, with a strict chain of command, different levels of command and different levels of subordinates. The commanders’ duty is to lead and control his subordinates and to ensure their disciplined conduct, which is indispensable for the smooth execution of his orders. In the armed forces, everybody has a commander: even the chief of the armed forces is usually subject to another authority, which is often the minister of defence or the President, depending on the applicable political system. 87

The role of the military commander can be compared to that of a ‘guarantor’. Known to civil law systems (e.g. the Swiss, the German) this status is attached to persons who have either the legal obligation to protect a specific object/person under their supervision from the external dangers and to persons who have originated a potential source of danger and who must, therefore, protect third parties from its negative effects. The military commander has a twofold guarantor position: he must take care of his subordinates and, at the same time, the safety of persons protected under the laws of armed conflict (LOAC) from the potential misconduct of his subordinates⁹⁵.

In case (b), proof of the existence of a hierarchical relationship is more complicated, since it cannot be presumed on the same basis as in a military or quasi-military environment (e.g. within the police). The civilian realm is not systematically hierarchical, even though there are some situations, like in the professional world, where hierarchical structures may be found. It is by reference to the professional world, and an analogy to the contractual employer-employee relationship, that the responsibility of non-military and non-military-like superiors for the misconduct of third parties was constructed.⁹⁶ This approach was supported by the ICTR in the *Musema Case*⁹⁷.

⁹⁴ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 346. These criteria recall the ones established in the Trial of Soemu Toyoda, Official Transcript of Record of Trial, 5005 and 5006. See also Pilloud et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 (1987) para. 3543.

⁹⁵ See Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 207; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 184.

⁹⁶ According to Swiss criminal law, a person who creates a danger is responsible for the prevention of any possible harm deriving from it. An analogous duty is incumbent upon parents with respect to their children. See Stratenwerth, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I: Die Straftat (1996) 408. The responsibility of the firm holder is known as ‘Geschäftsherrenhaftung’ in the continental system. See the decisions of the Swiss Federal Tribunal in the ‘Bührlé’ (BGE 96 IV 155) and ‘Von Roll’ (BGE 122 IV 103) cases. See also, with regard to this analogy, Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 844 et seq.; id., Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 184 and 199.

⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 27 Jan. 2000, para. 880. On the guarantor position. The Trial Chamber held that the accused, the director of an important tea factory, through his power to appoint and remove his employees, had exercised legal and financial control over them. Musema was, thus, found

In both cases (a) and (b), however, the pre-requisite is the existence of a de facto superior-subordinate relationship⁹⁸. The exercise of command must be effective and the superior-subordinate relationship cannot be derived from the mere fact of belonging to a chain of command: this is not per se sufficient⁹⁹. To do otherwise would lead to the application of the old doctrine of strict liability. This was followed in the *Yamashita Case*¹⁰⁰, but was later reversed in the *High Command Case*¹⁰¹. The superior's powers to control and to intervene must be real, in order to hold him accountable¹⁰². These must be assessed ad hoc. In this regard, distinctions must be drawn for instance between tactical commanders, who are in charge of military operations, and non-operational commanders, who might be in charge of activities such as logistics. This distinction played a crucial role in General Cermak's acquittal by the ICTY in relation to the conduct of Operation Storm in Croatia¹⁰³. Effective command or authority may be also exercised over each other by people holding equal status.¹⁰⁴ However:

‘... substantial influence as a means of control in any sense which falls short of the possession of effective control over subordinates, which requires the possession of material abilities to prevent subordinate offences or to punish subordinate offenders, lacks sufficient support in State practice and judicial decisions’¹⁰⁵.

The doctrine of command responsibility is applicable also to superior-subordinate relationships established across national borders or different armed groups. For instance, where a state relies on guerrilla groups or private subcontractors in order to resort to illegal methods of warfare without incurring into any kind of state liability, the leaders of this state may nevertheless be held accountable as individuals under the doctrine of command responsibility. The lack of a hierarchical and formal superior-subordinate structure does not detract from the possibility of incurring into criminal liability.

88 Thus, where a superior-subordinate relationship can be proven, the doctrine of command responsibility may apply, regardless of the military or civilian status of the person holding effective authority.

guilty under the doctrine of command responsibility for having failed to discharge his supervisory duty over them and having allowed them to commit crimes within the context of their work.

⁹⁸ Prosecutor v Momčilo Perišić, IT-04-81-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 28 Feb 2013, paras. 75 et seq.

⁹⁹ Burnett (1997) 38 HarvILJ 272, 272 et seq.; Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-94-14/1-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 25 Jun. 1999, paras 73 et seq.; see Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras. 354 and 647; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 26 Feb. 2001, para. 369.

¹⁰⁰ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) Part VI, ii, 84.

¹⁰¹ Trial of Wilhelm von Leeb et al. (The German High Command Trial), UNWCC, XII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) 76 ‘Criminality does not attach to every individual in this chain of command from that fact alone. There must be a personal dereliction. That can occur only where the act is directly traceable to him or where his failure to properly supervise his subordinates constitutes criminal negligence on his part. In this latter case it must be a personal neglect amounting to a wanton, immoral disregard of the action of his subordinates amounting to acquiescence’. The case was referred to in Prosecutor v. Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 3. Mar. 2000, para. 321. The court concluded that there had to be, instead, a causative, overt act or omission from which a guilty intent could be inferred, therefore rejecting the strict liability test.

¹⁰² Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 98, para. 422 and for further information see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I(2013) 191.

¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Ante Gotovina, Ivan Cermak, Mladen Markac, IT-06-90-T, Judgment 15 April 2011, para. 147, 149, 164, 166, 2549.

¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Delalić, IT-96-21-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 20 Feb. 2001, para. 303:

‘... it is possible to imagine scenarios in which one of two persons of equal status or rank – such as two soldiers or two civilian prison guards – could in fact exercise ‘effective control’ over the other at least in the sense of purely practical ability to prevent the conduct of the other by, for example, force of personality or physical strength’.

¹⁰⁵ Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 102, para. 266.

2. Any of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court when – committed by forces under ...effective control ... or ... authority and control', litera (a), or when – concerning 'activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior', litera (b) (ii)

Under article 28 (a) command responsibility can only be initiated by the commission of a crime falling within the Court's jurisdiction. There must be a 'nexus' between a commander's failure to properly command and control his subordinates and the latter's commission of crimes. The following two considerations arise:

- (a) The ICC has jurisdiction exclusively over the offences enlisted under article 5 (genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and aggression), as defined in articles 6–8bis ICC Statute (on the special status of the crime of aggression see the commentary to this provision). Therefore, a commander may only be liable in front of the ICC when one of these underlying offences was committed. A caveat, however, is that the war crimes catalogue of art. 8 ICC is not comprehensive of all the existing war crimes provisions pursuant to the LOAC. For instance, the use of biological and chemical weapons was excluded from the ICC Statute for political reasons, in order to achieve consensus and adopt it. Thus, a commander who failed to prevent the use of a chemical weapon by his subordinates may not be charged with war crimes in front of the ICC; this however, does not preclude his prosecution in a domestic court or another international criminal tribunal.
- (b) A controversial issue is the legal character of article 28: sui generis independent crime or a special form of participation to the underlying offences?¹⁰⁶ The origins of the command responsibility doctrine are to be found in the overarching notion of 'responsible command', pursuant to which a commander must properly discharge his 'command and control' duties in general. These are not restricted to the duty to prevent serious breaches of international law, but extend to the need to ensure the proper functioning of the military system in general, also by taking action against disciplinary offences and 'ordinary' crimes.¹⁰⁷ The concept of 'command responsibility, as it was developed under the LOAC, was then restricted to the failure to prevent the commission of serious breaches thereof. The underlying idea, however, is the same: the commander is entrusted with this responsibility to properly exercise command and control. Failure to do so will result in criminal charges. The actus reus, thus, consists primarily in this failure, not in the commander's participation to the offences he failed to prevent, repress or punish.¹⁰⁸ In the doctrine there are three major lines of thought, as summarized by Maria Nybondas. According to these such conduct shall qualify: (1) as a sui generis – independent – crime that punishes the superior for his failure to properly exercise command and that, as such, may also be committed by negligence, even if the primary offence requires intent; (2) as a sui generis form of – indirect or derivative – participation to the primary offence, which would as a rule require the commander to share the intent of the other participants; (3) as a mixture of both a sui generis act and a sui generis form of participation (bifurcated approach), depending on the case. Nybondas opts for the 'bifurcated approach', even though she admits that the ICTY followed the sui generis approach (see the Hadžihasanović and Halilović judgments)¹⁰⁹ Prof. Triffterer, by

¹⁰⁶ For a detailed analysis see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 207 (discussing different approaches in the literature).

¹⁰⁷ Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 19.

¹⁰⁸ Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 19; Arnold (2013) 11 JICJ 943–951.

¹⁰⁹ Nybondas, Command Responsibility and Its Applicability to Civilian Superiors (2010) 127 et seq., 133 and 136 et seq.; Arnold (2013) 11 JICJ 943–951. Also the position under Swiss legislation is very controversial. See Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 19 (forthcoming); Rogers, Law on the battlefield (1996) 196; Méttraux, The law of command responsibility (2009) 37 et seq. Holding the view that it is a genuine act of omission sui generis: Fiolka, in: Niggli and Wiprächtiger (eds.), Basler Kommentar zum StGB (2013), with reference to Ambos, in: Cassese et al.

contrast, argues that ‘command responsibility’ is a principle, as demonstrated by the fact that article 28 is contained in Part III of the ICC Statute (‘general principles of criminal law’), rather than Part II (Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law). Moreover, article 28 is neither enlisted as a crime per se falling under the jurisdiction of the ICC Statute pursuant to article 5, nor is it mentioned as a specific war crime or crime against humanity under articles 7–8 ICC Statute. In his view, therefore, it is to be considered only as a form of participation to the crimes enlisted under article 5. The qualification of breaches of art. 28 as a form of participation to the offences enlisted in article 5 of the ICC Statute may have a serious impact on issues like causality, concurrency to other crimes, double liability as primary perpetrator and commander, and attempt. So far the ICC has not made any judgments on this issue. In the Bemba Case, the Pre-Trial Chamber II of the ICC simply concluded that the accused was criminally responsible within the meaning of article 28(a) for the different war crimes and crimes against humanity charges enlisted in the indictment¹¹⁰.

91 Under the ICC Statute, unless it resulted into the commission of one of the crimes enlisted under article 5, a commander’s failure to exercise proper control over his subordinates is not criminally relevant. The same may not hold true under domestic military criminal law, by contrast, pursuant to which disciplinary measures may be triggered. The nexus to the underlying offence is to be read as a means to distinguish between failures to discharge a commander’s duties leading to the most serious breaches of international law and those with no consequences, for purposes of the determination of the punishment. This reasoning is supported by the fact that in some instances, article 28 has been implemented into domestic legislation as a specific provision contained in a special section dedicated to international crimes, without jeopardising the existence of more generic provisions on the duty to command and control contained in military manuals¹¹¹. Due to this mixed nature, one may conclude that the offence is a sui generis independent crime.

92 Another open issue yet to be clarified by the ICC is whether the subordinates must have committed, i.e. successfully brought to an end the underlying crimes, or whether it is sufficient for the crimes to be attempted¹¹². In contrast to article 25 ICC Statute, article 28 ICC is silent on this. The logics however suggest that if command responsibility is a sui generis crime aimed at punishing the commander for his failure to properly discharge his duties, then the correct approach is that whenever a crime is committed in a form that can entail the criminal responsibility of the subordinate, the superior shall be held accountable, too. Thus, if the responsibility for the underlying crimes can be incurred by committing an attempted crime, this may trigger the superior’s responsibility, too. This conclusion is also supported by a teleological interpretation of the doctrine of command responsibility. If the superior shall ensure the maintainance of order and control, in terms of prevention it is required that he intervenes at the earliest stage possible, which implies that the word ‘committed’ does not (eds.), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 844, 851 et seq.; Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts, Ansätze einer Dogmatisierung (2004) 667 et seq.; Bonafe (2007) 5 JICJ 599, 603–604; SCSL, Prosecutor v. Brima, Kamara and Kanu, SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, 20. June 2007, § 783, with reference to ICTY, Prosecutor v. Halilović, IT-01-48-T, Judgment, 16. November 2005, §§ 42–54 and ICTY, Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-T, Judgment, 15. March 2006, § 75. Critical: Weigend (2004) 116 ZStW 999–1002, 1006 et seq.; Laucci, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale internationale, commentaire article par article (2012) 864.

¹¹⁰ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para 444.

¹¹¹ See eg. art. 114 a of the Swiss Military Criminal Code (SR 321.0) on command responsibility for international crimes and Chapter 3 ‘Command’ of the Swiss Military Manual on Military Service of 1994, SR 510.107.0, breaches of which may be prosecuted under art. 72 of the Swiss Military Criminal Code; see also Laucci, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale internationale, commentaire article par article (2012) 864, 865; Smidt (2000) 164 MillRev. 155, 169. See also Triffterer, in: Lagodny et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Albin Eser (2005) 901, 913.

¹¹² Under most domestic criminal codes, the question would be whether the underlying offence is either a result or an inchoate endangerment crime.

require the completion of the crime.¹¹³ Take the following example: the crime of genocide can be objectively fulfilled by the killing of one or more persons¹¹⁴. It follows, that a superior who knew or should have known that his subordinates were acting with genocidal intent may be liable even if only one person was killed: no full scale effect (i. e. consummation) of the crime is required.¹¹⁵

The interpretation of the term committed is also relevant to determine the temporal 93 framework during which the perpetrator may still change his mind and abandon the commission of the offence. Triffterer observes that, according to article 25 para. 3 (f), which addresses situations in which the crime has been attempted and where the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions, the primary perpetrator's change of mind and abandonment of the commission of the crime may lead to his acquittal. The same, by contrast, does not necessarily hold true with regard to the superior. The question that arises is what happens when a superior decides to remain passive and the completion of the crimes is prevented by the fact that the primary perpetrator spontaneously abandons his plan. Shall the commander be liable in this case? As said, command responsibility is a sui generis crime that requires the commission of a crime by the subordinates. Participation is always accessory to the main crime, meaning that it would be unfair to hold a participant more liable than the primary perpetrator. However, since the wrongful conduct criminalised by article 28 is the commander's failure to supervise his subordinates, he shall be liable even though the crime was only attempted.

The second part of the sentence contained in article 28 lit. a relates instead to the required 94 kind of control, which has been examined in the previous paragraphs.

3. Minimum mental element for the second failure: – ‘should have known’, or – ‘consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated that the, subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes’

Different standards have been adopted in the history of the doctrine of command respon- 95 sibility. The controversial strict liability test adopted in the *Yamashita Case*¹¹⁶, holding that a superior shall be criminally responsible for acts committed by his subordinates, without it being necessary to prove his criminal intent¹¹⁷, is no longer applicable. It was rejected in the *High Command Case*¹¹⁸, which observed that due to the modern dictates of war, necessitating decentralisation, a high commander could not be kept informed about all the details of a military operation. Therefore it introduced the knew or should have known test¹¹⁹. This relies on the concepts of actual (knew) and constructive (should have known) knowledge: a commander may be liable if ‘he failed to exercise the means available to him to learn of the offence and, under the circumstances, he should have known and such failure to know constitutes ¹¹³ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 203; Bantekas (2009) 7 JICJ 1197, 1199; Métraux, The Law of Command Responsibility (2009) 79; Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 19, 28 (forthcoming); Trechsel (2009) 3 BJILP 26, 28 et seq.

¹¹⁴ UN Doc. ICC-ASP/1/3; Ambos and Cassese, however, argue that there need to be at least two victims. see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. II (2013) 10; Cassese et al., International Criminal Law (2013) 117, 129.

¹¹⁵ This is also the view of the Swiss legislator. See Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 19, 28 (forthcoming); Vest and Sager (2009) 4 AJP 423, 443.

¹¹⁶ Yamashita, UNWCC, XXI LRTWC (1948) Part II, p. 29.

¹¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para. 488.

¹¹⁸ Trial of Wilhelm von Leeb et al. (The German High Command Trial), UNWCC, XII LRTWC (1948) 76 and for further information see also Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 90.

¹¹⁹ Trial of Soemu Toyoda, Official Transcript of Record of Trial 5006, referred to in Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 389 and Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, para. 316. For details see Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 71 and Burnett (1985) 107 MillRev 71, 118 et seq. (1985) and Rogers, Law on the battlefield (1996) 147.

*criminal dereliction*¹²⁰. Likewise the Hostage Case held that the commander of an occupied territory 'is charged with notice of occurrences taking place within that territory'¹²¹. He may fulfil his duty by requiring reports. However, if these are incomplete, he is obliged to require supplementary ones. In the court's words: 'If he fails to require and obtain complete information, the dereliction of duty rests upon him and he is in no position to plead his own dereliction as a defence'¹²². The Toyoda Case ruled that this (constructive) knowledge may also be presumed when the carrying out of the crimes was so widespread that a reasonable man could come to no other conclusion than that the accused must have known of the facts. Thus, even though a commander cannot possibly keep track of all events, lack of knowledge is no defence when due to negligence in attempting to obtain all possible information.

- 96 In the Celebici Case the ICTY held that pursuant to customary law the knew or should have known test had been replaced by the knew or had reason to know test set forth in article 86 of Add. Prot. I of 1977¹²³. The latter no longer encompasses the liability of a commander for dereliction of duty to obtain information within his reasonable access¹²⁴. This position, which was initially disputed in *Blaškić*¹²⁵, was confirmed by the later jurisprudence of the ICTY¹²⁶. According to the 'had reason to know' test, a superior is only liable if:
- (1) he had actual knowledge (established through direct¹²⁷ or circumstantial¹²⁸ evidence) that his subordinates were committing or about to commit crimes, or,
 - (2) if he 'had reason to know' that crimes were being committed on the basis of information available to him and indicating the need for additional investigation¹²⁹.

¹²⁰ Trial of Wilhelm List et al. (Hostages Trial) UNWCC, VII LRTWC, Part IV, p. 71, referred to in, Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 389 and Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, para. 322. For details see Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 61 et seq.

¹²¹ Trial of Wilhelm List et al. (Hostages Trial) UNWCC, VII LRTWC, Part IV, p. 71. For details see Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 61 et seq.

¹²² Trial of Wilhelm List et al. (Hostages Trial) UNWCC, VII LRTWC, Part IV, p. 71, referred to in Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 389.

¹²³ This provision is now part of customary law. See Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras 383 and 390 and Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, para. 310.

¹²⁴ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 393, confirmed in Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, para. 224.

¹²⁵ See Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, para. 314–332 (in particular, para. 324). The Trial Chamber seems to support the view that there is no contradiction between the mens rea applied in post Second World War cases and articles 86 and 87 of Add. Prot. I. The Trial Chamber also refers to the findings of the Kahan Commission (para. 331). The latter held that '[t]he absence of a warning from experts cannot serve as an explanation for ignoring the danger of a massacre. The Chief of Staff should have known and foreseen – by virtue of common knowledge, as well as the special information at his disposal – that there was a possibility of harm to the population in the camps at the hands of the Phalangists' (para. 497 of the Report). However it seems to the author that the Commission relied on a 'had reason to know' test, rather than a 'should have known' test requiring him to obtain the information. The Commission namely observed that: 'If it indeed becomes clear that those who decided on the entry of the Phalangists into the camps should have foreseen – from the information at their disposal and from things which were common knowledge – that there was danger of a massacre, and no steps were taken which might have prevented this danger or at least greatly reduced the possibility that deeds of this type might be done, then those who made the decisions and those who implemented them are indirectly responsible for what ultimately occurred, even if they did not intend this to happen and merely disregarded the anticipated danger'. Israel, Final Report of the Israeli Commission of Inquiry into the Events at the Refugee Camps in Beirut, 7.2.1983, (1983) 22 ILM 497.

¹²⁶ Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, para. 241 and Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, para. 430 and 432 et seq.

¹²⁷ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 386.

¹²⁸ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 386; Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, para. 307 and Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, para 427. The Trial Chamber in Čelebići referred to the Final Report of the UN Commission of Experts for the ICTY, which contains a list of elements that may be used as indicia. These include the number, type and scope of illegal acts, the time during which these occurred, the number and type of troops involved, the logistics involved, the geographical location of the acts, their widespread occurrence, the tactical tempo of operations, the modus operandi of similar illegal acts, the officers and staff involved and the location of the commander at the time. Commission of Experts Report, S/1994/674, p. 17, referred to in Bassiouni and Manikas, The Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1996) 343.

¹²⁹ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 383.

The novelty is that the commander is no longer required to actively search for the information and that he shall only be liable for failure to acknowledge information already available to him. Unfortunately, in the Celebici Case the ICTY did not analyse whether current customary law had been modified by article 28 of the Rome Statute¹³⁰, which reintroduced a kind of should have known test. This examination was nevertheless undertaken by the ICTR in *Kayishema and Ruzindana*¹³¹. It concluded that a superior is only liable for having failed to take notice of information that may have indicated the occurrence of crimes, but not for the failure of obtaining that information. It recalled that in article 28 ICC Statute, the should have known formula is completed by the phrasing ‘owing to the circumstances at the time’, which seems to bring it in line with the had reason to know test supported in Celebici. Therefore, even though it will be the ICC’s task to define the details of the mens rea requirements under its Statute, it may be concluded that, notwithstanding a slightly different wording, the applicable test is still whether someone, on the basis of the available information, had reason to know in the sense of Add. Prot. I. This approach seem to be supported, so far, also by the ICC jurisprudence, in particular by the findings in the Bemba Case, as will be discussed in detail later.

II. Paragraph (a)

1. Qualification: ‘military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander’

At the Rome Conference in 1998¹³² a broad majority held the view that responsibility should also extend to civilian superiors, notwithstanding the opposition of few delegations, including China. A first draft produced by Canada and consolidated by the UK foresaw the same requirements for both categories. However, the United States raised the important question whether civilian superiors would be in the same position as military commanders to prevent or repress the commission of crimes by their subordinates. The outcome was the drafting of different requirements, but there was agreement that definitely both categories shall be encompassed.

The term ‘military commander’ was defined by the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber in the Bemba Case.¹³³ It refers to persons who are formally or legally appointed to carry out a military commanding function (i. e., de jure commanders). The concept embodies all persons who have command responsibility within the armed forces, irrespective of their rank or level. A military commander, thus, could be a person occupying the highest level in the chain of command or a mere leader with few soldiers. The term also captures those situations where the superior does not exclusively perform a military function.

The Pre-Trial Chamber held further that the term ‘person effectively acting as a military commander’ covers a distinct and broader category, which ‘refers to those who are not elected by law to carry out a military commander’s role, yet they perform it de facto by exercising effective control over a group of persons through a chain of command.’ This may encompass superiors who have authority and control over regular government forces, such as armed police units, or irregular forces (non-government forces) such as rebel groups, ¹³⁰ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 393. See also the Prosecutor’s view in Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, para. 430.

¹³¹ Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 21 May 1999, paras. 225–228. See also Prosecutor v. Brdanin, IT-99-36-T, ‘Trial Judgment’, 1 September 2004, para. 278: Knowledge can only be presumed if a superior had the means to obtain the relevant information of a crime and deliberately refrained from doing so.

¹³² Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, the making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (Kluwer 1999) 202.

¹³³ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 4408.

paramilitary units including, inter alia, armed resistance movements and militias that follow a structure of military hierarchy or a chain of command.¹³⁴

There is usually more than one commander in a chain of command. The latter may include, e.g., a section leader, a platoon commander, a company commander, a battalion commander, a brigade commander, a division commander and others in ascending seniority. A commander has thus the authority to issue direct orders to subordinates, including commanders of subordinate units. The significant element is the effective exercise of command, not the fact of holding a particular rank. In the *Celebici Case*¹³⁵ the Trial Chamber of the ICTY clarified that command responsibility could be based on a mere de facto position of authority and that ‘the mere absence of formal legal authority to control the actions of subordinates should not be understood to preclude the imposition of such responsibility’¹³⁶. It follows that the doctrine applies to all individuals¹³⁷, as long as these exercised effective control over the offenders and had ‘the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of these offences’¹³⁸. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY concurred with this view and observed that this standard had been also adopted by article 28 of the ICC Statute¹³⁹.

- 99 The showing of effective control is required for both de jure and de facto superiors. Celebici also drew a distinction between the tactical and executive commander¹⁴⁰. It observed that unlike a tactical commander, who is in charge of troops assigned to him, the latter is in charge of a territory and:

‘is per se responsible within the area of his occupation...regardless of the fact that the crimes committed were due to the action of the state or superior military authorities that he didn’t initiate or in which he didn’t participate’¹⁴¹.

To support this position, in *Celebici*¹⁴² the court referred to the findings of the *Hostage Case*¹⁴³.

- 100 This means further, that the commander of regular troops may be responsible for acts committed by irregular troops or guerrilla movements subordinated to his orders. This is an important alternative in cases where states may decide to rely on guerrilla movements, trained by their regular forces, in order to delegate responsibility for the commission of breaches of the international laws of armed conflict. In this type of situation, in fact, the hidden involvement of a state may be derived by establishing command responsibility of a member of its regular armed forces¹⁴⁴.

¹³⁴ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, paras. 409–410, with reference to ICTY and ICTR jurisprudence, in particular Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 354.

¹³⁵ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras. 647, 704 and 742.

¹³⁶ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 354 et seq. Confirmed in Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, para. 195. See Aleksovski (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, paras. 75 et seq. This position was confirmed by Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 24. Mar. 2000, paras 74 et seq.; Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 405. See also Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 191.

¹³⁷ See Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras 354 et seq. and 735. See also Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, paras. 416 et seq.

¹³⁸ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 378.

¹³⁹ Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, paras. 196 and 197.

¹⁴⁰ This approach was also followed in the The German High Command Trial, note 60, p. 76.

¹⁴¹ Trial of Wilhelm von Leeb et al. (The German High Command Trial), UNWCC, XII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) 76, referred to in Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 43 and 44.

¹⁴² Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras. 372, 648 and 649 and Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, para. 258 (footnotes omitted). For details see Jia (2004) 3 Chinese J. I L. 1, 1.

¹⁴³ Trial of Wilhelm List et al. (Hostages Trial) UNWCC, VII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Part IV, p. 71. See, Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 191; Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 60 et seq. The tribunal concluded that there had to be a causative, overt act or omission from which a guilty intent could be inferred, therefore rejecting a theory of strict liability.

¹⁴⁴ For details on this aspect see Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 191.

2. Commanders and subordinates

a) Structure of ‘forces’. Armed forces in the international laws of armed conflict are defined in article 43 of Add. Prot. I of 1977¹⁴⁵. According to this, the armed forces of a Party to the conflict consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct of its subordinates, even if that Party is represented by a government or an authority not recognized by the adverse Party. Such armed forces shall be subject to an internal disciplinary system which, inter alia, shall enforce compliance with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict. Thus, an intrinsic element is that armed forces be organized under a command responsible to a Party to the conflict for the conduct of its subordinates. The same requirement appears in article 4 A of the III Geneva Convention on Prisoners of War of 1949. According to the latter, belligerents can only be recognized as combatants – i.e. the status granted automatically to members of regular armed forces – if they a) either belong to regular armed forces of a state, therefore automatically having a responsible commander, or, b) if they belong to irregular armed forces, which fulfil several criteria, among which that of being led by a responsible commander¹⁴⁶. Therefore, the two notions of armed forces and commander are in symbiosis. The first can only exist with the presence of the latter. The underlying idea is that only those belligerent groups which are organized and have responsible leaders will have the discipline necessary to conduct warfare operations in observance of international humanitarian law.

Forces per se, instead, are a wider category, which may also include armed police forces and paramilitary units.

b) ‘[E]ffective command and control’. As already mentioned, a superior may only be held liable for the crimes committed by a subordinate if he effectively exercised command and control over him. Forces under the effective command and control are those which are subordinate to the commander in either a de iure or de facto chain of command and to which the superior may give orders. These may be transmitted directly or through intermediate subordinate commanders. When multiple chains of command exist, responsibility is assigned to the chain of command that holds the power to give orders related to the conduct of hostilities or the care or victims of war. The assessment whether the indicted subordinate was under the effective command of a superior is done on the basis of objective criteria, independently from the question of his subjective incompetence. The requirement of ‘effective command and control’ relates primarily to superiors of regular and irregular armed forces with a disciplined and hierarchical internal structure.

c) ‘[E]ffective authority and control’. This requirement was introduced to take into consideration the situation where someone holds de facto authority or command and control

¹⁴⁵ 1. The armed forces of a Party to a conflict consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct of its subordinates, even if that Party is represented by a government or an authority not recognized by an adverse Party. Such armed forces shall be subject to an internal disciplinary system which, inter alia, shall enforce compliance with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict.

2. Members of the armed forces of a Party to a conflict (other than medical personnel and chaplains covered by article 33 of the Third Convention) are combatants, that is to say, they have the right to participate directly in hostilities.

3. Whenever a Party to a conflict incorporates a paramilitary or armed law enforcement agency into its armed forces it shall so notify the other Parties to the conflict 3. Whenever a Party to a conflict incorporates a paramilitary or armed law enforcement agency into its armed forces it shall so notify the other Parties to the conflict.

¹⁴⁶ The other criteria are that;

a) They belong to a State
 b) they have a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance;
 c) they carry arms openly;
 d) they conduct their operations in accordance with the Laws and Customs of War.
 For more details see Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 191.

over third parties who do not belong to his chain of command or armed forces. It particularly comes into play when the commander of a regular armed force may exercise authority and control over members of a paramilitary group which act on its behalf or on its side. As already mentioned, there is then also the case of ‘executive commanders’, who are in charge of a territory¹⁴⁷ and who, in addition to their operational responsibility may give orders to all forces within their occupation zone¹⁴⁸.

In the Bemba Case the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that the expressions ‘effective command’ and ‘effective authority’ have close but distinct meanings, even though the required degree of control is the same¹⁴⁹. ‘Effective authority’ may indicate ‘the modality, manner or nature, according to which, a military or military-like commander exercise ‘control’ over his forces or subordinates.’ It refers to the material ability to prevent or repress the commission of the crimes or submit the matter to the competent authorities. The simple exercise of influence, albeit substantial, is not sufficient¹⁵⁰. The following factors may indicate a superior’s position of authority and effective control: (i) the official position of the suspect; (ii) his power to issue or give orders; (i.e., ensure that they would be executed); (iii) his position within the military structure and the actual tasks that he carried out; (iv) the capacity to order forces or units under his command, whether under his immediate command or at a lower levels, to engage in hostilities; (v) the capacity to re-subordinate units or make changes to command structure; (vi) the power to promote, replace, remove or discipline any member of the forces; (vii) the authority to send forces where hostilities take place and withdraw them at any given moment; and (viii) the capacity to ensure compliance with the orders issued¹⁵¹. Between the ‘effective control’ and the criminal conduct there must be temporal coincidence, i.e. it must have existed at the time of commission of the underlying crime. In this regard, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber distanced itself from Trial Chamber I of the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), according to which the ‘superior must have had effective control over the perpetrator at least at the time when the crimes were about to be committed’. He must have been in charge of the forces at least at the time the crimes were committed¹⁵².

3. ‘[F]ailure to exercise control properly’

- 104 In order to say that a superior failed to ‘exercise control properly’, it must be shown that he had ‘effective control’ over his forces: failure to exercise such control is a scenario of non-compliance with such duties. The underlying crime must be the result of the superior’s dereliction of duty to exercise proper control.¹⁵³ This position, supported in the Bemba Case, is in line with article 87 Add. Prot. I, according to which it is the commander’s duty to take all necessary and reasonable measures to ensure his forces’ compliance with international humanitarian law or to punish breaches thereof committed by his subordinates.¹⁵⁴ It is ¹⁴⁷ Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 720.

¹⁴⁸ Trial of Wilhelm von Leeb et al. (The German High Command Trial), UNWCC, XII Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) 36 and 76. See also, Hostages Trial, Part IV, note 59, at 71; Arnold (2002) 7 JCSL 191, 191; Parks (1973) 62 MillRev 1, 43 and 44; Noll and Trechsel, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I (2004) 242 et seq. The tribunal concluded that there had to be a causative, overt act or omission from which a guilty intent could be inferred, therefore rejecting a theory of strict liability.

¹⁴⁹ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 413.

¹⁵⁰ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 414–415; ICTY, Prosecutor v. Hadzihasanovic, and Kubura, IT-01-47-T, ‘Judgment’, 15 March 2006, paras 80 and 795.

¹⁵¹ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 417.

¹⁵² Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire in the case of the Prosecutor v. Laurent Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-642-Red, Public redacted version of Prosecution’s final written submissions on the confirmation of charges proceedings, 31 March 2014, ICC-02/11-01/11-642-Conf, 1st May 2014, para. 29; Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 418–419. Different view: SCSL, The Prosecutor v. Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-T, ‘Judgment’, 2 March 2009, para. 299.

¹⁵³ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 422.

¹⁵⁴ Aleksovski, note 98, para. 81 and Čelebići, note 3, para. 395.

irrelevant, whether or not the commander had the power to intervene, as long as he did not attempt to do so¹⁵⁵. At operational level this duty requires commanders to:

- ensures that forces are adequately trained in International Humanitarian Law
- ensure that due regard is paid to International Humanitarian Law in operational decision making
- ensure an effective reporting system is established so that he/she is informed of incidents when violations of International Humanitarian Law might have occurred
- monitor the reporting system to ensure it is effective

a) Passivity and duty to become active. Responsibility for omission of intervention is explicitly stated in articles 86 and 87 of Add. Prot. I of 1977. The idea is that due to his/her ‘guarantor’ position, a superior shall intervene to prevent the occurrence of a crime he/she has knowledge of, or at least refer the case to the military judicial authorities. The duty to intervene, however, is only attached to perpetrators who qualify as commanders, meaning that the offence can only be committed by a specific category of persons. In this sense, the crime is conceived as a sui generis form of so-called genuine omissions liability (‘echtes Unterlassungsdelikt’) as known to civil law systems.¹⁵⁶ As stressed by the ICTY in Celebici, omission of intervention may imply an accumulative charge for individual and command responsibility¹⁵⁷. The Court held that although prima facie it would be illogical to hold a superior criminally responsible for planning, instigating or ordering the commission of crimes and, at the same time, reproach him for not preventing or punishing them, the concurrent application of article 7 para. 1 and 7 para. 3 of the ICTY Statute is acceptable where his failure to intervene allows the commission of subsequent crimes. This may occur in relation with the failure to punish¹⁵⁸. The same view was shared in the Celebici and Aleksovski appeal judgements, ruling that these cases will result in a single but aggravated conviction for command responsibility¹⁵⁹. 105

b) ‘Crimes committed’ as a result. aa) Completed or attempted crimes. Even though command responsibility is a sui generis crime that is distinct from the crimes committed by the subordinates, it may only be triggered if an underlying offence was completed (or at least attempted) by the subordinates. The question of attempt is discussed in more details later. 106

bb) Committed in which modality of article 25 para. 3 ever. What is the relationship between superior responsibility under article 28 and individual responsibility under article 25? Article 25 para. 3 (a) – (e) defines five groups of conduct. Litera a deals with the commission, litera b with the instigation of the commission and litera c with facilitating the commission of a crime by assisting the principal perpetrator. Pursuant to litera d, contribution in any other way to the commission or attempted commission of the crime is only punishable when a ‘group of persons acting with a common purpose’ sets a criminal conduct and the participating perpetrator fulfils additional demands, such as acting intentionally, 107

¹⁵⁵ Bantekas (1999) 93 AJIL 577, 591; Green (1989) 27 CanYbIL 200 and Akayesu (TC Judgement), note 117, para. 46.

¹⁵⁶ See Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 4 (forthcoming); Fiolka, in: Niggli and Wiprächtiger (eds.) Basler Kommentar zum StGB, Bd. II (2013), with reference to Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.) The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 823, 851 et seq.; Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts. Ansätze einer Dogmatisierung (2004) 667 et seq.; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 186. Critical: Weigend, (2004) 116 ZStW 999, 1006 et seq.

¹⁵⁷ See Blaškić (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 101, paras 263, 270 and 284. On the understanding of the offence of command responsibility as a so-called ‘echtes Unterlassungsdelikt’, see Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR (forthcoming), with reference to art. 264 b of the Swiss Criminal Code, which implements article 28 ICC Statute.

¹⁵⁸ See Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber Judgement of 3 March 2000, paras 337 and 338.

¹⁵⁹ See, Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, Appeals Chamber Judgment of 24 March 2000, para 183; Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 102, paras 736 and 743 et seq. The issue of direct responsibility is beyond the scope of this paper.

aiming to further the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group and when he acts ‘in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime’. Litera e, instead, establishes individual criminal responsibility for incitement to commit genocide under certain conditions.

108 Command responsibility is primarily constructed on omission of intervention, whereas the forms of participation referred to under article 25 refer to active participation such as incitement. Under article 28 it is enough that because of the failure to control or intervene, crimes are committed which most probably would not have been committed otherwise. As previously mentioned, however, given certain circumstances inactivity by a superior may also consist in a form of direct participation, thereby aggravating the culpability of the superior¹⁶⁰. In such cases the active participation should prevail as *lex specialis*¹⁶¹. Another difference is that whereas direct responsibility requires willful intent, the doctrine of superior responsibility states that the latter may be incurred also on the basis of negligence¹⁶².

109 cc) Causality. In the Bemba Case the ICC’s Pre-Trial Chamber acknowledged that, in explicit contrast to the existing international jurisprudence¹⁶³, the use of the words ‘as a result of in the chapeau of article 28 ICC Statute suggest that causality is a separate element of superior responsibility¹⁶⁴. This, however, only holds true in relation to the duty to prevent the commission of future crimes.¹⁶⁵ With regard to the failure to repress or report past crimes, accountability will depend on whether the act of omission was likely to increase the risk of further crimes¹⁶⁶. Since the effect of an omission cannot be determined with certainty, only a hypothetical causality can be invoked, on the basis of different available tests. The Pre-Trial Chamber in the Bemba Case opted for a ‘but for test’, ‘in the sense that, but for the superior’s failure to fulfil his duty to take reasonable and necessary measures to prevent crimes, those crimes would not have been committed by his forces.’¹⁶⁷ It further clarified that: ‘it is only necessary to prove that the commander’s omission increased the risk of the commission of the crimes’.¹⁶⁸ The ICC, thus, seems to favour the so-called theory of risk aggravation/of added peril¹⁶⁹, which was arguably followed also by the ICTY’s Trial Chamber in *Celebici*¹⁷⁰. According to this, it is sufficient to prove that the intervention may have prevented the ¹⁶⁰ See Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 98, para. 371 and Delalić (Appeals Chamber Judgement), note 104, para. 736: ‘proof of active participation by a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates adds to the gravity of the superior’s failure to prevent or punish those acts and may therefore aggravate the sentence’.

¹⁶¹ See Triffterer (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179, 188.

¹⁶² See Čelebici (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 383 et seq. Rogers, Law on the battlefield (1996); Bantekas (1999) 93 AJIL 577, 590. By indirect intent he means dolus eventualis, i.e. those circumstances in which the prosecuted has no willful intent to perpetrate the acts but nevertheless fails to take preventive measures notwithstanding the knowledge of the risk. On the issue of negligence, see Čelebici (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, paras. 328 and 392 and Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para. 489 and Musema (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 97, para. 131, indicating that negligence may be a basis for prosecuting where this is so serious that is tantamount to acquiescence or even malicious intent.

¹⁶³ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 423, fn 550; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 215.

¹⁶⁴ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, paras. 423–424, citing Triffterer and Ambos in FN 551; see also Cryer, Prosecuting International Crimes, Selectivity and the International Criminal Law Regime (2005) 325; Moloto (2009) 3 BJILP 12, 21.

¹⁶⁵ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para 424, with reference to ICTY, ICTY, Prosecutor v. Halilović, IT-01-48-T, ‘Judgment’, 16 November 2005, para. 96; Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-A, ‘Appeals Chamber Judgment’, 22 April 2008, para. 267.

¹⁶⁶ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 424; ICTY, Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-A, ‘Appeals Chamber Judgment’, 22 April 2008, para. 267.

¹⁶⁷ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 425. On this aspect see also Trechsel (2009) 3 BJILP 26, 29–30, who is against a separate element of causality.

¹⁶⁸ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para 425.

¹⁶⁹ See Stratenwerth, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I: Die Straftat (1996) 156; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, (2013) 215; Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 721–2.

¹⁷⁰ See the 2nd edition of this Commentary to article 28 ICC Statute, para 109 et seq.; Čelebici (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 3, para. 399.

commission of the crime, i.e. that the commander's inaction increased the risk of the commission of the subordinates' crimes¹⁷¹.

Alternatively one may argue for the application of the – stricter – probability test¹⁷², according to which a crime can only be imputed if the intervention would most likely have prevented its occurrence¹⁷³. These questions become particularly relevant when there has been a change in command. According to some, a former commander should only be responsible if a novus actus interveniens cannot be established and if the breaches would not have occurred but for his failure to control his men¹⁷⁴. In the Oric Case, the ICTY¹⁷⁵ stated that for a superior's duty to punish, it should be immaterial whether he had assumed control over the relevant subordinates prior to their committing the crime. However, since it was bound by the precedent set in the *Hadžihasanović Appeal Case*¹⁷⁶, the Oric Trial Chamber followed the view that the superior must have had control over the perpetrators both at the time of its commission and at the time that measures to punish were to be taken¹⁷⁷. In Trechsel's view, the discussion about the applicable test for hypothetical causality is superfluous, in that the text of article 28 requires no causal nexus at all. It is not necessary to establish whether, in the specific case, the necessary and reasonable measures that a commander is supposed to have taken would have actually prevented the crimes. In his view, the commander is not responsible the fact of not having prevented the crimes, but only for not taking all necessary and reasonable measures within his power to prevent or repress their commission. Otherwise, if causality were required as a separate element, the text of article 28 ICC Statute should have read 'failed to prevent...'¹⁷⁸. Thus, in Trechsel's view, a commander who fails to punish those subordinates that perpetrated international crimes prior to the change of command is to be held liable. The argument that a superior should be liable for his dereliction of duty, regardless of whether he contributed to the commission of the underlying crimes, can be at best explained with the theory of inchoate endangerment¹⁷⁹. An analogy can be drawn to the crime of incitement to genocide (article 25 (3)(e), 6 ICC Statute).

In sum, the ICC jurisprudence suggests that with regard to the ex post facto failure to punish or report the crimes the requirement of causality is not a separate element of the doctrine of superior responsibility. Whether this also holds true with regard to the failure to prevent the crimes, is, as mentioned, controversial. 110

dd) Accountability. As already mentioned, a superior shall be held liable only where he (in addition to failure to control properly) failed to comply with his duty to take all possible measures to prevent the commission of a crime that he had or should have had knowledge of, or where he failed to report the facts to the competent authorities. 111

¹⁷¹ See Stratenwerth, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I: Die Straftat (1996) 43. See for example the Swiss Supreme Court decisions BGE 101 IV 152, BGE 108 IV 7 et seq.

¹⁷² See Noll and Trechsel, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I (2004) at 252 et seq.

¹⁷³ See Noll and Trechsel, Schweizerisches Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil I (2004) 252 et seq. According to Ambos, this is ultimately a policy issue: Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I (2013) 215.

¹⁷⁴ See Bantekas (1999) 93 AJIL 577, 590.

¹⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Naser Orić, IT-03-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 335.

¹⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, 16 July 2003, paras. 40ss.

¹⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Naser Orić, IT-03-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 336. Depending on the standard, various degrees of liability may come into play. For instance, according to Bantekas, a former commander may be held responsible only if a novus actus interveniens cannot be established and if the breaches would not have occurred but for his failure to control his men. This position would seem to follow the probability theory test. See Bantekas (1999) 93 AJIL 577, 590.

¹⁷⁸ Trechsel (2009) 3 BJILP 26, 29–30; Prosecutor v. Orić, IT-03-68-T, Judgment, 30 June 2006, § 338; Different opinion: Ambos (2007) 5 JICJ 159, 178; Mettraux, The law of command responsibility (2009) 82; Moloto, (2009) 3 BJILP 12.

¹⁷⁹ See mn 92.

A particular case is the responsibility of a superior for acts committed prior to becoming the superior of the perpetrator. This issue arose in the *Hadzihasanovic Case*¹⁸⁰. Amir Kubara was charged with command responsibility for, inter alia, the Dusina killings in the Zenica municipality and the destruction and plunder of property in January 1993. Kubara, however, had only taken up his position as acting commander of the 7th Muslim Mountain Brigade of the Bosnian Army 3rd Corps on 1 April 1993. The Trial Chamber held that command responsibility did arise in the case of a superior who assumed command after the events mentioned in the indictment, even though it would be a matter of degree as to when liability attached, depending partly on the length of time that had elapsed between the events and the assumption of command. Where the crimes came to knowledge only after the change of command, it would not be possible to proceed against the original commander if he had had no reason to know that they were being or had been committed by subordinates. In this case, Kubara's liability to take action ceased on his relinquishment of command but, on the Defence reading of the case, would not be transferred to the new superior. The Appeals Chamber observed that there was no practice or opinio juris to support the view that a commander can be held responsible for crimes committed by a subordinate prior to his/her assumption of command. Dissenting Judge Hunt, however, referred to the Kordic judgment where the Trial Chamber said, albeit obiter:

'Persons who assume command after the commission [of the crime] are under the same duty to punish'¹⁸¹.

112 As observed by Charles Garraway, although the majority in the Hadzihasanovic opinion pointed out that responsibility is limited to the commander who 'knew, or had information which should have enabled [the commander] to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that [the subordinate] was committing or was going to commit [a crime]'¹⁸², this does not mean that commanders who discover crimes after the event are not to be held responsible at all¹⁸³. However, a link must be established, so that the commander shall not be subject to strict liability and should incur responsibility only where he/she had power to intervene and failed to do so.

113 c) Mental element: intent and knowledge. There are three mental elements mentioned under article 28 Rome Statute:

- the commander shall have either known or should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes;
- the commander must have failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities
- the commander must have consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes;

Article 30 is a default rule defining the mental elements of crime which apply unless otherwise provided in the ICC Statute. Pursuant to article 25 para. 3, principal perpetrators and accomplices can only be held accountable when acting intentionally. The intent of the accomplice shall moreover encompass the mens rea of the principal perpetrator. Pursuant to article 28 Rome Statute, negligence shall lead to liability. It shall apply as a lex specialis in relation to article 30.

¹⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović, Alagić and Kubura, IT-01-47-PT, Interlocutory Appeal on Decision on Joint Challenge to Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 27. Nov. 2002. On this see Garraway, in: Arnold and Hildbrand (eds.), International Humanitarian Law and the 21st Century's Conflicts: Changes and Challenges (2005), at 126.

¹⁸¹ Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt to Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović, Alagić and Kubura, IT-01-47-AR72, Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, Appeals Chamber, 16. Jul. 2003, para. 23, quoting from para. 446 of the Judgment delivered in Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99.

¹⁸² See the majority opinion to Hadžihasanović, Alagić and Kubura (Appeals Chamber Interlocutory Appeal), note 181, para. 47.

¹⁸³ Garraway, in: Arnold and Hildbrand, International Humanitarian Law and the 21st Century's Conflicts – Changes and Challenges (2005) 117, 134.

Unlike the principal perpetrator or the accomplice, the superior does not have to know all the details of the crimes planned to be committed. It is sufficient that he believed that one or more of his subordinates may commit one or more crimes encompassed by the ICC Statute. If command responsibility, under article 28 ICC Statute, is to be understood as a separate offence punishing the author's disregard of his or her duties as commander, it follows that a detailed knowledge of the crimes planned by the subordinates on his part is unnecessary.

The 'knew' or 'should have known' element is particular in that it requires only one of the two component elements of the mens rea, i. e. the intentional and knowledge sides, as known to civil law systems. It is not necessary that the superior shared the intent of the principal perpetrator. Mere knowledge, or failure to acquire knowledge where this would have been required by the circumstances, is per se enough. This kind of failure to acquire knowledge may constitute either unconscious negligence or conscious negligence, i. e. recklessness, too.

Failure to take all necessary measures may further be classified into an intentional or unintentional (negligent) act. However, as observed by Triffterer, if the superior intentionally decides to remain passive, he may fulfil one of the criteria of article 25 para. 3, such as e. g. subpara (c) on assistance to a crime, and thus become liable as a direct participant¹⁸⁴. This may be the case, e. g., where passivity expresses a psychological support to the subordinates. This problem was raised by the ICTY in the Kordić and Blaškić cases¹⁸⁵.

4. Failure 'to take all necessary and reasonable measures'

a) '[K]new or should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes'. In the Bemba Case, the ICC reiterated that the Rome Statute does not endorse the concept of strict liability and that the suspect must have had knowledge of or should have known that his forces were about to engage or were engaging or had engaged in a conduct constituting the underlying crimes. Two standards of fault element are encompassed by Art. 28: the first, which is 'encapsulated' by the term 'known', requires the existence of actual knowledge. This, however, cannot be presumed. In determining when actual knowledge exists, the ICC referred to the criteria established by the jurisprudence of the UN ad hoc tribunals. These include the number of illegal acts, their scope, whether their occurrence is widespread, the time during which the prohibited acts took place, the type and number of forces involved, the means of available communication, the modus operandi of similar acts, the scope and nature of the superior's position and responsibility in the hierarchal structure, the location of the commander at the time and the geographical location of the acts.¹⁸⁶ According to the ICC, actual knowledge may be also proven a priori, a military commander is part of an organized structure with established reporting and monitoring systems. The second, covered by the term 'should have known', requires instead the superior to have merely been negligent in failing to acquire knowledge of his subordinates' illegal conduct.¹⁸⁷ Interestingly, the ICC's Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that this standard 'requires more of an active duty on the part of the superior to take the necessary measures to secure knowledge of the conduct of his troops and to inquire, regardless of the availability of information at the time on the commission of the crime'.¹⁸⁸ On the basis of the drafting history of this provision, the Pre-Trial Chamber went on to state that the intent was to take a more stringent approach towards commanders and military-like commanders compared to other superiors, an approach 'justified by the nature and type of responsibility assigned to this category of superiors'¹⁸⁹. It then concluded that the 'should have known standard' is different from the 'had reason to know' criterion embodied in the statutes of the ICTR, ICTY

¹⁸⁴ Triffterer (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179, 247.

¹⁸⁵ See Nybondas (2003) 59 NethILRev 1, 72 et seq.

¹⁸⁶ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 430.

¹⁸⁷ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 427/432.

¹⁸⁸ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 433.

¹⁸⁹ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 433.

and SCSL. However, it did not deem it necessary to address the differences in that decision and held that the indicia used by the ad hoc tribunals to meet the ‘had reason to know’ standard may also be useful when applying the ‘should have known’ requirement¹⁹⁰. The question, thus, still remains open as to whether, ultimately, the two standards are really to be interpreted differently. While awaiting for a clarification from the ICC jurisprudence, the suggested way to interpret this provision is in light of the UN ad hoc tribunals. It follows, as previously mentioned, that a superior can no longer be held responsible for having failed to search for information allowing him to become aware of the possibility of crimes being committed by his/her subordinates. However, responsibility will be imputed to him where, owing to the circumstances, he/she should have known that his/her forces were committing or about to commit such crimes.

117 b) Dereliction of duty and power to react. Although recent jurisprudence, like the Hadzihasanovic Judgment, seems to blur direct individual responsibility (article 25) with superior responsibility (article 28), it should be recalled that the latter’s underlying idea is that a superior shall be liable for having failed to exercise his duty to properly supervise his subordinates: the ‘criminal’ conduct is the dereliction of this duty, assuming the commander’s power to intervene. This additional requirement is important to avoid strict liability. The failure to intervene is not to be confused with participation in the underlying crimes. This was confirmed in the Bemba case, in which the ICC’s Pre-Trial Chamber additionally observed that there are three duties that need to be discharged by a superior: duty to prevent, to repress and to report. A failure to properly discharge the first duty cannot be cured by fulfilling the other two.¹⁹¹ 119 bb) ‘[T]o prevent or repress ... or to submit’. If the underlying crime is only at its initial stage, i. e. it is merely being attempted, the superior has the duty to intervene to impede it. Alternatively, where it has already been committed and it is too late to prevent it, the commander shall take measures to repress it. The superior shall remark to the other subordinates that such conduct was wrong, thereby interrupting a possible ‘chain effect’. If a superior lack the power to take disciplinary measures or where these appear to be insufficiently severe – which shall always be the case with regard to the crimes outlawed by the ICC Statute – he shall submit the case to the competent authorities.

118 c) Measures needed to avoid or to compensate ‘the result of’ the ‘failure to exercise control properly’. aa) Dependence on the stage of the commission. What measures shall be taken by a commander? This depends on the stage of the commission of the crimes. The attempt by the subordinates to commit a crime shall be sufficient to trigger command responsibility¹⁹².

In assessing the appropriate conduct in preventing the crimes, the ICC’s Pre-Trial Chamber considers it appropriate to be guided by relevant factors such as measures: (i) to ensure that superior’s forces are adequately trained in International Humanitarian Law; (ii) to secure reports that military actions were carried out in accordance with international law; (iii) to issue orders aiming at bringing the relevant practices into accord with the rules of war; (iv) to take disciplinary measures to prevent the commission of atrocities by the troops under the superior’s command.¹⁹³

¹⁹⁰ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 434. For an analysis of the jurisprudence of the ICTY on the indicia suggesting knowledge, see Maugeri, La responsabilità da comando nello Statuto della Corte Penale Internazionale (2007) 395 et seq. In Prof. Ambos’ view, both the had reason to know and the should have known standards essentially constitute negligence standards: ‘If one really wants to read a difference in these two standards considering that the ‘should have known’ standard ‘goes one step below’ the ‘had reason to know’ standard, it would be the ICC’s task to employ a restrictive interpretation which brings the former standard in line with the latter.’ (Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 722).

¹⁹¹ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, paras. 436. and 405. For a critical position see Ambos (2009) (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 721.

¹⁹² Arnold and Wehrenberg (2013) 2 MLLWR 27, 30.

¹⁹³ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 438.

With regard to the duty to repress, in Bemba the ICC stated that this encompasses two separate duties arising at two different stages: First, the duty to repress includes a duty to stop ongoing crimes from continuing to be committed, in order to ‘interrupt a possible chain effect, which may lead to other similar events’. Second, the duty to repress encompasses an obligation to punish forces after the commission of crimes.¹⁹⁴

The duty to punish, instead, which is a part of the duty to repress, may be fulfilled by the superior taking the necessary and reasonable measures to punish his forces, or, if he does not have the ability to do so, by referring the matter to the competent authorities. Thus, it constitutes an alternative to the third duty, i.e. the duty to submit the matter to the competent Authorities¹⁹⁵.

aaa) ex post or ex ante evaluation? – The objective comparable commander ‘in the situation at the time’, article 87 para. 2 Add. Prot. I. It would be too simplistic to judge a situation, in particular the possibility of intervention of a commander, ex post. A commander’s position and possibility to intervene shall rather be assessed on the basis of what any commander, in such a situation, would have objectively done at the time of the facts. 120 bbb) Hypothetical causation. Causation is hypothetical insofar as the question that needs to be assessed is whether, in the hypothesis that the commander had intervened to prevent the occurrence of crimes, the crimes would have been prevented or whether they would have nonetheless occurred. Reference can be made to what has been said previously in relation to the probability and risk aggravation theories. 121

d) Threshold of unreasonable demands? In some situations, a commander may have little power to intervene. For this reason it is always important not to confuse moral with legal obligations. A practical difficulty may, for example, be the rigidity of the chain of command. A middle officer in charge of subordinates who have committed a crime may have to refer the case to a commander – without the guarantee that the case will be considered any further – without having the chance to report it directly to the judicial military authorities. However, in this case, the mere fact of having reported the occurrences to the competent superior shall exempt him from liability.¹⁹⁶ In some cases, however, even this possibility may be precluded. In the Krstić Case, e.g., the Appeal’s Chamber of the ICTY held that the accused, in his position as a commander, would not have been able to prevent or punish because his superiors were involved ‘in the plot’.¹⁹⁷ 122

In Krnojelac, the ICTY held that an analogous situation may occur to a commander charged with crimes against humanity, which require a widespread and systematic attack, meaning that the top of the hierarchy is also very likely to be involved, thus making it very difficult for anyone in a middle position to do anything. It is therefore very important to understand what kind of commanding position was held by the accused, what his de facto and legal powers to intervene were.¹⁹⁸

III. Paragraph (b)

1. ‘[S]uperior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a)’

Paragraph (a) refers to military or quasi-military relationships in which persons exercise command over forces. However, the recent occurrences in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia raised awareness about the fact that in some cases civilians – who are not de facto enrolled in the military – may exercise a similar authority over forces, in which case they should incur 123

¹⁹⁴ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para 439.

¹⁹⁵ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 440.

¹⁹⁶ Nybondas (2003) 59 NethILRev 1, 170; Arnold (2013) 11 JICJ 943–951.

¹⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Krstić, IT-98-33-A, Appeals Chamber, Judgment, 19 April 2004, para. 143, fn. 250.

¹⁹⁸ Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Trial Chamber, Judgment, 15 March 2002, para. 127.

a responsibility similar to that of military commanders. Reference is made in particular to non-military members of governments, political parties, or business companies¹⁹⁹.

2. Subsidiarity based on a different notion of ‘relationship’ and ‘effective authority and control’

124 Paragraph (b) is subsidiary to paragraph (a). Therefore, it only comes into play where a hierarchy of a military or quasi-military nature cannot be established. The essence is that the superior shall have de jure or de facto authority enabling him to control his subordinates. In Akayesu the Trial Chamber of the ICTR confirmed the applicability of the doctrine of command responsibility to non-international conflicts and its extension to civilians holding de facto positions of authority²⁰⁰.

125 However, the assessment – and the underlying criteria – of whether someone is to be considered as exercising a military or a quasi-military function, or whether he has civilian status, is a matter that will have to be assessed by the ICC’s jurisprudence. In the Kordić Case, the Trial Chamber concluded that the accused could not be considered a military commander because:

‘while he played an important role in military matters, even at times issuing orders, and exercising authority over HVO forces, he was, and remained throughout the indictment period, a civilian, who was not part of the formal command structure of the HVO’²⁰¹.

This motivation, however, is quite superficial. For the purposes of the ICTY Statute, the question whether someone was a military commander or a civilian exercising commanding functions may be less dramatic, since the knowledge requirement is the same. This, however, may have serious impacts under article 28 ICC Statute, since burden of responsibility of a civilian accused is much lower²⁰². Therefore, the assessment criteria under paragraph (b) of article 28 will have to be carefully developed by the ICC.

3. ‘[F]ailure to exercise control properly’

126 As reflected in article 86 Add. Prot I, a superior is under the duty to establish and maintain an effective reporting system to ensure the compliance of his/her subordinates with International Humanitarian Law in the course of their duties. However, under paragraph (b) a superior shall not be responsible for acts committed by subordinates which were not related to their work. If, e. g., the employees of a paint factory engage in genocidal activities beyond the working hours, it is unlikely that the factory manager would be regarded as liable under article 28.

4. Failure ‘to take all necessary and reasonable measures’

127 a) ‘[K]new or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes’. The mens rea threshold for civilian superiors was intentionally set below the standard applicable to military commanders. It was deemed that military commanders, because of their position within a strictly hierarchical and organised structure, would have far more possibilities to receive information on the conduct of their subordinates. For non-military commanders, therefore, it is necessary to establish:

- that information clearly indicating a significant risk that subordinates were committing or were about to commit offences existed;
- that this information was available to the superior, and ¹⁹⁹ Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire in the case of the Prosecutor v. Laurent Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-642-Red, Public redacted version of Prosecution’s final written submissions on the confirmation of charges proceedings, 1 May 2014, para. 26; Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 90, para. 409.

²⁰⁰ See, Akayesu, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para. 492.

²⁰¹ See Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgement), note 99, para. 838.

²⁰² See Nybondas, Command Responsibility and Its Applicability to Civilian Superiors (2010) 79.

- that the superior, while aware that such a category of information existed, declined to refer to the category of information;
- b) crimes concerning ‘activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior’.

b) Crimes concerning ‘activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior’. As mentioned, a civilian superior shall only be liable for activities that were within his effective responsibility and control. Therefore, a civilian superior shall not be held liable for the misconduct of subordinates that occurred beyond the working hours or which were not related to their working activities. As mentioned, the doctrine of command responsibility is based on the idea of the ‘guarantor position’ of the superior, which shall be limited to the sphere of his competences. To do otherwise would imply a collective punishment.

c) The objective comparable superior ‘in the situation at the time’. Further, the responsibility of civilian superiors shall be assessed ex ante, on the basis of ‘the situation at the time of occurrence of the facts’.

d) Threshold of reasonable demands? Civilian superiors, unlike military commanders, are unlikely to have disciplinary powers. Therefore, what can be reasonably expected from them, is the reporting of misconduct to the competent authorities. Dismissal may be the first step, although care should be taken in assuring that once the employee/subordinate has been dismissed, a criminal proceeding will be opened. This may hold true in particular for NGOs or other institutions engaged in peace support operations, often availing themselves of the support of private subcontractors. There have been cases reported of such subcontractors committing crimes. Very often the first consequence is immediate dismissal and repatriation, according to the employment contract. However, it should be assured that once repatriated the individual will be subject to a criminal investigation procedure.

C. Special remarks

I. Assisting in command responsibility, a participation in the crime committed by subordinates?

Command responsibility can only be incurred by persons holding authority over the principal perpetrator. Thus, someone may be a co-perpetrator under article 28 only if he also holds such authority. A perpetrator may in fact have several commanders in the same chain of command. Participation as ‘co-author’ is conceivable e.g. where a commander fails to report to his superior a subordinate’s misconduct and also his own superior, who is the next in the chain of command and who has also acquired knowledge of the facts, fails to investigate or report further the matter. In this case both commanders may incur liability under article 28. If instead a commander, who has acquired information revealing the commission of crimes by subordinates, asks another subordinate to destroy this information, the subordinate, who may not necessarily have authority over the primary perpetrator, may be liable directly and individually under article 25 for having actively supported him.

Any other kind of support to the primary perpetrator (instigation, assistance, or otherwise support, e.g. by assisting the commander in his failure to intervene) may also be performed without any particular qualification or guarantor position. In this case, however, the accomplice or instigator will be liable according to Article 25 (3) of the Statute.

II. Attempted command responsibility, an attempted crime within the jurisdiction of the Court?

133 Attempt can only be given in those cases where the perpetrator acts intentionally but, for some reasons, his conduct does not lead to the expected results.

With regard to attempt and command responsibility, therefore, two scenarios arise:

- a) the first concerns the situation where a commander ‘attempts’ to incur into liability under the doctrine of command responsibility;
- b) the second concerns the case where the primary perpetrator merely attempts to commit a crime, and the commander, without knowledge of the fact that the acts will not lead to any effects, fails to intervene.

The first case may be given where a commander is unwilling to either report or prevent a crime he has heard rumours about, and in the end it turns out that the subordinates never had any intention to commit a crime. In this case the commander has simply attempted to ‘cover’ his subordinates.

134 In the Germanique doctrine this would be defined as an impossible attempt (untauglicher Versuch/délit impossible, delitto impossibile), since the underlying offence was not even attempted. Command responsibility requires at least the attempted commission of an underlying crime by a subordinate. Mere failure to control the subordinates, without any initial phases of the occurrence of the crime (e.g. attempt), does not imply criminal liability. This is due to the fact that even though command responsibility is a sui generis, separate offence punishing a commander’s failure to discharge his duties, the gravity of the punishment under art. 28 ICC can only be justified when a nexus to international crimes is proven. Otherwise, as already discussed, alternative provisions may be those addressing the violation of military regulations providing for the duty to properly command and control. Thus, unless the crime has at least been attempted, the commander will not be liable, since command responsibility is a sui generis crime that is accessory to the commission of an underlying offence falling within the jurisdiction of the ICC. This qualification, however, does not mean that command responsibility is a form of participation in the underlying crime.

135 The second scenario exists where a commander who acquires knowledge of his subordinates’ plan to commit a war crime, decides not to intervene and, for external reasons, the conduct of his subordinates’ does not lead to the expected results. As under art. 28 ICC Statute command responsibility is accessory to the commission of an international crime by the subordinate(s), a commander failing to discharge his duties will only be liable if the underlying crime has been committed or, at least, attempted. Alternatively, the commander could arguably be held accountable for an attempted breach of art. 28 ICC Statute. The sui generis approach is supported by international jurisprudence and is to be welcomed, even though a systematic interpretation of art. 28 ICC would justify the (minority view) that this provision corresponds to a form of participation to the underlying offences. A similar conclusion can be reached in the event where the subordinate had a justification for the commission of the underlying crime, but the superior failed to intervene without being aware of the existence of this justification.²⁰³

III. Concurring responsibility?

1. Authorities in a hierarchial chain all failing to fulfil their duties

136 If there is more than one person responsible for the acts of a subordinate in the same chain of command, all of them may be individually responsible under article 28 ICC Statute.

²⁰³ See Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I(2013) 203.

2. Command responsibility and participation according to article 25

Yamashita was not being punished ‘for a separate offence of failure to control, but for the actual offences committed by his subordinates’²⁰⁴. This conclusion, however, was reached on the basis of a strict liability approach to the doctrine of command responsibility. In the Hadzihasanovic Case, judge Shahabuddeen observed, instead, that:

‘Command responsibility imposes responsibility on a commander for failure to take corrective action in respect of a crime committed by another; it does not make the commander party to the crime committed by that other’²⁰⁵.

As observed by Otto Triffterer:

‘The common chapeau for all alternatives contained in Article 28, explicitly mentions that superior responsibility for acts of their subordinates should be ‘in addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute.’ It therefore does not substitute, but supplements all forms of participation as listed in Article 25(3) sub a-f. Article 28 thus extends the scope of individual criminal responsibility for perpetrators in the position of superiors’²⁰⁶.

The question whether art. 28 ICC Statute should be considered as a sui generis crime or a sui generis form of participation was previously discussed. Prof. Triffterer’s view is legally correct in light of the text and context of art. 28 ICC Statute. However, if one considers the history of the doctrine of command responsibility and its aim and purpose, a preferred approach would be that of a sui generis crime. It remains to be seen what direction the ICC’s jurisprudence will take.

IV. The customary nature of the doctrine of command responsibility

Generally, the customary nature of the doctrine of command responsibility has been recognised both by the doctrine²⁰⁷ and by the international jurisprudence.²⁰⁸ Debates, however, still revolve around its applicability, out of custom, to military and non-military commanders within the framework of non-international armed conflicts (NIAC). In the Hadzihasanovic Case, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY concluded that the doctrine was applicable to NIAC on the basis of customary law pre-dating the coming into force of the two Additional Protocols of 1977 and that the latter had simply codified already existing customary law²⁰⁹. The AC added that ‘the non-reference in Protocol II to command responsibility in relation to internal armed conflicts did not necessarily affect the question whether command responsibility previously existed as part of customary international law relating to internal armed conflicts.’²¹⁰ With regard to the application of the doctrine to ²⁰⁴ See Greenwood (2004) 2 JICJ 598, 599.

²⁰⁵ Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen to Prosecutor v. Hadzihasanovic, Alagic and Kubura, IT-01-47-AR72 d, Decision, Appeals Chamber, Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, 16 Jul. 2003, para. 33.

²⁰⁶ See Triffterer (2002) 15 LeidenJIL 179, 186.

²⁰⁷ Ambos, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 844, 846–847; Fenrick, in: Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Observer’s notes, article by article (2008) 515, 516; Méttraux, The law of command responsibility (2009) 21–33. Rule 153 of the ICRC Study on Customary Law: Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law, Vol. II (2009) 3713 et seq.; Laucci, in: Fernandez and Paccreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale internationale, commentaire article par article (2012) 864, 871–872.

²⁰⁸ The Prosecutor v. Hadzihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, ‘Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility’, 16 July 2003; Appeals Chamber (Judges Meron [Presiding], Pocar, Shahabuddeen, Hunt and Gunëy), at para. 28; Čelebići (Trial Chamber Judgment), note 3, paras 354 et seq.

²⁰⁹ The Prosecutor v. Hadzihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, ‘Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility’, 16 July 2003; Appeals Chamber (Judges Meron [Presiding], Pocar, Shahabuddeen, Hunt and Gunëy).

²¹⁰ The Prosecutor v. Hadzihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, ‘Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility’, 16 July 2003; Appeals Chamber, para 28.

civilian superiors, in the Akayesu Case the Trial Chamber of the ICTR noted that already during the Tokyo trials, certain civilian authorities like Hirota, the former Foreign Minister of Japan, had been convicted of war crimes under this doctrine. The ICTR, after a thorough examination of the existing jurisprudence, concluded that in the application of the principle to civilians remained contentious, but that 'Against this background, the Chamber holds that it is appropriate to assess on a case by case basis the power of authority actually devolved upon the Accused in order to determine whether or not he had the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish the perpetrators thereof.'²¹¹ Ten years later, in the Celebici Case, the TC of the ICTY found that already the International Military Tribunal for the Far East had relied on this principle 'in making findings of guilt against a number of civilian political leaders charged with having deliberately and recklessly disregarded their legal duty to take adequate steps to secure the observance of the laws and customs of war and to prevent their breach.'²¹²

The question whether the doctrine of command responsibility could apply, out of custom to (a) international armed conflicts, and (b) to non-military commanders in the years prior to 1991, and in particular in the period between 1975–1979, was set in a motion of the defence team of Ieng Sary before the Cambodian EEEC.²¹³ The motion was taken to the Pre-Trial Chamber²¹⁴. In 2011 the Pre-Trial Chamber ruled on Ieng Sary and Ieng Thirith's appeals. It concluded that the doctrine of command responsibility was applicable to both military and civilian superiors during 1975–1979 and that it already formed part of customary law at the time. On this basis, according to the chamber, the accused could have sufficiently foreseen that criminal sanctions were going to be imposed on them for their conduct.²¹⁵

It can be concluded, thus, that article 28 ICC Statute is based on well-founded customary law, inasmuch it relates to the law applicable since the 1990s. Due to the temporal jurisdiction of the ICC, the Court will never be confronted with the question of the applicability of this doctrine to cases submitted to its judgment, since it will only address cases that occurred after the entry into force of the ICC Statute, that is at the earliest on or after 1 July 2002.

²¹¹ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para 491 <<http://www.unictr.org/Portals/0/Case/English/Akayesu/judgement/akay001.pdf>>.

²¹² Prosecutor v. Delalić, Mucić, Delić and Landžo, IT-96-21-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16. Nov. 1998, para. 357.

²¹³ See the Summary of IENG Sary's Appeal Against the OCIJ's Order on IENG Sary's Motion Against the Application of Command Responsibility of 13.10.2010 <<http://www.iengsarydefence.org/summary-of-ieng-sarys-appeal-against-the-ocijs-order-on-ieng-sarys-motion-against-the-application-of-command-responsibility.html>>.

²¹⁴ Ibid.

²¹⁵ Prosecutor v. Ieng Sary, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/OCIJ (PTC75), Decision on Ieng Sary's Appeal Against the Closing Order, 11 April 2011, paras. 20–21; Prosecution v. Ieng Thirith, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/OCIJ (PTC 145 & 146), Decision on Appeals by Nuon Chea and Ieng Thirith against the Closing Order, 15 February 2011, paras. 28–29. For a discussion see Abeyratne (2012) 44 GeoWashILRev 39, 44–45.

Article 29

Non-applicability of statute of limitations

The crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court shall not be subject to any statute of limitations.

Literature: Van den Wyngaert, C. and Dugard, J., 'Non-applicability of Statute of Limitations', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J. R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 873; Henckaerts, J.-M. and Doswald Beck, L., Customary International Humanitarian Law, Vol. I: Rules (2005) 614.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	4
C. Special remarks	7

A. Introduction/General remarks

The Rome Statute declares that the crimes within the Court's jurisdiction are not subject to a statute of limitations. None of the preceding international instruments concerned with international prosecution of atrocities, from the Charter of the International Military Tribunal to the statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, has contained anything similar. This is only logical, because in the absence of texts within the instruments creating a time bar, silence was all that was required. On the other hand, Control Council Law No. 10 stated that '[I]n any trial or prosecution for a crime herein referred to, the accused shall not be entitled to the benefits of any statute of limitation in respect of the period from 30 January 1933 to 1 July 1945'¹. Because Control Council Law No. 10 was applicable to national prosecutions within Germany, the provision was required in order to neutralize any alleged time bar to trials for Nazi-era crimes.

Many domestic criminal law systems provide for statutory limitation of crimes, even the most serious². Under French law, for example, prosecutions for murder are time barred after ten years³. Codes derived from the Napoleonic model generally have similar provisions. At trial, Eichmann pleaded that prosecution was time barred, but the argument was dismissed. Eichmann invoked a fifteen-year limitation period in force in Argentina. The District Court of Jerusalem ruled that Argentine norms could not apply, adding a reference to applicable Israeli legislation declaring that 'the rules of prescription ... shall not apply to offences under this Law'⁴. During the 1960s, as the application of statutory limitations in national penal codes to Nazi war criminals began to appear possible, there was a movement to amend rules by which such prosecutions could be time barred. Accordingly, there were changes to domestic legislation⁵. On an international level, these developments took the form of

¹ Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes Against Peace and Against Humanity, 20 Dec. 1945, Official Gazette Of The Control Council For Germany, No. 3, Berlin, 31 Jan. 1946, 50-55, article II (5).

² See: LaRosa, Dictionnaire de Droit International Pénal: Termes Choisis (1998) 50-52.

³ Penal Code (France), Article 7.

⁴ A. G. Israel v. Eichmann, (1968) 36 ILR 18 (District Court), para. 53.

⁵ Germany seems to have had a twenty-year limitation period on Nazi crimes not contemplated by Control Council Law No. 10. On 25 Mar. 1965 the Bundestag extended the limitation date for murder to 31 Dec. 1969, which was the twentieth anniversary of establishment of the German Federal Republic. But this was inadequate and the date was again extended until 31 Dec. 1979. On 3 July 1979 the Bundestag voted to eliminate any limitation date for murder. See: de Mildt, In the Name of the People: Perpetrators: Perpetrators of Genocide in the General Assembly resolutions⁶, and treaties within both the United Nations system⁷ and that of the Council of Europe⁸. Both instruments refer to the crime of genocide and to crimes against humanity as offences for which there shall be no statutory limitation.

- 3 The treaties have not been a great success in terms of signature and ratification; the United Nations instrument still has only forty-five States Parties. The low rate of adherence to the United Nations Convention has led some academics to contest the suggestion that this is a customary norm⁹. However, the French Cour de Cassation determined, in the Barbie case, that the prohibition on statutory limitations for crimes against humanity is now part of customary law¹⁰. Although the debates surrounding adoption of article 29 of the Rome Statute revealed a lack of unanimity on the subject, the final result is a clear demonstration of the Statute's contribution to the progressive development of international law.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

- 4 There was no reference to statutory limitation in the ILC Draft Statute that was submitted to the General Assembly in 1994¹¹. In the Ad Hoc Committee sessions of 1995, it became clear that the principle of the impermissibility of statutory limitations for crimes such as genocide and crimes against humanity was not universally accepted. Some delegations urged that the question be considered 'bearing in mind the importance of the legal principle involved, which reflected the decreasing social importance of bringing criminals to justice and the increasing difficulties in ensuring a fair trial as time elapsed'¹². In the first sessions of the Preparatory Committee, delegations expressed concern about the fairness of 'stale' prosecutions. The possibility that statutory limitations could apply to crimes that are less serious than the core offences of genocide and crimes against humanity was also evoked¹³. According to the 1996 report to the General Assembly, '[s]ome delegations suggested that, instead of establishing a rigid rule, the Prosecutor or the President should be given flexible power to make a determination on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the right of the accused to due process. It was suggested that an accused should be allowed to apply to the Court to terminate the proceedings on the basis of fairness, if there was lack of evidence owing to the passage of many years'¹⁴. One of the issues involved in addressing the matter was the general question of complementarity, in that States with statutory limitations on some or all of the crimes would find themselves 'unable' to prosecute after time had elapsed. A number of formal proposals before the Preparatory Committee contemplated some form of statutory limitation, either for certain specified treaty crimes or for the subject-matter

Reflection of Their Post-War Prosecution in West Germany (1996) 29–30; I. Müller, Hitler's Justice, the Courts of the Third Reich (1991) 243–249; Monson (1982) 30 AJIL 605; Triffterer (1980) NJW 2049 et seq.

⁶ GA Res. 3 (I); GA Res. 170 (II); GA Res. 2583 (XXIV); GA Res. 2712 (XXV); GA Res. 2840 (XXVI); GA Res. 3020 (XXVII); GA Res. 3074 (XXVIII).

⁷ Convention on the Non-applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity, 754 UNTS 73 (1970). See: Miller (1971) 65 AJIL 476.

⁸ European Convention on the Non Applicability of Statutory Limitation to Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes of January 25, 1974, ETS 82.

⁹ Ratner and Abrams, Accountability for Human Rights Atrocities in International Law, Beyond the Nuremberg Legacy (1997) 126.

¹⁰ Fédération nationale des déportés et internés résistants et patriotes et al. v. Barbie, (1984) 78 I.L.R. 125, 135. Also: France, Assemblée nationale, Rapport d'information déposé en application de l'article 145 du Règlement par la Mission d'information de la Commission de la défense nationale et des forces armées et de la Commission des affaires étrangères, sur les opérations militaires menées par la France, d'autres pays et l'ONU au Rwanda entre 1990 et 1994, p. 286 (1999).

¹¹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

¹² Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 127, p. 29.

¹³ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, paras. 195–196, p. 45.

¹⁴ Ibid., para. 196.

jurisdiction of the Court as a whole¹⁵. France argued for statutory limitation of ten or twenty years in the case of war crimes¹⁶. Interestingly, of the several draft proposals, non suggested that the statute simply be silent on the subject.

At the Rome Conference, the Working Group on General Principles opted for a text declaring the impermissibility of statutory limitation¹⁷. Testifying to the difficulty with the concept for some delegations, its report included a footnote:

Two delegations were of the view that there should be a statute of limitations for war crimes. One delegation agreed to the above text in a show of flexibility, but stressed that there should be a possibility not to proceed if, due to the time that has passed, a fair trial cannot be guaranteed. The question of statute of limitations will need to be revisited if treaty crimes are included. There must also be a special regime for crimes against the integrity of the Court. The absence of a statute of limitations for the Court raises an issue regarding the principle of complementarity given the possibility that a statute of limitations under national law may bar action by the national courts after the expiration of a certain time period, whereas the ICC would still be able to exercise jurisdiction¹⁸.

But the delegations did not object to the text being sent to the Drafting Committee¹⁹, and it was adopted unchanged in the final version.

C. Special remarks

In sentencing proceedings before the ad hoc tribunals it has been argued that the lapse of time between commission of the offence and imposition of penalty should be treated as a mitigating factor. In rejecting the argument, judges have referred to the prohibition on statutory limitation. For example, Trial Chamber 1 of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia wrote: 'For crimes of a seriousness justifying their exclusion from statutory limitation, the Trial Chamber considers that a lapse of time of almost twelve years between the commission of the crimes and sentencing proceedings is not so long as to be considered a factor for mitigation'²⁰.

The ad hoc tribunals have been required to consider statutory limitations as part of the process of referring cases to national courts, pursuant to Rule 11*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. For example, in referring a case to the court of Serbia, a Referral Bench of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia noted that article 95 para. 1, 1 (1) of the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia barred prosecution after twenty-five years. Accordingly, in the case under consideration, of which the alleged acts took place in December 1991, the offence would be time barred in 2016, a situation that the Referral Bench considered acceptable given the prospect of prompt trial within Serbia²¹.

Article 29 as adopted by the Rome Conference is unnecessary, at least to the extent it would be applied to trials before the Court for offences listed in article 5. Obviously, in the absence of a provision actually establishing statutory limitations, the silence of the Statute can only mean that there are no statutory limitations. This does not mean that article 29 is superfluous. Its role would appear to be part of the complex relationship between national and international judicial systems. The issue of statutory limitation arose when France was contemplating ratification of the Rome Statute. The French Conseil constitutionnel consid-

¹⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 88-89. Also: Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, pp. 24-26; Zutphen Draft, pp. 57-58; 'Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court', UN Doc. A/CONF.183/2/Add.2, pp. 62-64.

¹⁶ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.2, para. 47.

¹⁷ Ibid., paras. 45-74.

¹⁸ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPP/L.4, p. 4, fn. 7; UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPP/L.4/Corr. 1, fn. 7.

¹⁹ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C1/SR.8, paras. 76, 82.

²⁰ Prosecutor v. Mrđa, IT-02-59-S, Sentencing Judgment, 31 Mar. 2004, para. 104.

²¹ Prosecutor v. Kovačević, IT-01-42/2-I, Decision on Referral of Case Pursuant to Rule 11*bis*, 17 Nov. 2006, paras. 39, 42. Similarly, in a referral to Bosnia and Herzegovina: Prosecutor v. Stanković, IT-96-23/2-PT, Decision on Referral of Case Under Rule 11*bis*, 17 May 2005, para. 41.

ered that the complementarity provisions of the Rome Statute were incompatible with the French Constitution because they covered crimes that were subject to statutory limitation. According to the Conseil constitutionnel, ‘under the Statute, the International Criminal Court could be validly seized on the grounds of an amnesty statute or internal rules on limitation; in such a case, France, even if a State were neither unwell not unable to act, might be required to arrest and surrender to the Court a person accused of conduct covered by an amnesty or limitation period in French law...’²². The result was an amendment to the Constitution: ‘La République peut reconnaître la juridiction de la Cour pénale internationale dans les conditions prévues par le traité signé le 18 juillet 1998’²³.

- 8 There is ample precedent for States refusing to extradite offenders where crimes are time barred under their own legislation. Many extradition treaties provide explicitly for such an exception. This issue was certainly a live one in the preparatory discussions of the *Rome Statute*²⁴. Consequently, at the very least article 29 operates as an answer to any argument from a State Party whereby extradition might be refused because of a statutory limitation in its own domestic penal code.

A literal reading of article 29 leads to an intriguing result, although one that does not appear in the published record of the travaux préparatoires and may not have been contemplated by the drafters. To the extent that the Statute does more than simply create a court, and actually imposes obligations on States, can it not be sustained that article 29 in effect constitutes a prohibition in the law of the States Parties on statutory limitations of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and aggression? A State Party to the Statute whose legislation allowed prosecutions of these crimes to become time barred would be in breach of the instrument. Certainly on a purely practical level, statutory limitations in national law will be unable to shelter offenders. Should the national courts grant exceptions based on statutory limitation, the complementarity provisions of the Statute will grant the ICC jurisdiction. A State Party which allowed such an obstacle to a prosecution would, in effect, concede jurisdiction to the ICC. When States undertake revisions of their legislation as part of the process of accession to or ratification of the Statute, they should be advised to eliminate provisions that are incompatible with article 29. In most States, judges might even apply article 29 directly in order to supersede contrary penal legislation.

²² Décision n° 98–408 DC du 22 janvier 1999, para. 34. Translation available on the website of the Conseil constitutionnel at <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/langues/anglais/a98408dc.pdf>, cited in Barrat, in: Lee (ed.), State’s Responses to Issues Arising from the ICC Statute: Constitutional, Sovereignty, Judicial Cooperation and Criminal Law (2005) 60.

²³ Loi constitutionnelle n°99–568 du 8 juillet 1999 (article 52 para. 2).

²⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 13, para. 324, p. 68.

Article 30 Mental element

1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.
2. For the purposes of this article, a person has intent where:
 - (a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct;
 - (b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.
3. For the purposes of this article, ‘knowledge’ means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. ‘Know’ and ‘knowingly’ shall be construed accordingly.

Literature: Ambos, K., ‘Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision’, (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715; Badar, M. E., ‘Dolus Eventualis and the Rome Statute Without It?’, (2009) 12 NCLRev 433; id., ‘Mens rea – Mistake of Law & Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunals’, (2005) 5 ICLRev 203; Clark, R.S., ‘The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Crime’, (2001) 12 CLF 291; id., ‘Elements of Crimes in Early Confirmation Decisions of Pre-Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Court’, (2008) 6 NZYbilL 209; Eser, A., ‘Mental Elements – Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law’, in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 889; Kelt, M. and von Hebel, H., ‘General Principles of Criminal Law and the Elements of Crimes’, in: R.S. Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure (Transnational 2001); Triffterer, O., ‘The new International Criminal Law – Its General Principles establishing Individual Criminal Responsibility’, in: K. Koufa (ed.), Thesaurus Acroasium, The new International Criminal Law 639, xxxii (Sakkoulas 2003) 639; id., ‘“Command Responsibility” – crimen sui generis or participation as ‘otherwise provided’ in Article 28 Rome Statute?’, in: J. Arnold et al. (eds.), Menschengerechtes Strafrecht, Festschrift für Albin Eser zum 70. Geburtstag (CH Beck 2005) 91; Saland, P., ‘International Criminal Law Principles’ in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (Kluwer Law International 1999) 189; Smith, J.C. and Hogan, B., Criminal Law (Butterworths 4th edition 1978); Roxin, C., Strafverfahrensrecht (CH Beck 25th edition 1998); Weigend, T., ‘Intent, Mistake of Law, and Co-perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on Confirmation Charges’, (2008) 6 JICJ 471.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
1. Historical development	1
2. Purpose.....	2
3. Scope	3
4. Protected values	4
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	5
I. Paragraph 1	5
1. ‘criminally responsible and liable for punishment’	5
2. ‘material elements’	6
3. ‘committed’	7
4. ‘intent and knowledge’	9
5. ‘Unless otherwise provided’	14
II. Paragraph 2	16
1. ‘For the purposes of this article’	16
III. Sub-paragraph 2 (a).....	17
1. ‘conduct’	17
2. ‘means to engage in the conduct’	19
IV. Sub-paragraph 2 (b).....	20
1. ‘consequence’	20
2. ‘means to cause that consequence’	21
3. ‘aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events’	22
V. Paragraph 3	24
1. ‘For the purposes of this article’	24
2. ‘awareness that a circumstance exists’	25
3. ‘awareness that...a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events’	27

A. Introduction/General remarks*

1. Historical development

- 1 The Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, contained in the Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session, did not contain a provision concerning mental elements nor moral culpability¹. In its 1995 Report, the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court noted that many delegations expressed support for the inclusion in the Statute of provisions on general principles of criminal law, including provisions on *mens rea*². During the sessions in 1996 of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, a number of proposals were made regarding the insertion of a set of general principles, which included various proposals concerning mens rea or mental elements³. These proposals included provisions similar to those finally adopted by the Rome Conference, as well as proposals concerning other possible mental elements, such as specific intent, wilful blindness, recklessness and dolus eventualis. These proposals were further discussed by the Preparatory Committee at its session in February 1997 and a number of decisions were taken⁴, which resulted in a draft provision of narrower scope that was very similar to that finally adopted by the Rome Conference in 1998⁵.

2. Purpose

- 2 A general view was expressed in the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court that ‘since there could be no criminal responsibility unless mens rea was proved, an explicit provision setting out all the elements involved should be included in the Statute’⁶. A clear understanding of the general legal framework in which the court would operate was important for the Court, States Parties and the accused so as to provide guidance, predictability and certainty, and to promote consistent jurisprudence on fundamental questions, including the issue of moral culpability or *mens rea*⁷.

3. Scope

- 3 Despite the desire of the Preparatory Committee that all the mental elements should be set out in the Statute, these elements are not defined in one article. Article 30 only refers specifically to ‘intent’ and ‘knowledge’. With respect to other mental elements, such as certain forms of ‘recklessness’ and ‘dolus eventualis’, consensus could not be achieved on their definition nor on their appropriateness for general application in the Statute. It was

* The assistance of Greg Koster, Department of Justice (Canada) and Steve Taylor, Queen’s University Faculty of Law (Canada), is gratefully acknowledged.

¹ Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 49th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/49/10 (1994); see also Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291, 296–297.

² Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995), p. 19; see also Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291, 297.

³ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Vol. II, Compilation of Proposals, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), p. 92–93; see also Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291, 299.

⁴ Decisions Taken by the Preparatory Committee at its Session Held from 11 to 21 February 1997, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1997/L.9/Rev.1, p. 25.

⁵ For an account of the history of the negotiations on article 30, see: Saland, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, the Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999) 189; Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291, 295–316.

⁶ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Vol. I, Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee during March-April and August 1996, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), p. 45.

⁷ Ad Hoc Committee Report, note 2, p. 19.

decided to leave the incorporation of such mental states of culpability in specific definitions or modes of responsibility, if and where their incorporation was required by the negotiations or by applicable law⁸. Accordingly, the opening words of paragraph 1 of article 30 ('Unless otherwise provided'), recognise that mental elements might also be provided elsewhere. Examples of other relevant mental elements may be found within the specific definition of crimes⁹, general principles of criminal law¹⁰, and in the Elements of Crimes¹¹. As will be discussed below, the drafters concluded, and early case law confirms, that the Elements of Crimes may specify different mental elements, provided that these are consistent with the Statute and applicable law¹².

Paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 30 provide definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge'. These provisions describe the meaning of these terms and the degree of mental culpability or mens rea that is required. For example, in order to intend conduct, a person must 'mean' to engage in conduct; it is not sufficient if the conduct was brought about inadvertently. To know of a circumstance means to have 'awareness' that it exists; mere suspicion is not sufficient (unless it amounts to wilful blindness or some other high degree of awareness or advertence to the existence of the circumstance).

Paragraph 1 of article 30 applies these definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' to the material elements of the definitions of crimes in the Statute. The exact scope of this application, however, has to be inferred for each crime depending on the specific material elements set out in the definition of the crime and in light of the proviso to paragraph 1 ('Unless otherwise provided'), and paragraph 2 ('For the purposes of this article').

4. Protected values

Many legal historians are of the view that prior to the twelfth century a person could be held criminally liable merely if the person's conduct caused harm, regardless of any blameworthy state of mind. For example, in the common law and civil law traditions, it was under the influence of Canon law and Roman law that a requirement for some element of moral blameworthiness – a guilty mind – was imposed by the courts. This requirement has been expressed in the Latin maxim *actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea*¹³. It is now a basic requirement common to contemporary legal systems.¹⁴

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. 'criminally responsible and liable for punishment'

The modes of commission and of participation by which a person shall be 'criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' are outlined in article 25 para. 3. These various modes of criminal responsibility (such as 'commits', 'orders, solicits or induces', 'aids, abets, or otherwise assists', 'in any other way

⁸ See Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291, 299–303.

⁹ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (a) ('wilful' or 'wilfully').

¹⁰ See e.g. article 25 para. 3 (d) (i) ('with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group'); article 28 lit. a (i) ('knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known'); article 28, lit. b (i) ('knew, or consciously disregarded').

¹¹ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) ('should have known' that the child was under the age of 15 in the elements for child soldier provision).

¹² See e.g. Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 29 Jan. 2007, para. 356 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>; see also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 30 Sep. 2008, para. 532 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/67a9ec/>>.

¹³ Translation: 'An act does not make a person guilty of a crime, unless the person's mind be also guilty'.

¹⁴ Ambos, K., Treatise On International Criminal Law (OUP 2014) 93–95.

contributes to the commission', 'incites' and 'attempts') must, by virtue of article 30, be committed with intent and knowledge in order for a person to be criminally responsible and liable for punishment. Despite the apparent assertion in article 25 that a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment if the person's conduct falls within any of the subparagraphs of paragraph 3 of that article, the conditions of article 30 must also be fulfilled in order to attach to that person any criminal responsibility and liability for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. This is in accord with the Latin legal maxim: 'actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea'¹⁵.

Early jurisprudence of the Court has explored the relationship between Article 25 and 30. For example, Pre-Trial Chamber I, in declining to confirm charges in the Mbarushimana case, held that for an 'intentional contribution' under Article 25(3)(d), the person must mean to engage in the contributing conduct and be aware that his or her conduct contributes to the activities of the group¹⁶.

2. 'material elements'

- 6 The 'material elements' of a crime refer to the non-mental elements of the definition of the crimes as defined in articles 5 to 8. This term refers to the conduct described in the definition, any consequences that may be specified in addition to the conduct, and any circumstances that must exist¹⁷. This is confirmed by paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 30, which define the meaning of 'intent' or 'knowledge'¹⁸ with respect to each of 'conduct', 'consequences' and 'circumstances'¹⁹. Although previous drafts had used the term 'physical elements', the term was changed in the Drafting Committee of the Rome Conference to 'material elements' in order to better reflect and connote that conduct, consequences and circumstances may not always be 'physical' in character²⁰.

The conduct of a crime includes a prohibited action²¹ or prohibited omission²² that is described in the definition of a crime²³. The consequences of a crime can refer either to a ¹⁵ See translation, note 13.

¹⁶ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, No. ICC 01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 16 Dec. 2011, para. 288; see also Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2482, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, TC I, 14 Mar. 2012, paras. 986–987 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>.

¹⁷ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (x), which defines a crime that contains all three types of material elements: conduct ('subjecting persons...to physical mutilation or to medical or scientific experiments'); circumstances ('who are in the power of an adverse power') and consequences ('which cause death to or seriously endanger the health of such person or persons').

¹⁸ Prosecutor v. Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain and Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus, No. ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, Corrigendum of the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 7 Mar. 2011, para. 153.

¹⁹ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, No. ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC II, 15 June 2009, para. 355 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/07965c/>>.

²⁰ E.g. in the Statute 'conduct' sometimes refers to an omission (e.g., failure to do something), 'consequences' sometimes refers to a risk rather than a physical result (e.g., a risk of harm occurring), and 'circumstances' sometimes refers to a quality or value of a physical object or a situation (e.g., legal status of a person or a building, or degree of harm or deprivation). For specific examples, see the text accompanying notes 14 to 18.

Clark (2001) 12 CLF 299, 304–305, queries how the change from 'physical' to 'material' came about, and concludes that it did not convey a change of policy or substance by the Drafting Committee, but only a reflection of drafting consistency. The present author recalls that the change was made for stylistic and consistency reasons, as noted in the text above.

The Elements of Crimes followed this same approach to material elements (conduct, consequences and circumstances), often repeating the exact words of the Statute, and at other times adding elaborations from international instruments or jurisprudence, but they were not intended to alter the overall definition of the crime: see article 9 para. 3.

See also Clark (2008) 6 NZYBIL 209.

²¹ See e.g. article 6 ('killing', 'causing serious bodily or mental harm', 'inflicting...conditions of life', 'imposing measures' and 'forcibly transferring').

²² See e.g., article 28 lit. a (ii) and b (ii) ('failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures').

²³ For greater discussion of the meaning of 'conduct', see Part II, 1, below.

completed result, such as the causing of death²⁴, or the creation of a state of harm or risk of harm, such as endangerment²⁵. The circumstances of a crime qualify the conduct and consequences. They may, for example, describe the requisite features of the persons²⁶ or things²⁷ mentioned in the conduct and consequence elements.

There are four special types of material element that warrant particular comment.

First, some material elements have a 'legal' character: for example, requiring that a victim be a 'protected person' under the Geneva Conventions of 1949²⁸. Article 30 does not require proof that the accused knew the relevant law or that he or she correctly completed such a legal evaluation. Indeed, article 32 para. 2 affirms that a mistake of law as to the scope of the criminal prohibition is not a ground for excluding criminal responsibility²⁹. Accordingly, all that is required is that the accused knew the factual elements that established this legal character (for example, that the victim was affiliated with an adverse party)³⁰.

Second, some material elements involve a normative aspect, or a 'value judgment'. Examples include the requirement of 'serious' injury to body or health, 'severe' deprivation of physical liberty, or 'humiliating or degrading' treatment³¹. Such elements are similar to elements of a legal character, as it is not required to show that the accused correctly completed the normative evaluation. Otherwise, the accused's subjective opinions would determine whether a crime had been committed. For example, a perpetrator intentionally amputating the limbs of a victim can hardly escape liability by arguing that he did not consider the bodily harm to be 'serious'³². The Court must decide if the material element is satisfied (including whether the harm was 'serious'), and decide whether the perpetrator had the intent or awareness of the factual character establishing that 'seriousness' (in this case, amputating a limb). This rather obvious proposition accords with the approach of national legal systems³³, and is now confirmed in paragraph 4 of the General Introduction to the Elements, which provides that 'with respect to mental elements associated with elements involve value judgment ... it is not necessary that the perpetrator personally completed a particular value judgment, unless otherwise indicated'³⁴.

²⁴ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) (improper use of a flag of truce 'resulting in death or serious personal injury'); article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) (subjecting persons to physical mutilation or to medical or scientific experimentation 'which cause death to ... such person or persons').

²⁵ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) (subjecting persons to physical mutilation or to medical or scientific experimentation 'which...seriously endangers the health of such person or persons').

²⁶ E.g., that the victims who are killed must be 'members of the group' (article 6 (a)) or be 'combatants' (article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi)) or that the persons who are forcibly transferred must be 'children of the group' (article 6 (e)) or the persons who are compelled to take part in the operations of war must be 'nationals of the hostile party' (article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv)).

²⁷ E.g., that the attacks or bombardment must be directed against 'towns, villages, dwellings or buildings which are undefended and which are not military objectives' (article 8 para. 2 (b) (v)) or 'buildings dedicated to religion, education, art, science...' (article 8 para. 2 (b) (ix)).

²⁸ Article 8 para. 2 (a).

²⁹ An interesting question arises where the mistake of law is not related to the criminal prohibition itself, but another area of law. For example, a bona fide mistake as to the 'ownership' of particular property might negate the mental element for the crime of pillage: see article 32 para. 2.

³⁰ A possible deviation from this approach appears in the Elements of Crimes for article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) (improper use of a flag of truce), where the regulatory nature of these offences led delegations to include a requirement that the perpetrator 'knew or should have known of the prohibited nature of such use'.

³¹ Article 8 para. 2 (iii), article 7 para. 1 (e), and article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi), respectively. The demarcation between 'value judgments' and facts can depend on the circumstances; for example, an accused that had been indoctrinated in hate propaganda obviously could not escape liability by arguing that victims from a targeted minority were not considered to be 'persons'.

³² Article 6 (b) of the Statute.

³³ See e.g. a case of the Supreme Court of Canada, R. v. Finta (1994) 1 SCR 701 at 819 (accused must be aware of the facts or circumstances that bring the acts within the definition of a crime against humanity, but need not know that his actions were 'inhumane').

³⁴ Out of an abundance of caution, several provisions in the Elements nonetheless spell out the application of this principle to particular elements: see, e.g. article 7 para. 1 (k), element 3.

Third, some material elements contain an adjectival phrase using a term that sounds like a mental state. Examples include inflicting conditions of life ‘calculated’ to bring about the physical destruction of a group and imposing measures ‘intended’ to prevent births³⁵. Whether these hybrid elements are treated as mental elements or material elements may have a bearing on the determination of culpability³⁶. If what is required is proof that there was such a ‘calculation’ or ‘intent’, then arguably this requirement would be satisfied if it were shown that the accused so calculated or intended (i. e., mental element), or that there was a broader calculation or intent, for example, among the planners, or evident from the nature and scale of the acts (i. e., material element) and that the accused was aware of this material element.

Fourth, in the Elements of Crime some circumstance elements were identified as ‘contextual elements’, because they relate not to the conduct of the accused but rather to the broader ‘context’ that renders the crime an international crime. For war crimes, this is the existence of an armed conflict; for crimes against humanity, it is the widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population; and for genocide, it is the pattern of genocidal conduct³⁷. As will be explained below, reduced mental elements were considered appropriate for contextual elements³⁸.

Finally, in addition to the material elements of a particular offence, preconditions for the jurisdiction of the Court may also have to be proven where contentious³⁹, but neither the Statute nor any principle of international law require a mental element for such preconditions.

3. ‘committed’

7 The term ‘committed’ clearly refers to the mode of participation in crime that is described in sub-paragraph 3 (a) of article 25 (i. e., ‘commits such a crime’). The term, however, is also used generically in a broader sense and also includes all of the other modes of criminal responsibility described in article 25 sub-paras. 3 (b) to (f). This interpretation is supported by the discussion, above, of the term ‘criminally responsible and liable for punishment’.

8 For example, in the case of some modes of criminal responsibility in article 25 (such as inciting others to commit genocide or attempting to commit a crime), not all of the physical or material elements described in the definition of the crimes in articles 5–8 need actually be committed. Nevertheless, there is a form of ‘commission’ in respect of the material elements of the definition of a crime by a person who undertakes one of the modes of criminal responsibility described in article 25 paras. 3 (b) to (f), even if the actual intended, attempted or incited crime is not carried out or completed. Therefore, the term ‘committed’ refers to the commission of a material element of a crime by any of the modes of criminal responsibility described in article 25 (a) to (f).

4. ‘intent and knowledge’

9 Each of the terms ‘intent’ and ‘knowledge’ is specifically defined in paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 30, respectively (see below).

³⁵ Article 6 (c) and (d). See also the elements for article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii)-2 (war crime of biological experiments): ‘the intent of the experiment was non-therapeutic’ (emphasis added).

³⁶ See Kelt and von Hebel, in: R.S. Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure (2001) at 27.

³⁷ See para. 7 of the General Introduction to the Elements, and the final element of each crime.

³⁸ Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, No. ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, PTC I, 08 Feb. 2010, paras. 95–96 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cb3614/>>; Lubanga (PTC I Decision), note 15, para. 360.

³⁹ E.g., the location of the commission of a crime, the nationality of a perpetrator, the fact that a crime was committed after the entry into force of the Statute, or the fact that a particular event falls within the scope of a situation referred to the Court: see articles 11–14. Similarly, requirements for gravity (article 8(1), article 17(1)(d)) are not elements of the crimes.

Prior to the February 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, there had been some debate as to whether these two terms should be disjunctive ('or') or conjunctive ('and')⁴⁰. At the February 1997 session, a decision was taken to use the conjunctive formulation, which was subsequently adopted by the Rome Conference. This decision was based on the theory that, in general, one cannot perform an action or cause a consequence intentionally unless one also has knowledge of the circumstances in which that action or consequence was committed. For example, one cannot be said to intentionally attack or bombard a civilian target, contrary to article 8 para. 2 (b) (v), unless one is aware of the circumstances that render the civilian buildings 'undefended' or 'not military objectives'. The conjunctive formulation ensures that even where knowledge of a particular circumstance is an element of a crime, a person cannot be criminally responsible and liable for punishment unless the other material elements are also committed with intent. In result, each crime, taken as a whole, necessarily requires both intent (to engage in the relevant conduct) and knowledge (of consequences or circumstances).

This does not mean that each particular material element must be committed with both intent and knowledge. Indeed, that would contradict article 30 paras. 2 and 3, which set out the relevant mental elements for each type of material element. The Elements of Crimes confirm this distinction between the crime as a whole and particular elements. With respect to particular mental elements, paragraph 2 of the General Introduction to the Elements refers to 'the relevant mental element, i. e. intent, knowledge or both, set out in article 30' (emphasis added).

A question arises as to whether the conjunctive formulation changes existing international jurisprudence⁴¹ that an accomplice (such as an aider and abettor) need not share the same mens rea of the principal (e. g., an intent to kill), and that 'a knowing participation in the commission of an offence' or 'awareness of the act of participation coupled with a conscious decision to participate' is sufficient mental culpability for an accomplice. It is submitted that the conjunctive formulation has not altered this jurisprudence, but merely reflects the fact that aiding and abetting by an accused requires both knowledge of the crime being committed by the principal and some intentional conduct by the accused that constitutes the participation⁴².

A number of the definitions of crime specifically require that the material elements be 'intentional' or be committed 'intentionally'⁴³. This is likely superfluous, given the general rule in article 30. The specific presence of these terms is likely a product of the negotiation process whereby the terms were imported from other international instruments, such as the Geneva Conventions, or where certain delegations wished to make clear the intentional nature of the crimes before they agreed to their inclusion.

The major significance of article 30 is its effect on definitions that do not expressly specify a mental element. Where a particular definition of a crime is silent as to the requisite mental element, article 30 will import intent and knowledge as the corresponding mental elements.

Concerns were expressed by some delegations, particularly during the negotiation of the Elements, as to the potential difficulties of proving mental elements. Paragraph 3 of the General Introduction to the Elements of Crimes, however, re-affirms the elementary proposition that 'the existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances'⁴⁴.

⁴⁰ See e. g. 1996 Preparatory Committee, Vol. II, note 3, p. 92.

⁴¹ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, ICTY, Trial Chamber, 10 Dec. 1998, paras. 236-241.

⁴² Even if a strict literal reading of the conjunctive in paragraph 1 were made, such that an accomplice must intend the consequence committed by the principal, the same interpretative result would occur. Article 30 para. 2 (b), makes it clear that 'intent' may be satisfied by an awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. This same type of awareness can also satisfy the mental element of 'knowledge', as defined in article 30 para. 3. Therefore, if both 'intent' and 'knowledge' are required on the part of an accomplice, these mental elements can be satisfied by such awareness. Therefore, by either interpretation, article 30 confirms the existing international jurisprudence.

⁴³ See e. g., article 7 paras. 2 (b), (e), (f) and (h); article 8 paras. 2 (b) (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (ix), (xxiv) and (xxv), and paras. 2 (e) (i), (ii), (iii) and (iv).

⁴⁴ See also Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, para 137 (existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances).

5. 'Unless otherwise provided'

- 14 This term performs two functions: first, it establishes the article 30 standard as the 'default rule' for all material elements, and second, it signals that there may be deviations from that approach where otherwise provided.

The status of article 30 as the default rule was explicitly re-affirmed in the Elements, in order to avoid the necessity of spelling out the mental element for every material element, particularly where the application of article 30 is clear. Accordingly, paragraph 2 of the General Introduction to the Elements explains, '[w]here no reference is made in the Elements of Crimes to a mental element for any particular conduct, consequence or circumstance listed, it is understood that the relevant mental element – i. e., intent, knowledge or both, set out in article 30, applies'. Thus, for each material element listed, article 30 implicitly applies, and mental elements were articulated only where there was a need to depart from the article 30 standard or to clarify a potential ambiguity in its application.

The second function of the phrase is to signal that there may be deviations from the article 30 standard where otherwise provided. An issue that was not settled at the Rome Conference was whether only the Rome Statute could 'otherwise provide', or whether other sources, such as the Elements of Crimes, could also provide for a deviation. This debate continued during the negotiation of the Elements. Some delegations were of the view that the Elements could not call for a deviation from article 30, as the Elements document is subsidiary to the Statute⁴⁵. Other delegations noted that the default rule in Article 30 expressly contemplates that different standards can be 'otherwise provided', and that for some elements a different standard was needed to reflect accurately the applicable law, including the jurisprudence. The latter view was eventually accepted; the General Introduction to the Elements, paragraph 2 states: 'Exceptions to the article 30 standard, based on the Statute, including applicable law under its relevant provisions, are indicated below' (emphasis added). This formulation recognizes the primacy of the Statute, and indicates that exceptions must directly or indirectly flow from the Statute, but also recognizes that the Statute itself, through article 21 (applicable law), allows reliance on other sources, including treaties, customary law, general principles and the Elements. Thus, the approach suggests that States Parties could not legislate a deviation through the Elements, but they could codify a deviation where necessary to reflect their intent when drafting the Statute or to reflect the relevant treaties and jurisprudence⁴⁶. This view has been endorsed in early jurisprudence⁴⁷.

There are various ways in which the Statute, and the elaboration of the Statute contained in the Elements, provide for departures from the article 30 standard. In almost all cases, the effect is to reduce the standard that would otherwise apply.

For example, article 28 (a) of the Statute, on command responsibility, requires that a commander knew 'or should have known' of the commission of crimes. The 'should have known' standard reflects the principle that the commander is under a duty to make arrangements to remain informed of the activities of forces under his or her control. The precise meaning of 'should have known' was dealt with in the Bemba confirmation decision, where the Pre-Trial Chamber found that the test is one of (criminal) negligence. The Chamber held that the superior has an active duty to take the necessary measures to secure knowledge of the conduct of his troops⁴⁸. As the Statute is a criminal law instrument, it is ⁴⁵ Article 9 para. 3.

⁴⁶ A subsequent agreement among all treaty parties concerning the application or interpretation of a treaty may be taken into account in interpreting the treaty: article 31 para. 3 of the VCLT.

⁴⁷ See Lubanga (PTC I Decision), note 15, paras. 359–360. And to similar effect see Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) at 383 and Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2009) at 157–159.

⁴⁸ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, paras. 432–434. See also Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, No. ICTR-95-1A-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 3 July 2002, esp. paras. 32–45 (though, in contradistinction, noting that '[i]t is better ... not [to] describe superior responsibility in terms of negligence at all,' para. 36); Prosecutor v.

unlikely that a mere civil negligence standard is sufficient; the standard is likely akin to criminal negligence. Similarly, article 28 (b), requires that non-military superiors either knew 'or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated' the commission of crimes. This standard of culpability is more generous than that imposed on the military commander (as the latter is obliged to maintain a system of military discipline).

Similarly, with the war crime of conscripting or enlisting children under the age of fifteen years⁴⁹, the Elements require only that the perpetrator 'knew or should have known' that the person was under the age of fifteen years. This flexible mental element, regarding the age of the children recruited, reflects the interpretation of delegations that persons recruiting or enlisting young persons are under some degree of obligation to try to verify the age⁵⁰. Again, the precise meaning of 'should have known' remains for the Court to determine⁵¹.

A reduced mental element is also articulated with respect to each of the 'contextual elements', i. e. the circumstance elements that describe the surrounding context that renders a crime a matter of concern to the international community as a whole⁵². For war crimes, this is the existence of an armed conflict; for crimes against humanity, it is the widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population; and for genocide, it is the pattern of genocidal conduct⁵³. Since these contextual elements do not relate directly to the conduct of the accused, but rather to the context creating an international dimension, the full application of article 30 was not considered necessary. At the same time, some degree of awareness of the context was considered necessary for the perpetrator to be held responsible for an international crime⁵⁴. Therefore the Elements provide for a reduced mental element in relation to the contextual elements. For example, awareness of a widespread or systematic attack does not require detailed knowledge of the attack or its characteristics⁵⁵.

Rather than merely reducing the mental element required, a provision may modify the default rule of article 30 by indicating that no mental element is required at all. For example, for the crime against humanity of persecution, article 7 para. 1 (h) requires that the persecutory conduct be committed in connection with any act in article 7 para. 1 or with any ICC crime. This requirement was inserted to ensure that the Court would deal only with serious cases of criminal severity. Accordingly, during the Elements debates, the provision was regarded as a 'jurisdictional' provision, so the Elements specify that a corresponding mental element is not required⁵⁶.

It is also possible to require an additional element of intent or knowledge. For example, 15 some provisions of the Statute require that the impugned conduct (which must be committed Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, TC II, 22 Jan. 2004, paras. 601–610; Prosecutor v. Muvunyi, No. ICTR-2000-55A-T, Judgment, TC II, 12 Sep. 2006, paras. 473–475, reversed on other grounds, No. ICTR-2000-55A-A, Appeal Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 29 Aug. 2008.

⁴⁹ Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi). The 'should have known' standard was also adopted in the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) (improper use of flag of truce, etc.).

⁵⁰ See also the elements for article 6 lit. e (genocide by forcibly transferring children).

⁵¹ See eg. Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, paras. 432–434 and Lubanga (PTC I Decision), note 15, paras. 357–359.

⁵² Article 5.

⁵³ See paragraph 7 of the General Introduction to the Elements, and the final element of each crime.

⁵⁴ See for example, ICTY cases such as Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, paras. 255–270 and national cases such as Finta, note 33, p. 815 and 819.

⁵⁵ For crimes against humanity, the Elements clarify that the perpetrator need not have knowledge of the characteristics of the attack nor of the details of the plan or policy: Elements, Introduction to Crimes Against Humanity. For relevant case law and analysis, see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 280–283.

For genocide, given that knowledge of the genocidal context would inevitably be established in the course of proving genocidal intent, 'the appropriate requirement, if any, for a mental element regarding this circumstance' was left to be determined by the Court: Elements, Introduction to Genocide. For war crimes, knowledge of the armed conflict is listed as an element, but the introduction to war crimes limits the extent of awareness required, leaving the mental requirement highly ambiguous and for the Court to determine: Elements, Introduction to War Crimes. For relevant case law and analysis, see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 278–291.

⁵⁶ Clark (2008) 6 NZYBIL 209.

with intent and knowledge, by virtue of article 30 para. 1) also be committed for a specific or ulterior intention; i. e., ‘with intent to’ or ‘with the intention of’ achieving certain ends or purposes⁵⁷. In some instances, the Elements of Crimes have added specific intents to further elaborate the definitional elements contained in the Statute⁵⁸. These are specific intents required in addition to the general intent that is to be imported by article 30. They are additional mental elements that are not linked to any material element. They do not require that that which is intended to be achieved, actually results in fact. For example, under article 6 (genocide), any of the various acts listed under (a) – (e) must be committed intentionally (by virtue of article 30), with the additional specific intent to destroy a particular group. This is an ulterior intention, since there is not a corresponding material element that the group was actually destroyed.

Although some early proposals had contemplated making mention of both types of intent⁵⁹, the decision of the Preparatory Committee was that ‘there was no need, however, to distinguish between general and specific intention, because any specific intent should be included as one of the elements of the definition of the crime’⁶⁰. Accordingly, paragraph 1 of article 30 only refers to ‘intent’.

Finally, some Statute provisions may appear to modify the article 30 standard but are not intended to do so. For example, some of the war crimes provisions use terms such as ‘wilful’ or ‘wilfully’⁶¹, and the term ‘deliberately’ appears in one of the forms of genocide⁶². These terms appear because many of the Rome Statute provisions faithfully reproduced definitions in instruments such as the Geneva Conventions or Genocide Conventions, which were considered customary international law. It appears that the intent of the drafters was not to deviate from the default rule of article 30, and this interpretation is now confirmed by the approach in the Elements⁶³.

II. Paragraph 2

1. ‘For the purposes of this article’

- 16 This phrase appears to signify that the definitions in paragraphs 2 and 3 apply directly to article 30 and apply indirectly to the Statute through the operation of paragraph 1, which imports ‘intent’ and ‘knowledge’ as the minimum mens rea into all of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, unless otherwise provided. Therefore, other provisions of the Statute could provide for different definitions or meanings of these terms in respect of specific crimes. No specific alternative definitions of these terms, however, are provided in the current Statute.

III. Sub-paragraph 2 (a)

1. ‘conduct’

- 17 Commencing with the August 1996 session of the Preparatory Committee⁶⁴, the Draft Statute had contained a bracketed proposal concerning ‘Actus reus’ (act and/or omission), ⁵⁷ See e.g. article 6 (‘with intent to destroy’); article 7 para. 2 (h) and (i) (‘with the intention of maintaining’; ‘with the intention of removing’).

⁵⁸ E.g., Elements of Crime concerning article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) (‘in order to’), and article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii)-1 (‘for such purposes as...’).

⁵⁹ 1996 Preparatory Committee, Vol. II, note 3, p. 92.

⁶⁰ 1996 Preparatory Committee, Vol. I, note 6, p. 45, para. 199.

⁶¹ Article 8 para. 2 (a) (i) and (iii).

⁶² Article 6 lit. c.

⁶³ See e.g. Elements, article 6 lit. d., element 1; article 8 para. 2 (a) (i), element 1; and article 8 para. 2 (a) (iii), element 1; none of which provide an alternative mental element and therefore rely on article 30.

⁶⁴ Preparatory Committee Vol. I, note 6, p. 45; Preparatory Committee Vol. II, note 3, p. 90.

which was further refined at the February 1997 session⁶⁵ and submitted to the Rome Conference⁶⁶. Paragraph 1 of then article 28 had provided that conduct can ‘constitute either an act or omission, or a combination thereof’. Paragraph 2 of then article 28 attempted to describe the circumstances in which a person could be held criminally responsible for an omission, which included some proposed circumstances that implied mental elements other than intent or knowledge. At the Rome Conference, agreement could not be reached on this proposed article, and it was decided to delete it from the Statute with the understanding that the question of when, and if, omissions might constitute or be equivalent to conduct would have to be resolved in future by the Court.

Therefore, for the purposes of article 30, the term ‘conduct’ denotes positive action as well as intentional omission, where the causal result and moral culpability of the intentional omission is equivalent to the achievement of the same result caused by an intentional act⁶⁷. As for the inclusion of any other type of omissions within the Statute, these would have to be governed by article 30. 18

2. ‘means to engage in the conduct’

This phrase signifies, at a minimum, that conduct must be the result of a voluntary action on the part of an accused. It includes the basic consciousness or volition that is necessary to attribute conduct (i. e., actus reus) as being the product of the voluntary will of a person. In this sense, however, the phrase merely distinguishes involuntary from voluntary conduct. Generally, the term ‘intent’ also connotes some element, although even minimal, of desire or willingness to do the action, in light of an awareness of the relevant circumstances or likely consequences. As noted earlier, unless relevant circumstances are known that qualify the action as prohibited conduct, it cannot be said that the person intends the conduct. Therefore, ‘intent’ necessarily includes an element of ‘knowledge’⁶⁸. 19

As was noted above (‘material elements’), where a conduct element involves a legal conclusion or value judgment, it is not required that the accused correctly completed the legal or normative evaluation, but simply that the accused was aware of the relevant facts⁶⁹.

IV. Sub-paragraph 2 (b)

1. ‘consequence’

Some crimes prohibit conduct⁷⁰, other crimes prohibit not only conduct but the consequences that causally occur⁷¹ and other crimes prohibit the causing of consequences without specifying a particular predicate conduct⁷². Often conduct and consequence can be intertwined with little distinction in time or place between the two⁷³. In all situations where a consequence is part of the definition of a crime, paragraph 2 of article 30 defines what is meant when paragraph 1 requires that the consequences (where consequences are material elements) be committed with intent. 20

⁶⁵ February 1997, Preparatory Committee Decisions, note 4, p. 26.

⁶⁶ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 53rd Sess., UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/CRP. 7 (1998), p. 64–65 (article 28).

⁶⁷ See e.g., article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) (‘intentionally using starvation of individuals...’). The omission of intentionally starving individuals results in the achievement of the equivalent result (i. e., death) as would an intentional killing.

⁶⁸ Williams, Text Book of Criminal Law (1978) 52 and (1983) 116–117.

⁶⁹ One example of a conduct element involving a value judgment would be the intentional infliction of ‘severe’ pain or suffering: article 7 para. 1 (f).

⁷⁰ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (i) (‘directing attacks against civilian objects’).

⁷¹ See e.g. article 7 para. 1 (k) (‘Other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health’).

⁷² See e.g. article 6 (b) (‘causing serious bodily harm or mental harm to members of the group’).

⁷³ See e.g. article 8 para. 2 (a) (i) (‘wilful killing’).

As was noted above (‘material elements’), where a consequence element involves a legal conclusion or value judgment, it is not required that the accused correctly completed the legal or normative evaluation, but simply that the accused was aware of the relevant facts⁷⁴.

2. ‘means to cause that consequence’

- 21 This reflects the notion that specified consequences in the definition of a crime must causally follow from the person’s conduct, and that the person desires or means that such consequences occur. The phrase incorporates both the concepts of a desire for the occurrence of consequences (i. e., dolus directus) and a causal connection between the person and the consequence.

3. ‘aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events’

- 22 Traditionally, in most legal systems, ‘intent’ encompasses not only a ‘volitional’ aspect (ie. where the outcome is desired) but also a ‘cognitive’ aspect, i. e. where there is knowledge that the consequence will occur or will be caused. This cognitive concept of intent is known in several legal systems by various terms, including indirect intent, oblique intent, dolus indirectus or dolus directus in the second degree.

This raises an important question as to how certain or probable a consequence must be in order to fall within the test (‘will occur in the ordinary course of events’). Few things in life are certain, and certainty is often a question of degree. People generally govern their lives on the basis that common sense or the ordinary course of events would pronounce that the occurrence of a particular consequence flowing from a particular conduct is highly probable, such as to be equivalent to certainty for all practical purposes.

Early jurisprudence offers different views as to the requisite degree of probability. At one end of the spectrum, it seems clear that indirect intent encompasses consequences known to be close to certain – often described with terms such as ‘virtually certain’, ‘practically certain’ or ‘substantially certain’⁷⁵. At the other end of the spectrum, it seems clear that unlikely risks or possibilities would not satisfy the ‘will occur’ standard. In this connection, it is often emphasized that the concepts of recklessness and dolus eventualis, which can encompass mere possibilities, were not included in the Statute⁷⁶. Given the vastly different understandings of recklessness and dolus eventualis in different systems,⁷⁷ the attempt to map domestic concepts onto Article 30 may be less productive than focusing on the wording of ⁷⁴ One example of a consequence element involving a value judgment would be that the conduct ‘seriously endangered’ the health of the victims (article 8 para. 2 (b) (x)).

⁷⁵ See Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, para. 362.

⁷⁶ Ambos (2009) 22 LeidenJIL 715, 718 (noting, however, that while the preparatory materials support such an exclusion, they are ‘merely persuasive’ and ‘not decisive in the light of a clear or different literal interpretation’). Similarly, reaching the conclusion that the text appears to exclude mere recklessness or low probabilities, but that this is a normatively undesirable conclusion because it creates a more restrictive standard than customary law or national systems, see both Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2009) at 154–155 and Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) at 382–383. And see Badar (2009) 12 NCLR 433 at 451–452; Weigend (2008) JICJ 471, 482–484; Eser, in A. Cassese et al., eds, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 902, 915–916. See also Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, paras. 357–359; Lubanga (TC I Judgment), note 16, para. 1011.

⁷⁷ The concept ‘dolus eventualis’ does not have a monolithic or uniform meaning within all civil law systems. It generally includes awareness of a substantial or high degree of probability that the consequence will occur, and in many systems, it also includes awareness of a serious risk that a consequence will occur, coupled with indifference to that outcome or reconciliation with that outcome. Some systems may also include some forms of inadvertence in this concept. Due to different national conceptions, attempts to define the concepts were abandoned during the negotiations. Whatever may be the merits of the distinction under national legal systems, it was clear that the first-noted meaning of ‘dolus eventualis’ is included (i. e., ‘will occur in the ordinary course of events’). The latter meanings of ‘dolus eventualis’ or ‘recklessness’ were not incorporated explicitly into article 30, although it may be open to the Court to interpret the provision to include some of these aspects. The concepts may also exist in some specific crimes in the Statute under a different name (e. g., article 28). See Saland, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (1999)

the Statute. What remains to be determined in the Court’s jurisprudence is the extent to which probabilities between virtual certainty and mere possibility will suffice.

In the Lubanga confirmation of charges decision, Pre-Trial Chamber I argued that risks could satisfy the test if the accused reconciled himself to those risks (a test akin to dolus eventualis as conceived in some systems)⁷⁸. However, Pre-Trial Chamber II in the Bemba confirmation of charges decisions held that a mere possibility cannot satisfy the standard of ‘will occur in the ordinary course of events’⁷⁹. The Court’s first judgment, in Lubanga, indicated that a ‘low risk’ is not sufficient, but that future consequences are always somewhat uncertain and hence some considerations of probability are necessary⁸⁰. The decision appeared to suggest that substantial probabilities may satisfy the test⁸¹. The Court’s second judgment, in Katanga, adhered to the ‘virtual certainty’ side of the spectrum.⁸²

Finally, the question of the intent requirement for genocide attracted discussion during the negotiation of the Statute. Many delegations wished to distinguish between ‘responsible decision makers or planners and a general-intent or knowledge requirement for the actual perpetrators of genocidal acts’⁸³. However, the conclusion was that the Statute was not the appropriate forum for amendments to the Genocide Convention and that ‘the question of intent could be addressed under the applicable law or the general provisions of criminal law’⁸⁴. The definition of ‘intent’ in paragraph 2 clearly encompasses both the volitional and cognitive concepts of intention, as described in paragraph 2 (a) and (b) and thus is able to address the concern that the actual perpetrators of genocidal acts, while not specifically intending that their acts destroy an entire group, may nonetheless be aware that such consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events as a result of their acts. Alternatively, it could also be argued that the specific intent referred to in article 6 connotes a more limited meaning of ‘intent’⁸⁵. It will be for the Court to interpret the meaning of ‘intent’ in article 6 in light of its historical antecedents and the effect of article 30 and the Elements of Crimes.

V. Paragraph 3

1. ‘For the purposes of this article’

See discussion of the same phrase in paragraph 2, above. 24

2. ‘awareness that a circumstance exists’

See the discussion of ‘knowledge’ under paragraph 1 and paragraph 2(a), above. Awareness of a circumstance is a question of degree. Some legal systems include within this concept 25

189 at 205; and Clark (2001) 12 CLF 291 at 301, 314–315; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) at 276–278.

⁷⁸ Lubanga (PTC I Decision), note 12, para. 352.

⁷⁹ Bemba (PTC II Decision), note 19, para. 363.

⁸⁰ Lubanga (TCI Judgment), note 16, para. 1012.

⁸¹ Ibid, paras. 986–987 (sufficient risk), para. 1012 (risk, danger, but not low risks).

⁸² Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jgement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, 7 March 2014, paras 770–779 <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9813bb/>>.

⁸³ Ad Hoc Committee Report, note 2, at p. 13, para. 62; 1996 Preparatory Committee Vol. I, above note 6, p. 17, para. 60.

⁸⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee Vol. I, note 6, p. 17, para. 60.

⁸⁵ The more restrictive meaning was given to the phrase ‘with intent to destroy’ by the ICTR in Prosecutor v. Jean-Paul Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, TC I, 2 Sep. 1998, paras. 517–524. Subsequent cases have also indicated a fairly onerous mens rea requirement (specific intent or dolus specialis) and that the accused must share in this intent: Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, No. ICTR-96-3-T, Judgment and Sentence, Trial Chamber I, 6 Dec. 1999, paras. 59–62; Prosecutor v. Jelisić, IT-95-10-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 14 Dec. 1999, para. 78, reversed in part, on other grounds, IT-95-10-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 5 July 2001, see paras. 45–52; Prosecutor v. Krstić, IT-98-33-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 Aug. 2001, para. 571.

the state of mind where a person greatly suspects the true state of affairs but deliberately avoids steps to ascertain their validity or deliberately shuts his or her eyes to an obvious means of knowledge. This is often referred to as ‘wilful blindness’, which is tantamount to actual knowledge⁸⁶. It is distinguished from ‘recklessness’ or even ‘negligence’ due to the conscious awareness of the substantial risk of the true state of affairs and the deliberate avoidance of taking steps to find out the truth. Essentially, the person does not want to know and deliberately shuts his or her eyes to the truth. It may be argued that the specific definition in paragraph 3 excludes such concept and that actual awareness or cognizance is required. Alternatively, it may also be open to the Court to interpret ‘awareness’ to include wilful blindness⁸⁷.

- 26 An erroneous appreciation or awareness of the relevant facts by an accused can constitute a defence of mistake of fact, as such mistake is a negation of the requisite ‘knowledge’ or awareness of relevant circumstances. This is specifically acknowledged in article 32 para. 1. As was noted above (‘material elements’), where a circumstance element involves a legal conclusion or value judgement, it is not required that the accused correctly completed the legal or normative evaluation, but simply that the accused was aware of the relevant facts⁸⁸.

3. ‘awareness that...a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events’

- 27 See discussion of the same concept of ‘awareness’ under article 30 para. 2 (b), discussed above under the heading of ‘Awareness that a circumstance exists’.

⁸⁶ See, for example, Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law (1978) 103.

⁸⁷ Eser, in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 902, 931–932 argues, convincingly, that a principled approach to article 30 militates for the inclusion of wilful blindness as a sufficient form of knowledge, lest a perpetrator escape culpability through ‘shutting his eyes to the truth’ despite awareness of ‘facts he merely does not want to see.’

⁸⁸ One example of a circumstance element involving a value judgment would be that the conduct ‘was of a character similar’ to other acts listed in article 7 para. 1 (article 7 para. 1 (k)).

Article 31

Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility

1. In addition to other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility provided for in this Statute, a person shall not be criminally responsible if, at the time of that person's conduct:

- (a) The person suffers from a mental disease or defect that destroys that person's capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness or nature of his or her conduct, or capacity to control his or her conduct to conform to the requirements of law;
- (b) The person is in a state of intoxication that destroys that person's capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness or nature of his or her conduct, or capacity to control his or her conduct to conform to the requirements of law, unless the person has become voluntarily intoxicated under such circumstances that the person knew, or disregarded the risk, that, as a result of the intoxication, he or she was likely to engage in conduct constituting a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court;
- (c) The person acts reasonably to defend himself or herself or another person or, in the case of war crimes, property which is essential for the survival of the person or another person or property which is essential for accomplishing a military mission, against an imminent and unlawful use of force in a manner proportionate to the degree of danger to the person or the other person or property protected. The fact that the person was involved in a defensive operation conducted by forces shall not in itself constitute a ground for excluding criminal responsibility under this subparagraph;
- (d) The conduct which is alleged to constitute a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been caused by duress resulting from a threat of imminent death or of continuing or imminent serious bodily harm against that person or another person, and the person acts necessarily and reasonably to avoid this threat, provided that the person does not intend to cause a greater harm than the one sought to be avoided. Such a threat may either be:
 - (i) Made by other persons; or
 - (ii) Constituted by other circumstances beyond that person's control.

2. The Court shall determine the applicability of the grounds for excluding criminal responsibility provided for in this Statute to the case before it.

3. At trial, the Court may consider a ground for excluding criminal responsibility other than those referred to in paragraph 1 where such a ground is derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21. The procedures relating to the consideration of such a ground shall be provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'Other Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003; id., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute', (1999) 10 CLF 1; id., 'Zur Rechtsgrundlage des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs – Eine Analyse des Rom-Statuts', (1999) 111 ZStW 175; id., 'May a State Torture Suspects to Save the Life of Innocents?', (2008) 6 JICJ 261; id., 'Defences in International Criminal Law', in: B.S. Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (Elgar 2011) 299; id., 'Der Gerechtigkeit einen Dienst erwiesen? Zur Tötung bin Ladens', (2011) 66 JZ 763; Blakesley, C., 'Comparing the Ad Hoc Tribunal for Crimes against Humanitarian Law', (1996) 67 RIDP 139; Bond, J., and Fourgere, M., 'Omnipresent Threats: A Comment on the Defence of Duress in International Criminal Law', (2014) 14 ICLRev 471; Boon, K., 'Rape and Forced Pregnancy under the ICC Statute: Human Dignity, Autonomy, and Consent', (2001) 32 ColHumRtsLRev 625; Brady H., 'Disclosure of Evidence', in: Roy S. Lee, The International Criminal Court (2001) 403; Cassese, A., 'Justifications and Excuses in International Criminal Law', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 951; id., 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections', (1999) 10 EJIL 144; Cryer, R., 'Defences/Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility', in: R. Cryer et al (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (3rd ed. 2014) 398; David, E., 'Self-Defence and State of Necessity in the Statute of the ICC', in: J. Doria, H.-P. Gasser and M.C. Bassiouni (eds.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court. Essays in honour of Professor Igor Blishchenko (Nijhoff 2009) 757; Dinstein, Y., 'Defences', in: G.K. McDonald and O. Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law, i: Commentary (Kluwer 2000) 371; Eser, A. 'Justification and Excuse: A Key Issue in the Concept of Crime', in: A. Eser and G.P. Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung – Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives, Vol. I (MPI für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1987) 17, also available at <<http://www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/3906>> accessed 19 September 2014; id., 'The Need for a General Part', in: M.C. Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the International Law Commissions 1991 Draft Code of Crime against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Erés 1993) 43, also available at <<http://www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/9727>> id., 'Defences' in War Crime Trials, in: Y. Dinstein and M. Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (M. Nijhoff 1996) 251, also available at <www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/3734> accessed 19 September 2014, also published in: (1995) 24 IsYbHumRts 201 and A. Eser, Transnationales Strafrecht/Transnational Criminal Law (Berliner Wissenschafts-Verlag 2011) 562; id., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 767, also available at <<http://www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/3909>> accessed 19 September 2014; id., 'Mental Elements – Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, also available at <www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/3909> accessed 19 September 2014; id., 'Zwangsendrohung zur Rettung aus konkreter Lebensgefahr', in: F. Herzog and U. Neumann (eds.), Festschrift für Winfried Hassemer (Müller 2010) 713; id., 'Rechtmäßige Tötung im Krieg: zur Fragwürdigkeit eines Tabus', in: D. Dölling et al. (eds.), Verbrechen – Strafe – Resozialisierung. Festschrift für Heinz Schöch (De Gruyter 2010) 461; id., 'Procedural Structure and Features of International Criminal Justice: Lessons from the ICTY', in: B. Swart, A. Zahar and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (OUP 2011) 108; id., 'Tötung im Krieg: Rückfragen an das Staats- und Völkerrecht', in: I. Appel, G. Hermes and C. Schönberger (eds.), Öffentliches Recht im offenen Staat. Festschrift für Rainer Wahl (Duncker & Humblot) 665 also available at <<http://www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/9714>>, accessed 25 August 2015; id., 'Tötung im Krieg: auf der Suche nach einer Legitimationsgrundlage', in: M. Löhnig, M. Preisner and T. Schlemmer (eds.), Krieg und Recht (Gietl Verlage 2014) 239; id., 'Straffreistellungsgründe: aus der Sicht des Bürgers als Normadressat', in: M. Heger, B. Kelker and E. Schramm (eds.), Festschrift für Kristian Kühn (C.H. Beck 2014) 173 also available at <<http://www.freidok.uni-freiburg.de/volltexte/9719>>, accessed 25 August 2015; id., 'Zeit der Tat – Ort der Tat', in: A. Schönke and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014) 105 § 8; Eser, A. and Fletcher, G. (eds.), Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives, Vol. I (MPI für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1987); id. (eds.), Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives, Vol. II (MPI für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1988); Eser, A. and Hecker, B., 'Keine Strafe ohne Gesetz', in: in: A. Schönke and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014) 31, § 1; Eser, A. and Perron, W. (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung, Vol. III (MPI für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1991); Fletcher, G.P. 'The Right and the Reasonable', in: A. Eser and G.P. Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung/justification and excuse, Vol. I (MPI für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1987) 167; Franck, T., Recourse to Force: State Action against Threats and armed Attacks (CUP 2002); Friman, H., 'Investigation and Prosecution', in: Lee, International Criminal Court (2001) 493; Frulli M., 'Jurisdiction rationae personae', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 527; Greenwood, C., 'Belligerent Reprisals in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', in: Fischer et al. (eds.), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law. Current Developments (2001) 539; Gaeta, P., 'May Necessity be Available as a Defence for Torture in the Interrogation of Suspected Terrorists?', (2004) 2 JICJ 785; id., 'Official Capacity and Immunities', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 951; id., 'Ratione Materiae Immunities of Former Heads of State and International Crimes: the Hissène Harbre Case', (2003) 1 JICJ 186; Grewal, K., 'The Protection of Sexual Autonomy under International Criminal Law', (2012) 10 JICJ 373; Heller, K.J., The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (OUP 2011); id., 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', in: K.J. Heller and M.D. Dubber (eds.), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford Law Books 2011) 593; Henkel, H., 'Zumutbarkeit und Unzumutbarkeit als regulatives Rechtsprinzip', in: K. Engisch (ed.), Festschrift für Edmund Mezger (C.H. Beck 1954) 249; Janssen, S., 'Mental condition defences in Supranational Criminal Law', (2004) 4 ICLRev 83; Jescheck, H.-H., 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law Set Out in Nuremberg, as Mirrored in the ICC Statute', (2004) 2 JICJ 38; id., 'Zum Stand der Vereinten Nationen für die Errichtung eines Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', in: A. Eser (ed.), Festschrift für Haruo Nishihara (Nomos 1998) 437; Jescheck, H.-H. and Weigend, T., Lehrbuch des Strafrechts. Allgemeiner Teil (Duncker & Humblot 5th edition 1996); Joyner, C.C. 'Terrorizing the Terrorists: An Essay on the Permissibility of Torture', in: L.N. Sadat and M.P. Scharf (eds.), The Theory and Practice of International Criminal Law (Nijhoff 2008) 227; Keijzer, N. 'Introductory Observations', in: P. Duyx, R. Haveman and E. van Sliedregt (eds.), 'War Crimes Law and the Staute of Rome: Some Afterthoughts?', (2000) 39 RDPMDG 69; id., 'Self-Defence', in: P. Duyx, R. Haveman and E. van Sliedregt, 'War Crimes Law and the Staute of Rome: Some Afterthoughts?', (2000) 39 RDPMDG 100; Kahan, D.M., 'Some Realism About Retroactive Judicial Expansion of Criminal Statutes', (1997) 3 Roger-WilliamsULRev 95; Kelt, M. and H. von Hebel, 'General Principles of Criminal Law and the Elements of Crimes', in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 19; Knoops, G.J., Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (Nijhoff 2nd edition 2008); id., 'The Diverging Position of Criminal Law Defences before the ICTY and the ICC: Contemporary Developments', in: J. Doria, H.-P. Gasser and M.C. Bassiouni (eds.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court. Essays in honour of professor Igor Blishchenko (Nijhoff 2009) 779; Korte, M., Das Handeln auf Befehl als Strafausschließungsgrund (Nomos 2003); id., 'Die Irrtumsregelung des Art. 32 IStGH-Statut', (2008) 6 ZIS 419 <http://www.zis-online.com/dat/artikel/2008_9_262.pdf> accessed 19 September 2014; Kratzsch, D., '§ 53 StGB und der Grundsatz nullum crimen sine lege', (1971) GA 65; Krent, H.J., 'Should Bouie Be Buoyed?: Judicial Retroactive Lawmaking and the Ex Post Facto Clause', (1997) 3 RogerWilliamsULRev 35; Kreicker, H., 'Allgemeine Strafbarkeitsvoraussetzungen', in: A. Eser and H. Kreicker (eds.), Nationale Strafverfolgung völkerrechtlicher Verbrechen, Vol. I: Deutschland (edition iuscrim 2003) 270; Kreß, C., 'Die Kristallisation eines Allgemeinen Teils des Völkerstrafrechts: Die Allgemeinen Prinzipien im Statut des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs', (1999) 12 HuV-I 7; Krug, P., 'The Emerging Mental Incapacity Defense in International Criminal Law: Some Initial Questions of Implementation', (2000) 94 AJIL 317; Lenckner, T. and Sternberg-Lieben, D., 'Notwehr', in: A. Schöнке and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 28th edition 2010) 567, pre-notes to § 32; Lenckner, T. and Sternberg-Lieben, D., 'Notwehr und Notstand', in: A. Schöнке and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014), 571 prenotes to § 32; McCormack, T.L.H., 'Self-Defence in International Criminal Law', in: H. Abtahi and G. Boas (eds.), The Dynamics of International Criminal Justice. Essays in Honour of Sir Richard May (Brill 2005) 231; Merkel, R., 'Gründe für den Ausschluss der Strafbarkeit im Völkerstrafrecht', (2002) 114 ZStW 437; Morrison, T.W., 'Fair Warning and the Retroactive Judicial Expansion of Criminal Statutes', (2001) 74 SouthCalLRev 455; Nill-Theobald, C., 'Defences' bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeinen Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (edition iuscrim 1998); Ohlin, J.D., 'The Bounds of Necessity', (2008) 6 JICJ 289; Perron, W., 'Schuldunfähigkeit wegen seelischer Störungen', in: A. Schöнке and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014) 379, 374, § 20; id., 'Rechtfertigender Notstand', in: A. Schöнке and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014) 687, 677, § 34; id., 'Entschuldigender Notstand', in: A. Schöнке and H. Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (C.H. Beck 29th edition 2014) 708, 705, § 35; Peschke, K., 'The ICC investigation into the conflict in Northern Uganda: beyond the dichotomy of peace versus justice', in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (Elgar 2011) 178; Radosavljevic, D., 'Scope and Limits of Psychiatric Evidence in International Criminal Law', (2013) 13 ICLRev 1013; Randelzhofer, A., 'article 51', in: B. Simma (ed.), The Charter of the United Nations – A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2nd edition 2002); Roberts, R.C.E., 'The Lubanga Trial Chamber's Assessment of Evidence in Light of the Accused's Rights to the Presumption of Innocence', (2012) 10 JICJ 923; Robinson, D., 'The Rome Statute and Its Impact on National Law', in: Casese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 849; Rowe, P., 'Duress as a Defence to War Crimes after Erdemović', (1998) 1 YbHumL 210; Sadat, L.N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (Transnational 2002); Saland, P., 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189; Salton, C.A., 'Mental Incapacity and Liability Insurance Exclusionary Clauses', (1990) 78 CalLRev 1027; Scaliotti, M., 'Defences before the international criminal court: Substantive grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, Part 1', (2001) 1 ICLRev 111; id., 'Part 2', (2002) 2 ICLRev 1; Schabas, W.A., 'National amnesties, truth commissions and international criminal tribunals', in: Bartram S. Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (Elgar 2011) 373; id., 'General Principles of Criminal Law', (1998) 6 EJCLCLJ 400; van Schack, B., 'The Crime of Aggression and International on Humanitarian Intervention on Behalf of Women', (2011) 11 ICLRev 407; Viseur Sellers, P., 'The Context of Sexual Violence: Sexual Violence as Violations of international Humanitarian Law', in: G.K. McDonald and O. Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law. Current Developments (Kluwer Law 2001) 539; van Sliedregt, E., The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (T.M.C. Asser 2003); Triffterer, O., 'Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law', (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 2, 872; Weigend, T., 'Notwehr im Völkerstrafrecht', in: U. Sieber et al. (eds.), Strafrecht und Wirtschaftsstrafrecht. Festschrift für Klaus Tiedemann (Heymanns 2008) 1439; id., 'Anwendung des allgemeinen Rechts', in: W. Jöckes (ed.), Münchener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, Vol. vi/2: Nebenstrafrecht III, Völkerstrafgesetzbuch (C.H. Beck 2009); id., 'Kill or Be Killed. Another Look at Erdemović', (2012) 10 JICJ 1219; Werle, G., 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in article 25 ICC Statute', (2007) 5 JICJ 953; Wilson, W., Criminal Law: doctrine and theory (OUP 2nd edition 2003); van der Wilt, H., 'Justifications and Excuses in International Criminal Law: An Assessment of the Case-law of the ICTY', in: B. Swart, A. Zahar and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (OUP 2011) 275; Van Schaack, B., 'The Crime of Aggression and Humanitarian Intervention on Behalf of Women', (2011) 11 ICLRev 477; Watzek, J., Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung im englischen Strafrecht (edition iuscrim 1997); Wirth, S., 'Immunity for Core Crimes? The ICJ's Judgment in the Congo v. Belgium Case', (2002) 13 EJIL 877; Wise, E., 'General Principles of Criminal Law', in: L. Sadat Wexler (ed.), Observations on the Consolidated ICC Text before the Final Session of the Preparatory Committee (Érés 1998) 43; Zimmermann, A., 'Superior Orders', in: Casese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 957.

Content

A. General remarks – Scope and genesis of the provision	1
B. Exclusion of criminal responsibility outside of article 31	7
I. Abandonment (article 25 para. 3 (f))	8
II. Exclusion of jurisdiction of persons over 18 (article 26)	9

III. Mistake of fact and mistake of law (article 32)	10
IV. Superior orders and prescription of law (article 33)	11
C. Missing defences	12
I. Explicitly rejected defences to ICC crimes: Official capacity and statutory limitations	13
II. Non-addressed defences	15
D. Analysis and interpretation of elements	17
I. Paragraph 1: Chapeau	17
1. 'Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility'	17
2. 'In addition to' 'other grounds ... provided for in this Statute'	18
3. 'At the time of that person's conduct'	21
II. Paragraph 1 (a): Incapacity	22
1. 'Suffers from a mental disease or defect'	23
2. 'Destroys' the person's 'capacity to appreciate' the unlawfulness or the 'capacity to control' the conduct	26
III. Paragraph 1 (b): Intoxication	30
1. 'State of intoxication'	33
2. 'Destroys' the person's 'capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness' or the 'capacity to control' the conduct	34
3. Unless 'voluntarily intoxicated' in that the person 'knew or disregarded the risk' of being 'likely to engage in conduct constituting a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'	35
IV. Paragraph 1 (c): Self-defence, defence of another person, and defence of property in war crimes	37
1. 'Person' (not merely) 'involved in a defensive operation'	38
2. 'imminent and unlawful use of force' against (specific) legally protected interests	41
3. 'Reasonably acts to defend in a manner proportionate to the degree of danger'	46
V. Paragraph 1 (d): Duress	49
1. 'Conduct alleged to constitute a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'	52
2. 'Duress' resulting from a 'threat of imminent death' or of 'continuing or imminent serious bodily harm' against 'that person or another person' whereby the threat is either 'made by other persons' or 'constituted by other circumstances beyond that person's control'	53
3. 'The person acts necessarily and reasonably to avoid this threat'	58
4. 'Provided that the person does not intend to cause a greater harm than the one sought to be avoided'	60
VI. Paragraph 2: The implementation by the Court in the case before it	63
1. 'The Court shall determine the applicability' of the (exclusionary grounds) 'to the case before it'	65
2. Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility 'provided for in this Statute'	67
3. Paragraph 2 in the light of the principle of legality	68
VII. Paragraph 3: Other (international or national) sources for exclusionary grounds	72
1. 'At trial the Court may consider' a ground for excluding criminal responsibility 'other than those referred to in paragraph 1'	73
2. Where such a ground is 'derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21'	75
3. 'The procedures relating to the considerations of such a ground shall be provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'	76
E. Outlook	77

A. General remarks – Scope and genesis of the provision

1 Although this article of the Rome Statute, as will be seen, certainly has its merits, it must be made clear from the very outset that both its heading is misleading and its contents incomplete. When speaking of 'grounds for excluding criminal responsibility' in such a general way, the provision seems to comprise all defences which may lead to the exclusion of criminal responsibility. This impression is, however, misguided from two countervailing ends: On the one hand, as to be concluded from its paragraph 1, article 31 is not the only place in this Statute where grounds for excluding criminal responsibility may be found (below B); in this respect, the provision has a supplementary function in that it regulates grounds for excluding criminal responsibility not yet recognized in other provisions of this Statute. On the other hand, article 31 is far from providing a complete supplement of all possible defences to an offence, as may be seen from the missing list (below C). Thus this provision in fact solely deals with incapacity (below D.II), intoxication (below D.III), self-defence and defence of property (below D.IV), and duress (below D.V). Yet, this deficiency as well is consciously taken into account, firstly in paragraph 2 by giving the Court the power to determine the concrete applicability of the grounds for excluding criminal responsibility (below D.VI), and secondly in paragraph 3 by allowing the invocation and development of further grounds for excluding criminal responsibility by reference to other applicable international and national law (below D.VII).

Beyond being merely supplementary and still incomplete, the manner in which these 2 grounds for excluding criminal responsibility are regulated is ambivalent insofar as it leaves open the question as to whether a specific ground may be considered as a 'justification' of the offence or merely as an 'excuse' of the offender, or whether other – more procedural or political – reasons may lead to a discharge. In this respect, by abstaining from a closer differentiation between various types of exclusionary grounds, as known in most continental-European jurisdictions¹, article 31 appears to have been phrased along common law propositions of a rather broad and undifferentiated concept of 'defences'. Although this common law point of departure has to be kept in mind when interpreting the defences of the Statute, the question remains whether the future development could aim at different ends (below E).

With regard to the genesis of article 31, two lines of development are worth remarking: 3 a more principal and a more formal one. The first is concerned with the question of whether the Statute should provide grounds for excluding criminal responsibility at all. In this respect, the development leads from almost zero to considerable heights, finally ending on a middle level². If, by neglecting earlier drafts³, the 1994 ILC Draft Statute may serve as starting point of the Rome Statute, it must be realized that in this Draft grounds for excluding criminal responsibility are not mentioned at all; this, however, may be explained by the fact that the ILC Draft was by any means rather scarce in pronouncing general principles by merely explicitly expressing the principle of legality (article 39). Thus, in that Draft, solely its article 33 which deals with 'applicable law', thereby allowing the application of 'general international law' or 'any (applicable) rule of national law', could have been used as source for excluding criminal responsibility. After this substantial lack of general requirements of and exemptions from criminal responsibility had been met with considerable criticism, supported by constructive proposals⁴, all further proposals and drafts of UN Committees contained a

¹ Cf. Eser, in: Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung – Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives (1987) 19 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 215 et seq.; cf. also below mn 17.

² In addition to this review cf. also Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 217 et seq.; id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 301 et seq.; Knoops, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (ed.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009), 779, 793 et seq.; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 482 et seq.; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 239 et seq. – Further cf. on the controversy about an exhaustive or enumerative list of defences Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 119; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 221 et seq.

³ Such as the 1991 ILC Draft Code, in which at least some rudimentary general principles and in rather general terms 'defences and extenuating circumstances' had been recognized: cf. Eser, in: Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the International Law Commissions 1991 Draft Code of Crime against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1993) 58 et seq. – As to whether and to what kind and degree defenses had already found consideration and recognition in the Nuremberg trials see Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 294 et seq.

⁴ In particular cf. the various (private) Siracusa/Freiburg/Chicago-Drafts which, as an alternative to the (official) ILC-Drafts, had been prepared by a working group of the AIDP/ISISC in Siracusa/Italy and the Max Planck Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law in Freiburg/Germany (article 33; published in: Nill-Theobald, 'Defences' bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. (1998) 454 et seq.); as several of these rules had been phrased differently by Eser, Koenig, Lagodny and Triffterer (reprinted and compared with the version in the Updated Siracusa Draft in: Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 942 et seq.),

certain range of various defences. This new openness can be observed as early as in the Ad Hoc Committee Report of 1995, where in Annex II a long list of possible defences can be found⁵. Still more proposals of possible defences were put forward for consideration in a compilation by the Preparatory Committee of 1996⁶. However, in all further recommendations of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law Penalties, solely mistake of fact or of law were left as explicitly recognized⁷. The eventually decisive step was then taken by the Preparatory Committee at its December 1997 session, where it accepted the recommendations of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law, as there the grounds for excluding criminal responsibility appear for the first time in the form in which it is, in principle, still represented in the present article 31⁸.

- 4 After these recommendations had basically been upheld by the Inter-Sessional Meeting of January 1998⁹ and finally found admittance into the Draft Statute of the Preparatory Committee of April 1998¹⁰ as a formal basis of the Rome Conference, all further modifications were less of principal than of marginal and more formal character. Without wishing to go into details at this point, the Final Draft Statute as presented to the Diplomatic Conference was, regarding defences to an offense, basically structured in the following way: Whereas mistake of fact or mistake of law (article 30) as well as superior orders and prescription of law (article 32) were regulated in special provisions and later merely renumbered to articles 32 and 33 respectively, article 31 was at that stage partly broader due to its recognition of a sort of necessity (paragraph 1 (d)), partly narrower due to its not yet containing a defence of property in case of war crimes (originally to be regulated in a specific article 33, now within article 31 paragraph 1 (c)), and by treating the present paragraph 3 of article 31 as ‘other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility’ in a special article 34. Whereas the chapeau of article 31 as well as paragraph 1 (a) and paragraphs 2 and 3 remained almost unchanged in their substance, paragraph 1 (b), (c) and (d) underwent various modifications in the course of the Rome Conference. Why, when and in which way this happened, must be seen in connection with the analysis of the respective grounds for excluding criminal responsibility (below D).

- 5 In the Post-Rome activities of the Preparatory Commission in charge of defining certain ‘Elements of Crimes’ and developing further ‘Rules of Procedure and Evidence’, the subject matter of defences did not play a major role: Whilst the Elements, in abstaining from any further concretization of the Statutory grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, remind the Prosecutor of his or her obligation under article 54 para. 1 to investigate incriminating and exonerating evidence equally¹¹, the Rules foresee only few procedural regulations of when and how to raise grounds for excluding criminal responsibility¹². The minor role of defences equally holds true for the Regulations of the Court¹³.

these rules were also integrated into ‘Proposals to Amend the “Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind”’, in: Triffterer, Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law, Annex 2, (1997) 4 Croatian AnnCrimL&Pract 2 [872]. To the role of these different drafts see also Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 777.

⁵ Ad Hoc Committee Report, pp. 18 et seq., 48 et seq.

⁶ Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc. A/AC.249/CRP.9 (4 Apr. 1996), Annex: General Principles of Criminal Law. Cf., in addition, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 79 et seq.

⁷ Cf. Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, pp. 18 et seq.

⁸ See articles L–O, Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, pp. 18 et seq.

⁹ See Zutphen Draft, pp. 60 et seq.

¹⁰ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, pp. 66 et seq.

¹¹ Elements, General Introduction, paragraph 5 with fn. 1. cf. Kelt and v. Hebel, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 19, 38.

¹² Cf. rule 79 para. 1 (b) (the defence shall notify the prosecutor of intent to raise a defence pursuant to article 31 para. 1), rule 80 (procedures for raising a defence pursuant to article 31 para. 3), rule 121 para. 9 (procedures relating to pre-trial hearings). Cf. Brady, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 403, 414 et seq., Friman, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 493, 521 et seq.

¹³ Cf. regulation 54 (p): At a status conference, the Trial Chamber may issue any order on the defences, if any, to be advanced by the accused.

Due to the novel nature of how these exclusionary grounds are regulated in article 31, 6 some caution with regard to the appropriate methodology of its interpretation appears advisable. Whereas the interpretation of other parts of the Rome Statute may easily take resort to legal precedents both in international and national criminal law, with regard to this section particular heed must be paid to the wording of these provisions, thus avoiding both an uncritical adoption of the ambiguous and controversial drafting at the Rome Conference and an unreflected implantation from national criminal justice systems.

B. Exclusion of criminal responsibility outside of article 31

As early as in its very first words ‘in addition to’, article 31 indicates that it possesses a 7 supplementary function, firstly in recognizing grounds for excluding criminal responsibility already provided for in other provisions of this Statute, and secondly by additional ones. Thus, in order to get a full view of possible grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, such grounds outside of article 31 must at least be listed, though not commented on here.

I. Abandonment (article 25 para. 3 (f))

According to this provision, a person shall not be held liable for the attempt to commit a 8 crime if he or she abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime, provided that he or she gives up the criminal purpose completely and voluntarily (article 25 para. 3 (f) sentence 2). Although in some countries, such as France, abandonment is considered part of the definition of attempt¹⁴, it is at least a negative and, thus, an excluding factor of criminal responsibility¹⁵.

II. Exclusion of jurisdiction of persons over 18 (article 26)

Although, due to the inability of the delegates to find a consensus on the age of 9 responsibility¹⁶, this exclusion is phrased in procedural terms by excluding jurisdiction, the essential reason behind this is the lack of criminal responsibility under a certain age. Therefore, this exclusion can, in substance, be considered as a ground for excluding criminal responsibility as well¹⁷.

III. Mistake of fact and mistake of law (article 32)

As mentioned, even in phases where the drafters of the Statute were hardly prepared to 10 recognize any grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, at any rate mistake of fact and, to a lesser degree, mistake of law were kept as reasons for excluding, or at least mitigating, ¹⁴ Cf. Bouloc, Droit pénal général (2013) 228.

¹⁵ For details of the various requirements of abandonment see Ambos above Art. 25, mn 34; Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 777, 814 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 147 et seq.; Werle (2007) 5 JICJ [953], 972 et seq.

¹⁶ Cf., in particular, Preparatory Committee Draft, pp. 60 et seq.; in addition Ambos (1999) 10 CLF [1], 22 et seq.

¹⁷ In principle agreeing van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 215 fn. 11.- For more details see Triffterer and Clark above Art. 26; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 430 et seq.; Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 227; Frulli, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 527, 533 et seq. If not overlooked, this exclusion is neither mentioned by the other comprehensive monographs of Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008), nor of van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003).

criminal responsibility¹⁸. Remarkably, both mistake of fact and mistake of law are explicitly denoted as grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, albeit under certain conditions: in the case of mistake of fact, if it negates the mental element required by the crime (article 32 para. 1), in the case of a mistake of law, if it negates the mental element or (article 32 para. 2 sentence 2 alternative 1) or if it can be traced back to a superior order or a prescription of law according to article 33 (article 32 para. 2 sentence 2 alternative 2). Although both the structure and contents of these mistake rules may be questionable in various respects¹⁹, it was certainly a decisive step regarding mistake of law to recognize this still worldwide highly controversial ground for excluding criminal responsibility at all²⁰.

IV. Superior orders and prescription of law (article 33)

- 11 Another highly controversial ground for excluding criminal responsibility is obedience to a superior order. Although not recognized in principle, article 33 of this Statute provides certain exceptions under which a person may be relieved of criminal responsibility if he or she acted pursuant to an order of a government or of a superior. Although, again, the structure and scope of this provision may be disputable²¹, it attempts to find a middle way between entirely disregarding and partly recognizing obedience to a superior as a ground for excluding criminal responsibility²².

C. Missing defences

- 12 In comparison to national penal codes and case laws where the fulfillment of the definitional elements of an offense may be negated by a wide range of justificatory, exculpatory or other grounds of excluding punishability²³, the list of possible offenses to international offenses in this Statute is rather limited. This may partly be explained by the fact that crimes penalized and prosecuted by inter- and supranational law are, in principle, of such infeasible dimensions that any attempts to justify or excuse them appear obscene and, therefore, are met with psychological reservations. Nevertheless, in the same way that a suspected murderer's act may be justified by self-defence, a rapist excused by insanity, or a policeman released from personal liability for suppressed resistance of 'superior order', in trials of international crimes it cannot be precluded either from the very outset that the ¹⁸ Cf. above mn 4; in particular referring to sex offenses see Grewal (2012) 10 JICJ [373], 389. As to partly divided opinions in the Nuremberg trials see Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 306.

¹⁹ For alternative phrasing cf. Article 33–15 of the Updated Siracusa Draft (in Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 951).

²⁰ For more details see Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, 934 et seq.; Triffterer below Art. 32; Korte (2008) 6 ZIS [419], 419 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 269 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 646 et seq.

²¹ As alternatives cf. article 33–16 of the Updated Siracusa Draft, the proposal by Eser, Koenig, Lagodny and Triffterer, article 33 o (in Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 951) and article 11 (in Triffterer, Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law, Annex 2, (1997) 4 Croatian Ann. of Crim.L. and Practice. 2 [872], 879) respectively.

²² For more details see Triffterer and Bock below Art. 33; Bantekas and Nash, International Criminal Law (2007) 56 et seq.; Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 33, 129 et seq.; above note 1, E. van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 287 et seq.; Zimmermann, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, A Commentary (2002) 957 et seq. As to the partly inconsistent approach in the Nuremberg judgments see Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 299 et seq.

²³ See in general Eser, in: Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung – Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives (1987) 17, 46 et seq. or, for instance with regard to German Criminal Law, cf. Lenckner and Sternberg-Lieben, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) preliminary remarks 27–133 to § 32, 2t 586 et seq.

statutory elements of an offense, although all given, may be counteracted by a valid defence²⁴. Otherwise it would not have been possible at all to recognize grounds for excluding criminal responsibility as described above at B and below at D. Yet the question still remains as to whether or not there might be further grounds for excluding criminal responsibility. The answer requires a distinction between two groups of possible defences:

I. Explicitly rejected defences to ICC crimes: Official capacity and statutory limitations

In declaring official capacity irrelevant, particularly that of a Head of State or Government (article 27), the Statute explicitly excludes a defence which was formerly practiced commonly and tacitly almost as a ‘matter of course’, which has been rejected, however, since at least as early back as the Nuremberg trials²⁵. Since more recently again invoked by Pinochet²⁶, this Statute’s explicit exclusion of ‘official capacity’ as a defence will hopefully clarify this controversial question and set a preventive signal towards government-supported crimes²⁷. 13

The same holds true for the non-applicability of the Statute of Limitations (article 29). 14
With the explicit rejection of this defence, any speculations on playing with the passage of time are made illusory²⁸.

II. Non-addressed defences

Aside from grounds for excluding criminal responsibility which are either statutorily 15 recognized (above B and below D) or explicitly rejected (above C.I), a wide range of defences remains which may be recognized as grounds for excluding criminal responsibility by various national laws, but which are not explicitly addressed in this Statute, neither in a positive nor in a negative way. Although certain defences recognized by national criminal law, by its very nature may not be acceptable within the context of international crimes, such as for instance educational privileges of parents or teachers, quite a few defences remain which have already been discussed and partly even considered for this Statute²⁹, but which in the final end were neither explicitly recognized nor rejected. Without pretending to be exhaustive, this refers to:

²⁴ See Eser, in: Dinstein and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 252 et seq.; agreeing Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 398; v. d. Wilt, in: Swart, Zahar and Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (2011) 275, 276.

²⁵ For more details see Sadat, L. N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 200 et seq.

²⁶ See id., 201.

²⁷ For more details see Triffterer and Buschard above Art. 27; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 406 et seq.; Cassese, International Criminal Law (2008) 302 et seq.; Gaeta, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 951, 975 et seq. – Note, however, that article 27 is only directly applicable to Member States, thus, especially after the so called Arrest-Warrant decision by the International Court of Justice, leaving it controversial whether the Court holds jurisdiction over the head of state or government of non-member states; cf. Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium, Judgment, 14 February 2002, 2002 ICJ Rep. 3, para. 61 (<<http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/121/8126.pdf>> accessed 23 September 2014). As to this decision cf. Gaeta (2003) 1 JICJ [186]; Wirth (2002) 13 EJIL [877].

²⁸ For more details see Schabas above Art. 29; Sadat, L. N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 220 et seq.; for possible conflicts with national statutes of limitation cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 427 et seq.

²⁹ Cf. the compilation of the Preparatory Committee in Annex, note 6, pp. 19 et seq., and, with special regard to war crimes, Eser, in: Dinstein and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 254 et seq.; Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeinen Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (1998) 55 et seq.

- consent of the victim³⁰,
- conflict of interests/collision of duties³¹,
- reprisals³²,
- general and/or military necessity³³,
- the tu quoque argument³⁴, or
- amnesties and immunities³⁵.

16 As several of these defences are highly controversial, partly in principle and partly at least with regard to the character of international crimes³⁶, it appears understandable that the Statute followed a center line by not explicitly recognizing these defences, and, on the other hand, by leaving the door open for one or the other of these defences in an individual case by means of article 31 para. 3 (see below D.VII).

³⁰ Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 328 et seq.; id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 387; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 399, 416. It should be noted, however, that the Elements of Crime as well as the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, in precluding consent from certain crimes (Elements 8 para. 2 (b) (x) fn. 48; 8 para. 2 (e) (xi) fn. 68) or by barring the inference of consent from certain facts (rule 70), implicitly recognize consent as a possible defence; for details cf. Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 493 et seq. With particular regard to consent problems in sexual abuse cf. Boon (2001) 32 Columbia HRLR [625], 667 et seq., and furthermore Visser Sellers, in: Kirk McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law (2000) [263], 328 (who interprets the jurisprudence of the ICTR on cases of sexual violence as constricting the availability of consent as a defence).

³¹ Cf. Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1008.

³² Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 390 et seq.; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 417; Eser (1995) 24 Israel Y.B. Hum. Rts. [201], 217 et seq.; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 291 et seq. On the controversy about the legality of reprisals against civilians cf. Prosecutor v. Kupreskic et al., IT-95-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 14 January 2000, paras. 527–536 (rejecting a defence) and (in criticizing this holding) Greenwood, 'Belligerent Reprisals in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', in: Fischer et al. (eds.), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law. Current Developments (2001) 539, 549 et seq. and van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 261 et seq.

³³ Cf. Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 324; id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 388 et seq.; Eser (1995) 24 IsYbHumRts [201], 219; Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 136 et seq.; id., in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (ed.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009) 779, 786 et seq.; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 295 et seq.; v. d. Wilt, in: Swart, Zahar and Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (2011) 275, 285 et seq. and, with particular attention to the Nuremberg judgments, see Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 308 et seq. – As to the ill-guided confusion of 'necessity' and 'duress' see below mn 49. cf. also below to note 134.

³⁴ The ICTY comprehensively classified the tu quoque defence as impermissible in international humanitarian law in Prosecutor v. Kupreskic et al., IT-95-16, Decision on Evidence of the Good Character of the Accused and the Defence of Tu Quoque, Trial Chamber, 17 February 1999. cf. Also Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 328 et seq., id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 393; Eser (1995) 24 IsYbHumRts [201], 218; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 294 et seq. As to the denial of this defense as well as of the invocation of 'selective prosecution' in Nuremberg trials see Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 296 et seq.

³⁵ Cf. Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 309 et seq.; Eser (1995) 24 IsYbHumRts [201], 219 et seq., Peschke, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 178, 183 et seq., 202; Robinson, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1849, 1855 et seq.; Schabas, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 373 et seq. (2011); Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 123 et seq.

³⁶ Cf. Eser, in: Dinstejn and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 245 et seq.

D. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: Chapeau

1. 'Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility'

When using this language, the Statute is basically, although only half-way, following 17 continental-European rather than common law traditions. In avoiding the common law term of 'defences' that would be open for comprising substantive as well as procedural bars to punishability and prosecution, the Statute is merely addressing substantive grounds for excluding criminal responsibility³⁷. Since the term 'defence' was consciously avoided³⁸, it would be inapt to use, as some commentators still do³⁹, defence and grounds for excluding criminal responsibility as interchangeable concepts⁴⁰. When speaking of 'excluding criminal responsibility' without further differentiation, however, the Statute leaves open the question as to whether a given ground is justifying the wrongful act or merely excusing the perpetrator, or even only negating punishability for some other substantive reason⁴¹. In abstaining from such further differentiation, the Statute remains behind jurisprudential development as was achieved particularly in the Germanic and, to some degree, in the Romanic jurisdictions as well⁴². Although the application of this distinction could be helpful for reasoning certain grounds for excluding criminal responsibility in a properly differentiated way, as in particular with regard to necessity and duress⁴³, this conceptual deficiency is not to create a practical ³⁷ This restriction to substantive exclusions of criminal responsibility, however, seems not to be generally recognized as, quite strangely, even alibi as a clearly evidentiary bar to finding a defendant guilty is mentioned among possible (although by this provision of the Statute not recognized) defences by certain authors, such as Sadat, L. N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 212 fn. 157; Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2001) 88; cf. also Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 388. Incidentally, this narrower understanding of defences seems to be gaining fellowship also among common law scholars; see, e. g., Ashworth and Horder, Principles of Criminal Law (2013) 193; cf. also van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 215 et seq.

³⁸ Reported by Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1028 with reference to Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 206. cf. also Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 441.

³⁹ Cf. Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (2001) 258; Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2001) 88.

⁴⁰ Cf. also Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 218 et seq. – With regard to consequences for the application of paragraph 3 of Art. 31 which allows the development of further grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, see below mn 74.

⁴¹ Cf. the comment by Sadat Wexler, Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court based on the Preparatory Committee's Text to the Diplomatic Conference, Rome June 15 – July 17 (1998) 56. Apparently due to this lack of clarity Wise, in: Sadat Wexler (ed.), Observations on the Consolidated ICC Text before the Final Session of the Preparatory Committee (1998) 43, 52, sees in Art. 31 a 'miscellaneous lot of exculpatory grounds' whilst, even more confusing, Krug, (2000) 94 AJIL. [317] fn. 2 speaks of 'justification' as providing 'exculpation' for not wrongful acts as to be distinguished from 'excuse' as 'exculpating' a particular defendant from accountability, thereby obviously not recognizing that 'exculpation' (as discharging from 'culpa' in terms of 'culpability') is more synonymous with mere 'excuse' (of the actor) rather than with 'justification' of the act.

⁴² Cf. the contributions to Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives, Vol. I and II (1987/88); Eser and Perron (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung (1991); Watzek, Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung im englischen Strafrecht (1997); furthermore Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 825; Jescheck and Weigend, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts. Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 332 et seq.; Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 448 et seq., 454; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 229 et seq., 273, 299, id., Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 215 et seq.

⁴³ Cf. below mn 49; furthermore Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 441, 448 et seq., 454; Sadat, L. N., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 214 et seq.; Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev[1], 46; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 230, 271 et seq., 299.

impediment as it also seems to be a common view⁴⁴. For as long as ‘criminal responsibility’ is understood in a broad sense, i.e. in terms of not only referring to the (subjective) capability of the actor but as also comprising the (objective) wrongfulness of the act, its exclusion may not only be procured by exculpatory factors, as in the case of incapacity (Paragraph 1 (a))⁴⁵, but also by genuine justifications as in the case of necessary and proportionate self-defence (paragraph 1 (c))⁴⁶.

2. ‘In addition to’ ‘other grounds ... provided for in this Statute’

- 18 By referring to ‘additional grounds’ for the exclusion of criminal responsibility, this article reveals its supplementary, if not even fundamental function as central place for the possible exclusion of criminal responsibility. Taking this route, the article could serve as the main instance of reference in such cases where general issues of these or other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility are in question⁴⁷. This might become relevant, for example, with regard to the time at which a defence must be present: for instance, as neither article 32, concerned with mistake of fact or law, nor article 33, concerned with superior orders, makes any reference to the relevant time, reference to the ‘person’s conduct’ in this paragraph could serve as guideline (see below D. I. 3).
- 19 Although paragraph 1 only refers to additional exclusionary grounds ‘provided for in this Statute’, this may not be interpreted as a ‘closed shop’ against other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, for, as can be derived from paragraph 3, the Statute does not bar the invocation of other exclusionary grounds found in applicable international and national law according to article 21 (see below D. VII).
- 20 However, although the case of concurrent exclusionary grounds is not expressly addressed, there is no reason why it should not be possible for a defendant to invoke multiple grounds for excluding criminal responsibility if they are given, as in the case in which he or she was misguided by a mistake of fact or law (according to article 32) and additionally acting under duress (according to paragraph 1 (c)).

3. ‘At the time of that person’s conduct’

- 21 In stating the ‘person’s conduct’ as the decisive time at which a ground for excluding criminal responsibility must be given, the Statute takes a rather narrow view by, implicitly, declaring the time at which the statutory result of the conduct occurs as irrelevant. Consequently, for instance, with regard to intoxication (paragraph 1 (b)), a person taking part in genocide who, at the time of giving orders or providing support, had already consumed alcohol, his mind yet not affected, could not claim exculpation by proving that, at the time at which the genocidal act was committed by the principals, he had lost his capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness of his conduct. Nevertheless, this so-called ‘act theory’ – as opposed to the ‘ubiquity principle’, according to which the place and/or the time of the effect of an act is equally relevant as the place or time of the conduct⁴⁸ – appears feasible in that the prohibition as well as permissions and excuses are determinant for the ⁴⁴ Cf. Bantekas and Nash, International Criminal Law (2007) 53 et seq.; Cassese, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 951, 955; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 402, 399 et seq.; Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev[111], 118.

⁴⁵ Cf. below mn 22, Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 304 et seq.

⁴⁶ For instance, to consequences with regard to mistakes of fact or law see Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, 934 et seq.; cf. also Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 300 et seq.

⁴⁷ Agreeing van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 223 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 620.

⁴⁸ For details to these approaches cf. Eser, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch (2014) § 8 mn 2 (with regard to the time of commission) at 105, and § 9 mn 3 et seq. (with regard to the place of commission), at 107 et seq.

conduct, whereas the occurrence of the statutory result may be accidental or at least no longer influenced by the conduct the respective person is responsible for⁴⁹.

II. Paragraph 1 (a): Incapacity

Different from all other exclusionary grounds of article 31 which underwent various modifications in the course of the promulgation of the Statute, the wording of paragraph 1 (a) has remained unchanged since its elaboration by the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law and its adoption by the Preparatory Committee at its December 1997 session⁵⁰. This provision adopts the well-established principle of national criminal justice systems that incapacity or legal insanity serves as a categorical exclusion of criminal responsibility⁵¹. As merely granting a personal excuse, however, and not an objective justification of the crime, the act still remains unlawful⁵². Since in this way excluding criminal responsibility, incapacity is to be distinguished from the inability to stand trial (as regulated in article 64 para. 8 and rule 135).⁵³

As to the contents of paragraph 1 (a), incapacity as ground for excluding criminal responsibility has two basic requirements: a defective mental state in terms of an abnormality of mind⁵⁴ (1), in which the capacity to either appreciate the unlawfulness or to control the conduct is destroyed (2).

1. ‘Suffers from a mental disease or defect’

This component of the insanity defence is a triple one: the defendant has to ‘suffer’ from a certain impairment (‘disease or defect’) that relates to the human mind (‘mental’). In comparison to corresponding regulations in various recent national penal codes⁵⁵ this requirement is narrow in one respect and rather broad in the other.

On the one hand, the regulation of incapacity in subparagraph (a) could be understood as narrow because of solely recognizing ‘mental’ deficiencies as ground for excluding criminal responsibility. As suggested in the first edition of this commentary and, indeed, followed by

⁴⁹ Agreeing Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 312; cf. also van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 242 et seq.

⁵⁰ Cf. Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997; article I; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 484 et seq.

⁵¹ Cf. Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 672 and 674. For details to national underpinnings and case law on this commonly so-called ‘insanity defence’ cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 315 et seq.; Knoops, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (eds.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009) 779, 789 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 224 et seq. – Note that a plea of incapacity raises procedural difficulties that are neither covered by the Rome Statute nor by the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. For example, article 77 does not foresee detention as the appropriate reaction to a successful incapacity plea; in order not to set the defendant free, regulation 106 para 6 – which allows a Chamber of the Court to transfer detained mentally ill persons or persons suffering from serious psychiatric condition to specialized institutions for appropriate treatment – could be construed as providing the appropriate sanction for defendants successfully raising incapacity. It has to be noted, however, that this interpretation is delicate at best, since it would invent a highly intrusive criminal sanction with there being only a very small, if any, basis in the Rome Statute. For an overview over further procedural problems regarding insanity cf. Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 303 et seq.; Krug, (2000) 94 AJIL [317], 322 et seq.

⁵² Cf. above mn 17, Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 301 f.

⁵³ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 432 et seq. As an example of this kind of a procedural defence at the ICTY see Prosecutor v. Kovačević, IT-01-42/2, public version of the Decision on Accused’s Fitness to Enter a Plea and Stand Trial, Trial Chamber I, 12 April 2006; Zahar and Sluiter, International Criminal Law (2008) 440 et seq.

⁵⁴ As understood in Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 1156 (hereafter Čelebić).

⁵⁵ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 314 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 224 et seq.

some prominent authors⁵⁶, ‘mental’ might be interpreted as not covering merely ‘psychic’ disturbances as long as they do not affect the cognitive or intellectual capacity of the person concerned. Consequently, other psychic affections or deep emotional disturbances, as they may be taken into consideration in national laws⁵⁷, could only be taken resort to by way of paragraph 3 of this article (below D.VII). At second glance, however, this restrictive reading of ‘mental’ appears neither cogent nor adequate as better arguments speak for a broader concept in which ‘mental’ encompasses impairments both of reason (cognition)⁵⁸ and emotion (volition)⁵⁹. In comparative perspective, this issue resonates the recurring debate in national criminal law as to whether the incapacity defence should be restricted to cognitive inabilities of the defendant to recognize the unlawfulness of his or her conduct or also to comprise uncontrollable, irresistible impulses, though the defendant may still be intellectually aware of the wrongfulness of his or her action⁶⁰. In linguistic terms it is to be taken into account that the (English) term ‘mental’ is highly ambiguous, bearing several connotations that neither point one or another way⁶¹. Thus, with regard to the Statute both the legislative history of paragraph 1 (a) and teleological reasoning as well as comparative analysis advise a broad interpretation of ‘mental’. Not only that a restrictive cognitive understanding would trail recent national penal codes that opted for an inclusion for volitional disturbances and disorders⁶², in particular remembering that the formulation ‘mental disease or defect’ is directly taken from sec. 4.01. U.S. Model Penal Code⁶³ which supplements the cognitive focus of the (in)famous M’Naghten test⁶⁴ with a volitional element. Furthermore, this dualistic approach is normatively warranted since the psychiatric distinction between volitional and cognitive disorders is in a constant flux⁶⁵, so it does not seem sensible to rest the availability of the incapacity defence on hazy labels attached to mental illnesses. Finally, this reasoning evidently motivated the Working Group Chairman’s statement that the effect, not the label, of a certain mental condition should be the pertinent factor⁶⁶.

- 25 On the other hand, however, this component of the insanity defence appears rather broad by not requiring a specific mental ‘disease’, but by being content with any ‘defect’ that destroys the defendant’s relevant capacity. This gate to the insanity defence is, of course, even more opened if ‘mental’ is to be broadly understood in terms of comprising both cognitive ⁵⁶ Such as Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 110 et seq. and Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 674, and, supposedly in not yet realizing the change of position made here, Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 302; id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 32 with reference to fn. 190.

⁵⁷ As, for instance, according to § 20 German Penal Code. For details see Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (2014) § 20 mn 6 et seq., at 379.

⁵⁸ In terms of encompassing awareness and understanding; cf. Wilson, Criminal Law: doctrine and theory (2003) 231.

⁵⁹ As, in particular, suggested by Janssen (2004) ICLRev [83], 84; Krug, (2000) 94 AJIL [317], 324; Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev [1], 26; and as also interpreted by the (German) Gesetzentwurf der Bundesregierung zur Einführung des Völkerstrafgesetzbuches: Deutscher Bundestag Drucksache 14/8524, 37 (Cabinet’s Draft for a German International Criminal Code); similarly Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 443; supposedly to be understood in broad terms cf. also van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 225 et seq.

⁶⁰ Cf. Ormerod, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law (2011) 304.

⁶¹ Cf. Oxford English Dictionary (OUP 2004) keyword: mental.

⁶² Beside § 20 German Penal Code of 1975 (already mentioned above note 57), cf. in particular article 35 Polish Penal Code of 1998 and article 20 Spanish Penal Code of 1995.

⁶³ Sec. 4.01. U.S. Model Penal Code reads: ‘A person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect he lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate his criminality (wrongfulness) of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law’.

⁶⁴ House of Lords, 8 ER 718 (1843). The relevant section reads as follows: ‘... to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that, at the time of committing the act, the accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong’; cf. Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 485.

⁶⁵ Krug, (2000) 94 AJIL [317], 324, footnote 48.

⁶⁶ Reported by Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev [1], 26.

and emotional defects as described before. This obvious danger of opening the insanity defence to almost any psychic affection must be counterchecked by all the more taking the requirement of ‘suffering’ from a relevant disease or defect serious in that not a merely temporary or momentary mental defect may suffice but that it must amount to a disturbance of some duration⁶⁷.

2. ‘Destroys’ the person’s ‘capacity to appreciate’ the unlawfulness or the ‘capacity to control’ the conduct

However narrow or broad the mental deficiencies are construed, the final limits of the insanity defence anyhow depend on the further required effects on the defected mind. 26

With regard to the affected capacity, the Statute continues its mild approach in that it suffices that either the (cognitive) ‘appreciation’⁶⁸ of the unlawfulness or nature of the conduct or the (volitional) ‘control’ of the conduct to conform to the requirements of law is affected⁶⁹. 27

Thus, the ultimate limitation of the incapacity defence rests with the degree of defection of the relevant capacity: it has to be ‘destroyed’. In this respect, the Statute clearly goes beyond the otherwise very similar sec. 4.01. US Model Penal Code, which only calls for a ‘lack of substantial capacity’⁷⁰. The criterion ‘destroy’ is nonetheless far from self-explaining. If, on the one hand, the mental deficiency goes so far as to completely exclude the person’s ability or awareness of acting as such,⁷¹ criminal responsibility is not only excluded by lack of culpability according to paragraph 1 (a), but eventually even by lack of human conduct or lack of intent (article 32 para. 1). If, on the other hand, from a normative point of view, the destroyed capacity was equated with the utter elimination of volitional control or cognitive reason, the Statute would set unrealistic hurdles, since mental disorders normally do not leave mentally ill people absolutely incapable of self-control or totally disorientated⁷². In order to give testifying expert witnesses an appropriate and workable orientation and to grant mentally ill defendants a fair chance to raise incapacity, ‘destroyed’ mental capacities may reside between the substantial and the absolute impairment of cognitive or volitional abilities⁷³. What, thus, is required for is an extensive and far-reaching loss of self-control or reason⁷⁴. 28

At any rate, however, the level of incapacity must still remain above mere diminished mental capacity; for different from various national penal codes, the Statute does not provide a (partial) defence of ‘diminished criminal responsibility’⁷⁵. Therefore, as suggested in the First Edition of this Commentary, taking resort to paragraph 3 seemed to be the only way for 29

⁶⁷ Agreeing Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 302, id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 321; Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 110 et seq. As to evidentiary aspects of proving a psychic affection see D. Radosavljević (2013) 13 ICLRev [1013], 1013-1035..

⁶⁸ As ‘appreciate’ is again borrowed from sec. 4.01. U.S. Model Penal Code, one should be aware of the controversy as to whether using ‘appreciate’ rather than ‘know’ entails a broader understanding than simple cognition; in this case the offender has to be intellectually and emotionally aware of the significance of his conduct. cf. Model Penal Code and Commentaries, i, General Provisions (1985) §§ 3.01 to 5.07 169.

⁶⁹ For more details of these two different sides of culpability cf., with regard to the almost equivalent version of the German § 20 Penal Code, Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (2014) § 20 mn 25 et seq., at 392.

⁷⁰ In a similar way, rule 67 lit. A (ii) (b) ICTY refers to ‘diminished or lack of mental responsibility’. This provision was addressed in Čelebići, note 54 but only to the extent of diminished mental capacities.

⁷¹ As according to Janssen (2004) ICLRev [83], 85, 96 the Statute deeming to require one hundred percent insanity, thus, however, making a successful insanity plea highly unlikely.

⁷² Cf. the comment to sec. 4.01. U.S. Model Penal Code: ‘Disorientation, psychiatrists indicated, might be extreme and still might not be total; what clinical experience revealed was closer to a graded scale with marks along the way’. Model Penal Code and Commentaries, i, General Provisions (1985) § 3.01 to 5.07 171. Cf. also Salton (1990) 78 CallRev [1027], 1042.

⁷³ By no means is this middle course over-stretching ‘the limits of literal interpretation’ as indicated by Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 322 who, in case of a mental defect falling short of ‘destroying’ the actor’s cognitive or volitional capacity, would instead recommend to take resort to mitigation.

⁷⁴ The Statute’s still high requisites are legitimated by the seriousness of the pertinent crimes.

⁷⁵ Cf. § 21 German Penal Code, Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 302.

taking a case of diminished responsibility into account⁷⁶. Yet, this is not necessary anymore since rule 145 para. 2 (a) (i) explicitly mentions ‘substantially diminished mental capacity’ which, though ‘falling short of constituting grounds for exclusion of criminal responsibility’, may be taken into account in the determination of sentence. This pragmatic approach⁷⁷, although precluding an independent defence of ‘diminished responsibility’, at least allows for mitigation in the sentencing phase; but as the mental abilities must be ‘substantially reduced’⁷⁸, more than merely minor mental defects are to be required⁷⁹.

III. Paragraph 1 (b): Intoxication

30 This ground for excluding criminal responsibility is world-wide highly controversial, not at least due to the diverging cultural attitudes towards alcohol. Thus, the handling of intoxication differs greatly from nation to nation⁸⁰. So it cannot surprise that the Statute follows a centerline by neither completely disregarding nor unconditionally recognizing lack of capacity by reason of intoxication as a defence. Although the main approach of the present provision can be found as early as in the Report of the Working Group as accepted by the Preparatory Committee in its December 1997 session⁸¹, the Draft Statute of April 1998 still contained quite a few alternatives⁸². Thus, it was not prior to the session of the Working Group of June 29, 1998⁸³ that the final version was accepted⁸⁴, then by attempting to find a balance between completely disregarding and principally recognizing intoxication as a ground of excluding criminal responsibility.⁸⁵

⁷⁶ As criticized by van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 247, resorting to article 31 para. 3 would have been systematically problematic, however, since this norm only deals with full defences, whilst diminished responsibility only serves as a partial defence. Cf. also Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 401; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 228; Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev[1], 27, considering the option to raise diminished responsibility under article 21.

⁷⁷ Which eventually follows neither the continental-European understanding of diminished responsibility as partial excuse (i.e. a partial reduction of the defendant’s culpability) nor the Anglo-American understanding, where diminished responsibilities reduces the charge to a lesser included offense, for example from murder to manslaughter. On the different approaches to diminished responsibility cf. Krug, (2000) 94 AJIL[317], 328 et seq.

⁷⁸ The qualification ‘substantially’ was already circulated in the Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 122, fn. 13.

⁷⁹ Note, that interpreting the qualification ‘substantially’ with reference to Čelebići, note 54, para. 1166, where the ICTY advanced a substantially impairment test for determining the scope of the diminished responsibility defence of rule 67 lit. A (ii) (b) ICTY, is delicate at best, since the ICTY was prepared, under certain conditions, to understand diminished responsibility as a complete defence (cf. Čelebići, note 54, para. 1164).

⁸⁰ Beside this lack of a common approach to dealing with intoxication, as already addressed in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II (see fn. to article M, p. 98), and still in the Preparatory Committee Draft, p. 69, fn. 24, it was even questioned in principle whether voluntary intoxication was at all a defence worth to be discussed in the context of crimes at stake here: see Report of the Working Group of General Principles of Criminal Law of 3 July 1998, UN Doc. A./CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4, Add.1/Rev.1, p. 4, fn. 8; cf. also Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 324 et seq.; Ambos (1999) 10 CLF [1], 25 et seq. For details to national underpinnings of this defence cf. also Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 480 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) 677 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 230 et seq. As to ICTY cases in which intoxication had – mainly without success – been invoked for excluding criminal responsibility see Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2002, para. 706; Prosecutor v. Todorović, IT-95-9/11-S, Sentencing Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 July 2001, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, IT-98-32-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 29 November 2002, para. 284; Prosecutor v. Mrđja, IT-02-59-S, Decision on the defense motion for medical examination and variation of scheduling order, Trial Chamber I, 15 September 2003.

⁸¹ See article L para. 1 (b) Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 19.

⁸² See article 31 para. 1 (b) Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 67 et seq.

⁸³ article 31 para. 1 (b) Report of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law, Committee of the Whole, UN Doc. A./CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4/Add.1 (1998).

⁸⁴ According to Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 207, as drafter of this provision, this compromise was eventually accepted because it ‘had the benefit of not satisfying anyone’.

⁸⁵ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 324.

As to the provision's scope, at the Rome Conference it was controversial whether intoxication serves as an excuse only to war crimes or also to genocide and crimes against humanity⁸⁶. According to the Working Group's Chairman it was inconceivable that the Court would accept intoxication with regard to the latter two charges⁸⁷. Following this reasoning, Ambos deems it 'absurd to defend a person who committed genocide or crimes against humanity with the argument that he or she was drunk'⁸⁸. Yet, such an a priori limitation of subparagraph (b) can neither be reconciled with the encompassing wording nor is it normatively warranted. Although it seems practically inconceivable that masterminds of a prolonged genocidal engagement or of widespread or systematic attacks against a civilian population raise intoxication, it is not unlikely that an individual genocidal act or a particular crime against humanity is committed by an ordinary low-level person who is actually intoxicated throughout the whole crime and thus should not be precluded from raising subparagraph (b).⁸⁹

This rather lengthy provision can be broken down into two positive elements by requiring a certain state of intoxication (1) by which the person's capacity of appreciation and control is destroyed (2), and a negative element by excluding exculpation if the person was voluntarily intoxicated (3).

1. 'State of intoxication'

Whereas the first drafts had required intoxication to be caused by alcohol or drug consumption⁹⁰, although then opening it to 'other means'⁹¹, the Statute finally rescinded the presupposition of a specific substance or cause by which the intoxication must have been produced. As, however, intoxication by its very meaning implies a sort of toxic impact, it would not suffice that the person acted in a state of excitement or acceleration, as may follow from endogenic causes or external circumstances, though in its effect comparable to drunkenness or drug consumption, rather the intoxication must at least be caused by consumption of an exogenic substance with the effect of an intoxication.⁹²

2. 'Destroys' the person's 'capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness' or the 'capacity to control' the conduct

As in the case of incapacity by mental defect, it would not be sufficient that the intoxication merely diminishes the person's capacity of appreciation and control, but rather it must 'destroy' the personal ability to realize and estimate that he is acting unlawfully or, if the person is still aware of the unlawfulness of the conduct, lacks the ability to control it according to the requirements of law⁹³.

⁸⁶ Cf. Knoops, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (ed.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009), 779, 789; Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev [1], 34; Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1030.

⁸⁷ Reported by Scaliotti (2002) 2 ICLRev [1], 34.

⁸⁸ Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1030.

⁸⁹ As meanwhile also recognized by Ambos Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 328; also agreeing Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 120.

⁹⁰ See article M in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 98.

⁹¹ Cf. Article 25 (L) para. 1 (b) Zutphen Draft, p. 61.

⁹² Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 328; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 229.

⁹³ van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 229; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 679. For further details to this parallel component of the intoxication and the incapacity defences see above mn 26 et seq.

3. Unless ‘voluntarily intoxicated’ in that the person ‘knew or disregarded the risk’ of being ‘likely to engage in conduct constituting a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’

35 By excluding exculpation if the person concerned became voluntarily intoxicated, the Statute attempts to prevent a mala fide procured state of incapacity, as it would be the case if penal law were to tolerate that a person puts himself into a state of non-responsibility by means of intoxication with the objective of committing a crime and later to invoke his lack of capacity as a ground for excluding responsibility. Instead of denying any voluntary intoxication an exculpation, however, the Statute follows the principle of actio libera in causa by presupposing that the person ‘knew’ or ‘disregarded the risk’ of getting involved in criminal conduct at the point of becoming intoxicated. Evidently, this bars intoxication as a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if the defendant intentionally sought ‘Dutch courage’ to commit a crime.⁹⁴ Less clear, however, is the exclusion of the defence when the defendant merely disregarded the risk of committing a crime under the influence of alcohol or other drugs. Whereas, at first, Ambos seemed to consider negligence as sufficient for excluding the defence⁹⁵, other sources require that the person concerned was not only cognitively aware of the likelihood of committing a crime but also anticipatorily approved this (in terms of dolus eventualis)⁹⁶. Although this may be doubtful from a systematic point of view, as it means introducing a mental standard that was otherwise carefully avoided in the Statute⁹⁷, it is nevertheless submitted that paragraph 1 (b) establishes a test that resides between negligence and dolus eventualis, by precluding the intoxication defence if the defendant acted recklessly with regard to getting involved in a crime. This conclusion not only takes into account the provision’s controversial legislative history – as a hard-fought compromise between most Arab States, considering voluntary intoxication as an aggravating circumstance, and most western countries, by precluding conceptualizing even voluntary intoxication as a ground for mitigation if not exculpation; applying a recklessness standard is also supported by the wording since disregarding a risk insinuates that the person concerned is nothing more and nothing less than mentally aware of running the risk of committing a crime. It yet has to be noted that the defendant’s recklessness is not to be determined singularly by the ‘risk’ of engaging in international criminal conduct; rather the recklessness requirement is somewhat moderated by the Statute’s reiteration that the person concerned disregarded the ‘risk’ of ‘likely’ committing a crime. Consequently, intoxication is only then excluded as a defence if (a) the person intentionally became drunk or otherwise intoxicated and (b) knowingly or recklessly took the risk that, due to the intoxication, he would be likely to commit or otherwise get involved in a crime.⁹⁸ Thus, intoxication can be invoked as a defence if and as long as the person was involuntarily intoxicated or, although having voluntarily become drunk or stupefied by drugs, was not aware of the risk that he could engage in criminal conduct as a ramification of the intoxication.

⁹⁴ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 329, 330; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 403.

⁹⁵ Cf. Ambos, Zur Rechtsgrundlage des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs – Eine Analyse des Rom-Statuts, 111 ZStW 189 (1999), contending that a ‘fahrlässige’ actio libera in causa is enough for barring the defence (but as of now see also Ambos, note 98).

⁹⁶ As it may in particular be concluded from the Official German translation of ‘disregarding the risk’ in paragraph 1 (b) as ‘in Kauf nehmen’ and as also supported by Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 444 (holding that paragraph 1 (b) requires ‘dolus eventualis’) and Satzger, Internationales und Europäisches Strafrecht (2013) 307.

⁹⁷ Cf. Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, 932.

⁹⁸ In the final end coming to the same standard of recklessness see for a concurring interpretation Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 682 as well as meanwhile also Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 222; cf. also id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 328 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 229 et seq.; more strict by identifying recklessness with dolus eventualis cf. Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 120 fn. 137.

Yet, even if the person is aware of such likelihood, he is only barred from exculpation if the conduct he is likely to become involved in would be ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the court’. This means that even in a case in which a soldier is aware that, due to his drunkenness, he might commit a murder, he could hardly be barred from invoking intoxication as a defence as long as he was not aware of the genocidal or anti-humanitarian character of the murder in terms of article 6 or 7 of this Statute⁹⁹. This requirement must not be taken lightly¹⁰⁰ since committing an international crime should normally be, even in times of war and conflict, an exceptional or, to use the Statute’s term, unlikely event. Thus, if so wanted or not, due to this clause intoxication may well serve as general defence that is only exceptionally precluded if there is an actio libera in causa. This especially holds true with regard to intoxication with drugs or alcohol. Although, as a matter of experience, criminal involvement seems more likely to occur in case of voluntary intoxication with these substances, it would turn the provision’s rule-exception-relationship upside down to only leave room for this defence if the intoxication was procured by ‘other means’ than drug or alcohol¹⁰¹.

IV. Paragraph 1 (c): Self-defence, defence of another person, and defence of property in war crimes

‘The principle enshrined in this provision’, as aptly summarized by the ICTY in Kordic, ‘reflects provisions found in most national criminal codes and may be regarded as constituting a rule of customary international law’¹⁰². Although, thus, legitimate defence as a ‘classical’ ground of justification had already been contained in the Preparatory Committee’s compilation of 1996¹⁰³, its concept and phrasing remained highly controversial until the very last framing of this provision¹⁰⁴. Whereas the Draft Statute of April 1998 was sent to the ⁹⁹ As this reference and limitation to the ‘jurisdiction of the court’ was added to the last sentence of article 31 para. 1 (b) rather late, namely (according to the available papers) by the Chairman’s (of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law) proposal for article 31 para. 1 (b) Option 3 (UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.8/Rev.1 (25 June 1998)), it is not quite clear whether this restriction of the responsibility by actio libera in causa was made on purpose or whether an interpretation different from that assumed here was intended. Also see Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 213 fn. 160, guessing that in the application of this provision judges coming from legal systems rejecting voluntary intoxication may read the Statute more narrowly on this point.

¹⁰⁰ As rightly stressed in particular with regard to the difficult proof of such an intent by Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1030.

¹⁰¹ As suggested by van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 250 and, as a matter of practice, reiterated van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 230.

¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 26 February 2001, para. 451; cf. Knoops, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (eds.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009) 779, 788 et seq. To national underpinnings of self-defence cf. van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 264 et seq., to precedents in post-Second War case law cf. Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 305 et seq.; McCormack, in: Abtahi and Boas (eds.), The Dynamics of International Criminal Justice (2005) 231, 239 et seq.; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 487 et seq.

¹⁰³ See article N 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 99 with Annex, pp. 15 et seq.

¹⁰⁴ See Report of the Working Group of 29 June 1998, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4/Add.1, p. 5 note 13. Cf. also the report and criticism of David, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (eds.), Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court. Essays in honour of Professor Igor Blishchenko (2009) 757, 758 et seq. Whilst David’s fundamental denial of the usefulness of self-defence in the area of international crimes seems feasible as to genocide and crimes against humanity since those crimes may indeed hardly be justifiable by self-defence (cf. Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) 228; above note 2, Knoops, in: Doria, Gasser and Bassiouni (ed.), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (2009) 779, 789), regarding war crimes, however, his absolute preclusion of self-defence appears misguided by the assumption that in war, on the one hand, every (ordinarily penalized) action is permitted as long as it does not amount to a war crime but that, on the other hand, a war crime may be justified only if permitted by international humanitarian law. Both assumptions, however, are questionable: the first one because war does not as per se provide a license to kill (as, contrary to common belief, delegates of the Rome Conference with quite a few undecided alternatives and a lengthy wording¹⁰⁵, the first sentence of the present provision seems to go back to a proposal by the USA of June 1998¹⁰⁶, not yet, however, did it include the defence of property in case of war crimes which in terms of ‘military necessity’ was originally conceived as a separate ground for excluding criminal responsibility¹⁰⁷, but was finally integrated into the first sentence of this provision on proposal of the Working Group¹⁰⁸. The last sentence of the provision, dealing with defensive operations, was finally added in the very last minute by the Drafting Committee¹⁰⁹.

Basically three requirements are essential for the exclusion of criminal responsibility under this provision: a person not merely being involved in a defensive operation (1), a qualified danger to a person or property by unlawful force (2), and an appropriate defence against it (3).

1. ‘Person’ (not merely) ‘involved in a defensive operation’

38 Although unusual, to start with the second sentence of subparagraph (c) is warranted because this clause helps to reveal the scope of the Statute’s self-defence provision¹¹⁰. Most fundamentally, ‘self-defence’ as known in public international law and as used in criminal law is to be distinguished.

39 First, since the Rome Statute is only concerned with the individual criminal responsibility of human actors, subparagraph (c) does not address the defensive use of force by States (or equivalent non-State actors), as left unimpaired by article 51 UN Charter¹¹¹. This distinction between self-defence on the levels of international criminal and of public international law and their terminological designations is additionally confused by the fact that article 51 UN Charter distinguishes between ‘individual self-defence’ of a Member State (in case of an armed attack) and ‘collective self-defence’ rendered by other Member States (in support of analysed in more detail by Eser in the contributions referred to below note 120) and, secondly, as there is no international principle which would allow justifications only if provided for by international humanitarian law. This is at least true for the conduct and responsibility of individual actors (while the responsibility of states may be different). Cf. also the counter-criticism to David by Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 489 and Weigend, in: Sieber et al. (eds.), Strafrecht und Wirtschaftsstrafrecht. Festschrift für Klaus Tiedemann (2008) 1439, 1440 et seq.

¹⁰⁵ See article 31 para. 1 (d) Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 68, based on article L para. 1 (d) Zutphen Draft, p. 62.

¹⁰⁶ Article 31 para. 1 (b) Proposal by the United States of America for single provision covering issues currently governed by articles 31, 32, 33 and 34 (UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.2 (1998)); a similar proposal, although not yet containing defence of property, had been made by Japan (cf. Annex of the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 16).

¹⁰⁷ See article R in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 103; article 33 Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 17.

¹⁰⁸ See article 31 para. 1 (c), Report of the Working Group, note 78, pp. 4 et seq.

¹⁰⁹ In this sense, as already favored by some delegations (see Report of the Working Group, note 78, p. 5, fn. 12), article 30 para. 1 (c), sentence 2 Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole (UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.65/Rev.1 (1998)), p. 7). – To the genesis of this article of the Statute cf. also Ambos (1999) 10 CLF [1], 26 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 235; as to comparative examples in national criminal codes cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 330 et seq.

¹¹⁰ Just to the contrary, van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 264 considers the clause as ‘superfluous’, reasoning that ‘a defensive operation does not qualify as a reaction to an “unlawful use of force”. If this is to mean that a defensive operation is either not a ‘reaction’ (but rather an action) or, if to be considered as a reaction, is directed against a not ‘unlawful’ (and thus lawful) use of force, then her statement would not express more than a truism. In fact, however, sentence 2 of subparagraph (c) can truly function as indicating the distinctions between various levels which must be observed in the following and as they are aptly presented by van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 254 et seq. as well as by van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 233 et seq., though without taking reference to the clause in question.

¹¹¹ See Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 334 et seq.; Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 158 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 630 et seq. cf. also Keijzer (2000) 39 RDPMDG [69]; id., (2000) 39 RDPMDG [100], 102.

the attacked State)¹¹². Therefore, if one wants to talk of ‘individual’ or ‘collective’ self-defence as performed by a combatant in the context of article 31 para. 1 (c) of the Rome Statute, one must be aware that this provision renders a further distinction with regard to the individual acting in self-defence: by disqualifying individuals ‘involved in a defensive operation’ who, as according to sentence 2, are not per se excluded from criminal responsibility, sentence 1 is in fact justifying only ‘private’ self-defence as distinct from ‘operational’ self-defence carried out within or in course of a collective action. Thus, although paragraph 1 (c) by speaking of acts of a ‘person’ obviously concerns ‘individual’ self-defence in terms of criminal law only, the exclusion of criminal responsibility still depends on whether the individual defended himself (merely or also) in his personal (non-official) capacity (‘private self-defence’) or solely in his official capacity as agent of a collective entity, like a State (‘operational self-defence’). This exemption of (purely) ‘operational self-defence’ (in terms of sentence 2) from (at least to some degree also) ‘private self-defence’ (in terms of sentence 1) means that the justification of the concrete defensive act must be distinguished from its possibly collective context in two directions: On the one hand, the self-protecting action of a combatant is not simply privileged because of its embedment in an attack that is legal according to public international law; for this reason, the wide field opened by sentence 1 for defence of qualified property in war crimes can be substantially narrowed¹¹³. On the other hand, ‘private self-defence’ (as described before) is not privileged only because its operational framework is legal, nor is it foreclosed only because the operational context is illegal¹¹⁴ – just as ius ad bellum and actio in bello are to be kept distinct. In other words¹¹⁵, collective self-defence (by a state against another state) and private self-defence (by an individual soldier) are independent from each other¹¹⁶: the former as a matter of public international law, the latter as a matter of international criminal law¹¹⁷. Consequently, in the same way as, on the one hand, the legality or illegality of a collective defence operation in terms of article 51 UN Charter does not depend on the lawful or unlawful conduct of individual soldiers, is, on the other hand, the justification of individual war crimes by virtue of self-defence not depending on the public legitimacy of the state’s original resort to military force¹¹⁸.

Second, although due to sentence 2 pure ‘operational self-defence’ cannot avail itself of sentence 1, that does not mean that this kind of defensive action remains without any ground for excluding criminal responsibility. For as the reservation by sentence 2 regarding the involvement in a collective defence situation is explicitly limited to subparagraph (c), international criminal responsibility in connection with defensive operations may still be excluded by other provisions, such as under public international law¹¹⁹. If, for example, a head of State orders a military defence operation in order to fight back an enemy State, although he cannot

¹¹² Cf. Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeinen Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (1998) 358 et seq.; Randelzhofer, in: Simma (ed.), The Charter of the United Nations – A Commentary (2002) mn 37 et seq.; Franck, Recourse to Force: State Action against Threats and Armed Attacks (2002) 23 et seq. Whilst the negotiations on the definition of aggression could have offered the possibility of clarifying the involvement in a ‘defensive operation’, unfortunately this opportunity was not used: cf. Van Schaack (2011) 11 ICLRev [477], 486 et seq.

¹¹³ Cf. below mn 44.

¹¹⁴ Cf. Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1034.

¹¹⁵ And thereby also revising a statement (made prior to the Rome Statute in: Dinstein and Taborj (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 263) which, by explaining individual self defence as being available only in a ‘derivative manner’, may be considered misleading.

¹¹⁶ Cf. Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 309.

¹¹⁷ Cf. van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 234.

¹¹⁸ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 334 et seq.; McCormack, in: Abtahi and Boas (eds.), The Dynamics of International Criminal Justice (2005) 231, 232 et seq.; as to potential overflows from the ius ad bellum to the ius in bello, however, cf. also v. d. Wilt, in: Swart, Zahar and Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (2011) 275, 277 et seq.

¹¹⁹ Cf. Report of the Working Group of 8 July 1998, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4/Add.3 (1998), p. 2 (fn. 1) to ‘accomplishing a military mission’ which declares that ‘the use of force by States is governed by the applicable international law’.

raise self-defence under paragraph 1 (c), he still may take resort to the defences in terms of paragraph 3, as, in particular, to article 51 UN Charter. Accordingly, although a combatant, while not being himself in acute danger, may not be justified by paragraph 1 (c) for eliminating an enemy on the battlefield, he could still refer to the (traditionally) general allowance of killing an enemy combatant under international humanitarian law¹²⁰.

2. 'imminent and unlawful use of force' against (specific) legally protected interests

- 41 a) The exclusion of criminal responsibility in any of the various instances of this provision requires the 'imminent' and 'unlawful' 'use of force'. As force can be exerted in various ways and to a varying degree and no further qualification is required by this provision, force can be understood in a broad way, not necessarily requiring a physical attack, but also including psychic threats, provided that their effects are not only announced for the future but exerting coercion presently¹²¹.

This use of force has to be imminent. Although a literal approach to 'immediacy' and a systematic comparison with paragraph 1 (d), where it was deemed necessary to mention 'continuing or imminent' risks, suggests otherwise, there is common agreement that a use of force is imminent if it is immediately antecedent, presently exercised or still enduring¹²². Thus, a defender neither has to wait until a danger has become present, nor is it allowed to use pre-emptive or even preventive means to circumvent a use of force, nor is it permitted to retaliate against an already passed attack.

As a third requirement, the use of force by the attacker must be unlawful. This is the case when the use of force is not justified for its part by law or any other legally valid permission or order. On the other hand, however, the unlawful force needs not to be criminal for being averted¹²³. Thus, self-defence will be available against an unlawful attack even if the aggressor may be excused by reason of insanity or because he has not yet reached the age of being criminally responsible. Accordingly, there is no right to defend oneself against someone who is acting lawfully¹²⁴. As to the afore mentioned distinction between 'personal' and 'operational' actions¹²⁵, the unlawfulness of the 'use of force' under paragraph 1 (c) must not be confused ¹²⁰ Whilst on a different way coming to a similar result, see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 335 with further references. Strangely though, however, if it comes to the killing of enemy combatants on the battlefield, one hardly can find an explicit foundation of its justification, the implicit reason being that acts of war seem to be basically exempted from the 'normal' provisions on murder and manslaughter (like in German terms characterized as 'nicht tatbestandsmäßig' by Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 450); accordingly, in pre-supposing killing in war as in principle being justified, 'Rules of Engagement' – like similar conventions and rules of war – traditionally are understood as mere restrictions of (rather than foundations) of justifications which, as assumed in customary international law, are not considered to require further legitimization. For details to this issue, which in the past had found less attention than it would have deserved, see – with detailed references – Eser, in: Dölling et al. (eds.), Verbrechen – Strafe – Resozialisierung Festschrift für Heinz Schöch (2010) 461 et seq.; id., in: Appel, Hermes and Schönberger (eds.), Öffentliches Recht im offenen Staat. Festschrift für Rainer Wahl (2011) 665 et seq.; id., in: Löhnig, Preisner and Schlemmer (eds.), Krieg und Recht (2014) 239, id., 'Killing in War: Unasked Questions – Ill-founded Legitimization' (2016), 10 Criminal Law and Philosophy (forthcoming).

¹²¹ This broad notion of 'force' is also supported by the fact that stronger alternatives which, for instance, required threat of death or serious bodily harm (see article 31 para. 1 (d) Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 68), were finally not accepted, nor was ever required force in form of 'violence' (as demanded by Weigend, in: Joecks (ed.), Münchener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch (2009) § 2 VStGB, mn 18): such a phrasing would, of course, be more readily open for implying some physical impact. Agreeing with the broad interpretation of 'force' Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1032, id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 339; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 238.

¹²² Cf. Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1032; Regierungsentwurf Völkerstrafgesetzbuch, note 59, 34. As in particular regarding the killing of Osama bin Laden, as not being armed at the relevant time, the criterion of an 'imminent' force may be doubted: Ambos (2011) 66 JZ [763].

¹²³ Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 405.

¹²⁴ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 339 et seq. with further comparative qualifications.

¹²⁵ Cf. mn 39.

with the legality or illegality of a collective engagement. Paragraph 1 (c) is concerned with the unlawfulness of the individual attack, whilst it is indifferent to this attack's being part of a legal or illegal collective campaign¹²⁶.

b) Paragraph 1 (c) is limited to the defence of specifically protected interests. With respect to all crimes falling under the jurisdiction of the Court, paragraph 1 (c) justifies an accused's action to defend himself or herself or another person. As probably recognized world-wide, the concept of legitimate defence is not limited to self-defence but also comprises defence of 'another person' who has been endangered by an unlawful attack. Whereas this requirement certainly precludes mere danger to any property¹²⁷, a person can be endangered with regard to his or her own life, physical integrity and liberty or that of a third person¹²⁸.

c) With respect to the special 'case of war crimes', the defence clause of paragraph 1 (c) is opened to the protection of 'property', though only if one of two qualifications is present. One concerns property which is 'essential for the survival of a person'. This seems to be merely a special case of the general and uncontroversial protection of a person's life: the defended property not only has to ensure that a person continues to exist in a very primordial physical sense ('survival'), it must be indispensable ('essential') in that a human's very continuing existence hinges on said property. The other qualified protection concerns property which is 'essential for accomplishing a military mission'. As certainly one of the Statute's most intriguing clauses the exact scope of which is yet to be determined, it goes back to defences by reasons of 'military necessity' under international humanitarian law¹²⁹. Since so far international humanitarian law did not entitle the military to commit war crimes in order to repel an unlawful use of force against the property at issue, paragraph 1 (c) is harshly criticized for (purportedly) introducing an according allowance to the laws of war¹³⁰. Further, the notion of essential military property is hard to interpret in the light of its intertwining individual legitimate defence as known in municipal criminal law with the collective dimension of international humanitarian law¹³¹.

In order to prevent this clause from being used as a readily available 'panacea' in any sort of military confrontation, at least three limitations are to be observed. First, with regard to sentence 2 of paragraph 1 (c) which was purposefully inserted so as to stress that justifying 'private self-defence' cannot be invoked simply by reference to a collective 'defensive operation'. Thus, the protection of essential military property is not concerned with a collective's defence of collective goods, but merely with the somewhat unprecedented individual's defence of collective interests¹³². Second, it is further required that the defended ¹²⁶ Not disentangling the collective use of force from the use of force presupposed in paragraph 1 (c) leads to a confused or at least unclear understanding of the Statute's self-defence provision. At the Rome Conference, the delegation of Mexico intended to add the footnote to the effect that this provision does not apply to the use of force between states (reported by Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 167). What is more, some delegations held that individual self-defence under paragraph 1 (c) presupposes the legality of the collective engagement that the defendant is involved in (reported and discussed by Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1033).

¹²⁷ As it had been proposed by the US without any further qualification: see above note 106 to article 31 para. (b); cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 340 et seq.

¹²⁸ Ambos, ibid., 340; Weigend, in: Sieber et al. (eds.), Strafrecht und Wirtschaftsstrafrecht. Festschrift für Klaus Tiedemann (2008) 1439, 1447; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 624; in particular regarding the defence of liberty see Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 444.

¹²⁹ Cf. 1996 Preparatory Committee II to article R, p. 103.

¹³⁰ Cassese (1999) 10 EJIL [144], 154; id., International Criminal Law (2008) 230; David, Principes de droits des conflits armés (4th, ed. 2008) 902.

¹³¹ Cf. Keijzer (2000) 39 RDPMDG [100], 108, complaining that individuals with no legal training might (wrongly) read in paragraph 1 (c) that 'military necessity' serves as a general justification in international criminal law.

¹³² Cf. Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 341. Insofar it is questionable whether paragraph 1 (c) indeed introduces a new norm to international humanitarian law. For as clarified by its sentence 2, paragraph 1 (c) entitles neither the military as a collective unit nor persons who act as agents for a collective entity to commit war crimes in order to defend property which is essential for accomplishing a military mission against imminent and unlawful use of force.

property is ‘essential’ for ‘accomplishing’ a ‘military mission’. Although ‘mission’ covers all kinds of stand-alone military operations, irrespective of their importance in an overall campaign and independent of the amount of personnel involved, the scope of property being legally protected by paragraph 1 (c) is still rather narrow, since the defended property not only has to ensure that the mission’s objectives can be realized (‘accomplish’), it is also necessary that achieving a mission’s goals hinges on said property, i. e. that it is indispensable (‘essential’). If the attacked property is replaceable and its substitution does not infringe the military mission, it is not protected under paragraph 1 (c).¹³³ Finally, it is to be emphasized that the protection of essential military property must not be sweepingly equated with ‘military necessity’ as a ground of excluding criminal responsibility in terms of which it is at present generally not recognized¹³⁴. Paragraph 1 (c) allows for war crimes only as a response to an unlawful use of force, whilst military necessity, in not stipulating a similar requirement, is eventually far broader.

45 d) In any case, the use of force as well as the danger to person or property must be objectively given and may not only exist in the subjective belief of the defender. Although various proposals were prepared to admit self-defence even in the case that the person merely ‘reasonably believes’ that there is a threat to the person concerned¹³⁵, this expansion of self-defence, as known particularly in common law countries¹³⁶, was not adopted in the end. Therefore, a person who is not actually attacked or endangered but merely believes that to be the case, may resort to mistake of fact according to article 32 for excluding criminal responsibility¹³⁷.

3. ‘Reasonably acts to defend in a manner proportionate to the degree of danger’

46 a) The defensive reaction must be reasonable in terms of being necessary as well as able to prevent the danger. This means that the defensive reaction might neither be excessive by causing more harm to the aggressor¹³⁸ than is needed for diverting the attack or a danger nor inapt by implying inefficient or otherwise futile means.¹³⁹ Whether an accused reacted reasonable in case of self-exposure or provocation is not regulated in the Statute and was left for the Court to decide under paragraph 2 of Art. 31.¹⁴⁰ 47 b) Furthermore, even as far as the defensive reaction is reasonable in terms of necessary and suitable to divert the force and danger, it still must be performed in a ‘proportionate’

¹³³ Agreeing Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 341.

¹³⁴ Cf. above note 33.- Such a confusion of ‘necessities of war’ or of the ‘conflict’ (by which the destruction of an enemy’s property is not considered a war crime according to article 8 (2)(b)(XIII) or 8(2)(e)(XII) respectively) and a ‘ground of excluding responsibility’ (in terms of article 31), however, is unfortunately furthered by the fact that in the Elements of Crimes (article 9) the aforementioned war crimes are interpreted as requiring ‘not (to be) justified by military necessity’. This language, as it can also be found in decisions of the ICTY (Kordić and Čerkez (Trial Chamber Judgment), note 102, para. 451) and the ICC (Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 16 December 2011, paras. 172, 175, 176), is misleading by seemingly raising ‘military necessity’ to a justifying ground of excluding criminal responsibility of a war crime (as given by having fulfilled all positive statutory elements) whilst, in fact, the lack of military needs (in the aforementioned crimes) is, both already and merely, a negative element for constituting destruction of property as a war crime at all.

¹³⁵ After this concept had already been expressed in article 33–12 of the Updated Siracusa Draft (in Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 948), it was contained as an alternative in Proposal 1 of article N in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 99, and still proposed as an alternative in article 31 para. 1 (d) Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 68.

¹³⁶ Cf. the codes listed by Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1021 et seq., 1032.

¹³⁷ To the same end cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 339; McCormack, in: Abtahi and Boas (eds.), The Dynamics of International Criminal Justice (2005) 231, 238; Sadat Wexler, Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court based on the Preparatory Committee’s Text to the Diplomatic Conference, Rome June 15 – July 17 (1998) 57; cf. also Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, 937 et seq.

¹³⁸ Note that self-defence is only permissible against the attacker and not against third persons.

¹³⁹ Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 308.

¹⁴⁰ Cf. Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 166. For details to this paragraph cf. below mn 63 et seq.

manner. This means that even self-defence is not an unlimited right¹⁴¹, but restricted by the principle of proportionality. At first glance, the Statute is rather strict in requiring positive proportionality between the defensive reaction and the danger sought to be avoided. Evidently, this would give the Court little leeway in its considerations, far less flexibility than a negative ‘not disproportionate’ test would entail¹⁴². Yet, as solely the ‘degree of danger’ to the person or property protected is named as criterion for the proportionality of the defensive reaction, the Court’s estimation is offered a wide range: neither does a waging of different sorts of defended and thereby violated personal or property interests seem to be precluded, nor is deadly defensive reaction, as objected to by some proposals¹⁴³, categorically excluded. Nevertheless, defensive reactions that kill an assailant should be restricted to cases where either death or serious bodily harm is to be prevented.¹⁴⁴

c) Finally, in subjective terms, a defender has to act ‘to defend’ himself. This leaves open, however, whether self-defence merely requires the defendant’s awareness of the imminent and unlawful use of force¹⁴⁵, thus justifying him even if he was determined by other motives (such as hatred or vengeance), or whether countering the unlawful attack must be the main, if not sole, purpose of the defender in terms of an ‘ulterior intent’¹⁴⁶, thus barring justification if the attack was in fact merely exploited for pursuing other motives than defensive ones. A fair solution may be found in the middle of the road: whereas, on the one hand, the volitional element inherent in ‘to defend’ would be missed if mere knowledge of an imminent attack allowed any reaction regardless of the motivation whatsoever, on the other hand, the complexity of motivations in a given situation is a human phenomenon. Therefore countering an unlawful attack needs not exclusively but at least partially (also) be motivated by defensive ends¹⁴⁷.

V. Paragraph 1 (d): Duress

Among the many compromises which had to be made in order to get this Statute accepted, paragraph 1 (d) is one of the least convincing provisions, as in an ill-guided and lastly failed attempt it tried to combine two different concepts: (justifying) ‘necessity’ and (merely ¹⁴¹ As it may appear in clauses, such as in the German Penal Code (§ 32), which do not expressly require proportionality of the defence. cf. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) 303; van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 261.

¹⁴² Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 453. – Differently, Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1034 seems to equate ‘proportionate’ with ‘not disproportionate’.

¹⁴³ Cf. Article 31 para. 1 (d) Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 68 with ft. 95.

¹⁴⁴ In the same vein see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 342; Weigend, in: Sieber et al. (eds.), Strafrecht und Wirtschaftsstrafrecht. Festschrift für Klaus Tiedemann (2008) 1439, 1450. As to whether torture may never be proportionate or even absolutely excluded, as commonly submitted (cf. Joyner, in: Sadat and Scharf (eds.), The Theory and Practice of International Criminal Law (2008) 227 et seq.) or whether and to what degree merely threatening bodily harm for rescuing a victim from being killed may be feasible, see below note 156.

¹⁴⁵ As advanced by Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 831, id., in: Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (2011) 299, 308 et seq.; similar Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 120.

¹⁴⁶ As perhaps assumed by McCormack, in: Abtahi and Boas (eds.), The Dynamics of International Criminal Justice (2005) 231, 238; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 629 and Kreicker, in: Eser and Kreicker (eds.), Nationale Strafverfolgung völkerrechtlicher Verbrechen (2003) 270, 326 with regard to the German term ‘Verteidigungswille’. – As to the of ‘ulterior’ intent cf. Ormerod, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law (2011) 136: ‘an intention ulterior to the actus reus’. A comparable concept may be found in the German concept of ‘Finalität’.

¹⁴⁷ However, even if self-defence may not be available if the defendant was predominantly motivated by other than defensive reasons, as in case that he had even provoked the attack for the purpose of getting a chance to counteract, the fact that the attack, though provoked, remains a wrong which, from an objective point of view, must not be tolerated; nevertheless, by at least being co-motivated finally to avert an (though provoked) attack may lessen the degree of the defender’s wrongdoing so as to be accounted for in sentencing.

excusing) ‘duress’¹⁴⁸. Whereas all Pre-Rome conference proposals and drafts had, more or less, clearly distinguished between necessity and duress¹⁴⁹, it was only in the final stage of the conference that they were mixed up in one provision¹⁵⁰. This reflects (and somewhat continues) a common terminological confusion: In American and English text books, necessity is labeled as duress of circumstances¹⁵¹, the Nuremberg jurisprudence used the term necessity to describe cases of duress¹⁵², ICTY Judge Cassese employs necessity to encompass duress¹⁵³, and the German Criminal Code distinguishes justifying and excusing necessity¹⁵⁴. It is suggested that the distinction between duress and necessity lies with the rationale for excluding criminal responsibility: Here, paragraph 1 (d) blends the justifying choice of a lesser evil (necessity) with excusing situations where the defendant’s freedom of will and decision is so severely limited that there is eventually *no moral choice*¹⁵⁵ available (duress).

50 Understanding paragraph 1 (d) accordingly, it is to be distinguished from the defence of ‘superior orders’ (article 33)¹⁵⁶. Though an order might exert sufficient compulsion so as to curtail a defendant’s freedom of will and, thus, rise to duress, this effect would not fall under ¹⁴⁸ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 208; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 632 et seq. Cf. also Ambos (1999) 10 CLF [1], 27 et seq.; Janssen (2004) ICLRev [83], 97 and, with a comparative survey of national criminal law and pre- and post-war international developments, Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 342 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 243 et seq. – For a converse evaluation cf. Cassese, International Criminal Law (2008) 289, deeming that paragraph 1 (d) ‘rightly lumps necessity and duress together’, whereas his revised edition (2013, p. 216) merely states that this paragraph ‘encompasses both duress by threat and duress by circumstances’.

¹⁴⁹ Starting with these distinction in the Siracusa/Freiburg Draft of AIDP/ISISC/MPI, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court – Alternative to ILC-Draft, prepared by a Committee of Experts, Siracusa/Freiburg July 1995 (at IV.A.1/2 and 9 to article 34, 39, reprinted in Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. (1998) 455), then in the Ad Hoc Committee Report, Annex II sub. 5 (b), p. 59, the various proposals in the Updated Siracusa Draft article 33–13.1 and 2 (in Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 951) and in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, articles O and P, pp. 100 et seq.; cf. also the compilation of various proposals in the Annex of the Preparatory Committee of Mar./Apr. 1996, above note 6, pp. 16–18, resulting in the more or less equivalent proposals of the Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997 (articles L.1 (d) and (e), at p. 19), the Zutphen Draft (articles L.1 (d) and (e), pp. 62 et seq.) and the Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft (article 31 para. 1 (d) and (e), p. 68).

¹⁵⁰ Eventually starting with Working Paper on article 31 of 22 June 1998 (UN Doc. A./CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.6), with some modifications in the Report of the Working Group of 29 June 1998 (UN Doc. A./CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4/Add.1) and finalized by the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole, 14 July 1998 (UN Doc./A/CONF.183/C.1/L.65/Rev.1, article 30 para. 1 (d), p. 7).

¹⁵¹ Cf. Wilson, Criminal Law: doctrine and theory (2003) 278; Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 83. – Generally, it is very common in Anglo-American criminal law to differentiate necessity and duress according to the compulsive source and to classify non-human compulsion as necessity and human compulsion as duress. cf. Kreicker, in: Eser and Kreicker (eds.), Nationale Strafverfolgung völkerrechtlicher Verbrechen (2003) 270, 337 et seq.

¹⁵² For a critical overview cf. Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1005, 1023 et seq., 1035 et seq. To further international jurisprudence cf. van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 279 et seq. and, with particular attention to the Nuremberg judgments, Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (2011) 302 et seq., 308 et seq.

¹⁵³ Cf. Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgment, Separate and dissenting opinion by Judge Cassese, Appeals Chamber, 7 October 1997, para. 14 (hereafter Erdemović). For a thorough analysis of this case see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 361 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) (both with further references) and (with legal policy considerations which under certain conditions may not even exclude justification) Weigend (2012) 10 JICJ. [1219].

¹⁵⁴ Cf. § 34 and § 35 of the German Penal Code. – Further cf. Jescheck (2004) 2 JICJ [48]; qualifying the merger as mirroring a modern development in national criminal law not to distinguish between necessity and duress. With special regard to torture distinguishing between justifying and excusing necessity see Ohlin (2008) 6 JICJ [289]; cf. also below note 178. – For a broader comparative survey see Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 342 et seq.

¹⁵⁵ For the latter definition cf. the Nuremberg jurisprudence in US v. Krauch et al. (case 6), in: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals, Vol. III (1952) 1176; as to ‘no moral choice’, however, see also Weigend (2012) 10 JICJ [1219], 1234 et seq.

¹⁵⁶ Cf. Rowe (1998) 1 YBIHumL [210], 216 et seq.; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 490.

the purview of the defence of superior order since this one is concerned with the protection of (military) hierarchies rather than with the freedom of will of the order's addressee.¹⁵⁷

For making paragraph 1 (d) more transparent, at least four constituents of this rather complex provision must be distinguished: the type of conduct to be excluded from criminal responsibility (1), the elements of duress on the defendant (2), the requirements for the (re)action to avoid the threat (3), and the mental element that accompanies the defendant's (re)action (4).

1. 'Conduct alleged to constitute a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'

Why this clause speaks of conduct 'alleged' to constitute a crime, is difficult to understand. If it is to express no more than the fact that, by the exclusion of criminal responsibility, a crime has not been constituted but remains merely 'alleged', then the same consequence would be true with all other grounds by which criminal responsibility is excluded. Therefore, this phrase, if to be meaningful, would have to express more than that general matter of course. Without having access to the respective deliberations of the Working Group, an explanation could be found in the reference to crimes 'within the jurisdiction of the Court', to the effect that this novel blending of necessity and duress, by which even the killing of innocents – against the majority in Erdemović – may be excluded from responsibility¹⁵⁸, should only be available for crimes according to articles 5–8 of this Statute, thus foreclosing any concessions to national criminal justice systems or the jurisprudence of other international tribunals.

2. 'Duress' resulting from a 'threat of imminent death' or of 'continuing or imminent serious bodily harm' against 'that person or another person' whereby the threat is either 'made by other persons' or 'constituted by other circumstances beyond that person's control'

Within this lengthy phrase four components can be distinguished:

(a) The basic requirement must be a threat of imminent death in terms of appearing to occur closely and seriously, or a threat of continuing or imminent serious bodily harm, thus, in its exculpating scope narrower than in case of self defence¹⁵⁹, also requiring more than easily healed superficial wounds. In the same vein a merely abstract danger or simply an elevated probability that a dangerous situation might occur would not suffice¹⁶⁰; nevertheless may the imminence of a threat be present in an overall continuing state of emergency¹⁶¹ (as in terms of a 'Dauernotstand'¹⁶²). Like the attack in self-defence, the threat must be objectively given and not merely exist in the perpetrator's mind¹⁶³.

(b) As to its origin, the threat must be either made by other persons, as it is the case when the person concerned is the victim of coercion¹⁶⁴, or constituted by other circumstances

¹⁵⁷ Furthermore cf. Blakesley (1998) 67 RIDP [139], 182 et seq. and above Eser, in: Dinstein and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 254 et seq.

¹⁵⁸ Cf. below note 188.

¹⁵⁹ As, in particular, here excluding the protection of property; cf. above mn 42; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 357.b.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 357 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 638, giving the example of the abstract omnipresence of the Gestapo in the Third Reich. The concrete imminence of the threat could become pertinent in a case of coerced recruitment, especially of child soldiers, since an accused cannot raise the duress defence, if he was 'only' coercively enrolled generally but not forced to commit the charged offence.

¹⁶¹ Cf. Bond and Fourgere (2014) 14 ICLRev [471], 471 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 638.

¹⁶² Cf. Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 35 mn 12, at 708 with reference to id. in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 34 mn 17, at 687.

¹⁶³ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 357; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 408. cf. above mn 44.

¹⁶⁴ Different from self-defence (article 31 (1) subparagraph (c)), however, in the instance of subparagraph (d) the threat is not required to be unlawful; were this the case, then the person defending himself against an beyond that person's control, as is the case of danger which does not result from another person's action, but from other sorts of endangerment by natural forces or technical menaces. The clause 'beyond that person's control' ('indépendants de sa volonté') insinuates that self-induced risks, regardless whether concerning human-made or natural threats, cannot provide an excuse by paragraph 1 (d)¹⁶⁵. However, an exact definition of self-exposure was consciously avoided at the Rome Conference and was left to the Court to decide under paragraph 2 of art. 31.¹⁶⁶

55 (c) The person exposed to the threat can be either the defendant himself or another person. This broad approach allows not only the preservation from own endangerment but also emergency assistance for third persons. Different from certain national criminal codes, however, which would limit acting under 'altruistic' duress to relatives or persons similarly close to the defendant¹⁶⁷, this Statute does not explicitly require any special relationship between the defendant and said third person. Nevertheless, averting threats from strangers may for other reasons fail to fulfill paragraph 1 (d) as, for instance, depending on the circumstances of the individual case the threat to a stranger may not be grave enough as to compel a reasonable person to commit an international crime.¹⁶⁸ Therefore, particularly with regard to 'altruistic' actions, the following requirement needs attention:

56 (d) The threat must result in 'duress' causing the crime. In this component of the provision, duress functions as mediator between threat and criminal conduct: the threat must cause duress which in turn causes the alleged criminal reaction. In order to be caused, however, duress not only implies a certain state of mind in which the defendant's will is overborne, but is also contingent on the threat's capacity to overbear that will. As a brief comparative analysis may show, the latter dimension of duress opens it for normative and, for that matter, objective limitations: Whether one demands, as the Law Commission for England and Wales does, that 'the threat is one which in all the circumstances ... [the defendant] cannot reasonably be expected to resist'¹⁶⁹, or whether, according to the US Model Penal Code, the threat must have been sufficiently great that 'a person of reasonable firmness in the [defendant's] situation would have been unable to resist'¹⁷⁰, all these propositions lastly rest on a concept which in German theory and law has been labeled as 'Unzumutbarkeit'¹⁷¹, finding adoption in Romanic theory in terms of 'no exigibilidad'¹⁷² and 'inesigibilita'¹⁷³ respectively: in recognizing duress as an excuse only if the defendant acted upon threats that the 'normal' person cannot be fairly expected to endure¹⁷⁴. Conversely, threats that are otherwise avertable do not result in 'duress' proper.

unlawful threat of death or bodily harm could even be justified according to paragraph 1 (c); see above mn 41. Regarding the relationship and difference between duress and superior order cf. above to notes 156 et seq.

¹⁶⁵ Cf. Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 408; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 644; disagreeing Heller, in: Heller and Dubber (eds.), Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (2011) 593, 613 by restricting this clause to self-procured natural risks.

¹⁶⁶ Cf. Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 153.

¹⁶⁷ As, for instance, § 35 German Penal Code.

¹⁶⁸ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 357.

¹⁶⁹ See § 42 in: The Law Commission, A Criminal Code for England and Wales, Vol. I (1989). Further, the House of Lords answered affirmative to the question: 'Does the defense of duress fail if the prosecution proves that a person of reasonable firmness sharing the characteristics of the defendant would not have given way to the threats as did the defendant?' R v Howe and Others (1987) CLRev 480.

¹⁷⁰ Sect. 2.09 (1) US Model Penal Code.

¹⁷¹ As one of the first to develop this concept see Henkel, in: Engisch (ed.), Festschrift für Edmund Mezger (1954) 249. As to the implementation of 'Zumutbarkeit' in § 35 German Penal Code see Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 35 mn 13 a, et 709.

¹⁷² See Mir Puig, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2011) 604 et seq.; Zaffaroni, Derecho Penal. Parte General (2003) 744 et seq.

¹⁷³ Fiandaca and Musco, Diritto Penale. Parte Generale (2010) 408.

¹⁷⁴ Bundesgerichtshof, 4 StR 140/92, 21.05.1992 (1992) 12 NStZ [487]. Also cf. Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 35 mn 14, at 710. As to the translation of 'Zumutbarkeit' as 'fair expectability' cf. Fletcher, in: Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung (1987) 167, 171.

Accordingly, paragraph 1 (d) only applies if the defendant cannot be fairly expected to withstand or assume the risk. Thus, a threat results in ‘duress’ only if it is not otherwise avoidable, i. e. if a reasonable person in comparable circumstances would not have submitted and would not have been driven to the relevant criminal conduct. It is therefore neither required to show special valor, prowess or heroism, nor does a weak will or a weakness of character exclude the criminal responsibility of a defendant¹⁷⁵. This is not to say that one may simply follow the most convenient way out, rather has the coerced person to seek every reasonable, not too distant evasive alternative for avoiding the commission of a crime¹⁷⁶. Furthermore, if the yardstick for measuring what threats a person may fairly be expected to resist shall not be left entirely to the subjective sentiments and attitudes of the person concerned, fair expectability cannot be determined without regard to this person’s social function and legal obligations; this means that police officers, firemen or soldiers due to their official position can be expected more resistance in enduring dangers than normal citizens¹⁷⁷.

3. ‘The person acts necessarily and reasonably to avoid this threat’

Different from self-defence where reasonableness and proportionality is required (above D. IV. 3), here a ‘necessary’ and ‘reasonable’ act is asked for. This, undisputedly, means that the act directed at avoiding the threat must be necessary in terms of no other means being available and reasonable for reaching the desired effect¹⁷⁸.

Beyond this primarily factual test, however, the prevailing opinion would ask for more by interpreting ‘reasonable’ as to entail an *objective proportionality or balancing test*¹⁷⁹, to the effect that the harm sought to be avoided outweighs, from a normative standpoint, the caused harm: accordingly, a defendant is said only to act ‘reasonable’ if his (re)action is proportionate¹⁸⁰. This pursues the choice-of-a-lesser-evil approach as already known from the traditional necessity defence and as summarized by Judge Cassese in his meanwhile commonly referred to limitation of the ‘duress’ in his dissent in Erdemović, by requiring that ‘the crime committed was not disproportionate to the evil threatened’ (this would, for example, occur in case of killing in order to avert an assault). In other words, in order not to be disproportionate, the crime committed under duress must be, on balance, the lesser of two evils¹⁸¹. However, expecting proportionality of the defendants (re)action in objective terms is ¹⁷⁵ Cf. Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 35 mn 14, at 710.

¹⁷⁶ Id.

¹⁷⁷ This criterion, discussed by Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1039, id., Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 358; Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 408 can again explicitly be found in the German provision for excusing necessity in § 35 Penal Code. For further details cf. Perron, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 35, mn 21–37, at 713 et seq., as to reservations regarding soldiers cf. Weigend (2012) 10 JICJ [1219], 1235.

¹⁷⁸ With regard to the question of whether paragraph 1 (d) could serve as a defence to interrogational torture (article 7 para. 1 (f) and article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii) respectively), for example of alleged terrorists to gain relevant information of imminent attacks, cf. above note 141 and Gaeta (2004) 2 JICJ [785], 791 et seq., arguing – against the Supreme Court of Israel – that torture is always unreasonable, because of the uncertainty to gain reliable and pertinent information. A more differentiated position is taken by Ambos (2008) 6 JICJ [261], 206, and Ohlin (2008) 6 JICJ [289], 289 et seq. by, while denying justification, granting an excuse. In my view, too, there is a qualitative difference between torturing for gaining a confession of a crime already committed and mere threat of harm for rescuing a victim from otherwise being doomed to die: cf. Eser, in: Herzog and Neumann (eds.), Festschrift für Winfried Hassemer (2010) 713.

¹⁷⁹ Cf. Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (2001) 263 et seq.; Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2008) 86 et seq.; Korte, Das Handeln auf Befehl als Strafausschließungsgrund (2003) 193 et seq.; Krefß (1999) 12 HuV-I [7]; Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 117; Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) 303 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 642 and fn. 452.

¹⁸⁰ Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1040.

¹⁸¹ Erdemović (Appeals Chamber Judgment), note 153, para 16. The complete definition of duress, as found in Judge Cassese’s separate opinion para. 41, requires: ‘(1) a severe threat to life or limb; (2) no adequate means to at least questionable. From a systematic point of view, the umbrella term ‘reasonably’, at least in the Statute, does not automatically connote proportionality since in paragraph 1 (c) on self-defence it was deemed necessary to require that the defendant acts both ‘reasonably’ and ‘in a manner proportionate’. Further, the clear cut requirement of paragraph 1 (d) that the defendant ‘does not intend (!) to cause a greater harm than the one sought to be avoided’ points to a subjective rather than objective proportionality standard for the defendant’s conduct¹⁸². This terminological argument is bolstered by the historic attempt to blend in one norm the traditional necessity and duress defence, as known in national criminal justice systems, the reason being that only a subjective proportionality test would not eliminate altogether the ‘no moral choice’-element as the central criterion of the duress defence and, thus, would not reduce paragraph 1 (d) to mere necessity. Yet, even when not employing an objective standard, if the pertinent danger and the harm are unreasonably disproportionate – for example: threatening to cut off the defendant’s finger if he did not execute an innocent victim – the threat is already not unzumutbar, i. e. the defendant was required to resist.

4. ‘Provided that the person does not intend to cause a greater harm than the one sought to be avoided’

- 60 As already indicated before, this subjective conception of the ‘lesser evil’-principle is an integral element of this defence: different from classical ‘necessity’ which justifies actions that save the greater good at the cost of the minor, and different from classical ‘duress’ which would grant an excuse regardless of the greater or lesser harm, if the person could not be fairly expected to withstand the threat¹⁸³, this phrase could well be understood as drawing a line in-between: on the one hand requiring less than justifying ‘necessity’ would afford, and on the other hand requiring more than excusing ‘duress’ would be satisfied with. Thus, only applying a subjective proportionality test to the accused’s conduct would pursue the unprecedented historic attempt to reconcile necessity and duress in one provision¹⁸⁴.
- 61 In order to valorize that the defendant subjectively endorsed the higher good or deliberately chose the lesser of two evils, this requirement goes beyond the negative requisite that the defendant may merely not act with dolus malus.¹⁸⁵ Therefore, the clause that the defendant did ‘not intend to cause a greater harm than the one sought to be avoided’ encapsulates the reasoning in the Eichmann case¹⁸⁶: If the defendant, although exposed to a risk not otherwise avoidable, identifies himself with his project or over-accomplishes the extorted tasks, his criminal responsibility is not excluded under paragraph 1 (d).
- 62 It remains to be seen whether a nuanced approach that combines a subjective interpretation of the pertinent (re)action’s proportionality and an objective understanding of the threat causing this reaction (‘Zumutbarkeit’) is superior to the prevailing opinion which escape the threat; (3) proportionality in the means taken to avoid the threat; (4) the situation of duress should not have been self-induced’.

¹⁸² In similar terms see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 360; Heller, in: Heller and Dubber (eds.), Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (2011) 593, 613; Weigend (2012) 10 JICJ [1219], 1224. Interestingly enough, Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 453 et seq., as well seems to have interpreted the aforementioned citation (note 182), in subjective terms, although leaving open whether he would finally prefer this position.

¹⁸³ Cf. Eser, in: Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung – Justification and Excuse. Comparative Perspectives (1987) 19, 54 et seq.; id., in: Dinstein and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 261 et seq.

¹⁸⁴ Instead of interpreting the requirement of proportionality in view of the defendant’s subjective intention, Korte, Das Handeln auf Befehl als Strafausschließungsgrund (2003) 198 et seq. would rather treat lack of objective proportionality, whilst the defendant had subjectively intended it, as a case of mistake.

¹⁸⁵ Cf. Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) 117.

¹⁸⁶ Attorney General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann (1968) 36 ILR 5 (summary).

either applies only an objective proportionality standard or even goes as far as requiring subjective proportionality additionally¹⁸⁷.

VI. Paragraph 2: The implementation by the Court in the case before it

In face of the fact that the proposals of the ILC did not yet propose grounds for 63 excluding criminal responsibility at all and that also later on it remained uncertain as to which, and on what way, grounds for excluding criminal responsibility should be regulated by this Statute¹⁸⁸, it is not surprising that a provision which would give the Court power to determine the admissibility of reasons excluding punishment in view of the individual character of a crime was, in principle, proposed as early as in the Updated Siracusa Draft of 1996¹⁸⁹. The first decision to this end was then taken by the Preparatory Committee in its session of December 1997 and drafted in a version which basically remained unchanged up to the present provision¹⁹⁰.

The final acceptance of paragraph 2 had been a concession to those delegations which 64 favored a minimalist approach to defences, i. e. to those who challenged a (detailed) codification of grounds for excluding criminal responsibility and rather opted for giving the Court leeway in finding the appropriate standards for negating a defendant's international criminal liability¹⁹¹. This course was also led by the assumption that, even if the participants of the Rome Conference had been willing to do so, it would have been hardly possible to completely codify all situations that might exclude international criminal responsibility. Thus, in order to avoid disagreement on certain situational patterns in terms of their barring or not barring international criminal responsibility and to solicit a consensus, these borderline situations were not addressed in the Statute but rather consciously referred to the Court to decide upon. Of the three ways for the Court to look for exclusionary grounds beyond the boundaries of paragraph 1, two are opened by paragraph 2: one by empowering the Court to adjust the codified grounds for excluding crim-

¹⁸⁷ Cf. Ambos, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 1003, 1041. - The teleological advantage of discarding objective proportionality and of rather focusing on the threat's 'Zumutbarkeit' might be reasoned with regard to Erdemović (above note 153), i. e. the coerced killing of innocents: After controversial discussions at the Rome Conference, it was finally agreed that subparagraph (d) is also available to murder (Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (2001) 264; Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 154; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) mn 640; cf. also Cassese, International Criminal Law (2013) 217 et seq.) To explain this conclusion by an appeal to the purported (objective) proportionality of the defendant's action is highly dangerous and appears bluntly utilitarian: Since one has to argue that the harm avoided outweighs the harm caused (in terms of choice of the lesser evil), the innocent's life has to be degraded, whilst the defendant's integrity is cast as the higher good. Yet centering on the phrase 'duress resulting from a [further specified] threat' reveals and radiates an almost humanistic rationale for excluding criminal responsibility even in the case of killing innocents: A defendant cannot be fairly expected to withstand a threat which we would deem irresistible for a reasonable person in comparable circumstances (this seems to be misunderstood by Dinstein, in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law (2000) 373, 375, apparently due to his confusing duress as absence of moral choice with the proportionality requirement of the choice of a lesser evil). With regard to the exclusion of responsibility in the case of killing innocents, those victims are not degraded to a lesser value, but the accused's human (and fallible) nature has become the focal point of legal reasoning. By not requiring, as a matter of law, that a person defies an overpowering compulsion, criminal justice does not project any expectations of heroism and is thus firmly grounded in humanistic ideals.

¹⁸⁸ Cf. above mn 3.

¹⁸⁹ Cf. article 4, article 33–11 para. 1 Updated Siracusa Draft, p. 74, which was literally adopted both by the ILC (article 14, 1996 ILC Draft Code, p. 73) and the 1996 Preparatory Committee II in its article S Proposal 2, p. 104).

¹⁹⁰ Cf. Article L para. 2 Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 22. Even the final wording ('provided for in the Statute'), as phrased at the end by the Drafting Committee (article 30 para. 2, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.65/Rev.1 (14 July 1998), p. 8) - instead of grounds 'listed in paragraph 1', respectively 'permitted by this Statute' - was one of various alternatives suggested in the original Draft of the Preparatory Committee.

¹⁹¹ Cf. Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court - The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 208.

inal responsibility to the case at stake (1), the other by allowing the Court to resort to exclusionary grounds (outside of paragraph 1) within the Statute (2), whereas the third way may even lead to exclusions of responsibility outside of the Statute according to paragraph 3 (below D.VII). In this respect, article 31 can indeed be characterized as ‘acknowledging its own status as a work in progress’¹⁹². As much understandable this evasive action by the makers of the Statute may have been, it leaves doubts with regard to the principle of legality (3).

1. ‘The Court shall determine the applicability’ of the (exclusionary grounds) ‘to the case before it’

- 65 In principle, the power given to the Court to ‘determine the applicability’ of exclusionary grounds must mean more than simply to apply the law, as this function would not need to be proclaimed expressly. Therefore, the Court appears to be empowered to adjust available grounds in such a way that they are applicable to the individual case. On this way, the Court may, for instance, solve cases of provocation or of excessive, yet excusing, use of force¹⁹³ by adjusting self-defence (paragraph 1 (c)) or of self-exposure by limiting duress (paragraph 1 (d)).
- 66 This power, however, is not unlimited, but determined by the ‘case before the court’. This means that the Court may not pronounce new general definitions, but has to restrict itself to a just solution of the case before it. If it sees need and reason to modify existing exclusionary grounds or to create new ones in a general way, it would have to proceed according to paragraph 3 (below D.VII). However, even in as far as the Court merely adapts an existing ground to the case before it, it is not completely free, as already taken into account by the drafters of this provision¹⁹⁴, but bound by the rules of article 21 regarding applicable law¹⁹⁵.

2. Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility ‘provided for in this Statute’

- 67 Beyond or even instead of adjusting an exclusionary ground within paragraph 1, the Court may even go farther to other grounds ‘provided for in this Statute’. For by way of this referral, the determining power of the Court is not limited to adjusting exclusionary grounds of paragraph 1, as it had been proposed in an alternative to the present version¹⁹⁶, but relevant for grounds for excluding criminal responsibility outside of article 31 (above B) as well. Thus, the determining power of the Court goes far beyond the reach of this article.

3. Paragraph 2 in the light of the principle of legality¹⁹⁷

- 68 The plain wording of paragraph 2 suggests that the Court’s power to adapt the codified grounds for excluding criminal responsibility to the case before it is not necessarily limited to situational patterns that are connected to, but not addressed by the Statute’s codification; rather, paragraph 2 provides that the Court may alter, in the interest of justice, each and every of the Statute’s codified grounds for excluding criminal responsibility according to the facts of the individual case¹⁹⁸. Obviously, this brings about an inner tension between the ¹⁹² Cf. Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (2002) 212.

¹⁹³ Cf. § 33 German Penal Code (granting an excuse if the perpetrator exceeds the limits of proportionate self-defence due to confusion, fear or fright). As to the Rome Statute not addressing excessive self-defence cf. Merkel (2002) 114 ZStW [437], 447.

¹⁹⁴ See fn. 11 to article L para. 2 in the Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 22. On the other hand regarding the accused, who has no onus of proving the applicability of grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, cf. Roberts (2012) 10 JICJ [923], 928.

¹⁹⁵ Cf. below mn 75.

¹⁹⁶ Cf. above note 190.

¹⁹⁷ For drafting this section, I am greatly indebted to Christoph Burchard.

¹⁹⁸ Similarly, the Court may easily revoke previous precedents and previous statutory interpretations. Principally disagreeing with such a broad judicial discretion Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) attempt of defining specific prerequisites that negate a person's international criminal liability and the leeway granted to the Court under paragraph 2; in other words, paragraph 2 points to the problem of adjudicative retroactivity and, as the Working Group's Chairman has put it almost unnoticed, 'it could be argued that the possibility of denying the applicability to a certain case of a ground for excluding criminal responsibility otherwise provided for runs counter to the principle of legality'¹⁹⁹. Interpreting the scope of paragraph 2 in light of these vastly intriguing implications, some general guidelines seem at place.

First, grounds for excluding criminal responsibility are not subject to the interpretation rules of article 22 (nullum crimen sine lege)²⁰⁰; thus, disregarding the plain wording of a provision regulating a defence due to teleological arguments (so called 'teleological reduction') is not formally disqualified. This reflects a popular notion in domestic criminal justice theory: because of their dynamic evolution, an evolution that is driven by ever-changing social needs, the principle of nullum crimen sine lege is deemed not to apply fully to defences²⁰¹. On the other hand, domestic criminal law theory also suggests that a court's construing a defence provision directly influences a defendant's criminal liability and thus is hardly different from interpreting a criminal offense provision²⁰². Accordingly, with regard to national criminal justice systems, it is far from clear to what effect and to what extent grounds for excluding criminal responsibility can be altered retroactively and, thus, touch on the legality principle. However, even if the nullum crimen requirements – according to the wording of article 22 paragraph 2 – only apply to the 'definition of a crime' and not to grounds of excluding criminal responsibility²⁰³, the determination power of the Court entrusted to it in paragraph 2 of article 31 could be overstretched if in a given case defences granted by the Statute were principally disregarded or narrowed in a way that the very substance of such a ground of excluding criminal responsibility gets lost.²⁰⁴

Second, a potential conflict with the legality principle will predominantly arise only if the Court disregards any possible meaning of the wording and adapts a codified ground for excluding criminal responsibility in a manner detrimental to the defendant. More specifically, illuminating the underlying rationales of the legality principle²⁰⁵, the Court's determination may either withhold fair notice or counteract the accused's protection against arbitrary justice and ad hoc punishment. With regard to fair notice, this concept is rooted in liberal rational choice theory and prescribes that an actor consciously adjusts his actions to the codified requirements of (domestic or international) criminal law so that said requirements must not be altered retroactively²⁰⁶. However, this usual "reliance" argument against judicial creativity²⁰⁷ seems frustrated by paragraph 2, as this provision positively allows for a variable and flexible interpretation of the Statute's grounds for excluding criminal responsibility and, thus, in fact, negates any reliance in judicial constancy²⁰⁸. With regard to the accused's

491, obviously led by a minimalist approach to giving leeway to excluding criminal responsibility; however, whereas incriminating elements are certainly subjected to the principle of legality (article 22), this is not necessarily the same with exonerating justifications or excuses as being in favor of the accused (cf. Satzger, Internationales Strafrecht (2013) 304). See also below mn 69 et seq.

¹⁹⁹ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 208.

²⁰⁰ Cf. Broomhall above Art. 22, mn 31, 39 et seq.

²⁰¹ Cf. Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (2006) 158; Lenckner and Sternberg-Lieben, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2010) pre-note 25 to § 32, at 585 et seq.

²⁰² Cf. Eser and Hecker, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 1 mn 13, at 31.

²⁰³ As assumed, though, by Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 90, 314.

²⁰⁴ Cf. Cryer, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 400.

²⁰⁵ Cf. Kratzsch (1971) GA [65], 68; Morrison (2001) 74 SouthCalifLRev [455], 461 et seq.

²⁰⁶ Cf. Kahan (1997) 3 RogerWilliamsULRev [95], 95; above note 37, A. Ashworth/J. Horder, Principles 57 et seq.

²⁰⁷ Ashworth and Horder, Principles of Criminal Law (2013) 60.

²⁰⁸ As a consequence, with regard to interpretive limitations of paragraph 2 in light of the legality principle, there is no need to differentiate between justifying and excusing grounds for excluding criminal responsibility. Insofar, retroactive alterations of excuses are normally less troublesome because they constitute rules of adjudications for the courts rather than rules of conduct to guide citizens; cf. Eser, in: Heger, Kelker and protection against arbitrary justice and ad hoc punishment, this second rationale of the legality principle sets institutional restrictions to judicial vindictiveness fuelled by the potential animosity towards the defendant²⁰⁹. It may be guessed that utilizing these restrictions to define the scope of paragraph 2 accounts for the immense pressure that the Court will come to bear and prevents that it will fall prey to an overpowering impression of an individual case. In order to ensure a high degree of accountability and acceptance, adapting grounds for excluding criminal responsibility under paragraph 2 is advisable only if the alterations – according to standards employed by both the European Court of Human Rights²¹⁰ and the US Supreme Court²¹¹ – are reasonably foreseeable and can be reasonably brought under the original concept of the defence²¹². Applying this rational basis inquiry separates the legitimate dynamic evolution of international criminal law from illegitimate judicial reinterpretations animated by capricious and arbitrary impulses.

- 71 Third, even if paragraph 2 confers to the Court a limited power to adapt the law, it might be more suitable not to disregard codified requirements but rather to take advantage of their broad interpretive latitude which naturally inheres legal terms like reasonable etc. This internal approach to solve problematic cases mitigates the impending conflict between paragraph 2, judicial retroactivity and the legality principle²¹³.

VII. Paragraph 3: Other (international or national) sources for exclusionary grounds

- 72 For reasons similar to those finally causal for paragraph 2²¹⁴, it was quite clear from the start that the Statute could and should not provide an exhaustive list of defences; therefore a defence was needed according to which the Court should be empowered to avail itself of defences which might be derived from other recognized legal sources²¹⁵. After the Preparatory Committee had proposed a rule to this end in its session of December 1997²¹⁶ which was still upheld as a separate provision by the Draft Statute of April 1998²¹⁷, it was then, on proposal of the USA, integrated into article 31 as paragraph 3 and phrased as it stands now²¹⁸. The provision contains three rules:

Schramm (eds.), Festschrift für Kristian Kühl (2014) 173 et seq. What is more, by rejecting the liberal ‘reliance’ argument because of the explicit wording of paragraph 2, it is not necessary to comment on the question of whether international criminal law really guides the actions of potential international criminals.

²⁰⁹ Cf. Krent (1997) 3 Roger Williams ULRev [35], 41.

²¹⁰ Cf. Case of SW v. United Kingdom, Application No. 00020166/92, Judgement, 22 November 1995, para. 36.

²¹¹ Cf. Bouie v. City of Columbia (1964) 378 U.S. 347–368, 353 et seq.

²¹² The test applied is objective in nature whereby further differentiations may be necessary. For example, the foreseeability requirement might be more lax if the individual case is comparable, as a matter of law, to a previously decided case, yet took place in a different geopolitical situation. Vice versa, the foreseeability requirement might be more strict if a relevant precedent already accounted for the peculiarities of the geopolitical background of the individual case that is to be decided.

²¹³ Cf. Eser and Hecker, in: Schönke and Schröder (eds.), Strafgesetzbuch. Kommentar (2014) § 1 mn 13, at 31.

²¹⁴ See mn 64.

²¹⁵ Here again, the Updated Siracusa Draft (article 33–11 para. 2, p. 74; cf. above note 189) as well as the 1996 Preparatory Committee II (article S Proposal 1, pp. 104 et seq.) have made first suggestions on this respect. Cf. also Jescheck, in: Eser (ed.), Festschrift für Haruo Nishihara (1998) 437, 447 et seq. Referring to this possibility in particular with regards to sex offenses, though not specifying any available defences, see Grewal (2012) 10 JICJ [389], 389.

²¹⁶ Art. O in the Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 23.

²¹⁷ See article 34 Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 71.

²¹⁸ See Proposal by the United States of America for single provision covering issues currently governed by articles 31, 32, 33 and 34, note 106. Later changes did not do more than introduce ‘consideration’ instead of ‘assertion and application’ in paragraph 3 sentence 2; cf. Article 31 para. 3 in the Report of the Working Group of 29 June 1998 (UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.4/Add.1), p. 5. Cf. Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 492.

1. ‘At trial the Court may consider’ a ground for excluding criminal responsibility ‘other than those referred to in paragraph 1’

This power given to the Court at trial reaches further than that according to paragraph 2 (above D.VI) in that the Court shall not only adjust an existing exclusionary clause to the case before it, but may even employ grounds for excluding criminal responsibility ‘other than those referred to in paragraph 1’ and, as must be added, other than those provided for in the Statute as well; for as paragraph 1 also covers the ‘additional’ grounds (above B) by its chapeau, the power of the Court to look for other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility is not limited to the subparagraphs (a) to (d) of paragraph 1, but even goes beyond this Statute²¹⁹. 73

Yet, as article 31 is concerned with substantive exclusions of criminal responsibility only²²⁰, introducing additional non-substantive defences, like alibi²²¹, ne bis in idem²²², failure of proof or other more procedural defences²²³, could hardly be accomplished by direct application of paragraph 3, as seems to have been envisaged by preparatory proposals²²⁴. However, by way of analogy, as far as favorable to the defendant, an extension of paragraph 3 on non-substantive defences may still be open. 74

2. Where such a ground is ‘derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21’

This clause is both a guideline and a limitation for the Court. For this purpose, it was extensively elaborated in earlier drafts²²⁵, but even in its new trimmed version does it reach the same end by simply referring to article 21. This is due to the fact that the rules for the application of law in and outside of this Statute, as prescribed by article 21, concern grounds for excluding criminal responsibility in the same way as any other law within the jurisdiction of this Court. Thus, even defences which have not been expressly regulated by this Statute (such as those listed above at C. II), can be invoked by the person concerned and considered by the Court, in as far as they are reconcilable with the application rules of article 21.²²⁶ 75

3. ‘The procedures relating to the considerations of such a ground shall be provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence’

In addition to the substantive limitation of sentence 1 binding the Court to certain legal sources, sentence 2 of paragraph 3 provides a certain procedure by which a ground for excluding criminal responsibility not provided for in this Statute may be taken into consideration. The pertaining rule 80, however, regulates scarcely more than the procedural way of how the defence may raise an exclusionary ground according to this paragraph²²⁷. 76

²¹⁹ By acknowledging the Court’s power to adopt new defences, the Statute goes beyond Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 583, where it was stated that the ICTY must not adopt new rules constituting new defences. Further note that the Court’s rule-making powers do not conflict with the principle of nullum crimen sine lege.

²²⁰ Cf. above mn 17.

²²¹ Cf. above note 37.

²²² Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 396 et seq.

²²³ On further non-substantive defences in the Rome Statute cf. Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev [111], 112 et seq. For a systematic analysis of the different subgroups of criminal law defences from a common law point of view cf. Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses (1984) sections 21–28.

²²⁴ As reported and obviously supported by van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 291.

²²⁵ Such as in article 34 Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 73.

²²⁶ Cf. Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (2013) 386; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (2012) 223.

²²⁷ For further details see Brady, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 403, 417.

E. Outlook

- 77 After the 1994 ILC Draft Statute for a Permanent International Criminal Court had not yet contained any grounds for excluding criminal responsibility, it was certainly fundamental progress that the Statute was prepared to expressly recognize certain grounds for excluding criminal responsibility and, in addition, left the door open for further grounds²²⁸. This is not to say that such abhorrent crimes as those dealt with by the Statute should be easily open for substantive defences; as was already necessary to be said; however, even war criminals cannot be denied the right to be tried according to the rule of law²²⁹. Insofar, the Statute's efforts to transcribe the principal grounds for excluding responsibility into international criminal law, rather than being 'absurd'²³⁰, mark a further step to a comprehensive codification of international criminal law both in founding and excluding criminal responsibility²³¹. This applies not only to substantive law but concerns the procedural position of the defendant as well, in particular with regard to the Court's institutional design²³². Although it is unquestionably desirable to structurally improve the defence side, for example by establishing a permanent defence unit, the main focus should not lie on expanding on the adversarial dichotomy between prosecution and defence but rather on ensuring that an impartial prosecution will indeed collect, evaluate and present evidence that is advantageous for the defendant (article 54 para. 1 (a)).²³³
- 78 Nonetheless it is not to be ignored that article 31 is not yet in the very best of shape, both from substance and format. This holds particularly true with regard to the lack of differentiation between various – justificatory, exculpatory or other extenuating – reasons for which criminal responsibility may be excluded²³⁴. This is a field which needs more refinement, at least in order to make certain exclusionary grounds better understandable and more adequately applicable²³⁵.

²²⁸ Another question, of course, is as to what degree the ICC will be prepared for making use of its power: doubtful, e.g., Janssen (2004) ICLRev [83], 97.

²²⁹ Cf. above mn 12.

²³⁰ As Schabas (1998) 6 EJCLCJ [400], 423 oddly saw fit to describe the progress with regard to the intoxication defence.

²³¹ To the same end cf. van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2003) 299.

²³² Cf. Fair Trials and the Role of International Criminal Defense (2001) 114 HarvLRev [1982], 1986.

²³³ As to desirable improvements in this respect see Eser, in: Swart, Zahar and Sluiter (eds.), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (2011) 108, 121 et seq.

²³⁴ Cf. above mn 2.

²³⁵ Cf. – with varyingly far-reaching goals and hopes – Eser, in: Dinstein and Tabory (eds.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 251, 263 et seq., 271 et seq.; Nill-Theobald, "Defences" bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA. Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeinen Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (1998) 387 et seq. and Jescheck, in: Eser (ed.), Festschrift für Haruo Nishihara (1998) 437, 448, 451.

Article 32

Mistake of fact or mistake of law

1. A mistake of fact shall be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility only if it negates the mental element required by the crime.

2. A mistake of law as to whether a particular type of conduct is a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility. A mistake of law may, however, be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if it negates the mental element required by such a crime, or as provided for in article 33.

Literature: Bothe, M., 'War Crimes', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 379; Clark, R., 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences', (2001) 12 CLF 291; Badar, M.E., 'Mens Rea, Mistake of Law & Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunals', (2005) 5 ICLRev 203; Eser, A., 'Mental Elements – Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law', in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889; id., "'Defences" in Strafverfahren wegen Kriegsverbrechen', in: K. Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Otto Triffterer (Springer 1996) 755; Eser, 'Justification and Excuse: A Key Issue in the Concept of Crime', in: A. Eser and G.P. Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung: rechtsvergleichende Perspektiven, Vol. I (Max-Planck-Institut 1987) 37; Eser, A., Lagodny, O. and Triffterer, O., 'Proposals to Amend the "Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind"', in: O. Triffterer (ed.) Annex 2: Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law, (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 2, 872; Heller, K.J., 'Mistake of Legal Element, the Common Law, and article 32 of the Rome Statute', (2008) 6 JICJ 419; Jescheck, H., Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane nach Völkerrecht (Röhrscheid 1952); Nill-Theobald, C. 'Defences' bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA: Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (Edition iuscrim 1998); Reynolds, J.D., 'Collateral Damage on the 21st Century Battlefield – Enemy Exploitation of the Law of Armed Conflict, and the Struggle for a Moral High Ground', (2005) 56 AFLRev 1; Robinson, P.H., 'Commentary to article 14', in: M.C. Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the ILC's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Eres 1993) 199; Saland, P., 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (Springer 1999) 189; Scaliotti, M., 'Defences Before the International Criminal Court: Substantive Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility–Part 2', (2002) 2 ICLRevev 1; Schabas, W.A., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the ICC Statute', (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 400; Stuckenberg, C-F., 'Problems of "Subjective Imputation" in Domestic and International Criminal Law', (2014) 12 JICJ 311–323; Triffterer, O., 'The Object of Review Mechanisms: Statutes' Provisions, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence', in: R. Bellelli (ed.), International Criminal Justice: Law and Practice from the Rome Statute to Its Review (Ashgate 2010) 355; id., 'Ius in bello: Eskalation durch "Kollateralschäden" wie durch Kriegsverbrechen–Beweisbarkeit und Vermeidbarkeit. Anmerkungen zu dem bewaffneten Konflikt zwischen Israel und der libanesischen Hizbullah Miliz', in: R. Moos, U. Jesionek and O. Müller (eds.), Festschrift für Roland Miklau zum 65. Geburtstag (Studien Verlag 2006) 559; id., 'The New International Criminal Law – Its General Principles Establishing Individual Criminal Responsibility', in: K. Kalliopi (ed.), The New International Criminal Law (Sakkoulas 2003) 639; id., 'Der ständige Internationale Strafgerichtshof–Anspruch und Wirklichkeit', in: K.H. Gössel and O. Triffterer (eds.), Gedächtnisschrift für Heinz Zipf (C.F. Müller 1999) 495; id., 'Bestandsaufnahme zum Völkerstrafrecht', in: G. Hankel and G. Stuby, (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschheitsverbrechen: Zum Völkerstrafrecht 50 Jahre nach den Nürnberger Prozessen (Hamburger Edition 1995) 169; id., Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (Springer 2nd edition 1994); id., 'Ein rechtfertigender (Erlaubnistatbestands-)irrtum? – Irrtumsmöglichkeiten beim polizeilichen Einsatz und deren Dogmatische Einordnung', in: O. Triffterer and F. von Zezschwitz (eds.), Festschrift für Walter Mallmann (Nomos 1978) 373; von Verseveld, A., Mistake of Law: Excusing Perpetrators of International Crimes (Springer 2012); Weigend, T., 'Intent, Mistake of Law, and Co-perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on Confirmation of Charges', (2008) 6 JICJ 471.

Content

A. General remarks	1
I. Historical development	1
II. Need for article 32?	11
III. Conceptual framework	13
IV. Error and lack of awareness	19
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	20
I. Paragraph 1: Mistake of fact	20
1. Facts	20

a) Descriptive and normative material elements	21
b) Facts as bases for a normative evaluation – value judgment	22
c) Conceptual consequences	24
2. Perception as basis for ‘the mental element required’	25
3. Legal consequences	26
II. Paragraph II: Mistake of law	29
1. Differentiation from mistake of fact	29
2. Aspects to be mistaken	30
a) ‘whether a ... conduct is a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’	31
b) Other ‘legal elements’	33
aa) Knowledge of the facts	34
bb) Mistaken legal evaluation	35
3. Legal consequences	36
a) Excluding or not ‘excluding criminal responsibility’	37
b) Mitigating circumstances	40
4. Special regulation in article 33	41
C. Special remarks: Scope of practical importance	42
1. ‘Core crimes’ and contempt of court	43
2. Errors and appeal	50
3. Collateral damage as war crime?	51

A. General remarks

I. Historical development

- Part 3 of the Rome Statute contains some – but not all – of the general principles of criminal law to be applied by organs of the Court. According to article 21, other principles may be found in the applicable law, especially in the ‘principles of law’ mentioned in paragraphs 1(c) and 2¹. But there is, in addition, room for extensive interpretation and development of such principles, especially through the jurisprudence of the ICC, as demonstrated by the decisions of the ICTY and the ICTR during the last years².
- It surprises – at first glance – that a Statute aiming to establish a court and its (international criminal) jurisdiction also defines precisely the crimes over which jurisdiction shall be exercised and, in addition, some general principles of criminal law to be applied. However, on a closer analysis, this double structure of the Rome Statute, dealing with substantive and procedural rules in one document is desirable and, especially in the field of international criminal law, also necessary to clarify and thereby help guarantee observance of the rule of law. The fulfilment of the latter presupposes, for instance, that the crimes and defenses are defined in a way ‘strictly construed in the sense of article 22’, which means, sufficiently precise to make criminal justice transparent and thereby acceptable, while also understandable and controllable³.

The Statute’s double orientation becomes understandable when considering its historical development. In addition, it is in accordance with the early development of national and regional criminal law and procedure, where a strict separation between substantive and procedural law also is missing; quite well known codifications, for instance, the Constitutio Criminalis Carolina (CCC) of 1532, contain regulations concerning both fields⁴.

¹ See deGuzman, article 21, mn 11 et seq., 14 et seq. And 20 et seq.

² See, for instance, Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 7 October 1997, paras 12 and 13, and the separate and dissenting opinion of Judge Cassese and Judge Stephen, para 37 and 59 respectively. The majority of the Appeals Chamber found that duress does not afford a complete defence to a soldier charged with a crime against humanity and/or a war crime.

³ See, for instance, the Report of the ILC on the Work of its Thirty-Ninth Session (to its Draft Code 1987), UN Doc. A/42/10, reprinted in: (1987) 2 YbILC, Part 1 (3), 7, where it was considered that all ‘exceptions of the principle of responsibility’ concern ‘jurisdictional guarantees’. See also Clark, R.S. Article 9, mn 1 et seq.

⁴ See, for instance, Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 1, mn 13, and for the ‘double character’ of the ICC, Triffterer, in: Gössel and Triffterer (eds.), Gedächtnisschrift für Heinz Zipf (1999) 495, 534 et seq.

An analysis of the early development in the international field, however, reveals a clear separation of both subject matters. At the beginning, endeavors concentrated on substantive law because there was not yet any international criminal jurisdiction in sight. Instruments dealing with the laws and customs of war, especially the 1907 Hague Conventions, represent this tendency. The Charter for the Nuremberg Tribunal is also typical since it concentrated mainly on substantive law, leaving great parts of the procedural law to be adopted by the Tribunal according to its own Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The question of error was not even mentioned in the Charter. This line was continued in the Nuremberg Principles drafted by the ILC in 1948⁵. The 1948 Genocide Convention equally concentrated on the criminality of such acts and though not referring to the possibility of an error it at least mentioned the procedural aspect and thereby opened the possibility of direct enforcement by an international criminal court⁶.

The UN's work thereafter, through the promulgation of the 1951 and (revised) 1953 Draft Statutes for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court by a special Committee, and the 1951 and 1954 Draft Codes of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind by the ILC, only served to widen the separation. The Draft Codes do not even mention that defenses and extenuating circumstances may play a role and that a relevant error of the perpetrator in regard to a necessary element of the crime may fall under one of those categories⁷. This may have been due to the fact that even though they were not mentioned in the Nuremberg Statute or in the Allied Control Council Law No. 10 of 1945, mistakes of law or fact were quite frequently raised as a defense in trials conducted according to these laws. However, in the jurisprudence in the aftermath of WWII, mistake of law was generally declared to be irrelevant while an error of fact was accepted as a ground for excluding criminal responsibility, for instance in the so-called 'Ärzte-Urteil'⁸. This term refers to cases of physicians who were acquitted because they believed that the persons brought to them were sentenced to death and would be pardoned if they survived the medical experiments, during which they were 'at the disposal' of the physicians⁹.

The question was extensively discussed by the ILC in 1986 during its work on a revision of the Draft Code, because in the meantime quite a few drafts from non-governmental organizations had dealt with this particular defense¹⁰. The Special Rapporteur referred to the High Command and the I.G. Farben cases, in which the Nuremberg Tribunal ruled on the misinterpretation of a rule of law and a change in general acceptance of laws and customs of war, thereby altering 'the substantive content of certain of its principles'¹¹. Thereafter the ILC included, in its 1987 Draft, article 9 'Exceptions to the principle of responsibility' (formerly article 8), and referred to in subparagraph (d) as 'error of law or of fact'¹². However, instead of being defined, both were merely mentioned as grounds that would not 'relieve the perpetrator of criminal responsibility unless, in the circumstances in which it (the crime) was committed, it was unavoidable for him'. In addition, for all defenses mentioned in

⁵ The principles were defined by the ILC but never scheduled to be discussed in the General Assembly, see 1991 ILC Draft Code, paras 60 et seq.; Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des Materiellen Völkerstrafrechts seit Nürnberg (1966) 76.

⁶ For reference to an international penal tribunal see article IV of the Genocide Convention; for the neglect of rules for a general part see, for instance, Triffterer, 2nd edition, Preliminary Remarks, mn 34 et seq.; for the limitation of the Genocide Convention to specific rules about participation see article III and also article 86(2) of Add. Prot. I.

⁷ See, for instance, article 2 of the 1951 and of the 1954 Draft Code.

⁸ United States vs. Karl Brandt et al., Judgment of Military Tribunal in Case No. 1, 19 August 1947.

⁹ For details see Nill-Theobald, 'Defences' bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA: Zugleich ein Beitrag zu einem Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (1998) 342 with references in fn. 1.

¹⁰ ILA Seoul Conference (1986) Annex C and Protocol II to the Statute for an International Criminal Court and to the Statute for an International Commission of Criminal Inspiry containing defences, paras 4 and 5; AIDP, 'A Draft International Criminal Code' (1980), Appendix - General Part, article IX section 7, reprinted in: Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law: A Draft International Criminal Code (1980) 47 et seq.

¹¹ (1986) 2 YbILC, Part 2, paras 161 et seq. with references for the two cases mentioned in fn. 126 and 127.

¹² For the Draft article, see 1987 ILC Report, para 44 et seq.

the original article 8, the defense would not exempt the defendant from punishment if his act was ‘a breach of a peremptory rule of international law, ... originated in a fault on his part ...’, or ‘the interest sacrificed is higher than the interest protected’¹³. The new article 9 repeated the principal regulation on ‘error of law or of fact’ without including the limitations mentioned in former article 8¹⁴. The discussion, which canvassed the broadness of the concepts of ‘errors of law or of fact’ (in that order) and mentioned, without attempting to be exhaustive, the variety of possible mistakes, referred expressly to the very basic and still valid decision of the German Federal Court defining ‘the concept of insurmountable error’¹⁵. The cases mentioned and the ensuing discussion illustrated the difficulty of and the sophisticated analysis required to differentiate between errors of fact and law. This may have been the reason why the 1991 ILC Draft Code did not refer to mistake of fact and law. It stated in its article 14 only that ‘defences under the general principles of law’ were applicable and had to be considered in every single case¹⁶. The maximum that can be derived from this article is that the ILC thereby tacitly accepted that errors of fact and law may be defenses, which, if applicable in principle, had to be checked in each case.

- 6 The silence of the ILC is rather surprising. Already the early 1980 AIDP Draft, the 1987 Bassiouni Draft, the 1991 ILA Draft and later on the 1996 Updated Siracusa Draft all accepted both mistakes. It was considered that a defense would be permitted where there was a negation of ‘the mental element required by the crime charged provided that said mistake is not inconsistent with the nature of the crime or its elements, and provided that the circumstances he reasonably believed to be true would have been lawful’¹⁷. The consequences attaching to a mistake were only mentioned with regard to mistakes of law and were rather concisely summarized; accordingly, a behaviour associated with a mistake of law was either ‘not punishable’ or if the mistake was avoidable ‘the punishment may be reduced’¹⁸.
- 7 It is noteworthy that the Statutes for the ICTY and the ICTR do not contain any regulations concerning relevant mistakes. But by making generally accepted legal rules applicable, they can (and in their practice do) take consideration of both mistake of fact and mistake of law¹⁹. Against this background the ILC – before a ‘revivment’ of its members took place – aimed to conclude its 45 years of work on the Draft Code. On the demand of members, an additional proposal was presented by experts, changing article 33–15 paragraph 1 of the Updated Siracusa Draft and pointing out the consequences of this proposal with the formula: ‘If an individual would not be held guilty of the crime if the circumstances were as he reasonably believed, he is not punishable’²⁰. However, no agreement could be reached on

¹³ (1987) 2 YbILC, Part 1, 7 (brackets added).

¹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵ BGHSt 2, 194, 18 March 1952. See also (1987) 2 YbILC, part 1, [8]. For its present importance see, for instance, Jescheck and Weigend, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts: Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 452.

¹⁶ See Robinson, in: Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the ILC's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Eres 1993) 199 et seq.

¹⁷ Appendix – General Part, article IX, section 7 A.I.D.P. Draft 1980, reprinted in: Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law: A Draft International Criminal Code (1980) 164; for the ‘Bassiouni Draft’ 1987 see Part I–General Part, article IX, section 7, reprinted in: Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal (1987) 110; see also Updated Siracusa Draft, article 33–15 para. 1.

¹⁸ The 1991 ILA Report mentions both possibilities. An unavoidable mistake of law was accepted as an ‘excuse from criminal liability’ while an avoidable mistake was a reason why ‘punishment may be reduced’. With regard to the mistake of fact there was no regulation contained; see Report of the ILA of the 64th Conference 186 (1991). But this is comparable to national laws like in Austria where such a regulation is missing as well. The legal consequence of such an error is self-evident, because a mental element is required and the lack of perception of these facts logically leads to a lack of the mental element required. See, for instance, note 4, Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994), chapter 17, mn 19 et seq. with further references.

¹⁹ This aspect has been expressly mentioned in the Ad Hoc Committee Report, para 87. See, for instance, Erdemović (Appeals Chamber Judgment), note 2.

²⁰ See for this Draft Eser, Lagodny and Triffterer, ‘Proposals to Amend the “Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind”’, in: Triffterer, Annex 2: Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law, (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 2 [872], 872 et seq.

this question during the work on the 1996 Draft Code, especially since a lack of broad consensus was already apparent during the work on the ILC Draft Statute 1994²¹.

It is not surprising that the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court did not produce results that the ILC could not achieve either. It only proposed guidelines 'for consideration of the question of general principles of criminal law'. They contained a list of possible defences including 'error of law?' and 'error of fact?' – again using the order adopted in former ILC Drafts – without mentioning any further details or referring to the articles of the 1987 ILC Draft. But the two question marks behind each of the two aspects 'for consideration' indicate that the Ad Hoc Committee did not then want to decide, if at all, to what extent each of the mistakes should lead to impunity or needed to be regulated at all²².

Due to this open situation, at its first session the Preparatory Committee discussed proposals by Japan to formulate an article on 'mental element' and by the Netherlands concentrating on avoidability and consistency of errors with the nature of the alleged crimes, as well as the possibility of a provision stating that even if a mistake was avoidable it 'may be considered in mitigating of punishment' or, in other words, 'the punishment may be reduced'. It was this proposal by the Netherlands that led the ILC to change the order and to mention mistake of fact before law. This order has been used since then²³.

However, the question was also debated whether these concepts should be included at all in the Statute and if they fell into 'the category of justifying facts ... Are negations of responsibility or a defense'²⁴. The Report on the first and second session of the Preparatory Committee reflects an open discussion in which the majority held the opinion that mistakes should be a defense and not 'a ground for exemption from criminal responsibility'. In addition, it was questioned whether with regard to the 'particular mental elements in order to establish criminal responsibility ... this defense needs to be explicitly mentioned as it is merely one example of the various factors that could negate the existence of the required mental element'²⁵.

In its third session in February 1997, the Committee, in summarizing the discussion and the major proposals, drafted two alternative texts, mentioning in footnote 26 and 27 that 'there were widely divergent views on this matter'. It stated further that according to some delegations a regulation for 'mistake of fact was not necessary because it was covered by mens rea'²⁶. The first, the shorter version (A), treated both mistakes equally as a defense if unavoidable and, if avoidable, as mitigating circumstances, adding however, 'provided that the mistake is not inconsistent with the nature of the alleged crime'²⁷.

During the fourth and the fifth session, August and December 1997 respectively, the subject was not dealt with expressly. But in the latter, due to the influence of the Updated Siracusa Draft²⁸, 'general principles of criminal law' were considered by a separate Working Group²⁹. Article 1 of the Working Group's proposal is titled 'Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility' but does not mention mistakes in the Annex II to the Report at all³⁰.

The Zutphen Draft contains in article 24 [K] two options, both including mistakes of fact and of law. They differ from the proposals made during the third session only to the extent

²¹ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, paras 45 et seq.

²² See Ad Hoc Committee Report, Annex II B 5 a, p. 58.

²³ See for these proposals Summary of the proceedings of the Preparatory Committee during the period 25 March–12 April 1996, 1st Sess., UN Doc. A/AC.249/1 (7 May 1996), Annex I, p. 22 and mn 17.

²⁴ See 1996 ILC Draft Code.

²⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 96.

²⁶ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, pp. 27–28.

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ For the influence of the Updated Siracusa Draft as 'a good starting position', see 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para 204.

²⁹ See Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, Annex II, pp. 18 and 19.

³⁰ Ibid.

that they substituted ‘shall be a defense’ with the words ‘shall be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’ in both options³¹.

The Consolidated Draft from 14 April 1998, concluding the work of the Preparatory Committee after the sixth session, repeated these two options, noting in footnote 20 that there were still ‘widely divergent views on this article’. In footnote 21 it was again mentioned ‘that mistake of fact was not necessary because it was covered by mens rea’. Footnote 22 contains an additional option for paragraph 2 of the second option including, with regard to mistake of law, the observation that ‘whether a particular type of conduct is a crime under the Statute, or whether a crime is within the jurisdiction of the Court, is not a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’³². This formulation was the basis for the later similar wording in the Statute. In the commentary to the proposed article (at that time 30), the reasons for and different aspects of mistakes, their points of reference and the consequences are explained³³.

II. Need for article 32?

- 11 From the outset a point of discussion concerned whether a regulation for mistake of fact was at all necessary in the Statute. According to article 32(1) such an error ‘shall be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility only if it negates the mental element required by the crime’. Since according to article 30(1) criminal responsibility and liability for punishment depend on whether ‘the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge’, a person who is not aware of these required elements (which describe typically the nature, any specific circumstances and the consequences of the conduct), does not have the necessary mens rea. He or she is, therefore, free from responsibility and liability for punishment because culpability depends on the existence of such a (complex) mental element³⁴. In this respect, paragraph 1 expresses only what is self-evident and therefore may serve as a pure clarification of a generally accepted principle of criminal law³⁵.
- 12 With regard to article 32(2) the situation is different. The concept of mistake of law, as well as its consequences, namely, if and under what circumstances it may exclude responsibility or merely serve as mitigating circumstance, are subjects of dispute. Of course, if ‘it negates the mental element required’, the consequence is as self-evident as for an error of fact. On the other hand, the mere belief that a certain conduct is not punishable or does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Court does not concern the material elements of which the perpetrator has to be aware before he may build the mens rea required³⁶. As expressed in sentence 2, only in exceptional cases may such an error negate this element; therefore, paragraph 2 also clarifies, though without precisely expressing, when and where such a consequence can be drawn. The interpretation and detailed analysis therefore falls to the competence of the ICC.

III. Conceptual framework

- 13 In some civil law countries, criminal law theory has been developed to a rather sophisticated level of perfectionism: every single question has to be placed in a specific context as part of a systematic order of elements of crimes which all have to be fulfilled for a certain conduct to result in criminal responsibility. This approach leads to a diversity of mistakes

³¹ Zutphen Draft, pp. 60–61.

³² Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 67.

³³ See (1998) 13*ter* NEP [54], 54 et seq. To these aspects see mn 25 and 31.

³⁴ At least as far as there exists no criminal responsibility for negligent conduct. See also commentary on article 30, (1998) 13*ter* NEP [54], 55.

³⁵ For this argument see already Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, article 30, fn. 21.

³⁶ In this regard, see also Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 371, who concurs that mistakes regarding jurisdiction are not exculpating.

located in the different areas of such a system³⁷. Common law countries do not differentiate matters in this way; they are more likely looking at the result, namely whether punishment should be excluded or merely mitigated³⁸. Article 32 takes a neutral middle position by acknowledging in paragraph 1, through the emphasis given to ‘shall be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’, that a mistake may negate the mental element required – in whatever way this may be explained theoretically. Taking into consideration the tendency for a rapprochement between the two legal systems, not only in Europe but worldwide, and especially through the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, it seems advisable to summarize and locate the different methods of identifying mistakes according to the civil law system.

With regard to the mistake of fact it is undisputed that when its prerequisites are fulfilled, there is no ‘intent and knowledge’ to use the language of article 30. The mens rea required for the specific crime is necessarily lacking in such cases and the word ‘only’ is superfluous. Such a mistake is located in the category where the mental element is positioned. 14

On the contrary, persons have the necessary mental element when they assume the existence of a situation in which, if it were as they believed, they would be justified (for example by self-defense). They are, in the same way, mistaken about one or more facts, even though these are not material elements of the crime, but material prerequisites for a justification of the crime. They thus have been inspired to commit a crime by being mistaken in a comparable way to a person who is in error over the existence of a material element: in both cases suspects perceive the reality incorrectly. In both cases they would have avoided behaving (acting or omitting) the way they did, and, thus, criminal responsibility if they had seen or in any other way appreciated the facts correctly instead of wrongly. Therefore, by reasoning based not on legal theory, but on the similarity of the result, they should be treated equally: neither should be punished for intentionally committing the crime; the first because he is lacking the mental element required, the second because he does not deserve this punishment, since without the mistake of the (justifying) facts he would not have intentionally committed the crime. This comparable structure of the systematically differently located two mistakes is the reason, why, for instance, paragraph 8 Austrian Penal Code provides a corresponding regulation stating that the person who is mistaken about the material prerequisites for justification, like a situation of self-defense, is on the one hand not justified, but on the other cannot be punished for committing the crime ‘with intent and knowledge’.

An error of fact in the sphere of other defenses may excuse the person, for instance, in situations of necessity/coercion or duress when the perpetrator wrongfully assumes ‘circumstances beyond his control likely to create an otherwise unavoidable private or public harm’³⁹. Because, in a situation that he reasonably believed to exist, the psychological pressure on the perpetrator is as strong as if the situation existed in reality. It has to be admitted that, contrary to the similarities in the three conceptual spheres of mistakes mentioned above, they are located in three different places in the systematic structure of crime:

The first concerns the correspondence between material and mental elements.

The second has its basis in a mistaken perception of facts, which if they existed in accordance with the belief, would have established a ground for justification of the act. Such an error is, however, (because of this wrong perception) a mistaken evaluation of the lawfulness of the conduct and, therefore, by its concept under legal theory, a mistake of law. Such a mistake, though conceptually not a mistake of fact, nevertheless has the practical consequence of being treated as if it were one.

³⁷ This helps to explain – even though only partly – the different categories to which errors have been allocated by the ILC according to the quotations in mn 9. See, for instance, for national legal theory in Austria Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 17, mn 17 et seq., and Germany, Jescheck and Weigend, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts: Allgemeiner Teil (1996) 456 et seq.

³⁸ See, for instance, Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Otto Triffterer (1996) 763; Eser, in: Eser and Fletcher (eds.), Rechtfertigung und Entschuldigung: rechtsvergleichende Perspektiven (1987) 37 et seq.

³⁹ Eser, Lagodny and Triffterer, ‘Proposals to Amend the “Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind”’, in: Triffterer, Annex 2: Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law (1997) 4 Croatian Ann-CrimL&Prac 2 [872], 881. See also Eser, article 31, mn 10.

The third is a false perception of facts founding an excuse for the perpetrator. However, because of the wrong perception, it is a mistaken evaluation of the lawfulness of the conduct and therefore, by legal theory, a mistake of law. This mistake, though conceptually not a mistake of fact, nevertheless has the practical consequence of being treated as if it were one⁴⁰. For these three situations, a theoretical differentiation between negating the required mental element, justification, and excuse makes sense, even though it is not necessarily needed to achieve the same result, namely to relieve the perpetrator from punishment.

15 The difference between mistake of fact and mistake of law is that in principle the latter involves a perpetrator not mistaken about the existence of a (purely) material element or fact; therefore, mistakes about legal aspects of a crime in general do not touch the material elements or material prerequisites for justification or excuse. This is the reason why they, as expressed with regard to two such mistakes in paragraph 2 sentence 1, ‘shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’.

16 However, consider the legal evaluation of elements like ‘inhuman’ or ‘torture’. They are based on facts and thus have a comparable basis with material elements. The latter can be descriptive or normative in nature. In the second case, facts are legally evaluated and the perpetrator needs only to know the facts but does not have to know their precise legal definition in order to fulfil the mental element required; it is sufficient that he or she is aware of the social meaning of the facts perceived (‘Parallelwertung in der Laiensphäre’ or laymen’s parallel evaluation test)⁴¹. For example, knowledge of the legality of a Trial Chamber’s order is not an element of the mens rea of contempt. Otherwise, this requirement would mean that an accused could defeat a prosecution for contempt by raising a mistake of law defence⁴².

17 A similar structure underlies legal elements, because they all are normative by definition. One of the crimes against humanity according to article 7(1)(e) is ‘imprisonment ... in violation of fundamental rules of international law’. The existence of these rules is a prerequisite for the definition of the crime and therefore has to have been known by the perpetrator with the ‘mental element required’. If the perpetrator did not know the rule, he or she is mistaken in the same way as if he did not know that what he is destroying is, for instance, a (protected) hospital. He is mistaken by an error of fact and treated the same way according to article 32(1).

If, however, he is aware of a legal regulation dealing with this issue and (nevertheless) believes that this rule is either not applicable, not ‘fundamental’, or not ‘international’, he is mistaken about a legal concept underpinning the rule.

This is the typical mistake of law for which article 32 provides different consequences than for a mistake of fact. The reason for this differentiation is that the legal assignment to a certain category, or the precise apprehension of a legal definition, is not ‘the job’ of the perpetrator but of the person who has to apply the law. However, the perpetrator cannot be influenced in this process if he does not know, for instance, about the existence of a prohibition to destroy protected historical objects. Without knowing the factual basis for this legal element, the perpetrator cannot decide between right and wrong. Therefore, if he is mistaken in making this value judgement, his responsibility depends on whether he could have avoided the wrong decision or not.

⁴⁰ For details with further references see, for instance, Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 17, mn 19 et seq., 31 et seq.

⁴¹ For the differentiation see mn 21 and for all aspects mentioned Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 9, mn 76 et seq.

⁴² See Prosecutor v. Jović, IT-95-14 & 14/2-R77-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 March 2007. See with regard to value judgements also below Triffterer, ‘The Object of Review Mechanisms: Statutes’ Provisions, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence’ (Conference on International Criminal Justice, Turin 14–18 May 2007) 4. E. therein.

Admittedly, differentiating legal elements from normative elements is difficult. The definition of one of the crimes against humanity in article 7(1)(h) contains three legal elements, namely 'persecution' under 'grounds that are universally recognized as impermissible under international law' and a 'crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'. The definition of 'persecution' in article 7(2)(g) refers to another legal element: 'fundamental rights contrary to international law'. In contrast, the crime of apartheid in article 7(1)(j), defined in paragraph 2(h), presupposes an 'institutionalized regime'. But this regime need not be legitimate; a de facto institutionalization is sufficient. Therefore, this is not a legal element but a normative (material) one. The same is true for the elements in article 8(2)(b)(iv): 'widespread, long-term and severe' for the damage of the natural environment or the element that such an act 'would be clearly excessive'. Applying article 32(2) sentence 1 to these aspects, it is clear that a mistaken belief about one of these elements ('collateral damage would be clearly excessive' or 'a particular type of conduct' would not constitute 'a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'), does not relieve the perpetrator from punishment because the conclusion need not be drawn by the perpetrator. If he wrongly believes the condition would not be fulfilled, he undertakes an evaluation that is not an element of the crime; therefore, in relation to this element, no value judgement has to be made by any perpetrator at all for holding him or her responsible for a crime.

This theoretical classification is not necessary, but it may be helpful to allocate a perpetrator's mistaken perception to one of the two models of mistake. Doing so would make it easier to decide whether the mistake should relieve him from punishment and whether this decision about impunity should depend on the avoidability of the mistake.

IV. Error and lack of awareness

The word 'mistake' in article 32 describes the false perception of reality. But a perpetrator may have no perception at all, for instance, of a material element required for the crime. Often he is not aware of a certain element because when committing the act he does not contemplate the situation but rather acts without thinking about anything other than the final aim he wants to achieve. This may be the case if someone shoots without looking whether there is a human being around. This state of mind is often referred to as 'ignorance' rather than 'mistake'.

Both states of mind, however, should be treated equally; the perpetrator not perceiving one or more of the material elements lacks the capacity for the required mens rea and, therefore, cannot fulfil this mental element. He lacks the mens rea in the same way as a person who assumes a 'wrong' fact (which does not exist in reality), e.g. Aiming at what he thought was a monument that in reality was a human being. Therefore, mistake or error can be defined as a wrong or absent perception (awareness) of reality. Persons without this awareness cannot be mistaken in the technical sense of the word. They merely act without knowledge or awareness, i.e. lacking the (right) knowledge or awareness about reality. Therefore, error and mistake, as well as lack of knowledge and awareness, fall under the concept of 'mistake of fact'. They need not be differentiated because both lead to the same result: the capacity for the required mens rea is missing and therefore the mental element is missing, which is a ground for 'excluding criminal responsibility'⁴³.

⁴³ For this differentiation see Triffterer, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (1994) chapter 17, mn 2 and 3.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: Mistake of fact

1. Facts

20 The facts relevant to the subject matter of article 32 are the basis for all constituent material elements and, therefore, have to be contained in the definition of the crime. They have to exist in the ontological situation, independent of whether they exist outside the sphere of the person, as is normally the case, or inside, like, for instance, the intent to cheat. Another difference is between facts in the past or the present versus fact that will only materialize in the future, like the result to be achieved by shooting at a person or a military target. As already mentioned above, a person who does not realize that the object is a hospital cannot be aware that the building is a protected target and therefore does not have the mental element required for committing a war crime under article 8(2)(b)(ix)⁴⁴.

In these cases, the question of whether criminal liability for negligence is at stake, does not affect the question of mistake of fact. However, for the allocation of an error into one of the two categories, law or fact, another differentiation is decisive⁴⁵.

21 a) Descriptive and normative material elements. Seldom is a material element purely descriptive. Most elements have a double nature, both descriptive and normative. Human beings, for instance, are as such visible. But the beginning and the end of human life mark two borders, which have been changed, especially the latter, in recent years by legal (normative) definitions. Therefore, many material elements have, at least in their border regions, a normative character. But, in general, descriptive material elements can be identified with our five senses. Normative elements, however, are legally defined.

22 b) Facts as bases for a normative evaluation – value judgment. Nevertheless, normative material elements are not abstract legal definitions but a legal evaluation of facts by a legislator or by the jurisprudence. The underlying facts are facts like the descriptive material elements; a false perception of them falls under the label ‘mistake of fact’ and ‘negates the mental element required’ with the consequences described in paragraph 1.

23 The question is whether and to what extent the perpetrator has to comprehend the legal definition or if he just has to be aware of the social relevance of the facts (‘Parallelwertung in der Laiensphäre’ or layman’s parallel evaluation test). The prevailing opinion in German law is that the latter is sufficient. Only those applying the law have to submit the required facts, known to the perpetrator, to the legal definition in order to apply the law correctly⁴⁶.

24 c) Conceptual consequences. The differentiation between descriptive and normative elements on the one side and facts and their normative evaluation on the other has certain consequences:

Persons mistaken about purely descriptive matters, or about facts forming the factual basis for a normative evaluation fall under the concept of mistake of fact. The same is true for perpetrators who have a false understanding of the social importance of a normative element. It is because it belongs to the concept of normative (material) elements that the underlying facts and their social significance are understood by the perpetrator.

⁴⁴ Cf. Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Working Group on Elements of Crimes, Discussion paper proposed by the Coordinator, PCNICC/1999/WGEC/RT.4 (9 August 1999), where it is stated in relation to the war crimes listed in article 8(2)(a)(vi) and (vii) that the accused must be aware of the factual circumstances conferring the victim(s) with protected status under the Geneva Conventions.

⁴⁵ See also mn 16 et seq.

⁴⁶ Ibid.

However, persons who are aware of the factual basis and the social importance but (nevertheless) wrongfully believe that the legal definition is not applicable to their conduct, fall under the category of ‘mistake of law’. They undertake (as already mentioned in mn 17) an evaluation which is not at all demanded but falls exclusively within the competence of those who have to apply the law.

2. Perception as basis for ‘the mental element required’

According to article 30(1), the mental element presupposes ‘for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ that ‘the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge’. A person who is not aware of a certain situation or a single material element cannot exhibit this mens rea; nor does the person know of its existence or its coming into existence like, for instance, the results of an act. Perception therefore is the basis for ‘the mental element required’. Where it is lacking, ‘the mental element required’ does not exist and no criminal responsibility can be established⁴⁷.

3. Legal consequences

The consequences from the above considerations about mistakes of fact include the following: anybody mistaken about or not aware of a material element cannot exhibit ‘the mental element required’. Since the mental element is missing, the mistake constitutes ‘a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’. A person who is free from criminal responsibility is free from penal guilt and therefore cannot be punished. Insofar as the Statute does not provide otherwise (like in article 28), he or she has to be acquitted.

To the extent that a provision in the Statute requires a mental element other than intent and knowledge, article 32(1) does not regulate it. But by argumentum e contrario, if there exists such a regulation independent of intent and knowledge, e.g. negligence, the mental element required for this different concept of responsibility is not automatically lacking. Rather, it depends on whether the mistake of fact was unavoidable or avoidable. If it was unavoidable, most probably the concept of negligence will not apply. If, however, it was avoidable, the negligent commission of the fact may be punished, provided the Statute or other laws contain a rule punishing such negligent conduct, like in the case of command responsibility under article 28⁴⁸.

When deciding that criminal responsibility is not excluded, the Court nevertheless may rule that the mistake of fact was of such a character that it may constitute a circumstance calling for the mitigation of punishment. This is because the Court ‘in determining the sentence ... shall ... take into account such factors as the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person’, according to article 78(1). Even though not specifically mentioned in article 32(1), this possibility is open in all cases falling under article 32. Therefore, even if a situation does not constitute ‘a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’, mistakes belong to the ‘individual circumstances’ of the convicted person and, therefore, have to be taken into consideration. They may even impinge on the judgement of ‘the gravity of the crime’ because this includes not only the harm but also the amount of guilt – personal blame – for committing the crime. Article 78 entails that certain Rules have to be respected, in particular rule 145, since they may determine by what amount such factors reduce the penalty⁴⁹.

A further consequence of paragraph 1 is that a mistake about facts underlying a defense, like self-defense, does not negate the mental element required. If it was unavoidable, such an error may exclude punishment for the respective crime. If it was avoidable, it may lead to ⁴⁷ See also mn 16 et seq.

⁴⁸ For the mental element see Piragoff, article 30, mn 1 et seq., and with regard to command responsibility see Arnold and Triffterer, article 28, mn 1 et seq.

⁴⁹ For such consideration see Jennings, article 78, mn 2 and 9 and Triffterer and Burchard, article 27, mn 25.

negligent responsibility according to the national regulations in Austria and Germany and some other countries, which can be applicable according to article 21(1)(c).

II. Paragraph II: Mistake of law

1. Differentiation from mistake of fact

- 29 The explanation above that an express mistake has to be treated in the same way as lack of awareness is, in principle, also valid for legal elements. The difference between the two mistakes mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 is explained by the two examples given in the first sentence of paragraph 2. But these examples are not exhaustive, as can be seen from sentence 2 in this paragraph. Generally, the difference can be characterized by the definition of facts given above and by defining legal elements as those with specific legal content. Examples, in addition to those already given above, include ‘impermissible under international law’ in article 7(1)(h) and ‘a regularly constituted Court’ in article 8(2)(c)(iv)⁵⁰.

2. Aspects to be mistaken

- 30 The concept of paragraph 2 is broad and the examples given in its first sentence can serve only as guidelines for a mistake of law that does not ‘negate[s] the mental element required’.
- 31 a) ‘whether a ... conduct is a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’. It is unclear whether the wording of paragraph 2 sentence 1 refers to two mistakes of law or just to one that is precisely explained by reference to the jurisdiction of the Court.
 ‘Whether a particular conduct is a crime’ refers to the awareness of the punishability of the act. The perpetrator is aware of all relevant facts but draws the wrong conclusion, namely that his correctly perceived conduct, free of error, does not fulfil the prerequisites for ‘a particular type of conduct’ constituting a crime. This mistake is evaluated as an irrelevant error and therefore ‘shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’. The phrasing ‘shall not’ makes clear that there is no discretion in the Court to come to another judgement.
 If a person evaluates ‘a particular type of conduct’ (correctly) as a crime but believes that this crime does not fall ‘within the jurisdiction of the Court’, he or she is just mistaken about the competence of the ICC to exercise its jurisdiction. This knowledge is, however, not an essential element of the crime nor has it any other importance for establishing, in principle, the criminal responsibility of the suspect. Similarly, in national law an error about which court is competent to prosecute the crime is completely irrelevant. Therefore, it does not matter whether the two references ‘whether a ... conduct is a crime’ and ‘within the jurisdiction of the Court’ are treated as one or two separate elements, because in both cases the result is the same: the mistake of law ‘shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’.
- 33 b) Other ‘legal elements’. Paragraph 2 sentence 2 suggests that there are other mistakes of law which shall not necessarily, but ‘may ... be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’ (emphasis added).
- 34 aa) Knowledge of the facts. All legal elements have their basis in facts, which have to be known if the perception of the element is to reach the awareness of the perpetrator. Someone who is not aware of the purpose for which ‘a flag of truce’ may be used, cannot comprehend an ‘improper use’ of it under article 8(2)(b)(vii)⁵¹. This serves as an additional example of the close relationship between normative (material) and legal elements, which have been dealt with under mn 15 and 21 et seq. If the word improper is defined as ‘forbidden by law’, it is a legal element; if it refers to mere customs socially respected, it would be a normative element.

⁵⁰ See also mn 34.

⁵¹ See mn 15 et seq. and 29.

There are few legal elements in the Statute about which a mistake of law may arise under paragraph 2 sentence 2. One may be contained in article 8(2)(b)(xx): ‘subject of a comprehensive prohibition’ or ‘by an amendment in accordance with the relevant provisions’. Someone who does not know of any prohibitive rule or ‘relevant provisions’ does not know the relevant facts, i.e. the basis on which this legal element is built upon. Therefore, he cannot be aware that his behaviour violates this regulation because his mistake concerns prerequisite constitutive facts for the legal element⁵².

bb) Mistaken legal evaluation. On the contrary, someone who is correctly aware of the situation and knows the constituent circumstances but nevertheless believes that the prohibition is not applicable to his conduct, or the amendment was not ‘in accordance with the relevant provision’ under article 8(2)(b)(xx), evaluates the legal situation incorrectly. The same is true for someone who knows of the judicial guarantees in the 1966 UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, but wrongly assumes that these rights are not ‘generally recognized as indispensable’ under article 8(2)(c)(iv) or wrongfully believes that this treaty is not valid or valid only between some States. He correctly understands the situation but also evaluates it incorrectly. He makes a legal evaluation, a value judgement, which is not necessary as part of his ‘obligation’ and therefore his mistake is of no relevance. 35

3. Legal consequences

It is worth noting that there is a difference in the wording in paragraph 2 between sentence 1 (‘shall’) and sentence 2 (‘may’). This needs clarification with regard to excluding or granting discretion to the Court. 36

a) Excluding or not ‘excluding criminal responsibility’. The alternatives expressed in both sentences of paragraph 2 are very clear. The two mistakes mentioned in the first sentence ‘shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’. This means there is criminal responsibility upon which a penalty has to be applied. The Court has no discretion with respect to this judgment as to criminal responsibility. 37

However, with regard to other mistakes of law referred to in sentence 2, there is discretion which is expressed by the word ‘may’. There is no obvious hint in article 32 or elsewhere in the Statute about how to exercise this discretion. Since the difference between sentence 1 and 2 must presumably make sense, it may be based on the following reason. The Court has to decide to which category the mistake should be assigned: is it an error regarding the underlying facts or a mistaken legal evaluation? Assuming the first, the consequence is regulated obligatorily by paragraph 1; because the error is factual it falls under this provision. The discretion expressed in paragraph 2 sentence 2 concerns exclusively a mistake of law by a wrongful legal (or normative) evaluation. This means, the Court may judge that even in these cases a mistake of law may negate the mental element required and thus exclude responsibility, because the error was unavoidable. The ‘unavoidableness’ is not mentioned in article 32, but this criterion is well accepted by general principles of law. 38

The Court, therefore, in cases of paragraph 2 sentence 2, has a twofold task. First, to decide whether this mistake of law concerns the underlying facts including the law or the rule to be applied; a positive answer entails that it has no discretion because paragraph 1 is mandatory. In contrast, when the mistake is based on a wrongful legal evaluation, the Court must decide if this was avoidable or not and consequently whether criminal responsibility is excluded or not.⁵³ 39

b) Mitigating circumstances. Even though the alternatives mentioned in article 32(2) are exhaustive, excluding or not excluding criminal responsibility according to sentence 2, 40

⁵² See also mn 14 et seq.

⁵³ Contra, see K. Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 373–374, who concludes that the term ‘may’ is not a reference to the court’s discretion but rather to the fact that ‘not every mistake of law is relevant – only ones which negate the mental element’.

article 78(1) of the Statute entails that the Court has the same discretion for mistakes of law as it does for mistakes of fact (discussed above in mn 27). The rules should have made clear what criteria should be used for judging the avoidability of the mistake, or they must be decided with the help of the applicable law according to article 21.

4. Special regulation in article 33

- 41 Article 33(1) provides that persons committing crimes ‘pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior ... shall not relieve ... of criminal responsibility’. However there is a defined exception. One of the three cumulatively demanded conditions under which an order may (exceptionally) have criminal relevance refers to an error of law in subparagraph (b): ‘The person did not know that the order was unlawful’. This regulation deviates from the general rule of article 32(2).

Such a person is mistaken about the lawfulness and therefore about a legal element. He or she evaluates the order wrongly with regard to its lawfulness, which normally under article 32(2) does not constitute ‘a ground for excluding criminal responsibility’. But in this exceptional case the Court has no discretion because the word ‘shall’ means that the consequence is obligatory⁵⁴.

Article 33 contains the only case in which a wrongful legal evaluation – by express terms in the Statute – ‘relieves ... of criminal responsibility’. This consequence of an error in law follows from the wording ‘shall not relieve ... unless ... [t]he person did not know that the order was unlawful’. This mistaken value judgement may be caused by a lack of knowledge about the facts constituting the unlawfulness or by evaluating these facts incorrectly.

But according to article 33(1)(c), this consequence only applies when ‘the order was not manifestly unlawful’. If it was ‘manifestly unlawful’ under the circumstances, the defence recognized by article 33 is not applicable and it cannot relieve the defendant from responsibility. In such cases the Court is left only with the discretion to mitigate punishment, as mentioned in mn 40 according to the general rule of article 78(1)⁵⁵.

Otherwise, if ‘the order was not manifestly unlawful’ and the mistaken evaluation not ‘automatically’ avoidable, a third condition has to be fulfilled in order to relieve the perpetrator from criminal responsibility: the subordinate must have been ‘under a legal obligation to obey orders’⁵⁶. This is a merely objective, material condition to exclude criminal responsibility; it, therefore, does not have to be comprehended by the mens rea, which means that a false perception in relation to the existence of this legal element is in principle irrelevant. But it may be considered as mitigation, because the psychological pressure on the perpetrator is equally strong regardless of whether he really is under the pressure of command under article 33 or he wrongfully assumes it, as referred to under mn 26. For further discussion on value judgements of the perpetrator (see below mn 43 et seq. in particular, 49 et seq. and 54).

C. Special remarks: Scope of practical importance

- 42 It has already been mentioned above that statutes for the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, the ICTY and the ICTR, do not contain regulations similar to article 32 of the Rome Statute. Furthermore, because of the default rules on mental elements contained in article 30, there is no practical need for article 32(1)⁵⁷.

⁵⁴ See also Triffterer and Bock, article 33, mn 11 and 14.

⁵⁵ Id., mn 27. But see K. Ambos, Treatise ICL I (2013) 381, who argues that article 33 on superior orders does not apply if the defendant falsely believed that he was under a legal obligation to follow an order, in which case the defendant can then rely on the mistake of law defense under article 33. Under Ambos’ view, the legal obligation must objectively exist in order for article 33 to be triggered; the defendant’s mere subjective belief in the legal obligation is insufficient to trigger article 33.

⁵⁶ For details see Triffterer and Bock, article 33, mn 26.

⁵⁷ See above mn 4, 7 and 11.

1. ‘Core crimes’ and contempt of court

This tendency is confirmed by the jurisdiction of the Ad hoc Tribunals. Cases from the tribunals rarely deal in detail with these issues and, when they do, it is primarily regarding mistake of law in connection with Contempt of the Tribunal, and not in the context of core crimes. 43

The reason for the limited practical importance for core crimes is rather simple: Definitions of crimes under international law have been developed in accordance with appearances of behavior, which could be observed on the battlefield or, in the context of other atrocities, committed more or less openly. Deviance from generally acknowledged laws and customs of war, or broadly accepted conventional international humanitarian agreements, was generally apparent for all to see; Fletcher once referred to this as the ‘pattern of manifest criminality’ in the context of domestic criminal law.

These core crimes, such as the Grave Breaches of the Geneva Conventions, were defined by ‘visible’ conduct; there was, therefore, little chance for suspects to deny what was or could have been observed by many persons – including but certainly not limited to victims. When the prosecutor had to prove a mental element such as acting with ‘intent and knowledge’, the mental element could be easily inferred from the objective requirements that were ‘self-convincing’. For example, the required mental element is easily inferred when the defendant killed surrendered soldiers who were disarmed and taken into custody, killed POWs in concentration camps, killed wounded persons on the battlefield, or killed civilians who were not taking an active part in hostilities.

Disputes in court were mainly limited to cases where ‘unusual’ crimes were prosecuted and ‘defended’ with contradictory arguments like in the so called ‘Ärzte-Urteil’ at Nuremberg, discussed above in mn 4. The need to deal with false perceptions of the factual situation or of the ‘legal reality’ may occur not only when definitions of crimes contain elements shaped by a legal value judgement, like persecution under article 7(1)(h), or ‘in violation of the international law of armed conflict’ under article 8(2) (b)(XX), but also in cases of violations of an order of the Court or other modalities of Contempt of Court. 44

Contempt of Court is, however, not a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. It is regulated by article 71 and rules 170 et seq. But the General Principles of Criminal Law defined and acknowledged in Part 3, articles 22 et seq., which include article 32, are not limited to crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Such a limitation may exist only as far as expressly mentioned, like in articles 22 and 25(2). Otherwise, these principles apply generally, which means also to cases which fall within a ‘side competence’ of the Court, such as ‘Offences against the administration of the Court’ under article 70 and the sanctioning of ‘misconduct before the Court’ under article 71. 45

The so-called Čelebići Case dealt with considerations concerning mistake of law. The Appeals Chamber stated, with reference to the Trial Chamber’s findings and the Grave Breaches of the Geneva Conventions: 46

‘Mucić’s submission [which was “that in 1992 he could not have known that there was a possibility that the confinement of persons at Celebici could be construed as illegal under an interpretation of an admixture of the Geneva Conventions and article 2 lit. g of the Statute of the Tribunal”], has no merit because it is clear from the provisions ... from Geneva Convention IV that the detention of those persons was illegal at the very time of their detention’.⁵⁸

The Tribunal only required knowledge of the constituent facts and no value judgement in relation to this factual situation in cases where the illegality of the situation ‘is clear’ by these facts.

⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Mucić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, paras 373-75.

Similar wording can be found with regard to violations of orders of the Court. For instance, the Trial Chamber stated:

[i]f mistake of law were a valid defence in such case [Jović argued that the Blaškić Chamber's orders did not bind him], orders would become suggestions and a Chamber's authority to control its proceedings, from which the power to punish contempt in part derives, would be hobbled'.⁵⁹

The Appeals Chamber confirmed this decision, concluding that,

'knowledge of the legality of the Trial Chamber's order is not an element of the mens rea of contempt'.⁶⁰

47 The only ICC case to deal with mistake of law in the context of core crimes is Lubanga.⁶¹ The defendant argued that he was unaware that recruiting child soldiers triggered individual criminal responsibility, and even argued that he received insufficient notice that the Rome Statute was in effect during the time and location of the alleged crimes.⁶² The Pre-Trial Chamber first dispensed the legality concerns on factual grounds, noting that the Hema and Lendu communities of Ituri, and Lubanga specifically, were aware of the DRC's ratification of the Rome Statute in 2002 and 'the type of conduct which gives rise to criminal responsibility under the Statute'.⁶³ The Pre-Trial Chamber then discussed the scope of mistake of law under article 32(2), which it described as 'relatively limited'.⁶⁴ In keeping with this statement, the Chamber rejected Lubanga's mistake of law argument. In evaluating his claim, the judges apparently adopted the German 'layman's parallel evaluation test' described above. Though the chamber did not refer to the test in those terms, it did conclude that the mistake of law defense is limited to those situations where the defendant is 'unaware of a normative objective element of the crime as a result of not realising its social significance (its everyday meaning)'.⁶⁵ Applying this standard, Lubanga's argument failed because there was insufficient evidence in the record that he labored under a relevant confusion. The argument might have succeeded if there had been evidence that he misunderstood the concept of 'recruitment' as including forcible conscription but excluding voluntarily enlistment of children, which would have constituted a normative mistake.⁶⁶ In such a case, the normative element could not be understood in purely layman's terms. But no factual basis existed for reaching this conclusion about Lubanga's state of mind.⁶⁷

48 However, the real significance of the discussion in Lubanga was the chamber's cryptic adoption of the layman's parallel evaluation test in its interpretation of article 32(2).⁶⁸ The use of a German framework to understand and qualify mistakes of law is in keeping with the use of German criminal law theory by the Pre-Trial Chamber, and the ICC more generally (for example with regard to co-perpetration). At least some commentators have complained that the layman's parallel evaluation test is inconsistent with the common law framework for mistake of law, and also inconsistent with some civil law jurisdictions that regard mistake of ⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Jović, IT-95-14 & IT-95-14/2-R77, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 30 August 2006, para 21.

⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Jović, IT-95-14 & IT-95-14/2-R77, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 15 March 2007, para 27.

⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para 294. For a discussion, see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law 371–372.

⁶² Id. At paras 294–296.

⁶³ Id. At para 312.

⁶⁴ Id. At para 305.

⁶⁵ Id. At para 316.

⁶⁶ See Weigend (2008) 6 JICJ [471], 476; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law 372 (concluding that 'the defence could have raised a somewhat more sophisticated line of argumentation. If Lubanga had, for example, argued that he was aware of the general prohibition of enlisting and conscripting children but was convinced that this provision was only applicable to the forcible recruitment ("conscripting") of children, the Chamber would have been faced with the difficult question whether an erroneous evaluation of very specific normative elements of a crime... can be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility').

⁶⁷ Lubanga (Decision on the confirmation of charges), note 59, para 308, 316.

⁶⁸ See also the discussion of the test with regard to core crimes in Eser, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 889, 925.

law as an excuse negating culpability, which is far different from a negation of mens rea.⁶⁹ These considerations are not, by themselves, an absolute barrier to the ICC's interpretation of article 32(2). It is clear, however, that in Lubanga the ICC preferred a reading of the Rome Statute informed by German criminal law theory, and that the layman's parallel evaluation test will help structure future international decisions on mistake of law.

Common to both groups of decisions referred to above is the difference between awareness 49 of facts that shape the definition and an evaluation of these facts by the defendant, which is not required to establish criminal responsibility. For all these aspects it is sufficient that the defendant knows the facts, i. e. is aware of them in the sense of article 30(3), and that he nevertheless believes that the situation and/or his behaviour was not unlawful. A legal evaluation of noticed facts is not required from the perpetrator, but is exclusively the task of those who apply the law and decide the fate of the defendant. A false value judgement by the perpetrator himself is not a relevant mistake of law, at least as long as the perpetrator correctly understands the underlying facts of the situation. Such situations and their consequences have been dealt with comprehensively above under mn 17 et seq. They may play a role, if at all, as mitigating circumstances according to rule 145(2)(a) of the RPE. The above under mn 41, which considered the special rule concerning article 33, only underlines this general regulation.

2. Errors and appeal

The considerations above, dealing with the difference between mistake of fact and mistake 50 of law as well as value judgements may be helpful also when filing an Appeal to the Court or dealing with Appeal cases before it. Article 81 differentiates between errors (not mistakes) of facts and errors of law in paragraph 1(a) and (b). Such errors concern the factual situation at the Trial, in particular awareness of presented (or still-to-be presented) facts and evidence, as well as false conclusions in the sense of value judgements on which the sentence may have been founded. In these situations, the same assessment to facts and evaluations of law may be relevant for the defendant and the Prosecution. At the Appeals level, both may claim an error or even argue that the error caused an unfavourable decision from the judges.⁷⁰

3. Collateral damage as war crime?

These issues have even more practical importance for differentiating legitimate collateral 51 damage from war crimes. Both are strongly related by empirical appearance, as well as by similar concepts. But, as demonstrated by article 8(2) (b)(iv), they have to be strictly separated because of their different material and mental elements and their consequences. Both may equally violate protected targets, but, due to their different material and/or mental approaches when attacking these targets, they may lead to exoneration or to criminal liability and punishment⁷¹.

⁶⁹ Heller (2008) 6 JICJ [419], 437. Heller concludes that the Rome Statute, when properly interpreted, is far too accommodating with regard to mistakes by defendants because he concludes that the layman's parallel evaluation test, and other doctrinal mechanisms to restrict the doctrine of mistake of law, are all inapplicable. Faced with no viable doctrine to limit mistake of law arguments, he urges a legislative amendment to correct the problem. In contrast, Ambos argues the opposite, i. e. that the Rome Statute's treatment of mistakes of law 'is unduly strict and may be inconsistent with the principle of culpability'. See Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law 375 (describing the 'presumption of knowledge of the law' as a 'fiction bordering on the absurd'). The presumption probably holds for obvious war crimes such as intentionally attacking civilians but Ambos is correct to note that some war crimes, eg the notion of 'other inhumane acts', are vague and more indeterminate. Similarly, Stuckenberg (2014) 12 JICJ 311, 322, finds it deplorable that 'the Rome Statute did make a step backwards when it broadly excluded' mistake of prohibition defenses, especially because a 'soldier may honestly err about the precise content of one of the numerous and sometimes very intricate and constantly evolving rules of the laws of war'. In addition to Stuckenberg, other scholars recognize at least the possibility of the defense in cases of unavoidable mistakes. See eg Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford University Press 2010) 505; E. van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (Oxford University Press 2012) 285. The warrant for this conclusion is that it would be a breach of the principle of culpability if the law required the defendant to act in such a way that was impossible for him (in the case of unavoidable mistakes). Under this view, culpability logically presupposes that the defendant has some choice in the matter.

⁷⁰ For the common approach and the differences between errors of facts or law on the one hand, compared with mistakes of facts or law on the other hand, the considerations by Staker and Eckelmanns in this Commentary under article 81, mn 28 et seq. and 35 et seq.

The difference between harm caused by war crimes and collateral damage can be understood by scrutinizing the required mental elements. For the latter, ‘collateral damage’ may be ‘calculated’ but need not be; and when it is, it may be comprehended by ‘intent and knowledge’ in the modality of dolus eventualis and therefore amount to a war crime. If not, collateral damage does not trigger criminal responsibility, as long as it comes as ‘side effects’ to lawful military actions on military targets and is not ‘clearly excessive’, which means disproportionate ‘in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated’. In other words, the anticipated collateral damage must be weighed against the value of the military aims to be achieved by the military activity, a definition based on article 52(2) Add. Prot. I. War crimes, on the other hand, may be solitary actions violating international law, in particular the laws and customs of war or other rules of humanitarian warfare.

52 As an example, consider the war crime defined in article 8(2)(b)(iv). According to this definition, ‘intentionally launching an attack’ is per se admissible. Such an attack, for which intent and knowledge is required under article 30, becomes a war crime not by the consequences caused as ‘incidental loss’. The triggering element is within the mens rea, namely ‘the knowledge that such an attack will cause incidental loss’ on civilian targets or the environment. Such loss consequently does not have to appear by being realized and, therefore, does not have to be proven by the Prosecution as caused by the perpetrator. The Elements of Crimes, therefore, refer to this war crime under No. 3 with the phrase ‘would cause’ as well as ‘would be ... clearly excessive’. It is sufficient that the perpetrator foresaw the facts leading to these conclusions and if the result occurred it would ‘be clearly excessive in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated’.

53 With regard to such hypothetical losses, this definition does not trigger attempt liability. Whereas the mens rea for attempt liability requires intent and knowledge in relation to all material elements constituting the crime, independent of whether they have been realized or not, the knowledge required for article 8(2)(b)(iv) is only awareness in the sense of article 30(3). Acting ‘in the knowledge’ is only the intellectual part of the ordinary mens rea, i. e. the mental side. At the same time it implies that the ‘intent to cause’, the volitional part, is missing.

In these cases, the required mental element is associated only with the intellectual approach of the relevant behaviour. Therefore, an error about what damage will occur on protected targets is relevant only if it concerns the factual basis for such a prognosis. And it implies also that the suspect has the ‘correct knowledge’ about these facts, but wrongfully evaluates them as not causing such losses or, if nevertheless they appear, that they would not be ‘clearly excessive’.

54 With regard to other war crimes, article 32 is, in principle, applicable in all its modalities. With regard to collateral damages as for all value judgements, there is a difference: A mistake of fact or law concerning the legality of the underlying military attack is treated as one of the usual mistakes, to which article 32 may be applied. Since the responsible person does not have to have any intent at all with regard to the so-called collateral damages, a false perception about their appearances is no defence. It may only shape the legality or illegality of the underlying military action and thus the criminal responsibility for this behaviour, the attack potentially or in reality causing such damages. Because excessive collateral damage not only makes the harm it causes illegal but also the attack itself illegal, it triggers liability for punishment.

⁷¹ See Triffterer, in: Moos, Jesionek and Müller (eds.), Festschrift für Roland Miklau zum 65. Geburtstag (2006) 559, 559 et. seq. See also Dörmann and Arnold, article 8, mn 31–35 and 58–60. See also Reynolds (2005) 56 AFLRev [1], 64 et. seq.

It may be argued that article 8(2)(b)(iv) requires, by the phrase ‘in the knowledge that’, a mental requirement additional to the ordinary mens rea with which the attack must be launched: awareness that the attack ‘will cause incidental loss’ of civilians or ‘damage to the natural environment’ and that such consequences, if they are realized, ‘would be clearly excessive in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated’. But perhaps this formulation describes only circumstances, characterizing the constituent elements of an attack falling within the scope and notion of this war crime. ‘Knowledge’ would then only emphasize what is already required for ordinary intent in the sense of article 30: awareness of a material circumstance of the attack.

In any event, the formulation ‘in the knowledge that’ refers to facts, which according to the knowledge of the perpetrator may lead to the conclusion that, due to the character of the attack, there is a risk that its targets are protected, which the perpetrator does not have to intend but only has to know. This means that the risk has to be covered by the intellectual, though not the volitional, part of the mens rea.

What consequences with regard to criminal responsibility and a mistake of fact or law derive from this proposition? In this case, the word ‘knowledge’ only repeats what is already required by article 30: the perpetrator has to know the facts which lead to the conclusion that ‘collateral damages’ will occur by launching the attack. An error, or the belief that the attack will not cause incidental loss or damage, is a false value judgement and therefore does not relieve the defendant from criminal responsibility. The same is true with regard to a false assessment concerning the requirement that the damage be ‘clearly excessive’⁷².

This result is satisfying and convincing: the attacker has to bear the risk of collateral damages when, for instance, he knows that there are more civilians than soldiers around the targeted building. Military actions are permitted only when the risk for ‘protected targets’ is excluded or, at least, minimized and, therefore, appears ‘negligible’, which even in the latter case is ‘bad enough’ for the victims. But a soldier who knows about the potential or actual ‘clearly excessive’ incidental damage to protected targets (by his awareness of facts which establish this relationship), should not be permitted to attack ‘military targets’. In particular, the experience of 21st century warfare suggests that, in general, the amount of civilian or protected targets destroyed in battle is very high and may not be justified when weighed against the anticipated value of the military objective.

Therefore, an excursus to a diverging opinion. Jefferson D. Reynolds has pointed out that ‘many attacks are launched with the knowledge that they will result in some civilian casualties’⁷³. He further states in his analysis: ‘A defendant would not be criminally liable if an attack was executed under the personal belief that any collateral damage was not excessive compared to the military objective achieved’⁷⁴.

Reynolds backs this opinion by referring in his footnote 301 to the Elements of Crimes. There is an overall principle for all crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court listed under No. 4 in the General Introduction:

‘With respect to mental elements associated with elements involving value judgement, such as those using the terms “inhuman” or “severe”, it is not necessary that the perpetrator personally completed a particular value judgement, unless otherwise indicated’⁷⁵.

In fact, Element No. 3 for article 8(2)(b) (iv) in its formulation:

‘The perpetrator knew that the attack would cause incidental death or injury to civilians or damage to civilian objects or widespread, long-term and severe damage to the natural environment and that such death, injury or damage would be of such an extent as to be

⁷² For a different opinion see Bothe, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 379 et. seq., 400. See also Elements of Crime, Annex II in this Commentary, fn. 37.

⁷³ Reynolds (2005) 56 AFLRev [1], 70.

⁷⁴ Id. at 71.

⁷⁵ Elements, Annex II in this Commentary.

clearly excessive in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated⁷⁶ may be understood as such an exception. And, as to avoid any doubt and opposite interpretation of this Element, because its interpretation according to the scope and structure of crimes in relation to mistake of fact and law, the drafters added to this Element footnote 37 with a specific interpretation, which reads:

‘As opposed to the general rule set forth in paragraph 4 of the General Introduction this knowledge element requires that the perpetrator make the value judgement as described therein. An evaluation of that value judgment must be based on the requisite information available to the perpetrator at the time’⁷⁷.

This interpretation tries to narrow the definitions of all crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, which use ‘mental elements associated with elements involving value judgement’. If the interpretation of Reynolds were accepted, it would not accord with the spirit of the Rome Statute preamble and its stated goal of preventing impunity, but would instead further impunity for those persons who launch attacks ‘in the knowledge that they will result in some civilian casualties’, as mentioned above.

This approach is dangerous because it frustrates the law’s goal of fostering compliance, as can be seen when Reynolds continues by citing Michael Bothe:

‘Under this interpretation a defendant’s culpability depends entirely and exclusively on that individual’s own value judgement⁷⁸. If the defendant believed the collateral damage was not excessive, then there could not be a finding of guilt⁷⁹. The court’s own evaluation of the defendant’s value judgement as to the excessive character of the damage is irrelevant⁸⁰. Defendants are able to make an independent value judgement that ultimately determines their own criminality and rewards willful ignorance⁸¹. Commanders who teach their subordinates that they should only launch attacks when they have the personal belief that the collateral damage would not be excessive relative to the anticipated military advantage, run the risk that their subordinates will not be sufficiently careful in selecting military targets nor avoiding civilian damage.

The above-mentioned danger to the interests of justice is not diminished when Reynolds admits: ‘Although the ICC appears to adopt this approach in the ICC Elements of Crime, it is also free to disregard it’⁸².

It does not help to emphasize the independence of the Court in relation to the Elements, after they have been approved and acknowledged by the ASP without discussion. Reynolds himself mentions that the Elements are (merely!) guidelines that the Court may or may not apply.

In relation to the war crime defined in article 8(2)(b)(iv), the Court will hopefully not adopt what the ASP has recommended without open consideration and discussion in plenary.

- 57 If the Court would follow what is intended by article 9 to assist its interpretation and application of article 8(2)(b)(iv), the preventive function of International Criminal Law may even collapse. If military personnel can launch attacks in the belief that the expected damage to protected targets will not be ‘clearly excessive’ compared with the anticipated military advantage, they may be tempted to broaden the risk to such targets in almost unlimited ways because they do not risk criminal responsibility and punishment. The value of the military advantage will inevitably be decided first by the military with an optimistically high evaluation, which is difficult to control because of, among other things, the secrecy of military strategy. The higher the anticipated military advantage is calculated, the more loss

⁷⁶ Ibid.

⁷⁷ See Annex II in this Commentary.

⁷⁸ Reynolds (2005) 56 AFLRev [1], 71, with reference in fn. 301 to Bothe, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 379, 400.

⁷⁹ Id. with the same reference to Bothe.

⁸⁰ Id.

⁸¹ Id.

⁸² Id. at 72.

would be 'allowed' as so-called proportional 'collateral damage'⁸³. Such an approach should not prevail and not shape the intensity and character of attacks launched for whatever military reasons, if International Criminal Law is to provide (as it should) effective protection for the civilian population and the natural environment⁸⁴.

⁸³ See also Triffterer, in: Moos, Jesionek and Müller (eds.), Festschrift für Roland Miklau zum 65. Geburtstag (2006) 559.

⁸⁴ For these aspects in the context of the Kampala Review Conference, see also Triffterer, 'The Object of Review Mechanisms: Statutes' Provisions, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (Conference on International Criminal Justice, Turin 14–18 May 2007).

Article 33

Superior orders and prescription of law

1. The fact that a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been committed by a person pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior, whether military or civilian, shall not relieve that person of criminal responsibility unless:

- (a) The person was under a legal obligation to obey orders of the Government or the superior in question;
- (b) The person did not know that the order was unlawful; and
- (c) The order was not manifestly unlawful.

2. For the purposes of this article, orders to commit genocide or crimes against humanity are manifestly unlawful.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'Zur strafbefreienden Wirkung des "Handelns auf Befehl" aus deutscher und völkerstrafrechtlicher Sicht', (1998) JR 221; id., 'Defences in International Criminal Law', in: B. S. Brown (ed.), Research Handbook on International Criminal Law (Edward Elgar 2011) 299; id. and Bock, S., 'Germany', in: A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds.), General Defences in Criminal Law – Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (Ashgate 2014) 227; Bantekas, I., 'Defences in International Criminal Law', in: D. McGoldrick, P. Rowe and E. Donnelly (eds.), The Permanent International Criminal Court – Legal and Policy Issues (Hart 2004) 263; Cryer, R., 'Superior Scholarship on Superior Orders: An Appreciation of Yoram Dinstein's the Defence of "Obedience to Superior Orders" in International Law', (2011) 9 JICJ 959; id., 'Defences/Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility', in: id. et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (OUP 3rd edn. 2014) 398; Dinstein, Y., The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law (Sijthoff 1965); id., 'Defences', in: G. K. McDonald and O. Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law, Vol. I (Kluwer Law International 2000) 369; Dufour, G., 'La défense d'ordre supérieurs existe-t-elle vraiment?', (2000) 82 IRevRC 969; Elliot, C., 'France', in: K. J. Heller and M. D. Dubber (eds.), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford Law Books 2011) 209; Eser, A., "'Defences" in Strafverfahren wegen Kriegsverbrechen', in: K. Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Otto Triffterer zum 65. Geburtstag (Springer 2nd edn. 1998) 755; id., Lagodny, O. and Triffterer, O., 'Proposals to Amend the 'Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind"', in: Triffterer, O. (ed.), Acts of Violence and International Criminal Law – A New Position to Fight Abuse of Power, (1997) 4 CroatianAnnCrimL&Prac 872; Fournet, C., 'Judicial Development of the Law of Defences by the International Criminal Tribunals', in: S. Darcy and J. Powderly (eds.), Judicial Creativity at the International Tribunals (OUP 2010) 229; Fuhrmann, P., Der höhere Befehl als Rechtfertigung im Völkerrecht (Beck 1963); Gaeta, P., 'The Defence of Superior Orders: The Statute of the International Criminal Court versus Customary International Law', (1999) 10 EJIL 172; Garraway, C., 'Superior Orders and the International Criminal Court: Justice Delivered or Justice Denied?', (1999) 81 IRevRC 785; Glaser, S., 'L'Ordre hiérarchique en droit international pénal', (1953) 33 Revue de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie 283; Grayson, J. W., 'The Defence of Superior Orders in the International Criminal Court', (1995) 64 NordJIL 243; Green, L. C., Superior Orders in National and International Law (Sijthoff 1976); id., 'The Defence of Superior Orders in the Modern Law of Armed Conflicts', (1993) 31 AlbertaLRev 320; id., 'Article 11: Order of a Government or Superior', in: M. C. Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against Peace and Security of Mankind (Erès 1993) 191; Heller, K. J., 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', in: K. J. Heller and M. D. Dubber (eds.), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford Law Books 2011) 393; Heugas-Darraspen, E., 'Article 33. Ordre hiérarchique et ordre de la loi', in: F. Fernandez and X. Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire article par article, Vol. I (Pedone 2012) 945; Jescheck, H.-H., Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane nach Völkerstrafrecht (Röhrscheid 1952); Knoops, G.-J. A., Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2nd edn. 2008); Korte, M., Das Handeln auf Befehl als Strafausschließungsgrund (Nomos 2003); Kos-Rabcewicz-Zubkowski, L., 'Seventh Interim Report', in: ILA (ed.), Report of the Sixty-Second Conference Held at Seoul (ILA 1986) 357; Liang, J., 'Defending the Emergence of the Superior Orders Defence in the Contemporary Context', (2010) 2 GoJIL 872; McCoubrey, H., 'From Nuremberg to Rome: Restoring the Defence of Superior Orders', (2001) 50 I&CompLQ 386; Meyer, F., 'Ausschluss und Minderung strafrechtlicher Verantwortung bei Handeln auf Weisung', (2012) 159 GA 557; Mezzetti, E., 'Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility', in: Lattanzi, F. (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Comments on the Draft Statute (Editoriale Scientifica 1998) 147; Nill-Theobald, C., 'Defences bei Kriegsverbrechen am Beispiel Deutschlands und der USA', (edition iuscrim 1998); Paust, J. J., 'Superior Orders and Command Responsibility', in: M. C. Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, Vol III, Enforcement (Transnational Publishers 1987) 73; Saland, P., 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: R. S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (Kluwer Law International 1999) 189; Schabas, W. A., 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the ICC Statute', (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 400; Scaliotti, M., 'Defences Before the International Criminal Court: Substantive Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility – Part 1’, (2001) 1 JCLRev 111; Schmoller, K., ‘§ 110. Eigenmächtige Heilbehandlung’, in O. Triffterer, C. Rosbaud and H. Hinterhofer (eds.), Salzburger Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch (Lexis Nexis 5th supplement 1998); Triffterer, O., Österreichisches Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (Beck 2nd ed. 1994); id., ‘Bestandsaufnahme zum Völkerstrafrecht’, in: G. Hankel and G. Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte gegen Menschheitsverbrechen: Zum Völkerstrafrecht 50 Jahre nach den Nürnberger Prozessen (Hamburger Edition 1995) 169; UNWCC (ed.), History of the United Nations War Crimes Commission and the Development of the Laws of War (H. M. Stationery Office 1948); Vogler, T., ‘The Defense of “Superior Order” in International Criminal Law’, in: M. C. Bassiouni and V. P. Nanda (eds.), A Treatise on International Criminal Law, Vol. I, Crimes and Punishment (Thomas 1973) 619; Zimmermann, A., ‘Superior Orders’, in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J. R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 957.

Content

A. General remarks	1
I. Historical development	1
II. Conceptual framework and article 32	10
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	13
I. The Heading: ‘Superior orders and prescription of law’	13
II. Paragraph 1	14
1. General rule: ‘shall not relieve’	14
a) ‘crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’	15
b) Committing ‘pursuant to an order’	16
aa) Definition of order	17
bb) ‘of a Government or of a superior’	18
cc) ‘military or civilian’	22
dd) Connection between order and conduct	23
c) Legal consequences	24
2. Exemption	25
a) Conditions	26
aa) ‘legal obligation to obey’	26
bb) ‘did not know that the order was unlawful’	27
cc) ‘not manifestly unlawful’	28
b) Legal consequences	29
III. Paragraph 2: ‘manifestly unlawful’	30
1. Presumptio iuris et de iure	30
2. Additional cases?	31
C. Special remarks: Superior orders and command responsibility, article 28	32

A. General remarks

I. Historical development

Article VIII of the 1945 Nuremberg Charter was the first international document dealing expressly with the criminal responsibility of subordinates. It completely excluded superior orders as a valid defence by providing that acting ‘pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior shall not free [...] from responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment, if the Tribunal determines that justice so requires’¹. The IMT approved the underlying principle of absolute liability of the subordinate and argued that it.

‘is in conformity with the law of all nations. That a soldier was ordered to kill or torture in violation of the International Law of war has never been recognized as a defence to such acts of brutality, though, as the Charter here provides, the order may be urged in mitigation of punishment. The true test [...] is not the existence of the order, but whether moral choice was in fact possible’².

¹ See UNTS 288 (1951); also Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Triffterer (1998) 755, 759 and fn. 14. This rule was confirmed in article II para. 4 (b) of the Allied Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes against Peace and against Humanity of 20 December 1945, which, however, did not include the words ‘that justice so requires’. See also the overview on the historical development of the superior order defence by McCoubrey (2001) 50 I&CompLQ 386, 387–392.

² The Trial of the Major War Criminals, Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg, Germany (H. M. Attorney General by HMSO, London 1950), Part 22, 447; crit. as ‘the total rejection

Given the 'shocking and extensive' crimes in question which 'have been committed consciously, ruthlessly and without military excuse or justification', however, the IMT deemed a mitigation of punishment to be inappropriate³. In some of the subsequent proceedings, judges have tried to find more flexible solutions giving due regard to the soldier's dilemma who is trapped between the duty to obey the orders of his or her superior and the imperative demands of (international) criminal law⁴. Nevertheless, the issue was highly disputed not only between the parties in these proceedings but also between the judges⁵.

It is surprising that the Genocide and the Geneva Conventions of 1949 did not take any specific position on the (possible) exonerating effects of superior orders. The Genocide Convention provides in article III merely for the punishability of conspiracy and incitement while the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 mention for instance articles 49, 50, 129 and 146 the punishability of orders to commit war crimes. Since it is acknowledged that the prevention of such orders is the best measure to avoid such crimes and taking into consideration that the Geneva Conventions have not created new international humanitarian law but merely codified already existing laws and customs of war prohibiting certain behaviour⁶, the silence on this question of accountability is understandable.

- 2 In accordance with its mandate to elaborate a (rather complete) Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, the ILC included in its 1951 Draft an article on superior orders (article 4), adhering in principle to the Nuremberg precedent albeit with two modifications⁷: 'shall not free' was replaced by 'does not relieve' and the possibility of mitigating punishment was not expressly mentioned. The main change was that the irrelevance of an order was made dependent on that 'a moral choice was in fact possible'. In its report, the ILC referred expressly to '[p]rinciple IV of the Commission's formulation of the Nuremberg principles, on the basis of the interpretation given by the Nuremberg Tribunal to article 8 of its Charter'⁸. The proposed moral-choice criterion, which passed the Fifth Session of the General Assembly without any substantial modification, was meant to lay 'down the principle that the accused is responsible only if, in the circumstances, it was possible for him to act contrary to superior orders'⁹. Mitigation of punishment was not mentioned but also not excluded; rather it was regulated in the general rule of article 5 of the 1951 Draft Code.

In its revised 1954 Draft Code, the ILC emphasized that article 4 only excludes superior orders as a valid defence 'in international law'; in addition, the wording 'a moral choice was of the superior order defence was a novelty and went beyond the existing international law', Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 378.

³ The Trial of the Major War Criminals, Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg, Germany (H. M. Attorney General by HMSO, London 1950), Part 22, 493.

⁴ The soldier's dilemma was summarized by the Israeli Supreme Court as follows: 'There is also the personal problem of the soldier himself when placed in the dilemma that, if he disobeys the order of his commanding officer, and it later turns out to have been lawful, he will be brought before a court-martial, whereas if he obeys it, and it later transpires that this was not the case, he will be liable to punishment under the general criminal law.', A-G of Israel v. Eichmann, Supreme Court Judgment, 29 May 1962, (1968) 36 ILReporter 277, 314 para. 15; see also Dinstein, 'Obedience to Superior Orders' (1965) 5–9; Grayson (1995) 64 NordJIL 243, 251; Bantekas, in: McGoldrick, Rowe and Donnelly (eds.), Permanent ICC (2004) 263, 269; Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 872–874; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 376 with further references.

⁵ According to the judgement in the Hostage Case, for instance, a subordinate who is unaware of the unlawfulness of the order may claim a mistake of law, US v. von Listz et al. (Hostage Case), 19 February 1948, in: US General Printing Office, Trial of War Criminals, xi (1997) 1236–1237; thereto Jescheck, Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane (1952) 388 et seq. In the High Command Case, the Tribunal indicated that in case the pressure exercised by the superior amounted to duress, the subordinate could be excused, US v. von Leeb et al. (High Command Case), 27 October 1948, in: US General Printing Office, Trial of War Criminals, xi (1997) 508–509; see also the case-law overview by Ambos (1998) JR 221, 223–224.

⁶ See Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen (1966) 190; id., in: Hankel and Stuby (eds.), Strafgerichte (1995) 169, 177–178.

⁷ See also Green (1993) 31 AlberiaLRev 320, 331–333.

⁸ 1951 ILC Draft Code, 137.

⁹ 1951 ILC Draft Code, 137.

in fact possible to him' was replaced by 'in the circumstances at the time, it was possible for him not to comply with that order'. This alteration occurred because of views that 'moral choice' was a difficult concept to define and put too much emphasis on the moral and not on the factual or the legal situation in which the subordinate had committed the crime¹⁰.

The 1986 Draft Code contained a new article 8 on 'Exceptions to the principle of responsibility'. Its subpara. (c) provided that 'the order of a Government or of a superior does not relieve the perpetrator from criminal responsibility unless he acted under the threat of a grave, imminent and irremediable peril'. According to subparagraph (e), this and all other exceptions to criminal responsibility should be inapplicable if there was a 'breach of a peremptory rule of international law', the defence originated in a fault on the part of the perpetrator or 'the interest sacrificed is higher than the interest protected'¹¹. However, these limitations were not contained in the later version of this provision, then named article 9. The latter changed the concept of superior orders by mentioning that it should constitute an exception to criminal responsibility and returned to the 1951 Draft Code's formula of 'provided a moral choice was in fact not possible'¹². In its commentary, the ILC acknowledged that according to the Hostage and High Command Cases¹³ compliance to an order may already be 'justified by coercion and by an error as to the lawfulness of the order'. In the end, it nevertheless confirmed the need for a special regulation on superior orders¹⁴.

The 1991 ILC Draft Code returned to the 1954 Draft and substituted the 'moral choice' criterion with the possibility 'not to comply with that order' in article 11. In addition, it included in article 14 a regulation according to which 'the competent court shall determine the admissibility of defences under the general principles of law' and 'shall, where appropriate, take into account extenuating circumstances'.

Parallel to the endeavour of the ILC, alternative models were developed by the AIDP and the ILA. The 1980 AIDP Draft mentioned superior orders in the context of other defences in article IX section 5 expressing that '[a] person [...] is not relieved from responsibility by the sole fact that he was acting – pursuant to "superior orders", except where the provisions of article IX, Section 5 were applicable'. Article IX section 5 stated that 'a person acting in obedience to superior orders shall not be exonerated from responsibility – if he could have reasonably known that his conduct constituted a crime and he had a moral choice in refusing to obey the order'¹⁵.

The 61st Conference of the ILA adopted in 1984 a resolution which proposed in the annexed Protocol II, section III, Justifications, paragraph 5, a provision similar to the present article 33:

'Every one is justified when he, in engaging in the conduct charged to constitute an offence, does no more than execute an order of his superior in the armed services which he does not know to be unlawful or which is not for him obviously unlawful' (emphasis added).

Proposals to include beside armed services, for instance, the police and (other) security forces were rejected. In the Explanatory Report to Protocol II on Defences, Annex D under section Ad III paragraph (5), it was expressly mentioned, that

[t]he minimum prerequisite for the justification of an order is for the subordinate person, that the order is not obviously unlawful. So neither the theory of the "bayonettes intelligentes" nor the one of the total exemption of the subordinate persons from criminal liability for actions on order are laid down here.'

¹⁰ See, e.g., Fuhrmann, Der höhere Befehl (1963) 110; Nill-Theobald, 'Defences' (1998) 77.

¹¹ See also in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin, article 32 mn 5.

¹² See Report of the ILC on the Work of its Thirty-Ninth Session, 4 May–17 July 1987, (1987) 2 YbILC, Vol. II, Part 1, 7–9.

¹³ See note 5.

¹⁴ Report of the ILC on the Work of its Thirty-Ninth Session, 4 May–17 July 1987, (1987) 2 YbILC, Vol. II, Part 1, 9.

¹⁵ See Bassiouni, ICL: Draft International Criminal Code (1980) 141 et seq., 152 and 163.

The underlying consideration was, that for various reasons ‘[t]he obviously possible knowledge of the unlawfulness by the subordinate person can only be assumed for very grave breaches of the law’¹⁶.

6 It was against this background that the ICTY Statute was drafted. Its regulation on superior orders, article 7 para. 4, is in its final version completely comparable with article VIII of the Nuremberg Charter, leaving unconsidered the drafts and the jurisprudence developed in the interim¹⁷. This appears to be understandable, since the aim was to formulate generally accepted international criminal law and the discussion about a more detailed formulation had at that time not led to a widely accepted result and could have led to an undesirable delay in establishing the ICTY.

7 With regard to the legal effects of superior orders, especially the ILA-Draft and the writing of scholars, members of the AIDP, refer to three major discernible opinions. The traditional theory called ‘respondeat superior’ is based on the notion that, when acting on superior orders subordinates, especially privates in the army, could not decide, if the order was lawful or unlawful because they do not know the relevant circumstances. Besides, it would be at least from their subjective point of view impossible for them to refuse to obey, since they are only tools of those in power¹⁸. The opposite opinion favours an ‘absolute liability’ of the subordinate arguing that only lawful orders can create an obligation to obey¹⁹. But as always in such rigid situations there is also a conciliatory branch of opinions. Some supporters of the ‘respondeat superior’ approach argue that orders should not relieve the subordinate of responsibility if they are ‘manifestly unlawful’²⁰. The second theory also has its compromising branch, called the ‘mens rea principle’, according to which the mental element may be lacking, if the subordinate mistakenly believes that the order was lawful²¹. The third opinion holds superior orders generally irrelevant with regard to the criminal responsibility but concedes that they may constitute *mitigating circumstances*²².

The 1994 ILC Draft Statute did not contain any regulation on superior orders and did not even mention this defence, because of its emphasis on enforcement and jurisdiction. Consequently, the 1995 Ad Hoc Committee did not consider this specific question in detail. However, the defence of superior orders was mentioned in the list of possible excuses leaving it to the Preparatory Committee to decide if at all and with what notion a regulation on this subject matter should be included in the Statute of the ICC²³.

8 Even though the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR with their identical provisions may – at first glance – raise the impression that the legal concept of superior orders was clarified, the situation was open when the Preparatory Committee started its work. Therefore, proposals published during the interim in the Updated Siracusa Draft and the 1996 ILC Draft Code were highly contentious²⁴. The discussion was structured according to the three

¹⁶ Kos-Rabcewicz-Zubkowski, in: ILA (ed.), Report (1986) 357, 374. For the different theories and scholarly views see Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity (2011) 590 et seq.; Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Triffterer (1998) 755, 760 et seq.; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 287–291, 299–303.

¹⁷ On the adoption of the strict Nuremberg approach of absolute liability in the Statutes of various international and internationalized Tribunals Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 379.

¹⁸ For details see Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity (2011) 590 et seq.; Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Triffterer (1998) 755, 760, fn. 17 and 18; also Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ (1998) 69 et seq.; Gaeta (1999) 10 EJIL 172, 174 et seq.; Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev 111, 127–129.

¹⁹ See Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Triffterer (1998) 755, 762 with further references in fn. 28 and 29; also Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ (1998) 71 et seq. (95).

²⁰ See, for example, Vogler, in: Bassiouni and Nanda (eds.), Treatise on ICL (1973) 619, 634.

²¹ Dinstein, ‘Obedience to Superior Orders’ (1965) 76 et seq., 87 et seq.; also Eser, in: Schmoller (ed.), Festschrift für Triffterer (1998) 755, 763 fn. 32.

²² See, for example, Jescheck, Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane (1952) 268.

²³ See Ad Hoc Committee Report, Annex II (Guidelines), 58.

²⁴ See, for instance, Preparatory Committee Decisions 1997, article M with fn. 17: ‘There were widespread doubts about the contents and the placement of this paragraph’; see also Gaeta (1999) 10 EJIL 172, 188–9; Saland, in: Lee (ed.), ICC: Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 189, 210–212; Zimmermann, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 957, 966–967.

opinions summarized above (mn 7). In addition, it was considered whether subordinates receiving an order which was not manifestly but ‘just simply unlawful’, should not be relieved of criminal responsibility, ‘if it transpires that their commander was acting illegally in giving the order, and if they should have made further inquiries before obeying the order’. The question of which facts and rules should be decisive for a judgment on the lawful- or unlawfulness of an order was also debated²⁵. Right from the beginning there was a broad agreement that superior orders should not relieve from criminal responsibility in cases of genocide and crimes against humanity. But it was also considered that this defence should be applicable to only a few crimes outside these two groups²⁶.

The decisive break-through came in the second session with a proposal not accepting superior orders as a full defence but leaving it to the discretion of the Court to consider them as a mitigating circumstance if ‘justice so requires’. The second proposal was to exclude it (only) for genocide, crimes against humanity and aggression but nevertheless accept it as a mitigating circumstance. In cases of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and serious violations of the laws and customs of war the subordinate should be relieved of criminal responsibility unless the order was manifestly unlawful or in conflict with the rules of international law or international treaties. It was also suggested that ‘persons who have carried out acts ordered by the Security Council or who have acted on its behalf and in accordance with a mandate issued by it’ shall not be criminally responsible²⁷. This second proposal appeared for the first time under the new heading: ‘Prescription by law, and orders of the legitimate authority’. It was meant to clarify that carrying out ‘an act prescribed or authorized by legislation or regulations or an act ordered by the legitimate authority’ shall not exempt as such from criminal responsibility²⁸.

In the 5th session of the Preparatory Committee it was proposed that superior orders ‘shall 9 relieve the person of criminal responsibility, unless the order appeared to be manifestly unlawful’. It was considered that every order ‘in conflict with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict’ amounted to an example of such illegality²⁹. In deference to this debate, article 32 of the Consolidated Draft has been phrased similarly but contains, even though in brackets, almost the final version of the Rome Statute: ‘shall not relieve the (that) person of criminal responsibility unless.’³⁰ This variety of opinions and proposals mirrors the whole scale of what has been discussed in and outside the UN since Nuremberg. It therefore is not surprising that the final version of article 33 is a compromise solution which tries to strike a balance between the different approaches³¹:

II. Conceptual framework and article 32

Regulations on responsibility of subordinates appeared necessary or at least advisable after 10 the Act of State doctrine had lost its validity and individual responsibility for crimes under international law became more and more accepted after the turn of the century and especially after the First World War. The aim of the drafting process was to clarify that subordinates could no longer hide behind the responsibility of their superiors or their States. To achieve the broadest possible deterrent effect, all three groups, State organs or officials, commanders and subordinates, should be equally responsible³². Accordingly, article 25 provides a com-

²⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, article Q, Proposal 1, 102.

²⁶ Ibid., article Q, Proposal 2, 102.

²⁷ Ibid., article Q, Proposal 1 and 2, 102.

²⁸ Ibid., article Q, Proposal 2, 102.

²⁹ See Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, Annex II, article M with fn. 20.

³⁰ See Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft.

³¹ See also Dufour (2000) 82 IREVRC 969, 986–987; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380.

³² 1991 ILC Draft Code, commentary on article 11, pp. 256 et seq. And 1996 ILC Draft Code, commentary on article 5.

prehensive list of principles relevant to ‘Individual criminal responsibility’³³. Since article 25 para. 3, listing different kinds of participation in the commission of a crime, does not expressly mention commission by a subordinate, even though this might fall under another subdivision as voluntary or involuntary participation, it appeared necessary to regulate such a situation separately, because there was agreement that being a subordinate should not by itself relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may, under certain conditions, absolve from or mitigate punishment.

- 11 This is the background in relation to which article 33 has to be seen and was included into the group of ‘defences’ mentioned in Part 3 on ‘General Principles of Criminal Law’. None of them is classified as justification or excuse. Rather they are described in a neutral language as ‘grounds for excluding criminal responsibility’ (article 31) or a fact which relieves a person of criminal responsibility (article 33). Article 32, which links the exonerating effect of mistakes of fact or law to the negation of the required mental element, is the exception³⁴.

The differentiation between justification and excuses may be of little practical relevance with regard to the responsibility of the direct perpetrator because both would result in an acquittal³⁵. It is nevertheless useful as it reflects the different moral rationales of grounds excluding criminal responsibility: A justification bars a person from criminal responsibility for an act which fulfils the elements of the offence definition but is regarded as lawful because the actor acted on the basis of a permissive norm which negates the effect of the actus reus. Excuses, to the contrary, do not render the act lawful. Rather, the individual wrongdoer is not blamed for having carried it out since he or she was unable to recognize the unlawfulness of his or her conduct or could not be expected to act lawfully.³⁶ The formulation ‘shall not relieve [...] of criminal responsibility’ in article 33 para. 1 is neutral and does not go in one or the other direction³⁷. But it is worthwhile drawing attention to article 2 para. 3 of the Torture Convention 1984, which provides that superior orders ‘may not be invoked as a justification for torture’³⁸.

- 12 In jurisprudence the opinion prevails that orders to commit any of the crimes punishable under international law are illegal (unlawful) and (therefore) cannot justify a corresponding behaviour by the subordinate. They may excuse him or her, where ‘a moral choice was not possible’ or where he or she was mistaken about the legality of the demanded behaviour³⁹. That these possibilities come close to the regulation in article 33 appears from its paragraph 1 and the conditions mentioned in subparagraphs (a)–(c). The reason behind this is that orders may cause a conflict of duties, on the one hand not to commit any crime and on the other to obey the order, given within the usual framework. This psychological pressure may be equally strong, whether the order is lawful or the person merely assumes that it is lawful⁴⁰. In conclusion it should be kept in mind that whatever conceptual framework is selected in the future, orders to commit a crime can never justify the crime committed in executing the order.⁴¹ However, the

³³ Heading of article 25; see for details in this commentary Ambos, article 25 mn 5 et seq.

³⁴ For more details see in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin, article 32 mn 14 et seq.

³⁵ On the importance of this distinction for secondary participants and the right to self-defence, however, see Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 306.

³⁶ Ambos and Bock, in: Reed and Bohlander (eds.), General Defences (2014) 227; in more detail and with further references Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 304–307.

³⁷ See also in this commentary Eser, article 31 mn 17.

³⁸ See the commentary of the United Kingdom on the draft, reprinted by Green in: Bassiouni (ed.), Commentaries on the ILC’s 1991 Draft Code (1993) 191, 194.

³⁹ See, for instance, UNWCC (ed.), History of the UNWCC (1948) 274, especially on the jurisprudence in War Crimes Trials after the First and Second World War at 286 et seq.; see also Nill-Theobald, ‘Defences’ (1998) 80 et seq.

⁴⁰ See on the soldier’s dilemma already mn 1; see also in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin, article 32 mn 14 et seq.; Triffterer, Österreichisches Strafrecht (1994) chapter 12 mn 165 et seq. On mistakes concerning the subordinates ‘legal duty to obey’ see mn 26.

⁴¹ See also van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 304; Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Handbook on ICL (2011) 299, 323; id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 385. In France, however, obedience to superior orders is qualified as a justification, see Elliot, in: Heller and Dubber (eds.), Handbook (2011) 209, 227.

possibility remains of using this defence not by itself, but when the conditions come close to other defences like duress or coercion, as an excuse (also mn 14). In addition, even if the subordinate is not relieved of criminal responsibility, the fact that he or she committed a crime pursuant to an order may lead to a mitigation of punishment⁴². This possibility is not mentioned in article 33; but article 78 para. 1 obliges the Chambers to ‘take into account such factors as the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person’. This general provision is specified further by rule 145 according to which circumstances falling short of constituting grounds for exclusion of criminal responsibility may constitute a mitigating circumstance (see also infra mn 24).

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. The Heading: ‘Superior orders and prescription of law’

Headings of legal regulations are in many cases not the expression of a majority opinion of the legislator because they are not directly voted upon. Their wording, therefore, is often not a binding part of the respective articles. However, they may nonetheless have to be taken into consideration when interpreting elements of the respective articles⁴³. This is true with regard to article 33 as well.

When such a comprehensive heading was proposed in the Preparatory Committee, it was expressly stated that, besides orders, prescriptions and authorizations ‘by legislation and regulation’ shall not as such exempt from criminal responsibility⁴⁴. This underlines that regardless of the type of the order, the rank of the superior or the kind of prescription of law that lead to the commission of one of the most serious crimes of concern to the community of nations, they all ‘shall not relieve’ the subordinate ‘from criminal responsibility unless’ the conditions listed in para. 1 (a) to (c) are fulfilled. That reference to national prescriptions cannot relieve the subordinate follows also from article 21 on the applicable law, according to which ‘this Statute’ has priority, especially since national law can be applied only as far as it is ‘not inconsistent with this Statute’ (para. 1 [c]).⁴⁵

The heading further expresses that superior orders have to be seen in the light of ‘prescription of law’ and not independent from their lawfulness, thus referring to the fact, that illegal (unlawful) orders, as for instance an order to commit a crime, can generally have no legally binding effect. The second part of the heading is mirrored in paragraph 1 (a) by the words ‘under a legal obligation to obey orders’. This formula presupposes (only) a general legal obligation to obey orders given by the Government or the ‘superior in question’ according to the national law concerned or by a de facto commander under the laws and customs of war (in more detail mn 17, 19 and 26).

II. Paragraph 1

1. General rule: ‘shall not relieve’

The first half of paragraph 1 states very clearly, that – in principle – superior orders ‘shall not relieve [...] of criminal responsibility’. For psychological reasons and questions of proof this method of first establishing the principle of absolute liability of the subordinate and ⁴² Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev 111, 141; Knoops, Defenses (2008), 130; Safferling Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5 mn 59; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 385; Werle and Jeßberger, Principles (2014) mn 671.

⁴³ See, for instance, the headline of § 110 Austrian Penal Code concerning ‘Eigenmächtige Heilbehandlung’ and thereto Schmoller, in: Triffterer, Rosbaud and Hinterhofer (eds.), Salzburger Kommentar (1998) mn 22 et seq.

⁴⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, article Q, Proposal 2, 102.

⁴⁵ Also Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380.

then restricting it under exceptional circumstances was selected in preference to the possibility to recognize superior orders as a defence (in principle) and then nominating the exceptions, according to which this defence would not be applicable. Obedience to superior orders thus does not amount to a defence per se but is a factual element which may be taken into consideration in conjunction with other circumstances of the case.⁴⁶ In particular, the ‘soldier’s dilemma’ may constitute a mitigating circumstance (supra mn 11) and should be considered within the framework of the defences of duress and mistake⁴⁷.

Paragraph 1 as a whole does not express an opinion with regard to all conceivable orders in general. Rather, it narrows the scope of relevant orders by describing enumeratively the types of crimes they have to address and, in addition and alternatively, the institution or superior issuing the order thus limiting the applicability of article 33 in two respects. Its scope is even further restricted by paragraph 2 (see infra mn 30).

- 15 a) ‘crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’. First of all, the wording clarifies that article 33 is applicable only when a crime has been committed which falls ‘within the jurisdiction of the Court’, i. e., genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression (article 5). The Court’s jurisdiction over these crimes began with the entry into force of the Statute on the 1st July 2002 (article 126), but includes only those crimes committed thereafter. With regard to aggression, however, the ICC may exercise its jurisdiction at earliest after 1 January 2017 (article 15*ter*).

Thus, article 33 does not regulate the question of whether crimes under international law in general (which includes also less serious crimes than those mentioned in article 5) ought to be treated in the same way. It also expresses no opinion on how to deal with the question of superior orders in national law. But if States exercise their jurisdiction over crimes contained in article 5 they genuinely proceed only if they give respect to article 33⁴⁸. In other words, States that in general accept superior orders as a full defence without differentiation are unable genuinely to carry out the investigations or prosecutions in terms of article 17 para. 1 (a) or (b) and trigger the complementary jurisdiction of the Court. Therefore, even though the Statute cannot prescribe which laws national criminal jurisdictions have to apply with regard to those crimes mentioned in article 5 it nevertheless has an influence on the domestic level.

- 16 b) Committing ‘pursuant to an order’. The perpetrator must have committed the crime charged ‘pursuant to an order’ issued by a competent authority, i. e., a Government or a superior, in a military or civilian context.
- 17 aa) Definition of order. Orders in the sense of article 33 are all oral or written or otherwise expressed demands, addressing a certain person or groups of persons individually or by describing their functions, for instance as local military commanders, to behave in a specific way, whether by acting or omitting⁴⁹. It is advisable to keep this definition broad in the sense that any sort of explicit or implied communication between a superior and a subordinated person whatsoever is sufficient.⁵⁰ This includes orders given by conclusive

⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judgement, Joint Separate opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, Appeals Chamber, 7 October 1997, para. 34.

⁴⁷ Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Handbook on ICL (2011) 299, 324; id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 386; also Kittichaisaree, ICL (2002) 268; Knoops, Defenses (2008) 130; Schabas, ICC: Commentary (2010) 511; Meyer (2012) 159 GA 557, 566; Cassese and Gaeta, Cassese’s ICL (2013) 237–240; Cryer, in: id. et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 398, 415. The close connection between superior orders and duress/mistake is also reflected in the Nuremberg jurisprudence, see fn. 5 and in the case law of the ICTY, Prosecutor v. Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, 7 October 1997, para. 34; also Prosecutor v. Češić, IT-95-10/1-S, Sentencing Judgment, Trial Chamber, 11 March 2004, para. 97; Prosecutor v. Mrda, IT-02-59-S, Sentencing Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 March 2004, para. 65.

⁴⁸ See also in this commentary Triffterer and Burchard, article 25 mn 5.

⁴⁹ Conc. Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380; see also the similar definitions by Zimmermann, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 957, 969; Korte, Handeln auf Befehl (2003) 126.

⁵⁰ Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380, see also Korte, Handeln auf Befehl (2003) 126; van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 293.

behaviour, for which the objective expression ('objektiver Erklärungswert') in the given situation is decisive. An order presupposes further that the superior has – at least in principle – a right to demand obedience by the subordinate because their different positions are in one way or another linked. Such a broad starting point does not undermine the ratio of article 33, because paragraph 1 contains sufficient additional criteria for excluding, for instance, 'orders' from parents to their children.

Orders may address persons generally, for instance, by prohibiting or ordering a certain behaviour requiring everybody to fulfil certain criteria or by demanding or forbidding a specific behaviour in individual cases such as protecting or attacking a certain person or property.

bb) 'of a Government or of a superior'. Article 33 applies only to orders of a Government 18 or a superior.

Orders of a Government can be issued by all its branches or persons belonging to the Government and in charge of specific functions which permit them to act on behalf or in the name of a Government or one of its branches. Such Government orders can be given with regard to all persons under the power of the respective Government. It is generally accepted that orders of Governments may address all citizens of the respective State and even those of third States who live in a certain territory or are tied by another obligation to this Government. For instance, a legal order to appear and to give evidence before a court is an order of the judicial branch of the Government and not of a superior.

Orders of a Government do not have to address persons individually but may do so. An order of a Government to all civilian and military forces to cleanse a certain territory of a specific ethnic group is an order to every person belonging to one of the mentioned units and thus falls under the scope of article 33. On the other hand, orders may also be especially addressed to individual subordinates in the hierarchy of a Government or generally to all persons in charge of specific functions like commanders of certain military units who have to forward the order to their subordinates. Such a commander may either just pass an order to the next lower level, i. e., to another commander subordinated to him, or address all his subordinates directly.

It appears convincing that orders of a Government must be at least issued by the 19 competent organ (person) and must be formally legitimate. If these (formal) requirements are not fulfilled, the order cannot create a legal obligation to obey. Nevertheless, the subordinate may not be capable of judging this question. Again, a broad interpretation of 'Government orders' does not jeopardize the international criminal justice system, because, in principle, they – like any other orders – do not relieve the subordinate of criminal responsibility.⁵¹ Government therefore means a legally established or de facto accepted Government of a State which has issued an order at least formally in accordance with its respective rules of action⁵².

The wording 'order of a Government or of a superior' is not an alternative in the sense 20 that either a Government or a superior from outside the Government must have given the order. Rather the term superior clarifies, that article 33 is applicable also if an order is not issued personally by the minister of defence, for example, but by a local military commander. Orders issued by individual persons and not signed in the name or on behalf of the Government may nonetheless be orders of a superior. In any case, superiority presupposes that the person concerned is subordinated to the commanders in such a way that he or she is duty bound to fulfil their instructions.

The differentiation between the two concepts, Government and (other) superiors, does not 21 seem to be of any practical importance as long as it is guaranteed that all relevant cases can be subsumed under either of them. In order to give broad effect to article 33's general rejection of the superior order defence it seems advisable to include in principle all superior-subordinate relationships. In particular, article 33 is applicable to legal obligations arising out of a mandate of the Security Council or in the framework of the NATO and may even encompass subordinations within the hierarchy of civil enterprises which can establish a 'legal obligation to obey orders' by valid contracts (see, however, also mn 22). Superior-subordinate relationships within a criminal organisation acting outside the law, to the contrary, are not covered by article 33⁵³. Insofar already the heading 'superior orders and prescription of law' acts as a filter.

⁵¹ See also Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381: '[T]he broader the term 'government' is interpreted, the wider the application of article 33's general rejection of the superior order defence becomes.'

⁵² Conc. Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380; see also in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin, article 32 mn 18; against the inclusion of de facto Governments, however, Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 890; also Zimmermann, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 957, 968.

- 22 cc) 'military or civilian'. Article 33 equally applies to military and civilian orders, which corresponds to the extension of the concept of command responsibility to civilian superiors⁵⁴. It does not matter, if the specification 'whether military or civilian' is connected to orders of a superior only or equally to orders of a Government. For the latter opinion it has to be mentioned that Governments are in practice divided into military and civilian administrations⁵⁵, as was, for example, the machinery of Nazi Germany in order to administer the large scale commission of crimes against humanity. In sum, the two adjectives 'military or civilian' refer to all branches of Governments and relevant fields in which superiors are acting.

The (possible) extension of article 33 to civilian orders and in particular to instructions of private enterprises given to their employees (see also mn 21), however, is not uncontested. The problem with this broad approach is that 'the superior order defence operates under the presumption of military conditions',⁵⁶ that is, a strict system of discipline demanding absolute obedience safeguarded by harsh (military or criminal) sanctions. In a civilian context, the subordinate acts under less pressing conditions.⁵⁷ However, one must take into account that the applicability of article 33 depends on the existence of an order of a superior in the sense dealt with above (mn 17). Therefore it is necessary that the superiors have effective control over the persons committing the crime. This condition is fulfilled only if civilian superiors exercise a degree of control over their subordinates which is similar to that of military commanders⁵⁸. In such cases, it should make no difference if one of the industrial organizations of the Second World War has given instructions for an inhuman or degrading treatment through its organs and thus to commit crimes against humanity within their hierarchy of subordination or if such orders were given within the different branches of the Government directly. As has been pointed out in the drafting history with reference to the approach of the IMT '[t]he true test [...] is not the existence of the order, but whether moral choice was in fact possible'⁵⁹. Translated into the language of article 33 this means that the true test for the liability of the subordinate is whether or not the exceptional conditions listed in paragraph 1 (a) – (c) are fulfilled.

This understanding of article 33 is confirmed by the fact that its scope has been changed during the drafting process. The Updated Siracusa Draft proposed to limit the provision to ⁵³ For the same result Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381 according to whom, however, article 33 may be applied to hierarchical relationships within non-states actors in terms of article 1 para.1 Add. Prot.; crit. Zimmermann, in: Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (eds.), Rome Statute of the ICC (2002) 957, 969; Cryer, in: id. et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 398, 413.

⁵⁴ Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 889; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381.

⁵⁵ van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 294.

⁵⁶ Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 891.

⁵⁷ Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 891; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 382.

⁵⁸ In the same vein Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 889; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381; also Korte, Handeln auf Befehl (2003) 131; Heller, in: Heller and Dubber (eds.), Handbook (2011) 593, 614. This corresponds to the approach adopted by the ICTY with regard to the extension of the concept of superior responsibility to civilian commanders, see, e.g. Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 378.

⁵⁹ See Report of the ILC on the Work of its Thirty-Eighth Session, 5 May–11 July 1986, UN Doc. A/41/10 (1986), para. 165, p. 52.

orders of ‘military or political’ superiors, while the Preparatory Committee suggested referring in the heading to ‘orders of the legitimate authority’ (emphasis added)⁶⁰. Ever since the present wording ‘whether military or civilian’ was proposed and put into brackets in the fifth session of the Preparatory Committee, it has been continuously maintained in all following drafts without any explanation. From the whole context, however, it appears that these words serve the purpose of not limiting the applicability of paragraph 33 to military orders. Rather all possibilities to refer to a subordination in order to avoid criminal responsibility for an act ordered by a superior should be included⁶¹.

dd) Connection between order and conduct. The crime on which the Court shall exercise its jurisdiction has to be ‘committed [...] pursuant to an order’. This implies that the subordinate must have intended to act or omit to act out of concern to obey and hence to execute the order. If he or she commits the crime independently from the order, article 33 is not applicable.⁶² However, obedience to the order does not need to be the only motive of the subordinate. It is sufficient, if the crime was initiated or inspired by the order, even though the subordinate may have expected or even desired that the order provides him or her with a (better or additional) basis or perhaps even a justification (or an excuse) for what he or she was already motivated to do (anticipated obedience).

The causal connection between the order and the crime of the subordinate has to be evaluated on an ex post basis, because – according to the rules of natural sciences – there is no connection between a human behaviour and the ‘result’ it may cause in the mind of another person that makes such a result predictable in a generalized way aside from the specific situation⁶³.

c) Legal consequences. The Chapeau of paragraph 1 is not to be misunderstood. It prescribes that orders ‘shall not relieve that person of criminal responsibility’. Thus, the general rule is that obedience to superior orders is no defence and that the subordinate has to be punished for the (international) crimes he or she has committed in execution of an order (for exceptions see mn 25 et seq.)⁶⁴. As was already pointed out (see mn 12), the ‘soldier’s dilemma’, however, may be taken into account in sentencing. Its mitigating effect depends on the individual circumstances of the case. The Bralo Trial Chamber of the ICTY, for example, has emphasized that the accused ‘has taken full personal responsibility for those crimes and has acknowledged that he knew them to be wrong’. While ‘Bralo may have been pressured to participate in combat activities, he remained legally and morally obliged to conduct himself in accordance’ with the relevant norms of international humanitarian law. As the Chamber was convinced that Bralo ‘did indeed have a choice with regard to his continued participation in the combat activities’ it refused to accept compliance with superior orders as a mitigating factor.⁶⁵ This finding was upheld by the Appeals Chamber⁶⁶.

2. Exemption

There exists only one exemption from the liability principle. Its applicability depends on the satisfaction of the three cumulative conditions listed in para. 1 (a) – (c). The first one is phrased in a positive way; the second and the third ones in a negative way (‘did not know’; ‘not manifestly unlawful’). In the previous edition, it was argued that the wording of article 33

⁶⁰ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, 102.

⁶¹ Bassiouni, ICL: Draft International Criminal Code (1980) 152 et seq.

⁶² van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 294; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 380.

⁶³ Triffterer, Österreichisches Strafrecht (1994) chapter 16 mn 70 et seq. with further references.

⁶⁴ Also Mezzetti, in: Lattanzi (ed.), ICC: Comments on the Draft Statute (1998) 147, 155; Dinstein, in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 369, 381; Werle and Jeßberger, Principles (2014) mn 669.

⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Bralo, IT-95-17-S, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 7 December 2005, paras. 54–55; in a similar vein Prosecutor v. Mrda, IT-02-59-S, 31 March 2004, para. 67.

⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Bralo, IT-95-17-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 2. April 2007, paras. 23–25.

indicates that the defence has to prove the existence of the first requirement while the second and third are already fulfilled if it cannot be proven (according to the evidence available) that the subordinate knew that the order was unlawful, respectively that the order was manifestly unlawful. According to this reading, article 33 para. 1 (b) and (c) contain a reversal of the burden of proof in favour of the subordinated person⁶⁷. Article 67 para. 1 (i) of the Statute, however, prohibits any reversal of the burden of proof or onus of rebuttal to the detriment of the accused. If one applies this rule not only to the elements of the offence, but also to defences, the Prosecution is generally obliged to disprove the existence of a defence beyond reasonable doubts (article 66 para. 3). According to this approach, the accused carries (regardless of the wording of the defence) only an initial evidentiary burden with regard to the facts supporting the alleged defence.⁶⁸

- 26 a) Conditions. aa) ‘legal obligation to obey’. The ‘legal obligation to obey orders of the government or the superior in question’ must have existed at the time when the subordinated person decided to commit the crime. This formula refers to binding orders in general and not to the question of whether there was a legal obligation to obey the specific order to commit a crime. The reason for this interpretation is that only in longer lasting or permanent hierarchical relationships a sort of dependence or pressure may develop to make ‘blind obedience’ understandable and, perhaps, excusable. Moreover, orders to commit international crimes are always unlawful (mn 27) and subordinates are not legally obliged to obey them⁶⁹.

To establish this condition as an objective element to exclude criminal responsibility does no harm to the subordinated persons. If they wrongfully believe to be ‘under a legal obligation to obey orders’, which in fact they are not, they may claim a mistake in terms of 32⁷⁰. But since in principle, superior orders ‘shall not relieve [...] of criminal responsibility’, there is not much room for article 32. The main exception may be an assumed ‘legal obligation to obey’ by a false awareness of the factual situation⁷¹.

- 27 bb) ‘did not know that the order was unlawful’. Article 33 para. 1 (b) implies that orders to commit ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ are always unlawful. To be relieved of criminal responsibility the subordinate person must ‘not know that the order was unlawful’. It is obvious, that the illegality must result from the content of the order, namely to commit ‘a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’. All other reasons for an order to be unlawful are not decisive in this context.

This condition is fulfilled if it cannot be proven that the subordinate had positive knowledge of the unlawfulness of the order. In cases of doubt he or she has to be treated as if he or she was mistaken (see also mn 25). Article 33 para. 2 (b) thus contains an exception to the strict ignorantia iuris rule⁷². It accepts an error regardless of how it was caused and whether or not it was avoidable, i. e., the superior order defence is available even in cases in which the subordinate has neglected important evidence from which he ⁶⁷ See the previous edition of this commentary, Triffterer, article 33 mn 25; also Dufour (2000) 82 IRevRC 969, 989.

⁶⁸ In more detail and with further references Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 312–313; see also Garraway (1999) 81 IRevRC 785, 791.

⁶⁹ Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381; see also Meyer (2012) 159 GA 557, 569.

⁷⁰ See also Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381 and in this commentary Triffterer and Burchard article 32 mn 41. More reluctant Cryer, in: id. et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 398, 413, who argues that a mistake about the ‘legal obligation to obey’ can never negate mens rea as required by article 33; see, however, on the analogous application of article 33 to (indirect) mistakes about the existence of the factual requirements of a defence Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 374–375 with further references.

⁷¹ In more detail in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin article 32 mn 41.

⁷² In more detail on the relationship between article 33 and 32 see Liang (2010) 2 GoJIL 872, 882–883; Heugas-Darraspen, in: Fernandez and Pacreau, Statut de Rome (2012) 945, 951–952; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 381; Cryer, in: id. et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014), 398, 415; see also Safferling Internationales Strafrecht (2011) § 5 mn 59; crit. Dinstein, in: McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000) 369, 379, who deems article 33 to be redundant. In more detail on the differences between Dinstein’s conception of the superior order defence and the approach of the Rome Statute Cryer (2011) 9 JICJ 959, 970–971.

could have concluded ‘that the order was unlawful’. The regulation is therefore very favourable to subordinated persons⁷³.

cc) ‘not manifestly unlawful’. A sort of compensation for the strict acceptance of (even avoidable) errors of the subordinates is contained in condition (c): even if condition (a) is fulfilled and the subordinate did not know that the order was unlawful according to (b), he or she is not relieved of criminal responsibility, if the order is manifestly unlawful. This again is an objective element. As already stated above (mn 25) it has to be proven positively that ‘the order was manifestly unlawful’. As long as there remains doubt about this question, the order was, in favour of the subordinate, not manifestly unlawful. 28

The manifestly unlawful criterion establishes a high threshold. In a famous dictum, the Israeli District Court held that ‘the distinguishing mark of a “manifestly unlawful order” should fly like a black flag above the order given, as a warning saying “Prohibited”’⁷⁴. In other words, the unlawfulness of the order must be ‘obvious, self-evident (even to a lay-person) and incontestable’⁷⁵. If the subordinate nevertheless erroneously assumes that the order was ‘not manifestly unlawful’, it has to be differentiated as follows: If he or she is not aware of the ‘real’ facts, underlying and shaping the order, he or she acts under an error of facts and article 32 para. 1 is applicable. If he or she, however, is aware of all facts and only makes a wrong legal assessment, he or she is under an error of law, which does not exclude his or her criminal responsibility⁷⁶.

b) Legal consequences. If the subordinate ‘was under a legal obligation to obey orders’ and ‘did not know that the order was unlawful’ and ‘the order was not manifestly unlawful’, he or she is relieved ‘of criminal responsibility’. To be more precise, the subordinate is excused (see mn 11) because he or she was in situation of pressure (para. 1 [a]) in which he or she did not realize that he or she was not legally obliged to obey (para. 1 [b] complemented by the objective manifest unlawful test of para. 1 [c]). Thus, if all exceptional conditions listed in article 33 para. 1 are fulfilled, the subordinate cannot be blamed for having carried out the unlawful orders of the superior. 29

III. Paragraph 2: ‘manifestly unlawful’

1. Presumptio iuris et de iure

Paragraph 2 limits the scope of the superior order defence by the presumption that the unlawfulness of the order in terms of para. 1 (c) is self-evident when crimes of genocide and crimes against humanity are committed in its pursuance. According to the drafters of the Rome Statute such an order would be so obviously ‘manifestly unlawful’ that this fact does not need any proof. The presumption of para. 2 is unrebuttable⁷⁷, which means that article 33 only applies to war crimes and the crime of aggression⁷⁸. 30

⁷³ See also in this commentary Triffterer and Burchard, article 32 mn 41.

⁷⁴ A-G of Israel v. Eichmann, District Court Judgement, 12 December 1961, 36 (1968) ILR 18, 256 para. 218.

⁷⁵ Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 384; also Korte, Handeln auf Befehl (2003) 135; Schabas, ICC: Commentary (2010) 511–512.

⁷⁶ See also Schabas (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 400, 427; id., Introduction to the ICC (2011) 243; in more detail in this commentary Triffterer and Ohlin article 32 mn 41.

⁷⁷ For a different view see Bantekas, in: McGoldrick, Rowe and Donnelly (eds.), Permanent ICC (2004) 263, 273, who argues that the presumption of article 33 para. 2 must be rebuttable, because ‘the commission of genocide and crimes against humanity involve large scale action, often requiring minor operations in which the offender cannot always be expected to be aware of the eventual aim’; in the same vein Bantekas and Nash, ICL (2007) 61; against this view Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 384.

⁷⁸ Scaliotti (2001) 1 ICLRev 111, 140; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 383; also Werle and Jeßberger, Principles (2014) mn 670.

2. Additional cases?

- 31 The wording of para. 2 is clear: Only genocide and crimes against humanity as defined in articles 6 and 7 fall under the presumptio iuris et de iure. Orders to commit war crimes and the crime of aggression, to the contrary, are not per se manifestly unlawful, but must be evaluated on a case-by-case basis; for all of them the exemption of paragraph 1 is applicable⁷⁹. This differentiation is surprising⁸⁰. Genocide and crimes against humanity on the one hand and war crimes and the crime of aggression on the other do not differ too much in respect of the gravity of the harm they cause. If, nevertheless, none of the most serious war crimes and crimes against peace are excluded from the applicability of article 33 para. 1, the reason appears to be obvious: genocide and crimes against humanity can be committed by everybody, while war crimes and crimes against peace are typically committed by military or paramilitary personnel in whatever armed conflicts they may be involved. To protect them seems to be the reason for paragraph 2's differentiated approach. However, one may argue that most of the war crimes listed in article 8 are so serious that the 'manifestly illegal' criterion of para. 1 (c) will in the majority of cases exclude the superior order defence.⁸¹

C. Special remarks: Superior orders and command responsibility, article 28

- 32 Superiors ordering the commission of 'a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' are individually responsible pursuant to article 25 para. 3 (b). This provision is complemented by article 28 on command responsibility according to which the superior is liable for omission where he or she fails to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent criminal acts of his or her subordinates or to punish them.⁸² The foundation for this extension of responsibility is that the superior triggered criminal behaviour by not controlling properly those persons under his or her hierarchical power which includes the legal obligation to instruct them how to behave and to obey the relevant laws and customs of war. Articles 28 and 33 therefore represent two sides of the same coin,⁸³ even though they do not fit too well together: article 33 regulates the criminal responsibility of subordinates when committing crimes in pursuance of an order of their superiors or government; the responsibility of the person who had given the order is covered by article 25. Article 28 regulates the responsibility of superiors who did not order the commission of a crime and did not in any way participate in a specific criminal behaviour of their subordinates. They merely had 'effective command and control' over persons, but did not use this power and thereby did not only neglect but violated their duty to supervise their subordinates properly⁸⁴.

⁷⁹ For a different view see Gaeta (1999) 10 EJIL 172, 190–191 according to whom orders to commit war crimes are always manifestly illegal. This view, however, ignores the clear decision of the State parties against the absolute liability principle, Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 384.

⁸⁰ Very crit. Gaeta (1999) 10 EJIL 172, 190 who argues that article 33 para. 2 'departs from customary international law without any well-grounded motivation'; in the same vein Fournet, in: Darcy and Powderly (eds.), Judicial Creativity (2010) 229, 236–237; Cassese and Gaeta, Cassese's ICL (2013) 231; cri. also Cryer, in: id. et al. (eds.), Introduction (2014) 398, 415.

⁸¹ Garraway (1999) 81 IREvRC 785, 791; Ambos, in: Brown (ed.), Handbook on ICL (2011) 299, 323; id., Treatise on ICL I (2013) 383; in a similar vein Grayson (1995) 64 NordJIL 243, 252; Gless, Internationales Strafrecht (2011) mn 726; Heugas-Darraspen, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome (2012) 945, 953; Cassese and Gaeta, Cassese's ICL (2013) 231.

⁸² In more detail in this volume Ambos, article 25 mn 18.

⁸³ Crit. van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (2012) 294.

⁸⁴ See in the first edition of this commentary Fenrick, article 28 mn 7 and 18 et seq. See also for more details in this commentary, Triffterer and Arnold, article 28.

PART 4 COMPOSITION AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE COURT

Article 34 Organs of the Court

The Court shall be composed of the following organs:

- (a) The Presidency;
- (b) An Appeals Division, a Trial Division and a Pre-Trial Division;
- (c) The Office of the Prosecutor;
- (d) The Registry.

Literature: Blakesley, C.L., 'Comparing the Ad Hoc Tribunal for Crimes against Humanitarian Law in the Former Yugoslavia & the Project for an International Criminal Court prepared by the International Law Commission', (1996) 67 RIDP 139; Burns, P., 'An International Criminal Tribunal: The Difficult Union of Principle and Politics', (1994) 5 CLF 2-3; 1996 YbICTY (1997); de Zayas, A., 'The Kalshoven Commission', (1993) 6 LeidenJIL 131.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. The Organs	3
1. The Presidency.....	3
2. An Appeals Chamber, a Trial Division, a Pre-Trial Division	6
3. The Office of the Prosecutor.....	8
4. The Registry.....	9
C. Special remarks	10

A. Introduction/General remarks

In all the turmoil, debate and compromise that gave birth to the Rome Statute, the basic composition of the proposed court remained pretty constant. The International Law Commission's proposal of 1994 was altered but little¹. The two main discussions that arose in the drafting of this article were primarily matters of nomenclature². The components of the Permanent Court were dictated by functional necessity³ and the basic requirements of justice. Any court system which seeks to investigate, prosecute, administer and determine the guilt or innocence of any person must be capable of giving effect to the basic minimum guarantees that are by now well established in international criminal law⁴. The pragmatics of such an undertaking require that there be an independent judiciary, an independent Prosecutor and a Registry to service both of them as well as to administer the court docket, deal with the press and any court appointed defence counsel.

¹ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 5.

² For example see: the US proposal that 'Presidency' be replaced by the term 'Administrative Council', 'President' with 'Chief Judge' and 'Vice President' with 'Deputy Chief Judge'; the UK's proposal that 'Procuracy' be replaced with 'Prosecutors Office' and that of France, (albeit of more substance) that the reference to 'other chambers' in the ILC's Draft be replaced with 'a Remand Chamber' in the 1996 Preparatory Committee II, 'Proposals to article 5', p. 7. The nature of these differences and their trivial nature mirrored those present in the drafting of article 11 in the Statute of the ICTY. That article is the equivalent to article 34 of the Rome Statute. During the drafting of article 11 of the ICTY Statute, the French proposed a 'commission' be established to investigate complaints, (see Letter from the Permanent Representative of France to the Secretary-General, 10 Feb. 1993, UN Doc. S/25266 (1993), transmitting a report on the establishment of an International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia), the Italians suggested a 'prosecutor's office' (see Letter from the Permanent Representative of Italy to the Secretary-General, 16 Feb. 1993, UN Doc. S/25300 (1993) transmitting a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia). Previously Bassiouni had recommended a 'Procuracy' for a Permanent International Court (See Draft Statute - International Tribunal 3-32, AIDP, (2nd ed.1993) 10 NEP 35, 50-51). Commentating on these discussions, Burns (1994) 5 CLF 2-3, 357, wryly noted that, 'Nomenclature is of little significance where in each case the same broad functions are to be carried out'. The same comment is apt when considering the debates and drafting of article 34 leading up to the Rome Statute.

- 2 The organizational structure of the Court was considerably advanced by the experience of the ICTY and ICTR which had worked under a similar organizational composition⁵. Staffing, as always, will remain an essential and important aspect for the proper functioning and success of the Court.

B. The Organs

1. The Presidency⁶

- 3 The function and role of the Presidency saw quite a change in the period between the ILC's Draft Statute⁷ and the Rome Statute itself. It was initially proposed that in addition to various administrative functions, important legal responsibilities be assigned to the Presidency including supervising and authorising investigations⁸, issuing arrest warrants⁹ and determining the question of pre-trial detention or release¹⁰. The view gained support, however, that this proposed role be modified. It was suggested that the duties of the President be limited to ceremonial and administrative functions and to supervising the Registry. This was thought more appropriate a task for the Presidency than their exercising pre-trial and other procedural functions. The latter functions were thought rather more appropriate for an

³ Presenting his Draft article 11 of what was to become article 11 of the Statute for the ICTY, the Secretary-General stated that:

'The organisation of the International Tribunal should reflect the functions to be performed by it. Since [it] is established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, this presupposes an international tribunal composed of a judicial organ, a prosecutorial organ and a secretariat. It would be the function of the prosecutorial organ to investigate cases, prepare indictments and prosecute persons responsible for committing the violations referred to above. The judicial organ would hear the cases presented to its Trial Chambers, and consider appeals from the Trial Chambers in its Appeals Chamber. A secretariat or Registry would be required to service both the prosecutorial and judicial organs'.

See the Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Res. 808 (1993), UN Doc. No. S/25704 and Add.1 (1993), para. 69.

⁴ For example see ICTY Statute article 21, ICTR Statute article 20, 1966 ICCPR article 14.

⁵ See article 11 of the ICTY Statute; article 10 of the ICTR Statute.

⁶ The functions of the Presidency are detailed in article 38 of the Rome Statute. The functions of the Presidency are also fleshed out in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Regulations of the Court. For example, Rule 4 bis (2) stipulates that: 'As soon as possible following its establishment, the Presidency shall, after consultation with the judges, decide on the assignment of judges to divisions in accordance with article 39, paragraph 1.' Rule 14(1) stipulates that the Regulations of the Registry must be approved by the Presidency. Rules 21, 26 and 30 variously task the Presidency as the responsible body for determining an appeal of the Registrar's decision declining to appoint a particular counsel for a suspect or accused, receipt of complaints of misconduct against the Prosecutor, Deputy Prosecutor, the Registrar or the Deputy Registrar, and the determination of disciplinary measures for misconduct against a Judge, the Registrar or a Deputy Registrar. Rule 33 empowers the Presidency to determine a request by a Judge, the Prosecutor or a Deputy Prosecutor to excuse him or herself from acting in a particular matter. Regulation 11 of the Regulations of the Court calls for the three-member Presidency to act with unanimity when possible, and addresses circumstances as to when and how the Presidency may act when one or more of its members disqualify themselves with respect to a particular matter or are otherwise unavailable.

⁷ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, note 1, article 8.

⁸ Ibid., article 27.

⁹ Ibid., article 28.

¹⁰ Ibid., article 29.

indictment or investigations chamber¹¹. The result of this is a mainly administratively focused Presidency¹² and an increased role for what became the Pre-Trial Chamber.

The creation of the Presidency, as a separate organ from the rest of chambers was also the result of a bid to reduce costs and to give organizational form to the Court. Though such a body was not included as a separate organ in the Statutes of the ICTY or ICTR, the judges of those Tribunals in effect created one by way of the 'Bureau' established under Rule 23 of their respective Rules of Procedure and Evidence. That body comprises the President, the Vice President and the Presiding judges¹³ of the Trial Chambers. The President is obliged to consult this body on all major questions relating to the functioning of the Tribunal, and to determine any questions regarding disqualification of judges and the like¹⁴. This inner sanctum encourages consensus where possible on matters relating to the administration of the Tribunal and guards against the arbitrary use of authority. The Presidency is the administrative and functional head of the Court, but the principle of primus inter pares amongst the judges was both very much in evidence and very much intended by the delegates to the Rome Conference.

The creation of the Presidency as a distinct organ had another intended purpose. It was not anticipated that the full complement of judges permitted under the Statute would be needed from the outset. In order to save costs, it was therefore decided that the judges comprising the Presidency would take up their offices as soon as elected¹⁵ and only call upon their fellow judges to commence their terms as and when needed¹⁶. In this way, the Presidency is to be the heart of the Permanent Court's Judiciary, ensuring that the oxygen of information and the benefits of accumulated experience continue to flow to that organ even when cases are in abeyance, preparation or investigation.

2. An Appeals Chamber, a Trial Division, a Pre-Trial Division¹⁷

The size of the Chambers is set at a minimum¹⁸ and can be increased with the agreement of the Assembly of States Parties upon the recommendation of the Presidency¹⁹. This clause may well be needed if cases on the Rwanda or Yugoslav scale are to be expeditiously disposed of in future, but has not yet been engaged by the Presidency. The experience of both the ICTY and ICTR have shown that flexibility and a willingness to increase the number of judges can frequently be needed²⁰ and a provision to this effect is to be applauded.

Article 5 (b) of the ILC's 1994 Draft Statute provoked some discussion. Whereas the ILC had included an Appeals Chamber and Trial Chambers, it kept the third part of this trinity rather vague by defining it simply as 'other Chambers'. Some delegates to the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court stated that an indictment or an investigations chamber for pre-trial procedures, issuing warrants, indictments

¹¹ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, pp. 12-13.

¹² See also article 38 and regulation 11, Annex III.

¹³ In the case of the ICTR 'the more senior Presiding judge of the Trial Chambers', rule 23, ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

¹⁴ See 1996 YbICTY, Chapter 2, p. 12 and also Rule 15 (b) ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence; Rule 15(b) ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

¹⁵ See article 35 para. 2.

¹⁶ See article 35 para. 3.

¹⁷ The composition of Chambers as a whole is dealt with in article 39.

¹⁸ See article 36 para. 1 below.

¹⁹ See article 36 para. 2 (a) and (b) below.

²⁰ See Security Council Res. 1165 of 30 Apr. 1998 adding a third Trial Chamber to the ICTR (amending articles 10, 11 and 12 of ICTR Statute); Letter of the Secretary-General to the United Nations to the Security Council, 5 May 1998, (S/1998/376) advising of the need of an additional Trial Chamber for the ICTY and the subsequent Security Council Res. 1166 of 13 May 1998 adding a further Trial Chamber and amending the corresponding articles of the ICTY Statute. The intention to vigorously pursue a 'completion' strategy with greater vigour also led to the election of ad litem judges to supplement the work of the permanent judges. See, for example, rules 13ter and 13quarter of ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

and the like was needed²¹ and should be a body composed of three judges with the necessary authority to monitor preliminary investigative matters. Others preferred the flexibility of the ILC's Draft²². In finally adopting a Pre-Trial Chamber the delegates appear to have recognised, as have the judges of the ICTY, the need to streamline the functioning of Chambers to ensure that they are able to manage and conduct cases as expeditiously as possible²³. In addition, the creation of the Pre-Trial Division was a function of the decision to require judicial oversight of investigations and the need to separate this from the main trial process²⁴.

3. The Office of the Prosecutor²⁵

- 8 The term 'Procuracy' initially preferred by the ILC was rejected in favour of 'Office of the Prosecutor' on the proposal of the United Kingdom²⁶. This, and the fact that this terminology had become familiar to delegates and gained general usage in the ad hoc Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda ensured that it was adopted.

4. The Registry²⁷

- 9 The need, function and title of this organ remained unchanged and unchallenged. Its inclusion as one of the principal organs of the International Criminal Court mirrored the existence of Registries (or bodies performing the function of a Registry) in almost every State. Given some problems that initially beset the ad hoc Tribunal for Rwanda, the importance of an efficient and well-organised Registry to the successful functioning of any Permanent Court should not be underestimated. Failing this, much of the time, energy and attention of both Chambers and the Prosecutor will be wasted.

C. Special remarks

- 10 Article 34 also follows the example of the ad hoc Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in not catering for a standing office of Defence Counsel. Defence Counsel to the International Criminal Court must be (and seen to be) independent. Such independence is, of course, a pre-requisite to justice and to confidence in the International Criminal Court. It is not clear, however, why such a standing office should necessarily be incompatible with the concept of fully independent defence counsel. Independence of the Prosecutor and his or her staff is also essential, but apparently this was not called into question simply on account of ²¹ Some of the arguments reflected those previously made on the setting up of the ICTY. Various commentators had argued then for a separate Pre-Trial Chamber on the grounds of logistical necessity and administrative efficiency. See Blakesley (1996)67 RIDP para. XIV (B), p. 191.

²² 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 11, p. 11.

²³ A Pre-Trial Judge was created and functions assigned in rule 65*ter* of the ICTY's Rules of Procedure and Evidence adopted on 11 Feb. 1994, in the amendment made to them on 9 and 10 July 1998, IT/32/Rev.13. This Rule delegates to one judge (of the Trial Chamber) the responsibility of coordinating communications between the parties, setting dead-lines, and generally taking such measures as are necessary to prepare the case for a fair and expeditious trial. In a more concrete way, the Rome Statute in article 64 para. 4 allows such matters to be delegated from a Trial Chamber to the Pre-Trial Chamber.

²⁴ See article 39 para. 4 of the Rome Statute expanding upon the principle adumbrated in rule 15 (C) of the ICTY's Rules. The functions and responsibilities of the Pre-Trial Division itself are set out in articles 15, 18, 19, 34 para. 2, 54 para. 2, 57, 61, 64 and 72 of the Rome Statute.

²⁵ The authority, remit, and appointment of the Prosecutor is dealt with in article 42. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence further specify the manner in which the Office of the Prosecutor shall function. See, e.g., Rules 9 ('Operation of the Office of the Prosecutor'), 10 ('Retention of information and evidence') and 11 ('Delegation of the Prosecutor's functions').

²⁶ Supra note 2.

²⁷ The Registrar's functions and modalities of appointment are dealt with in article 43, and further addressed in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (see, e.g., Rules 12 to 22) and the Regulations of the Court (see, e.g., Regulation 77 C 'Office of Public Counsel for the Defence').

their being directly employed by the Court. Many argued for a standing office of Defence Counsel at the time the ICTY was created and the case against this proposal remains by no means conclusive²⁸. Indeed, the trend has been in favour of an autonomous, if not separate, Office of the Defence. Regulation 77 of the Regulations of the Court requires that the Registrar ‘shall establish and develop an Office of Public Counsel for the defence’ (OPCD). The mandatory terms of this Regulation and the requirement to further ‘develop’ the Office is welcome and indeed essential to the fairness of trials before the ICC, the majority of which have been and will likely continue to be legally aided²⁹.

Pursuant to Regulation 77, the OPCD was inaugurated as a functioning office in 2006 and is presently composed of a Principal Counsel as well as four additional staff members (legal assistants, a case manager and support staff). Crucially, Regulation 77 also overcomes some of the difficulties that beset the Office of the Principal Defender (OPD) in the Special Court for Sierra Leone (in that the OPD was subordinate to the Registry and this resulted in several conflicts in responsibility). There were several reported instances where the OPD was directed by the Registry to either desist from making certain submissions, contrary to the Registrar’s stated position, or ‘encouraged’ to modify submissions that were to be made³⁰. Regulation 77 para. 2 leaves no such room for uncertainty providing that ‘[t]he Office ... shall fall within the remit of the Registry, solely for administrative purposes, in accordance with article 43, paragraph 2, and it shall function in its substantive work as a wholly independent office’. Counsel and assistants within the office shall act independently’. In 2011, the judges of the Court amended Regulation 77 to expand and strengthen the mandate of the OPCD. Among other changes, the revised Regulation 77(3) requires that the Office include ‘at least one counsel ... who fulfils the requirements for inclusion on the list of counsel’. Regulation 77(4) now sets out in six sub-paragraphs the duties of the office: (a) ‘Representing and protecting the rights of the defence during the initial stages of the investigation ...’; (b) ‘Providing general support and assistance to defence counsel and to the person entitled to legal assistance, including legal research and advice [...]’; (c) ‘Appearing, on the instruction or with the leave of the Chamber, in respect of specific issues’; (d) ‘Advancing submissions, on the instruction or with leave of the Chamber, on behalf of the person entitled to legal assistance when defence counsel has not been secured ...’; (e) ‘Acting when appointed under regulation 73 [Duty Counsel] or regulation 76 [Appointment of defence counsel by a Chamber]’; and (f) ‘Assisting or representing defence ²⁸ See Report on the International Tribunal to adjudicate War Crimes Committed in the Former Yugoslavia, submitted by a special task force of the American Bar Association Section of International Law and Practice (8 July 1993), p. 19 (cited in Morris and Scharf, An Insider’s Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1995) 138 fn. 393). Also see Blakesley (1996) 67 RIDP para. XIV, p. 190. The Practice of the ad hoc Tribunals shows that these Defence Counsel are instructed as independent members of the legal profession (either admitted to practice or law professors – rule 44 ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence; rule 44 ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence).

While recognizing the critical importance of independent defence counsel, the drafters of the Rome Statute were also alive to the dangers of inequality of arms between the OTP and the Defence on account of the latter not being an organ of the Court. This was sought to be ameliorated by article 57 para. 3 (b) of the Rome Statute. See Guariglia and Hochmayr, article 57 para. 3 (b).

²⁹ However, notwithstanding rule 45 of the Special Court for Sierra Leone Rules of Procedure and Evidence (which also requires the Registrar to ‘maintain and develop’ such an office), institutional problems have remained affecting the Defence. See letter of the Principal Defender stating that the Registry had ‘whittled away’ various rights of the Defence, Prosecutor v Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Transcript, 4 June 2007, pp 3–5.

³⁰ The Appeals Chamber noted this difficulty in stating ‘the staff of the Defence Office and its head the Principal Defender, are all “support staff”, and have no independent authority to disobey or ignore a direction from the Registrar’, see Prosecutor v Brima et al., ‘Separate and concurring opinion of Justice Robertson on the decision on Brima-Kamara Defence appeal motion against Trial Chamber II majority decision on extremely urgent confidential joint motion for the re-appointment of Kevin Metzger and Wilbert Harris as lead counsel for Alex Tamba Brima and Brima Bazzy Kamara’, 14 Dec. 2005, para. 83, SCSL-040-16- AR73-16906. The learned judge went on to state ‘... in future courts the [Defence] office should be an independent ‘fourth pillar’ alongside the judiciary, the Registrar and the Prosecutor’ (para 88, Rules of Procedure and Evidence 16910).

counsel or defence witnesses who are subject to article 70 proceedings or when rule 74, sub-rule 1, applies, on the instruction of with the leave of the Chamber’.

- 12 In fulfilling its mandate, the OPCD has developed into an important institutional counterweight to the significant institutional resources of the Office of the Prosecutor (i.e. Legal Advisory Section, Appeals Section, Knowledge Base Unit, appointment of Special Advisers). In addition to providing discrete legal research assistance to defence teams upon request, the OPCD, inter alia, advises and informs defence teams on issues such as the application of the legal aid policy across different cases and proposals for amendments to Registry and Court policies that impact on the rights and functioning of the defence. The OPCD produces manuals and memos on confirmation and trial practice and specific legal issues. The OPCD also assists the defence on practical matters, such as use of the Court’s electronic evidence management system. Equally important, the OPCD acts as a crucial institutional voice for the defence on the committees and bodies of the Registry on which it has been invited to sit, and with respect to policy documents that have been circulated among the Organs of the Court or within the Registry, for comment.

However, and as noted above, the OPCD is not an organ of the Court, which was the preferred option detailed in the Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Tribunal for Lebanon.³¹ The preference of the Secretary-General was accepted and found form in articles 7 and 13 of the STL Statute³². A Defence Office being administratively and functionally independent of the Registry, has much to commend it. The institutional difference (in terms of resources, having a ‘voice’ within the Court and more balanced media reporting) that being an ‘organ’ brings cannot be underestimated by any that are conversant with the history and dynamics of the various ad hoc and hybrid Tribunals. Given the organization of the Court, as determined by article 34, much will depend upon the Registrar’s willingness to ‘further develop’ the Defence Office and to create an atmosphere whereby its staff members feel able to operate independently in the interests of justice.

At the time of writing, it seems that change is afoot that may have significant consequences to the existence of the OPCD. The current Registrar of the Court (elected by the judges in 2013) has embarked on a ‘ReVision Project’ further to a general recommendation from the Committee on Budget and Finance that the Court ‘undertake a thorough review of its organizational structure, with a view to rationalizing reporting lines, identifying responsibilities that could be delegated and streamlining functions, processes and structures’.³³ The ‘on-going ReVision project involves a thorough review of both the structure and the operations of the Registry³⁴ for purposes of proposing changes to improve the overall functioning, efficiency (including costs) and effectiveness of the Registry. With respect to the Registry’s mandate and responsibility pursuant to the Statute, Rules, and Regulations of the Court to assist and facilitate the work of the defence, the Registrar has proposed, as part of the ReVision Project, abolishing the OPCD and consolidating some of its functions under a new Defence Office that would additionally be responsible for implementing and managing the legal aid policy and providing administrative support to the defence (tasks presently handled by the Registry’s Counsel Support Section ‘CSS’). The Registrar is currently of the view that such consolidation would allow for the more efficient provision of assistance and services to the defence. The Registrar considers that the OPCD is not well-placed to represent and advocate for the defence as it is not an executive body of the legal profession or subject to democratic oversight (a task, it is said, better suited to an outside association of counsel).

Should the judges accept the Registrar’s proposal and amend or excise Regulation 77, the significance for the defence would be twofold. First, and as highlighted above and at footnote ³¹ S/2006/893, 15 Nov. 2006, para 27.

³² Statute of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, Annexed to Resolution 1757(2007), S/Res/1757 (2007), 30 May 2007.

³³ ICC-ASP/13/16, para. 1, citing to ICC-ASP/11/20, vol. II, part B.1, para. 29.

³⁴ ICC-ASP/13/16, para. 2.

30, the Defence Office would seemingly revert, more or less, to the structure of the prior defence offices of the ad hoc Tribunals. Second, the defence would, perhaps, lose the current institutional voice that OPCD provides in its attempt to pass on the views and concerns of the defence into the myriad of policy and administrative discussions, plans and decisions within the Court that impact on the rights and functioning of the defence. While an outside association of counsel may very well complement the advocacy work of the OPCD, it may not be able to wholly replace the institutional representation that OPCD provides, including at the earliest stages of policy-making or when the matters under discussion are confidential/non-public. Whatever the judges finally decide, it is important that regard be had to ensuring that the voice of the Defence is properly heard at various levels of the courts administration and operation.

Article 35 Service of judges*

1. All judges shall be elected as full-time members of the Court and shall be available to serve on that basis from the commencement of their terms of office.

2. The judges composing the Presidency shall serve on a full-time basis as soon as they are elected.

3. The Presidency may, on the basis of the workload of the Court and in consultation with its members, decide from time to time to what extent the remaining judges shall be required to serve on a full-time basis. Any such arrangement shall be without prejudice to the provisions of article 40.

4. The financial arrangements for judges not required to serve on a full-time basis shall be made in accordance with article 49.

Literature: Bellelli, R., 'The law of the Statute and its practice under review', in: R. Bellelli et al. (ed.), International Criminal Justice, Law and Practice from the Rome Statute to its Review (Ashgate 2010) 410–415; Jones, J. R. W. D., 'Composition of the Court', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J. R. W. D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, I (OUP 2002) 235–267; Rwelamira, M. R., 'Composition and Administration of the Court', in: R. S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues Negotiations, Results (Kluwer Law International 1999) 153–167; Schabas, W., 'Article 35. Service of Judges', in: W. Schabas (ed.), The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 520–523; Liera, S. F., 'Single Judge, Replacements, and Alternate Judges', in: R.S. Lee (ed.) The International Criminal Court, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 310–314.

Content

I. Introduction	1
II. Drafting history	2
III. Paragraph 1 – Full-time service of judges.....	7
IV. Paragraph 1 – Availability to serve full-time.....	9
V. Paragraph 2 – The Presidency	15
VI. Paragraph 3 – Calling judges to serve on a full-time basis	17
VII. Paragraph 4 – Financial arrangements for non-full-time judges	23

I. Introduction

1 Article 35 of the Statute, governing the service of judges, is vital to ensuring the efficient functioning of the judiciary of the Court. This provision is the result of discussions which sought to reconcile two seemingly competing notions: that 'the court, as an institution, must be permanent, but it should not operate on a full-time basis.'¹ The article brings together the two camps in a model of the Court which sees the number of full-time judges increasing as necessary on the basis of workload. Moreover, in conjunction with the articles designed to insulate judges from outside or political influence (for instance, by precluding judicial interference and providing for the financial security of judges and single non-renewable judicial terms),² article 35 of the Statute, requiring, inter alia, the full-time service of judges, is an essential guarantee for the independence of judges. Indeed, at the Rome Conference, the provision was recognised by States as having a close connection with the independence of judges (governed by article 40 of the Statute) and the financial arrangements for salaries,

* The views expressed herein are those of the author alone and not of the International Criminal Court.

¹ Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993 (A/48/10), paragraph 45.

² See articles 40, 49 and 36(9)(a) of the Statute.

allowances and expenses of judges (governed by article 49 of the Statute and resolutions of the Assembly of States Parties ('ASP')).³

II. Drafting history

It was not always foreseen that judges would serve at the Court on a full-time basis. During the drafting of the Statute, the issue was subject to substantial discussion and there were differing views as to whether the judiciary should serve full-time or part-time. This was linked to the then undecided question of whether the Court, which was to be established as a permanent institution, would sit continuously or be convened only as and when required to consider a case submitted to it, particularly in its nascent stages.⁴

Those advocating a court in continuous session were of the view that a permanent criminal court required judges to carry out their functions full-time in order to guarantee their independence.⁵ It was considered that a court in permanent session with a full complement of judges would ensure the exclusive dedication of those judges to their judicial functions, which would in turn contribute to their impartiality and objectivity.⁶ In contrast, there was concern that the part-time service of judges might be incompatible with and indeed undermine the very permanence, stability and independence required of a true international criminal court.⁷ Proponents of a permanent judiciary also maintained that a body of judges sitting full-time would develop a collective understanding of the aims and working methods of the Court,⁸ and benefit the uniformity and further development of the law.⁹

Supporters of the service of judges on a part-time basis were of the view that since the Court was being established as the first permanent court of its kind, as opposed to a situation-based or ad hoc institution, its likely utilisation was unpredictable and there was uncertainty as to when it would be seised of its first case or indeed how heavy its future caseload would be; in that respect, a court in permanent session could not be justified, particularly in the first phase of its operation.¹⁰ The full-time vision of the judiciary also held ³ United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Official Records, Volume III, A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III), Part II, F, Documents of the Committee of the Whole, Part 4. Composition and administration of the Court, Coordinator's rolling text on cluster 1 of part 4 (articles 35(b), 36, 37 and 40), page 260, footnote 80 to article 36. See note 62, for the relevant resolutions of the ASP.

⁴ See Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fourth session, 4 May – 24 July 1992 (A/47/10), paragraphs 33–34, 103 and its Annex, Report of the Working Group on the question of an international criminal jurisdiction ('Annex'), paragraphs 4(e), 19, 42, 46–47 and 51; A/48/10, see note 1, paragraphs 30 and 45 and Annex, Draft Statute for an international criminal tribunal ('1993 Draft Statute'), commentary to article 4, paragraph 6; Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994 (A/49/10), paragraphs 32 and 49 and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court ('1994 ILC Draft Statute'), commentary to articles 4 (paragraph 1) and 10. At the Rome Conference the following States expressed support for judges serving full-time from the outset: see note 3, Official Records, Volume II A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II), Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole, A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.14 paragraphs 13 (United Kingdom), 56 (Venezuela), 58 (Niger), 59 (Slovakia), 62 (Tunisia), 70 (Qatar) 75 (Czech Republic), 79 (Yemen), 83 (Greece), 88 (Afghanistan), 90 (Senegal), 94 (Israel) 98 (United Arab Emirates). See ibid, A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.15 at paragraphs 5 (Togo), 6 (Chile), 8 (Oman), 13 (Kuwait), 16 (Morocco), 17 (Portugal), 18 (Thailand) 20 (Libya), 23 (Cameroun), 26 (Iraq), 28 (Mozambique), 31 (Algeria), 32 (Uruguay) and 34 (Ghana). Whilst the following States advocated a flexible approach or the part-time service of judges: ibid, A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.14, paragraphs 19 (Madagascar), 28 (Argentina), 44 (Syria), 49 (Japan), 71 (China), 73 (Colombia) and 85 (Pakistan). See also ibid, A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.15, paragraphs 4 (Republic of Korea) and 38 (Russia).

⁵ A/47/10, see note 4, paragraph 103; 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 10, paragraph 3; see in particular the comments of the United Kingdom, Venezuela, Qatar, Yemen, Senegal, Togo, Oman, Morocco, Cameroon, Iraq and Algeria at the Rome Conference, see note 4.

⁶ A/47/10, see note 4, paragraph 34.

⁷ 1993 Draft Statute, commentary to article 4, paragraph 6; 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 4, paragraph 1.

⁸ A/47/10, Annex, see note 4, paragraph 47.

⁹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, paragraph 49.

¹⁰ A/47/10, paragraph 11 and Annex, paragraph 4(e).

clearly greater financial implications (with its impact on judicial remuneration and staffing) which were seen as contrary to the aims of cost reduction and flexibility.¹¹ The part-time service of judges at a permanent court was thus seen as a middle ground whereby the Court would have the advantage of existing as a legal entity but without the costly disadvantages of a full-time judiciary.¹²

- 5 This debate is apparent in the development of the Statute. The 1993 Draft Statute prepared by the Working Group of the International Law Commission ('ILC') provided that the Court was a permanent institution that would sit when required to consider a case submitted to it,¹³ and did not expressly foresee the service of full-time judges. Whereas arguments were put forward for the President of the Court to immediately serve on a full-time basis, it was thought that this might unnecessarily restrict the range of candidates for the post and the need for flexibility was stressed.¹⁴ However it was understood that nothing in the draft would prevent the President from becoming full-time if circumstances required it.¹⁵ The 1994 ILC Draft Statute similarly provided that, whilst the Court was a permanent institution, it would act only when required to consider a case submitted to it.¹⁶ That draft provided that judges would work at the Court on a part-time basis, at least at first, but foresaw the possibility of States Parties calling judges to full-time service on the basis of workload, upon the recommendation of the Presidency of the Court.¹⁷ It was the 1998 Draft Statute adopted by the Preparatory Committee,¹⁸ which expressly provided that the judges of the Presidency would serve on a full-time basis immediately from the commencement of their terms of office and, in square bracketed text, that depending on the workload of the Court, other judges may serve on a full-time or part-time basis as required. Paragraph 2 of article 35 of the Statute is identical to the first sentence of the corresponding provision in the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute, which in full provided:

'The judges composing the Presidency shall serve on a full-time basis as soon as they are elected. [The judges composing [the] [a] Pre-Trial Chamber shall serve on a full-time basis [once the Court is seized of a matter] [when required in the view of the President].] [On the recommendation of the Presidency, the States Parties] [The Presidency] may [by a two-thirds majority] decide that the workload of the Court requires that the judges [composing any of the other Chambers] should serve on a full-time [or part-time] basis.'¹⁹

It should be noted that in the footnotes to the provision, the view was expressed that reference in the first sentence should be made to the 'President' rather than the 'Presidency'. On the other hand, delegations agreed that the reference to 'the Court' meant the whole Court, as set out in article 35 of the Statute.

- 6 The present text of article 35 of the Statute, adopted at the Rome Conference, strikes a balance between the two approaches. It provides a flexible arrangement which sees only the three judges of the Presidency²⁰ serving at the Court, in the initial phase of its operation, on a ¹¹ A/47/10, Annex, see note 4, paragraph 47; 1993 Draft Statute, commentary to article 4, paragraph 6; 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 4, paragraph 1.

¹² A/47/10, Annex, see note 4, paragraph 42.

¹³ 1993 Draft Statute, article 4(1), providing: 'The Tribunal is a permanent institution [...] It shall sit when required to consider a case submitted to it'.

¹⁴ 1993 Draft Statute, commentary to article 10.

¹⁵ 1993 Draft Statute, commentary to articles 10 and 17.

¹⁶ Article 4(1) of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, provided: 'The Court is a permanent institution [...] It shall act when required to consider a case submitted to it'.

¹⁷ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 10(4). With particular respect to the President, it was agreed that the provision would not prevent the President from becoming full-time should circumstances so require, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 8, paragraph 2. See note 56.

¹⁸ In respect of the status of the Court, article 4(1) of the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute provided: 'The Court is a permanent institution open to States Parties in accordance with this Statute. It shall act when required to consider a case submitted to it' (see note 3, Official Records, Volume III, A/CONF.183/13(Vol. III), Part I, B, Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court ('1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute')).

¹⁹ 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute, article 36.

²⁰ See mn 15.

full-time basis immediately upon their election, whilst envisaging the future possibility of the Court remaining permanently in session through judges being called to full-time service.²¹

III. Paragraph 1 – Full-time service of judges

Paragraph 1 of article 35 of the Statute provides that the judges of the Court are elected as full-time members of the Court. However, pursuant to paragraph 3 of article 35, discussed below from margin 17, the service of judges is staggered so that some judges are called to full-time service immediately whereas others are not. The implication of paragraph 1 is that once called to serve on a full-time basis, judges are not permitted to serve at the Court on a part-time basis during any part of their terms of office. Indeed, article 40(3) of the Statute provides that '[j]udges required to serve on a full-time basis at the seat of the Court shall not engage in any other occupation of a professional nature'.²² This paragraph applies to all judges of the Court, whether elected: within the regular election cycle as one of the eighteen judges of the Court in accordance with article 36 of the Statute;²³ to fill a judicial vacancy in accordance with article 37 of the Statute; or in accordance with article 36(2) of the Statute, to increase the number of judges.

The question has arisen as to whether judges whose terms have been extended for the purpose of completing any trial or appeal the hearing of which has already commenced, in accordance with article 36(10) of the Statute, fall within the ambit of articles 37(1) and 40(3) of the Statute, given that their original terms of office have expired; i.e. whether judges serving extended terms to complete a case are equally required to serve on a full-time basis at the Court and refrain from engaging in other occupations of a professional nature. The question has not been definitively settled.

IV. Paragraph 1 – Availability to serve full-time

Paragraph 1 of article 35 requires judges to be available to serve at the Court on a full-time basis from the commencement of their terms of office. This provision thus obliges judges to be on hand to take up their full-time duties at the Court as and when required within their terms of office. It seeks to ensure that the Presidency is not divested of judges with whom to compose Chambers to hear cases and that the Court is thereby in a position to administer justice without delay.

For judges elected on regular mandates, their terms of office commence on the eleventh of March following the date of their election.²⁴ For judges elected to fill judicial vacancies, their ²¹ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, paragraph 49.

²² For those judges who have not yet been called to serve to on a full-time basis, article 40(2) of the Statute provides that judges shall not engage in any activity which is likely to interfere with their judicial functions or to affect confidence in their independence.

²³ Regular elections refer to the scheduled elections of the ASP to elect judges to the Court, which take place every three years in accordance with article 36(9) of the Statute.

²⁴ At the first judicial election at its first session in 2003, the ASP decided that the terms of office of judges of the Court shall begin to run from the 11 March following the date of the election, Official Records, First session (first and second resumptions) 3–7 February and 21–23 April 2003 (ICC-ASP/11/3/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 31. This is enshrined in regulation 9(1) of the Regulations of the Court, which likewise provides that the terms of office of the judges commence on the eleventh of March following the date of their election. It is not stated when the terms of judges elected to increase numbers, in accordance with article 36(2) of the Statute, would commence. (For further pronouncements of the ASP on the commencement of the terms of office of judges elected within the regular election cycle see Official Records, Fourth session (resumption) 26–27 January 2006 (ICC-ASP/4/37), Part I, B, paragraph 20; Official Records, Seventh session (first and second resumptions) 19–23 January and 9–13 February 2009 (ICC-ASP/7/20/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 24; Official Records, Tenth session, 12–21 December 2011 (ICC-ASP/10/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 44; Official Records, Thirteenth session, 8–17 December 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 50).

terms of office commence on the date of their election.²⁵ The availability of judges to be called to serve on a full-time basis at the Court could, however, be delayed for reasons such as health/illness, continuing professional obligations or issues of residence/proximity to the Court.

- 11 On the subject of availability of judges and in the context of reporting on the two candidates nominated at the twelfth session of the ASP in November 2013 to fill, in accordance with article 37 of the Statute, the judicial vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge Anthony Thomas Aquinas Carmona (Trinidad and Tobago),²⁶ the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges of the International Criminal Court (mandated to facilitate the appointment of the highest-qualified individuals as judges of the Court ('Advisory Committee')),²⁷ considered it 'important that judges elected to the Court be in good health and prepared to serve the whole term immediately, and that there be no extraneous duties that could delay their assumption of office'.²⁸ The Advisory Committee reiterated the importance of this in relation to the seventeen candidates nominated in the elections for six judicial seats at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014²⁹ and also recalled this in relation to the two candidates nominated in the elections at the resumed thirteenth session of the ASP in June 2015³⁰ to fill the judicial vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge-elect Senator Miriam Defensor-Santiago (The Philippines).³¹ Further,

²⁵ At the first judicial election at its first session in 2003, the ASP also decided that the term of office of a judge elected to replace a judge whose term of office has not expired shall run from the date of the election for the remainder of that term, Official Records, First session (first and second resumptions) 2003 (ICC-ASP/1/3/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 31. This is equally enshrined in regulation 9(2) of the Regulations of the Court, which provides that the terms of office of judges elected to replace judges whose terms have not expired shall commence on the date of their election and shall continue for the remainder of the predecessors' terms. (For further pronouncements of the ASP on the commencements of the terms of office of judges elected to fill judicial vacancies see Official Records, Sixth session, 30 November – 14 December 2007, (ICC-ASP/6/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 32; Official Records, Eighth session, 18–26 November 2009 (ICC-ASP/8/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 34; Official Records, Twelfth session, 20–28 November 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 24).

²⁶ Effective as of 18 March 2013, following his election as President of Trinidad and Tobago. See ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20130320-PR885, 20 March 2013.

²⁷ The Advisory Committee, a subsidiary body of the ASP in accordance with article 36(4)(c) of the Statute, was established by resolution of the ASP at its tenth session in December 2011 (Official Records, Tenth session, 2011 (ICC-ASP/10/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, paragraph 19) with the mandate of facilitating the appointment of the highest-qualified individuals as judges of the Court (see paragraph 5 of the Terms of Reference of the Advisory Committee set out in Report of the Bureau on the establishment of an Advisory Committee on nominations of judges of the International Criminal Court, 30 November 2011, ICC-ASP/10/36 ('Advisory Committee Terms of Reference')). The Advisory Committee is mandated to prepare information and analysis, of a technical nature, on the suitability of the judicial candidates in order to inform the decision making of States Parties in the election process (see paragraphs 9, 11 and 12 of the Advisory Committee Terms of Reference, ICC-ASP/10/36). In examining the scope of its mandate, the Advisory Committee has stated that it is 'required to advise States on whether or not, in its opinion, the candidates meet the requirements of article 36 [of the Statute], taking into account the specific qualifications required under Lists A and B as provided in that article.' See Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its fourth meeting, 24 April 2015, ICC-ASP/13/46, paragraph 18. The Advisory Committee evaluates the candidates by conducting interviews with regard to their qualifications before preparing its report to the ASP. The President of the Bureau of the ASP has expressed the hope that States Parties would be guided by the conclusions of the reports of the Advisory Committee in casting their votes during judicial elections (Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Ninth meeting, 30 September 2014, paragraph 3(a)).

²⁸ Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its second meeting, 29 October 2013, ICC-ASP/12/47, Annex I, paragraph 8.

²⁹ The Advisory Committee 'stressed the importance that judges elected to the Court be in good health and prepared to serve the whole term, and that there be no extraneous duties that could delay their assumption of office or interfere with their discharge of their duties of a judge as provided in article 40, paragraph 3, of the Rome Statute.' Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its third meeting, 29 September 2014, ICC-ASP/13/22, Annex I, paragraph 8.

³⁰ Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its fourth meeting, 24 April 2015, ICC-ASP/13/46, Annex, paragraph 8.

³¹ Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago resigned on 3 June 2014 for medical reasons, see note 36. 'Judge-elect' refers to an incoming judge who has been elected to the Court by the ASP but who has not yet made his or her solemn undertaking in accordance with article 45 of the Statute.

the President of the Bureau³² has informed States Parties that in selecting candidates for judicial office it is 'important that the candidates be willing, able and fit to assume office when called to service by the Court'.³³ At its thirteenth session in December 2014, the ASP also 'stress[ed] the importance of elected judges who have made their solemn undertaking being available to take up their full-time service when the Court's workload so requires'.³⁴

These statements have been informed by practice, as the Court has seen judges who have resigned both during, and prior to, full-time service due to reasons of ill-health³⁵ or who have not been sworn in and called to serve on a full-time basis due to reasons of ill-health.³⁶ It is noted that unlike the staff of the Court, the appointment of judges is not subject to clearance from a medical professional following the results of a medical examination³⁷ and, again, unlike the staff of the Court, there is no upper age limit on the service of judges.³⁸ Nonetheless, whereas health is not a relevant criterion in the nomination and election of judges as stipulated in article 36 of the Statute, it has become an essential condition in considering the aptitude of judges for full-time service at the Court. In his address to the ASP at the opening of its twelfth session in November 2013, the President of the Court, in the context of discussing the forthcoming elections of six judges at the thirteenth session of the ASP, declared that '[a]s you know, the Court needs elected officials of the highest quality, with ample professional experience in relevant fields of law. Further, and equally important, they need to be in good and robust health!' The President reiterated this at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014.³⁹ Moreover, the Advisory Committee reported to the ASP that: the two candidates nominated to fill the judicial vacancy at the twelfth session in November 2013 (resulting from the resignation of Judge Carmona);⁴⁰ the seventeen candidates for election at the thirteenth session in December 2014; and the two candidates nominated to fill the judicial vacancy at the resumed thirteenth session in June 2015 (resulting from the resignation of Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago)⁴¹ had stated that they were in good health.⁴²

³² In accordance with article 112(3) of the Statute, the Bureau of the ASP has a representative character. It consists of a President, two Vice-Presidents and eighteen members elected by the ASP for three-year terms and meets at least once a year to assist the ASP in the discharge of its responsibilities.

³³ Letter from President of the ASP to States Parties concerning the work of the Advisory Committee on the Nominations of Judges and the nomination of candidates, ASP/2014/001, 18 February 2014.

³⁴ Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC/ASP/13/Res.5, paragraph 41.

³⁵ Judge Jorda (France), see ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20070508-218, 8 May 2007 and Judge Kaul (Germany), see ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20140630-PR1023, 30 June 2014.

³⁶ Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago (The Philippines), see Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Fourth meeting, 4 June 2014, paragraph 2. Concerning the resignation of Judge-elect Shahabuddeen (Guyana) (ICC Press Releases ICC-ASP-20090218-PR391, 18 February 2009 and Election of judges to fill two judicial vacancies of the International Criminal Court, 11 November 2009, ICC-ASP/8/21, paragraph 2), see Bellelli, in: Bellelli et al. (eds.), International Criminal Justice (2010) 413.

³⁷ Rule 104.13 of the Staff Rules of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/4/3, 25 August 2005. For discussion on the issue of an age limit for elected officials see Bellelli, in: Bellelli et al. (eds.), International Criminal Justice (2010) 410–415.

³⁸ Regulation 9.5 of the Staff Regulations of the Court sets the age limit at 62 years providing: 'Staff members shall not be retained in active service beyond the age of sixty-two years. The Registrar or the Prosecutor, as appropriate, may, in the interest of the Court, extend that age limit in exceptional cases' (Official Records, Second session, 8–12 September 2003 (ICC-ASP/2/10), Part IV, ICC-ASP/2/Res.2).

³⁹ Statement of Judge Sang-Hyun Song President of the International Criminal Court, at the opening of the 12th Session of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 20 November 2014. Likewise at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014, the President 'stress[ed] once again that the ICC needs judges of the highest quality, with ample professional experience and sound health. In addition, given the heavy casework which will face the Judiciary next year, it will be very important that the newly-elected judges are immediately available to take up full-time service'. Statement of Judge Sang-Hyun Song President of the International Criminal Court, at the opening of the 13th Session of the Assembly of States Parties of the International Criminal Court.

⁴⁰ Supra note 26.

⁴¹ Supra notes 31 and 36.

⁴² ICC-ASP/12/47, Annex I, see note 28, paragraph 8; ICC-ASP/13/22, Annex I, see note 29, paragraph 8; ICC-ASP/13/46, Annex, see note 30, paragraph 8.

- 13 Continuing professional obligations might also delay the availability of a judge to assume office; consequently the readiness of candidates to take up their positions at the Court has similarly become a relevant consideration. It is noted that judges elected to the Court have still been engaged in other professional duties at the time of election and thereafter which have prevented them from being called to the Court to serve full-time. For example, a judge elected at the tenth session of the ASP in December 2011 was not, until March 2015, called to serve the Court on a full-time basis as he was sitting in the trial of The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić (IT-95-5/18-I) before the ICTY.⁴³ Thus, in relation to extraneous commitments, the Advisory Committee, after conducting interviews with the judicial candidates, reported to the ASP that both candidates nominated to fill the judicial vacancy at the twelfth session in November 2013, resulting from the resignation of Judge Carmona, had stated that they were available to serve the remainder of the term of office of the vacant seat immediately.⁴⁴ The Advisory Committee similarly reported that all seventeen judicial candidates for election at the thirteenth session in December 2014 had stated that they were prepared to serve for the full term of nine years and further that, with the exception of one candidate, all seventeen candidates had stated that they would be available from 11 March 2015.⁴⁵ In respect of the resumed thirteenth session in June 2015, the Advisory Committee also reported to the ASP that the two candidates to fill the judicial vacancy left by the resignation of Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago had indicated that they would not be delayed in serving their terms.⁴⁶
- 14 The ability of judges to present themselves at the seat of the Court may also lead to delay. Whereas the place of residence of full-time judges is not expressly addressed in article 35 of the Statute or elsewhere in the Statute, there was discussion during the drafting of the Statute as to whether the President should be compelled to reside at the seat of the Court.⁴⁷ Moreover, previous drafts of the provision during the Rome Conference had implied that serving the Court full-time entailed presence at the seat of the Court in The Hague.⁴⁸ Although this inference was not retained in article 35 of the Statute, it remains in article 40 of the Statute, which refers to 'Judges required to serve on a full-time basis at the seat of the Court'.

The ASP, noting that ultimately the issue of the residence of full-time judges was not explicitly addressed in the Statute adopted at Rome, considered that 'the judges themselves will take a decision as to whether or not residence at the seat of the Court is required for full-time service, bearing in mind the permanent character of the Court'.⁴⁹ However, early on in ⁴³ Referring to Judge Howard Morrison (The United Kingdom).

⁴⁴ ICC-ASP/12/47, Annex I, see note 28, paragraph 8.

⁴⁵ ICC-ASP/13/22, Annex I, see note 29, paragraph 8. The Advisory Committee noted that one of the candidates might not be in a position to serve from 11 March 2015, in view of his engagement in continuing proceedings at the ICTY, referring to Judge Antoine Kesia-Mbe Mindua sitting in the trial of The Prosecutor v Goran Hadžić (IT-04-75), ibid paragraphs 8 and page 11. It should be noted that the authorities of the Democratic Republic of the Congo subsequently reassured States Parties that Judge Mindua, their nominated candidate, would be available to take up his duties once elected (see Note Verbale of 12 November 2014, 132.44/A1/SJ/920/2014). Judge Mindua was thereafter successfully elected as a judge of the Court at the thirteenth session of the ASP. For the results of the elections see Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 44).

⁴⁶ ICC-ASP/13/46, Annex, see note 30, paragraph 8.

⁴⁷ 1993 Draft Statute, commentary to article 10; 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 8, paragraph 2.

⁴⁸ A previous draft of the text had provided that: [...] 'The Presidency may, in consultation with the members of the Court, decide from time to time, on the basis of the workload of the Court, to what extent the remaining judges shall be required to be available at the seat of the Court. Any such arrangement shall be without prejudice to the provisions of article 41. The financial arrangements for judges not required to be available full-time at the seat of the Court shall be made in accordance with article 50', see note 4, Official Records, Volume III, A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III) Part II, F, Documents of the Committee of the Whole, Part 4, Composition and administration of the Court, (i) Working document, A/CONF.183/C.1/L31/REV and (ii) Recommendation/Report, A/CONF.183/C.1/L.45, article 36. See also A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II), Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole, 39th meeting, paragraphs 30–31.

⁴⁹ Official Records, Second session, 2003 (ICC-ASP/2/10), Part III, A, page 199, footnote 1. In full the footnote to the paragraph 7 on travel/relocation costs provides: 'The Rome Statute does not specifically address the issue of the residence of judges. Article 35 of the Rome Statute provides that full-time judges of the Court 'shall be available to serve on that basis from the commencement of their terms of office'. Moreover, article 40 provides the life of the Court, the Presidency concluded that practicability required judges to reside in the vicinity of the Court during their terms of office and proposed an amendment to the Conditions of Service and Compensation of Judges of the ICC⁵⁰ to ensure that judges were able to serve the Court on a full-time basis effectively.⁵¹ That amendment was adopted by the ASP and the Conditions of Service and Compensation of Judges of the ICC now provide that 'Judges shall take up residence in The Netherlands within sufficient proximity to the seat of the Court to be available to attend the Court at short notice in order to discharge their duties under the Rome Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'.⁵²

V. Paragraph 2: The Presidency

Notwithstanding paragraph 1, paragraph 2 of article 35 provides that the judges composing the Presidency shall serve on a full-time basis as soon as they are elected. The Presidency, an organ of the Court pursuant to article 34(a) of the Statute, is comprised of the President and the First and Second Vice-Presidents elected from amongst the judges for a renewable three-year mandate, in accordance with article 38(1) of the Statute. The Presidency is responsible for the proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor, and for other specific functions conferred upon it in accordance with the Statute.⁵³ It is the responsibilities of the Presidency that dictate the immediate full-time service of its members. 15

An important task of the Presidency in the judicial management of the Court, as set out in the Statute, is deciding when to call judges to serve the Court on a full-time basis, in accordance with article 35(3) of the Statute. Another is excusing a judge from the exercise of a function under the Statute or excusing the Prosecutor or Deputy Prosecutor from acting, in accordance with articles 41(1) and 42(6) of the Statute respectively. Other key functions of the judges of the Presidency warranting their immediate service, set out in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ('Rules') and Regulations of the Court ('Regulations'), are assigning judges to judicial divisions in accordance with rule 4*bis*(2) of the Rules, selecting candidates for the post of Registrar in accordance with rule 12(1) of the Rules, and constituting Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers in accordance with article 61(11) of the Statute, rule 130 of the Rules and regulation 46 of the Regulations, as well as assigning situations to those Chambers in accordance with regulation 46(2) of the Regulations. Key functions of the President in particular are representing the Court, supervising the functions of the Registrar, in accordance with article 43(2) of the Statute, and convening plenary sessions of judges, in accordance with rule 4(2) of the Rules. 16

VI. Paragraph 3 – Calling judges to serve on a full-time basis

Paragraph 3 provides that the Presidency may, on the basis of the workload of the Court and in consultation with its members, decide from time to time to what extent the remaining judges shall be required to serve on a full-time basis. This key provision affords the Court the capacity 17 that judges 'required to serve on a full-time basis at the seat of the Court shall not engage in any other occupation of a professional nature'. The question of the residence of full-time judges and their availability to serve on that basis at the seat of the Court is a matter which the Rome Statute has entrusted to the judges. Article 52 sets out the manner in which the Regulations of the Court are to be elaborated and adopted. In considering the issue of the residence of full-time judges, the judges themselves will take a decision as to whether or not residence at the seat of the Court is required for full-time service, bearing in mind the permanent character of the Court.'

⁵⁰ Infra note 62.

⁵¹ Proposal regarding conditions of service and compensation of judges and elected officials, 10 August 2004, ICC-ASP/3/12, Annex I, Part II.

⁵² ICC-ASP/3/Res.3, Annex, Part II, paragraph 1, see note 62. Paragraph 2 of the same provides that 'Residence status is defined as the establishment, through acquisition or long-term lease, of a permanent residence, coupled with the declaration by the judge concerned of resident status'.

⁵³ Article 38(3) of the Statute.

to adapt as required to its caseload and grants the Presidency the necessary flexibility to ensure the effective operation of the Court. As discussed above at margins 2 to 6, the staggered nature of the full-time service of judges was a way to ensure that the Court did not waste precious resources when faced with an unpredictable workload in its initial phase of operation. However, it will have continued relevance during any inactive periods in the life of the Court.

- 18 The Presidency may decide whether to call judges to serve on a full-time basis, in consultation with the members of the Court. In the French version of the Statute, those consultees are specified as being the judges of the Court.⁵⁴ In practice, those members, consulted as to the workload indicators of the Court from their various perspectives, are the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar.⁵⁵ Previous drafts of this provision had seen the ASP deciding whether judges should be required to serve on a full-time basis following a recommendation from the Presidency.⁵⁶ The provision adopted at the Rome Conference omits any role for the ASP and leaves the decision firmly in the hands of the Presidency, depending on the volume of work in the Court; thereby underlining the Presidency's autonomy vis-à-vis the ASP over the internal judicial functioning of the Court.
- 19 In its initial phase, due to the nature of the proceedings of the Court, the first judges that the Presidency called to serve on a full-time basis were the judges assigned to the Pre-Trial Division in order to constitute Pre-Trial Chambers, as well as the judges constituting the Appeals Chamber. This was due to the responsibilities of the Pre-Trial Chambers, which deal with the initial stages of judicial proceedings before the Court in terms of inter alia, authorising the commencement of proprio motu investigations by the Prosecutor pursuant to article 15 of the Statute, hearing challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case in accordance with article 19 of the Statute, hearing applications for the issuance of a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear in accordance with article 58 of the Statute and deciding whether to confirm the charges against a person and commit him or her for trial in accordance with article 61 of the Statute.⁵⁷ Moreover, the judges of the Appeals Chamber need to be in place to hear any interlocutory appeals arising from challenges to decisions of the Pre-Trial Chambers in accordance with articles 82(1) and 82(2) of the Statute. The Trial Division, the pool of judges from which the Presidency composes Trial Chambers, were amongst the last to be called to the Court since the pre-trial stage of proceedings require completion, entailing the confirmation of charges and committal for trial, before the Presidency constitutes a Trial Chamber to hear a case, in accordance with article 61(11) of the Statute.
- 20 Of the judges elected to the Court at the first election in February 2003, whose terms of office began on 11 March 2004, the Presidency had by the end of 2004 called to full-time service the judges of the Pre-Trial Division, constituting the three Pre-Trial Chambers⁵⁸ and

⁵⁴ The French version of article 35(3) of the Statute provides: 'La Présidence peut, en fonction de la charge de travail de la Cour et en consultation avec les autres juges, décider périodiquement de la mesure dans laquelle ceux-ci sont tenus d'exercer leurs fonctions à plein temps.' The English text provides: 'The Presidency may, on the basis of the workload of the Court and in consultation with its members decide from time to time to what extent the remaining judges shall be required to serve on a full-time basis.' Given the definition of 'the Court' in article 1 of the Statute and the organisational structure of the Court set out in article 34 of the Statute, the English text of article 35(3) of the Statute is less precise in its terms than the French text.

⁵⁵ For example, see the Address by Judge Philippe Kirsch President of the ICC at the Third Session of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 6 September 2004, page 2.

⁵⁶ The 1994 ILC Draft Statute provided, at article 10(4): 'On the recommendation of the Presidency, the States Parties may by a two-thirds majority decide that the workload of the Court requires that the judges should serve on a full-time basis'. Article 36 of the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute provided: '[On the recommendation of the Presidency, the States Parties] [The Presidency] may [by a two-thirds majority] decide that the workload of the Court requires that the judges [composing any of the other Chambers] should serve on a full-time [or part-time] basis'. See mn 5.

⁵⁷ The 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute had equally foreseen at article 36, in square bracketed text, that '[The judges composing [the] [a] Pre-Trial Chamber shall serve on a full-time basis [once the Court is seized of a matter] [when required in the view of the President].]' See mn 5.

⁵⁸ Constituted on 23 June 2004, ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20040625-60, 25 June 2004, Constitution of ICC Pre-Trial Chambers. Excluding the Vice-President who was in the Pre-Trial Division in accordance with article 39(1), six additional pre-trial judges were called to full-time service.

the judges of the Appeals Division who comprised the Appeals Chamber in accordance with article 29(2)(b)(i) of the Statute.⁵⁹ By March 2007, the Presidency had constituted the first Trial Chamber⁶⁰ and called to full-time service all of the judges of the Court elected at the first election, other than those who had resigned. Since then, the large majority of judges have been called to full-time service from the commencement of their terms of office. The Proposed Programme Budget of the Court for 2015 foresees that all seven incoming judges will be required full-time, stating that ‘the anticipated caseload in 2015 will necessitate the calling of all six regular judges to be elected at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014, as well as one additional judge to be elected to replace the previous judge-elect, Senator Miriam Defensor-Santiago of the Philippines, following her resignation in June 2014. The new judges are expected to be called to service immediately upon commencement of their terms of office pursuant to article 35(1) of the Statute.’⁶¹

The Presidency has been relatively conservative in calling judges to full-time service where the body of judges is complemented by judges whose terms have been extended for the purpose of completing any trial or appeal the hearing of which has already commenced, in accordance with article 36(10) of the Statute. The Presidency has underlined its ‘efforts on the one hand to ensure the availability of a sufficient number of judges to meet the requirements of current casework, while on the other hand attempting to limit as far as possible any increase beyond the total of 18 judges normally provided for in the Statute ... thus limiting the impact that extensions [pursuant to article 36(10) of the Statute] have had on the budget.’⁶² 21

Paragraph 3 maintains that the decision of the Presidency to call judges to full-time service is without prejudice to the terms of article 40 of the Statute, which safeguards their independence. This is to ensure that the exigencies of judicial administration do not lead to an inadvertent flouting of the provisions seeking to maintain the independence of judges. 22

VII. Paragraph 4 – Financial arrangements for non-full-time judges

Paragraph 4 of article 35 of the Statute provides that the financial arrangements for judges who are not required to serve on a full-time basis should be made in accordance with article 49 of the Statute. That article in turn provides that judges shall receive such salaries, allowances and expenses as may be decided upon by the ASP. As such, the benefits and allowances of non-full time judges are governed by the Conditions of Service and Compensation of Judges of the ICC (‘Conditions of Service’) adopted by the ASP.⁶³ 23

⁵⁹ Excluding the President, who was in the Appeals Division in accordance with article 39(1), the remaining four appeals judges were called to full-time service.

⁶⁰ Decision constituting Trial Chamber I and referring to it the case of The Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-842, 6 March 2007.

⁶¹ Proposed Programme Budget for 2015 of the International Criminal Court, Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol II, Part A, paragraph 70. The budget for 2015 therefore makes provision for the remuneration of 18 full-time judges, including all of the judges elected at the tenth session of the ASP in December 2011.

⁶² Report of the Bureau on Salary and all allowances for judges, whose terms have been extended in accordance with article 36, paragraph 10, 9 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/56, paragraph 6. In the Proposed Programme Budget of the Court for 2013, the Presidency also noted that being ‘[m]indful of possible future changes in workload, the Judiciary will exercise its functions in a manner that makes the most efficient possible use of the resources allocated to it.’ Official Records, Eleventh session, 14–22 November 2012 (ICC-ASP/11/20), Vol II, Part A, Proposed Programme Budget for 2013, paragraph 52.

⁶³ Adopted at the second session of the ASP in September 2003 (Official Records, Second session, 2003 (ICC-ASP/2/10), Part III) and partly republished in amended form in the annex to resolution ICC-ASP/3/Res.3 adopted at the third session of the ASP in September 2004 (Official Records, Third session, 6–10 September 2004 (ICC-ASP/3/25), Part III, Annex).

- 24 Pursuant to the Conditions of Service, judges of the Court who have not yet been called to serve on a full-time basis and who have made their solemn undertaking⁶⁴ receive an annual allowance of € 20,000, which is payable monthly.⁶⁵ In addition, a judge who declares to the President of the Court that his or her net income, including the € 20,000 annual allowance, is less than the equivalent of € 60,000 per annum will receive an allowance, again payable monthly, to supplement his or her declared net income up to € 60,000 per annum.⁶⁶ Furthermore, when engaged on the business of the Court, as certified by the Presidency, judges who have not yet been called to serve on a full-time basis are entitled to a special allowance of € 270 per day.⁶⁷ Moreover, non-full-time judges are entitled to a subsistence allowance, at the United Nations rate in Euros, applicable to judges of the International Court of Justice, for each day that they attend meetings of the Court.⁶⁸ As for benefits, a non-full-time judge is also entitled to the costs of travel to official meetings of the Court.⁶⁹ Finally, Judges who have not yet been called to serve on a full-time basis are not entitled to pension benefits until they are full-time and, as with judges serving on a full-time basis, they are not entitled to health insurance.⁷⁰
- 25 As discussed above at margins 7 to 9, judges are required to be available to serve on a full-time basis at the Court from the commencement of their terms of office in accordance with article 35(1) of the Statute. Furthermore, whilst judges who are not serving on a full-time basis at the Court are, unlike their full-time counterparts, entitled to engage in occupations of a professional nature, they shall not, pursuant to article 40(2) of the Statute, engage in any activity which is likely to interfere with their judicial functions or to affect confidence in their independence. In light of the foregoing, judges elected to the Court are, on the one hand, in effect obliged to be on standby to be called to serve the Court on a full-time basis, pursuant to article 35(1) of the Statute, and on the other hand, limited in the types of activities in which they might engage, pursuant to article 40(2) of the Statute. This situation might interfere with their professional activities and hence warrant additional remuneration in the interim period between the commencement of their judicial terms of office and full-time service at the Court. In recognition of this, non-full-time judges are thus compensated by the above allowances and expenses to ease any financial hardships that they might incur and to facilitate their attendance at the Court for official meetings, for example plenary sessions of judges of the Court held pursuant to rule 4 of the Rules (which all judges, whether called to full-time service or otherwise, may attend, except for those on extended mandates pursuant to article 36(10) of the Statute (see mn 27)).
- 26 The salaries, allowances and expenses of full-time judges are equally provided for in article 49 of the Statute and set out in the Conditions of Service. They will not be considered in any detail here save for noting the following by way of comparison. The remuneration of a judge working on a full-time basis at the Court is set at € 180,000 net per annum.⁷¹ The President receives a special allowance paid at the rate of ten per cent of the President's annual remuneration of € 180,000, amounting to € 18,000 net.⁷² When acting as President, the two ⁶⁴ Judges who have not made their solemn undertaking pursuant to article 45 of the Statute are not entitled to the allowances and expenses granted to non-full-time judges. See the Proposed Programme Budget of the Court for 2013 and 2014 which made no provision for the entitlements of the judge newly elected at the tenth session of the ASP in December 2011 who had yet to be sworn in (Official Records, Eleventh session, 2012 (ICC-ASP/11/20), Vol II, Part A, Proposed Programme Budget for 2013, footnote 39 to paragraph 89 and Annex V(c); Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol II, Part A, Proposed Programme Budget for 2014, footnote 31 to paragraph 70 and Annex V(c)).

⁶⁵ Official Records, Second session, 2003 (ICC-ASP/2/10), Part III, paragraph 9.

⁶⁶ Ibid, paragraph 10.

⁶⁷ Ibid, paragraph 11.

⁶⁸ Ibid, paragraph 12.

⁶⁹ Ibid, paragraph 15.

⁷⁰ Ibid, paragraphs 13 and 14.

⁷¹ Official Records, Third session, 2004 (ICC-ASP/3/25), Part III, ICC-ASP/3/Res.3, Annex, Part III, paragraph 1.

⁷² Ibid, paragraph 2.

Vice-Presidents, or any other judge assigned to act as President, are entitled to a special allowance of € 100 net per day for each working day so acting, up to a maximum of € 10,000 per annum.⁷³ Full-time judges are also entitled to further allowances and benefits in accordance with the Conditions of Service.

The Conditions of Service make no distinction between judges on regular mandates and judges on extended mandates pursuant to article 36(10) of the Statute, in terms of remuneration and other benefits, with the exception of the accrual of pensions after nine years.⁷⁴ The remuneration of judges whose terms have been extended, pursuant to article 36(10) of the Statute, has been called into question by the ASP. In practice, and in comparison to other judges, a judge on an extended term is limited to sitting solely in the case for which he or she has been extended and does not take part in other judicial activities (such as attending the plenary sessions of judges of the Court, convened pursuant to rule 4 of the Rules). The issue has hence been broached by the ASP as to whether judges on extended mandates, in accordance with article 36(10) of the Statute, should still be entitled to the full salary earned by judges on regular mandates even if they have been extended for the purpose of sitting in one case alone.⁷⁵ However, the Court has reported that the caseloads of judges whose terms have been extended for the purpose of only one case were not significantly lower than those of judges in regular service who could be assigned to two or more cases, due to the fact that the work of judges on extended terms during the closing phase of a case was normally intense prior to the rendering of final decisions and judgements.⁷⁶ This is especially true for the presiding judge. The ASP has not taken any decision on the question and remains seized of the matter.

⁷³ Ibid, paragraph 3.

⁷⁴ Official Records, Third session, 2004 (ICC-ASP/3/25), Part III, ICC-ASP/3/Res.3, Appendix 2, Pension scheme regulations for judges of the International Criminal Court, article 1(4), providing: 'No additional pension shall be paid if the judge has completed more than a full nine-year term.' Article 1(3) of the Amendments to the pension scheme regulations for judges of the International Criminal Court, set out in resolution ICC-ASP/6/Res.6, maintains this limitation.

⁷⁵ Official Records, Tenth session, 2011 (ICC-ASP/10/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, paragraph 31; Official Records, Eleventh session, 2012 (ICC-ASP/11/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC-ASP/11/Res.8, paragraph 34; Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013, (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol II, Part B, Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance on the work of its twentieth session, April 2013, paragraphs 35 and 36; Report of the Bureau on Salary and all allowances for judges, whose terms have been extended in accordance with article 36, paragraph 10, 9 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/56, paragraph 4.

⁷⁶ Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol II, Part B, paragraph 35.

Article 36

Qualifications, nomination and election of judges

1. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 2, there shall be 18 judges of the Court.
2. (a) The Presidency, acting on behalf of the Court, may propose an increase in the number of judges specified in paragraph 1, indicating the reasons why this is considered necessary and appropriate. The Registrar shall promptly circulate any such proposal to all States Parties.
 - (b) Any such proposal shall then be considered at a meeting of the Assembly of States Parties to be convened in accordance with article 112. The proposal shall be considered adopted if approved at the meeting by a vote of two thirds of the members of the Assembly of States Parties and shall enter into force at such time as decided by the Assembly of States Parties.
 - (c) (i) Once a proposal for an increase in the number of judges has been adopted under subparagraph (b), the election of the additional judges shall take place at the next session of the Assembly of States Parties in accordance with paragraphs 3 to 8, and article 37, paragraph 2;
 - (ii) Once a proposal for an increase in the number of judges has been adopted and brought into effect under subparagraphs (b) and (c) (i), it shall be open to the Presidency at any time thereafter, if the workload of the Court justifies it, to propose a reduction in the number of judges, provided that the number of judges shall not be reduced below that specified in paragraph 1. The proposal shall be dealt with in accordance with the procedure laid down in subparagraphs (a) and (b).

In the event that the proposal is adopted, the number of judges shall be progressively decreased as the terms of office of serving judges expire, until the necessary number has been reached.
3. (a) The judges shall be chosen from among persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective States for appointment to the highest judicial offices.
 - (b) Every candidate for election to the Court shall:
 - (i) Have established competence in criminal law and procedure, and the necessary relevant experience, whether as judge, prosecutor, advocate or in other similar capacity, in criminal proceedings; or
 - (ii) Have established competence in relevant areas of international law such as international humanitarian law and the law of human rights, and extensive experience in a professional legal capacity which is of relevance to the judicial work of the Court;
 - (c) Every candidate for election to the Court shall have an excellent knowledge of and be fluent in at least one of the working languages of the Court.
4. (a) Nominations of candidates for election to the Court may be made by any State Party to this Statute, and shall be made either:
 - (i) By the procedure for the nomination of candidates for appointment to the highest judicial offices in the State in question; or
 - (ii) By the procedure provided for the nomination of candidates for the International Court of Justice in the Statute of that Court.

Nominations shall be accompanied by a statement in the necessary detail specifying how the candidate fulfils the requirements of paragraph 3.
- (b) Each State Party may put forward one candidate for any given election who need not necessarily be a national of that State Party but shall in any case be a national of a State Party.

- (c) The Assembly of States Parties may decide to establish, if appropriate, an Advisory Committee on nominations. In that event, the Committee's composition and mandate shall be established by the Assembly of States Parties.
5. For the purposes of the election, there shall be two lists of candidates:
List A containing the names of candidates with the qualifications specified in paragraph 3 (b) (i); and List B containing the names of candidates with the qualifications specified in paragraph 3 (b) (ii).
A candidate with sufficient qualifications for both lists may choose on which list to appear. At the first election to the Court, at least nine judges shall be elected from list A and at least five judges from list B. Subsequent elections shall be so organized as to maintain the equivalent proportion on the Court of judges qualified on the two lists.
6. (a) The judges shall be elected by secret ballot at a meeting of the Assembly of States Parties convened for that purpose under article 112. Subject to paragraph 7, the persons elected to the Court shall be the 18 candidates who obtain the highest number of votes and a two-thirds majority of the States Parties present and voting.
(b) In the event that a sufficient number of judges is not elected on the first ballot, successive ballots shall be held in accordance with the procedures laid down in subparagraph (a) until the remaining places have been filled.
7. No two judges may be nationals of the same State. A person who, for the purposes of membership of the Court, could be regarded as a national of more than one State shall be deemed to be a national of the State in which that person ordinarily exercises civil and political rights.
8. (a) The States Parties shall, in the selection of judges, take into account the need, within the membership of the Court, for:
(i) The representation of the principal legal systems of the world;
(ii) Equitable geographical representation; and
(iii) A fair representation of female and male judges.
(b) States Parties shall also take into account the need to include judges with legal expertise on specific issues, including, but not limited to, violence against women or children.
9. (a) Subject to subparagraph (b), judges shall hold office for a term of nine years and, subject to subparagraph (c) and to article 37, paragraph 2, shall not be eligible for re-election.
(b) At the first election, one third of the judges elected shall be selected by lot to serve for a term of three years; one third of the judges elected shall be selected by lot to serve for a term of six years; and the remainder shall serve for a term of nine years.
(c) A judge who is selected to serve for a term of three years under subparagraph (b) shall be eligible for re-election for a full term.
10. Notwithstanding paragraph 9, a judge assigned to a Trial or Appeals Chamber in accordance with article 39 shall continue in office to complete any trial or appeal the hearing of which has already commenced before that Chamber.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'Book Review: International Courts and Their Judges', (2012) 23 CLF 223; Bohlander, M., 'The International Criminal Judiciary – Problems of Judicial Selection, Independence and Ethics', in: id. (ed.), International Criminal Justice – A Critical Analysis of Institutions and Procedures (2007); id., 'Pride and Prejudice or Sense and Sensibility? A pragmatic proposal for the recruitment of judges at the ICC and other international criminal courts', (2009) 12 NCLRev 529; id., 'No Country for Old Men? – Age limits for judges at international criminal tribunals', (2010) 1 IndianYbIL&Pol 327; id., 'Language, culture, legal traditions and international criminal justice', (2014) JICJ 491; id., 'Criminalising LGBT persons under national criminal law and article 7(1)(h) and (3) of the ICC Statute', (2014) Global Policy 401; Bohlander, M. And Findlay, M., 'The use of domestic sources as a basis for international criminal law principles', (2002) 1 The Global Community: Yearbook of International Law and Jurisprudence 3

Content

I. Paragraphs 1 and 2: Composition of the Chambers.....	1
II. Paragraph 3: Qualifications of judicial candidates.....	3
III. Paragraph 4: Nomination procedure; Advisory Committee (ACN).....	9
IV. Paragraphs 5 to 8 – Election procedure; gender balance.....	11
V. Paragraphs 9 and 10: Term of office; continuation in office.....	13

I. Paragraphs 1 and 2: Composition of the Chambers*

1 The ICC's regular complement comprises 18 judges to serve in the Trial and Appeals Chambers. This number may be augmented if 'necessary and appropriate' circumstances, presumably mainly¹ the development of the Court's case load (argumentum e contrario from paragraph 2(c)(ii)), so require². The procedure for increasing the numbers on the bench is set out in paragraph 2, which is self-explanatory. At the time of writing, however, no such increase had ever been applied for by the Presidency, despite several requests by individual judges to be unassigned from sitting on certain cases because of personal docket overload³. The length of the proceedings before the Trial and Appeals Chambers and especially the time that the accused must spend in custody has reached the levels previously encountered at the ICTY and ICTR, a state of affairs which has persistently caused human rights concerns. There are thus already indications that the current staffing of the ICC bench may not be adequate. The experience from the ICTY and ICTR, firstly with the increase of the number of Trial Chambers and the augmentation of the joint Appeals Chamber and the attendant number of permanent judges, and secondly with the introduction of ad-litem judges in 2001 as part of their completion strategy, should be cause for concern and suggest a pro-active and robust approach to the problem of under-staffing, not least given the fact that even after the increases in judicial numbers just mentioned, both ad hoc tribunals continued to struggle with the case load and length of proceedings⁴.

2 Given that paragraph 2 also allows for decreasing the number of the supernumerary⁵ judges once the circumstances justifying a larger number have ceased to exist, the creation of a rapid response mechanism such as, for example, a reserve pool of qualified candidates⁶ who could be called upon at short notice, would seem advisable. There will be more suitable candidates in almost any election than vacant seats; hence the ASP might consider adding a procedure for the establishment of a reserve list to article 36 under the same criteria

* The views expressed in this book are solely those of the author and do not represent the views of the ECCC, the United Nations or the Government of the Kingdom of Cambodia.

¹ It is, however, imaginable that other reasons might be adduced, such as for example, a need for an injection of specific cultural and linguistic competences for a certain situation or case, similar to the expertise on issues such as violence against women and children in paragraph 8(b).

² The view expressed in the previous edition of this Commentary at marginal number 3 and fn. 12 that this equals a simplified procedure for amending the Statute is herewith abandoned, since the Statute itself already allows for the variation in the number of judges – paragraphs 1 and 2 do not stand in a hierarchical relationship to each other but must be read together: Paragraph 1 is not amended by increasing the number of judges under paragraph 2; if anything, the normative reach and content of paragraph 1 is generally qualified ab initio by paragraph 2. Similarly, Rwelamira, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The making of the Rome Statute (1999) 155.

³ See e.g. The Prosecutor v Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, ICC-01/09-02/11, Decision replacing a judge in Trial Chamber V(b), 30 January 2014; The Prosecutor v William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang and The Prosecutor v Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta ICC-01/09-01/11 & ICC-01/09-02/11, Decision replacing a judge in Trial Chamber V, 26 April 2013; The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo ICC-01/05-01/08, Decision replacing judges in Trial Chamber III, 20 July 2010; The Prosecutor v German Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision replacing a judge in Trial Chamber II, 30 September 2009 and ICC-01/05-9-Anx2, Decision on the request to be excused from the exercise of judicial functions in Pre-Trial Chamber III, 22 April 2008.

⁴ It is obvious that the main factors militating against such a pragmatic approach are budget considerations.

⁵ Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 531; Rwelamira, in Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The making of the Rome Statute (1999) 155.

⁶ See in this context Bohlander (2009) 12 NethCLRev 529; id. (2010) 1 IndianYbIL&Pol 327.

(experience, geographical distribution and sex) that apply to the regular elections. One way of doing so could be to elect (at least) one qualified reserve judge for every permanent seat; this could also at the same time lead to a more efficient way of filling casual vacancies under article 37; unlike the practice at the ad hoc tribunals where the state of the judge whose departure etc. caused the vacancy was given the prerogative of unilaterally nominating the successor, article 37 provides for no such approach.

II. Paragraph 3: Qualifications of judicial candidates

The qualification of judicial nominees has been one of the most contentious aspects at each of the modern international criminal tribunals, starting with the ICTY and ICTR. While ‘moral character’ has so far not been a live issue, as far as can be seen, the criterion of being qualified for the highest judicial offices in the domestic environment has given rise to a number of challenges, albeit not at the ICC. As a preliminary (and admittedly somewhat academic⁷) matter, it bears reminding oneself that since a State Party can nominate a candidate of another State Party⁸ under paragraph 4(b) and (c), there is a possibility that State Party A nominates a candidate from State Party B who may qualify for the highest judicial offices under the latter’s domestic law, but not under the former’s. The meaning of the term ‘qualifications ... for appointment highest judicial office’ also varies rather widely⁹ as is best explained at the example of the first ICC judge from Japan¹⁰. The qualifications need to exist during the entire term of office and according to the case law of the ad hoc tribunals their loss will lead to the loss of the judicial seat itself¹¹. There is, however, some uncertainty over the question of whether an elected judge of the ICC who does not meet the criteria can or must be removed from office¹².

The development of the law on the issue of qualifications was highly controversial¹³. Article 6 of the ILC Draft stated that candidates should have ‘in addition: (a) criminal trial experience; (b) recognized competence in international law’, i.e. A cumulative requirement. The ad-hoc committee of the 1996 Preparatory Committee, under para. 20 of its report, stated that ‘concerning the appointment of the prosecutor, expertise in the investigation and prosecution of criminal cases was considered to be an important requirement’, but that insisting on criminal or international law experience with the judges was seen by some as ‘unduly restricting the sources of expertise on which the court should be able to rely’. The meaning of ‘sources of expertise’ may be illustrated by comments made by Algeria, Egypt,

⁷ But see e.g. on the circumstances of the judicial candidature in 2013 of the then Chef de Cabinet at the ICTY who had no prior judicial experience at all: www.diplomatmagazine.nl/2013/11/03/gabrielle-mcintyre-election/ and www.sense-agency.com/icty/togolese-judge-elected-to-tribunal%E2%80%99s-appeals-chamber.29.html?news_id=15507.

⁸ This possibility was already considered during the early drafting history of the provision. See Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 529.

⁹ Bohlander, in: id. (ed.), International Criminal Justice – A Critical Analysis of Institutions and Procedures (2007) 325.

¹⁰ See Bohlander (2009) 12 NCLRev 529.

¹¹ See on the related ICTY jurisprudence Bohlander (2010) 1 Indian Yearbook of International Law and Policy 327.

¹² Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 532 appears to take the view that an ‘independent removal procedure’ is not provided for in such a case, and also extends that to the language command issue – after all a serious matter in the daily court practice. This is prima facie supported by the absence of such an alternative in article 46(1); in any event the rare case of a candidate who intentionally lied about her qualifications may be found to constitute ‘serious misconduct’ under article 46(1)(a). The Statute does not seem to allow for a removal if the deception was, for example, committed by the nominating State authorities without the collusion of the candidate. It is nonetheless disconcerting to think that a judge who does demonstrably not meet the criteria should be allowed to remain in office. The Statute is in need of amendment in this regard.

¹³ See on the following and the relevant sources Bohlander (2009) 12 NCLRev 529 from which parts have been excerpted and modified.

Jordan, Kuwait, Libya and Qatar at the 1996 Prep Comm: 'Experience in criminal matters (judicial prosecutorial or defense advocacy) is, in part, necessary, but not to the exclusion of other expertise. The words of article 6 '...for appointment to the highest judicial offices...' are too limiting since most legal systems do not have judicial appointments by career judges. The present formulation means that only career judges are eligible, and therefore, this formulation should be changed'. The United Kingdom argued for the phrase 'criminal trial experience and, where possible, recognized competence in international law', a common-sense approach to the necessities of judging, whether in a domestic context or in the international arena. Many delegates of the 1998 Diplomatic Conference thought that trial experience should be required for the pre-trial and trial chamber judges. The insistence on previous practical experience together with or as an alternative to competence in international law can be found in the proposals of Switzerland, Portugal, Singapore, Trinidad and Tobago, the United States and France at the 1996 Prep Comm. Article 30[6] of the 1998 Zutphen Draft was an expression of the range of opinions which affected the negotiations; draft article 37 submitted to the Rome Conference by the 1998 Prep Comm in A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 read:

3. The judges of the Court shall:
- (a) be persons of high moral character and impartiality [who possess all the qualifications required in their respective States for appointment to the highest judicial offices]; [and]
 - (b) have:
 - (i) [at least ten years'] [extensive] criminal [law] [trial] experience [as a judge, prosecutor or defending counsel]; [or] [and, where possible]
 - (ii) recognized competence in international law [in particular international criminal law, international humanitarian law and human rights law] ; and (c) possess an excellent knowledge of and be fluent in at least one of the working languages referred to in article 51].'

The text of draft article 37 transmitted by the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole contained a reference to competence in criminal law and procedure gained through judicial or prosecutorial as well as defence experience or a similar capacity, and to competence in international law with reference to extensive professional legal capacity of relevance to the judicial work of the court. Any doubt as to whether these were meant to be cumulative or alternative requirements were dispelled by the final version of article 36 of the Rome Statute, which inserted the word 'or' between them¹⁴.

- 5 It is unclear by what method or on what grounds 'established competence' is determined (see also marginal no. 10 below on the advisory committee), not least since paragraph 4(a) in fine requires States Parties to explain how nominees meet the respective criteria. Neither the Statute nor the Rules or Regulations provide any further explanations¹⁵. The distinction between criminal practice experience and competence in international law continues to be unhelpful in this context. Even after over 20 years of modern international criminal justice since the inception of the ICTY, a domestic criminal judge can learn most of what needs to be known about the development of international humanitarian/criminal law in an intensive short course and fill any remaining lacunae by reading the relevant materials in preparation of an individual case¹⁶. However, 20 years of criminal judicial and case management

¹⁴ It is, however, noticeable that in the recent practice of nominations to the international judiciary, emphasis is de facto increasingly placed on judicial experience as the main controlling aspect for selection, a development which is to be welcomed. See also for a critique Ambos, (2012) 23 CLF 223.

¹⁵ Other commentaries on the ICC Statute are silent on the matter: Jones, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court - A Commentary, Vol. I, (2002) 242. - Ingadottir, The International Criminal Court: Recommendations on Policy and Practice (2003) at 153-155 gives a slightly more detailed picture but nothing expounding on the substance of the qualifications. Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 530 et seq. does not expand on the matter, either, but states (at 530) that 'the concerns of most delegations were ensuring geographic representation and experience from the major legal systems rather than the professionalism of the individuals making up the Court'.

¹⁶ Similarly, Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 532 finds that the experience of international criminal tribunals has shown that international law questions were much less frequently relevant than the emphasis in the negotiation stages may have suggested.

experience can only be gained through undergoing 20 years of criminal judicial and case management experience. Countries with career judiciaries usually assign new judges to dockets where their lack of experience will do the least damage, or place them in collegiate panels where they can learn from more experienced colleagues. Countries without a career judiciary require a certain minimum professional experience in the law before they appoint to the bench, although the picture is more blurred there¹⁷. This sensible approach should not be abandoned merely because the post is outside the national judiciary; it is moreover doubtful whether any State Party would favour such an approach in its own national judiciary. It seems particularly questionable when candidates without any prior experience as a judge, prosecutor or defence counsel in national or international trials are immediately appointed to an influential Appeals Chamber seat, as happened with one particular example at the ICTY.¹⁸

In October 2011, the International Bar Association's Human Rights Institute passed a resolution on the Values Pertaining to Judicial Appointments to International Courts and Tribunals¹⁹ which under No. 3 stresses the cumulative criterion of professional experience²⁰.

The question of command of languages has been another issue at all tribunals and courts established after 1993. While all judges have a command of either English or French, one finds that English is by far the most common language spoken by judges. Recent research on all 35 ICC judges who took office since 2002 has shown that all 35 spoke English, yet a mere 22 spoke French. Overall, English made up for 37.6 % of all the languages represented among the judiciary and was at the same time the only language which achieved 100 % coverage across the entire judiciary. French accounted for 23.7 %, Spanish for 8.6 %, German for 7.5 %, Russian for 4.3 %, Italian for 3.2 %, Dutch, Japanese and Kiswahili for 2.2 % each and the remaining 14 native languages (1.1 % each) for 15.4 %. English was thus more than twice as frequent as the 14 languages represented only once each, it accounted for more than the sum of all other multiple languages except French. English and French together were roughly double the percentage of the other multiple languages and still about 15 % above the sum of all other languages²¹. A previous study of ICTY judges disclosed a difference in multiple language capacity between judges from common law backgrounds on the one hand and civil law backgrounds on the other, with the latter on average being the more polyglot of the two²².

While the requirement of speaking one of the working languages²³ is primarily meant simply to ensure ease of internal communication between the judges and their staff (as well

¹⁷ See Bohlander, in: id. (ed.), International Criminal Justice – A Critical Analysis of Institutions and Procedures (2007) at 357–362.

¹⁸ See ICTY press release of Friday, 23 November 2001 – CVO/P.I.S./639e. – Every appellate judge should have undergone sufficient trial experience, not least in order to avoid unrealistic expectations towards the trial judges on whose decisions the judge is to rule on appeal.

¹⁹ Online at www.ibanet.org/article/Detail.aspx?articleUid=CA79763C-39CC-4B54-8174-DD247A894150 which also contains a link to the background paper.

²⁰ In an email of 18 November 2009 to the author (on file), former UN Legal Counsel Hans Corell provided the following view on the selection criteria for trial and appellate judges in general: 'My own view on who should be elected judge of an international criminal court is very clearly expressed in the Proposal for an International War Crimes Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia by the Rapporteurs (Corell-Türk-Thune) under the CSCE Moscow Human Dimension Mechanism to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia of 9 February 1993. Needless to say, as former judge in my own country I feel very strongly about this. In our proposal we made a clear distinction between judges to be elected to serve on the Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal.' – The relevant articles in that proposal are 7(3) and 18(3). The full text can be found at www.havc.se/res/SelectedMaterial/19930209csceproposalwarcrimtribunal.pdf.

²¹ Bohlander (2014) JICJ 491.

²² Bohlander and Findlay (2002) 1 The Global Community: Yearbook of International Law and Jurisprudence 3.

²³ Interestingly, this is one of the areas where the Advisory Committee on nominations (ACN – see below at marginal no. 10) may have a salutary effect, especially when it comes to testing the breadth of a candidate's command of legal terminology. See e.g. the 2nd Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its second meeting of 29 October 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/47) (online at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ICC-ASP-12-47-ENG.pdf) p. 6 para 18, where the ACN stated with regard to one of the

as to some extent with the parties' representatives), it is undeniable that factual language preponderance will also have an impact on source access and collation in the context of the comparative research that is still necessary even at the ICC. This aspect of the judges' language command (and that of their legal assistants) has so far been under-researched. Neither the Statute, nor the Rules or Regulations make provision for ensuring that a sufficiently broad reservoir of languages exists in the working and in particular the research environment of the Court.

- 8 The age of the nominees was a contentious issue²⁴ for international criminal tribunals from the beginning but was never held to be an essential criterion. The Appeal Judgment of 20 February 2001 in Prosecutor v Delalić et al. set out the reasoning for the ICTY:

'The intention of article 13 must [] be to ensure [] that the essential qualifications do not differ from judge to judge. Those essential qualifications are character (encompassing impartiality and integrity), legal qualifications (as required for appointment to the highest judicial office) and experience (in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law). Article 13 was not intended to include every local qualification for the highest judicial office such as nationality by birth or religion, or disqualification for such high judicial office such as age. Nor was article 13 intended to include constitutional disqualifications peculiar to any particular country for reasons unrelated to those essential qualifications.'²⁵

In the challenge of Judge Baird's nomination by Radovan Karadzic, a three judge panel decided on 20 October 2009²⁶ that the motion based on the judge's age was unfounded:

'It is plain that the Statute does not limit the ability of Judges to serve at the Tribunal by virtue of age, nor does the Bench find any reason to read such a requirement into article 13. Indeed, a clear distinction must be drawn between the qualifications referred to in article 13 and technical requirements for judicial office. In particular, the qualities a person must possess to be trusted with the highest judicial offices in his or her country is a separate matter from the restrictions local legislation may impose with respect to the age until which a person may hold such office. Accordingly, the Bench finds the Motion to be without merit'²⁷.

For the ICC, the debate about the issue is evident from the history of article 36 ICCS, which was previously Draft article 37. Subsection 9 of the 1998 Preparatory Committee version reads:

'A judge may not be over the age of 65 at the time of election'²⁸.

Article 30(6) of the previous 1996 Zutphen Draft had read under 4.:

'A judge may not be over the age of [61] [66] [65] [?] at the time of nomination. Judges shall retire at the age of [70] [75]'²⁹.

Similar references to age limits (appointment or retirement) can be found in the 1996 statements of some delegations of the Preparatory Committee, namely Algeria, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Jordan, Kuwait, Libya, Qatar and Singapore³⁰. The discussions at the candidates: 'The Committee questioned whether the candidate's oral proficiency in English, one of the working languages of the Court, while sufficient for the purposes of the interview, met the high standard prescribed under article 36, paragraph 3(c), of the Rome Statute. The candidate told the Committee that his proficiency in French, the other working language of the Court, was limited.' The candidate concerned was withdrawn by the nominating State Party on 21 Nov. 2013: 'Election of a judge to fill a judicial vacancy of the International Criminal Court – Addendum – Withdrawal of candidature' (ICC-ASP/12/45/Add.1-Eng), available online at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ICC-ASP-12-45-Add.1-ENG.pdf.

²⁴ See Bohlander (2010) 1 IndianYbIL&Pol 327.

²⁵ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Judgement, Case No. IT-976-21-A, of 20 February 2001 at para. 659. – Emphasis in the original.

²⁶ Prosecutor v Radovan Karadžić, Decision on motion to recuse Judge Baird and report to Judge Güney, Case No. IT-95-0518-PT, 20 October 2009.

²⁷ Ibid., at para 21.

²⁸ Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, Vol.2, (2005) 257.

²⁹ Ibid., 259.

³⁰ Ibid., 259–264.

1998 Diplomatic Conference about subsection 9 of then article 37 showed a mixed picture. The following table shows countries opting for an age limit and those against it.

Age limits at the 1998 Diplomatic Conference³¹,

For age limit:

Finland (214), Oman (218), Brunei Darussalam (220), Iraq (220), Mozambique³² (221), Algeria (221)

Against age limit:

Syria (209) Japan (210), Venezuela (210), Turkey (211), Qatar³³ (212), Senegal (213), Togo³⁴ (217), Chile (216), Kuwait (219)

Why the subsection was finally deleted in article 36 ICCS is unclear³⁵.

III. Paragraph 4: Nomination procedure; Advisory Committee (ACN)

The nomination procedure is set out³⁶ in paragraph 4 and largely self-explanatory. The reference in paragraph 4(a)(ii) to the procedure for nominating candidates to the ICJ is to article 4 of the ICJ Statute.

Paragraph 4(c) empowers the ASP to establish an Advisory Committee on nominations (ACN). This committee was created only during the 11th session of the ASP from 14–22 Nov. 2012, over ten years after the coming into force of the Rome Statute³⁷. The report of the working group on the ACN³⁸ is remarkable firstly insofar as it requested the Bureau and the President of the ASP to discourage States Parties from campaigning for candidates for the ACN³⁹, and secondly, in that it put the two principal terms of reference given to it by the ASP, geographical representation, principal legal systems and gender diversity on the one hand and ‘established competence and experience in criminal or international law’ on the other, in a clear selection hierarchy: Only candidates who fulfilled the second criterion could then be scrutinised under the first⁴⁰. The Working Group concluded that ‘it would be important to have a balance between experts in international criminal law and public international law; between persons with a civil law and a common law background; between persons with academic, judicial and diplomatic backgrounds; and, insofar as possible given ³¹ Numbers refer to pages in Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, Vol.3, (2005) – Table reproduced from Bohlander (2010) 1 IndianYb/L&Pol 333.

³² Mozambique supported ‘an age limit of 65 to encourage participation by younger people.’

³³ Qatar made the condition ‘provided a judge was in good health at the time’.

³⁴ Togo tied this to a term of office of five years, stating that ‘Age would then not be a problem.’

³⁵ In an email of 12 November 2009 to the author, M Cherif Bassiouni stated: ‘I do remember this discussion but in the end there was no strong opinion in favor of an age limitation.’ Similarly, Hans Corell wrote on 10 November 2009: ‘In the cases where I had some influence myself, that is to say when I interviewed candidates to discuss with the Secretary-General for special courts, read the Special Court for Sierra Leone, I could of course consider this issue. However, when judges are proposed by countries directly for a vote by an assembly of States it is more difficult’. – Both emails are on file with the author. Rwelamira, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – The making of the Rome Statute (1999) 157 cites only the age of 65 and states that the idea was dropped because of lack of a coherent national or international practice.

³⁶ See also the supplementary resolutions by the Assembly of States Parties: Resolution ICC-ASP/1/Res.2, ‘Procedure for the nomination and election of judges, the Prosecutor and Deputy Prosecutors of the International Criminal Court’ and Resolution ICC-ASP/1/Res.3, ‘Procedure for the election of the judges for the International Criminal Court’, both of 9 Sep. 2002, ICC-ASP/3/Res.6 ‘Procedure for the nomination and election of judges of the International Criminal Court’, of 10 Sep 2004 and Resolution ICC-ASP/5/Res.5 ‘Procedure for the nomination and election of judges, the Prosecutor and Deputy Prosecutors of the International Criminal Court: amendment to operative paragraph 27 of resolution ICC-ASP/3/Res.6’, of 1 Feb. 2007 – all resolutions are available online at www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/resolutions/categoricallist/Pages/default.aspx under ‘Elections’.

³⁷ See http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/elections/advisorycommitteenominations/Pages/election%20acn-%202012.aspx.

³⁸ Report of the Bureau Working Group on the Advisory Committee on Nominations (ICC-ASP/11/47) Online at www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP11/ICC-ASP-11-47-ENG.pdf.

³⁹ Ibid., at para 10.

⁴⁰ Ibid., at paras. 7–8.

the status of nominations, between both genders⁴¹. It also expressed its concern that it ‘was keenly conscious of the fact that some of the criteria contained in paragraph 2 of the terms of reference were difficult to assess and therefore subjective in nature. It was noted, for example, that it would be difficult to make a comparative assessment of candidates’ eminence, once a certain threshold was crossed, or to compare the eminence of individuals with different professional backgrounds’⁴². The ACN itself has in the meantime recommended ‘suggested guidelines for the presentation of candidates for election as judge of the International Criminal Court’⁴³; the ICC website now contains a model CV which nominating States Parties are encouraged to use⁴⁴.

IV. Paragraphs 5 to 8 – Election procedure; gender balance

- 11 The election procedure follows the intricate and technical regulations in paragraphs 5 to 8. They have in practice been supplemented by detailed instructions from the Bureau of the ASP on the actual voting process⁴⁵.
- 12 Since the Statute expressly uses the terms ‘male’ and ‘female’ in paragraph 8(3) without any reference to the phrase ‘within their context in society’ as in article 7(3), it would seem that the reference here is only to the biological sex and it may therefore be questionable under the current law to require employing a wider gender-related interpretation in this context. The related discussion about the meaning of the term ‘gender’ in the context of article 7(3) and the debate about sexual orientation would prima facie appear to be irrelevant with regard to judicial elections⁴⁶. The voting record of the ASP in this context is, however, so far not indicative of any discernible bias in any event: Judge Adrian Fulford from the UK, who has always been open about his homosexuality, was classified simply as ‘male’ and was elected for a term of nine years in the first election in Feb. 2003⁴⁷, in the 9th round with two votes more (59) than the two-third majority required (57 out of 85)⁴⁸. In the other rounds, other judges were elected with 56 to 65 votes, but mostly with fewer than 60⁴⁹; voting went into 33 rounds at the time, so he seems to have been either uncontroversial or it may have simply been the numerical relation between the majority who had no such concerns, and the critical minority.

⁴¹ Ibid., at para 15.

⁴² Ibid., at para 12.

⁴³ Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its second meeting, of 29 Oct. 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/47) (online at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ICC-ASP-12-47-ENG.pdf) at p. 8.

⁴⁴ Online at www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Elections/EJ2014/FORM-Judges-CV-ENG.doc.

⁴⁵ See the guidance for the 2014 elections at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP13/ICC-ASP-NV-13-SP-06-ENG.pdf, and Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2010) 532.

⁴⁶ Yet, despite the fact that such a case may appear academic at the moment, even this restrictive interpretation of the Statute could on the face of it include judicial candidates who have undergone a sex change operation. That such cases and hence the potential for candidates are not unimaginable at the highest courts of a country is evidenced by the recent sex change of Jürgen Schmidt-Räntsch, now called Johanna Schmidt-Räntsch, a judge at the German Federal Court of Justice; see www.welt.de/politik/deutschland/article129468131/Bundesrichter-laesst-sich-zur-Frau-umwandeln.html and www.ito.de/recht/nachrichten/n/bgh-richter-schmidt-raentsch-geschlechtsumwandlung/ (links courtesy of Stephan Glantz). Obviously, nothing stops the ASP from taking sexual orientation as part of the commitment to gender diversity in general into account in elections. Given the reluctance of a large minority of states to countenance, leave alone respect, sexual orientation and LGBT rights in general with regard to article 7(3), it is unclear whether this would currently be acceptable to them in the nomination and election context. See for that debate Bohlander, M, Criminalising LGBT persons under national criminal law and article 7(1)(h) and (3) of the ICC Statute (2014) Global Policy 401.

⁴⁷ See <http://legal.un.org/icc/elections/judges/fulford/fulford.htm>.

⁴⁸ Official Records, Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session (first and second resumptions), New York, 3–7 Feb. And 21–23 Apr. 2003 (ICC-ASP/1/3/Add.1); available online at <http://daccess-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N03/341/37/PDF/N0334137.pdf>.

⁴⁹ Ibid., at paras. 15–26. The 56-vote elections were due to two invalid votes in the respective round.

V. Paragraphs 9 and 10: Term of office; continuation in office

Paragraph 9(b) and (c) are now obsolete, as they refer to the first election; all judges eligible at the time went into their second term, if they were re-elected⁵⁰. The 1994 ILC Draft Statute provided for a term of 12 years, which, however, met with opposition and was reduced to nine years, in line with the term of the judges of the International Court of Justice. Lots were drawn at the first election to determine who would receive a term of three or six years⁵¹. 13

ICC Reg. 9(1) states that '[t]he term of office of judges shall commence on the eleventh of March following the date of their election', which followed from the determination made by the ASP at the 6th meeting on 3 February 2003: '[T]he Assembly, on the recommendation of the Bureau, decided that the terms of office of judges ... elected by the Assembly shall begin to run as from the 11 March following the date of the election. The Assembly also decided that the term of office of a judge elected⁵² to replace a judge whose term of office has not expired shall run from the date of the election for the remainder of that term⁵³. The latter was then enshrined in ICC Reg. 9(2).

Paragraph 10 allows judges who have part-heard a case to continue in office until the termination of the proceedings in which they have been involved, a procedure that makes sense pragmatically and is actually required by the principle that only those judges may decide a case who have seen and heard all the evidence. This can lead to quite dramatic extensions, as, for example, in the case of Judge Blattman, who sat on the Trial Chamber in the Lubanga case. Judge Blattman had been elected in Feb. 2003 and his term of office, beginning on 11 Mar. 2003, had been decided by lot as running for six years; he was thus not eligible for re-election. This meant that he should have stepped down on 10 Mar. 2009. Judges Fulford and Odio-Benito had been elected for nine years and should have stepped down on 10 Mar. 2012. However, they were still sitting on 7 Aug. 2012 in the decision on reparation proceedings⁵⁴ when the Chamber decided that the present judges no longer needed to remain seized of overseeing the reparation proceedings managed by the Trust Fund for Victims, and that a differently constituted Chamber could perform that task⁵⁵. 14

⁵⁰ See for the election history until 2013 the overview at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Elections/ICC-Election-Judges-History-July-2013-ENG.pdf.

⁵¹ Ibid. (fn. 47) at paras. 27–30.

⁵² Pursuant to article 37.

⁵³ Ibid. (fn. 47), at para 31.

⁵⁴ Prosecutor v Lubanga Dyilo, Case No. ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations, of 7 August 2012, available online at www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc1447971.pdf.

⁵⁵ Ibid. At paras. 260–261.

Article 37 Judicial vacancies*

1. In the event of a vacancy, an election shall be held in accordance with article 36 to fill the vacancy.

2. A judge elected to fill a vacancy shall serve for the remainder of the predecessor's term and, if that period is three years or less, shall be eligible for re-election for a full term under article 36.

Literature: Bellelli, R., 'The law of the Statute and its practice under review', in: R. Bellelli (ed.), International Criminal Justice, Law and Practice from the Rome Statute to its Review (Ashgate 2010) 410–415; Jones, J. R. W. D., 'Composition of the Court', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J. R. W. D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, I (OUP 2002) 235–267, Rwelamira, M. R., 'Composition and Administration of the Court', in: R. S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues Negotiations, Results (Kluwer Law International 1999) 153–167; Schabas, W., 'Article 35. Service of Judges', in: W. Schabas (ed.), The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 520–523; Liera, S. F., 'Single Judge, Replacements, and Alternate Judges', in: R.S. Lee (ed.) The International Criminal Court, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 310–314.

Content

A. Introduction.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation	2
I. Paragraph 1 – Elections to fill judicial vacancies	2
1. The advent of a vacancy.....	2
2. The procedure for filling a vacancy	6
3. The practice of the Court	10
II. Paragraph 2 – Judges elected to fill vacancies.....	13
1. Judicial replacements	13
2. The terms of office of judges filling vacancies	16

A. Introduction

1 Article 37 of the Rome Statute lays out the procedure to be followed where a seat in the judiciary of the Court is vacated by the death, resignation or removal from office of a judge or where a judge does not make his or her solemn undertaking within a given time-frame. This provision seeks to ensure that unfilled judicial vacancies do not put a strain on the capacity of the Court to administer justice in an expeditious manner and has been applied in several instances. In terms of its drafting history, article 37 of the Statute has largely remained the same since the first draft of the Statute prepared by the International Law Commission, and throughout the Preparatory Committee phase and the Diplomatic Conference in Rome.

B. Analysis and interpretation

I. Paragraph 1 – Elections to fill judicial vacancies

1. The advent of a vacancy

2 Paragraph 1 provides that in the event of a vacancy in the judiciary of the Court, an election shall be held in accordance with article 36 of the Statute. Article 36 in turn sets out the qualifications required of judges of the Court and the process for judicial nominations and elections. Whereas the expiration of the term of office of a judge technically leads to a judicial vacancy, an election to replace a judge whose tenure has ended does not fall within the purview of article 37 of the Statute. Those elections are conducted within the regular cycle of judicial elections to the Court, which take place every three years in accordance with article 36(9) of the Statute. Instead, a judicial vacancy in accordance with article 37 arises where the mandate of a judge comes to an end prematurely, before the expiry of the judge's term of office. This may be triggered by the death of a judge as provided for in rule 36 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ('Rules'); the resignation of a judge from the Court (due to illness or other reasons) as provided for in rule 37 of the Rules; or the removal from office of a judge for serious misconduct, serious breach of duty¹ or the inability to exercise the functions required by the Statute, in accordance with article 46(1) of the Statute.²

* The views expressed herein are those of the author alone and not of the International Criminal Court.

Furthermore, by virtue of an amendment to the Procedure for the Nomination and Election of judges of the International Criminal Court ('Election Procedure'),³ adopted by resolution of the Assembly of States Parties ('ASP') at its twelfth session in November 2013, a judicial vacancy will be declared in accordance with article 37 of the Statute if an elected judge fails to assume his or her duties to the Court by making his or her solemn undertaking, in accordance with article 45 of the Statute,⁴ within six months of election, leading to new elections.⁵ The amendment was adopted to ensure the efficient functioning of the Court, given that elected judges who have not been sworn in pursuant to article 45 of the Statute are ineligible to take up their duties and be called by the Presidency of the Court⁶ to serve on a full-time basis in accordance with article 35(3) of the Statute. It seeks to ensure that the Court is not deprived of a judge for a potential period of nine years (the term of office of a judge in accordance with article 36(9)(a)) if a Judge-elect⁷ refuses to take the oath of office⁸ and was adopted in response to the concrete situation arising from the decision of a judge elected at the tenth session of the ASP in December 2011, whose term of office began on 10 March 2012, to defer making her

¹ Serious misconduct and serious breach of duty are defined in rule 24 of the Rules. For further provisions on removal from office and disciplinary measures, see generally articles 46 and 47 of the Statute, rules 23–32 of the Rules and regulations 119–125 of the Regulations of the Court.

² The procedure for filling judicial vacancies in the Court by way of an election by the ASP should not be confused with the procedure set out in rule 38 of the Rules and regulation 15 of the Regulations of the Court which deals with the replacement of judges within a Chamber by the Presidency, for example in cases of resignation, accepted excuse, disqualification, removal from office or death.

³ As set out in Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Third session, 6–10 September 2004 (ICC-ASP/3/25), Part III, ICC-ASP/3/Res.6. As amended by resolutions ICC-ASP/5/Res.5 (contained in Official Records, Fifth session (resumption) 29 January – 1 February 2007 (ICC-ASP/5/35), Part II), ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, Annex II (contained in Official Records, Twelfth session, 20–28 November 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol I, Part III) and ICC-ASP/13/Res.5, Annex II (contained in Official Records, Thirteenth session, 8–17 December 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part III).

⁴ See rule 5 of the Rules, setting out the text of the solemn undertaking and the procedure to be followed in relation thereto.

⁵ Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC-ASP/12/Res.8 (paragraph 29), Annex II. By virtue of Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, the Election Procedure now provides (at paragraph 27*bis*) that: 'A judicial vacancy will be declared in accordance with article 37 of the Rome Statute if an elected judge does not make his or her solemn undertaking in accordance with article 45 of the Rome Statute within six months of his or her election.'

⁶ Pursuant to article 34(a) of the Statute, the Presidency is an organ of the Court, which is composed of three judges elected from amongst their peers, in accordance with article 38 of the Statute, to serve as President, First-Vice President and Second Vice-President, for a renewable three-year term, and is responsible for the proper administration of the Court (with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor) and other functions conferred upon it in accordance with the Statute.

⁷ 'Judge-elect' refers to an incoming judge who has been elected to the Court by the ASP but who has not yet made his or her solemn undertaking in accordance with article 45 of the Statute.

⁸ Report to the Bureau on the review of the procedure for the nomination and election of judges, 15 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/57, Annex III (Proposals submitted by Belgium regarding the procedure for election of judges, paragraph 3).

solemn undertaking for over two years, until her resignation from the Court in June 2014, effectively preventing the Presidency from calling her to full-time service.⁹

- 4 Although the aforementioned amendment encourages judges to safeguard their elected positions and prevent them from lapsing by making their solemn undertaking within six months, it would not remedy a situation where a judge is sworn in within the given time-frame but still defers taking up his or her duties when called to serve on a full-time basis by the Presidency, and there is no obviously satisfactory answer as to what the Court could do to resolve this. In such cases, reference may be had to the approaches proposed by the Bureau of the ASP ('Bureau')¹⁰ in the situation of Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago to whom the amendment did not apply in accordance with the principle of non-retroactivity (having been adopted subsequent to her election).¹¹ In those circumstances, the Bureau suggested that 'measures such as administrative or persuasion could be undertaken to resolve the matter'.¹² The Bureau did not explain itself further but, given its responsibility for the proper administration of the Court,¹³ it would be expected that such persuasion exercised upon a judge, in those circumstances either to relinquish office and thus create a judicial vacancy or to make his or her solemn undertaking and be called to serve the Court full-time, would fall to be undertaken by the Presidency. It is equally anticipated that similar persuasive measures could be employed by the Presidency to motivate a judge who has made his or her solemn undertaking but deferred full-time service, to either serve the Court full-time or relinquish office.
- 5 Moreover, it has been suggested that such a situation falls within the disciplinary realm,¹⁴ which would, evidently, depend on the legitimacy of the reasons given for such a deferral of full-time service, i. e. whether it is a case of unwillingness or inability for justifiable reasons. Turning to the potentially relevant disciplinary regime, without commenting on its applicability, the Statute and Rules provide for the disciplinary measures of a reprimand¹⁵ or pecuniary sanction¹⁶ to be imposed upon an elected official¹⁷ who is deemed to have committed misconduct of a less serious nature,¹⁸ such as repeatedly failing to comply with or ignoring requests made, inter alia, by the Presidency in the exercise of its lawful authority.¹⁹ Furthermore, for more drastic measures, there is provision in article 46(1)(a) of the Statute for an elected official of the Court to be removed from office for a serious breach of duty, which in accordance with rule 24(2) of the Rules, may occur in the case of gross negligence in the performance of duties or knowingly acting in contravention of those duties,

⁹ Referring to Judge-elect Senator Miriam Defensor-Santiago (The Philippines) (mn 11). The five other judges elected at the same session of the ASP in December 2011, made their solemn undertaking on 9 March 2012, ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20120308-MA120, 8 March 2012.

¹⁰ In accordance with article 112(3) of the Statute, the Bureau of the ASP has a representative character. It consists of a President, two Vice-Presidents and eighteen members elected by the ASP for three-year terms and meets at least once a year to assist the ASP in the discharge of its responsibilities. In practice, the Bureau meets regularly throughout the year.

¹¹ See Note to Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.8 (cited at note 5).

¹² Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Twentieth meeting, 28 November 2013, paragraph 3 b.

¹³ In accordance with article 38(3)(a) of the Statute, see note 6.

¹⁴ Report to the Bureau on the review of the procedure for the nomination and election of judges, 15 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/57, paragraph 18. The 'administrative measures' proposed by the Bureau in relation to Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago (see note 12) could also be taken to refer to disciplinary measures.

¹⁵ Rule 32(a) of the Rules.

¹⁶ Rule 32(b) of the Rules. In such a case, the pecuniary sanction could be levied against the allowance paid to a non-full time judge pursuant to articles 35(4) and 49 of the Statute. This allowance is only payable to judges who have made their solemn undertaking pursuant to article 45 of the Statute (see Official Records, Eleventh session, 14–22 November 2012 (ICC-ASP/11/20), Vol II, Part A, Proposed Programme Budget for 2013, footnote 39 to paragraph 89 and Annex V(c); Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol II, Part A, Proposed Programme Budget for 2014, footnote 31 to paragraph 70 and Annex V(c)).

¹⁷ An 'elected official' refers to either a judge, the Prosecutor, Deputy Prosecutor, Registrar or Deputy Registrar of the Court.

¹⁸ Article 47 of the Statute and rule 25 of the Rules.

¹⁹ Rule 25(1)(a)(ii) of the Rules.

including repeatedly causing unwarranted delay in the initiation, prosecution or trial of cases, or in the exercise of judicial powers.²⁰ Moreover, there is provision in article 46(1)(b) of the Statute for an elected official to be removed from office where he or she ‘[i]s unable to exercise the functions required by th[e] Statute’. Whilst, the drafting history of the latter provision suggests that the aforementioned inability to exercise functions was, at least initially, contemplated as being attributable to long-term illness or disability,²¹ the provision was not subject to further elaboration in the Rules, and, as the text stands, a judge could be potentially liable to removal from office pursuant to article 46(1)(b) of the Statute for reasons additional to the aforementioned health reasons.

2. The procedure for filling a vacancy

Article 37 of the Statute does not elaborate upon the procedure for conducting elections to fill judicial vacancies, other than stipulating that such elections shall take place in accordance with article 36 of the Statute. Nor does it regulate the timing of such elections, contrary to the procedure in article 36(2)(c)(i) of the Statute for example, which provides that the election of additional judges to the Court shall take place at the next election of the ASP once a proposal for an increase in the number of judges has been adopted.

In practice, the Presidency initiates the process of filling a judicial vacancy by notifying the President of the Bureau of the ASP of the death or resignation of a judge, in accordance with rules 36 and 37 of the Rules.²² The Election Procedure adopted by the ASP further elucidates the process to be followed. It maintains that ‘[w]ithin one month of the occurrence of the judicial vacancy, the Bureau of the ASP shall fix the venue and date of the election, which should not be later than 20 weeks after the occurrence of the vacancy unless the Bureau decides otherwise after consulting the Court’.²³ As such, notwithstanding the terms of article 37(1) of the Statute, it is not mandatory to fill an open judicial vacancy, given that the Bureau may decide to defer filling the vacancy pursuant to the Election Procedure, in consultation with the Court.

Those consultations with the Court are conducted through the Presidency which, in accordance with article 38(3)(a) of the Statute, is responsible for its proper administration and, as such, has a good overview of, and is best placed to assess, the workload, needs and functionality of the judiciary. Significantly, the Election Procedure gives the Presidency the opportunity to shape the decisions of the Bureau and leaves the latter a wide discretion to decide: whether the vacancy shall be filled either during the remainder of the term of office of ²⁰ Rule 24(2)(b) of the Rules.

²¹ The 1994 Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court prepared by the International Law Commission (‘1994 ILC Draft Statute’), provided, at article 15(1): ‘A judge, the Prosecutor or other officer of the Court who is [...] unable to exercise the functions required by this Statute because of long-term illness or disability, shall cease to hold office’ (Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994 (A/49/10)). Article 47 of the 1998 Preparatory Committee Statute for the International Criminal Court (‘1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute’), on the other hand, referred only to the inability to exercise the functions of the Statute, omitting any reasons therefor. Furthermore, in footnote 135 to the draft provision, long-term illnesses or disability were referred to as examples of reasons for the inability to exercise functions (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Official Records, Volume III, A/CONF.183/13(Vol. III), Part I, B, Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, article 47).

²² In accordance with rule 37(1), a judge notifies the Presidency in writing of his or her decision to resign. This has been the case in all resignations save for that of Judge-elect Shahabuddeen who wrote directly to ASP President (see note 30). Judges are encouraged to give at least six months’ notice and make every effort to discharge their outstanding responsibilities before resigning, pursuant to rule 37(2) of the Rules. However, this is not mandatory and resignations may be given at short notice.

²³ Election Procedure, paragraph 27(a). The current provision is the result of an amendment which entitles the Bureau to disregard the rule that the venue and date of the election shall be fixed within one month of the occurrence of the judicial vacancy and shall not in any case take place later than 20 weeks after the occurrence of the vacancy. This amendment was effected by resolution of the ASP through the addition of the words ‘unless the Bureau decides otherwise after consulting the Court’ (Official Records, Fifth session (resumption) 2007 (ICC-ASP/5/35), Part II, ICC-ASP/5/Res.5).

the judge concerned or after the expiry of that term of office, within the regular election cycle;²⁴ and, further, if it is to be filled during the remainder of the predecessor judge's term, by what means the vacancy shall be filled (i. e. during an election held at a scheduled session of the ASP or an election held at a resumed session of the ASP convened for that purpose in accordance with article 112(6) of the Statute).

- 9 The relevant considerations in deciding whether, and how, to hold such an election are: the duration of the remaining term of office of the predecessor judge; the urgency of filling the vacancy contingent on the needs of the Court; the financial implications of convening fresh elections, particularly if an election to fill a vacancy cannot be accommodated within the scheduled sessions of the ASP, thereby necessitating a resumed session; the need to allow States Parties sufficient time to identify and nominate qualified candidates;²⁵ the need to allow the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges of the International Criminal Court (mandated to facilitate the appointment of the highest-qualified individuals as judges of the Court, ('Advisory Committee')),²⁶ sufficient time to assess the judicial candidates prior to election;²⁷ and, the stipulation that the number of judges of the Court shall not be reduced below eighteen in accordance with articles 36(1) and 36(2)(c)(ii) of the Statute. However, the latter condition has not, in practice, been of relevance where a vacancy has been open for a relatively short period of time or where the requisite number of judges has been satisfied by the extension of the terms of judges for the purpose of completing any trial or appeal the hearing of which has already commenced, in accordance with article 36(10) of the Statute.²⁸

²⁴ Regular elections refer to the scheduled elections of the ASP to elect judges to the Court, which take place every three years in accordance with article 36(9) of the Statute.

²⁵ It is noteworthy that the period within which States Parties may nominate judicial candidates is considerably shorter for elections to fill judicial vacancies in comparison to the nomination period in regular elections due to the presumed urgency of filling the vacant judicial seat. Both nomination periods have been subject to extension by six weeks to allow the Advisory Committee sufficient time to review nominated candidates, taking into account the fact that the nomination periods may be extended several times before an election (see Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Seventh meeting, 15 August 2014, paragraph 1(a) and Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Annex II Oral Report of the Bureau, paragraph 17). In the case of regular vacancies, the nomination period opens 32 weeks before the elections and lasts for 12 weeks, having been extended from 26 weeks by resolution of the ASP adopted at its twelfth session in 2013 (see note 3). On the other hand, in elections to fill judicial vacancies, the nomination period opens 18 weeks before the elections and lasts for 6 weeks, having been extended from 12 weeks by resolution of the ASP adopted at its thirteenth session in 2014 (see note 3).

²⁶ The Advisory Committee, a subsidiary body of the ASP in accordance with article 36(4)(c) of the Statute, was established by resolution of the ASP at its tenth session in December 2011 (Official Records, Tenth session, 12–21 December 2011 (ICC-ASP/10/20), Vol I, Part III, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, paragraph 19) with the mandate of facilitating the appointment of the highest-qualified individuals as judges of the Court (see paragraph 5 of the Terms of Reference of the Advisory Committee set out in Report of the Bureau on the establishment of an Advisory Committee on nominations of judges of the International Criminal Court, 30 November 2011, ICC-ASP/10/36 ('Advisory Committee Terms of Reference')). The Advisory Committee is mandated to prepare information and analysis, of a technical nature, on the suitability of the judicial candidates in order to inform the decision making of States Parties in the election process (see paragraphs 9, 11 and 12 of the Advisory Committee Terms of Reference, ICC-ASP/10/36). In examining the scope of its mandate, the Advisory Committee has stated that it is 'required to advise States on whether or not, in its opinion, the candidates meet the requirements of article 36 [of the Statute], taking into account the specific qualifications required under Lists A and B as provided in that article.' See Report of the Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges on the work of its fourth meeting, 24 April 2015, ICC-ASP/13/46, paragraph 18. The Advisory Committee evaluates the candidates by conducting interviews with regard to their qualifications before preparing its report to the ASP. The President of the Bureau of the ASP has expressed the hope that States Parties would be guided by the conclusions of the reports of the Advisory Committee in casting their votes during judicial elections (Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Ninth meeting, 30 September 2014, paragraph 3(a)).

²⁷ For example, following the resignation of Judge-elect Shahabuddeen (Guyana) in February 2009, the President of the Court informed the President of the ASP in March 2009 that the Court wished his seat to be filled as soon as possible. The Bureau decided not to convene a special session prior to the eighth session of the ASP scheduled for November 2009 in order to avoid the ensuing additional costs and to provide States Parties with sufficient time to identify and nominate highly qualified candidates. Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Seventh Meeting, 7 April 2009, paragraph 1. ICC Press Release, ICC-ASP-20090218-PR391, 18 February 2009.

²⁸ See Report of the Bureau on Salary and all allowances for judges, whose terms have been extended in accordance with article 36, paragraph 10, 9 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/56, noting at paragraph 6 that the

3. The practice of the Court

As at November 2015, there have been four elections held pursuant to article 37 of the Statute to fill seven judicial vacancies before the Court. The first was held at the sixth session of the ASP in November/December 2007 to fill three judicial vacancies.²⁹ The second was held at the eighth session of the ASP in November 2009 to fill two judicial vacancies³⁰ and the third election pursuant to article 37 of the Statute was held at the twelfth session of the ASP in November 2013 to fill one judicial vacancy.³¹

The fourth election pursuant to article 37 of the Statute proved more complicated. It was held at the resumed thirteenth session of the ASP in June 2015 to fill the judicial vacancy arising from the resignation of Judge-elect Senator Miriam Defensor-Santiago (The Philippines) for medical reasons in June 2014.³² The modalities for conducting an election to fill this vacancy at the time it arose in June 2014 were initially complicated by the scheduled regular election of six judges to the Court at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014. The Bureau had concerns regarding the possible ramifications that filling the vacancy might have on the regular election, bearing in mind the legal framework for judicial elections established in the Rome Statute and in the Election Procedure of the ASP, notably the proscription in article 36(7) of the Statute that no two judges of the Court may be nationals of the same State, as well as the lack of clarity over the procedure for concurrent nominations to both regular and special elections at the same ASP session by the same State Party.³³ The Bureau furthermore sought to ensure that the Advisory Committee had sufficient time to evaluate all the candidates nominated to fill the judicial vacancy³⁴ and weighed the budgetary implications of convening a resumed session solely to conduct the article 37 election.³⁵

Presidency has underlined its 'efforts on the one hand to ensure the availability of a sufficient number of judges to meet the requirements of current casework, while on the other hand attempting to limit as far as possible any increase beyond the total of 18 judges normally provided for in the Statute...thus limiting the impact that extensions [pursuant to article 36(10) of the Statute] have had on the budget.'

²⁹ Resulting from the resignation of Judge Maureen Harding Clark (Ireland) to serve in the High Court of Ireland, effective as of 10 December 2006, the resignation of Judge Claude Jorda (France) for ill-health, effective as of 12 August 2007, and the resignation of Judge Karl T. Hudson-Phillips (Trinidad and Tobago) for personal reasons, effective as of 30 September 2007 (see ICC Press Releases ICC-CPI-20061211-192, 11 December 2006 (Judge Harding-Clark), ICC-CPI-20070508-218, 8 May 2007 (Judge Jorda) and ICC-CPI-20070319-211, 19 March 2003 (Judge Hudson-Phillips)). See also Election of judges to fill three judicial vacancies of the International Criminal Court, 2 October 2007, ICC-ASP/6/15. Those Judges were replaced by Judges Bruno Cotte (France), Daniel David Ntanda Nsereko (Uganda) and Fumiko Saiga (Japan), Official Records, Sixth session, 30 November – 14 December 2007, (ICC-ASP/6/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 29.

³⁰ Resulting from the 16 February 2009 resignation of Judge-elect Mohamed Shahabuddeen (Guyana) who was not in a position to assume his duties as a judge for personal reasons and the passing away of Judge Fumiko Saiga (Japan) on 24 April 2009 (see ICC Press Releases ICC-ASP-20090218-PR391, 18 February 2009 [Judge Shahabuddeen] and ICC-CPI-20090424-PR407, 24 April 2009 [Judge Saiga]). See also Election of judges to fill two judicial vacancies of the International Criminal Court, 11 November 2009, ICC-ASP/8/21, paragraph 2. Those Judges were replaced by Judges Silvia Fernández de Gurmendi (Argentina) and Kuniko Ozaki (Japan), Official Records, Eighth session, 18–26 November 2009 (ICC-ASP/8/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 31.

³¹ Resulting from the resignation of Judge Anthony Thomas Aquinas Carmona (Trinidad and Tobago), effective as of 18 March 2013, following his election as President of Trinidad and Tobago. (See ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20130320-PR885, 20 March 2013. See also Election of a judge to fill a judicial vacancy of the International Criminal Court, 21 October 2013, ICC-ASP/12/45). He was replaced by Judge Geoffrey Henderson (Trinidad and Tobago). Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 22.

³² Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Fourth meeting, 4 June 2014, paragraph 2. Judge-elect Defensor-Santiago was replaced by Judge Raul Cano Pangalangan (The Philippines), Official Records, Thirteenth Session (resumption), 24–25 June 2015, (ICC-ASP/13/20/Add. 1), Part I, B, paragraph 20.

³³ Ibid and Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Sixth meeting, 18 July 2014, paragraph 1(b).

³⁴ Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Fifth meeting, 30 June 2014, paragraph 1(a). The Bureau was concerned that the dates of the scheduled meetings of the Advisory Committee would not also allow it to consider nominations for the judicial vacancy, which would only be submitted after the meeting bearing in mind the nomination periods.

³⁵ Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Sixth meeting, 18 July 2014, paragraph 1(b).

The Bureau considered three options for filling the vacancy: i) holding an election at the thirteenth session of the ASP, prior to the election of six judges already scheduled for the same session; ii) holding a joint election to fill seven seats altogether, whereby one seat would lead to a mere six-year term (approximately) and six seats would lead to nine-year terms;³⁶ or iii) deferring the election to early 2015, so that the results of the election of six judges at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014 could be taken into account in the calculation of the requisite minimum voting requirements regarding the judicial vacancy.³⁷ Ultimately, the Bureau decided that it would not be possible to hold an election to fill the judicial vacancy at the thirteenth session in December 2014 within the existing legal framework and referred the matter to the ASP with the recommendation that the latter schedule it in 2015.³⁸ Thereafter, at the thirteenth session, during its final plenary meeting, the ASP mandated the Bureau to consider the practicalities of holding a resumed session to fill the remaining judicial vacancy and, if appropriate, convene such a session in the second quarter of 2015, in light of the needs of the Court to be served by a full complement of judges due to its workload.³⁹

- 12 As stated above, vacancies in the judiciary have not always led to special elections in accordance with article 37 of the Statute, particularly where the mandate of a resigning judge is soon to expire. The judicial vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge Navanethem Pillay (South Africa),⁴⁰ did not lead to an election pursuant to article 37 to fill a judicial vacancy. Instead, a replacement for Judge Pillay, whose mandate was due to expire only seven months later, in March 2009, along with five other judges, was elected during the course of the regular elections which took place at the seventh resumed session of the ASP in January 2009. Similarly, the Bureau decided not to fill the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul (Germany)⁴¹ with an election pursuant to article 37 of the Statute, as the Court was not seeking to replace the judge given that his term of office was due to conclude only eight months later in March 2015, alongside that of five other judges. An election to fill that judicial vacancy at the thirteenth session in December 2014 (deemed the earliest opportunity) would thus have only allowed a replacing judge to serve in office for just over two months, in accordance with article 37(2) of the Statute,⁴² given the regular elections scheduled at the same session.⁴³ As such, the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge Kaul was scheduled to be filled through the regular judicial elections already scheduled for the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014.⁴⁴

³⁶ Given that the term of office of Judge-elect Senator Miriam Defensor-Santiago expires on 10 March 2021, whereas the terms of office of the judges elected at the thirteenth session expire on 10 March 2024. See mn 16 regarding the duration of a replacing judge's term.

³⁷ Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Sixth meeting, 18 July 2014, paragraph 1(b).

³⁸ Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Seventh meeting, 15 August 2014, paragraph 1(a); Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 31 and Annex II Oral Report of the Bureau, paragraph 16.

³⁹ Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 69; and Part III, ICC/ASP/13/Res.5, Annex I, paragraph 16(c), which provides 'Concerned by the need for the Court to have a full bench of judges in 2015, as provided by the Rome Statute, further decides to mandate the Bureau to consider the practicalities of holding a resumed session to fill the remaining judicial vacancy, including the location, timing and financial implications, and if appropriate to proceed with the convening of such a resumed session in the second quarter of 2015'. The Bureau decided to schedule that resumed session of the ASP for the election to fill the judicial vacancy in late June 2015. Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, First meeting, 23 January 2015, paragraph 2.

⁴⁰ Effective 31 August 2008, in order to take up her appointment as the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. See ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20080730-PR344, 30 July 2008.

⁴¹ Effective 1 July 2014, due to health reasons. See ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20140630-PR1023, 30 June 2014.

⁴² Two months calculated from December 2014, (the date of both the elections at the thirteenth session of the ASP and the commencement of the term of office of the replacing judge (see mn 16)) and 10 March 2015 (the expiration of the term of office of Judge Kaul).

⁴³ Bureau of the ASP, Decisions, Fifth meeting, 30 June 2014, paragraph 1(b).

⁴⁴ For the results of the elections see Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 44.

II. Paragraph 2 – Judges elected to fill vacancies

1. Judicial replacements

Article 37 of the Statute does not dictate the manner in which a judicial vacancy is to be filled, save for stating in paragraph 1 that such elections are to be held in accordance with article 36 of the Statute. In comparison, the 1994 ILC Draft Statute had explicitly provided that in filling judicial vacancies, judges ‘shall be replaced by persons nominated as having the same qualification’.⁴⁵ As such, a judge with established competence in criminal law and procedure, in accordance with article 36(3)(b)(i) of the Statute, would be replaced with the same in order to maintain the overall balance within the judiciary of the Court. Whereas the Statute does not maintain any such explicit condition in the election process to fill judicial vacancies, the makeup of the remaining body of judges is relevant to determining the way in which a judicial vacancy is to be filled.

Article 36 of the Statute sets out the key elements. According to articles 36(7) and 36(8)(a) of the Statute respectively, no two judges may be nationals of the same State, and the States Parties shall, in the selection of judges, take into account the need, within the membership of the Court, for the representation of the principle legal systems of the world; equitable geographical representation;⁴⁶ and a fair representation of female and male judges. They must also, pursuant to article 36(8)(b) of the Statute, take into account the need to include judges with legal expertise on specific issues, including, but not limited to, violence against women or children. Article 36(5) of the Statute further provides that of the eighteen judges of the Court at least nine shall have established competence in criminal law and procedure (List A),⁴⁷ at least five shall have established competence in international law (List B)⁴⁸ and that ‘[s]ubsequent elections shall be so organized as to maintain the equivalent proportion on the Court of judges qualified on the two lists’.

Moreover, the Election Procedure of the ASP further elaborates the way in which article 37(2) of the Statute is to be implemented. It seeks to maintain the balance in the expertise, geographical representation and gender representation amongst the judges, as stipulated in articles 36(5) and 36(8) of the Statute. In accordance with the Election Procedure: ‘[i]f the judicial vacancy reduces the number of judges from [L]ist A to below 9 or the number of judges from [L]ist B to below 5, only candidates from the underrepresented list can be nominated’ for election.⁴⁹ Further, ‘[i]f at the time of the election a regional or gender minimum voting requirement is not fulfilled, only candidates that can satisfy any of the underrepresented regional minimum voting requirements as well as the underrepresented gender minimum voting requirement can be nominated’ for election.⁵⁰ The latter provision was applied in the election to fill the vacancies left by the resignation of Judge-elect Shahabuddeen (Guyana) and the death of Judge Saiga (Japan), wherein only candidates from the Group of Latin American and Caribbean States and the Group of Asia-Pacific ⁴⁵ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 6(8) and commentary to article 7(2). From the placement of this provision, it would appear to have concerned all judicial elections, including those to fill judicial vacancies.

⁴⁶ Those five regional groupings are: African States, Asia-Pacific States, Eastern European States, Latin American and Caribbean States and Western European and Other States.

⁴⁷ Namely: judges with ‘established competence in criminal law and procedure, and the necessary relevant experience, whether as judge, prosecutor, advocate or in other similar capacity, in criminal proceedings’ in accordance with article 36(3)(b)(i) of the Statute.

⁴⁸ Namely: judges with ‘established competence in relevant areas of international law such as international humanitarian law and the law of human rights, and extensive experience in a professional legal capacity which is of relevance to the judicial work of the Court’ in accordance with article 36(3)(b)(ii) of the Statute.

⁴⁹ Election Procedure, paragraph 27(c).

⁵⁰ Election Procedure, Paragraph 27(d). Minimum voting requirements are also applicable to regular elections. For example, at the elections to fill six seats at the thirteenth session of the ASP in December 2014, minimum voting requirements were applied in respect of expertise, geographical representation and gender representation (see Fifth election of judges of the International Criminal Court, 2 October 2014, ICC-ASP/13/3, paragraph 5).

States, respectively, could be nominated for election to the Court.⁵¹ In the election to fill the vacancy left by the resignation of Judge Carmona (Trinidad and Tobago), only candidates from the Group of Latin American and Caribbean States could be nominated for election to the Court.⁵² Similarly, in the election to fill the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Judge-elect Senator Defensor-Santiago, only candidates from the Group of Asia-Pacific States were eligible for nomination.⁵³

Thus, the abovementioned provisions of the Statute and the Election Procedure are similar in their combined effect to the 1994 ILC Draft Statute which sought to replace like with like in an effort to maintain a balance within the judiciary of the Court when filling judicial vacancies. Whilst a replacing judge might not strictly require the same qualifications as his or her predecessor (unless the minimum voting requirements of the ASP are not met), the overall balance within the judiciary of the Court has to be maintained in filling a judicial vacancy, taking into account the makeup of the judges still serving.

2. The terms of office of judges filling vacancies

- 16 In relation to the duration of the term of office of a judge elected to fill a vacancy, paragraph 2 of article 37 of the Statute provides that a replacement judge shall serve for the remainder of his or her predecessor's term, which is still running. Due to the presumed urgency of replacing a judge, that term of office commences immediately upon election. As such, prior to the first regular election in 2003,⁵⁴ and thereafter for each election, the ASP decided that the terms of office of the judges elected to fill judicial vacancies shall run from the date of their election for the remainder of their predecessors' terms.⁵⁵ This is enshrined in regulation 9(2) of the Regulations of the Court, which likewise provides that the term of office of a judge elected to replace a judge whose term of office has not expired shall commence on the date of his or her election and shall continue for the remainder of the term of his or her predecessor. This is in contrast to the term of office of a judge elected within a regular election cycle, which commences on the eleventh of March following the date of his or her election.⁵⁶
- 17 Moreover, whereas article 36(9)(a) of the Statute provides that judges elected in regular elections shall ordinarily serve for a nine-year term and shall not be eligible for re-election, article 37(2) of the Statute is an exception to this rule.⁵⁷ It provides that if the predecessor judge's term of office is three years or less, the replacing judge shall be eligible for re-election

⁵¹ Nomination and election of judges, Note Verbale of 13 May 2009, ICC-ASP/8/S/20, page 3. See note 46 for regional groupings.

⁵² ICC-ASP/12/45, paragraph 9 (cited at note 31).

⁵³ Election of a judge to fill a judicial vacancy of the International Criminal Court, 14 April 2015, ICC-ASP/13/44, paragraph 9.

⁵⁴ Official Records, First session (first and second resumptions) 3–7 February and 21–23 April 2003 (ICC-ASP/1/3/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 31.

⁵⁵ Official Records, Sixth session, 2007 (ICC-ASP/6/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 32; Official Records, Eighth session, 2009 (ICC-ASP/8/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 34; Official Records, Twelfth session, 2013 (ICC-ASP/12/20), Vol I, Part I, paragraph 24.

⁵⁶ Official Records, First session (first and second resumptions), 2003 (ICC-ASP/1/3/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 31; Official Records, Fourth session (resumption) 26–27 January 2006 (ICC-ASP/4/37), Part I, B, paragraph 20; Official Records, Seventh session (first and second resumptions) 19–23 January and 9–13 February 2009 (ICC-ASP/7/20/Add.1), Part I, B, paragraph 24; Official Records, Tenth session, 2011 (ICC-ASP/10/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 44; Official Records, Thirteenth session, 2014 (ICC-ASP/13/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 50; and regulation 9(1) of the Regulations of the Court.

⁵⁷ It is unclear why, in article 36(2)(c)(i) of the Statute concerning an increase in the number of judges, reference is made to article 37(2) of the Statute concerning the term of a judge elected to fill a vacancy of a predecessor judge. If this is not to be interpreted as a defunct cross-reference, then in combination with the fact that elections to increase the number of judges shall take place in accordance with paragraphs 3 to 8 of article 36 of the Statute but not paragraph 9 of article 36 of the Statute (which sets a judge's term of office at nine years) it could imply that judges elected to increase numbers in the judiciary, may be elected for less than nine years and if that period is three years or less shall be eligible for re-election for a full term. However, this provision has not been tested.

for a full term. Providing the possibility of re-election for a judge whose term of office is relatively short is a manner of attracting candidates to fill judicial vacancies and ensuring that the Court is not left wanting.⁵⁸ This provision was applied in respect of the election to fill three judicial vacancies in November/December 2007 at the sixth session of the Assembly, whereafter lots were drawn by the President of the ASP in order to determine which of the three judges elected at that session would serve the remainder of the term of Judge Jorda (approximately one and a half years in duration and due to expire on 10 March 2009).⁵⁹ In contrast, the terms of office of the two other judges who were being replaced at that session were due to expire on 10 March 2012. Pursuant to a drawing of lots, Judge Saiga was selected to serve the remainder of the term of Judge Jorda,⁶⁰ and, as such, was eligible for re-election at the end of her mandate, in accordance with articles 36(9)(a) and 37(2) of the Statute, and was indeed re-elected for a full nine-year term.⁶¹

Article 37(2) of the Statute is principally the same as its forerunner in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute except for the fact that the draft proposed by the ILC anticipated that a judge might be eligible for re-election if his or her predecessor's term was less than five years as opposed to the current three years.⁶² The text was amended to three years following a proposal from France without any extensive discussion.⁶³ The relevant provision in the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute was sent to the Rome Conference with the question of the entitlement of a replacing judge to stand for re-election after completion of his or her predecessor's term in square brackets.⁶⁴ At the Rome Conference, the Coordinator estimated that '[t]here might be a need to consider...whether a judge elected to fill a judicial vacancy should be eligible for re-election after completing his or her predecessor's term, or whether that should be dependent on the period of the term remaining'.⁶⁵ In the event, there was little debate on the subject⁶⁶ and the current text was adopted. The three-year time-frame is aligned with article 36(9)(c) of the Statute which provides that judges who serve for a three-year term in accordance with article 36(9)(b) of the Statute are eligible for re-election for a full term.

⁵⁸ Jones, in: Cassese et al.(eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 254.

⁵⁹ The remainder of the predecessor's term is calculated from the date that the resignation becomes effective to the date that the term of office expires, which, in the case of Judge Jorda was 2 August 2007 (ICC Press Release ICC-CPI-20070508-218, 8 May 2007) and 10 March 2009, respectively.

⁶⁰ Consequently, whereas the term of Judge Saiga was to expire on 10 March 2009, the terms of office of Judges Cotte and Nsereko were to expire on 10 March 2012. Official Records, Sixth session, 2007, (ICC-ASP/6/20), Vol I, Part I, B, paragraph 32.

⁶¹ Judge Saiga was re-elected at the first resumption of the Seventh session of the ASP in January 2009 (Official Records, Seventh session (first and second resumptions) 2009 (ICC-ASP/7/20/Add.1) Part I, B, paragraph 18) and passed away on 24 April 2009 resulting in another election to fill a judicial vacancy (see margin 10 and note 30).

⁶² 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 7(2). In the Draft Statute prepared by the Working Group of the ILC in 1993, a replacing judge serving the remainder of their predecessor's term was eligible for re-election if that period was less than four years, Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May-23 July 1993 (A/48/10), article 8(2).

⁶³ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/51/22, 1996, Vol II, Compilation of Proposals, article 8.

⁶⁴ Article 38(2) of the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute provided: 'A judge elected to fill a vacancy shall serve for the remainder of the predecessor's term[, and [if that period is less than three years] is eligible for re-election for a further term]'.⁶⁵

⁶⁵ 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute, paragraph 47.

⁶⁶ Supra note 21, Official Records, Volume II, A/CONF.183/13(Vol. II), Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole, paragraphs 63 (Belgium) 78 (Malawi), 83 (United Arab Emirates and Syria), 110 (Venezuela), 113 (Iran), 125 (Democratic Republic of Congo).

Article 38 The Presidency

1. The President and the First and Second Vice-Presidents shall be elected by an absolute majority of the judges. They shall each serve for a term of three years or until the end of their respective terms of office as judges, which ever expires earlier. They shall be eligible for re-election once.

2. The First Vice-President shall act in place of the President in the event that the President is unavailable or disqualified. The Second Vice-President shall act in place of the President in the event that both the President and the First Vice-President are unavailable or disqualified.

3. The President, together with the First and Second Vice-Presidents, shall constitute the Presidency, which shall be responsible for:

- (a) The proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor; and
- (b) The other functions conferred upon it in accordance with this Statute.

4. In discharging its responsibility under paragraph 3 (a), the Presidency shall coordinate with and seek the concurrence of the Prosecutor on all matters of mutual concern.

Literature: Abtahi, H., Article 38, in: J. Fernandez and X. Pacreau (eds), Commentaire article par article du Statut de la Cour pénale internationale, i (Pedone 2012) 983; id., Ogwuma, O. And Young, R., 'The Judicial Review Powers of the Presidency of the International Criminal Court: Safeguards for the Protection of Human Rights', (2013) 12 LAPE 281; id., 'The Composition of Judicial Benches, Disqualification and Excusal of Judges at the International Criminal Court', (2013) 11 JICJ 379; Abtahi, H., and Koh S.A., 'The Emerging Enforcement Practice of the International Criminal Court', (2012) 45 CornellILJ 1; Ambach, P. And Rackwitz, K.U., 'A Model of International Judicial Administration? The Evolution of Managerial Practices at the International Criminal Court', (2014) 76 L&ContempProbs 119.

Content

A. Analysis and interpretation of elements	1
I. Paragraph 1	1
II. Paragraph 2	4
III. Paragraph 3	5
1. 'The proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor'	6
2. 'Other functions conferred upon the Presidency by the Statute'	7
IV. Paragraph 4	8
B. Special remarks	10
I. External relations and cooperation	12
1. General cooperation	13
2. Enforcement cooperation	14
II. Judicial	16
1. Administrative tribunal	17
2. Criminal court	18
III. Administration	1
1. Oversight of judicial proceedings	20
a) Organisation and work of Chambers	21
b) Ethics, professional conduct, privileges and immunities	26
aa) Excusal and disqualification	27
bb) Misconduct	29
cc) Privileges and immunities	32
2. Management, oversight and coordination	33
a) Registry specific	34
b) Court wide	37

A. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

The judges meeting in plenary elect by an absolute majority, in accordance with rule 4 1 paras. 1 and 4 of the Rules, each of the three members of the Presidency, from among their peers, for a three year mandate, with the possibility to be re-elected once¹.

The Rules do not set out in any more detail the procedure for the election, unlike, for 2 instance, the Rules of the International Court of Justice and the Rules of the ICTY and ICTR². However the judges of the Court have adopted internal election rules that they have applied in each election³.

It is not without interest to recall a proposal by the USA to the Preparatory Committee⁴, 3 suggesting adding the following to paragraph 1: ‘The Vice-Presidents and Alternates shall be chosen so as to represent both the Appellate and Trial Judges’. Eventually, this proposal was not retained in the Final Draft of the Statute given the fact that the mechanisms of assignment to divisions bears complexities that may not be reconciled with this draft, as will be seen in the commentary to article 39.

II. Paragraph 2

This text replaces the ILC’s Draft approved verbatim by the Preparatory Committee⁵. This 4 text is more direct and clearer than some earlier proposals, e.g., Singapore⁶, Australia and Netherlands⁷. It is likely that the States Parties wanted to ensure the clarity of the technical operation of this particular feature of the Presidency. Subsequently, the concrete operation of this provision was set out in detail in the Regulations of the Court. Accordingly, the functions of one or more unavailable or disqualified member of the Presidency shall be carried out by another judge in accordance with the precedence of judges under regulation 10 of the Regulations of the Court⁸. Also, the remaining members of the Presidency may, in exceptional circumstances, take the action required⁹. Finally, the members of the Presidency shall attempt to achieve unanimity in their decisions, failing which their decisions shall be taken by majority¹⁰.

¹ The First two Presidents of the Court, Judges Philippe Kirsch and Sang-Hyun Song, served two consecutive mandates as President of the Court from 2003 to 2009 and from 2009 to 2015, respectively.

² Rule 18 lit. C ICTY provides in full: ‘The President shall be elected by a majority of the votes of the permanent Judges composing the Tribunal. If no Judge obtains such a majority, the second ballot shall be limited to the two Judges who obtained the greatest number of votes on the first ballot. In the case of equality of votes on the second ballot, the Judge who takes precedence in accordance with rule 17 shall be declared elected’. By virtue of rule 20 lit. C ICTY, the same procedure applies to the election of the Vice-President. See also rules 18 and 20 ICTR. In contrast, the Rules of the Special Court for Sierra Leone provide in rule 18 that the presiding judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be the President of the Special Court and that ‘The Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be elected by a majority of the votes of the Judges appointed to the Appeals Chamber’; its rule 20 provides that ‘The Vice-Presidency shall rotate in order of precedence amongst the other members of the Appeals Chamber commencing on 7 March 2003’.

³ In the First Edition of this Commentary, which appeared before the first election of the members of the Presidency, Jules Deschênes, a former judge of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY, expressed the view that: ‘In the writer’s opinion, nominations should be allowed, even sought. If there is only one – prior informal consultations may well show the obviousness of the situation – the election of that candidate will follow automatically. Should there be more than one, the majority on a secret ballot should determine the winner’.

⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 18.

⁵ Ibid. p. 17.

⁶ Ibid., p. 18.

⁷ Ibid., pp. 19–20.

⁸ Regulation 11 para. 2 and 4 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁹ Regulation 11 para. 3 of the Regulations of the Court.

¹⁰ Regulation 11 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Court.

III. Paragraph 3

- 5 This paragraph actually establishes the Presidency, which is composed of the President and the two Vice-Presidents. The original Draft of the ILC provided for two alternate Vice-Presidents. But several delegations saw no usefulness in those positions and the idea was finally dropped.

The Presidency has duties to fulfil, which the Statute has classified under two headings:

1. 'The proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor'

- 6 Given the specificity of the latter exception, the Presidency is granted a wide ambit of authority capable of including almost all activities pertaining to the daily functioning of the Court. Yet it was suggested at the Preparatory Committee that the paragraph should also spell out 'supervision and direction of the Registrar and the staff of the Registry, and security arrangements for the defendants, witnesses and the Court'¹¹. The first part of this suggestion was expressly supported by the USA¹². Ultimately, the Registrar, the 'principal administrative officer of the Court' who is 'responsible for the non-judicial aspects of the administration and servicing of the Court', was placed, pursuant to article 43 para. 2, under the authority of the President, rather than that of the Presidency.

2. 'Other functions conferred upon the Presidency by the Statute'

- 7 A host of such other functions may be found in the Statute and subsequent legal texts of the Court and shall be commented upon in the relevant chapters of this work. Due to their regular overlap with article 38 para. 3(a), their relationship shall be articulated under the special remarks heading.

IV. Paragraph 4

- 8 The original paragraph 4 proposed by the ILC foresaw the exercise by the Presidency of 'pre-trial and other procedural functions'¹³. At the Preparatory Committee, 'doubts were expressed as to the appropriateness of the Presidency exercising (such) functions', with Switzerland successfully moving that paragraph 4 be simply deleted¹⁴.
- 9 The current paragraph 4 rather deals with the relationship between the Presidency and the Prosecutor. By virtue of paragraph 3(a), the responsibility of the Presidency for the proper administration of the Court extends to all parts of the Court with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor, who, pursuant to article 42 para. 2, has full authority over the management and administration of the Office of the Prosecutor. Article 38 paragraph 4 intends therefore to facilitate the smooth functioning of the Court as a whole by providing that the Presidency shall coordinate with and obtain the Prosecutor's concurrence 'on matters of mutual concern', that is on the proper administration of Court under paragraph 3(a)¹⁵.

¹¹ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 12.

¹² 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 18.

¹³ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 8.

¹⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 19.

¹⁵ In the First Edition of this Commentary, Jules Deschênes, expressed the view that: 'It is indeed highly desirable, from the point of view of justice in general, that the Prosecutor and the judges hold views which are shared so that the Court may proceed efficiently and without acrimony. ...This does not mean that the Chambers should always uphold, when it comes to law, the views of the Prosecutor: far from it. The experience of the Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda are living witnesses of the reality of the independence of the judicial organ of those International Tribunals from their common prosecutor....But we

B. Special remarks

The inclusion of the Presidency as one of the organs of the Court, in accordance with article 34, represents a departure from the precedents of the ad hoc and hybrid supranational criminal jurisdictions, the Statutes of which provide for three organs, namely the Chambers, the Prosecutor and the Registry¹⁶. While the Rules of those tribunals do contain a section entitled ‘The Presidency’¹⁷, they do not establish a ‘Presidency’ as a body, but merely contain the provisions relating to the election and functions of the President and the Vice-President of those tribunals¹⁸, although they confer significant functions on the President, some of which resemble those of the Court’s Presidency¹⁹. 10

The administrative scheme of the Court is governed by the Rome Statute system. The Registrar, who is the principal administrative officer of the Court, acts under the authority of the President who, in turn, is a member of the Presidency, the organ of the Court responsible for the proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor, with which the Presidency shall coordinate and seek the concurrence on matters of mutual concern. To this most challenging management model, one should add the ASP’s management oversight over the Presidency, the Prosecutor and the Registrar in respect of the administration of the Court in accordance with article 112 para. 2(b). As far as the internal functioning of the Court is concerned however, the ‘Report of the Court on measures to increase clarity on the responsibilities of the different organs’ has identified the managerial challenges and devised a number of solutions²⁰. As far as the Presidency is concerned, its functions are scattered across the Statute, the Rules, the Regulations of the Court and the Regulations of the Registry. The core of the functions of the Presidency that are expressly referred to in the Statute is concentrated in Part IV on the composition and administration of the Court and Part X on the enforcement. A more limited number of the functions of the Presidency may be found in other parts of the Statute. However, because of the general nature of the Statute, the implied functions of the Presidency have subsequently been made express, essentially in the Rules, the Regulations of the Court, the Regulations of the Registry and also other documents. The decade long functioning of the Court has not only shed light on many of those functions but also, and most importantly, has blurred the dichotomy of the division in article 38 para. 3(a) and (b). In practice, the Presidency has performed three functions, often overlapping: external relations and cooperation; judicial; and administration²¹. 11 are dealing here with administrative matters: there is no reason in the world why judges and prosecutor, being after all persons of good faith who have willingly decided to devote their career to a joint purpose of public interest, should not be able to steer together the administration of the Court into a common satisfactory canal’.

¹⁶ Statute of the ICTY, article 11; Statute of the ICTR, article 10. See also Statute of the SCSL, article 11.

¹⁷ Rules of the ICTY, Part Three, Section 2; Rules of the ICTY, Part Three, Section 2. See also Rules of the SCSL, Part Three, Section 2.

¹⁸ Rules of the ICTY, rules 18–22; Rules of the ICTY, rules 18–22. See also Rules of the SCSL, rules 18–22.

¹⁹ In particular, rule 19 of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL Rules provides that the President shall ‘coordinate the work of the Chambers and supervise the activities of the Registry as well as exercise all the other functions conferred on the President by the Statute and the Rules’. Furthermore, rule 23 of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL provide for a ‘Bureau’ or a ‘Council of Judges’, composed of the President and Vice-President, as well as the Presiding Judges of each of the Trial Chambers which, generally, require the President to consult the other members of those bodies on the functioning of the institutions. The Rules of these Tribunals also confer certain specific functions on the Bureau, such as the function of deciding upon certain applications for disqualification of judges; see rule 15 of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL Rules. These rules also confer to the Bureau the function of making recommendations for the appointment of the Deputy Registrar or other Registry staff Rules of the ICTY, rule 31. See also, e.g., Rules of the ICTY, Rules 28 lit. A, 74 bis; Rules of the ICTR, rules 22 lit. A, 46 lit. D and 74 bis.

²⁰ Report of the Court on measures to increase clarity on the responsibilities of the different organs, ICC ASP/9/CBF.1/12, 18 March 2010.

²¹ For a comprehensive discussion, see Abtahi Hirad, Article 38, in: Julian Fernandez and Xavier Pacreau (eds), Commentaire article par article du Statut de la Cour Pénale Internationale, i (Pedone 2012) 983.

I. External relations and cooperation

12 The Court operates in the form of an intergovernmental organisation. As such, the proper accomplishment of the Court's judicial mandate depends on external relations, and cooperation with external entities, which – for the purposes of the present commentary – may be divided into general cooperation and enforcement cooperation. In addition to the Statute, documents such as the Rules and the Regulations of the Court have clarified those many instances where the President and/or the Presidency intervene.

1. General cooperation

13 The President and the Presidency play an active role in developing and maintaining cooperative relationships between the Court and various external entities. This makes the President the public face of the Court. Article 2 assigns an express role to the President for the conclusion of the relationship agreement with the United Nations. The President, personally or upon delegation, also concludes Court-wide agreements and arrangements with other external entities, such as States, intergovernmental organisations or other applicable entities – without prejudice to the power of the Prosecutor to conclude organ specific agreements²². It is also the President who, in case of a finding of non-cooperation by a State Party under article 87 para. 7, refers the matter to the ASP or UNSC, as applicable²³. On the other hand, it is the Presidency that, in consultation with the relevant Chamber, decides to change the place of the proceedings in a particular case and to sit in a State other than the host State²⁴.

2. Enforcement cooperation

14 Rule 199 of the Rules specifies that enforcement related functions are to be carried by the Presidency. This in practice encompasses the full cycle of enforcement of the sentences of imprisonment as well as many aspects of the enforcement of fines, forfeiture measures and reparation orders, as described in details under Part X of the Statute, Chapter 12 of the Rules and Chapter 7 of the Regulations of the Court.²⁵

15 To carry out the above functions, which espouse essentially features of public international law but also incorporate aspects of diplomatic communication and international relations, the President and the Presidency engage, in speeches, publications, meetings, on both bilateral and multilateral basis, at the seat of Court or anywhere else, with the ASP²⁶, States Parties and States not Parties, inter-governmental organisations; civil society, and academia. Far from being minimal, these activities, which are necessitated by the Court's need for cooperation, require significant attention.

II. Judicial

16 In performing its judicial functions, the Presidency acts to a very large extent as an administrative tribunal and, to a lesser extent, as a criminal court. Firmly grounded in administrative and human rights law, these functions address the protection of fundamental human rights as far as suspects, accused and detained witnesses are concerned, as well as the right to a fair trial with regard to the suspect and/or accused and victims' representation²⁷.

²² Regulation 107 of the Regulations of the Court and article 54 para. 3.

²³ Regulation 109 para. 4 of the Regulations of the Court. While this regulation does not touch upon a finding a non-cooperation by the State not Party, it will still be the President who will make the necessary referral.

²⁴ Rule 100 of the Rules.

²⁵ For a comprehensive discussion, see Abtahi, H., and Koh S.A., 'The Emerging Enforcement Practice of the International Criminal Court', (2012) 45 CornellILJ.

²⁶ Article 112 para. 5.

²⁷ For a comprehensive discussion, see Abtahi et al., (2013) 12 LAPE 281.

1. Administrative tribunal

In performing its functions as an administrative tribunal, the Presidency is the body responsible for the judicial review of certain decisions of the Registrar. The express foundation of this function lies in rule 21 para. 3 of the Rules, according to which the Presidency may review a decision of the Registrar to refuse a request for assignment of counsel. The Regulations of the Court and the Regulations of the Registry have expanded this function to a wide range of fields, such as the refusal to grant legal aid²⁸. More comprehensively, the Presidency reviews the decisions of the Registrar on the conditions of detention as detailed in regulation 106 of the Regulations of the Court and section 5 of Regulations of the Registry. These concern matters such as medical care²⁹; postal costs³⁰; telephone calls³¹; monitoring of telephone calls³²; telephone cost³³; visits³⁴; monitoring of visits³⁵; segregation³⁶; use of force³⁷; isolation³⁸; as well as disciplinary offence and disciplinary measures³⁹. The Presidency also reviews the decisions of the Registrar concerning the removal, suspension or refusal to include counsel on the list of counsel or to confirm the retention of counsel in the absence of legal aid⁴⁰. The Presidency further reviews the decisions of the Registrar refusing to include in or to remove from the list of professional investigators⁴¹; and the refusal to include applicants in the list of experts⁴². Furthermore, the Presidency may also review complaints by counsel on election procedures for representing counsel in the Advisory Committee on Legal Texts⁴³; and in the Disciplinary Board and Disciplinary Appeals Board, under the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel⁴⁴.

2. Criminal court

As for its criminal jurisdiction function, the Presidency may extend the sentence of imprisonment of a convicted person who has continuously and wilfully refused to pay the fine imposed on him/her⁴⁵.

III. Administration

The third function of the Presidency mirrors to a large extent the title of Part IV of the Statute: composition and administration of the Court, which may be divided into the oversight of judicial proceeding and management, oversight and coordination.

1. Oversight of judicial proceedings

The oversight of judicial proceedings includes facilitating the organisation and work of Chambers, as well as addressing matters relating to ethics and professional conduct.

²⁸ Regulation 85 para. 2 and 3 of the Regulations of the Court.

²⁹ Regulation 157 para. 9, 11, 12 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁰ Regulation 172 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³¹ Regulation 173 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³² Regulations 174 and 175 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³³ Regulation 176 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁴ Regulation 180 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁵ Regulation 184 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁶ Regulations 201 para. 10 and 202 para. 5 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁷ Regulation 204 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁸ Regulations 212 para. 9 and 213 para. 2 of the Regulations of the Registry.

³⁹ Regulation 216 para. 1, 3 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁴⁰ Regulation 72 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁴¹ Regulations 137 and 138 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁴² Regulation 44 of the Regulations of the Court and regulation 56 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁴³ Regulation 3 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁴⁴ Regulations 147 and 148 of the Regulations of the Registry, respectively.

⁴⁵ Rule 146 para. 5 and 6 of the Rules and regulation 118 of the Regulations of the Court.

- 21 a) Organisation and work of Chambers. The Presidency performs a number of key functions designed to facilitate the organisation and work of Chambers. In accordance with article 35, while the members of the Presidency shall serve on a full-time basis as soon as they are elected, the Presidency itself is the sole body to decide when to call other judges to serve on a full-time basis. The Presidency may also propose an increase beyond and a reduction not below the eighteen judges, in accordance with article 36 para. 2(a) and 2(c)(ii).
- 22 Pursuant to rule 4*bis* of the Rules, the Presidency is responsible for the assignment of the judges to the Appeals, Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions under article 39 para. 1⁴⁶. In accordance with article 39 para. 4, the Presidency may temporarily attach the judges in between divisions.
- 23 The Presidency is responsible for constituting Pre-Trial Chambers and assigning the situations to them as soon as it has been informed by the Prosecutor⁴⁷. Upon confirmation of charges and transfer of the records of the case by the Pre-Trial Chamber to the Presidency, the latter assigns the case to a Trial Chamber in accordance with article 61 para. 11⁴⁸. In accordance with article 74 para. 1, the Presidency may also assign one or more alternate judges to the trial bench⁴⁹.
- 24 Under article 85, the Presidency is also responsible for composing a three judge bench to address requests for compensation in case of unlawful arrest or conviction made following miscarriage of justice⁵⁰.
- 25 Of direct impact on courtroom proceedings, it is noteworthy that the Presidency may authorise the use of an official language of the Court as a working language in the proceedings⁵¹. In terms of facilitating the work of the division, it should also be mentioned that the duty roster of judges and legal officers of the Chambers is established in consultation with the Presidency⁵². Finally, the Presidency approves all standard forms and templates for use before court proceedings⁵³.
- 26 b) Ethics, professional conduct, privileges and immunities. The elected officials of the Court, other court proceedings actors, as well as, more generally, the staff of the Court, are all subject to a variety of ethical and professional conduct, privileges and immunities. Appearing all in Part IV of the Statute, they have been expanded and/or elaborated upon in subsequent documents of the Court. These can be grouped into excusal and disqualification; misconduct and privileges and immunities.
- 27 aa) Excusal and disqualification. Pursuant to regulation 126 of the Regulations of the Court, the Code of Judicial Ethics of the judges was drawn up by the Presidency and adopted by the judges in plenary⁵⁴. The Statute, Rules and Regulations of the Court provide that questions of judicial ethics, such as judicial independence, impartiality, and integrity are addressed by the Presidency, as the final decision maker or as the organiser of the plenary of judges, depending on the circumstances. These can be broadly divided into two categories: excusal and disqualification as well as disciplinary functions.
- 28 As far as the former is concerned, pursuant to articles 41 para. 2 and 42 para. 6, the Presidency is the competent organ for reviewing the request of a judge or the Prosecutor or a Deputy Prosecutor to be excused from a case before the Court⁵⁵. Where, however, it is the ⁴⁶ Prior to State Parties' proposal and adoption of the amendment of rule 4 into rule 4*bis*, it was the plenary of the judges that assigned the judges to the Divisions.

⁴⁷ Regulations 45 and 46 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁴⁸ Rules 60, 129 and 130 of the Rules.

⁴⁹ Regulation 16 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁵⁰ Rule 173 of the Rules.

⁵¹ Rule 41 para. 2 of the Rules.

⁵² Regulations 17 and 18 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁵³ Regulations 23 para. 2 of the Regulations of the Court and regulation 104 para. 2 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁵⁴ Code of Judicial Ethics, ICC-BD/02-01-05, 9 March 2005.

⁵⁵ As complemented by rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

Prosecutor or a person being investigated or prosecuted who are seeking the disqualification of a judge, the matter is to be decided by the plenary of the judge, which is then convened by the President who, beyond chairing the plenary, is also responsible, together with the Vice-Presidents, for drafting the decision of the plenary⁵⁶.

bb) Misconduct. With regard to disciplinary functions, all complaints against a judge, the Prosecutor, the Deputy-Prosecutor, the Registrar and the Deputy-Registrar for serious misconduct under article 46 para. 1 or misconduct of a less serious nature under article 47 shall, in accordance to rule 26 of the Rules, be transmitted to the Presidency, which may also initiate proceedings proprio motu. The Presidency is assisted by a panel of judges that it sets up in accordance with Chapter 8 of the Regulations of the Court. If the Presidency finds the complaint against the Prosecutor or Deputy-Prosecutor not anonymous nor manifestly unfounded, it transmits the matter to the Bureau of the ASP in the case of the Prosecutor and to the latter in case of a Deputy-Prosecutor⁵⁷. Where the Presidency decides that a complaint against a judge, the Registrar, or the Deputy-Registrar is not anonymous nor manifestly unfounded, the President convenes the plenary of the judges and⁵⁸, together with the Vice-Presidents, prepares the draft of the final decision. In the case of disciplinary measures against a judge, the Registrar, or the Deputy-Registrar, it is the Presidency that decides on the form of those measures, which may include a reprimand or pecuniary sanctions⁵⁹.

Where the need arises to replace a judge, it is the Presidency that, pursuant to the Rules and Regulations of the Court, is the competent body⁶⁰.

The Presidency shall appoint the Commissioner for investigating complaints of misconduct under the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel⁶¹. The Presidency shall also sit on the Disciplinary Appeals Board⁶², unless it was under their mandate that the Commissioner was appointed or that they are dealing with the case from which the complaint has arisen⁶³. Finally, where sanctions for misconduct before the Court have been imposed under article 71, the Presiding judge may refer the question of the extension of the period of interdiction to the Presidency which may hold a hearing to order an extension of the interdiction or make it permanent⁶⁴.

cc) Privileges and immunities. Pursuant to article 48 para. 5(b), the Presidency is the competent body to waive the privileges and immunities of the Registrar. The APIC and Headquarters Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the Host State provide that, in addition, the Presidency may also waive the privileges and immunities of counsel and persons assisting defence counsel, witnesses and victims as well as other persons required to be present at the seat of the Court⁶⁵.

2. Management, oversight and coordination

Management, oversight and coordination applies to both the Registrar/Registry, by virtue of the relationship between articles 38 para. 3 and 43 para. 2, as well as to the Court as whole, essentially through the relationship between articles 38 para. 3 and 4, 40, 42, 43 and 112 para. 2(b).

⁵⁶ For a comprehensive discussion, see Abtahi et al. (2013) JICJ 379–398,11(2).

⁵⁷ Rule 26 of the Rules and regulations 121 para. 2 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁵⁸ Rule 26 of the Rules and regulation 121 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁵⁹ Rules 30 and 32 of the Rules and regulation 122 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁶⁰ Rule 38 of the Rules and regulations 12 and 15 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁶¹ Article 33 of the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, ICC-ASP/4/Res.1, 2 December 2005 and regulation 149 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁶² Article 44 para. 4(a) of the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, ICC-ASP/4/Res.1, 2 December 2005.

⁶³ Article 44 para. 4(a)(i) and (ii) of the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, ICC-ASP/4/Res.1, 2 December 2005.

⁶⁴ Rule 171 of the Rules.

⁶⁵ Article 26 para. 2 of APIC and article 30 para. 2(b) of the Headquarters Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the Host State, ICC-BD/04-01-08, 1 March 2008.

- 34 a) Registry specific. article 43 para. 4 mandates the judges to elect the Registrar and, where applicable, the Deputy-Registrar. Rule 12 para. 1 mandates the Presidency to establish a list of candidate who satisfy the conditions provided in article 43 para. 3 and to transmit that list to the ASP for any recommendations⁶⁶. Upon receipt of the recommendation, the President shall convene the plenary of the judge to proceed with the election⁶⁷. If the need for a Deputy-Registrar arises, the Registrar shall make a recommendation to the President who shall put the question to the plenary of the judges for decision⁶⁸, which, in the affirmative, would proceed with the election⁶⁹.
- 35 Furthermore, as the person principally responsible for the management of the Court's Detention Centre, the Registrar entertains a close reporting line with the President and Presidency on detention related matters. This includes informing the Presidency of any breach of the procedure for incoming and outgoing mail⁷⁰; active monitoring of telephone calls or of visits and any breach of the rules of safety and security by the detained person⁷¹; cell monitoring⁷²; any incident arising from the use of instruments of restraint⁷³; use of force⁷⁴; temporary segregation⁷⁵; and use of isolation cell⁷⁶. Furthermore, the Presidency may appoint a judge to inspect the Detention Centre and, on a regular basis, an independent inspecting authority for the Detention Centre shall report to the Presidency⁷⁷. In case of serious disturbance or other emergency at the Detention Centre, the Presidency may temporarily suspend the relevant parts of the Regulations of the Court or the Regulations of the Registry⁷⁸. Finally, the Presidency may order an inquiry in the event of death, serious illness or injury of a detained person⁷⁹.
- 36 There are many other areas of oversight of the President/Presidency over the Registrar/Registrar, but as they fall under the Court wide coordination cluster, they shall be covered therein.
- 37 b) Court wide⁸⁰. To discuss and coordinate the administrative activities of the organs of the Court in the relevant areas, the Coordination Council has been established, comprised of the President, on behalf of the Presidency, the Prosecutor and the Registrar⁸¹. In practice, the Coordination Council addresses Court-wide matters of strategic significance, ranging from the Strategic Plan of the Court through to human resources, budget and finance, as well as public information, outreach, documentation or any unforeseen new developments. To this end, and in the exercise of the President's and Prosecutor's 'respective oversight responsibilities and ensuring appropriate internal and external control', the Audit Committee has been established through a Presidential Directive⁸². Composed of the President, Prosecutor and Registrar, as well as four external members, the Audit Committee provides strategic advice, to the organs' heads, on organizational matters listed in the Presidential Directives, including 'the financial reporting process; the system of internal control; the risk manage-

⁶⁶ Rule 12 para. 1 of the Rules.

⁶⁷ Rule 12 para. 2 and 3 of the Rules.

⁶⁸ Rule 12 para. 4 of the Rules.

⁶⁹ Rule 12 para. 5 of the Rules.

⁷⁰ Regulation 169 para. 7 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷¹ Regulations 175 para. 2 and 9 and 184 para. 2 and 9 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷² Regulation 196 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷³ Regulation 203 para. 3 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷⁴ Regulation 204 para. 5 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷⁵ Regulation 209 para. 3 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷⁶ Regulation 213 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁷⁷ Regulation 94 of the Regulations of the Court and Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the International Committee of the Red Cross on Visits to Persons deprived of Liberty Pursuant to the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, ICC-PRES/02-01-06, 29 April 2006.

⁷⁸ Regulation 96 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁷⁹ Regulation 103 para. 7 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁸⁰ For a comprehensive discussion, see Ambach and Rackwitz (2014) 76 L&ContempProbs 119.

⁸¹ Regulation 3 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁸² ICC/PRES/D/G/2009/1, 11 August 2009.

ment system; the internal and external audit processes; and the Court's process for monitoring compliance with regulations and rules approved by the Assembly of States Parties⁸³. In order to facilitate its internal administration, the Court has thus drawn up, in addition to its staff rules⁸⁴, a vast body of administrative issuances, including presidential directives and administrative instructions. The former are designed to facilitate the implementation of the ASP's regulations, resolutions and decisions, such as the promulgation of guidelines for Financial Regulations and Rules; Staff Regulations and rules; regulations and rules governing programme planning, monitoring the implementation and methods of evaluation⁸⁵. Presidential directives are promulgated by the President on behalf of the Presidency, after having coordinated with and sought the concurrence of the Prosecutor⁸⁶. The administrative instructions prescribe procedures for the implementation of presidential directives and regulate the administration of practical and organizational matters of general concerns. They are promulgated by the Registrar following the consent of the President and the Prosecutor⁸⁷. The President shall be the final authority for the interpretation of administrative issuances⁸⁸.

One specific area requiring the Presidency's inter-organ involvement is public information. 38
The Presidency decides, in consultation with the Prosecutor and/or the Registrar, which documents in addition to those listed in the Regulations of the Court should be published in the Official Journal of the Court⁸⁹. The Presidency is also one of the three persons, alongside the Prosecutor and the Registrar, who may decide on the publication on the website of the Court, of material additional to those enumerated in the Regulations of the Court⁹⁰. Together with the Chamber, the Presidency is the body to be consulted by the Registrar for the establishment of the calendar of proceedings⁹¹. Finally, pursuant to article 50 para. 1, in addition to the judgments of the Court, the Presidency shall determine which decisions resolve fundamental issues and, as such, should be published in the official languages of the Court⁹².

Finally, the Presidency is the pivot of the Court's judicial-generated normative activities. 39
Pursuant to the Roadmap to Expedite the Criminal Process that was endorsed by the ASP in 2012, the Working Group on Lessons Learnt of the judges, as chaired by a member of the Presidency, identifies amendment clusters within the Rules which may enhance the efficiency of court proceedings⁹³. The Working Group on Lessons Learnt submits its amendment proposals to the Advisory Committee on Legal Texts, which is the sole Court-wide body with the mandate to consider and report on proposals for amendments to the Rules, Elements of Crimes and the Regulations of the Court. This process ensures that all stakeholders to the criminal proceedings, that is judges, the Prosecutor, defence, victims and the Registry have, under the oversight of the Presidency, the opportunity to consider with great care amendment proposals before they are submitted to the ASP, in accordance to article 51 para. 2⁹⁴, by the Presidency. Where emergency dictates the adoption of amendments to the Rules under article 51 para. 3, or to the Elements of Crimes or to the Regulations of the Court, the Presidency may proprio motu or at the request of a judge or the Prosecutor, submit proposals

⁸³ ICC/PRES/D/G/2009/1, 11 August 2009.

⁸⁴ Article 44 para. 3.

⁸⁵ ICC/PRES/D/G/2003/001, 9 December 2003.

⁸⁶ ICC/PRES/D/G/2003/001, 9 December 2003.

⁸⁷ ICC/PRES/D/G/2003/001, 9 December 2003.

⁸⁸ ICC/PRES/D/G/2003/001, 9 December 2003.

⁸⁹ Regulation 7 para. 1(n) of the Regulations of the Court.

⁹⁰ Regulation 8 para. (d) of the Regulations of the Court.

⁹¹ Regulation 36 para. 1 of the Regulations of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁹² Rule 40 of the Rules.

⁹³ ICC-ASP/11/Res.8. The Roadmap was annexed to the Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC/ASP/11/31. The 'Revised Roadmap' was endorsed by the ASP on 27 November 2013, ICC-ASP/12/Res.8.

⁹⁴ Regulation 4 of the Regulations of the Court.

directly to the plenary of the judges, thus bypassing the ACLT⁹⁵. Furthermore, it is the Presidency that approves the Regulations of the Registry and any amendment thereto, as prepared by the Registrar following his consultations with the Prosecutor on matters affecting the operations of her office⁹⁶. Finally, it should be recalled that on the basis of a proposal made by the Registrar following consultations with the Prosecutor and independent representative body of counsel and legal associations, the Presidency drew up a Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel⁹⁷, which was adopted by the ASP⁹⁸.

⁹⁵ Regulations 5 and 6 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁹⁶ Rule 14 of the Rules and regulation 4 of the Regulations of the Registry.

⁹⁷ Rules 8 and 20 para. 3 of the Rules.

⁹⁸ Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, ICC-ASP/4/Res.1, 2 December 2005.

Article 39 Chambers*

1. As soon as possible after the election of the judges, the Court shall organize itself into the divisions specified in article 34, paragraph (b). The Appeals Division shall be composed of the President and four other judges, the Trial Division of not less than six judges and the Pre-Trial Division of not less than six judges. The assignment of judges to divisions shall be based on the nature of the functions to be performed by each division and the qualifications and experience of the judges elected to the Court, in such a way that each division shall contain an appropriate combination of expertise in criminal law and procedure and in international law. The Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions shall be composed predominantly of judges with criminal trial experience.
2. (a) The judicial functions of the Court shall be carried out in each division by Chambers;
(b) (i) The Appeals Chamber shall be composed of all the judges of the Appeals Division;
(ii) The functions of the Trial Chamber shall be carried out by three judges of the Trial Division;
(iii) The functions of the Pre-Trial Chamber shall be carried out either by three judges of the Pre-Trial Division or by a single judge of that division in accordance with this Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;
(c) Nothing in this paragraph shall preclude the simultaneous constitution of more than one Trial Chamber or Pre-Trial Chamber when the efficient management of the Court's workload so requires.
3. (a) Judges assigned to the Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions shall serve in those divisions for a period of three years, and thereafter until the completion of any case the hearing of which has already commenced in the division concerned;
(b) Judges assigned to the Appeals Division shall serve in that division for their entire term of office.
4. Judges assigned to the Appeals Division shall serve only in that division. Nothing in this article shall, however, preclude the temporary attachment of judges from the Trial Division to the Pre-Trial Division or vice versa, if the Presidency considers that the efficient management of the Court's workload so requires, provided that under no circumstances shall a judge who has participated in the pre-trial phase of a case be eligible to sit on the Trial Chamber hearing that case.

Literature: Abtahi, H., Article 38, in: J. Fernandez Et X. Pacreau (eds.) Commentaire article par article du Statut de la Cour pénale internationale, 983-998, Vol. I (2013); id., Ogwuma, O. And Young, R., 'The Composition of Judicial Benches, Disqualification and Excusal of Judges at the International Criminal Court', (2013) 11 JICJ 379-398.

Content

I. Paragraph 1.....	1
II. Paragraph 2.....	3
III. Paragraph 3.....	11
IV. Paragraph 4.....	13

* The authors are indebted to the work of Jules Deschênes and Christopher Staker in the first and second editions of this commentary.

I. Paragraph 1

1 Article 36 para. 1 provides that there shall be 18 judges. The judges of the Court are organized into three divisions, as foreseen by article 34 para. b:

- The Appeals Division, to be comprised of five judges including the President,
- the Trial Division, to be comprised of a minimum of six judges; and
- the Pre-Trial Division, to be comprised of a minimum of six judges.

Given that the Appeals Division must always consist of five judges, the 18th judge must be assigned to either the Trial or Pre-Trial Division.

One should remember that judges elected to the Court have established competence in either criminal law and procedure (List A) or international humanitarian law and human rights (List B); with, in both cases, experience in the practice of law.¹ The Presidency has confirmed that the language of this paragraph, echoing as it does that of article 36, indicates that it is the List A and List B competencies which are relevant for the purposes of the assignment of judges to divisions.² The assignment of judges to the various divisions must take into consideration the nature of the work of each division as well as the competence of each judge, in order to strike a proper balance between criminal law and procedure and international law.

2 Article 39 itself does not specifically state who is to conduct the assignment of judges to divisions. At various stages of the drafting process, a number of different opinions were expressed in that regard:

- assignment by the Presidency: ILC Draft of 1994³,
- election by the Court: Preparatory Committee;⁴ and
- choice by lot: France.⁵

This issue is resolved in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Rule 4*bis* provides that ‘... the Presidency shall, after consultation with the judges, decide on the assignment of judges to divisions in accordance with article 39, paragraph 1’. Introduced in December 2011 at the 10th session of the Assembly of States Parties, rule 4*bis* was a modification to the original rule 4, paragraph 1 of which had empowered the judges acting in plenary to assign judges to divisions.⁶ In introducing this amendment, the Assembly of States Parties had before it a report of the Study Group on Governance which considered this amendment to be ‘a possible way to strengthen the Presidency’s authority to oversee the administration of judges and minimize, to the extent possible, situations resulting in the extension of judicial mandates and/or the excusal of judges. ... the Study Group considered that the current mechanism to assign judges to divisions could potentially limit the proper administration of the Court, responsibility which [sic] lays in the Presidency’.⁷

II. Paragraph 2

3 Judicially the three divisions work through chambers.

The Appeals Chamber is composed of the five judges of the Appeals Division, including the President. The Appeals Chamber is the only chamber of the Court which has a fixed composition in the sense that all members of the Appeals Division are automatically

¹ See M. Bohlander, Article 36 para. 3.

² Decision concerning the Request of Mr. Germain Katanga of 14 November 2008 for re-composition of the bench of Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 21 November 2008, ICC-01/04-01/07-757, p. 7.

³ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 55.

⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 12.

⁵ Ibid., p. 22.

⁶ Resolution ICC-ASP/10/Res.1, 20 December 2011.

⁷ ICC-ASP/10/33, para. 21.

members of the Appeals Chamber, which must always carry out its functions with all five members.⁸ Trial and Pre-Trial Chambers, on the other hand, are composed by the Presidency as the need arises.⁹ There is little guidance provided as to how the Presidency is to compose chambers. The Presidency thus has a broad discretion to determine how to best achieve the sound and efficient administration of the Court, with it likely being guided by ‘factors such as the availability of judges, the prospective long-term needs of the Court in relation to the case or situation in question and relative judicial workload’.¹⁰

The language of sub-paragraph c provides for a flexible approach in which multiple chambers are constituted as the need arises. For example, as of the beginning of July 2014 there were six Trial Chambers (Trial Chambers I, II, III, IV, V(a) and V(b)) and two Pre-Trial Chambers. In the early practice of the Court, it was most often the case that each Trial Chamber was assigned one case, although with the increase of the caseload, it may be that a Trial Chamber has more than one case before it for a period of time.¹¹ It should be noted that there may be overlapping composition of the various Trial Chambers with one or more judges sitting in multiple chambers simultaneously. In relation to Pre-Trial Chambers, as of the beginning of July 2014, Pre-Trial Chamber I was assigned the situations in Libya, Côte d’Ivoire and the Registered Vessels, while Pre-Trial Chamber II was assigned the situations in Uganda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Darfur (Sudan), the Central African Republic (two situations), Mali and Kenya. The numerical disparity between the number of situations assigned to each Pre-Trial Chamber appears to strongly indicate that assignment of situations to Pre-Trial Chambers occurs on the basis of the assessment of actual and anticipated workload at the relevant time, rather than being solely based on alternating assignments.

A Trial Chamber is composed of three judges. The wording of paragraph 2(b)(ii) indicates that this will ordinarily be three judges of the Trial Division, however, this must be read in conjunction with paragraph 4 which allows also for the temporary attachment of a judge of the Pre-Trial Division to the Trial Division by the Presidency, thus allowing for the possibility that a judge of the Pre-Trial Division may also sit in a Trial Chamber (and vice versa). The emphasis on the envisaged structure of simultaneous chambers referred to in sub-paragraph c indicates that it is expected that a judge of the Trial Division may sit simultaneously in multiple differently composed Trial Chambers hearing different cases, where the efficient management of the Court’s work so requires, with this having already occurred regularly at the Court, as well as at the ad hoc Tribunals.¹² An amendment to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence introduced by the ASP in November 2012 added rule 132*bis* which specified that certain functions in relation to the preparation of a case for trial could be performed by one or more members of a Trial Chamber as designated by that Chamber, rather than requiring the participation of all three judges.¹³

⁸ Although this does not prevent a member of the Appeals Chamber from being replaced if necessary, see Regulation 12.

⁹ Rule 130; Regulation 46 para. 1.

¹⁰ Abtahi et al. (2013) 11 JICJ 379, 384; See generally Report of the Bureau of the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/10/30, 22 November 2011.

¹¹ For example, multiple cases were initially assigned to a single Trial Chamber, Trial Chamber V, before it was later split to form two separate Trial Chambers: V(a) and V(b); Decision referring the case of The Prosecutor v. Francis Kirimi Muthaura and Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta to Trial Chamber V, Presidency, 29 March 2012, ICC-01/09-02/11-414; Decision constituting Trial Chamber V and referring to it the case of The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang, Presidency, 29 March 2012, ICC-01/09-01/11-406; Decision constituting Trial Chamber V(a) and Trial Chamber V(b) and referring to them the cases of The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang and The Prosecutor v. Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, Presidency, 21 May 2013, ICC-01/09-01/11-745.

¹² See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Kanyabashi, Case No. ICTR-96-15-A, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on the Jurisdiction of Trial Chamber I, Joint and Separate Opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, Appeals Chamber, 3 June 1999; Prosecutor v. Nsengiyumva, Case No. ICTR-96-12-A, Decision on Appeal Against Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 28 Sep. 1998, Joint and Separate Opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, Appeals Chamber, 3 June 1999.

¹³ ASP Resolution ICC-ASP/11/Res.2, 21 November 2012.

- 6 A Pre-Trial Chamber is comprised of three judges, usually from the Pre-Trial Division, although there are certain functions of a Pre-Trial Chamber which can be performed by only one member of a Pre-Trial Chamber, acting as a single judge. The designation of a single judge is done by the Pre-Trial Chamber itself,¹⁴ based on criteria including seniority of age, criminal trial experience, the circumstances of proceedings before the chamber, as well as workload and proper case management.¹⁵ Rule 7 para. 2 specifies that a single judge may take decisions on questions where the Statute and Rules do not otherwise specify that the full chamber must decide.¹⁶ The Pre-Trial Chamber may at any time may decide that the functions of the single judge should be exercised by the full chamber (rule 7 para. 3), and may designate more than one single judge when the efficient management of the workload of the chamber so requires (regulation 47 para. 2), although it is normally expected that a single judge shall be designated for the duration of a case.
- 7 In practice, the composition of chambers follows a fixed procedure. Regulation 45 requires that the Prosecutor inform the Presidency in writing when a new situation is referred to the Court. In accordance with regulation 46 para. 2, the Presidency immediately assigns the situation to a Pre-Trial Chamber after having received the Prosecutor's notification.¹⁷ This could be either a pre-existing Pre-Trial Chamber or a newly composed one. Any cases which subsequently arise in this situation are thus considered by the Pre-Trial Chamber in question. In respect of the formation of Trial Chambers, it has been usual practice that, upon delivery of a decision confirming charges pursuant to article 61, the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber has remained seized of the case until the decision on the confirmation of charges becomes final. Once either a decision on leave to appeal has been denied or an actual appeal against the confirmation of charges decision has been rendered, the Pre-Trial Chamber then transmits the case file to the Presidency, in accordance with rule 129. Upon receipt of such notification, the Presidency then either constitutes a Trial Chamber and refers the case to it, transmitting the record of proceedings to such Chamber,¹⁸ or assigns the case to a pre-existing Trial Chamber.
- 8 The Court has had the opportunity to consider in detail the principles governing the constitution of chambers in response to a request before the Presidency for the reconstitution of Trial Chamber II.¹⁹ The applicant requested that the Presidency reconsider that Chamber's composition by replacing one Judge on the grounds, inter alia, that the Judge lacked qualifications and experience in the area of criminal practice and international criminal law and that the Chamber lacked a judge from the common law tradition.²⁰ The Presidency commenced with the observation that the Court's legal texts do not provide criteria for the constitution of chambers.²¹ According to article 36 para. 8, the Assembly of States Parties must consider the representation of the principal legal systems of the world when electing judges. However, although such factors might be part of the 'qualifications and experience' of the judges relevant to the assignment of judges to divisions in paragraph 1, paragraph 2 does not impose any further requirements regarding the composition of individual chambers. Thus, the common law system does not have to be represented in each chamber.²² The Presidency further specified that in the context of composing chambers it endeavours to

¹⁴ Rule 7 para. 1.

¹⁵ Regulation 47 para. 1.

¹⁶ See e.g. Article 57 para. 2 (a) of the Statute which sets out certain matters which must be dealt with by the full Pre-Trial Chamber.

¹⁷ See e.g. Decision Assigning the Situation in the Central African Republic to Pre-Trial Chamber III, Presidency, 19 January 2005, ICC-01/05-1.

¹⁸ See e.g. Decision constituting Trial Chamber III and referring to it the case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Presidency, 18 September 2009, ICC-01/05-01/08-534.

¹⁹ Decision concerning the Request of Mr. Germain Katanga of 14 November 2008 for re-composition of the bench of Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 21 November 2008, ICC-01/04-01/07-757.

²⁰ Ibid., p. 3.

²¹ Ibid., p. 4.

²² Ibid., pp. 4–5.

apply the criteria for the election of judges set out in article 36 para. 8 to the extent possible, although it is not required to do so. Yet, in these circumstances, an insufficient availability of judges from the common law tradition made it impossible to have a judge from such background in every Trial Chamber.²³

In respect of the questioning of the Judge's qualifications and experience, the Presidency noted, once again, that the assessment thereof was a matter for the Assembly of States Parties, acting pursuant to article 36.²⁴ The Presidency further noted that the requirements in article 39 para. 1 concerning an appropriate combination of expertise related to the assignment of judges to divisions and not to the composition of individual chambers.²⁵ Nonetheless, despite the lack of any obligation to do so, the Presidency indicated that it sought 'to ensure, where possible, an appropriate combination of expertise in criminal law and procedure and in international law within Chambers'.²⁶ The Presidency noted that the Trial Chamber in question had more judges from list A (i. e. 'established competence in criminal law and procedure') than List B.²⁷ Accordingly, the request for the re-composition was dismissed. This decision demonstrates that although paragraph 2 does not establish criteria for the composition of chambers and the Presidency maintains discretion in this regard, it seeks, wherever possible, to consider the criteria for the assignment of judges to divisions set out in paragraph 1, as well as those governing the elections of judges in article 36.

Although not expressly stated, the power to compose chambers necessarily also entails a power to re-compose them as the need arises.²⁸ Regulation 15 specifies that when the Presidency is replacing a judge in a Trial or Pre-Trial Chamber it shall take into account 'to the extent possible, gender and equitable geographical representation'. The Presidency has also dissolved Pre-Trial Chambers as necessary to ensure the efficient management of the Court's workload.²⁹

Finally, Regulation 14 specifies that each division shall elect a President who shall oversee the administration of that division. Each President is elected for a period of one year. Further, regulation 13 para. 2 provides that each Trial and Pre-Trial Chamber elects a Presiding Judge who performs the tasks specified for such role pursuant to the Court's legal texts.³⁰ Pursuant to regulation 13 para. 1, the Appeals Chamber also elects a Presiding Judge for each appeal coming before it.

III. Paragraph 3

Judges are assigned to the Pre-Trial and Trial Divisions for a term of three years. This term may be extended, should the hearing of a case still be ongoing when the formal end of the term is reached. The reference to 'hearing' has been interpreted as referring to the actual presentation of evidence in session (rather than the preparation of a case). For example, on several occasions a Trial Chamber of a certain composition has commenced the preparation of a case for trial, with the composition then being changed prior to the commencement of the actual hearing of the case.³¹ In reality, the availability of the mechanism of temporary attachment in paragraph 4 makes it difficult to understand the necessity of sub-paragraph (a) because, for example, even if a judge initially assigned to the Trial Division were reassigned to ²³ Ibid., p. 5.

²⁴ Ibid., p. 6.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 7.

²⁶ Ibid.

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ See e.g. Decision replacing judges in Trial Chamber III, Presidency, 20 July 2010, ICC-01/05-01/08-837.

²⁹ See e.g. Decision on the constitution of Pre-Trial Chambers and on the assignment of the Central African Republic situation, Presidency, 19 March 2009, ICC-01/04-560.

³⁰ Article 64 para. 8(b); Rules 122, 133, 141, 143, 170, 171.

³¹ Decision replacing a judge in Trial Chamber IV, Presidency 16 March 2012, ICC-02/05-03/09-308; Decision replacing judges in Trial Chamber III, Presidency, 20 July 2010, ICC-01/05-01/08-837.

the Pre-Trial Division after three years but still had an ongoing hearing in the Trial Division, there is no reason that the judge could not complete such hearing as a Pre-Trial Division judge temporarily attached to the Trial Division. Nonetheless, the reason for this specification is likely the need for absolute clarity in specifying that accused persons are entitled to have a case heard by the same chamber once it has reached the hearing stage, a point similarly emphasized by the provision for the extension of a judicial mandate in article 36 para. 10.

- 12 In the Appeals Division, judges ‘shall serve in that division for their entire term of office’. The judges of the Court have interpreted this to mean that once a judge is assigned to the Appeals Division, that judge is to remain in such division until the end of her or his mandate.³² Thus, a number of judges who have initially been assigned to the Pre-Trial or Trial Division have later been assigned to the Appeals Division to serve the remainder of their mandate.³³

IV. Paragraph 4

- 13 The first sentence of paragraph 4 indicates that a judge assigned to the Appeals Division shall serve only in that division. This stands in contrast to judges assigned to the Trial or Pre-Trial Division who may be temporarily attached to other divisions as the efficient management of the Court’s workload demands. In practice, such temporary attachments have been common place. For example, following the resignation of Judge Jorda, Judge Ušacka, a member of the Trial Division, was temporarily attached to the Pre-Trial Division in order to replace Judge Jorda in a Pre-Trial Chamber.³⁴ A number of judges assigned to the Pre-Trial Division have also sat in Trial Chambers,³⁵ clearly in response to the inability, in view of the Court’s growing caseload, of the maximum of seven judges assigned to the Trial Division to hear all active cases. This mechanism of temporary attachment makes it possible that a judge may simultaneously sit in both a Pre-Trial and Trial Chamber.³⁶

Although this paragraph prohibits absolutely any member of the Appeals Division from sitting in the Trial Division or Pre-Trial Division, it does not expressly prohibit judges of the Trial Division or Pre-Trial Division from sitting in the Appeals Division. Regulation 12 of the Regulations of the Court enables the Presidency to authorize the latter to occur where a member of the Appeals Division is prevented from sitting in a case for a substantial reason. This has been used regularly in order to replace judges who have been excused from particular appeals.

Finally, paragraph 4 makes clear that no judge who has participated in the pre-trial phase of the case may be a member of the Trial Chamber hearing the case, a scenario which would otherwise be possible due to both the practice of the temporary attachment of judges and the possibility of a judge moving between the Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions during their mandate.

³² For further discussion of this aspect see Schabas, ‘Article 39’, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP, 2010) 555–556.

³³ See e.g. ICC Press Release: ICC-CPI-20120315-PR778, 14 March 2012; ICC Press Release: ICC-CPI-20091911-PR399, 19 March 2009. This has implications in terms of the excusal of judges, see Abtahi and Young, article 41.

³⁴ See discussion in Abtahi, ‘Article 39’, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale Commentaire article Par article, i (Pedone, 2012) 1001.

³⁵ For example, Judges Van den Wyngaert, Fernández de Gurmendi and Herrera Carbuca.

³⁶ See e.g. the example of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul: Decision replacing a judge in Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 29 April 2009, ICC-01/04-01/07-1086.

Article 40 Independence of the judges

1. The judges shall be independent in the performance of their functions.
2. Judges shall not engage in any activity which is likely to interfere with their judicial functions or to affect confidence in their independence.
3. Judges required to serve on a full-time basis at the seat of the Court shall not engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.
4. Any question regarding the application of paragraphs 2 and 3 shall be decided by an absolute majority of the judges. Where any such question concerns an individual judge, that judge shall not take part in the decision.

Content

I. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
II. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	6
1. Paragraph 1	6
2. Paragraphs 2 and 3	7
3. Paragraph 4	11

I. Introduction/General remarks

This article enshrines the cardinal principle in the administration of justice: that judges must be independent. It ought to go without saying¹. Yet there have arisen so many examples where justice has been subverted to expediency and judges forced or tricked into serving political goals, that the principle bears reasserting.

It is not necessary to go back beyond modern-day international instruments. In 1945 the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which ‘forms an integral part of the [...] Charter’ of the United Nations² stated in its article 2:

‘the Court shall be composed of a body of independent judges ...’.

Then in 1948 the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed in its article 10:

‘Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal ...’.

In 1966 the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which entered into force in 1976, provided in the relevant part of its article 14 para. 1:

‘... everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law’.

Regional international instruments have taken a similar approach:

- the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights, article 26:
- ‘States Parties to the present Charter shall have the duty to guarantee the independence of the Courts ...’.

¹ ‘The fundamental human right of an accused to be tried before an independent and impartial tribunal is generally recognised as being an integral component of the requirement that an accused should have a fair trial’: Prosecutor v. Furundžija, Case No. IT-95-17/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 21 July 2000, para. 177 (see also the Declaration of Judge Shahabuddeen). See also, e.g., Prosecutor v. Kanyabashi, Case No. ICTR-96-15-A, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on the Jurisdiction of Trial Chamber I, Joint and Separate Opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, Appeals Chamber, 3 June 1999, paras. 36–38.

² Article 92 of the Charter.

- The American Convention on Human Rights, article 8 para. 1:
 - 'Every person has the right to a hearing, with due guarantees and within a reasonable time, by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal, previously established by law ...'.
 - The European Convention on Human Rights, article 6 para. 1:
'... everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law ...'.
- 2 On the basis of those unanimous statements of principle, the international community has adopted from time to time several Declarations which tend further to strengthen the principles. A few examples will suffice for our purposes.
- In 1985 the UN General Assembly endorsed³ and welcomed⁴ the *Basic Principles on the Independence on the Judiciary*⁵, which include the following principles:
1. 'The independence of the judiciary shall be guaranteed by the State and enshrined in the Constitution or the laws of the country. It is the duty of all governmental and other institutions to respect and observe the independence of the judiciary'.
 2. 'The judiciary shall decide matters before it impartially, on the basis of facts and in accordance with the law, without any restrictions, improper influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason'.
 3. 'There shall not be any inappropriate or unwarranted interference with the judicial process ...'.
 4. 'Everyone shall have the right to be tried by ordinary courts or tribunals using established legal procedures ...'.
 5. 'The principle of the independence of the judiciary entitles and requires the judiciary to ensure that judicial proceedings are conducted fairly and that the rights of the parties are respected'.
- 3 Then in 1989 the UN Commission on human rights approved⁶ the Draft Universal Declaration on the Independence of Justice which had been referred to it by the Sub-commission on the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities⁷. This comprehensive text is too long (72 articles) to be quoted here in full; but a few excerpts should be apposite:
