Under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) Rome Statute, and in contrast to the war crime of perfidious killing or wounding, it need not be the person improperly using the sign, nor anyone of his or her party to the conflict, that kills or wounds an adversary or intends such result⁴⁹⁹. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) can be read as having a broader scope of application and possibly even applying to the situation where the improper use eroded an adversary’s confidence in that the sign is always properly used, and thereafter kills or wounds a person identified and protected by the same sign in order to avoid a military disadvantage in case that person would be improperly using the sign⁵⁰⁰. While article 85 para. 3 Add. Prot. I requires that death or serious injury is ‘caused’ by the conduct described in paragraphs a – f of the provision, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) requires that the improper use ‘resulted’ in death or serious personal injury⁵⁰¹. The wording ‘resulting in’ might suggest that a less direct causal link is necessary between the improper use and the death or injury. However, while chances ⁴⁹⁴ ‘Le fait d’utiliser indûment ...’ and ‘[u]tilizar de modo indebido ...’ (emphasis added).

⁴⁹⁵ See the second element of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–2 to –4. Element 2 of article 8 para. 2 (b)(vii)–1 implies the same.

⁴⁹⁶ See, e.g., Oeter, Methods (1995) 202; ICRC, ‘Study on Second Set of War Crimes within Article 8’ (30 July 1999), (2)(B) Rome Statute 49.

⁴⁹⁷ See de Preux, in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 448–449 (para. 1534).

⁴⁹⁸ ‘[B]lessures graves’, ‘lesiones graves’, respectively (emphasis added).

⁴⁹⁹ Cf. de Preux, in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 448, para. 1532.

⁵⁰⁰ See German Draft International Crimes Code, p. 75.

⁵⁰¹ However, the French and Spanish language versions of article 8 para. 2 (b)(vii), which were translated from the text agreed on in English (as almost all provisions were mainly negotiated in English) provide ‘et ce faisant, de causer ...’ and ‘y así causar...’, respectively (emphasis added).

are that internationally protected signs will be less respected in future situations once they have been improperly used, and while such use consequently may eventually lead to deaths or injuries of protected persons, it will often be difficult to provide evidence of a concrete causal link between the abuse and such indirect result in particular cases.

In any event, even if no result of death or injury occurs, the person that improperly used a sign can be prosecuted for attempt insofar he had the requisite state of mind.

- 329 dd) Mental element. aaa) Knowledge of the prohibited nature of the improper use. In view of articles 30 and 32, it would generally appear appropriate to exclude the criminal responsibility of a perpetrator if he or she has not been aware of the ‘improper’ nature of his or her use of a particular sign. Indeed, article 32 para. 2 (second sentence) provides that ‘[a] mistake of law may ... be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if it negates the mental element required by such a crime ...’.
- 330 In view of the lack of clarity but importance of what state of mind is required under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii), the Preparatory Commission suggested that, except for the use of UN signs, it is sufficient that ‘[t]he perpetrator knew or should have known of the prohibited nature of such use’⁵⁰². Thereby, the Elements of Crimes appear to deviate from article 30 Rome Statute (which is permitted by the introductory words of article 30) by providing criminal responsibility for negligence. This seems to establish a duty of persons involved in an armed conflict to inform themselves what use of the flag of truce, the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions or signs of the adversary is prohibited under international humanitarian law⁵⁰³.
- 331 In contrast, the use of UN signs is only criminalized if ‘[t]he perpetrator knew of the prohibited nature of such use’⁵⁰⁴. Footnote 41 of the Elements of Crimes explains that ‘[t]he “should have known” test required in the other offences found in article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) is not applicable here because of the variable and regulatory nature of the relevant prohibitions’. This phrase was included as delegations deemed it too harsh to require knowledge of rules not contained in international treaties but merely in organizational regulations that in addition easily change. Of course, the should-have-known test in any event would have left it for the judge to decide whether or not the person could have been expected to be aware of the particular prohibition concerned or not, taking into account factors such as the variable and regulatory nature of the prohibition.
- 332 bbb) Knowledge that the conduct could result in death or serious personal injury. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) requires that the improper use ‘resulted’ in death or serious personal injury, while article 85 para. 3 Add. Prot. I requires that death or serious injury is ‘caused’ by the prohibited conducts⁵⁰⁵. The wording ‘resulting in’ might not only suggest that the causal link need not be as direct but also that a lesser level of intent or even no such intent of the perpetrator is necessary. However, given that the ‘result’ required under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) Rome Statute appears to be a material element, more specifically, a required consequence, article 30 para. 2 (b) Rome Statute seems to provide that the perpetrator must at least have been ‘aware that [the consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events’, which ⁵⁰² Element 3 of article 8 para. 2 (b)(vii)–1, –2 and –4 (emphasis added).

⁵⁰³ Fns. 39, 40, and 43 (to element 3 of article 8 para. 2 (b)(vii)–1,–2 and –4) explain that the should-have-known standard ‘recognizes the interplay between article 30 and article 32’. This phrase could be understood as meaning that the lacking awareness of the improper nature of the sign’s use amounts to a ‘mistake of law’ under article 32 para. 2 which ‘may ... be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if it negates the mental element required by such a crime’ (emphasis added). The cited element thus specifies, within the ‘discretion’ given by the ‘may’ in article 32 para. 3, the cases in which such a mistake of law will constitute a ground excluding criminal responsibility. The vague formulation of this phrase may be due to the difficulty of negotiators to find a systematic approach to the general issue of the mental element and in particular the relationship between Part. III of the Rome Statute and the particular definitions under article 8 and the Elements.

⁵⁰⁴ Element 3 of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–3 (emphasis added); reprinted here in Annex II.

⁵⁰⁵ See above, mn 77.

appears to come close to *dolus eventualis*⁵⁰⁶. Element 5 to article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)-1 through -4 suggests the requirement that '[t]he perpetrator knew that the conduct could result in death or serious personal injury' (emphasis added), which implies a lesser degree of expected probability and a lower standard of mens rea than article 30 para. 2 (b) Rome Statute.

ccc) Any particular intent required? Would the improper use of the listed signs resulting in death or injury also qualify as a war crime under ICC jurisdiction when the intent of the person improperly using them was in no way related to gaining a military advantage or to committing another unlawful act⁵⁰⁷? 333

c) Improper use of the flag of truce. Rules of international law on how flags of truce are to be used date far back. As recalled by the ICRC Study on customary international humanitarian law, the prohibition of improper use of the flag of truce is a 'long-standing rule of customary international law already recognised in the Lieber Code, the Brussels Declaration and the Oxford Manual'⁵⁰⁸ and were codified in articles 32–34 Hague Regulations. Article 32 Hague Regulations provides that the bearer of a flag of truce is inviolable from being attacked and from being taken prisoner. Also, a person who shows a flag of truce to express an intention to negotiate or surrender may qualify as a person hors de combat that must not be made the object of attack⁵⁰⁹. Article 23 (f) Hague Regulations prohibits to make improper use of a flag of truce, and article 38 para. 1 Add. Prot. I prohibits its deliberate misuse. Article 37 para. 1 (a) Add. Prot. I prohibits the perfidious use of the flag of truce⁵¹⁰. All of these provisions are of customary nature⁵¹¹. 334

A truce is an understanding, in the course of an armed conflict, to suspend hostilities, usually for a fixed time. The term may also refer to peace or the cessation or absence of hostilities. According to established practice, the flag of truce is white and indicates the desire of the person carrying it to communicate with his or her adversary⁵¹². The white flag, however, is not only used to symbolize a wish to negotiate truces or cease fires but also to indicate a decision to cease combat. The term 'flag of truce' thus sometimes is understood to also include a white flag indicating a willingness to surrender⁵¹³. 'Any other use, for example, to gain a military advantage over the enemy, is improper and unlawful.'⁵¹⁴ 335

Contemporary warfare, however, often is conducted with modern means of technological communication and without eye-sight of the adversary. While the protection of the flag of truce may still be of importance in face-to-face combat or negotiations, radio messages may be more effective and more commonly used to signal a willingness to negotiate, cease fire or surrender. It may thus be asked whether improperly using more modern ways of communication could also amount to the war crime of improperly using the flag of truce under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) Rome Statute⁵¹⁵. The German Military Manual states that '... It is also prohibited to make improper use of other distinctive signs equal in status with that ... of the flag of truce ...'⁵¹⁶. 336

⁵⁰⁶ See above, Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (i), mn 17.

⁵⁰⁷ See above, Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii), mn 36.

⁵⁰⁸ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 205.

⁵⁰⁹ See above, article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi), mn 64 et seq.

⁵¹⁰ See also above, article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi), mn 123 et seq.

⁵¹¹ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 205-7.

⁵¹² See, e.g., article 32 Hague Regulations.

⁵¹³ See Arnold, in: Wolfrum (ed.), MPIL, (2006). Cf., U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), Nos. 458–467; U.S. Commander's Handbook, section 11.9.5. See also, more generally, Greenspan, 'The Modern Law of Land Warfare' (1959) 380 et seq.; Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law, ii (1944) 425 et seq.

⁵¹⁴ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 207.

⁵¹⁵ On the challenges of electronic warfare with respect to the improper (and perfidious) use of signs, see Politakis, G.P., 'Stratagems and the prohibition of perfidy with a special reference to the laws of war at sea' (1993) 45 AustrianJPubL 301-306. See also, ICRC, Study on Second Set of War Crimes 49.

⁵¹⁶ German Joint Services Regulations, No. 1019, in Fleck (ed.), Handbook No. 230 (1999) (emphasis added). See also U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), No. 458(1) (second sentence) (stating that '[i]n current practice,

- 337 As regards individual criminal responsibility for improperly using the flag of truce, as early as 1863, article 114 of the Lieber Code considered the abuse of the flag of truce ‘an especially heinous offense’ for which the bearer who abused it for surreptitiously obtaining military knowledge can be deemed a spy. Article 33 para. 3 Hague Regulations also provides that a bearer of a flag of truce may be detained temporarily in case of abuse. The Responsibilities Commission of the 1919 Paris Peace Conference included the ‘misuse of flags of truce’ among its list of violations of the laws and customs of war to be prosecuted⁵¹⁷. The Nuremberg Tribunal even selected the improper use of flags of truce as an example of war crimes, pointing out that even though the Hague Regulations do not explicitly designate such a practice as criminal, past offenders have been tried and punished as war criminals for many years⁵¹⁸. While the perfidious use of the flag of truce gives rise to criminal responsibility under article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I insofar causing death or serious injury, the mere improper use of the flag, however, is not as such criminalized by the Geneva Conventions or the First Additional Protocol.
- 338 Certainly, a perfidious use of the white flag would qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii). According to the ICRC Commentary on article 38 para. 1 (second sentence) Add. Prot. I, ‘[t]o raise the white flag without a reason or for the sole purpose of deflecting attention away from a military operation in progress, or for other purposes conflicting with the law of armed conflict, such as threatening not to give quarter, constitutes a breach and may give rise to sanctions’⁵¹⁹. The US Army Field Manual states that ‘Flags of truce must not be used surreptitiously to obtain military information or merely to obtain time to effect a retreat or secure reinforcements or to feign a surrender in order to surprise an enemy’⁵²⁰.
- 339 Element 2 of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–1 Rome Statute requires that the white flag was used ‘in order to feign an intention to negotiate when there was no such intention on the part of the perpetrator’. The formulation of this element appears to have been drawn from the prohibition of perfidy under article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I less the requirement of an intent to betray the confidence created by the feigning⁵²¹.
- 340 d) Improper use of signs of the adversary. In contrast to the flag of truce and the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions, which identify for instance non-combatants or persons hors de combat, and the UN signs, which indicate a special status, the flag, military insignia and uniform of the adversary do not indicate any protected status under humanitarian law, and their improper use does not undermine the respect of international signs. In fact, feigning to belong to the armed forces of the adversary appears to always have been practiced to a certain degree, and it is unclear to what extent such feigning is prohibited under contemporary customary international law or else constitutes a permitted ruse of war⁵²².
- 341 As regards land warfare, it seems largely accepted in state practice and doctrine that the use of the adversary’s signs is not permitted while actually engaging in an armed attack. It is, however, unclear whether and to what extent it is a permitted ruse of war to use adversary’s signs during withdrawal or preparation of an attack insofar the disguise is abandoned before actual fighting begins, for instance to gain the advantage of surprise in attack or to lead the enemy to disperse its forces⁵²³.

radio messages to the enemy and messages dropped by aircraft are becoming increasingly important as a prelude to conversations between representatives of the belligerent forces’).

⁵¹⁷ 1950 ILC Draft Code II – Report by J. Spiropoulos Special Rapporteur, p. 264, para. 69.

⁵¹⁸ General Military Government Court of the U.S. Zone of Germany, Skorzeny et al. (1949) IX Law Reports 93.

⁵¹⁹ de Preux, in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 458, para. 1552.

⁵²⁰ U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), No. 53. See also ibid., No. 467; German Joint Services Regulations (Zentrale Dienstvorschrift (ZDV)) 15/2 (1992), reprinted in Fleck (ed.), Handbook No. 230 (1999).

⁵²¹ See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi).

⁵²² Article 37 para. 2 Add. Prot. I states that ruses of war are not prohibited, see article 8 para. 2 (b)(xi). For a deeper analysis of State practice, see Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 213–218.

⁵²³ For the doctrine, see, e.g. Jobst (1941) 35 AJIL 436–437, (holding that article 23 (f) Hague Regulations absolutely prohibits using enemy uniforms for purposes of deceiving the enemy) (with further references up to

In the Skorzeny case German soldiers used American uniforms and American vehicles in order to freely move behind American lines in order to sabotage and generally disrupt. Skorzeny however was acquitted without legal reasoning. The Commentator noted that the Tribunal had to determine whether the wearing of enemy uniforms was a lawful ruse of war, differentiating between the use of enemy uniforms in actual fighting as opposed to such use during operations other than fighting. The defense quoted H. Lauterpacht who had stated that, '[a]s regards the use of the national flag, the military ensigns, and the uniforms of the enemy, theory and practice are unanimous in prohibiting such use during actual attack and defense, since the principle is considered inviolable that during actual fighting belligerent forces ought to be certain who is friend and who is foe'⁵²⁴. The defense argued that the German soldiers had instructions to reach their objectives in enemy uniforms, but as soon as they were detected, they were to discard their American uniforms and fight under their true colours⁵²⁵. The acquittal has been interpreted as suggesting that the use of the Germans made of the enemy's uniform was not 'improper'⁵²⁶.

In another war crimes case, German soldiers were accused of having violated international rules of land warfare by disguising to remove an explosive charge placed by the Dutch at a bridge to forestall a crossing by the Germans. The comment by Committee I of the United Nations War Crimes Commission notes that this means of deception was clearly a permitted ruse of war recognized under article 24 Hague Regulations, while improper when used during the time of actual attack or defense. The Committee continues in interpreting the time of actual attack in a broad way: As '[i]n this particular case the Dutch uniform was used by the accused at a time when Dutch territory was being invaded and actual fighting was going on[,] [t]hose improperly wearing the uniform could not be considered as spies in the circumstances and were therefore war criminals', having violated article 23 (f) Hague Regulations⁵²⁷.

The US Army Field Manual states that '[i]n practice, it has been authorized to make use of national flags, insignia, and uniforms as a ruse. [article 23 (f) Hague Regulations] does not prohibit such employment, but does prohibit their improper use. It is certainly forbidden to employ them during combat, but their use at other times is not forbidden'⁵²⁸. A comment to article 40 of the Swiss Manual also states that 'it is for instance prohibited to attack and fight the enemy while wearing the enemy's uniform'⁵²⁹. Article 8 para. c of the 1880 Oxford Manual prohibits '[t]o attack an enemy while concealing the distinctive signs of an armed force'.

While article 39 para. 1 Add. Prot. I absolutely prohibits the use of signs of states not parties to the conflict and prohibits the use of UN signs except as authorized by the UN, article 39 para. 2 Add. Prot. I prohibits the use of uniforms of adverse parties only 'while engaging in attacks or in order to shield, favour, protect or impede military operations' (emphasis added), thereby clarifying the law to some degree. The ICRC Commentary suggests that the formulation in article 39 para. 2 Add. Prot. I also covers the preparatory 1941); Stephens and Skousgaard, in: Wolfrum (ed.), MPIL (2009); McCoubrey and White, International Law and Armed Conflict (1992) 226–227; UNWCC, History (1948) 490–491; Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 212–215; de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 465–469, paras. 1572–1579. Bordwell also states that '[t]he use of the national flag and of the uniform of the enemy is allowed for purposes of approach, but before fighting is begun, the true character of the ship or of the soldiers must be disclosed. This right of approach is well settled, although made little if any use of in recent times, especially on land. Complaints of fighting in the uniform of the enemy, however, have been numerous'. Bordwell, The Law of War between Belligerents (1908) 283–284. On State practice, see just below.

⁵²⁴ Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law, ii (1952) 335.

⁵²⁵ Skorzeny et al., IX Law Reports (1949) 90.

⁵²⁶ Rowe, Defence (1987) 113. Fleck however argues that the acquittal in this case cannot be taken as a yardstick, because the analysis of the acquittal in IX Law Reports 90–93 (1949), does not consider the legislative background of article 23 (f) Hague Regulations nor the situation of modern armed conflicts, Fleck (1974) 13 RDPM 281–282.

⁵²⁷ UNWCC, History (1948) 490–491.

⁵²⁸ U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), No. 54.

⁵²⁹ Swiss Army Regulations on the Laws and Customs of War, article 40, 12 (1978).

stage to an attack, referring to article 44 para. 3 Add. Prot. I⁵³⁰. In addition, the use of adversary signs is not criminalized as a grave breach under the Protocol, in contrast to the signs named under articles 37 and 38 Add. Prot. I⁵³¹. As regards sea warfare, No. 110 of the San Remo Manual can be considered to reflect customary international law⁵³² in stating that ‘Ruses of war are permitted. Warships and auxiliary vessels, however, are prohibited from launching an attack whilst flying a false flag ...’⁵³³, even if it seems this statement has not always been true in history⁵³⁴. Several national military manuals confirm this statement. The US Commander’s Handbook on the Law of Naval Operation for instance states that ‘Naval surface and subsurface forces may fly enemy colors and display enemy markings to deceive the enemy, Warships must, however, display their true colors prior to an actual armed engagement’⁵³⁵. The German Joint Services Manual provides that ‘Ruses of war are permissible also in naval warfare. Unlike land and aerial warfare, naval warfare permits the use of false flags or military emblems (article 39 para. 3 Add. Prot. I). Before opening fire, however, the true flag shall always be displayed’⁵³⁶.

346 With respect to air warfare, a commentary to Nos. 109–111 of the San Remo Manual points out that, contrary to warships, aircraft have never been entitled to bear false markings⁵³⁷. Article 19 of the 1923 Hague Rules of Air Warfare also categorically stated that ‘[t]he use of false external marks is forbidden’⁵³⁸. This absolute prohibition is confirmed by national military manuals⁵³⁹.

347 In sum, it appears broadly accepted that it is at least improper for combatants to wear the uniforms of the enemy or display enemy signs while actually engaging in an attack. The suggestion of element 2 of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–2 Rome Statute that the improper use of adversary signs needs to have been made ‘in a manner prohibited under the international law of armed conflict while engaged in an attack’ in order to qualify as a war crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC seems reasonable and generally in accordance with the laws and customs of war. This limitation of the offense’s scope of application to the moment in which persons actually engage in attack is a welcome clarification. The use of enemy uniforms etc. for exercise purposes or by prisoners of war or grounded parachutists who try to get back to their lines would thus for instance not amount to the offense defined under articles 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) Rome Statute⁵⁴⁰. It should also be taken into consideration that the capture of enemy

⁵³⁰ de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 467 (para. 1575).

⁵³¹ Article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I only prohibits the wilful and perfidious use of ‘protective’ signs recognized by the Conventions or the Protocol, thus not including adversary signs.

⁵³² See however, Politakis, Stratagems 272–301 and 307, (examining various World War examples and concluding that ‘[f]ar from pointing to an international custom, the degenerated practices of the two World Wars demonstrated that there do not exist commonly admitted principles’ with respect to the use of flags of the enemy or other states in the conduct of armed conflict at sea). See also Heintschel von Heinegg, The Law of Armed Conflicts at Sea, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (OUP 2013), 422.

⁵³³ L. Doswald-Beck (ed.), San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea (1995) 28.

⁵³⁴ Madden, M., ‘Of Wolves and Sheep: A Purposive Analysis of Perfidy Prohibitions in International Humanitarian Law’, (2012) 17 J S L 439, at 445, 446.

⁵³⁵ U.S. Commander’s Handbook, section 12.5.1.

⁵³⁶ German Joint Services Regulations, No. 1018, in Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (1999). See also Swiss Army Regulations, article 48.

⁵³⁷ Doswald-Beck (ed.), San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea (1995) 184.

⁵³⁸ Hague Rules of Air Warfare, Drafted by a Commission of Jurists at The Hague, Dec. 1922–Feb. 1923.

⁵³⁹ German Joint Services Regulations, No. 1018, in Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (1999). US Commander’s Handbook, section 12.5.2, also states that ‘[t]he use in combat of enemy markings by belligerent military aircraft is forbidden’. A comment to that rule indicates that ‘[t]his rule may be explained by the fact that an aircraft, once airborne, is generally unable to change its markings prior to actual attack as could a warship. Additionally, the speed with which an aircraft can approach a target (in comparison with warships) would render ineffective any attempt to display true markings at the instant of attack’, Thomas and Duncan (eds.), Annotated Supplement (1999) 513, fn. 14.

⁵⁴⁰ Cf., de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 463 (para. 1565); Fleck, Ruses of War 282; Bothe, Flags and Uniforms in War 403; Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 214.

material and belligerent occupation may result in particular situations in which the use of objects with adversary signs does not necessarily violate the prohibition to improperly use adversary signs.

The terms ‘flag or ... military insignia and uniform’ of the enemy refer to concrete visual objects. These terms should be understood to include distinguishing marks on airplanes, vehicles and buildings. However, electronic means of identification are not covered by the wording, at least in a strict literal interpretation. It has in addition been maintained that the prohibition does not apply to the ruse of using the adversary’s codes, passwords and countersigns to aid military operations⁵⁴¹. 348

e) Improper use of signs of the United Nations. The improper use of the flag, military insignia and uniform of the United Nations is prohibited by articles 37 para. 1 (d) and 38 para. 2 (d) Add. Prot. I and criminalized under article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I. Rule 60 of the ICRC Study on customary international humanitarian law introduces a nuance in that it prohibits the use of the United Nations emblem and uniform (except as authorized by the organisation), and not only their improper use.⁵⁴² 349

Even when UN personnel are or become involved in an armed conflict, the improper use of the UN signs should still be considered to qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–3, and not merely be treated as an improper use of enemy signs (article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–2) which may amount to a war crime only when the persons using them engage in an attack. Even if used by peace-enforcement operations, UN signs constitute ‘protective’ signs serving to protect ‘neutral’ zones as well as objects or personnel not involved in an armed conflict or in other places, times and circumstances⁵⁴³. 350

Element 2 of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–3 suggests that in order for an improper use of UN signs to qualify as a war crime under the Rome Statute, the perpetrator must have made such use ‘in a manner prohibited under the international law of armed conflict’. At first sight, this element seems to limit the cases to which article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) is applicable, as it could be maintained that UN regulations providing who is permitted to use UN signs under what circumstances do not (all) constitute rules of the international law of armed conflict. However, article 38 para. 2 Add. Prot. I prohibits all use ‘of the distinctive emblem of the United Nations’ that is not authorized by the United Nations. Element 2 is consequently somewhat circular and suggests, at least in a literal interpretation, that all use of UN signs not authorized by the UN may qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) as long as the other prerequisites are given, even if delegations at the Preparatory Committee may have intended this element 2 to limit the scope of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii). 351

The same phrase however could also be read as limiting the scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–3 to those cases in which a substantive rule of the Geneva Conventions or the Add. Prot. I or another direct source of humanitarian law rules directly prohibit a particular use, that is, without referring to a vague general formula like an ‘improper use’. This would certainly be the case regarding the prohibition of perfidy⁵⁴⁴. 352

With respect to naval warfare, No. 110 of the San Remo Manual can be considered to reflect customary international law in stating that ‘... Warships and auxiliary vessels ... are prohibited ... at all times from actively simulating the status of: ... (d) vessels protected by the United Nations flag; ...’. 353

Protected are ‘the flag or ... the military insignia and uniform ... of the United Nations’. The term ‘military insignia ... of the United Nations’ may be considered to refer to 354

⁵⁴¹ Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 214.

⁵⁴² Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 210.

⁵⁴³ Signs of adversary parties are not considered ‘protective’ signs under article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I. See, Zimmermann, in: Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987) 998, paras. 3495–3499; W. Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 517. See also de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. Commentary (1987), 439 (para. 1509). The argument that UN operations have a different legitimacy even if engaging in armed conflict and therefore should be better protected appears less convincing as it mixes elements of ius ad bellum into the ius in bello.

⁵⁴⁴ See articles 37 para. 1 (d) and 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I.

distinguishing marks or signs or badges of authority that identify personnel as members of the military, police or civilian components of the UN or its specialized agencies, or vehicles, vessels, aircraft, buildings or other objects of the UN or its specialized agencies⁵⁴⁵. It is unlikely that delegations at the Rome Conference intended to exclude signs used by UN personnel involved in non-military activities by using the term ‘military’. Rather, this term was drawn from the Hague wording referring to the signs of the enemy, while delegations appear not to have realized that this term might not be fully appropriate with regard to UN signs. Articles 37 para. 1 (d) and 38 para. 2 Add. Prot. I use the terms ‘signs’ and ‘emblems’ without such qualifier.

Protected signs thus certainly include the blue UN flag and other UN insignia like UN badges or UN helmets⁵⁴⁶.

- 355 f) Improper use of the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions. As early as 1863, the Lieber Code prohibited the abuse of the Red Cross. The Responsibilities Commission of the 1919 Paris Peace Conference included, besides the prohibition of ‘deliberate bombardment of hospitals’ and ‘attack and destruction of hospital ships’, also the ‘breach of other rules relating to the Red Cross’ in its list of violations of the laws and customs of war. The proper use of the emblems of the Geneva Conventions is regulated by numerous provisions of the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol I. Article 23 (f) Hague Regulations also prohibits ‘[t]o make improper use of ... the distinctive badges of the Geneva Convention’. Article 38 Add. Prot. I prohibits ‘to make improper use of the distinctive emblem of the Red Cross, Red Crescent or red lion and sun or of other emblems, signs or signals provided for by the Conventions or by this Protocol ...’. Article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I makes it a grave breach to cause death or serious injury by perfidiously using, in violation of article 37 Add. Prot. I, the protective signs recognized by the Geneva Conventions or the First Additional Protocol. Moreover, Article 6 of Add. Prot. III provides that the relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions and of the 1977 Add. Prot. governing inter alia the misuse of the distinctive emblems ‘shall apply equally to the third Protocol emblem’. In addition, recalling also the Oxford Manual and the Brussels Declaration, the ICRC Study on customary international humanitarian law contains a rule prohibiting the improper use of the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions.⁵⁴⁷
- 356 The ‘distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions’ are the Red Cross, the Red Crescent and the red lion and sun on a white ground⁵⁴⁸. Additionally, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) may in the future also be applied, at least with regard to parties to the conflict bound by the 2005 Additional Protocol III, to improper use of the additional emblem of the new ‘red crystal’, composed of a red frame in the shape of a square on edge on a white ground⁵⁴⁹.
- 357 Other internationally recognized emblems and signs or signals which are protected or recognized by the Geneva Conventions or the First or Third Additional Protocols do not constitute distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions. A different issue is whether the improper use of distinctive signals or other methods of identification different from the visual sign of the Red Cross or Red Crescent, which are recognized by the Annex of the Additional Protocol and used to indicate the same status and protection as the Red Cross or ⁵⁴⁵ See articles 1 (Definitions) and 3 (Identification) of the UN Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, UN Doc. A/RES/49/59 (9 Dec. 1994). The use of the United Nations flag is regulated by a code issued by the Secretary-General: The United Nations Flag Code and Regulations, UN Doc. ST/SGB/132 (January 1967), cited in, de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 459 (para. 1559).

⁵⁴⁶ It might even cover non-blue signs identifying personnel or objects associated with the UN, such as the yellow berets of unarmed Swiss assistance personnel providing medical or other civilian services to UN peace-keeping operations.

⁵⁴⁷ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 207 (rule 59).

⁵⁴⁸ See article 8 para. 1 Add. Prot. I, article 38 GC I, and article 41 GC II. The protection of the distinctive emblems of the Conventions is further developed by article 38 Add. Prot. I, and models of the emblems are found in Figure 2 (article 4) of the Regulations Concerning Identification, Annex I to Add. Prot. I (as amended on 30 Nov. 1993).

⁵⁴⁹ See article 2 et seq. of the 2005 Add. Prot. III.

the Red Crescent, such as radio signals when there is no direct eye contact, could also be subsumed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–4 Rome Statute⁵⁵⁰. The German Military Manual for instance states that ‘... it is prohibited to misuse the emblem of the Red Cross or to give a ship, in any other way, the appearance of a hospital ship for the purpose of camouflage. It is also prohibited to make improper use of other distinctive signs equal in status with that of the Red Cross (article 45 GC II; article 37 Add. Prot. I) ...’⁵⁵¹.

The protective emblems of the Geneva Conventions generally identify and protect sick or wounded persons as well as units and installations transporting or sheltering them and persons retrieving or caring for the⁵⁵². The emblems protect ‘medical units and transports, or medical and religious personnel, equipment or supplies’⁵⁵³. Who is entitled under what circumstances and for what particular purpose to use the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions is regulated with more specificity by the First, Second and Fourth Geneva Conventions, Part II of the First Additional Protocol and articles 2 to 6 of the Third Additional Protocol⁵⁵⁴. Given that the abuse of the emblems can substantially weaken the protection they might otherwise provide, the abuse of the emblems is categorically prohibited by the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocols I and III.

Element 2 of article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–4 Rome Statute suggests that the term ‘improper use’ must be understood as a use ‘for combatant purposes in a manner prohibited under the international law of armed conflict’. Footnote 42 of the Elements of Crime further spells out that ‘[c]ombatant purposes’ in these circumstances means purposes directly related to hostilities and not including medical, religious or similar activities. This specification appears reasonable, as it would not make sense that any use of the emblems not perfectly in accordance with the applicable prescriptions potentially qualifies under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) even if occurring in good faith to help sick and wounded.

The US Army Field Manual considers the following conducts as examples of an ‘improper use’ of the emblem of the Red Cross, which could all be subsumed under element 2 to article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)–3 Rome Statute: ‘Using a hospital or other building accorded such protection as an observation post or military office or depot; firing from a building or tent displaying the emblem of the Red Cross; using a hospital train or airplane to facilitate the escape of combatants; displaying the emblem on vehicles containing ammunition or other nonmedical stores; and in general using it for cloaking acts of hostility’⁵⁵⁵. A US Intermediate Military Government Court sentenced the accused Hagendorf on a charge of having ‘wrongfully used the Red Cross emblem in a combat zone by firing a weapon at American soldiers from an enemy ambulance displaying such emblem’⁵⁵⁶. The commentator remarked that ‘[i]t is hard to conceive of a more flagrant misuse than the firing of a weapon from an ambulance by personnel who were themselves protected by such emblems and by the [Geneva] Conventions, in the absence of an attack upon them’⁵⁵⁷.

⁵⁵⁰ Such other methods of identification are covered by the prohibition of improper use of signs under article 38 para. 1 Add. Prot. I. Israel uses the red shield of David, while considering to ratify Add. Prot. III.

⁵⁵¹ German Joint Services Regulations, No. 1019, in Fleck (ed.), Handbook No. 230 (1999) (emphasis added).

⁵⁵² On the protection of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, see generally, e.g., Rabus, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013) 293. It is submitted that article 8 para. 2 (b)(vii) applies to the protective use of the emblem for those engaged on tasks provided for by the Geneva Conventions and the Add. Prots. It does not apply to the indicative use of the Red Cross to show authorized affiliation with international or national Red Cross organizations, which in armed conflict will always be done with an emblem of a small size which may not be displayed on armbands or rooftops and which is not covered as such under article 38 Add. Prot. I. See Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 208, fn. 1; de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 450–451, paras. 1539–1540.

⁵⁵³ Article 8 para. 1 Add. Prot. I.

⁵⁵⁴ On the protection of the emblem and repression of abuses, see in particular articles 38, 44, 53 and 54 GC I; articles 41 to 45 GC II; articles 18, 20 and 22 GC IV; articles 8 to 31 (above all article 18), 37, 38 and 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I. See also Arnold, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv).

⁵⁵⁵ See U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), No. 55.

⁵⁵⁶ U.S. Intermediate Military Government Court at Dachau, Heinz Hagendorf (8–9 August 1946), XIII Law Reports 146 (1949).

⁵⁵⁷ Ibid., at 148.

361 Delegations intended to cover abuses to kill or wound the adversary as well as cases in which the distinctive emblems are used to gain another military advantage which then leads to death or injury because the confidence that the emblems are properly used by all sides has been lost or was reduced.

362 As regards the law of naval warfare, No. 110 of the San Remo Manual can be considered to reflect customary international law in stating that ‘... Warships and auxiliary vessels ... are prohibited ... at all times from actively simulating the status of: (a) hospital ships, small coastal rescue craft or medical transports; (b) vessels on humanitarian missions; ... (f) vessels entitled to be identified by the emblem of the Red Cross or Red Crescent’.

8. Paragraph 2(b)(viii): Prohibited deportations and transfers in occupied territories

Literature: Benvenisti, E., The international Law of Occupation (PUP 1993); Brecht, F., Anwendbarkeit des humanitären Völkerrechts im Israel-Palästina-Konflikt (Duncker & Humblot Berlin 2009); Haslam, E. ‘Unlawful Population Transfer and the Limits of International Criminal Law’, (2002) 61 CambridgeLJ 66; Henckaerts, J.M., Mass Expulsion in Modern International Law and Practice (Nijhoff Leiden 1995); Kretzmer, D., ‘The Advisory Opinion: The Light Treatment of International Humanitarian Law’, (2005) 99 AJIL 88; Meindersma, C. ‘Legal Issues Surrounding Population Transfers in Conflict Situations’, (1994) 41 NethLLRev 31; Meron, T., ‘Deportation of Civilians as a War Crime Under Customary Law’, in: D. Gomien (ed.), Broadening the Frontiers of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Asbjørn Eide (Scandinavian University Press 1993) 201; Roberts, A., ‘Prolonged Military Occupation: The Israeli-Occupied Territories Since 1967’, (1990) 84 AJIL 44; Dörmann, K. ‘Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court: The Elements of War Crimes. Part II: Other Serious Violations of the Laws and Customs Applicable in International and Non-International Armed Conflicts’, (2001) 83 ICRC 481 et seqq. <https://www.icrc.org/eng/assets/files/other/461-488_dormann.pdf> accessed 16 January 2015; Olson, W. ‘UN Security Council Resolutions Regarding Deportations from Israeli-Administered Territories’, (1987–88) 24 StanJIL 611; Official Records of the Diplomatic Conference on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflicts, vi (1977), 291; von Hebel, H., ‘The Elements of War Crimes’, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers New York 2001) 159; ‘Entwurf eines Gesetzes zur Einführung des Völkerstrafgesetzbuches’ 29, Drucksache 14/8524, <<http://dip21.bundestag.de/dip21/btd/14/085/1408524.pdf>> accessed 19 October 2014; Elon Moreh case, No. H.C. 390/79, reprinted in: Shamgar, M. ‘Legal Concepts and Problems of the Israeli Military Government – the Initial Stage’, in: M. Shamgar (ed.), Military Government in the Territories Administered by Israel 1967–1980: The Legal Aspects (Alpha Press Jerusalem 1982) 404, 419–26; ‘Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory’ ICJ Advisory Opinion, ICJ Reports 2004, 136, delivered on 9 July 2004. <<http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/131/1671.pdf>> accessed 15 October 2014; Pégurier, C., Ethnic Cleansing: A Legal Qualification (Routledge New York 2013); Lehmler, L., Die Strafbarkeit von Vertreibungen aus ethnischen Gründen im bewaffneten nicht-internationalen Konflikt (Nomos Baden-Baden 1999); Mulaj, K., Politics of Ethnic Cleansing: Nation-State Building and Provision of In-Security in Twentieth-Century Balkans (Lexington Books Lanham 2008); Preece, J.J., ‘Ethnic Cleansing as an Instrument of Nation-State Creation: Changing State Practices and Evolving Legal Norms’, (1998) 20 HumRtsQ 817; Köhler, S., Das Massenvertreibungsverbot im Völkerrecht (Verlag Spitz Berlin 1999); Henckaerts, J.M., Mass Expulsion in Modern International Law and Practice (Nijhoff Leiden 1995); Dawson, G. and Farber, S., Forcible Displacement Throughout the Ages: Towards an International Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Forcible Displacement (Nijhoff Leiden 2012); de Zayas, A., ‘International Law and Mass Population Transfers’, (1975) 16 HarvILJ 211; Meron, T., ‘Deportation of Civilians as a War Crime Under Customary Law’, in: D. Gomien (ed.) Broadening the Frontiers of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Asbjørn Eide (Scandinavian University Press Oslo 1993) 201; ‘Australian Law Concerning Trials of War Criminals by Military Courts’, in: Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Selected and prepared by the United Nations War Crimes Commission (London 1948), vol. V 95; Solf, W.A. and Cummings, E.R., ‘A Survey of Penal Sanctions under Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949’, (1977) 9 CaseWesternResJIL 232 et seqq.; Junod, S., ‘Article 17’, in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Nijhoff 1987) 1471; Roberts, R., ‘Prolonged Military Occupation: The Israeli-Occupied Territories Since 1967’, 1990 84 AJIL 44, 83 et seqq.; Gasser, H.P., ‘Protection of the Civilian Population’, in: D. Fleck (ed.), The Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflict (1995) 246 and 251; Meindersma, C., ‘Legal Issues Surrounding Population Transfers in Conflict Situations’ (1994) 4141 NILR 31; Zimmermann, B., ‘Article 85’, in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Nijhoff 1987).

363 The prohibited acts contained in Art. 8 b (viii) Rome Statute are twofold and constitute two different crimes. First, it criminalizes the direct or indirect transfer by an occupying power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies. Second, the deportation or transfer of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within or outside this territory is prohibited.⁵⁵⁸ Both manners of transfer and deportation have severe humanitarian, economic, political and social long-term consequences, by changing the demographic composition of a territory, protracting conflicts and creating factual situations which are difficult to reverse.⁵⁵⁹ The creation of such faits accomplis render the settlement of conflicts more complicated,⁵⁶⁰ in particular with regard to land restitution and return of refugees and internally displaced people. Both acts are only criminalized in international armed conflicts.⁵⁶¹

a) War crime of transferring parts of the own population into occupied territory. The war crime of transferring parts of the population of the Occupying Power into the occupied territory aims at protecting the status as well as the population and property of occupied territory against the long-lasting effects of settlements by the Occupying Power and its population. 364

aa) Normative origins and drafting history. aaa) The underlying issues and the objectives of the prohibition. The transfer by an Occupying Power of its own civilian population into territory it occupies usually has substantial lasting consequences. Such transfers not only change the demographic composition within the occupied territory, but experience shows that they often lead to restrictions of the original inhabitants' free movement as well as constraints of property and other fundamental rights. In addition, inhabitants of the occupied territory that may have become refugees or been internally displaced during the prior armed conflict may encounter added difficulties to return because of the transfers. The new settlers may defend, often protected by the Occupying Power, their new housing and settlements and resist the original inhabitants' return and reappropriation of property and housing 365

Occupying Powers often initiate, promote, support or at least tolerate transfers and shifts in the demographic composition of the occupied territory to factually weaken the position of the resident population of the occupied territory and solidify its territorial and political claim over the territory, not infrequently with the end goal to annex the territory or parts of it. Implantations of settlements and settlers can constitute a powerful and difficult-to-reverse means of ethnic cleansing. 366

bbb) The normative framework. (1) The conceptual framework of the law of belligerent occupation. Article 2 common of the GC defines in para 2 the scope of application of the conventions. They also apply to 'all cases of partial or total occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance.' Occupation in international humanitarian law is defined in Regulation 42 of the Annex to the Hague Convention respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land,⁵⁶² which reads: 367

⁵⁵⁸ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2001) 83 ICRC. <https://www.icrc.org/eng/assets/files/other/461-488_dormann.pdf> accessed 16 January 2015 461 481 et seq.

⁵⁵⁹ The indictment in the case of the Major War Criminals before the IMT Nuremberg in 1945 held, under the title 'Germanization of Occupied Territories': '[...] the defendants methodically and pursuant to plan endeavored to assimilate those territories politically, culturally, socially and economically into the German Reich. The defendants endeavored to obliterate the former national character of these territories. In pursuance of these plans and endeavors, the defendants forcibly deported inhabitants who were predominantly non-German and introduced thousands of German colonists.' IMT Nuremberg, Case of the Major War Criminals, Indictment, 20 November 1945, Count 3(J) pp 63–65. Excerpts in Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck (eds), Customary International Humanitarian Law. Practice (2005) vol. II p. 2968 Note 420.

⁵⁶⁰ The UN SC held in its Resolution 465, 1 March 1980 on Israeli settlement policies in the occupied territories that 'Israel's policy and practices of settling parts of its population and new immigrants in those territories constitute a flagrant violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War and also constitute a serious obstruction to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East.' S/RES/465 (1980) 1 March 1980, para 5.

⁵⁶¹ Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) mn. 1238.

⁵⁶² Convention (IV) respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and its annex: Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land. The Hague, 18 October 1907.

‘Territory is considered occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army’. Under international law, occupation must be limited in time due to the general ban of use of force stipulated in the UN Charter. The political, social and cultural life in occupied territories should be changed as little as possible. Therefore, the objective of 85 para 4 (a) AP I is to avoid that the demographic, social and political conditions are altered by the Occupying Power to the social and economic detriment of the population living in the occupied territory.⁵⁶³

- 368 A party to a conflict occupying territory is not free to act as it likes within that territory. International humanitarian law provides rules specifying the rights and obligations of a belligerent power with regard to the occupied territory and its inhabitants. International law and more particularly the UN Charter generally ban the use of force and, as a consequence, also the acquirement of foreign territory by force. Therefore, annexing conquered territory is prohibited. Hence, under international law, any belligerent occupation must necessarily be temporary. Correspondingly, international humanitarian law provides for obligations of Occupying Powers as an interim military administrator, essentially similar to a trusteeship. The Occupying Power for instance is not permitted to change the law in force in the territory ‘unless absolutely prevented’ (article 43 Hague Regulations). The political and public life and the occupied territory itself, including its demographic composition, should be changed as little as possible and without effecting the situation after the end of the armed conflict.⁵⁶⁴ According to article 46 Hague Regulations, reflecting customary international law, the private property in occupied territory ‘must be respected’ and ‘cannot be confiscated’. Article 53 GC IV provides in addition that:

‘Any destruction by the Occupying Power of real or personal property belonging individually or collectively to private persons, or to the State, or to other public authorities, or to social or cooperative organizations, is prohibited, except where such destruction is rendered absolutely necessary by military operations’⁵⁶⁵

- 369 Reprisals against civilians and their property as well as collective penalties or measures of intimidation are prohibited.⁵⁶⁶ The extensive destruction or appropriation of property not justified by military necessity may also amount to a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv) and (b) (xiii) Rome Statute.
- 370 (2) Basic rules prohibiting transfers into occupied territory. The prohibition of the transfer of parts of their own civilian population by states into a territory they occupy is considered as a norm of customary international humanitarian law applicable in international armed conflicts.⁵⁶⁷
- 371 Article 49 para 6 GC IV provides that ‘[t]he Occupying Power shall not deport or transfer parts of its own population into the territory it occupies.’ The UN Security Council has repeatedly condemned transfers of an Occupying Power’s own population into occupied territory, considering it ‘a flagrant violation of the [Fourth] Geneva Convention.’⁵⁶⁸ Arti-

⁵⁶³ ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949, 3504.

⁵⁶⁴ Gasser, in: Fleck and Bothe, Handbook (2008) 246 and 251.

⁵⁶⁵ See also articles 48 et seq. AP I.

⁵⁶⁶ Article 33 para 3 GC IV; articles 20 and 51 para 6 AP I.

⁵⁶⁷ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005), vol. I, 462 et seq. The national legislation of many states as well as numerous military manuals prohibit the deportation or transfer by a party to the conflict of parts of its civilian population into the territory it occupies. This prohibition is supported by a number of official statements and reported practice. Further, attempts to alter the demographic composition of an occupied territory have repeatedly been condemned by the UN SC, cf. Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary IHL (2005), vol. II, 2956 et seq.

⁵⁶⁸ The UN Security Council stated for instance that ‘Israel’s policy and practices of settling parts of its population and new immigrants in [the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967] constitute a flagrant violation of the [Fourth] Geneva Convention’, UN SC Res. 465 (1980) para 5. In another resolution, it has called upon Israel to ‘desist from taking any action which would result in changing the legal status and geographical nature and materially affecting the demographic composition of the Arab territories occupied ...

cle 85 para. 4 (a) AP I, which was adopted by consensus,⁵⁶⁹ explicitly criminalizes the act as a grave breach of Additional Protocol I.⁵⁷⁰ Many states penalize the transfer of own civilian population by Occupying Powers.⁵⁷¹

(3) Drafting history. The International Law Commission included the ‘establishment of settlers in an occupied territory and changes to the demographic composition of an occupied territory’ as exceptionally serious war crime in article 22 para 2 (b) of its 1991 Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind.⁵⁷² In its 1996 Draft Code, the International Law Commission included as a war crime, insofar ‘committed willfully in violation of international humanitarian law: (i) the transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies’ as a violation of international humanitarian law (lit. c ii).⁵⁷³

The wording of article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute, in particular regarding the transfer of its own population by an Occupying Power to territories under its occupation was controversial during the preparatory and the Rome negotiations due to political disagreement. Israel opposed the inclusion of any war crime based on article 85 para 4 (a) AP I, supported, to a limited extent, only by the United States. The overwhelming majority of the delegations in Rome however rejected the argument of Israel⁵⁷⁴ that this grave breach would not be part of customary international law⁵⁷⁵ and preferred a wording based on the first part of article 85 para. 4 (a) AP I. However, the Arab delegations wished to clarify by way of the offense’s definition that it does not only apply to the direct organization by the Occupying Power of such transfers, but also criminalizes measures of an occupying power and its agents that (indirectly) encourage, facilitate or promote the transfer of its population into the occupied territory. After intense negotiations opposing primarily Arab states and Israel, the wording ‘directly or indirectly’ was added.⁵⁷⁶ Most state parties did not consider this addition and, in particular, not to transfer parts of its own civilian population into the occupied Arab territories’, SC Res 446 (1979) para 3. See also SC Res 452 (1979); SC Res 476 (1980); Olson (1987–88) 24 StanJIL 611.

⁵⁶⁹ Official Records (1977) Vol. VI CDDH/SR.44, 291. This provision was not least adopted in view of the Israeli settlements on the Golan Heights and on the West Bank.

⁵⁷⁰ Article 147 GC IV does not appear to criminalize a violation of article 49 para 6 GC IV, since it only criminalizes an ‘unlawful deportation or transfer [...] of a protected person’, and since the Occupying Power’s own population is not the object of protection of article 49 GC IV. Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960), 599.

⁵⁷¹ See list in Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck Customary IHL (2005), vol. II, 2958 et seq.

⁵⁷² The commentary to article 22 stated that this crime constituted ‘a particularly serious misuse of power, especially since such an act could involve the disguised intent to annex the occupied territory. Changes to the demographic composition of an occupied territory seemed to the Commission to be such a serious act that it could echo the seriousness of genocide.’ Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, Document A/46/10. Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-third session, 29 April–19 July 1991, Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-sixth session, Supplement No. 10. http://legal.un.org/ilc/documentation/english/A_46_10.pdf (last visited on 20 October 2014).

⁵⁷³ ICL Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind with commentaries (51 UN GAOR Supp. (No. 10) at 14, UN Doc. A/CN.4/L.532, corr.1, corr.3 1996) YbILC (1996) (vol II part 2) 53.

⁵⁷⁴ Israel, which is party to AP I opposed the inclusion of the crime of transferring own population into occupied territory by an Occupying Power, arguing that this grave breach was not part of customary international law. See: von Hebel and Robinson, ‘Crimes within the Jurisdiction of the Court’, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (Nijhoff Leiden 1999) 112 et seq.

⁵⁷⁵ Four options of definitions were submitted to the Rome Conference: ‘(f) Option 1: the transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies; Option 2: the transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, or the deportation or transfer of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within or outside this territory; Option 3: (i) the establishment of settlers in an occupied territory and changes to the demographic composition of an occupied territory; (ii) the transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, or the deportation or transfer of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within or outside this territory; Option 4: no paragraph (f): Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p 20 (Art. 5 – War crimes – B.(f)).

⁵⁷⁶ Hebel and Robinson (n 574) 113 affirm that the Arab group also intended to cover the case where the Occupying Power does not take effective steps to prevent the population from organizing such transfers, an omission which, however, is not clearly implied by the term ‘indirectly’.

as an extension of the scope of article 85 para 4 (a) AP I, but rather as a clarification.⁵⁷⁷ As a result, the part of article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) Rome Statute criminalizing the transfer of the occupying power's own population is identical with article 85 para. 4 (a) Add. Prot. I with the exception of the wording 'directly or indirectly'⁵⁷⁸, the omission of the reference to article 49 GC IV and to a specific standard of mens rea.

374 The drafting of the Elements of Crime of Article 8(2)(b)(viii) proved difficult too and caused major controversy around the questions whether a transfer must be forcible, whether the crime shall be limited to large-scale transfers of the population and whether the economic situation of the local population must be worsened and their separate identity be endangered by the transfer.⁵⁷⁹ A particular difficulty in drafting the elements stemmed from the need to 'translate' the Occupying Power's obligation not to transfer its own population in occupied territory into a criminal offense defining the circumstances under which a particular individual incurs criminal responsibility for his or her conduct.

375 The Preparatory Committee strived to determine, first, for what precise acts an individual becomes criminally responsible for the war crime spelled out in article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii), and, second, in what way – if at all – the Occupying Power needs to be involved in some way. Four different proposals for the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii)-1 were tabled.⁵⁸⁰ The US proposal suggested material as well as mental elements that cannot be found in nor derived from article 49 para. 6 GC IV and article 85 para. 4 (a) AP I, including the requirements that the transfer was compulsory, worsened the economic situation of the local population, endangered their separate identity, and that the perpetrator had a special intent. In addition, the US comment to these proposals suggested that transfers could be justified where serving the 'public order and safety' (article 43 Hague Regulations). Since these ⁵⁷⁷ von Hebel, in: Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 159.

⁵⁷⁸ In the commentary to the Draft of the German Code of Crimes Against International Law (Entwurf eines Gesetzes zur Einführung des Völkerstrafgesetzbuches, Drucksache 14/8524, (2002) <<http://dip21.bundestag.de/dip21/btd/14/085/1408524.pdf>> accessed 19 October 2014) 29, the drafters stated that the provision reflects customary international law and obviously and in any event covers both direct and indirect acts of transfer, which is why the phrase 'directly or indirectly' is not repeated in the Code.

⁵⁷⁹ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2001) 83 IRRC 481 et seq.

⁵⁸⁰ Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999):

- '1. That the act took place in the course of a military occupation with respect to territory where authority of a hostile army was actually established and exercised.
2. That the accused intended to effect the compulsory transfer, on a large scale, of parts of the population of the Occupying Power into such occupied territory.
3. That the accused effected such transfer of nationals of the Occupying Power into such occupied territory.
4. That the accused intended that such transfer would endanger the separate identity of the local population in such occupied territory.
5. That the transfer worsened the economic situation of the local population and endangered their separate identity.
6. That the transfer was without, and the accused knew it was without, lawful justification or excuse'.

Proposal by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8 (19 July 1999):

- '... 2. The perpetrator: (a) Transferred, directly or indirectly, parts of its own population into the territory it occupies';

Proposal by Japan UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.12 (22 July 1999):

- '1. The act took place in the context of military occupation with respect to territory where authority of a hostile army was established and exercised.
2. The Occupying Power caused the transfer, directly or indirectly, of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies,
3. The accused was responsible for such transfer or deportation.
4. Such transfer or deportation was conducted in violation of article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention'.

Proposal by Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.25 (10 Aug. 1999):

- '... 2. The perpetrator, directly or indirectly:

- (a) Induced, facilitated, participated or helped in any manner in the transfer of civilian population of the Occupying Power into the territory it occupies; ...

3. The perpetrator acted wilfully and knowingly'.

additional requirements would have considerably increased the threshold of the required evidence, they were unacceptable to a great number of delegations. The elements proposed by Arab states specified the forms of an individual's participation in the transfer that may give rise to his criminal responsibility, ie the perpetrator 'induced, facilitated, participated or helped in any manner'.⁵⁸¹ This specification however was considered unnecessary, since Part III of the Rome Statute specifies the possible forms of participation giving rise to responsibility under the Statute and did not gather sufficient support among other delegations. The Japanese proposal was the only one explicitly addressing how the Occupying Power and the perpetrator, respectively, must be involved in the transfer, stating that the Occupying Power 'caused' the transfer, while the accused had to be 'responsible' for such transfer. The proposal by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland (hereinafter 'Swiss proposal') essentially merely replaced the wording of the Rome Statute 'the Occupying Power' by 'the perpetrator'. The formulation that '[t]he perpetrator (a) Transferred ... its own population', however, was orally amended when the Swiss delegation presented it to the Preparatory Commission so as to read 'the perpetrator (a) Transferred, directly or indirectly, parts of the population of the occupying power into the occupied territory it occupies'.⁵⁸²

While all four proposals were commented upon, the Swiss proposal became the primary focus of the discussions at the August 1999 session of the Preparatory Commission.⁵⁸³ The negotiations were increasingly conducted informally between the Arab group and Israel supported by the US. The Arab group opposed the oral amendment of the Swiss proposal by Switzerland and preferred the previous wording, since the amendment explicitly referred to the occupying power and therefore might be interpreted as requiring some form of government involvement. Israel also preferred to keep the wording 'its own population' and to simply add a footnote to the elements according to which '[t]he term transfer needs to be interpreted in accordance with the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law' 405 Delegations eventually decided to keep the original, written formulation of the Swiss proposal, which grammatically is illogical since an individual perpetrator cannot have an 'own population', but ironically allowed for a compromise between the Arab group and Israel (as well as the US).

In contrast with the Rome Statute, article 85 para. 4 (a) Add. Prot. I and article 49 para. 6 GC IV, the Elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) omit the word 'civilian'. The Costa Rican/Hungarian/Swiss delegations, who had presented the initial wording leading to these elements and which already omitted that word, had not meant thereby to indicate any departure from the wording of the Additional Protocol or the Fourth Geneva Convention. The same seems to apply to the delegations participating in the negotiations in Rome. Namely, subsequent to the compromise between the Arab group and Israel (and the US), Turkey had proposed informally to add the word 'civilian' again to the elements of article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) to bring it into line with the Rome Statute. Yet, this proposal was rejected in order not to reopen the carefully balanced compromise, and not because there was a disagreement on substance.⁵⁸⁴

bb) Elements of Crime. aaa) Actus reus. A first element of the war crime of transferring an Occupying Power's population into occupied territory is a transfer of persons into

⁵⁸¹ The wording however did not strictly elaborate on the meaning of 'directly or indirectly'. The elements proposed by the Arab states applied the wording 'directly or indirectly' also to the war crime of transferring or deporting population of the occupied territory, which however is inconsistent with the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii).

⁵⁸² Proposals in relation to elements of article 8(2)(b)(viii) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/INF/3 (12 Aug. 1999), fn. 1.

⁵⁸³ The Preparatory Commission session of August 1999 was unable to find agreement on a generally acceptable compromise and merely compiled the four proposals, Proposals in relation to elements of article 8(2)(b)(viii) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/INF/3 (12 Aug. 1999).

⁵⁸⁴ Israel might have hoped to create an opportunity to argue that certain provisions are not part of customary law. However, the footnote states what in any event applies for all the definitions of the Rome Statute as well as elements thereto and therefore is superfluous.

occupied territory. The wording ‘transfer’ denotes a physical displacement that is, as the offense’s objective suggests, of a certain duration.⁵⁸⁵ An only short-term displacement into the occupied territories, such as a tourist visa, clearly would not suffice.

379 As the definition of the war crime under the Rome Statute as well as article 49 para. 6 GC IV and article 85 para. 4 (a) AP I make it clear that the persons transferred must be persons belonging to the Occupying Power’s own civilian population.⁵⁸⁶ The relocation of members of the armed forces into the occupied territory to perform military tasks as occupiers does not qualify under article 8 para 2 (b) (viii).⁵⁸⁷ However, the contrary would seem to apply if members of the armed forces would establish themselves permanently with their families in private settlements or houses in the occupied territory.

380 The wording ‘parts of its own civilian population’ suggests that the commission of the offense must involve the displacement of a certain minimum number of individuals. However, even the settlement of a few individuals would qualify.⁵⁸⁸

381 Since the aim of the provision is to protect the population of the occupied territory, it is irrelevant whether the transfer is voluntary or not. It derives from a comparison of the wording used in para 1 of article 49 GC IV with its para 6. While para 1 refers to ‘forcible transfer’, the wording used in para 6 is simply ‘transfer’.⁵⁸⁹ The ICJ held in its Advisory Opinion on Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory that article 49 GC IV ‘prohibits not only deportations or forced transfers of population such as those carried out during the Second World War, but also any measures taken by an occupying Power in order to organize or encourage transfers of parts of its own population into the occupied territory.’⁵⁹⁰

382 Article 8 para 2 (b) (viii) Rome Statute criminalizes the transfer of the population ‘by the Occupying Power’ without specifying for which precise conduct criminal responsibility incurs for an individual. However, the wording implies some involvement of the state.⁵⁹¹ Settlements in occupied territory thus appear to only amount to war crimes if the Occupying Power’s authorities are involved. Isolated individuals buying a house in accordance with the

⁵⁸⁵ In the commentary to the Draft of the German Code of Crimes Against International Law (Entwurf eines Gesetzes zur Einführung des Völkerstrafgesetzbuches, Drucksache 14/8524) (2002) 29, the drafters concluded that the transfer must be of a certain duration. <<http://dip21.bundestag.de/dip21/btd/14/085/1408524.pdf>> accessed 19 October 2014.

⁵⁸⁶ The wording of the elements ‘the perpetrator (a) Transferred [...] parts of its own population’ may be interpreted in accordance e.g. with the analogous German meaning of ‘die eigene Bevölkerung’, which suggests that the perpetrator as well as persons transferred into the occupied territory belong to the same population of the Occupying Power.

⁵⁸⁷ While the elements refer only to ‘population’, the Rome Statute refers to ‘civilian population’. While the Elements of Crimes in any event come second to the definitions in the Rome Statute, the above-mentioned drafting history confirms that the omission of the word ‘civilians’ in the elements was not meant to indicate any departure from the Fourth Geneva Convention and Additional Protocol I.

⁵⁸⁸ Werle (n 561) note 1226. The German government has taken the view that the transfer of only ‘a few persons’ is sufficient to fulfil the required elements ‘since the objective of the provision is the protection of the civilian population residing in the occupied territory’, stating that this applies also to transfers into uninhabited areas to manifest the state of occupation. See commentary to the Draft of the German Code of Crimes Against International Law (n 585) 29. (translation by author) (‘Da Zweck der Vorschrift der Schutz der im besetzten Gebiet ansässigen Zivilbevölkerung ist, reicht die Überführung einiger weniger, zur Zivilbevölkerung der Besatzungsmacht gehöriger Personen zur Tatbestandserfüllung aus. Dies gilt auch in den Fällen, in denen die Überführung in unbewohnte Gebiete erfolgt, um den Besatzungszustand zu manifestieren’).

⁵⁸⁹ Bredt, Anwendbarkeit des humanitären Völkerrechts im Israel-Palästina-Konflikt (2009) 113 et seq.; Werle (n 561) note 1226; Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 211. In the judgment 22 October 1979 in the Elon Moreh case, the Supreme Court of Israel declared an Israeli settlement to be illegal based on article 52 of the Hague Regulations (which deals with requisitions). It had therefore little bearing on settlements that did not involve requisitions and Article 49 GC IV was not considered at all. Elon Moreh case, No. H.C. 390/79, reprinted in Shamgar ‘Legal Concepts and Problems of the Israeli Military Government – the Initial Stage’, in: Shamgar (ed), Military Government (1982) 404, 419–26.

⁵⁹⁰ ‘Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory’ ICJ Advisory Opinion, ICJ Reports 2004, 136, delivered on 9 July 2004. <<http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/131/1671.pdf>> accessed 15 October 2014, para. 120.

⁵⁹¹ Elements of War Crimes (2003) 211.

applicable rules (including the law of the occupied territory) and in a wholly private capacity without any incentive by the Occupying Power or coercive measures by that power vis-à-vis the local population, would not appear to qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) Rome Statute. It is also uncertain whether private actors such as the director of a company moving parts of the Occupying Power's population to settle into the occupied territory or of a company constructing houses in settlements in occupied territory could be made criminally responsible for the offense under article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii).

However, government involvement may be direct or indirect. As stated above, the wording 'the transfer, directly or indirectly,' was introduced by the drafters to include transfer policies without direct involvement of the state. Direct transfer would for instance include the provision of government settlement plans for its own population in occupied territory and the construction of housing by the state.⁵⁹² Indirect involvement of the Occupying Power would include policies and measures to induce and facilitate migration into occupied territory, such as economic and financial incentives, subsidies, and tax exonerations.⁵⁹³

The question remains, whether the incriminated conduct must be attributable to the Occupying Power or whether it would be sufficient that the Occupying Power fails to take effective steps to prevent the movement of its population into the occupied territory. Certainly, state agents, including government officials and parliamentarians, incur criminal responsibility under article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) for conducting, ordering, soliciting or inducing a transfer as well as for aiding, abetting or assisting in its commission for the purpose of its facilitation according to article 25 Rome Statute. They may for instance decide upon the construction of settlements (direct act) or financial subsidies, tax breaks and other indirect transfer policies. Superiors and military commanders may in addition become criminally responsible for acts of subordinates under article 28 Rome Statute.

bbb) Mens rea. According to the ICC Elements of Crime, the perpetrator must be aware of 'factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.' Further, there are no requirements of a special intent that goes beyond the elements of article 30 Rome Statute.⁵⁹⁴ The use of the term 'wilful' suggests that indirect intent suffices, which might be relevant in particular for the crime of indirectly transferring own population to occupied territory.⁵⁹⁵ The underlying motive for the transfer is irrelevant.⁵⁹⁶ Neither the definition under the Rome Statute nor the Elements of Crimes provide any indication for a requirement of a particular motive or special intent.⁵⁹⁷

b) War crime of deporting or transferring all or parts of the population of the occupied territory. The war crime of deporting or transferring all or parts of the population of the ⁵⁹² Meindersma (1994) 4141 NethILRev 31; ICJ Advisory Opinion (n 590) para 120, referring to UN SC resolutions 446 (1979) of 22 March 1979, 452 (1979) of 20 July 1979 and 465 (1980) of 1 March 1980, which described 'Israel's policy and practices of settling parts of its population and new immigrants in [the occupied] territories' as a 'flagrant violation' of the Fourth Geneva Convention (para 5).

⁵⁹³ ICJ Advisory Opinion (n 590) para. 120; Meindersma (1994) 41 NethILRev 31 (n 592) 51; Commentary German Code of Crimes Against International Law (2002) (n 585) 29: The Commentary on the German International Crimes Code states that: 'The element of 'transfer' can be fulfilled by indirect or direct acts. A typical direct act of transfer is the settlement of the population of the occupying power in the occupied territory. Indirect acts of transfer are, inter alia, the provision of financial or other incentives for citizens of the Occupying Power to settle in the occupied territory'; the original German text reads as follows: 'Die Tathandlung des 'Überführens' kann durch unmittelbare oder mittelbare Handlungen erfüllt werden. Typische unmittelbare Überführungshandlung ist die Ansiedlung der eigenen Bevölkerung im besetzten Gebiet. Als mittelbare Überführungshandlungen sind u. a. die Bereitstellung von finanziellen oder anderen Anreizen für die eigenen Staatsbürger bei Wohnsitznahme im besetzten Gebiet anzusehen.'

⁵⁹⁴ von Hebel, in: Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 161.

⁵⁹⁵ Werle, Völkerstrafrecht (2012) 1229; Haslam (2002) 61 CambridgeLJ 68.

⁵⁹⁶ Werle, Völkerstrafrecht (2012), note 1226.

⁵⁹⁷ Progress report of the Special Rapporteur Awn Shawkat Al-Khasawneh on the human rights dimensions of population transfer, including the implantation of settlers, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1994/18 (30 June 1994), para 73.

occupied territory within or outside this territory under article 8 para 2 (b) (viii) Rome Statute essentially criminalizes the same conduct as article 8 para 2 (a) (vii) Rome Statute.⁵⁹⁸

- 387 aa) Normative origin and drafting history. The deportation or transfer of the population of an occupied territory outside or within that territory violates the basic principle of the law of occupation not to create a factual situation, which is difficult to reverse, in particular with regard to the demographic composition of the population. It also causes severe grievances for the persons uprooted by the transfer or deportation. They have to abandon their homes, lose their property and are often separated from their families.⁵⁹⁹ History shows that transfers or deportations of people have often been used by Occupying Powers to enhance their rule over the occupied territory and to weaken its societal fabrics, sometimes as part what became known in the 1990^{ties} as ‘ethnic cleansing’.⁶⁰⁰
- 388 The prohibition of transfer and deportation of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory is considered as a norm of customary international humanitarian law applicable in international armed conflicts.⁶⁰¹ As early as 1863 the prohibition of the deportation of civilians appeared in the Lieber Code, which provided that ‘private citizens are no longer [...] carried off to distant parts’.⁶⁰² The 1907 Hague Regulations, however, did not explicitly prohibit deportations. Commentators suggested that the reason for this omission was that deportations were no longer practiced by ‘civilized nations’ and that the delegations therefore did not include an explicit ban.⁶⁰³
- 389 Yet, during both World Wars, mass deportations from territories occupied by Germany were common, in particular to supplement German forced labour and Germans were also deported in the aftermath of the armed conflicts.⁶⁰⁴ After World War I, the Responsibilities Commission of the 1919 Peace Conference included ‘deportation of civilians’ in its list of violations of the laws and customs of war to be punished.⁶⁰⁵ After the horrible crimes committed during World War II, deportation was criminalized in article 6(b) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg. ‘[D]eportation to slave labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory’ constituted a war crime.⁶⁰⁶ In the Nuremberg trials, several defendants were found guilty for the deportation

⁵⁹⁸ See Dörmann above Art. 8 para 2 (a) mn 145 et seq. Article 8 para 2 (b) (viii) provides that the deportation or transfer of the protected person takes place ‘within or outside the territory’. This however is also the case for article 8 para 2 (a) (vii), since it specifies that the protected persons are deported or transferred ‘to another State or to another location’. The only difference arises from the somewhat different scopes of protected persons under GC IV and AP I. The main difference between the two articles is that under article 8 para 2 (a) (vii) Rome Statute the deportation of even one person qualifies as a war crime, while article 8 para 2 (b) (viii) Rome Statute refers to the deportation and transfer of ‘all or parts of the population of the occupied territory’.

⁵⁹⁹ ‘There is doubtless no need to give an account here of the painful recollections called forth by the ‘deportations’ of the Second World War, for they are still present in everyone’s memory. It will suffice to mention that millions of human beings were torn from their homes, separated from their families and deported from their country, usually under inhumane conditions.’ Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960), 278.

⁶⁰⁰ On ‘ethnic cleansing’ see eg: Pégurier, Ethnic Cleansing: A Legal Qualification (2013); Lehmler, Die Strafbarkeit von Vertreibungen aus ethnischen Gründen im bewaffneten nicht-internationalen Konflikt (Nomos Baden-Baden 1999); Mulaj, Politics of Ethnic Cleansing (2008); Preece (1998) 20 HumRtsQ 817.

⁶⁰¹ Köhler, Das Massenvertreibungsverbot im Völkerrecht (1999); Henckaerts, Mass Expulsion in Modern International Law and Practice (Nijhoff Leiden 1995) 143 et seq.; Dawson and Farber, Forcible Displacement Throughout the Ages (2012) 49; for more references see: Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary, Vol. I (2005) 457 et seq. and id. Customary, Vol. II (2005) 2908 et seq.

⁶⁰² Id. 2911.

⁶⁰³ Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960) 279; de Zayas (1975) 16 HarvILJ 211.

⁶⁰⁴ Meindersma (n 592) (1994) 41 NethILRev 39 et seq.; De Zayas (n 603) 228; Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960) 278.

⁶⁰⁵ ‘Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties’ (1920) 14 (No 1/2) AJIL 114.

⁶⁰⁶ Article 5(c) of the 1946 IMT Charter (Tokyo) established individual responsibility for crimes against humanity, including ‘deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war.’ Principle VI of the 1950 Nuremberg Principles adopted by the ILC provides that ‘deportation to slave labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory’ is a war crime and that of civilians during the war.⁶⁰⁷ Deportation is also criminalized under a number of national legislations.⁶⁰⁸

In 1947, the ICRC proposed detailed provisions with regard to deportation and transfer of civilians in occupation, which were largely adopted by the Diplomatic Conference of 1949.⁶⁰⁹ Hence, paragraphs 1 to 5 of article 49 GC IV provide for a comprehensive prohibition of deportations and transfers of civilians in occupied territories:

Individual or mass forcible transfers, as well as deportations of protected persons from occupied territory to the territory of the Occupying Power or to that of any other country, occupied or not, are prohibited, regardless of their motive.

Nevertheless, the Occupying Power may undertake total or partial evacuation of a given area if the security of the population or imperative military reasons so demand. Such evacuations may not involve the displacement of protected persons outside the bounds of the occupied territory except when for material reasons it is impossible to avoid such displacement. Persons thus evacuated shall be transferred back to their homes as soon as hostilities in the area in question have ceased.

The Occupying Power undertaking such transfers or evacuations shall ensure, to the greatest practicable extent, that proper accommodation is provided to receive the protected persons, that the removals are effected in satisfactory conditions of hygiene, health, safety and nutrition, and that members of the same family are not separated.

The Protecting Power shall be informed of any transfers and evacuations as soon as they have taken place.

The Occupying Power shall not detain protected persons in an area particularly exposed to the dangers of war unless the security of the population or imperative military reasons so demand.

According to article 147 GC IV and 85(4)(a) AP I these acts are grave breaches of the Geneva Convention, unless the security of the civilians involved or imperative military reasons make them absolutely necessary. Further, the prohibition of unlawful deportation of transfer of civilians in occupied territory is contained in numerous military manuals and in the legislation of many states. It is also supported by a number of resolutions adopted by international organisations.⁶¹⁰

Article 20 of the 1996 ILC Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind lists the crime of ‘unlawful deportation or transfer [...] of protected persons’ generally as a violation of international humanitarian law (lit a vii) without referring specifically to the situation of occupation.⁶¹¹

‘deportation and other inhuman acts done against any civilian population’ is a crime against humanity. Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, ii (n 601) (2005) 2911.

⁶⁰⁷ eg US Military Tribunal at Nuremberg Erhard Milch (20 December 1946–17 April 1947) VII Law Reports 27 (1948) in particular 46–47 and 53–58. For references to further trials, see Meron, in: Gomien (ed), Broadening the Frontiers of Human Rights (1993) 201.

⁶⁰⁸ See eg: ‘Australian Law Concerning Trials of War Criminals by Military Courts’ cited in Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) vol V 95; article 2 para 5 of the French Ordinance of 28 Aug 1944 cited in: (1948) III Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 96, see also 52; article 611 Nos 4 and 5 of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 10/95 of 23 Nov 1995). The Penal Code of Ethiopia lists as an offence against the law of nations ‘the compulsory movement or dispersion of the population, its systematic deportation, transfer or detention in concentration camps or forced labour camps’, article 282 (c) of the Penal Code of the Empire of Ethiopia of 1957. See also the different regulations conferring jurisdiction over war crimes to different US Military Commissions (1948) III Law Reports TWC 106–107; article II of the Chinese War Crimes Law of 24 Oct 1946 considered a war criminal any ‘[a]lien combatants or non-combatants who during a war or a period of hostilities or prior to the occurrence of such circumstances nourish intentions of enslaving, crippling, or annihilating the Chinese Nation by such methods as (a) mass deportation of it nationals’ cited in: (1949) XIV Law Reports TWC 153.

⁶⁰⁹ Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960) 278.

⁶¹⁰ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, i (2009)457 and idem, ii (2009)paras 39–64, 65–156, 204–226.

⁶¹¹ ICL Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind with commentaries (51 UN GAOR Supp. (No. 10) at 14, UN Doc A/CN.4/L.532, corr.1, corr.3 1996) YbILC (1996) (vol II part 2) 53.

- 396 Contrary to the crime of ‘transferring parts of the own population to occupied territory by the Occupying Power’, discussed above, the prohibition of the deportation and transfer of protected persons in or from occupied territories was not controversial in the negotiations of the Rome Statute.⁶¹²
- 397 The deportation or transfer of the population of an occupied territory might also amount to the crime against humanity of ‘deportation or forcible transfer of population’ (article 7 (d) Rome Statute)⁶¹³ or even the crime of genocide (article 6 Rome Statute), in particular when such displacements are part of an ‘ethnic cleansing’ or ‘scorched earth’ policy.⁶¹⁴
- 398 bb) Elements of Crime. aaa) Actus reus. Article 8 b (viii) Rome Statute criminalizes the act of deporting or transferring ‘all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within or outside this territory’. The displacement must be forcible, which is understood as including not only actual physical force but also other means of coercion. It does not apply to voluntary movements of civilians.⁶¹⁵
- 399 Forcible transfer is prohibited within the boundaries of occupied territory and outside this territory.⁶¹⁶ It is often contented that the term ‘deportation’ refers to displacement outside the occupied territory while ‘transfer’ denominates to movements outside such territory.⁶¹⁷ However, the wording of article 45 para 1, article 49 para 6 GC IV and article 85 para 4(a) AP I suggests that transfer can also take place both within⁶¹⁸ and across⁶¹⁹ the boundaries of the occupied territory.
- 400 The destination of the transfer or deportation is irrelevant. Article 49 para 1 GC IV refers to deportations ‘from occupied territory to the territory of the Occupying Power or to that of any other country, occupied or not’.
- 401 Article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute refers to transfer and deportation of ‘all or parts of the population of the occupied territory’ without specifying whether the victims must be civilians and without referring to ‘protected persons’ in particular. However, article 49 para 1 GC IV prohibits only the transfer and deportation of ‘protected persons’, which are, according to article 4 para 1 and 2 GC IV ‘those who, at a given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a Party to the

⁶¹² Dörmann, ‘Elements of War Crimes’ (2001) 83 IRRC; 481; von Hebel, in: Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 159.

⁶¹³ See Stahn above Art. 7 para 1 (d) and para 2 (d) ‘Deportation or forcible transfer of population’ mn 44 et seq.

⁶¹⁴ See Schabas above Art. 6 mn 19–20.

⁶¹⁵ Prosecutor v. Radislav Krstić, IT-98-33-T, Judgement, 2 August 2001, paras 519–532. During the drafting of the Geneva Conventions the issue was controversial. See Pictet (n 9) 278: ‘[...] there was some discussion on the wording. The draft submitted by the International Committee of the Red Cross reads: ‘Deportations or transfers of protected persons out of occupied territory are prohibited...’; the Diplomatic Conference preferred not to place an absolute prohibition on transfers of all kinds, as some might up to a certain point have the consent of those being transferred. The Conference had particularly in mind the case of protected persons belonging to ethnic or political minorities who might have suffered discrimination or persecution on that account and might therefore wish to leave the country. In order to make due allowances for that legitimate desire the Conference decided to authorize voluntary transfers by implication, and only to prohibit ‘forcible’ transfers.’ (footnotes omitted).

⁶¹⁶ This goes also for article 85 para 4(a) AP I.

⁶¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Krstić (n 615) para 521; ILC Draft Code (n 573) 122; Henckaerts (n 601) 144.

⁶¹⁸ This results first from a systematic reading of the first paragraph of article 49 GC IV in connection with that article’s second paragraph. The second paragraph provides that also a displacement within the occupied territory is ‘[n]evertheless’ allowed under certain circumstances, implying that para 1 also applies to transfers within the occupied territory. Moreover, article 85 para 4 (a) AP I explicitly criminalizes the deportation or transfer within or outside the occupied territory, requiring that such deportation or transfer must be in violation of article 49 GC IV, thereby suggesting that article 49 GC IV also prohibits certain displacements within the occupied territory. Second, the prohibition of forcible transfers also within an occupied territory is confirmed in element 1 for article 8 para 2 (a) (vii) Rome Statute, which provides that one or more persons is deported or transferred ‘to another State or to another location’, meaning another location within the occupied territory.

⁶¹⁹ Zimmermann; in: in Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 1000, para. 3502; fn. 28; Solf and Cummings (1977) 9 Case Western Res JIL 232 et seq.; Pictet (n 9) 278 et seq. and 59.

conflict or Occupying Power of which they are not nationals.⁶²⁰ Article 4 para 4 GC IV makes it clear, that prisoners of war are not protected persons. In principle, article 85 para. 4 (a) AP I protects protected persons against deportations and forcible transfers since the conduct prohibited under it must be ‘in violation’ of article 49 GC IV. Yet, since article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute and its Elements of Crime do not explicitly refer to those articles of the GC IV, the term ‘population’ could include non-civilians as well, in particular since the first part of the sentence explicitly refers to transfer of parts of the Occupying Power’s ‘own civilian population into the territory it occupies’, while the second sentence does not use the term ‘civilian’.

While article 49 para 1 GC IV explicitly includes ‘individual’ transfer and deportation, article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute prohibits the transfer and deportation of ‘all or parts of the population’. This wording which corresponds with article 85 para 4 (a) AP I. It clearly deviates from the terms used in the Geneva Conventions, suggests that more than one person must be deported or transferred in order that the act qualifies as a crime under article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute, although transfers and deportations of small numbers of persons may suffice. Similarly, the Security Council has qualified the permanent expulsion by the Occupying Power Israel of nine Palestinian civilians as a deportation.⁶²¹ bbb) Exceptions. According to the ICRC Commentary on article 49 GC IV the prohibition of transfers and deportations is absolute and allows of no exceptions, apart from those stipulated in paragraph 2.⁶²² Concretely, para 2 of article 49 GC IV authorizes the Occupying Power to evacuate an occupied territory wholly or partly ‘when the safety of the population or imperative military reasons so demand’. The ICRC commentary defines evacuations as ‘a provisional measure entirely negative in character’, which is ‘often taken in the interests of the protected persons themselves.’⁶²³ Paras two to five of article 49 GC IV define several requirements for the transfer to be lawful. If these requirements are met the act would not be punishable under article 8 para 2 (b)(viii) Rome Statute either. According to the ICRC Commentary, evacuation of the population by the Occupying Power is for instance allowed and necessary if ‘an area is in danger as a result of military operations or is liable to be subjected to intense bombing’ or if ‘the presence of protected persons in an area hampers military operations’ and only if ‘overriding military considerations make it imperative; if it is not imperative, evacuation ceases to be legitimate.’⁶²⁴

Article 49 para 2 (first sentence) GC IV provides that only a ‘given area’ may be evacuated. This suggests that only a specific, geographically limited area may be evacuated.⁶²⁵ Further, the evacuation must always be a provisional, temporary measure limited to the time-span during which the justifying ground, such as hostilities in the area of initial residence, persists. Article 49 para 2 (third sentence) GC IV correspondingly provides that, ‘as soon as hostilities in the area [where the evacuated persons were evacuated from] have ceased’, they ‘shall be transferred back to their homes’. The Occupying Power consequently may be required to transfer back or repatriate evacuated persons before the end of all hostilities. Additionally, when evacuating or transferring evacuated persons back, the Occupying Power must ensure certain minimum humanitarian standards to the greatest practicable extent, including in particular proper accommodation to receive the displaced persons and satisfactory conditions

⁶²⁰ According to para 2, ‘[n]ationals of a State which is not bound by the Convention are not protected by it. Nationals of a neutral State who find themselves in the territory of a belligerent State, and nationals of a co-belligerent State, shall not be regarded as protected persons while the State of which they are nationals has normal diplomatic representation in the State in whose hands they are.’

⁶²¹ SC Res 608 (14 January 1988).

⁶²² Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Convention (1952–1960) 279.

⁶²³ Id. 280.

⁶²⁴ Id.

⁶²⁵ The Commentary on article 49 para 2 GC IV surprisingly suggests that even the entire occupied territory can be evacuated, which can hardly have been the intention of the drafters of article 49 para 2 GC IV; Pictet 280.

of hygiene, health, safety and nutrition (article 49 para. 3).⁶²⁶ Also, article 78 AP I provides that families must not be separated and additional safeguards should be applied to the evacuation of children. Article 49 para. 4 GC IV further provides that the Occupying Power must inform the Protecting Power or the ICRC of any transfer or evacuation ‘as soon as it has taken place’.

405 Clearly, compelling protected persons – above all persons from the occupied territory who are in the hands of the Occupying Power – to serve in the armed or auxiliary forces of the Occupied Power or to work outside the occupied territory definitely does not justify any transfer or occupation (article 51 para 2 GC IV). Also, ‘protected persons accused of offences shall be detained in the occupied country, and if convicted they shall serve their sentences therein’ (article 76 para 1 GC IV). The statement that the prohibition against deportation and transfer allows for no exceptions other than those stipulated in article 49 para. 2 GC IV may be of a customary character as regards displacements outside the occupied territory.

406 As regards the prohibition of transfers within the occupied territory, the detention of protected persons or their serving of sentences in a location within the occupied territory other than the detainee’s regular residence is not prohibited.⁶²⁷ Furthermore, the existing international humanitarian law rules do not appear to address the possible necessity to realize public infrastructure projects particularly in case of a long-term occupation (despite the premise under international law that occupations are to be temporary). In such very exceptional situations, the expropriation of some property and the displacement of a limited number of protected persons may be lawful, insofar it is in the clear interest of the population of the occupied territory and insofar the displaced persons are fully compensated and given free choice of residence within the occupied territory.

407 Conversely, evacuations do not justify ‘transfers of population with the aim of altering the demographic composition of the territory concerned for political, racial or religious reasons or transfers involving the disguised intent to annex the territory.’⁶²⁸ Displacing people in order to exercise more effective control over a dissident ethnic group⁶²⁹ as well as scorched earth strategies cannot be justified under article 49 para 2 GC IV.

408 ccc) Mens rea. According to the Elements of Crime the perpetrator must have been ‘aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.’ As for the crime of the transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, there are no requirements of a special intent beyond the elements of article 30 Rome Statute.

9. Paragraph 2(b)(ix): Intentionally directing attacks against protected buildings

Literature: Arnold, R., ‘The Protection of the Civilian Population from the Effects of Hostilities’, (2004) 3 HUV-I 159; Dörmann, K., Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2003); Elliott, H.W., ‘Open Cities and undefended Places’, (April 1995), The Army Lawyer 39; Fenrick, W.J., ‘The Rule of Proportionality and Protocol I in Conventional Warfare’, (1982) 98 MilRev 91; id., ‘Attacking the Enemy Civilian as a Punishable Offence’, (1997) 7 DukeJComp&IL 539; Frigo, M., ‘Cultural Property v. Cultural Heritage: A ‘Battle of Concepts’ in International Law?’, (2004) 86 IRRC 367; Frulli, M., ‘The Criminalization of ⁶²⁶ See also articles 25–27 and 82 GC IV and article 74 AP I. The limitation of the obligation to ensure these standards to ‘the greatest practicable extent’ was intended ‘to cover the contingency of an improvised evacuation of temporary character when urgent action is absolutely necessary in order to protect the population effectively against an imminent and unforeseen danger. If the evacuation has to be prolonged as a result of military operations and it is not possible to return the evacuated persons to their homes within a comparatively short period, it will be the duty of the Occupying Power to provide them with suitable accommodation and make proper feeding and sanitary arrangements’. Pictet (n 9) 281.

⁶²⁷ See article 76 GC IV and article 70 para 2 GC IV.

⁶²⁸ Final Report of the Special Rapporteur Mr Al-Khasawneh, Commission on Human Rights, Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and the Human Rights Dimension of Population Transfer, including the Implantation of Settlers and Settlements, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1997/23, 27 June 1997, para 40.

⁶²⁹ Junod, ‘Article 17 Additional Protocol II’ (n 619) 1473; Roberts (1990) 84 AJIL 44, 83 et seq.

Offences against Cultural Heritage in Times of Armed Conflict: The Quest for Consistency,' (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203; Parks, W.H., 'Air War and the Law of War', (1990) 32 AFLRev 1; Pfirter, D., 'Article 8(2)(b)(v) – Attacking Undefended Places', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001); Rogers, A.P.V., Law on the Battlefield (MUP 2004); Roberts, A. and Guelff, R., Documents on the Laws of War (OUP 3rd edn 2000).

Article 8 para. 2 (b) ix ICC Statute qualifies as a serious violation of the laws of war to intentionally direct attacks against buildings dedicated to religion, education, art, science or charitable purposes, historic monuments, hospitals and places where the sick and wounded are collected, provided they are not military objectives. Its mirror provision – applicable to non-international armed conflicts – is article 8 para. 2 (e)(iv). It is largely derived from articles 27 and 56 of the Regulations annexed to the 1907 IV HC Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and numerous provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 on the protection of hospitals and where the sick and wounded are collected⁶³⁰. It also restates the prohibition contained in the 1954 Hague Convention for the protection of cultural property during armed conflict (HCP) – which was complemented by the 1977 Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions of 1949⁶³¹ – and its Second Additional Protocol of 1999 (II AP to HCP)⁶³².

Since neither the ICC provisions nor the Elements thereto go into the details of the notion of cultural property and the degree of protection recognized thereto by customary law, it is useful to briefly illustrate the current status of the laws of armed conflict (LOAC) in this regard.

a) The different degrees of protection under the laws of armed conflict. The LOAC grant different levels of protection, depending on the importance of the cultural property. Basic protection as 'civilian' objects is granted to all cultural property not being used for military purposes (so-called civilian-use rationale)⁶³³, pursuant to the principle of distinction.

Specific norms are then dedicated to cultural property which has an added value for being of great importance to the cultural heritage of every people, as provided by definition contained in article 1 HCP⁶³⁴.

'Special' or 'enhanced protection' shall be granted to selected cultural property.

Special protection⁶³⁵ shall be granted to a limited number of refuges intended to shelter movable property, as well as to centers containing cultural property of very great importance, which has been entered in a specific 'International Register of Cultural Property under Special Protection', maintained by the Director General of UNESCO. Copies shall be provided to the UN Secretary General and the High Contracting Parties⁶³⁶.

⁶³⁰ In particular articles 19–23 GCI, articles 22–23, 34–35 GC II, articles 18–19 GC IV, articles 12 and 53 Add. Prot. I. See also Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 216.

⁶³¹ Article 53 Add. Prot. I, according to which 'Without prejudice to the provisions of the Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict of 14 May 1954, and of other relevant international instruments, it is prohibited:

(a) to commit any acts of hostility directed against the historic monuments, works of art or places of worship which constitute the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples; (b) to use such objects in support of the military effort; (c) to make such objects the object of reprisals.

⁶³² See Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) mn. 1313-1315.

⁶³³ Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 204.

⁶³⁴ According to this, the term 'cultural property' shall cover, irrespective of origin or ownership: (a) movable or immovable property of great importance to the cultural heritage of every people, such as monuments of architecture, art or history, whether religious or secular; archaeological sites; groups of buildings which, as a whole, are of historical or artistic interest; works of art; manuscripts, books and other objects of artistic, historical or archaeological interest; as well as scientific collections and important collections of books or archives or of reproductions of the property defined above; (b) buildings whose main and effective purpose is to preserve or exhibit the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a) such as museums, large libraries and depositories of archives, and refuges intended to shelter, in the event of armed conflict, the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a); (c) centers containing a large amount of cultural property as defined in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b), to be known as 'centers containing monuments'.

⁶³⁵ Article 8 of the 1954 HCP; article 53 of Add. Prot. I and article 16 Add. Prot. II to the GCs; Customary International Law, see Roberts and Guelff, Documents on the Laws of War (2000) 372.

⁶³⁶ Article 12 of the Regulations for the Execution of the HCP, attached to the 1954 HCP.

- 412 Pursuant to article 9 HCP, objects under special protection are subject to immunity (article 9), unless they are used for military purposes (waiver; article 8). The immunity shall be withdrawn only in exceptional cases of unavoidable military necessity, and only for such time as that necessity continues. This can be established only by the officer commanding a force the equivalent of a division in size or larger. Whenever possible, the opposing Party shall be notified reasonably in advance of the waiver decision and cessations of violations shall also be requested in within a reasonable time. Attack shall, thus, be the last resort. The Party withdrawing immunity shall inform the Commissioner-General for cultural property as soon as possible.
- 413 ‘Enhanced protection’ is a new concept introduced by articles 1 and 10 of AP II to the 1954 HCP, which entered into force in 2000. This shall be granted to property fulfilling cumulatively the following three conditions: a) it shall be considered as cultural heritage of the greatest importance for humanity; b) it must be protected by adequate domestic legal and administrative measures recognising its exceptional cultural and historic value and ensuring the highest level of protection; and c) it must not be used for military purposes or to shield military sites and a declaration must have been made by the Party which has control over the cultural property, confirming that it will not be so used. Each High Contracting Party shall submit a list of such property to the Committee for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict established by the II AP to the HCP (art. 24 II AP to the HCP)⁶³⁷.
- 414 Depending on the degree of importance, cultural property shall be identified with either a single (ordinary cultural property) or triple distinctive emblem (cultural property under special protection), as defined by art. 16–17 HCP.
- 415 b) Definition of cultural property and cultural heritage. There is no universally accepted definition of cultural property or cultural heritage⁶³⁸. Attempts to define these notions, however, have been made in the 1954 HCP and most recently by the ICC OTP.
- 416 Pursuant to article 1 1954 HCP, the term ‘cultural property’ shall cover, irrespective of origin or ownership: (a) movable or immovable property of great importance to the cultural heritage of every people, such as monuments of architecture, art or history, whether religious or secular; archaeological sites; groups of buildings which, as a whole, are of historical or artistic interest; works of art; manuscripts, books and other objects of artistic, historical or archaeological interest; as well as scientific collections and important collections of books or archives or of reproductions of the property defined above; (b) buildings whose main and effective purpose is to preserve or exhibit the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a) such as museums, large libraries and depositories of archives, and refuges intended to shelter, in the event of armed conflict, the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a); (c) centers containing a large amount of cultural property as defined in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b), to be known as ‘centers containing monuments’.
- 417 The adjective ‘cultural’ is generally used with reference to historic monuments and art works, whereas the term ‘spiritual’ is generally being used with reference to worship places. At the same time it is possible to assign to a cultural value to a church and a spiritual value to a historic monument or work of art⁶³⁹. Religious objects may also fall under the protection of Add.Prot. I or the 1954 HCP if they constitute the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples (Add.Prot. I) or fulfill the criteria of article 1 HCP⁶⁴⁰. In alternative, they may enjoy basic protection as civilian objects under the general principle of distinction. The same holds true for objects dedicated to education and science. For instance, in the Kordic and Cerkez Case, the ICTY held that:

‘educational institutions are undoubtedly immovable property of great importance to the cultural heritage of peoples (in the sense of article 1 of the 1954 Hague Convention) in that they are without exception centres of learning, arts, and sciences, with their valuable collections of books and works of

⁶³⁷ See for details Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 204.

⁶³⁸ Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 206, with reference to Frigo (2004) 86 IRRC 367.

⁶³⁹ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 646, Nos. 2064–2065.

⁶⁴⁰ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 221.

arts and science. The Trial Chamber also notes one international treaty which requires respect and protection to be accorded to educational institutions in times of peace as well as in war (i. e. the Roerich Pact)⁶⁴¹.

In its ‘article 53’ Report on Mali of 16th January 2013, the ICC’s Office of the Prosecutor (ICC OTP)⁶⁴² observed that article 8(2)(e)(iv) outlaws violations of the special protection granted to historic monuments, works of art or places of worship which constitute the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples, as reflected in Art. 53 Add. Prot. I. The ICC OTP attempted a definition by stating that ‘the cultural or spiritual heritage covers objects whose value transcends geographical boundaries, and which are unique in character and are intimately associated with the history and culture of the people’. In its view, the religious and historical buildings in Timbuktu, which belong to the World’s Heritage since 23 December 1988, clearly fall within this category⁶⁴³. 418

c) The Elements of Crime. aa) Actus reus. Article 8(2)(b)(ix) ICC Statute outlaws intentional attacks against these different types of protected cultural objects, without however providing for different levels of protection⁶⁴⁴. It simply states that specific buildings shall not be the object of attack. A merit, however, is that it does not require any result (damage)⁶⁴⁵. Pursuant to the Elements of Crime, the following criteria must be met: 419

1. The perpetrator directed an attack
2. The object of the attack was one or more buildings dedicated to religion, education, art, science or charitable purposes, historic monuments, hospitals or places where the sick and wounded are collected, which were not military objectives.
3. The perpetrator intended such building or buildings to be the object of the attack
4. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.

The notion of attack refers to the one contained in article 49(1) Add Prot. I to the GCs⁶⁴⁶, which was commented in relation to article 8 para. 2 (b) (v) ICC Statute. It is sufficient that the attack was intentionally directed against one of the following four categories of protected objects⁶⁴⁷: a) cultural objects; b) buildings dedicated to religion; c) other buildings dedicated to education; d) places for the collection of those in need. The inclusion of category d), which has nothing to do with cultural property⁶⁴⁸ and which may be covered by article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv) ICC Statute (buildings using the distinctive emblems of the GCs) makes article 8 para. 2 (e)(iv) a ‘civil-use’ provision that overlooks the cultural-value approach adopted by Protocol II to the 1954 HCP⁶⁴⁹. This is reflected inter alia by the lack of any specific protection granted to movable property, in departure from the 1954 HCP and its AP II. Movable property may be protected in alternative by article 8(2)(a)(iv) and article 8(2)(b)(xiii) on the one hand, or article 8(2)(b)(xvi) and article 8(2)(e)(v) banning pillage, on the other. The first, however, lack specificity, are usually interpreted as referring to immovable property, and are applicable to international armed conflicts, only⁶⁵⁰. The latter, instead, which were resorted to by the ICC OTP in its ‘Mali Report’⁶⁵¹, provide for a military necessity justification in their Elements. 420

⁶⁴¹ Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 26 Feb. 2001, para. 360.

⁶⁴² This is aimed at assessing whether there is reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation. See page 31 of the Report.

⁶⁴³ See ICC OTP, Situation in Mali, Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013, p. 31.

⁶⁴⁴ See on this Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 212; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) mn. 1316-7.

⁶⁴⁵ Pfirter, in: Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 163, Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 215. This is a difference with regard to Art. 3 (d) ICTY Statute.

⁶⁴⁶ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 216..

⁶⁴⁷ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 215.

⁶⁴⁸ Its basis are Articles 19–23 GC I, articles 22–23, 34–35 GC II, articles 18–19 GC IV, articles 12–13 Add. Prot. I, articles 24–31 Add. Prot. I.

⁶⁴⁹ Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 207 and 211.

⁶⁵⁰ Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 213.

⁶⁵¹ ICC OTP, Situation in Mali, Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013, pp. 24, 31-2.

- 421 Pursuant to the culture-specific provisions, there are only few very precise situations in which these objects shall lose protected status⁶⁵². Generally, they shall be protected as long as they are not misused by the adverse Party; in case of doubt with regard to their civilian status, they shall be presumed not to be used for military reasons (article 52 para. 3 Add. Prot. I)⁶⁵³. Article 1 AP II to the HCP defines as a military objective ‘an object which by its nature, location, purpose, or use makes an effective contribution to military action and whose total or partial destruction, capture or neutralisation, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage.’
- 422 A common feature of the 1954 HCP, its AP II and article 8 para. 2(b)(ix) ICC Statute, is that protected status will be waived if cultural property is used for military purposes. Moreover, in exceptional cases of unavoidable military necessity, even the special protected status may be waived, for as long as such necessity continues. In this case, advance notice shall be made (article 6 II AP to the HCP; article 11 HCP). In any case, the Parties shall take precautionary measures in attack and against the effects of the hostilities, for instance by choosing the proper means and methods in the exercise of targeting and by removing sensitive property from military locations (Art. 7 and 8 AP II to the HCP).
- 423 A difference with regard to other LOAC provisions, is that article 8 para. 2 (b)(ix) of the ICC Statute does not proscribe the use of cultural property in support of the military effort or as objects of reprisals (Add. Prot. I), nor its exposure to the risk of becoming military objectives (article 4 of the 1954 HCP, articles 85(4)(d) and 53 Add Prot. I and article 16 AP II)
- Since the Elements of Crime are very close to those established by the jurisprudence of the ICTY⁶⁵⁴, it is worth referring to it.
- 424 bb) Elements drawn from the ICTY’s jurisprudence. In Kordic and Cerkez, the ICTY interpreted article 3 (d) ICTY Statute, which is very close to article 8 para. 2(b)(ix) of the ICC Statute, in light of article 27 of the 1907 Hague Regulations, article 53 Add. Prot. I, the Roerich Pact and the 1954 HCP. In order to define cultural property, it referred to article 1 HCP⁶⁵⁵.
- 425 Further elements of the crime under article 3(d) ICTY Statutes were examined in the *Strugar Case*⁶⁵⁶, which dealt with the large scale destruction of the Old Town of Dubrovnik (Croatia), a city that has been on the World Heritage List since 1979, that occurred on 6th December 1991. The accused, Pavle Strugar, a retired Lieutenant-General of the then Yugoslav Peoples’ Army (JNA), was convicted to eight years imprisonment for, inter alia, destruction or wilful damage done to cultural property under Articles 3 (d) and 7 (3) of the Statute. The sentence was confirmed by the Appeals Chamber in its judgement of 17th July 2008. The Trial Chamber held that since there had been no military objectives in the immediate vicinity, the destruction or damage of property in the Old Town on that day was not justified by military necessity, meaning that it had retained protected status. By reference to the *Naletilic Case*⁶⁵⁷, the Court observed that, contrary to the holdings in Blaskic, protection does not require that the concerned institutions are not located in the immediate vicinity of military objectives. By discussion the protection granted to institutions dedicated to religion, it held that the crime would be satisfied if: (i) the general requirements of article 3 of the Statute were fulfilled; (ii) the destruction regards an institution dedicated to religion; (iii) the property was not used for military purposes; (iv) the perpetrator acted with the intent to destroy the property⁶⁵⁸. The Trial Chamber observed that there may be a waiver of the ⁶⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 17 Dec. 2004, paras. 359 et seq.

⁶⁵² Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 227.

⁶⁵³ Frulli (2011) 22 (1) EJIL 203, 213.

⁶⁵⁴ Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (2002) 170.

⁶⁵⁶ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005. The findings refer to the Kordić case. For a summary see the Press Release of the ICTY; Doc. CT/P.I.S./932 e, 31 Jan. 2005.

⁶⁵⁷ Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Mar. 2003, para 604.

⁶⁵⁸ Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Mar. 2003, para 605.

protection, when the enlisted objects have been used for military purposes⁶⁵⁹. It further concluded that the special protection may not be lost simply because of military activities or installations in the immediate vicinity of the cultural property. In such a case, however, the practical result may be that it cannot be established that the acts which caused destruction of or damage to cultural property were ‘directed against’ that cultural property, rather than the military installation or use in its immediate vicinity⁶⁶⁰. This holds true also under the ICC Statute⁶⁶¹. In sum, the Trial Chamber concluded that an act will fulfill the elements of the crime of destruction or wilful damage of cultural property, within the meaning of article 3 (d) ICTY Statute and in so far as that provision relates to cultural property, if: (i) it has caused damage or destruction to property which constitutes the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples; (ii) the damaged or destroyed property was not used for military purposes at the time when the acts of hostility directed against these objects took place; and (iii) the act was carried out with the intent to damage or destroy the property in question⁶⁶². To be noted, however, is that the Elements of Crime of article 8 para. 2(b) (ix) of the ICC Statute do not require actual damage⁶⁶³. In the Jokic Case, the judges stressed once more that attacks against cultural heritage bear an inherent gravity, in that:

‘The whole of the Old Town of Dubrovnik was considered, at the time of the events contained in the Indictment, an especially important part of the world cultural heritage. It was, among other things, an outstanding architectural ensemble illustrating a significant stage in human history. The shelling attack on the Old Town was an attack not only against the history and heritage of the region, but also against the cultural heritage of mankind’⁶⁶⁴.

c) Mens rea. In the Blaškić Case, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY held that: 426

‘The damage or destruction must have been committed intentionally to institutions which may clearly be identified as dedicated to religion or education and which were not being used for military purposes at the time of the acts’⁶⁶⁵.

The author must thus have carried out the attack notwithstanding this awareness of the objects’ protected status and their failure to qualify as military objectives. It is not necessary that he made a legal assessment of the protected status. He merely needs to know the factual circumstances, which grant the objects special status. It has been argued that this is unnecessary in light of article 30 ICC Statute. However, the requirement was retained for clarity purposes⁶⁶⁶. 427

A parallel provision is contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (iv) applicable to non-international conflicts, for which the same elements of crime have been drafted. 428

10. Paragraph 2(b)(x): Prohibition of physical mutilation

Literature: Bothe, M., Partsch, K.J., and Solf, W.A., New Rules for the Victims of Armed Conflicts – Commentary on the Two 1977 Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 (1982) 109; Dörmann, K., Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of ICC (CUP 2003) 229 et seq.; LaHaye, E., ‘Article 8(2)(b)(x)’, in: R. S. Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 164 et seq.; ICRC Mehring, S., ‘Medical War Crimes’, in: MPYbUNL 229–279.

a) Normative origins, drafting history and impact on the further development of international criminal law. The prohibition of physical mutilations and unwarranted medical experiments further elaborates the prohibition already contained in article 8 para. 2 429

⁶⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 308.

⁶⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 310.

⁶⁶¹ Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law, 170.

⁶⁶² Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 308.

⁶⁶³ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 307.

⁶⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Jokic, Judgement, IT-01-42/1, Trial Chamber, 18 Mar. 2004, at para. 51.

⁶⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 3 Mar. 2000, para. 185. See also Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 311.

⁶⁶⁶ Pfrtner, in: Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 163; cf. Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), 175; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014), no. 1318.

(a) (ii) of the Statute⁶⁶⁷. The prohibition as contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute is largely based on article 11 of the First and article 5 para. 2 (e) of the Second Additional Protocol of 1977. Similar prohibitions are also already contained in article 12 para. 2 of the First and Second Geneva Convention as well as in article 13 para. 1 of the Third Geneva Convention and finally in article 32 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. Those provisions in turn were based on criminal prosecutions that had taken place in the aftermath of World War II⁶⁶⁸. Finally, similar provisions can be found in article 2 (b) of the ICTY Statute ('biological experiments' as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions), article 4 (a) ICTR Statute and article 3 (a) of the Statute for the Special Court for Sierra Leone ('mutilation' as violation of common article 3 and Add. Prot. II), section 6.1. (b) (x) of UNTAET Regulation 2000/15 on the Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction over Serious Criminal Offences (wording identical to the one contained in the Rome Statute), as well as article 13 (b), No. 10 of the Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal (the wording being again identical to the one contained in the Rome Statute, except that it refers to 'persons of another nation').

430 By virtue of article 11 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I any act or omission which seriously endangers the health of a person constitutes a grave breach of the Protocol and under its article 85 para. 5 accordingly a war crime, when committed against a person not belonging to the same side of the conflict as the offender.

431 A provision, related to non-international armed conflict, which is mutatis mutandis identical to article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) is contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi) of the Statute⁶⁶⁹, the only difference being that the words 'in the power of an adverse party' were replaced by the words 'in the power of another party to the conflict'.

432 The idea of including a prohibition based on article 11 of Add. Prot. I first appeared in the ICRC proposal formally submitted by New Zealand and Switzerland⁶⁷⁰. A slightly modified version then found its way into a compromise paper which was the outcome of informal consultations among a group of interested countries which was then tabled by Germany⁶⁷¹. It was in this way then introduced into the Statute as article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

433 The elements of crimes, adopted by the Assembly of States Parties, provide with regard to the war crime of mutilation that:

1. The perpetrator subjected one or more persons to mutilation, in particular by permanently disfiguring the person or persons, or by permanently disabling or removing an organ or appendage.
2. The conduct caused death or seriously endangered the physical or mental health of such person or persons.
3. The conduct was neither justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the person or persons concerned nor carried out in such person's or persons' interest
4. Such person or persons were in the power of an adverse party.
5. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an international armed conflict.
6. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict;
 - respectively with regard to the crime of prohibited medical or scientific experiments that
 1. The perpetrator subjected one or more persons to a medical or scientific experiment.
 2. The experiment caused death or seriously endangered the physical or mental health or integrity of such person or persons.

⁶⁶⁷ See Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii).

⁶⁶⁸ See, Brandt et al., Judgment of 20 Aug. 1947, Trials of War Criminals, Vol. II, 171 et seq.; Supreme National Tribunal of Poland, Judgment of 2 Apr. 1947 (Hoess), UNWCC, Law Reports of Trials of War criminals, vii, (1947–49) 14 et seq.; Judgment of 17 Apr. 1947 (Milch), Trials of War Criminals, Vol. II, 773 et seq.

⁶⁶⁹ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2(e)(xi).

⁶⁷⁰ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.2, para. 1 (d).

⁶⁷¹ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.23/Rev.1, section B (h).

3. The conduct was neither justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of such person or persons concerned nor carried out in such person's or persons' interest.
4. Such person or persons were in the power of an adverse party.
5. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an international armed conflict.
6. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.

b) Persons 'in the power of an adverse party'. Unlike article 11 of Add. Prot. I, the scope ratione personae of which applies to both, persons who are in the power of the adverse party and to any other person who is interned, detained or otherwise deprived of liberty due to the armed conflict, article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute extends its protection solely to the first group. Accordingly, any act otherwise proscribed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute does not come within the jurisdiction of the Court when committed against nationals of a State not a party to the conflict who are present in the territory of a party to the conflict, against nationals of the territorial State itself or against nationals of co-belligerents⁶⁷². Given article 10 of the Statute, they remain, however, protected, where applicable, by article 11 of Add. Prot. I.

The term 'in the power of the adverse party' has to be understood in a broad sense as referring to prisoners of war, other persons held by an adverse party such as mercenaries or members of guerilla groups who have not complied with the requirement to wear their arms openly⁶⁷³, civilian internees, persons who have been refused authorization to leave the territory, which is de facto under the control of the respective party to the conflict, and finally inhabitants of occupied territories⁶⁷⁴. This broad interpretation of the terms 'in the power of an adverse party' has already been confirmed with regard to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949⁶⁷⁵, and is in line with both the travaux préparatoires of the Add. Prot. I⁶⁷⁶, and a teleological interpretation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute. It has furthermore been confirmed by the ICTY in the Kovačević case⁶⁷⁷.

c) 'physical mutilation'. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute does not criminalize all acts which are prohibited under article 11 of the Add. Prot. I but solely includes physical mutilations and unwarranted medical and scientific experiments.

The term 'physical mutilations' covers acts such as amputations, injury to limbs⁶⁷⁸ and forms of sexual mutilations⁶⁷⁹. This is confirmed by element 1 of the elements of crimes adopted with regard to the war crime of mutilation as contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute. Said element provides that the term mutilation covers in particular acts permanently disfiguring the victim, or by permanently disabling or removing an organ or appendage of the victim⁶⁸⁰.

d) 'medical or scientific experiments of any kind'. The use of the term 'medical or scientific experiments' prohibits using any of the persons protected under this article as so-called 'Guinea-pigs'. Only such acts are prohibited which do not serve a therapeutic purpose, but which are rather undertaken in order to gain medical or scientific knowledge.

⁶⁷² Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 112.

⁶⁷³ Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 111.

⁶⁷⁴ Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), mn 468.

⁶⁷⁵ ICRC, GC IV relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, 47.

⁶⁷⁶ See the declaration made by the United States delegation during the diplomatic conference leading to the adoption of the Add. Prot. I, quoted by: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982)112.

⁶⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Kovačević, No. IT-97-24-PT, Prosecutor's Pre-trial Brief, para. 579.

⁶⁷⁸ Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), mn 478.

⁶⁷⁹ For an example of sexual mutilation see the decision in, Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 45.

⁶⁸⁰ See also Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 2 March 2009, (RUF Case), para. 180.

- 439 e) ‘neither justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the person concerned nor carried out in his or her interest’. Any of the acts proscribed can be only justified if indicated by the State of health of the person concerned or undertaken in his or her interest. Thus, for example, amputations might be lawful if performed to save the life or overall health of the patient. On the other hand, medical and scientific experiments solely undertaken for scientific purposes cannot be considered to be either justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the person concerned nor can they be considered to be carried out in his or her interest. The sole exception could be such treatments that, while involving a certain degree of experimentation, constitute the sole possibility to save the life of the patient and are thus indicated by the health of the individual⁶⁸¹.
- 440 Notwithstanding the fact that a Swiss proposal⁶⁸² to define situations where the conduct in question is neither justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the person concerned nor carried out in his or her interest by using language from article 11 of the Add. Prot. I was not formally adopted, it may still be said that this definition encapsulates the very notion of medical or scientific experiments. This is confirmed by the fact that said formula, which refers to ‘any medical procedure which is not indicated by the state of health of the person concerned and which is not consistent with generally accepted medical standards which would be applied under similar medical circumstances to persons who are nationals of the Party conducting the procedure and who are in no way deprived of liberty’ is now contained in footnote 46 added to the text of element 3 of the respective element of crime.
- 441 f) ‘which cause death to or seriously endanger the health of such person or persons’. Under article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute the relevant act must have either caused the death or must have seriously endangered the health of a given person. Conversely, the Special Court for Sierra Leone has dismissed this requirement in the context of a non-international armed conflict as superfluous with respect to Article 3 of its Statute, arguing that albeit contained in article 11 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I, it does not form part of the violation under common article 3 and article 4 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II⁶⁸³. Indeed, article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), unlike article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi), does not contain such a result requirement. Accordingly, the war crime contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) does not require that the conduct caused death or seriously endangered the physical or mental health of the victim⁶⁸⁴. While a deadly outcome of either a mutilation or an experiment is evident, the other alternative of seriously endangering the health of a given person is of less specificity. It is also noteworthy that this requirement applies to both alternatives, acts of mutilations and scientific experiments. This is, in particular, not only confirmed by the French text of the statutory provision which uses the plural (‘et qui entraînent la mort’) but also by the fact that the elements of crimes with regard to both, acts of mutilations and scientific experiments, contain the almost identical element 2⁶⁸⁵.
- 442 It must be noted, however, that element 2 related to the war crime of medical or scientific experiments unlike element 2 related to the war crime of mutilation, more closely follows the wording of article 11 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I, by also encompassing experiments which seriously endanger the physical or mental integrity of a person covered by said provision. This may be understood as indicating that even such experiments which on the long-term do not endanger the health of the victim of the experiment, but which nevertheless still entail a significant intrusion into the victim’s physical integrity are also covered by the elements of crimes. This raises the question, however, whether the Assembly of States Parties, by

⁶⁸¹ Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 114.

⁶⁸² PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8.

⁶⁸³ Prosecutor v. Alex Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 20 June 2007 (AFRC Case), para. 725. See also SCSL, Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon, Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Trial Judgment, 2 March 2009, para. 182.

⁶⁸⁴ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 396.

⁶⁸⁵ See also LaHaye, Article 8(2)(b)(x), in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 164 et seq.

adopting the elements of crimes under article 9 of the Statute may broaden the scope of application of the provisions of the Rome Statute.

It is also important to note that article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) does not contain the requirement that the act under consideration has indeed affected the health of the person concerned. Instead, it is sufficient that the health is endangered by the respective act. Such endangering requires that the act or omission causes an objective danger in the concrete case which is attributable to the alleged offender and which could have easily turned into a violation of the health of the victim. It follows, that any action that has then actually resulted in such an injury would accordingly a fortiori fulfill the requirements of article 8 para. 2 (b) (x)⁶⁸⁶.

The term ‘seriously’ seems to indicate both, that the health (respectively the integrity) of the victim was clearly endangered and that the danger involved was also of some *magnitude*⁶⁸⁷.

Given the normative context on which article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) of the Statute is based, i. e. article 11 of the Add. Prot. I, it seems appropriate to consider that the notion of health embraces both, physical and mental health. This is confirmed by element 2 of the elements of crimes adopted with regard to the provision under consideration, which with regard to both, the war crime of mutilation and that of medical or scientific experiments, extends to the physical as well as to the mental health of the victim.

g) Irrelevance of consent. Footnote 46 of the elements of crimes applicable to both, the war crime of mutilation and the one of scientific experiments clarifies in line with article 11 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I (‘even with their consent’), if ever there was need, that consent may not serve a defense to this crime⁶⁸⁸.

11. Paragraph 2(b)(xi): Perfidious killing or wounding*

Literature: Adam S., Kriegslisten und Perfidieverbot in der Geschichte des Kriegsaktionenrechts vor Abschluss der Haager Landkriegsordnung von 1899 (Peter Lang 1992); Fleck, D., ‘Kriegslisten und Perfidieverbot’, in: id. (ed.), Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung des humanitären Völkerrechts für bewaffnete Konflikte (1973) 105; id., ‘Ruses of War and Prohibition of Perfidy’, (1974) 13 RDPMDG 269; Furrer, H.-P., Perfidie in der Geschichte und im heutigen Kriegsvölkerrecht (1988); Gimmerthal, M., Kriegslist und Perfidieverbot im Zusatzprotokoll vom 10. Juni 1977 zu den vier Genfer Rotkreuz-Abkommen von 1949 (Zusatzprotokoll I) (1990); Hall, M.T., ‘False Colors and Dummy Ships: The Use of Ruse in Naval Warfare’, (Summer 1989) NavalWarColRev, reprinted in: J.N. Moore and R.F. Turner (eds.), ‘Readings on International Law from the Naval War College Review 1978–1994’, (1995) 68 USNavalWarCollegeIL Studies; Rusinova, V., ‘Perfidy’, in: R. Wolfrum (ed.), MPIL (OUP 2008); Oeter, S., ‘Methods and Means of Combat’, in: D. Fleck (ed.), The Handbook Of Humanitarian Law In Armed Conflicts (1995); Politakis, G.P., ‘Stratagems and the Prohibition of Perfidy with a Special Reference to the Law of War at Sea’, (1993) 45 AustrianJPubIL; Dehn, J.C., ‘Permissible Perfidy? Analysing the Colombian Hostage Rescue, the Capture of Rebel Leaders and the World’s Reaction’, (2008) 6 JICJ; Roach, A., ‘Ruses and Perfidy Deception during Armed Conflict’, (1991–1992) 23 UToILRev 395; Madden, M., ‘Of Wolves and Sheep: A Purposive Analysis of Perfidy Prohibitions in International Humanitarian Law’, (2012) 17 JCSL 439; Green, B.D., ‘Bridging the Gap That Exists for War Crimes of Perfidy’, (2010) 2010 Army Law 45; Watts, S., ‘Law-of-War Perfidy’, (2014) 219 MillRev 106; Ipsen, K., ‘Ruses of War’, in: R. Wolfrum (ed.), MPIL (OUP 2010); Meron, T., Bloody Constraints – War and Chivalry in Shakespeare (1998); ‘Goyau, G., L’église catholique et le droit des gens’, 6 RCADI 139; Lieber, F., Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, originally published as U.A. War Department, Adjutant General’s Office, General Orders No. 100 (24 Apr. 1863), reprinted in: D. Schindler and J. Toman (eds.), The Laws of Armed Conflicts (3rd ed. 1988) 10; de Preux, J., ‘Article 37, 40, 44, 46 Add. Prot. I.’ in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (1987); Ipsen, K., ‘Perfidy’, in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, ii (1995) 978; M. Bothe et al., ‘Die Genfer Konferenz über humanitäres Völkerrecht, Verlauf und Ergebnisse’, (1978) 38 ZaöRV 24; Fleck, D., ‘Ruses of War and Prohibition of Perfidy’, (1974) 12 Revue de Droit Penal Militaire et de Droit de la Guerre 278; Solf, W., ‘Article 37, 40 Add. Prot. I.’, in: M. Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules for Victims of Armed Conflicts – Commentary on the Two 1977 Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 (Nijhoff 1982) 204; Thomas, A.R. and Duncan, J.C. (eds.), Annotated Supplement to the Commander’s Handbook on the Law of Naval Operations (1999); San Remo Manual on International Law

⁶⁸⁶ For details see Ambos, article 25.

⁶⁸⁷ See for a similar approach, Sandoz, et. al., Commentary, (1987) mn 478: ‘clearly and significantly endangered’.

⁶⁸⁸ See also LaHaye, Article 8(2)(b)(x), in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 16.

* The authors are indebted to Jérôme Massé for his research assistance.

Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea, (1995) 209 IRRC; Kalshoven, F. Assisting the Victims of Armed Conflict and Other – Disasters (1989); David, E., Principes de Droit des Conflicts Armés (3rd ed. 2002); Zimmermann, B., 'Article 85 Add. Prot. I', in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (1987); Kalshoven, F., 'Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflicts: The Diplomatic Conference, Geneva 1974–1977, Part II, (1978) IX NethYbIL; Fenrick, J., 'Introductory Report', in: W. Heintschel von Heinegg (ed.), The Military Objective and the Principle of Distinction in the Law of Naval Warfare (1991); Mechelynck, A., La Convention de La Haye (1915); Triffterer, O., 'Kriminalpolitische und dogmatische Überlegungen zum Entwurf gleichlautender 'Elements of Crimes' für alle Tatbestände des Völkermordes', in: B. Schünemann et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 70. Geburtstag am 15. Mai 2001 (2001); 'Zum Beachtungsanspruch des Völkerstrafrechts in staatlichen Rechtssystemen', in: Landesgruppe Österreich der Internationalen Strafrechtsgesellschaft (AIDP) (ed.), Internationale Strafgerichtshöfe und Menschenrechte (2007).

- 447 a) Normative origins and drafting history. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) is identical to article 23 sub-para. b of the 1907 Hague Regulations and was included in the Statute without any debate on its content or scope of application. The prohibitions of perfidy (and treachery) are among the oldest principles of international humanitarian law. They were derived from the principle of chivalry⁶⁸⁹, and reflect customary international law⁶⁹⁰.
- 448 While article 23 (b) Hague Regulations does not define the notion of 'treachery', the chapeau of article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I provides a general definition of perfidy under contemporary international law. Various other provisions of international law prohibit, or are directly related to the prohibition against treacherous or perfidious acts in international armed conflict, in particular articles 23 sub-para. f, 24, 33 para. 3, 34, 35, 40 and 41 of the Hague Regulations and articles 38, 39, 44 para. 3, 46 para. 3 and 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I⁶⁹¹.
- 449 Some of these provisions qualify the abuse of particular protective signs recognized under humanitarian law to exploit the adversary's respect of them as an act of perfidy, since such an act may seriously undermine the respect of these signs designed to minimize suffering and damage by identifying protected persons and objects. The perfidious use of protective signs recognized by the Conventions or the Additional Protocol is a grave breach under article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I. The perfidious use of such signs may not only qualify as a war crime of perfidy under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi), but also as the war crime of improperly using internationally protected signs under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii). Perfidy or treachery in the context of armed conflict has also been criminalized in domestic legislations⁶⁹².
- 450 At the negotiations within the Preparatory Commission on the Elements of War Crimes, it was broadly agreed that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) must be understood as criminalizing perfidy, or at least as criminalizing certain forms of perfidy, and that the definition of perfidy under article 37 Add. Prot. I should be taken as the basis to interpret the meaning of this offence⁶⁹³.

⁶⁸⁹ On custom, chivalry and perfidy, see Meron, Bloody Constraints – War And Chivalry In Shakespeare (1998), for instance, 11–15. As early as during the 13th century, Thomas d'Aquino distinguished permissible ruses from ruses that were prohibited because a promise was given or a wrong fact affirmed, cited in: Goyau (1925) 6 RCADI 139. See also Mike Madden who states that the rule already existed during the 7th century, Madden, (2012) 17 JConfSecL 441.

⁶⁹⁰ See Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 Oct. 1995, para. 125, in which the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY cites the prohibition of perfidy as an example of a general principle of customary international law. Already the Lieber Instructions of 1863 prohibited perfidy in its articles 16 and 65, while admitting deception in its article 101, see Lieber, Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, originally published as U.S. War Department, Adjutant General's Office, General Orders No. 100 (24 Apr. 1863), reprinted in: Schindler and Toman (eds.), The Laws of Armed Conflicts (3rd ed. 1988) 10. See also article 18 (b)–(d) of the 1880 Oxford Manual and article 13 (b) of the 1874 Brussels Declaration and Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2009) 221.

⁶⁹¹ See in addition articles 12 para. 4, 28 paras. 1–3, 51 para. 7, 53 (b) Add. Prot. I and articles 6 and 8–11 of the 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict. The Geneva Conventions do not directly regulate the prohibition of perfidy as it is a rule regarding the conduct of warfare (so-called Hague Law).

⁶⁹² See, e.g., Chapter 22, § 6, No. 2 of the Swedish Penal Code (defining as a crime against international law the killing or injuring of an opponent by means of treachery or deceit).

⁶⁹³ The proposals by the United States, by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland and by Japan for elements of this war crime all suggested to apply definitions of perfidy wholly or partly based on the definition in article 37

b) The principle. Even in armed conflicts combatants may not use any form of deception. 451
The prohibition of perfidy originally derives from a general appeal to the chivalry and good faith of combatants not to betray the good faith of the adversary, even in times of war. One concrete example under contemporary international humanitarian law is for instance the prohibition to abuse protective signs and rules of international humanitarian law designed to minimize suffering and damage and protect certain persons and objects.

c) Treachery and perfidy. aa) Treacherous as a synonym of perfidious. Article 8 para. 2 452
(b) (xi) Rome Statute criminalizes the treacherous killing or wounding individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army. The elements for this war crime make it clear that it must be understood as prohibiting the killing or wounding an adversary by resort to perfidy as defined under article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I⁶⁹⁴.

This clarification of the meaning of the term ‘treacherously’ in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) is 453 justified for the following reasons. First, the concept of treachery raises several questions as to what it covered even at the time of its inclusion in the Hague Regulations. It is even less clear what the concept would prohibit under contemporary humanitarian law. States negotiating the First Additional Protocol at the 1974–1977 Diplomatic Conference, while reaffirming and further developing the concept contained in article 23 (b) Hague Regulations, replaced the term of ‘treachery’ by ‘perfidy’⁶⁹⁵ and defined the latter’s meaning. Several authors consider that the prohibition of article 23 (b) Hague Regulations has been replaced or partially modified by articles 37–39 Add. Prot. I⁶⁹⁶. Others suggest that article 23 (b) Hague Regulations today must be interpreted as referring to the concept of perfidy⁶⁹⁷.

Second, treachery often is understood as referring to a breach of allegiance or loyalty of a 454 subject vis-à-vis his own state or nation⁶⁹⁸. This interpretation of treachery thus has little to do with humanitarian law rules regulating the conduct of hostilities in times of armed conflict vis-à-vis adversaries. International law does not appear to prohibit acts of treason within the own lines⁶⁹⁹. In 1946, an Australian Military Court has listed examples of acts of war treason such as giving information to the enemy or conspiracy against the own armed forces⁷⁰⁰. This confirms that ‘acts of war treason’ are not violations of humanitarian law, Add. Prot. I for the interpretation of the offence. See Proposal by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8 (19 July 1999), Proposal by Japan UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.12 (22 July 1999), Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999).

⁶⁹⁴ This had already been suggested by Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi), in the First Edition of this Commentary 219 et. seq. (mn 116–118).

⁶⁹⁵ J. de Preux however holds that the term perfidy was favored because the French term ‘trahison’ was too restricted in its meaning, De Preux, Article 37 Add. Prot. I, 431–432 (paras. 1488–1489).

⁶⁹⁶ Ipsen, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia 978.

⁶⁹⁷ See, e.g., Bothe et al., (1978) 38 ZaöRV 24; Fleck (1974) 13 RDPMDG 278 (for whom article 23(b) Hague Regulations ‘implies that it is forbidden to take advantage of the ‘good faith’, that is to say of the trust and confidence of individuals belonging to the hostile army or nation’).

⁶⁹⁸ New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary 3379 (2nd ed. 1993).

⁶⁹⁹ Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (1912) 314. ‘International Law gives a right to belligerent to use [espionage and war treason]’, Australian Military Court at Rabaul, Hashi et al. (1948) V Law Reports 28.

⁷⁰⁰ ‘War treason consists of all such acts (except hostilities in arms on the part of the civilian population, spreading of seditious propaganda by aircraft, and espionage) committed within the lines of a belligerent as are harmful to him and are intended to favour the enemy. War treason may be committed, not only in occupied enemy country, or in the zone of military operations, but anywhere within the lines of a belligerent.

The following are the chief cases of war treason that may occur:

- (1) Information of any kind given to the enemy;
- (2) Voluntary supply of money, provisions, ammunition, horses, clothing, and the like, to the enemy;
- (3) Any voluntary assistance to military operations of the enemy, be it by serving as guide in the country, by opening the door of a defended habitation, by repairing a destroyed bridge, or otherwise;
- (4) Attempting to induce soldiers to desert, to surrender, to serve as spies, and the like; surrender, and espionage offered by soldiers;
- (5) Attempting to bribe soldiers or officials in the interest of the enemy, and negotiating such bribe;
- (6) Liberation of enemy prisoners of war ...;
- (7) Conspiracy against the armed forces, or against individual officers and members of them;

since they pertain to acts against members of the own party to the conflict which often take place far from the battlefield, including in states where no armed hostilities are conducted.

455 Third, the terms perfidy and treachery can be understood as synonyms⁷⁰¹.

456 Fourth, delegations in Rome hardly intended to criminalize disrespectful behavior of loyalty towards the own troops as a war crime to be prosecuted by the ICC as a most serious crime.

Therefore, it is submitted that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) indeed prohibits perfidious acts: Here, the term ‘treacherously’ must be understood as referring to the concept of perfidy under contemporary international law.

457 bb) Definition of perfidy. Elements 1 and 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) Rome Statute provide:

- ‘1. The perpetrator invited the confidence or belief of one or more persons that they were entitled to, or were obliged to accord, protection under rules of international law applicable in armed conflict.
2. The perpetrator intended to betray that confidence or belief’.

458 The elements therefore mirror the widely accepted definition of perfidy provided by the second sentence of article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I⁷⁰². Perfidious acts thus involve a breach of good faith in the context of an armed conflict deliberately induced in order to gain a military advantage⁷⁰³. The ‘requirement of a specific intent to breach the adversary’s confidence sets perfidy apart from an improper use, making perfidy a more serious violation of international humanitarian law’⁷⁰⁴. However, it is not any good faith that is protected⁷⁰⁵, but only confidence invited with regard to a protection provided for by international humanitarian law: The ‘victim’ is induced to either trust that he or she is entitled to protection under humanitarian law, or that he or she must accord such protection to the perpetrator⁷⁰⁶. This

(8) Wrecking of military trains, destruction of the lines of communication or of telegraphs or telephones in the interest of the enemy, and destruction of any war material for the same purpose;

(9) Intentional false guidance of troops by a hired guide, or by one who offered his services voluntarily; (10) Rendering courier, or similar, services to the enemy’.

Ohashi et al. (1948) V Law Reports 29. For other sources confirming that one or more of these acts must be considered as acts of (war) treason, see, e.g., Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 204 (bribing a member of the armed forces of an adversary State to assassinate his or her commander); Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (1912) 314 ((1) Information of any kind given to the enemy. (2) Voluntary supply of money, provisions, ammunition, horses, clothing, and the like to the enemy. ... (6) Liberation of enemy prisoners of war. ...). It has furthermore been argued that article 23 (b) Hague Regulations also prohibits recruiting hired killers, placing a price negotiating desertion, on the head of an adversary or offering a reward for the capture of an adversary ‘dead or alive’, proscription and outlawry of an adversary, without however, precluding attacks on individual soldiers or officers, U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10, para. 31. See also Greenspan, The Modern Law (1953) 317.

⁷⁰¹ For instance, U.S. Army, Field Manual, No. 31 uses perfidy and treachery as synonym terms of the international law of armed conflict. The Oxford English Dictionary (2nd ed. 1989), defines treachery as, inter alia, act of perfidy or treason.

⁷⁰² The definition of perfidy in paragraph 111 of the San Remo Manual is virtually identical to the Protocol’s definition. The definition found at Rule 65 of the ICRC study corresponds verbatim with the prohibition found at article 37(1) Add. Prot. I.

⁷⁰³ See also the explanation of Oppenheim and Lauterpacht which is often cited as the ‘classical explanation’: ‘whenever a belligerent has expressly or tacitly engaged, and is therefore bound by a moral obligation, to speak the truth to an enemy, it is perfidy to betray his confidence, because it constitutes a breach of good faith’, Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (6th ed. 1944) 430; Lieber defined perfidy indirectly by stating that a ruse permits of ‘such deception as does not involve the breaking of good faith either positively pledged, regarding agreements entered into during the war, or supposed by the modern law of war to exist’, 1863 Lieber Code, article 15.

⁷⁰⁴ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 223.

⁷⁰⁵ A general rule protecting any good faith would not provide a precise guideline to distinguish perfidious acts of deception from lawful deception, that is, ruses of war.

⁷⁰⁶ See de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 435–436 (para. 1500); Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 204–205; Ipsen, in: Bernhardt, Encyclopedia (1997) 978; German Joint Services Regulations (Zentrale Dienstvorschrift) 15/2 (1992), para. 472 (defining perfidy as ‘acts misleading the adverse party into the

includes entitlements or obligations to accord protection under international law applicable in naval warfare⁷⁰⁷, even if the law on perfidy and permitted ruses of war may be somewhat different in naval warfare. The German Joint Services Regulations for instance defines perfidy as ‘acts misleading the adverse party into the belief that there is a situation affording protection under international law’⁷⁰⁸.

Drawing on the definition of article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I⁷⁰⁹, it is therefore proposed that 459 perfidious acts are acts inviting the confidence of an adversary to lead him to believe that he is entitled to, or is obliged to accord, protection under the rules of international humanitarian law, with intent to betray that confidence.

c) Permitted ruses of war. However, deception is not generally prohibited. So-called 460 ruses of war have always been permitted⁷¹⁰. Article 37 para. 2 First Add. Prot. defines ruses of war as ‘acts which are intended to mislead an adversary or to induce him to act recklessly but which infringe no rule of international law applicable in armed conflict and which are not perfidious because they do not invite the confidence of an adversary with respect to protection under that law’. The essential distinction between perfidy and ruses of war, i. e. non-perfidious deception, is thus that the latter do not invite the confidence of an adversary with respect to a protection under the law of armed conflict and do not violate any other rule of this law.

Deceiving the adversary about the military strength and location of the own forces and the 461 own intentions and plans has always been practiced. Traditional and lawful tactics to mislead the adversary and to induce him to act recklessly are the use of camouflage, decoys, mock operations, and misinformation⁷¹¹, for instance by transmitting false or misleading messages or signals⁷¹², as well as surprise attacks, simulating inactivity, use of small units to simulate large forces, and putting up dummy weapons, installations or vehicles⁷¹³. The possibilities of deception have become even more varied with today’s optical, electronic and other technical means.

Other measures which are not condemned by the prohibition of perfidy, but which are not 462 considered to be ruses of war, include the use of spies and secret agents⁷¹⁴, encouraging defection or insurrection among enemy civilians or desertion, surrender or rebellion among enemy combatants⁷¹⁵, and corrupting enemy soldiers or civilians by bribes.

belief that there is a situation affording protection under international law’), reprinted in in Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (1999). Article 15 in connection with article 16 of the 1863 Lieber Code, defines perfidy indirectly by stating that ‘such deception as does not involve the breaking of good faith either positively pledged, regarding agreements entered into during the war or supposed by the modern law of war to exist’ is allowed.

⁷⁰⁷ See de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 435, para. 1500, fn. 25; Thomas and Duncan (eds.), Annotated Supplement (1999) 510, fns. 5 and 6, para. 12.2.

⁷⁰⁸ German Joint Services Regulations (Zentrale Dienstvorschrift) 15/2 (1992), No. 472, reprinted in: Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995) 200.

⁷⁰⁹ The San Remo Manual contains a definition with almost identical terms as article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I, San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea, Prepared by international lawyers and naval experts convened by the International Institute of Humanitarian Law, adopted in June 1994, (1995) 309 IRevRC, para. 111.

⁷¹⁰ See article 101 of the Lieber Code, article 14 of the Brussels Declaration and article 24 of the 1907 Hague Regulations. See generally Politakis (1993) 45 AustrianJPubIL 3 253; Bourdoncle, De l’influence des Ruses sur l’évolution du droit de la guerre (1958) 31–133.

⁷¹¹ See article 37 para. 2 second sentence Add. Prot. I.

⁷¹² Unless this would constitute a prohibited improper use of the signals enumerated under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii), and unless it does not otherwise amount to a perfidious act.

⁷¹³ See Hall (Summer 1989) NavalWarColRev, reprinted in: Moore and Turner (eds.) (1995) 68 USNavalWar-CollegeILStudies 491 et seq.; Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995) 199–200; Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982); de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 1521. See also the extensive lists of military manuals, e.g., U.S. Army, Field Manual, No. 51; Swiss Army, Manuel Des Lois Et Coutumes De La Guerre (1963).

⁷¹⁴ See article 39 para. 3 Add. Prot. I; article 24 of the 1907 Hague Regulations; de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 1766.

⁷¹⁵ However, the assassination of a particular individual arguably may be considered to be an act of treason.

463 d) Examples of perfidious acts. Largely based on article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I⁷¹⁶, the following are examples of perfidious acts (provided they result in killing or wounding individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army):

- *The feigning of civilian, non-combatant status*⁷¹⁷. The distinction between civilians and combatants is central to the law of armed conflict, and attacks on civilians are prohibited⁷¹⁸. Consequently, feigning such protected status may amount to an act of perfidy. However, article 44 para. 3 Add. Prot. I recognizes that there are situations of armed conflicts where an armed combatant cannot distinguish himself from the civilian population (a guerrilla combatant in occupied territories or in wars of national liberation), and provides that he does not commit a perfidious act if he carries his arms openly during each military engagement and during the time he is visible in a military deployment preceding the launching of an attack⁷¹⁹.
- The feigning of protected status by the use of internationally recognized symbols such as the flag of truce, of signs, emblems or uniforms of the United Nations, or of the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions⁷²⁰. Article 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I makes it a grave breach of the Protocol to perfidiously use, in violation of article 37 Add. Prot. I, the protective signs recognized by the Conventions or the First Protocol, insofar death or serious injury to body or health is caused. This includes⁷²¹:
 - the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions, including non-visual signals⁷²²;
 - other protective signs and emblems recognized by the Geneva Conventions⁷²³;
 - the flag of truce⁷²⁴;
 - emblems of cultural property⁷²⁵;
 - signs, emblems or uniforms of the United Nations⁷²⁶;
 - signs, emblems or uniforms of a neutral or other State not party to the conflict⁷²⁷;
 - other internationally recognized protective signs,⁷²⁸ including other signs recognized by the Geneva Conventions and the First and Third Additional Protocols⁷²⁹.

⁷¹⁶ See also the San Remo Manual which states that '[p]erfidious acts include the launching of an attack while feigning: (a) exempt, civilian, neutral or protected United Nations status; (b) surrender or distress by, e.g., sending a distress signal or by the crew taking to life rafts', San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea, Prepared by international lawyers and naval experts convened by the International Institute of Humanitarian Law, adopted in June 1994, (1995) 309 IREVRC para. 111.

⁷¹⁷ Article 37 para. 1 (c) Add. Prot. I.

⁷¹⁸ See Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (b) (i).

⁷¹⁹ See de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentar (1987), paras. 1691–1715; Kalshoven, Assisting The Victims of Armed Conflict and Other Disasters (1989); David, Principes (3rd ed., 2002) 358–371.

⁷²⁰ Articles 37 para. 1 (a) and 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I.

⁷²¹ Cf. Zimmermann, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 998–999, paras. 3494–3499. Various states have complied with the obligation to provide for criminal jurisdiction over perfidious use of internationally recognized and protected signs, see, e.g., article 386 of the 1994 Penal Code of the Republic of Slovenia; article 612 para. 4 of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 10/95 of 23 Nov. 1995).

⁷²² See article 38 para. 1 (first sentence) Add. Prot. I as well as article 18 para. 5 Add. Prot. I and articles 3, 7–9 of Annex I to Add. Prot. I.

⁷²³ See article 6 of Annex I to GC IV (hospital and safety zones); article 66 para. 4 Add. Prot. I and article 16 of Annex I to Add. Prot. I ('international distinctive sign of civil defence'). See also article 56 para. 7 Add. Prot. I and article 17 of Annex I to Add. Prot. I ('international special sign for works and installations containing dangerous forces'); articles 59 para. 6 and 60 para. 5 Add. Prot. I (signs agreed upon between parties to the conflict for non-defended localities or demilitarized zones).

⁷²⁴ Article 38 para. 1 (second sentence) Add. Prot. I.

⁷²⁵ Ibid.

⁷²⁶ Articles 37 para. 1 (d) and 38 para. 2 Add. Prot. I.

⁷²⁷ Articles 37 para. 1 (d) and 39 Add. Prot. I.

⁷²⁸ An example of perfidious use of such other protective signs may be to feign distress by giving a signal of SOS or MAYDAY (recognized by the Radio Regulation of the International Telecommunications Union), see para. 111(b) of the San Remo Manual. Even the use of signs agreed upon bilaterally, such as signs identifying non-defended localities and demilitarized zones (articles 59 and 60 Add. Prot. I), to incite confidence with intent to betray that confidence may be perfidious.

⁷²⁹ See articles 85 para. 3 (f) and 38 para. 1 Add. Prot. I.

Improperly using a flag of truce, the flag or the military insignia and uniform of the enemy or of the United Nations, or the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions constitutes a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) Rome Statute insofar resulting in death or serious personal injury⁷³⁰.

- *The feigning of an intent to surrender*⁷³¹, to cease fire, or to negotiate a truce. Beyond the misuse of a flag of truce criminalized by article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)⁷³², declaring or otherwise clearly demonstrating to the enemy that one demands a cease fire or suspension of arms, while intending to betray him, may constitute an act of perfidy⁷³³. Furthermore, persons who express an intention to surrender must be recognized as persons hors de combat and may not be made the object of an attack⁷³⁴. The categorical prohibition to attack this category of persons calls for the criminalization of the abuse of their protection, and the feigning of an intent to surrender with an intention to betray the adversary's confidence in order to kill or wound him thus clearly amounts to a perfidious act. However, it seems less certain that prisoners of war who attack their guards while they are being detained would commit an act of perfidy criminalized under the ICC Statute⁷³⁵. If combatants have surrendered, have been disarmed and are in custody of the adversary party to the conflict, they most likely did not surrender with an intent to kill or wound the guards, and prisoners of war do not feign any entitlement to protection⁷³⁶.
- *The feigning of an incapacitation by wounds or sickness*⁷³⁷, or of distress. A person who has been rendered unconscious or is otherwise incapacitated by wounds or sickness and therefore is incapable of defending himself is a person hors de combat and therefore may not be made the object of attack⁷³⁸. Again, as a counterpart to this fundamental protection, feigning to be hors de combat with an intent to kill or wound the enemy whose confidence was invited is an act of perfidy and a war crime under this provision. Similarly, the feigning of distress, in particular by misuse of internationally protected or recognized distress signals such as SOS or MAYDAY⁷³⁹, evokes the obligation to aid and rescue those in distress, and consequently its abuse with an intent to betray the confidence of the enemy constitutes an act of perfidy.
- The feigning of belonging to a neutral or other State not party to the conflict by the use of their signs. Such feigning is prohibited by article 39 para. 1 Add. Prot. I, is an act of perfidy according to article 37 para. 1 of the Protocol, and seems to be a grave breach according to article 85 para. 3 (f) of the Protocol⁷⁴⁰.
- *The feigning of belonging to the enemy by the use of signs of the enemy*⁷⁴¹? Feigning to be a member of the adversary's or another States' armed forces is not directed at feigning a protection under international humanitarian law⁷⁴², and therefore does not constitute ⁷³⁰ See Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii).

⁷³¹ See article 37 para. 1 (a) Add. Prot. I.

⁷³² See Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii).

⁷³³ While the protection of the white flag may still be of importance in face-to-face negotiations, today's warfare is conducted with modern means of technological communication and conduct of warfare without eye-sight is common. Radio messages may be more effective and more commonly used to signal a desire to cease fire, negotiate or surrender. On the new challenges of electronic warfare in regard to improper or perfidious use of signs, see Politakis (1993) 45 AustrianJPubl 3 301–306.

⁷³⁴ See Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi).

⁷³⁵ de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 1504, fn. 34, considers it 'not very likely' that such attacks are acts of perfidy.

⁷³⁶ Such acts may, however, compromise the protection under the Third Geneva Convention and under article 41 Add. Prot. I.

⁷³⁷ Article 37 para. 1 (b) Add. Prot. I.

⁷³⁸ See Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi).

⁷³⁹ See Radio Regulation of the International Telecommunications Union.

⁷⁴⁰ Zimmermann, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.) Commentary (1987), mn 3497.

⁷⁴¹ Article 39 para. 2 Add. Prot. I.

⁷⁴² In this regard, the United States proposal at the first session of the Preparatory Committee to consider the improper use of the adversary's signs as a war crime, 'e.g., if the use of an enemy uniform does ... cause

perfidy in the strict sense⁷⁴³. Furthermore, it has always been controversial to which degree feigning to belong to the enemy's forces is unlawful. According to article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii), which criminalizes the 'improper use' of the flag, military insignia or uniform of the adversary, such acts may give rise to criminal responsibility⁷⁴⁴. The Preparatory Commission might usefully address the issue to what degree feigning to be a member of the adversary's armed forces gives rise to criminal responsibility.

465 e) 'Killing or wounding ... individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army'. Perfidy per se does not amount to a war crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC, as article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) only criminalizes killing or wounding by resort to perfidy. The conduct must result in death or injury to complete the crime. This is confirmed by the element 3 of this war crime. The Statute does not require any qualified level of the injury⁷⁴⁵. It may be furthermore recalled that article 25 para. 3 (f) Rome Statute provides also for criminal responsibility for unsuccessful attempts if the perpetrator has taken 'action that commences [the crime's] execution by means of a substantial step'. In contrast to article 37 para. 1 Add. Prot. I, capturing by resort to perfidy is not covered by article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) Rome Statute.

466 The confidence created by the perfidious act must have been used to kill or injure (element 4). As the Elements of Crimes confirm, a perpetrator must have participated both in the invitation of the confidence as well as the killing or injuring to be punishable for perfidious killing or injuring. Standing besides a fellow soldier holding up a white flag to deceive the adversary, and then killing an adversary by betraying that confidence so created, would be a sufficient participation in the invitation of the confidence.

Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) applies only to the killing or wounding of individuals belonging to the hostile nation and army. This includes both combatants and civilians of the adversary party.

12. Paragraph 2(b)(xii): Quarter*

467 a) Normative origins and drafting history. This provision draws on article 23 (d) of the 1907 Hague Regulations and was included in the ICC Statute without any debate on its substance. The consideration underlying the prohibition of declarations that there shall be no survivors is analogous to the aim of the prohibition to kill or wound persons hors de combat criminalized under article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi) Rome Statute: When a combatant surrenders, is wounded, or is otherwise incapable of defending him- or herself, he is no threat anymore and it would therefore violate fundamental principles of humanitarian law to kill him or her. To deny quarter provides no (proportional) military advantage as it is sufficient to render the adversary *hors de combat*⁷⁴⁶.

468 Initially, the rule by which the conquered adversary must not be exterminated was applied only to peoples of the same race or religion, not being applied with regard to strangers. Up to the eighteenth century, belligerents often declared that they would not make any prisoners if detrimental belief in an obligation or protection arising under the law of armed conflict', Proposal by the United States, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 11, presents some difficulty.

⁷⁴³ Article 37 Add. Prot. I does not list the feigning to be a member of the adversary's or another State's armed forces among the examples of perfidy, and article 39 regulates such acts slightly different from the treatment of internationally protected signs in articles 37, 38 and 85 para. 3 (f) Add. Prot. I, Kalshoven (1978) IX NethYbLL 163, seems to consider the feigning to be a member of the adversary's armed forces not an act of perfidy but of treachery, while Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 204, considers article 39 para. 2 as prohibiting the perfidious use of the enemy insignia.

⁷⁴⁴ See Cottier, article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii).

⁷⁴⁵ The U.S. had proposed that the result needs to be 'death or serious injury', Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 11–12. This requirement of a heightened level of injury was not adopted by the Preparatory Committee.

* The authors are indebted to Jérôme Massé for his research assistance.

⁷⁴⁶ A practice of denying quarter even tends to stiffen the resistance of the adversary and may in addition prompt the adversary to adopt a similar policy. Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 217.

the people in besieged fortresses would continue to obstinately defend themselves⁷⁴⁷. However, the prohibition against ‘declaring that no quarter will be given’ has since become well established and now reflects customary international law⁷⁴⁸.

The 1919 Responsibility Commission listed giving no quarter among the violations to be prosecuted (No. 28). Several accused in post-World War II trials were convicted for the war crime of denying quarter⁷⁴⁹. This offense also constitutes a war crime under the municipal law of several states⁷⁵⁰. 469

At and prior to the Rome Conference, there was virtually no debate on the content of the war crime adopted as article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute. During the negotiations of the elements for this ICC war crime⁷⁵¹, both the US⁷⁵² and the Swiss⁷⁵³ proposals constituted the basis for discussion. 470

Declaring or ordering not to give any quarter may amount to another war crime, and in particular the war crime of killing persons hors de combat (article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi) Rome Statute), insofar the perpetrator incurs command responsibility under article 28 Rome Statute or insofar the perpetrator ordered, solicited or induced such killing and the killing in fact occurs or is attempted (article 25 para. 3 (b) Rome Statute). The course of conduct criminalized under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute thus is largely covered by the war crime of killing or wounding persons hors de combat covered by article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi). 471

b) Material elements. aa) Declaration, order or threat. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute criminalizes the act of ‘declaring’ that no quarter will be given. However, this term 472

⁷⁴⁷ While the Lieber Code generally prohibited giving no quarter, it did not rule it out under certain exceptional circumstances. Cf. articles 60–71, 1863 Lieber Code. Article 60 stated in part that ‘[i]t is against the usage of modern war to resolve, in hatred and revenge, to give no quarter. No body of troops has the right to declare that it will not give, and therefore will not expect, quarter; ...’.

⁷⁴⁸ See, e.g., article 23 (d) Hague Regulations; article 40 Add. Prot. I; de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987) 474, para. 1589. See also Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 161: in rule 46 the ICRC also refers to the Oxford Manual and the Brussels Declaration.

⁷⁴⁹ A British Military Court found an accused guilty of ‘committing a war crime ... in that he ... in violation of the laws and usages of war gave orders to [his] platoon that no prisoners were to be taken and that any prisoners taken were to be shot’, British Military Court at Hamburg, Wickman (1949) XV Law Reports 133. In another war crimes trial it was decided that the mere giving of an order that subordinate submarine commanders were to destroy ships and their crews was a serious violation of the laws and customs of war, British Military Court in Hamburg (1951) Ann. Dig. (Year 1946) 64, Moehle Case, (1949) IX Law Reports 75, 78 and 80. In the Peleus Trial, a Commander of a German submarine was sentenced to death for having ordered the killing of survivors of a sunken merchant vessel, an order carried out by four others who killed survivors on rafts, British Military Court at Hamburg, Eck et al. (1947) I Law Reports 2 and 13. S.S. Brigadeführer Kurt Meyer was found to have committed a war crime in that he, ‘in violation of the laws and usages of war, incited and counseled troops under his command to deny quarter to Allied troops’, Meyer (1948) IV Law Reports 98 and 108. See also British Military Court at Brunswick, Von Falkenhorst (1949) XI Law Reports 18–30. See also Fenrick, in: Heintschel von Heinegg (ed.), The Military Objective (1991) 11–17.

⁷⁵⁰ See, e.g., U.S. Commander’s Handbook (1999), para. 6.2.5, section 4 (regarding the ‘[d]enial of quarter (i.e., killing or wounding an enemy hors de combat or making a genuine offer of surrender)’ as a ‘representative’ war crime under international law). ‘Directions to give no quarter’ also constituted war crimes under the Australian War Crimes Law, (1948) V Law Reports 96, and the Netherlands East Indies Statute Book Decree No. 44 of 1946, (1948) XI Law Reports 94.

⁷⁵¹ On the drafting history relevant to particular elements, see below, article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) and (iii).

⁷⁵² Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999)13:

1. [Link with armed conflict].
2. That the accused was a person in command who had force under the accused’s effective command and control or authority and control.
3. That the accused made a declaration or gave an order to those subordinate forces that any bona fide surrender by the enemy be refused, even if it would be reasonable to accept, and that all enemy persons proffering surrender be killed.
4. That in so declaring or ordering, the accused intended that his or her stated intent be executed.
5. That one or more persons were killed by forces acting in furtherance of the declaration of the accused’.

⁷⁵³ Proposal by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8 (19 July 1999);

1. [Link with armed conflict]
2. The perpetrator ordered that these shall be no survivors, threatened an adversary therewith, or conducted the hostilities on this basis’.

must be understood to include also forms of expression other than a formal declaration. As the elements of this war crime point out, the provision prohibits ‘declarations’ as well as ‘orders’ that no quarter shall be given. In addition, an explicit threat that no quarter will be given, typically with a view to provoke an immediate surrender or to terrorize the adversary, also appears to amount to a declaration prohibited under article 8 para. 2(b) (xii). However, the Elements are not entirely clear on this point. On the one hand, element 2 suggests that a declaration or order may be ‘given in order to threaten an adversary’ (emphasis added). On the other hand, however, element 3 requires that ‘[t]he perpetrator was in a position of effective command or control over the subordinate forces to which the declaration or order was directed’⁷⁵⁴.

- 473 Does the war crime of declaring that no quarter shall be given under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute extend to the act of conducting hostilities on that basis? While article 40 Add. Prot. I entitled ‘Quarter’ (also) reaffirms article 23 (d) Hague Regulations, it not only prohibits ‘to order that there shall be no survivors’ and ‘to threaten an adversary therewith’, but also ‘to conduct hostilities on this basis’⁷⁵⁵. However, does article 40 Add. Prot. I restate the meaning of article 23 (d) Hague Regulations under modern humanitarian law⁷⁵⁶.
- 474 At the Preparatory Committee the Swiss proposal consisting of interpreting article 8 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute to also subsume the actual conduct of hostilities on the basis that there shall be no survivors did not find sufficient support. The proposal to add the wording ‘or conducted hostilities on that basis’, which essentially repeats article 40 Add. Prot. I, was opposed by several delegations at the Preparatory Committee and consequently was not included. In any event, this restrictive view (insofar it would be upheld by the ICC) would not overly limit the Court’s jurisdiction, since the conduct of hostilities on the basis of not leaving survivors is likely to regularly amount (also) to the war crime of killing or wounding persons hors de combat covered by article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi) Rome Statute.
- 475 bb) Specific content of the declaration, order or threat. According to the Rome Statute, the declaration, order or threat must express that ‘no quarter will be given’. The meaning of the term ‘quarter’ in article 23 (d) Hague Regulations likely derives from its designation of the quartering and the accommodation of troops; denying quarter thus would mean not to provide such accommodation and security, and, by implication, life⁷⁵⁷. Article 40 Add. Prot. I as well as the elements to this war crime suggest that the meaning of the prohibition to deny ‘quarter’ is restricted to ‘leaving no survivors’⁷⁵⁸. This interpretation appears appropriate in the context of defining ‘one of the most serious crimes of international concern’. Thus, declaring ‘that no quarter will be given’ must be understood, in the context of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute, as referring to not sparing the conquered adversaries’ lives, meaning killing or leaving to a foreseeable death all conquered adversaries, including those proffering a bona fide surrender or persons that are otherwise hors de combat.
- 476 The elements appear to also cover contingent orders or declarations (‘leaving no survivors if X or Y does not happen’), as the elements explicitly cover declarations with an intent to threaten the adversary.

⁷⁵⁴ Emphasis added. Threatening the adversary however would not usually be considered as a declaration directed to the own subordinate forces, and it is not necessary that the threat is also directed to the own forces. The ambiguity might have resulted from the fact that the wording ‘to threaten an adversary’ was added at the end of the informal negotiations.

⁷⁵⁵ Paragraph 43 of the San Remo Manual contains the identical wording as article 40 Add. Prot. I. The ‘Explanations’ to that paragraph 43 state that the inclusion of this rule is ‘merely an affirmation that the provision concerned is already applicable to naval warfare’, and that ‘[t]he present text is a further development of [article 23 (d) Hague Regulations]’, Doswald-Beck (ed.), San Remo Manual (1994) 118–119.

⁷⁵⁶ See Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 216–217 (‘Article 40 reaffirms, in more modern language, the prohibition of the 1907 Hague Regulations, Art. 23(d)’).

⁷⁵⁷ See De Preux, in Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 475, para. 1591, fn. 8; Mechelynck, La Convention De La Haye (1915) 245.

⁷⁵⁸ Emphasis added. The plenary meeting of the 1974–77 Conference confirmed that the content of article 40 Add. Prot. I was perfectly in accordance with its title ‘quarter’, OR, Vol. VI, 103–104 (CDDH/SR.39, paras. 67–69).

While the war crime of denying quarter does not appear to prohibit ‘harshness’ in killing adversary combatants, it seems not necessarily limited to prohibiting the killing of persons that are *hors de combat*⁷⁵⁹, in contrast to article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi). As de Preux implies, the prohibition to deny quarter might also be considered to limit the conduct of warfare against combatants and the use of both conventional and other weapons⁷⁶⁰. Certainly, the prohibition does not imply that particular weapons per se are illegal. However, to some degree, the rule of proportionality also applies with regard to attacking combatants and with regard to the way weapons are used; the deliberate and pointless extermination of adversary combatants may constitute disproportionate casualties as compared to the military advantage anticipated if it would be feasible and sufficient to only render the adversary *hors de combat*⁷⁶¹. Based on this argument, the war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute of ordering that there shall be no survivors could be considered to criminalize to some extent serious violations of the prohibition to use means or methods of warfare of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering.

In the von Ruchteschell case, the Judge Advocate advised the Military Court in 1947 that ‘even if they found that no signal indicating surrender had been received by the armed raider the accused could still be convicted if they came to the conclusion that he deliberately or recklessly avoided any question of surrender by making it impossible for the [targeted] vessel to make a signal’⁷⁶². Based on this consideration it appears arguable that an attack in a way not leaving any possibility for surrender could amount to the war crime of denying quarter if the refusal of a possibility to signal surrender, or the killing of all of the adversaries, (clearly) did not represent any (proportional) military advantage, which might however for instance be the case when surprise or speed are critical to the attack’s success.

Element 3 and the comment to the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) proposed by the United States would have made such interpretation difficult⁷⁶³. However, neither element 3 nor the comment have been retained.

cc) Position of effective command or control of perpetrator. At the Preparatory Committee negotiations, several delegations wanted to ensure that declarations or orders that were not serious, such as jokes or declarations that obviously could not be effective because of a lack of control or influence over forces, would not amount to the war crime of denying quarter under the Rome Statute. Hence, element 3 requires – partly inspired by US proposals – that the perpetrator must have been ‘in a position of effective command or control over the subordinate forces to which the declaration or order was directed’. This requirement limits the criminal responsibility to those declarations that in fact may be expected to exert some influence on the subordinate forces and to be implemented or leading to an increased disregard of humanitarian duties. Declarations of a soldier lacking any command or control over other soldiers would thus not qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii). A position of de facto command or control over forces however suffices⁷⁶⁴.

⁷⁵⁹ The famous Commando Order of Hitler of 18 October 1942 for instance provided that ‘all enemy troops encountered by German troops during so-called commando operations [...] are to be exterminated to the last man, either in combat or in pursuit’ and that ‘if such men appear to be about to surrender, no quarter should be given them on general principle’ (emphasis added), U.S. Military Commission at Rome, Dostler (1951) AnnDig (1946) 281; Von Falkenhorst (1949) XI Law Reports 18–30, id. (1951) AnnDig (1946) 282; U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, Von Leeb et al. (1953) AnnDig (1948) 389.

⁷⁶⁰ De Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), paras. 1598–1599.

⁷⁶¹ De Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 1598.

⁷⁶² Von Ruchteschell (1951) AnnDig (Year 1946) 248.

⁷⁶³ The comment stated that ‘bringing a preponderance of force to bear against enemy military objectives or enemy personnel does not constitute denial of quarter. Neither is a commander obligated to offer an opportunity to surrender before carrying out an attack, since surprise or speed may be critical to the success of attack’. See note 401, Proposal submitted by the United States of America 13.

⁷⁶⁴ For the opposite opinion see Triffterer, in: Schünemann et al. (eds.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 70. Geburtstag (2001) 1432; Triffterer, in: Landesgruppe Österreich der Internationalen Strafrechtsgesellschaft (AIDP) (ed.), Internationale Strafgerichtshöfe und Menschenrechte (2007) 104.

- 481 dd) No necessity that hostilities actually be conducted on that basis. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute that the perpetrator be ‘declaring’ that quarter be denied contains no indication that the declaration must actually be implemented. The elements of this war crime appear to confirm this, since they on the one hand specify in detail what the objective of the declaration or order and the perpetrator’s command position needs to be, but on the other hand do not mention any requirement that the hostilities actually be conducted on the basis that no quarter shall be given. Indeed, several delegations at the Preparatory Committee found the element proposed by the U.S. ‘[t]hat one or more persons were killed by forces acting in furtherance of the declaration of the accused’⁷⁶⁵ not acceptable or not in conformity with the Statute, and this element was therefore not included.
- 482 Consequently, there is no need of a result such as that persons hors de combat actually be killed without mercy by forces acting in furtherance of the declaration, order or threat. It constitutes a serious violation of humanitarian law per se to declare, threaten or order that no quarter shall be given in a position of effective command or control (and with the requisite intent). Such ‘declarations’ may well produce or increase a disregard of humanitarian obligations including ignoring possibilities and signs of surrender or incapacitation.
- 483 c) Mental element. Element 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) Rome Statute specifies that the perpetrator must pronounce the declaration or give the order with the intention to threaten the adversary or to conduct hostilities on the basis that there shall be no survivors. This element was inserted to avoid that a joke, or a statement or order that evidently cannot be implemented, are excluded from the scope of application of the offense.

13. Paragraph 2(b)(xiii): Prohibited destruction

Literature: Benvenisti, E., The International Law of Occupation (2nd ed. 2012); Gasser, H.-P., ‘Protection of the Civilian Population’, in: D. Fleck (ed.), The Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflicts (1995); von Glahn, G., The Occupation of Enemy Territory: A Commentary on the Law and Practice of Belligerent Occupation (in particular 176 et seq.) (1957); Kolb, R., ‘Etude sur l’Occupation et sur l’Article 47 de la IV^{ème} Convention de Genève du 12 Août 1949 Relative à la Protection des Personnes Civiles en Temps de Guerre – Le Degré d’Intangibilité des Droits en Territoire Occupé’, (2012) AfricanYbIL 267 et seq.; Dinstein, Y., The International Law of Belligerent Occupation (2009); Timraz et al. v. Commander of IDF Forces in the Gaza Strip, partly summarised and reproduced in: (1993) IsYbHumRts 337 et seq.; Zimmermann, A., ‘State Succession and the Nationality of Natural Persons – Facts and Possible Codification’, in: P.M. Eisenmann and M. Koskeniemi (eds.), State Succession – Codification Tested Against the Facts (1999); Fatatouros, A., ‘National Legal Persons in International Law’, in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, ii (1995) 877, 879; Dominicé, C., La Notion du Caractère Ennemi (1961), in particular 51 et seq.; Hosang, H., ‘Destroying or seizing the enemy’s property: article 8 (2) (b) (xiii)’, in: Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 171; Carnahan, B., ‘Lincoln, Lieber and the Laws of War: The Origins and Limits of the Principle of Military Necessity’, (1998) 92 AJIL 213 et seq.; Rolin, A., Le Droit Moderne de la Guerre, i (1920) 339; Stone, J., Legal Controls of International Conflict (1954) 443; Garner, J.W., ‘Treatment of Enemy Aliens’, (1919) 13 AJIL 22; Politis, N., ‘L’interprétation anglaise de l’article 23 h du Règlement de La Haye’, (1911) 18 RGDIP 249; Freeman, A.V., ‘War Crimes by Enemy Nationals Administering Justice in the Occupied Territory’, (1947) 41 AJIL 579; Picciotto, C.M., ‘Alien Enemy Persons, Firms and Corporations in English Law, (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171–172; Hyde, C.C., International Law, Vol. III (2nd ed. 1947) 1714; Stirling-Zanda, S., ‘The Individual Criminal Responsibility of Judicial Organs in International Law in the Light of International Practice’, (2001) 48 NethILRev 1 67; Greenspan, M., The Modern Law of Land Warfare (1959) 47; Politis, N., ‘Lois et Coutumes de la Guerre sur terre. L’interprétation anglaise de l’article 23 h du Règlement de La Haye’, (1911) 18 RGDIP 249; Davis, G.B., ‘The Amelioration of the Rules of War on Land’, (1908) 2 AJIL 70; Bordwell, P., The Law of War Between Belligerents: A History and Commentary (1908) 283–284; Rowe, P., Defence: The Legal Implications – Military Law and the Laws of War (1987) 285; Hosang, H., ‘Compelling Participation in Military Operations: article 8 (2) (b) (xv)’, in: Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 173–174.

- 484 a) Normative context and scope of application. The wording of the prohibition of destroying the enemy’s property contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute is completely based on article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and ⁷⁶⁵ Proposal submitted by the United States of America – Draft elements of crime, Addendum, 13 (element 5).

Customs of War on Land. A provision which is quite similar in nature is to be found in the part of the Statute dealing with grave breaches of the four Geneva Conventions, namely in article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv)⁷⁶⁶.

Besides, a parallel provision relating to non-international armed conflicts is contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute⁷⁶⁷. 485

Similar prohibitions are also contained in articles 46, 47, 52 and 53 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land⁷⁶⁸, article 18 of the Third Geneva Convention, article 53 of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 and finally article 54 of Add. Prot. I. Given the wording of the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (b), it is against this background that article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute has to be interpreted. It is also worth noting that article 3 (b) ICTY-Statute contains a somewhat similar prohibition, while Section 6.1 (b) (xiii), as well as article 13 (b) No. 14 of the Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal (which however refers to ‘property of an adverse party’) are, mutatis mutandis, identical with article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Rome Statute. 486

The elements of crimes, adopted by the Assembly of States Parties, provide with regard to the war crime of destroying or seizing the enemy’s property that: 487

1. The perpetrator destroyed or seized certain property.
2. Such property was property of a hostile party.
3. Such property was protected from that destruction or seizure under the international law of armed conflict.
4. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established the status of the property.
5. The destruction or seizure was not justified by military necessity.
6. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an international armed conflict.
7. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.

The question of seizure or destruction of the property of the enemy can mainly arise with regard to three situations: 488

- destruction of enemy property as the consequence of combat activities,
- destruction or seizure of property of enemy aliens located on the territory of a belligerent State and finally,
- destruction or seizure of enemy property located in occupied territories⁷⁶⁹.

Thus, the question arises, which of the three situations just outlined, article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute is supposed to cover.

Article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land on which the wording of both, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute are based, forms part of Section II of the just mentioned 1907 Hague Convention which deals with hostilities. More particularly, it is contained in its Chapter I, which defines the limits as to the means of injuring the enemy. Thus, at first glance it might seem as if article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) (just like article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute) would regulate means and methods of warfare. This is arguably further confirmed by the fact that article 46 of the 1907 Hague Regulations, contained in Section III dealing with occupation, enshrines a 489

⁷⁶⁶ For details see Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv).

⁷⁶⁷ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii).

⁷⁶⁸ As to the prohibition of pillage see also Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi).

⁷⁶⁹ Besides, the issue of protected property also arises as far as the property of captured prisoners of war is concerned; see i.a. both, article 4 para. 3 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land as well as article 18 of the Third Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War under which personal belongings of a prisoner of war, unlike arms and equipment, shall not be subject to seizure or destruction. It is submitted, however, that this specific prohibition is not included in the rule enshrined in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute. This is due to the fact that the protection of prisoners of war is already addressed in article 8 para. 2 (a), (i), (ii), (iii), (v) and (vi).

specific provision on the protection of private property in case of occupation, which in turn was however not introduced into the Rome Statute.

- 490 Still, it has to be noted that means and methods of warfare are already being dealt with extensively inter alia in article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) and (iv) of the Statute. If one was therefore to interpret article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) as to also regulate the means and methods of warfare, it would be largely redundant and superfluous.
- 491 Even more importantly, allowing the military necessity exception entailed in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) to be invoked in the realm of the conduct of hostilities could undermine the principle of distinction in as much as it could potentially be used to extend the range of legitimate military targets beyond the confines of the accepted definition of military objectives as it is contained in article 52 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I and customary international law. After all, on the basis of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) the destruction of certain civilian objects could be justified on the basis of military necessity; whereas an attack against civilian objects would amount to a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii), which does not admit of such a military necessity justification.
- 492 Thus, it is submitted that the provision under consideration, notwithstanding the fact that it has its roots in the part of the 1907 Hague Regulations dealing with hostilities, does not regulate the means and methods of warfare to be applied in the case of international armed conflict notwithstanding the fact that the elements of crimes do not contain such a limitation and that the ICTY has also applied (the however different provisions of) article 3 (b) and (d) of its Statute with regard to property not subject to the control of the offender⁷⁷⁰.
- 493 The ICTY, however, avoids the above mentioned risk of undermining the principle of distinction in the realm of the conduct of hostilities by defining military necessity with reference to the definition of military objectives in article 52 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I⁷⁷¹. In other words, according to the ICTY, military necessity and military objectives, at least for purposes of the crime of wanton destruction, carry the same meaning. As a result, according to the ICTY military necessity may never justify the targeting of civilian objects⁷⁷².
- 494 While this approach as such cannot be disputed, the interpretation of the ICTY leads to an overlap of the crimes contained, on the one hand, in article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) and on the other in (xiii). Accordingly in the context of international armed conflicts article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) would be rendered redundant. Moreover, the very same approach would make the targeting of civilian objects a war crime even in non-international armed conflicts through the backdoor of the war crime of wanton destruction as laid out in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii). Yet, under the Rome Statute such an interpretation would not be maintainable, given that the crime of intentionally directing attacks against civilian objects was deliberately excluded from the catalogue of war crimes applicable to non-international armed conflicts. Therefore, the first situation, i. e. the destruction of enemy property as the consequence of the conduct of hostilities, cannot be comprised by the provision in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii).
- 495 It must be noted, however, that the ICC, in the Katanga decision, followed the approach of the ICTY and accorded a broader meaning to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii). The Chamber applied article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) also to attacks against civilian and military objectives, i. e. to ⁷⁷⁰ See e.g. Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 26 Feb. 2001, paras. 346 et seq., as well as Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, paras 290 et seq. But see also for a concurring view Werle, Völkerstrafrecht (3rd ed., 2012), 1256, as well as Sect. 9, para. 1 of the German Code of Crimes against International Law implementing the provision here under consideration, which insofar refers to the destruction, appropriation or seizure of property of the adverse party contrary to international law, ‘such property being in the power of the perpetrator’s party’.

⁷⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 295; Prosecutor v. Galić, IT-98-29-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 5 Dec. 2003, para. 51.

⁷⁷² Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 Dec. 2004, para. 36; para. 54; Prosecutor v. Galić, IT-98-29-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 30 Nov. 2006, para. 130; Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., IT-06-90-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 15 Apr. 2011, para. 1766.

the realm of the actual conduct of hostilities⁷⁷³. In this context the Chamber held that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) does not apply to property that qualifies as a military objective in the sense of article 52 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I nor to proportionate collateral damage, i. e. incidental civilian damage the destruction of which was justified under the principle of proportionality⁷⁷⁴. It would seem to follow that disproportionate collateral damage, in the view of the chamber, would qualify as a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii). However, as it would seem difficult to apply a different interpretation with regard to the similarly worded article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) in the context of non-international armed conflict, the interpretation adopted in Katanga leads to the problematic result that both the intentional targeting of civilian objects as well as violations of the proportionality principle (war crimes in the context of international armed conflicts according to article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) and (iv)) would be criminalized as war crimes under article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) in the context of non-international armed conflict as well, despite the fact that the drafters of the Rome Statute have deliberately omitted these crimes from the catalogue of crimes applicable in non-international armed conflicts. While this regulatory gap is certainly deplorable, closing it against the clear will of the States party to the Rome Statute is not maintainable. Notably, in the Garda case the Pre-Trial Chamber I itself pointed out that the negotiators of the Statute were certainly aware of this marked [with respect to article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii)] difference between international armed conflict and armed conflict not of an international character⁷⁷⁵.

Moreover, the extension of the war crime of the destruction of the enemy's property to the conduct of hostilities creates a double-standard. In the Katanga decision the Chamber differentiated (i) a conduct of hostility context, i. e. a situation before property has fallen into the hands of the attacking party, during which destruction could only be justified if the property destroyed qualified as a military objective, and (ii) a situation in which property had already fallen into the hands of the attacking party and in which its destruction could be justified more generally by military reasons⁷⁷⁶. In other words, whereas civilian objects would be categorically excluded as legitimate objects of destruction in a conduct of hostilities context by virtue of a narrow definition of the military necessity exception which is equated and thereby limited to the definition in article 52 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I, in an occupation-context a wider range of objects, including civilian objects, could potentially lawfully be destroyed given that a wider definition of military necessity would apply. It seems that a more coherent, less complicated approach that leads to similar results but avoids the problem of criminalizing behavior in the realm of non-international armed conflicts that the drafters of the Rome Statute did not want to be criminalized in non-international armed conflicts, would be to exclude the conduct of hostilities context from the ambit of both article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) altogether. In the Katanga case the Chamber distinguished between 'conduct of hostilities crimes' and other crimes⁷⁷⁷. Against this background it is submitted that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) should not be regarded as 'conduct of hostilities crimes'.

As to the applicability of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) to the seizure of enemy property within a belligerent State's own territory in the case of an international armed conflict, it has to be noted that this question has not been dealt with by any of the codified rules (including article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land).

⁷⁷³ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept 2008, para. 311.

⁷⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 313.

⁷⁷⁵ Prosecutor v Garda, 02/05-02/09, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 8 Feb. 2010, para. 85.

⁷⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 318.

⁷⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 267.

Thus, given the fact that article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute is identical in wording to that provision, it seems not to apply for that reason alone to such situations. Besides, it is doubtful whether clear rules which are applicable to seizure of foreign property located in the belligerents' own territory have developed. Finally, even if one was to admit that such rules do exist, their violation would in no case constitute a war crime. It is accordingly submitted that any such acts do not come within the scope of application of either article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) or (e) (xii). The ICTY, with respect to Article 3 (b) of its Statute, has adopted a somewhat wider interpretation, holding that 'the protection afforded under Article 3 (b) of the Statute includes all property in the territory involved in the conflict'⁷⁷⁸. The reference to 'territory involved in the conflict' would seem to comprise enemy as well as a State's own territory, especially in view of the fact that more recently the ICTY has been even more explicit by referring to 'any territory involved in the conflict'⁷⁷⁹.

498 Given the very wording of the provision and the fact that belligerent occupation is the situation where enemy property is, apart from the two other situations just referred to, most likely to be exposed to acts of a belligerent, it is submitted that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute was indeed meant to address the fate of any enemy property located in territories which have come under the de facto control of a belligerent⁷⁸⁰, regardless of whether the situation (yet) formally amounts to an occupation as defined in article 2 para. 2 common to the four Geneva Conventions or not⁷⁸¹. Again, the ICTY with respect to Article 3 (b) of its Statute has referred more generally to property 'located in enemy territory and in territory not under effective occupation'⁷⁸². In that regard, one has to take note of the fact that otherwise the inclusion of the prohibition of seizing the enemy's property in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute would have, given the realities of modern warfare, not made much sense. To the contrary, situations of seizures frequently arise within the context of belligerent occupation. This interpretation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute is further confirmed by the drafting history of the provision.

499 The original proposal submitted by the United States, finally leading to the inclusion of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) into the Statute⁷⁸³, had explicitly stated that only the seizure or destruction of such enemy property 'within one's custody or control' was supposed to be covered by that provision. During informal consultations among a certain number of States, where agreement could be reached to include that provision, it was further agreed to delete the just mentioned words in order for the provision to be completely in line with the original text of the 1907 Hague Regulations Concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land annexed to the Fourth Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land with the understanding, however, that such deletion would not expand the scope

⁷⁷⁸ Prosecutor v. Orić, IT-3-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 582; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 Dec. 2004, para. 36; para. 74; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 26 Feb. 2001, para. 347; Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 Mar. 2003, para. 580; Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 Sep. 2004, paras. 381, para. 592.

⁷⁷⁹ Prosecutor v. Gotovina et al., IT-06-90-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 15 Apr. 2011, para. 1766.

⁷⁸⁰ See as to the applicability of article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Regulations (identical in wording to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute) to situations of occupation also the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in Timraz et al. v. Commander of IDF Forces in the Gaza Strip, partly summarised and reproduced in: (1993) IsYbHumRts 337 et seq.

⁷⁸¹ As to the notion of belligerent occupation under customary international law, as reflected in article 42 of the Hague Regulations of 1907, according to which territory is considered to be occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army, see para. 172 with further references.

⁷⁸² Prosecutor v. Orić, IT-3-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 582; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 Dec. 2004, para. 74; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, Case IT-95-14/2-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 26 Feb. 2001, para. 347; Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 Mar. 2003, para. 580; Prosecutor v. Brđanin, No. IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 Sep. 2004, para. 592.

⁷⁸³ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.1, part (B), (v).

of application of that provision. Accordingly this clarification was no longer contained in the Zutphen text submitted to the Rome Conference for its consideration⁷⁸⁴.

Given this context of the norm as well as the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (b) of the Statute according to which the provisions of sub-paragraph b have to be interpreted ‘within the established framework of international law’, the individual elements of the prohibition have to be interpreted in light of relevant rules of customary international law such as those embodied inter alia in articles 46, 52, 53, 54, 55 and 56 of the 1907 Hague Regulations. Besides, one must also take into account the fact that under article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv) only the extensive destruction and appropriation of property which is carried out wantonly and in an unlawful manner is proscribed. This is confirmed by element 3 of the elements of crimes adopted with regard to the crime of destroying or seizing the enemy’s property according to which the property concerned must have been protected against the destruction or seizure under applicable rules of international humanitarian law.

In this regard ICTY Trial Chambers have held that ‘in order to constitute a violation of the laws or customs of war, the destruction must be both ‘serious’ in relation to an individual object and cover a substantial range of a particular city, town or village’⁷⁸⁵. The ICRC Customary Law Study, however, goes further, albeit for general international humanitarian law rather than for purposes of international criminal law, by simply stipulating, without any additional requirements as to the quality and extend of the destruction, that ‘[t]he destruction or seizure of the property of an adversary is prohibited, unless required by imperative military necessity’⁷⁸⁶. In the Katanga decision the Chamber relied on the jurisprudence of the ICTY and recalled that ‘in order to constitute a grave breach, destruction [...] must be extensive, unlawful, and wanton’⁷⁸⁷ [and that] [t]he notion of ‘extensive’ is evaluated according to the facts of the case; however, even a single act such as the destruction of a hospital, may suffice to characterize an offence under this count’⁷⁸⁸.

b) Enemy property. When defining the term ‘enemy property’, two different problems arise: First, one has to define the term ‘enemy’ and secondly, one has to decide whether only private property is protected against seizure and destruction or whether to the contrary the prohibition also extends to public property.

In order to be protected against destruction or seizure, the property under consideration must possess an enemy character. This enemy character is further described in the elements of crimes by requiring that the property concerned constitutes property of a hostile party. Thus, any such act directed against property belonging to either nationals of the belligerent itself or to nationals of third States, not participating in the conflict, does not come within the realm of the provision. In the same vein, the ICC, in the Katanga decision, has held that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) requires, ‘the destruction, by action or omission, of property belonging to an ‘enemy’ or ‘hostile’ party to the conflict’ and that this means that the property in question ‘must belong to individuals or entities aligned with or with allegiance to a party to the conflict adverse or hostile to the perpetrator’⁷⁸⁹. In the case of physical persons, one has to therefore determine the nationality⁷⁹⁰ of the victim of the destruction or seizure, ⁷⁸⁴ UN Doc A/CONF.183/2/Add.1, article 5, War crimes, B., (k).

⁷⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Orić, IT-3-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 583; Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 Jan. 2005, para. 294.

⁷⁸⁶ Henkaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law (2005) 50.

⁷⁸⁷ Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 Sep. 2004, paras 584–585.

⁷⁸⁸ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, Case 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 314; Prosecutor v. Elastić, IT-95-14-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 3 March 2000, para. 157.

⁷⁸⁹ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 310.

⁷⁹⁰ In the case of an armed conflict not of an international character the adversarial character of an individual is determined, given the lack of different nationalities in most cases, by the fact whether he or she can be considered to belong to another party to the conflict, for details see Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii), mn 326.

which especially in situations involving instances of state succession might prove rather difficult⁷⁹¹. In the case of legal persons, state practice during World War II but also that during armed conflicts after 1945 has almost universally applied the so-called control test, i. e. States have determined the nationality of a given corporation and accordingly eventually its enemy status according to the nationality of controlling shareholders, principal corporate officers and the presence of other substantial interests⁷⁹².

- 504 c) Extent of property protected. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute does not qualify the property that is protected from either seizure or destruction. It has to be noted, however, that the rules of customary law concerning enemy property enshrined in the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land are clearly based, as demonstrated by articles 46 and 53 of the annexed Regulations, on the distinction to be drawn between private property on the one side and government property on the other. In that regard, property of municipalities and institutions dedicated to religion, charity, education and arts and sciences shall be considered private property⁷⁹³. Where doubts exist as to the ownership, State practice tends to presume that property constitutes public and not private property unless the contrary is proven⁷⁹⁴. In that regard it has to be also noted that during the drafting of the elaboration of the elements of crimes the United States and Colombia had proposed to specifically refer in the elements of crimes to ‘private or public’ property⁷⁹⁵. Yet, later on agreement was reached during negotiations on the elements of crimes that the term ‘property’ would in any event include both, private and public property⁷⁹⁶.
- 505 Movable government property which may be used for military purposes can legally be confiscated⁷⁹⁷. Besides, even as far as private property is concerned, the occupying power can, within certain limits, also request requisitions in kind from the local population⁷⁹⁸. Finally, all private property⁷⁹⁹ that may be used for hostile purposes and immovable government property might be seized, though not confiscated⁸⁰⁰, under the rules enshrined in both article 53 paras. 1 and 2 and article 55 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land⁸⁰¹. The elements of crimes specifically require that the property concerned in order for the destruction or seizure to constitute a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, must have been protected from that destruction or seizure under the international law of armed conflict.
- 506 For the purposes of humanitarian law, the notion of State property does not only include property wholly owned by the respective State but also the property of institutions in which the State has a substantial interest or in which it exercises at least substantial control⁸⁰².

⁷⁹¹ For such an example see the decision of the ICTY, Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 Nov. 1998, paras. 251 et seq.; see generally as to the relationship between state succession and the nationality of individuals Zimmermann, in: Eisenmann and Koskeniemi (eds.), State Succession (1999).

⁷⁹² Fatatouros, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia (1995) 495 et seq.; for a more thorough analysis see Dominicé, La Notion du Caractère Ennemi (1961), in particular 51 et seq.

⁷⁹³ See article 56 para. 1 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995) 262.

⁷⁹⁴ v. Glahn, The Occupation of Enemy Territory (1957) 179; Israeli Supreme Court in Al Nawaret al., summarised and partly reproduced in: (1986) IsYbHumRts 321 et seq.

⁷⁹⁵ See respectively PCNICC/DP.4/Add.2 and PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.16.

⁷⁹⁶ Hosang, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 171.

⁷⁹⁷ See article 53 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land; Gasser, Protection 260.

⁷⁹⁸ Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook 259: ‘the right to demand requisitions is laid down in article 52 Hague Reg and customary law’ [emphasis added].

⁷⁹⁹ As to the specific situation of civilian hospitals see article 57 of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

⁸⁰⁰ Private property that has been actually used for hostile purposes and that is found on the battlefield might be confiscated, see for that proposition the decision of the Israeli High Court, Al Nawar v. Minister of Defence et al., Case No. 574/82, Judgment, 11 August 1985, 321 et seq.

⁸⁰¹ Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995) 261.

⁸⁰² v. Glahn, Occupation (1957) 179; Israeli High Court, Al Nawar v. Minister of Defence, et al., Case 574/82, Judgment, 11 August 1985, 321 et seq., quoting Schwarzenberger’s Treatise on International Law. But see also for

d) Prohibition of destruction or seizure. In general terms, article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute prohibits both, the destruction and the seizure of enemy property. Where however a pure seizure is sufficient under the doctrine of military necessity to secure a military advantage, only such measures may be taken. Besides, articles 53 para. 2 and 55 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, while providing for the possibility to seize certain property items do not contain a right to confiscate. Indeed, article 55 specifically stipulates, that as far as immovable Government property is concerned, the occupant may only administer them in accordance with the rules of usufruct unless again military necessity requires other measures such as e.g. the destruction of specific buildings.

Given the fact that article 8 para. 2 (a) (iv) only criminalizes the ‘extensive destruction and appropriation of property’ and taking into account that the ICC’s jurisdiction shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole⁸⁰³, it is submitted that singular incidents of illegal seizures or acts of destruction, which only concern items of marginal value and which are not committed on a somewhat larger scale would normally not be subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC. Yet the elements of crimes simply refer to the destruction or seizure of ‘certain’ property thus implying that even single incidents of destruction or seizure might already constitute a crime under this provision.

e) ‘imperatively demanded by the necessities of war’. By using the words ‘unless (...) imperatively demanded by the necessities of war’ the Statute, as beforehand the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land refers to the concept of military necessity⁸⁰⁴. First of all, it has to be stressed, however, that not every situation of military necessity, but only imperative reasons of military necessity, i.e. most serious military reasons which are of an imperative nature, may justify acts otherwise prohibited under this provision. While the Swiss draft for the elements of crimes had quite in line with the text of the Statute referred to acts ‘imperatively demanded by the military necessity’⁸⁰⁵, the elements of crimes now simply require that the ‘destruction or seizure was not justified by military necessity’, the underlying reason being that military necessity tout court was understood as being the equivalent of the more elaborate terms used in the Hague Convention and accordingly in the Statute itself⁸⁰⁶.

Accordingly, the mere fact that the acts under consideration serve security needs or contribute to the security of the area at large is not, in itself, sufficient to justify any of the otherwise prohibited acts⁸⁰⁷, unless it can be proven that there is indeed an imperative need to do so, i.e. that there are no other means to secure military safety. In particular, national-security needs in a broad sense may not justify takings of private property⁸⁰⁸.

In the Katanga decision the Chamber held that military necessity covers, ‘[...] inter alia, a situation in which: (i) the property destroyed constituted a military objective before having fallen into the hands of the attacking party; and (ii) having fallen into the hands of the attacking party, its destruction was still necessary for military reasons. However, this ground for justification can only be invoked if the laws of armed conflict provide for it and only to the extent that these laws provide for it’⁸⁰⁹. As was already mentioned above, if article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) from the outset is only applied to situations in which a certain degree of de a more far-reaching proposition applying a functional test under which the nature of the property would be judged according to its actual governmental or non-governmental use id., 325.

⁸⁰³ For details see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 8.

⁸⁰⁴ As to the historical development and the current status of that concept see most recently Carnahan, (1998) 92 AJIL 213 et seq.

⁸⁰⁵ PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8.

⁸⁰⁶ Hosang, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 171.

⁸⁰⁷ But see for a divergent position the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in Ayub et al. v. Minister of Defence et al. (Beth El case), summarised and partly reproduced in: (1979) IsYbHumRts 337 et seq.

⁸⁰⁸ See for such a limitation the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in Dweikat et al. v. The Government of Israel et al. (Elon Moreh case), summarised and partly reproduced in: (1979) IsYbHumRts 345 et seq.

⁸⁰⁹ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 318.

facto territorial control has been established, as is proposed here, the divergent military necessity standards suggested in the Katanga decision can be avoided⁸¹⁰.

- 512 Yet, the limitation that military necessity can only be invoked ‘if the laws of armed conflict provide for it and only to the extent that these laws provide for it’ is misleading since the military necessity exception forms part of the war crime in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) itself and precisely because the underlying provisions of international humanitarian law (see only article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Regulations or article 53 of the Fourth Geneva Convention) explicitly provide for such an exception. Thus, in order to prove military necessity under the Rome Statute, it is not necessary to provide an additional legal basis under the laws of war to justify its invocation. Rather, it suffices that the military necessity exception is provided for in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) itself.
- 513 In the practice of the Nuremberg Tribunal a policy of ‘scorched earth’ was not recognised to be justified by military necessity⁸¹¹. In the Orić case the ICTY Trial Chamber held that, except for the rare occasions in which such preventive destruction [i.e. the destruction of houses from which previously a serious danger had emanated in order to prevent the inhabitants, including combatants, to return and resume the attacks] could arguably fall within the scope of ‘military necessity’, the principle must be upheld that the destruction of civil settlements, as a rule, is punishable as a war crime⁸¹².

14. Paragraph 2(b)(xiv): Prohibition in regard to rights and rights of actions

- 514 a) Normative origins and drafting history. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) is identical with article 23 para. h of the 1907 Hague Regulations. The Rome Conference included the war crime of declaring abolished, suspended or inadmissible in a court of law the rights and actions of adversary nationals in the ICC Statute without any substantial debate that would provide an indication how to interpret the wording of the offence. Regardless of its rather inapt drafting, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) was, together with all other acts which are ‘especially forbidden’ by article 23 of the Hague Regulations, somewhat automatically included in the Statute because article 23 in its entirety was considered as reflecting customary international law. Delegations did not attempt to clarify the wording and translate it into an intelligible criminal offence. Few if any delegations took notice to the contention of scholars that article 23 para. h of the Hague Regulations should have been contained in a special convention on the effects of armed conflict on private law contracts rather than in a humanitarian law treaty⁸¹³, and that ‘whatever be the true purpose of article 23 (h), its drafting is inapt to express it’⁸¹⁴.
- 515 Indeed, there are only few judicial decisions and little state practice that allow to clarify the scope and meaning of this provision under customary international law, and the prohibition generally receives no or only little comment in contemporary treatises on the law of armed conflict⁸¹⁵. In the Justice Trial, the U.S. Military Tribunal at Nuremberg admitted that ‘the authorities are not in accord as to the proper construction of article 23 (h) of the regulations annexed to the Hague Convention of 1907’.
- 516 The Preparatory Commission did not discuss the substance of the offense under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv): The elements for this war crime essentially restate the wording of the Rome

⁸¹⁰ Id.

⁸¹¹ See the case against Alfred Jodl, in: Law Reports of Trials of Major War Criminals (1949) 517.

⁸¹² Hosang, in: Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court (2001) 171, Prosecutor v. Orić, IT-3-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 588; Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 Dec. 2004, paras. 419, 426.

⁸¹³ Rolin, Le Droit Moderne De La Guerre (1920) 339.

⁸¹⁴ Stone, Legal Controls of International Conflict (1954) 443.

⁸¹⁵ For writings up to mid-20th century, see Garner (1919) 13 AJIL 22 (1919); N. Politis, L’interprétation anglaise de l’article 23 h du Règlement de la Haye, 18 RGDIP 249; Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 441–443; Freeman (1947) 41 AJIL 579; Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171–172; Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law 309–313 and 445; Hyde, International Law (2nd ed. 1947) 1714, fn. 7. See furthermore Stirling-Zanda (2001) 48 NethILRev 1, 67.

Statute provision and do not resolve the main controversies with regard to the meaning of article 23 (h) Hague Regulations and therefore article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv). The ICC will have to clarify the elements of this prohibition.

Related to the war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) is the war crime of denying rights of fair and regular trial under article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi), which protects rights of due process and thus certainly criminalizes the deprivation of the rights of a fair and regular trial of protected persons once proceedings have been initiated. While article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi) also covers individual cases of denial of access to justice, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) rather aims at legislative or general administrative acts or possibly also to court decisions with wide implications but not isolated individual cases. 517

b) Material elements. aa) Does the war crime only apply to occupied territories? Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) clearly prohibits certain conduct by an Occupying Power vis-à-vis the population of that occupied territory. In such territory, the general abolition, suspension or inadmissibility in a court of law of the rights and rights of actions of the population of the occupied territory would clearly violate fundamental principles of the law of belligerent occupation. An Occupying Power must not exercise full sovereignty over occupied territory. Its legitimate authority is limited as the nature of the occupation regime is supposed to be only provisional. While an Occupying Power has the authority to restore and ensure as far as possible public order and safety, it must respect, ‘unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country’ (article 43 Hague Regulations). 518

However, a first fundamental controversy regarding the meaning of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) relates to whether its territorial scope of application extends also to the own territory of the party to the conflict abolishing certain rights of, e.g. foreign nationals residing on its territory. No word under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) or article 23 (h) Hague Regulations suggests that the scope of the provision is limited to occupied territory or precludes its application to the own territory of the Occupying Power or any other party to an armed conflict. Rather, it generally prohibits the abolition etc. of ‘the rights and actions of the nationals of the hostile party’, and not ‘of the population of an occupied territory’. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) thus rather suggests its applicability to the rights and actions of any nationals of a hostile party in a situation of armed conflict. This is confirmed by a systematical interpretation of article 23 (h) Hague Regulations, as it is placed in section II of the Hague Regulations concerning hostilities generally, and not in section III dealing with the law of belligerent occupation. 519

The prohibition under article 23 (h) Hague Regulations was in fact ‘introduced on a German initiative intended to cover suits in a belligerent’s own courts’⁸¹⁶. According to Picciotto, Germany thus consequently contended that the provision relates to the ‘inability to enforce the execution of a contract by recourse to the tribunals of the state in regard to which he is an alien enemy’⁸¹⁷. This view has overwhelmingly been shared by continental writers⁸¹⁸. 520

The British and American delegations at the Hague Conference adopting the Hague Regulations however appear to have intended to limit the application of article 23 (h) Hague Regulations to occupied territories. According to the English view at the beginning of the 20th century, ‘the subsection bears a strictly limited application to occupied territory’⁸¹⁹. A main Anglo-Saxon argument was the systematic position of article 23 (h) Hague Regulations in the section regarding the limitation of the action of military commanders in the actual theater of hostilities, thus not applying in the entire territory of parties to the conflict that is far away from the battlefield⁸²⁰. 521

⁸¹⁶ Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 443 (fn. 163). See also Garner (1919) n13 AJIL 24–25. M. Greenspan has furthermore contended that the general practice admitted the right of a resident enemy alien to institute legal proceedings in the country of residence, Greenspan, The Modern Law (1959) 47.

⁸¹⁷ Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171–172 (emphasis added).

⁸¹⁸ See the references in Garner (1919) n13 AJIL 26 (fn. 10).

⁸¹⁹ Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171–172.

⁸²⁰ Garner (1919) n13 AJIL 25–26; Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171–172. At that time, the English law automatically suspended the rights of actions of subjects of hostile states insofar they had no domicile in England,

In any event, the abolishment, suspension or inadmissibility of the rights and actions must be related to an armed conflict.

- 522 bb) What are ‘rights and actions’. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) prohibits the declaration that the ‘rights’ or ‘actions’ of nationals of the hostile party are abolished, suspended or inadmissible. The term ‘actions’ must be understood as legal claims or rights of actions, including the right of access to courts of law. This is confirmed by the French wording ‘il est notamment interdit: ... h) de déclarer éteints, suspendus ou non recevables en justice, les droits et actions des nationaux de la Partie adverse’. The German translation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) agreed between Austria, Germany and Switzerland also uses the terms ‘Rechte und Forderungen’ which basically means ‘rights and (legal) claims’. The US Army Field Manual interprets article 23 (h) Hague Regulations as a prohibition relating to rights and rights of action⁸²¹. As was stated by the UN War Crimes Commission, the provision refers to the general ‘deprivation of rights of access to courts’⁸²² of litigious standing⁸²³.
- 523 An additional important question concerning article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) is whether it only relates to rights and rights of actions regarding civil and commercial claims, or whether it also protects other fundamental rights and guarantees such as rights granted by criminal law, the national constitution or human rights law, including fair trial rights and the right of access to courts. Writers usually only examined the provision under the perspective that it relates to civil claims. Garner for instance referred to the ‘execution of a contract by recourse to ... tribunals’ and to ‘preventing access to civil courts’⁸²⁴. The Netherlands Special Court of Cassation also limited the scope of the provision to civil claims in 1949⁸²⁵.
- 524 However, it is not unlikely that delegations at the Rome Diplomatic Conference may have thought and intended to adopt an offense also relating to rights and actions other than relating to civil contracts and claims. The experience of the Second World War and in particular the abolition of most or all rights of Poles and Jews or other groups in occupied territories or in Germany may have influenced the support for this provision and its inclusion in the ICC Statute. Stone stated that there is ‘some historical link of the rule denying locus standi with the general placing of enemy subjects ex lege, exposing them not only to confiscation of their poverty, but to physical restraint, and even killing’⁸²⁶. Nothing in the offence’ wording restricts it necessarily to civil claims.
- 525 Moreover, in the Justice Trial, the US Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was of the opinion that the ‘Night and Fog Decree’ (Nacht und Nebel Erlass) of the Hitler regime clearly violated article 23 (h) Hague Regulations as well as other provisions of the 1907 Hague Regulations. This decree essentially aimed at imprisoning without trial all persons in occupied territories (in particular Poles and Jews in Poland) opposed to the Nazi regime even if they had not committed any serious offence, secretly taking them to Germany, keeping them incommunicado and making them disappear without trace⁸²⁷. The same U.S.

id., 172; J. Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 442. On the English view and how it was developed, see Politis (1911) 18 RGDIP 249. On the U.S. view, see also Davis (1908) 2 AJIL 70. See also Von Glahn, Occupation (1957) 108; Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (1952) 309–313 and 445.

⁸²¹ U.S. Army, Field Manual 27–10 (1956), No. 372.

⁸²² UNWCC, XV Law Reports 125 (fn. 1) (1949).

⁸²³ See, e.g., Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171; Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 441–443.

⁸²⁴ See, e.g., Picciotto (1917–1918) 27 YaleLJ 171. See also, e.g., Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 441–443.

⁸²⁵ Netherlands Special Court of Cassation, Rauter (1949) XIV Law Reports 120; Netherlands Special Court of Cassation, Zuehlke (1949) XIV Law Reports 144–145.

⁸²⁶ Stone, Legal Controls (1954) 441 (fn. 155).

⁸²⁷ The ‘Night and Fog Decree’ was a plan to combat so-called resistance movements in occupied territories. ‘[P]ersons who committed offences against the Reich or the German forces in occupied territories, except where the death sentence was certain, were to be taken secretly to Germany and handed over to the SIPO and SD for trial and punishment in Germany. ... Hitler’s Night and Fog programme was instituted for the deport for the deportation to Germany of many thousands of inhabitants of occupied territories for the purpose of making them disappear without trace. ... [T]hey were kept secretly and not permitted to communicate in any manner with their friends and relatives. ... The foregoing procedure under the NN Decree was clearly in violation of Military Tribunal at Nuremberg moreover found that ‘the introduction and enforcement of the law [of 4 December 1941] against Poles and Jews in occupied Poland resulted in a violation of [article 23 (h) Hague Regulations]’⁸²⁸. This law provided for the possibility of the death penalty even for minor offences or where ‘the offence points to particularly objectionable motives or is particularly grave for other reasons’ and abolished essential rights of the accused⁸²⁹.

[The defendants] original purpose was to imprison without trial all those persons who were opposed to the government, or who were in any way obnoxious to German authority. With the aid of a secret police force, this practice was widely extended, and in course of time concentration camps became places of organised and systematic murder ...⁸³⁰.

‘The enforcement of such laws as that of 4th December, 1941, against the Poles and Jews, so clearly exceeded what was demanded by the needs of “public order and safety” that the Tribunal was not called upon to analyse article 43 of the Hague Convention any more than it was article 23(h), and the Tribunal did not in fact rely so much upon a claim that German courts were illegally set up in occupied territories as upon the illegality under international law of the law which they applied ...’⁸³¹.

The US Military Tribunal at Nuremberg thus obviously considered that article 23 (h) 526 Hague Regulations also prohibits the introduction and enforcement of laws providing for the deprivation of liberty of persons for no (serious) offence and to the denial and abolishing of their rights to a fair and regular trial. Under contemporary international law, article 64 GC IV provides that, subject to certain exceptions, the penal laws of the occupied territory shall remain in force, and that the tribunals of the occupied territory shall continue to function in respect of all offences covered by these penal laws.

The official comment on § 9 para. 2 of the German draft International Crimes Code of 527 2 May 2001 furthermore states that the offense under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) Rome Statute ‘covers not only economic warfare, which in the past has often used the abolition and suspension of claims of nationals [Angehörigen] of the war adversary for its goals. Also other discriminatory measures and restrictions of the rights can qualify under the offense’⁸³².

Therefore, the general wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) and the precedents permit to 528 understand article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) as prohibiting not only the abolition etc. of property and commercial rights, but also other discriminatory measures and restrictions of the rights of the nationals of the adversary party to the conflict.

c) Further issues. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) only applies to the abolition etc. of ‘the rights 529 and actions of the nationals of a hostile party’. In a literal reading, the word ‘the’ might be understood as requiring that all the rights and actions of the persons belonging to the adversary party are abolished etc. However, element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) only requires that ‘certain rights or actions’ are abolished etc. This is appropriate, even though this articles 5, 43, 46 and also 23 (h) Hague Regulations’. U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 55–57 and 59. See also ibid., 8 et seq.

⁸²⁸ Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 63 (see also at 94).

⁸²⁹ Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 10–14.

⁸³⁰ Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 63.

‘Some of the defendants took part in the enactment of laws and decrees the purpose of which was the extermination of Poles and Jews in Germany and throughout Europe. Others in executive positions, actively participated in the enforcement of those laws and in atrocities, illegal even under German law, in furtherance of the declared national purpose. Others, as judges, distorted and then applied the laws and decrees against Poles and Jews as such in disregard of every principle of judicial behaviour. ... The discriminatory laws themselves formed the subject matter of war crimes and crimes against humanity with which the defendants are charged. ... The extension to and application in [the occupied Polish territories] of the discriminatory law against Poles and Jews was in furtherance of the avowed purpose of racial persecution and extermination’. Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 62 (emphasis added).

⁸³¹ (1949) XV Law Reports 125, referring to Altstötter (1948) VI Law Reports 96–104.

⁸³² ‘Der Tatbestand umfasst nicht nur die Wirtschaftskriegführung, die in der Vergangenheit vielfach die Aufhebung und Aussetzung von Forderungen von Angehörigen des Kriegsgegners zur Erreichung ihrer Ziele nutzte. Auch anderweitige Diskriminierungsmaßnahmen und Rechtsbeschränkungen können darunter fallen’ (emphasis added).

war crime would generally appear to require the abolition etc. of important, substantial rights and actions, and not only trivial, isolated rights or even one single action.

- 530 The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) also suggests that the abolition etc. must generally concern rights and actions of all or at least a substantial part of the persons belonging to the adversary party. In view of the objective of the provision, it may also be sufficient if the rights and actions of a defined group of the adversary party, e.g. a specific ethnic group of the adversary, are effected. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) however certainly *does not apply to cases of individual withdrawal of rights*⁸³³.
- 531 Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) literally criminalizes the declaration that rights and actions of the nationals of the hostile party are abolished *etc.*⁸³⁴ However, the Preparatory Committee rightly considered that a mere declaration incapable of actually effecting the abolition etc. of these rights and actions, for instance a random man in the street idly declaring any sort of things, should not give rise to individual criminal responsibility for the war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv). On the other hand, the word ‘declaring’ should not be understood too narrowly, for instance certainly including legislative or even general administrative acts aiming at generally abolishing etc. certain rights and actions of persons belonging to the adversary party to the conflict. Therefore, element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) requiring that the perpetrator ‘effected the abolition [etc.] of certain rights and actions’ (emphasis added) appears appropriate⁸³⁵. The means how the perpetrator achieves the intended result of denial of judicial access however is not of relevance. A legal abolition etc. of rights and actions would be sufficient. It is not necessary that courts have actually refused legal actions and access to them⁸³⁶.

15. Paragraph 2(b)(xv): Compelling adversary nationals to take part in war operations

- 532 a) Normative origins and drafting history. Delegations adopted article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) without any substantial debate as to its content and scope. The wording of the offence is identical with the final paragraph of article 23 of the 1907 Hague Regulations.
- 533 Forcing or pressuring nationals of the adversary to participate in efforts directly related to the war effort is furthermore prohibited under article 52 of the 1907 Hague Regulations⁸³⁷ as well as the Geneva Conventions and the First Additional Protocol. Articles 49–57 GC III and articles 40, 51 and 95 GC IV regulate in more detail under what conditions prisoners of war, aliens in the territory of an adversary party, inhabitants of occupied territories and civilian internees may be required to do specific types of work.
- 534 The ICRC Commentary has affirmed that ‘a basic principle, universally recognised in the law of war, strictly prohibits belligerents from forcing enemy subject to take up arms against their own country’⁸³⁸. On the one hand, the prohibition underlying article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv)

⁸³³ This view is also taken under § 9 para. 2, German Draft International Crimes Code (2 May 2001) which requires that the rights or claims of ‘all or an essential part of the persons belonging to the adversary party’ (emphasis added) are effected. The commentary to that provision explains that this threshold not explicitly contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) ‘carries out the goal and objective of Article 8 para. 2 letter b (xiv), which ... bases on a methodical or systematic process and does not aim at covering individual conduct. In view of the great range of possible alternative conducts that could be covered, individual cases of withdrawing rights thus are not covered’. The commentary also affirms that embargo measures decided by the UN Security Council on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter would not be covered.

⁸³⁴ The words ‘court of law’ clearly qualify the inadmissibility, that is, inadmissibility in a court of law of the rights and actions, and do not mean that the declaration would have to be uttered in a court of law.

⁸³⁵ See also Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (6th ed. 1994) 335, Bordwell, The Law of War (1908) 285. A similar case is the war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) of ‘[d]eclaring that no quarter will be given’, with regard to which the elements require that the perpetrator who declared or ordered that there shall be no survivors ‘was in a position of effective command or control over the subordinate forces to which the declaration or order was directed’. On the drafting history of the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b)(xiv), see also Hosang, in: Lee et al. (eds.) Elements of Crimes (2001) s 173–174.

⁸³⁶ See also Hosang, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 173–174.

⁸³⁷ See also articles 45 and 46 Hague Regulations.

⁸³⁸ Pictet (ed.), Commentary IV, Article 51 291.

(and (a)(v)) may have been adopted by States in order to exclude an infringement of each others' sovereign 'right' to their nationals' allegiance. The underlying objective of the prohibition appears to be, in the words of the ICRC Commentary, 'to prevent enemy aliens from being employed for purposes which conflict with the interests of their home country and are incompatible with their conscience and patriotic sentiments'⁸³⁹. Moreover, a participation in military operations against their own countries may put the individuals concerned in a difficult position upon their return to their country.

Compelling prisoners of war or civilians to serve in hostile forces or participate in operations of war during World War II has been found illegal under the laws of war in various war crimes trials referred to below, and has also been criminalized under various domestic legislations⁸⁴⁰. 535

Compelling a person under 15 to serve in hostile forces or to participate in military operations may also amount to the war crime spelled out under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) Rome Statute, consisting in conscripting or enlisting children or using them to participate actively in hostilities. Moreover, in the Aleksovski case, an ICTY Trial Chamber found that forcing detainees to dig trenches constitutes an outrage upon personal dignity amounting to a violation of the laws or customs of war under article 3 of the ICTY Statute⁸⁴¹. 536

b) Material elements. aa) Compelling. The voluntary service in adversary armed forces or voluntary participation in adversary military operations is not prohibited, but only coercing or forcing, 'by act or threat' (element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv)) to such actions amounts to a war crime. This is confirmed by the holding of the U.S. Military Tribunal in the Weizsäcker et al. case that 'it is not illegal to recruit prisoners of war who volunteer to fight against their own country, but pressure or coercion to compel such persons to enter into the armed services obviously violates international law'⁸⁴². 537

bb) Participation in operations of war directed against their own country. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) criminalizes compelling nationals of the adversary party 'to take part in the operations of war directed against their own country ...'. According to article 23 para. 2 Hague Regulations and the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) Rome Statute, the operations of war must be directed against the country to which the compelled person belongs. This is confirmed by element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) which requires military operations 'against that person's own country or forces'⁸⁴³. 538

The interpretation of the notion of 'operations of war' under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) Rome Statute is not easy, since in contemporary armed conflicts many types of work might be regarded as contributing to the country's war effort. Certainly, the term at least covers any armed hostilities, at least insofar directed against the compelled person's own country. Forcing someone to shoot combatants of his own country or to load a rocket to be propelled against troops of his country may clearly amount to a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv). 539

It is less clear and appears controversial, however, whether and to what degree 'operations of war' also extend to actions only indirectly linked to armed hostilities. Does article 8 540

⁸³⁹ Pictet (ed.), Commentary IV, Article 40 254.

⁸⁴⁰ See, e.g., Chapter 22 (§ 6) (No. 6) of the Swedish Penal Code; article 282 (d) of the Penal Code of the Empire of Ethiopia of 1957; article 611 No. 3 of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 10/95 of 23 Nov. 1995).

⁸⁴¹ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 25 June 1999, paras. 229 and 122–129.

⁸⁴² U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, Weizsäcker et al. (1949) 16 AnnDig 357.

⁸⁴³ However, this interpretation is not the only possible: The Fourth Geneva Convention does not contain such a condition. Articles 40 para. 2 and 51 para. 2 GC IV clearly prohibit any involuntary work directly relating to the conduct of military operations, whether they are directed against the home country or not. This change has been considered important for the protection of adversary nationals by the Commentator of the ICRC (Pictet (ed.), Commentary IV, Article 51 297) and could arguably be considered as the contemporary meaning of the Hague prohibition.

para. 2(b) (xv) also criminalize compelling to war-related labor such as producing munitions or driving soldiers behind the front lines? As is true with respect to all war crimes, it is important to distinguish between what is merely prohibited under international law from what is, in addition, criminalized under the Rome Statute.

- 541 In the Krupp trial, the U.S. Military Tribunal at Nuremberg found that article 52 Hague Regulations, which similarly to article 23 para. 2 Hague Regulations prohibits involving inhabitants in ‘taking part in military operations against their own country’, had been violated by the employment of deportees in armament production⁸⁴⁴. Erhard Milch was charged with participation in ‘plans and enterprises involving the use of prisoners of war in war operations and work having a direct relation with war operations, including the manufacture and transportation of arms and munitions’, wherefore he was convicted for having forcibly recruited foreign workers for employment in German industry in violation of articles 52 and 6 Hague Regulations as well as article 31 of the 1929 Geneva Convention⁸⁴⁵. Tanabe Koshiro similarly was found guilty of ‘employing prisoners of war in an unlawful way’ in violation of article 6 Hague Regulations and article 31 of the 1929 Geneva Convention as the building of ammunition dumps or depots was considered work connected with the operations of war⁸⁴⁶.
- 542 The International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg furthermore appears to have interpreted the words ‘taking part in military operations against their own country’ widely ‘so as to include any work for the German war effort, including “German industry and agriculture”, and not merely “work on German fortifications and military installations”’⁸⁴⁷.
- 543 The United Nations War Crimes Commission, however, appears to have taken a more restrictive stance. Its Committee I in many cases ‘made a distinction between military operations and military preparations and declined to list as accused war criminals those responsible for forcing civilians to render assistance in constructing military roads, fortifications and the like behind the lines of military operations’⁸⁴⁸, suggesting however that impelling ‘inhabitants to do work at places or to construct fortifications at places where military operations were actually being conducted or were imminent’ might amount to a war crime⁸⁴⁹.
- 544 The Commission argues that ‘the practice of belligerents has distinguished between military operations and military preparations, and has not condemned as inadmissible compulsion upon inhabitants to render assistance in the construction of military roads, fortifications, and the like behind the front, or in any other works in preparation for military operations’⁸⁵⁰. Moreover, it points out that ‘all attempts [at negotiations on international instruments] to extend the prohibition to services which imply an obligation to take part in military preparations and the like have hitherto [up to the World War II] failed’⁸⁵¹.
- 545 The Geneva Conventions of 1949 also deal with the question of what work inhabitants of occupied territory or prisoners of war may be compelled to do. Insofar as these provisions ⁸⁴⁴ UNWCC, LRTWC, Vol. X 144 et seq., Krupp et al., X Law Reports 167 (1949). The same Tribunal also stated that ‘it is apparent that the compulsory labour of the civilian population for the purpose of carrying out military operations against their own country is illegal’, Von Leeb et al. (1953) Ann. Dig. (1948) 389, id., (1949) XII Law Reports 89 and 92–93. The Dutch Court of Appeal subsumed construction of coast defences and seemingly ‘war preparations’ under ‘operations of war’, Court of Appeal (The Hague), Bouquet and v. Slom, (1947) 14 Ann. Dig. 308. A French Ordinance of 28 Aug. 1944 made ‘forced labour of civilians’ a war crime in its article 2 para. 5, see (1948) III Law Reports 52 and 96.

⁸⁴⁵ Milch (1948) VII Law Reports 27, 28 and 43. On employment in the metal industry, see also General Tribunal at Rastadt of the military Government for the French Zone of Occupation in Germany, Roehling et al. (1948) 15 Ann. Dig. 410–411. See also Oppenheim and Lauterpacht, International Law (6th ed. 1944) 335, Bordwell (1908) Law of War 285–286.

⁸⁴⁶ Netherlands Temporary Court-Martial at Macassar, Koshiro (1949) XI Law Reports 2.

⁸⁴⁷ British Command Paper Cmd. 6964, pp. 56–60, cited in (1949) XV Law Reports 120.

⁸⁴⁸ UNWCC, History 491 (1948) (emphasis of ‘behind’ added).

⁸⁴⁹ Ibid.

⁸⁵⁰ UNWCC, History 277 (1948) (emphasis in the original).

⁸⁵¹ UNWCC, History 228 (1948) (emphasis in the original).

‘permit’ compelling protected persons to do a certain type of work such compelling cannot constitute a war crime. Beyond that, however, it must be asked to what degree these provisions may be considered as reflecting the (customary) meaning of article 23 para. 2 Hague Regulations (respectively the war crime derived from that provision) as it has evolved since 1907.

According to article 50 GC III, prisoners of war may indeed be compelled to various types of work, including agriculture; industries other than metallurgical, machinery and chemical industries, ‘public works and building operations which have no military character or purpose’, ‘transport and handling of stores which are not military in character or purpose’, and ‘public utility services having no military character or purpose’. Moreover, article 52 para. 1 GC III provides that prisoners of war may not be employed on labor which is ‘of an unhealthy or dangerous nature’.

With regard to aliens in the territory of a party to the conflict who are nationals of an adversary, article 40 para. 2 GC IV provides that such persons ‘may only be compelled to do work which is normally necessary to ensure the feeding, sheltering, clothing, transport and health of human beings and which is not directly related to the conduct of military operations’.

In occupied territories, article 51 para. 2 GC IV ‘permits’ ‘work which is necessary either for the needs of the army of occupation or for the public utility services, or for the feeding, sheltering, clothing, transportation or health of the population of the occupied country’⁸⁵² unless such work ‘would involve them in the obligation of taking part in military operations’. The ICRC Commentary on the wording ‘work which is necessary for the needs of the army of occupation’ specifies that the clause covers services such as ‘billeting and the provision of fodder, transport services, the repairing of roads [etc.] and laying telephone and telegraph lines. On the other hand it is generally agreed that the inhabitants of the occupied territory cannot be requisitioned for such work as the construction of fortifications, trenches or aerial bases. It is the maintenance needs of the army of occupation and not its strategic or tactical requirements which are referred to here’⁸⁵³. Thus, while according to the ICRC Commentary it is ‘quite certain ... that the Occupying Power cannot demand that protected persons should revive the war industry of the occupied country, nor force them to produce war material’, they may for instance be compelled to do agricultural work which does not directly relate to the war effort. The ICRC Commentary rightly points out that ‘the Fourth [Geneva] Convention applies to civilians and civilians are by definition outside the fighting. Any action on the part of the Occupying Power which had the effect of involving them, directly or indirectly, in the fighting and so preventing them from benefiting by special protection under the Convention must be regarded as unlawful’⁸⁵⁴.

16. Paragraph 2(b)(xvi): Pillage

Literature: Maschke, H., Das Krupp-Urteil und das Problem der Plünderung (1951); Stewart, J., Corporate War Crimes: Prosecuting Pillage of Natural Resources (2011) 19; Heck, H. et al., ‘Law Reports of Trials of Major War Criminals’, in J. Stewart: Corporate War Crimes: Prosecuting Pillage of Natural Resources (2011) 20; Gasser, H.-P., ‘Protection of the Civilian Population’, in: D. Fleck (ed.), The Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflicts (1995);

a) Normative origins and drafting history. Pillage was prohibited already in the Lieber Code of 1863 according to which ‘all pillage or sacking, even after taking place by main force [...] are prohibited under the penalty of death’⁸⁵⁵. The wording of the prohibition of pillage ⁸⁵² According to the Commentary, ‘public utility services’ must be understood as services ‘such as water, gas and electricity services, transport, health and similar services’, J.S.Picet (ed.), Commentary, IV, Article 51, 295. Besides, the Occupying Power may not compel protected persons to ensure the security of the installations anywhere compulsory work is being performed, article 51 para. 2 (third sentence) GC IV.

⁸⁵³ J.S.Picet (ed.), Commentary, IV, Article 51, 297 (footnote omitted).

⁸⁵⁴ For details see 146, Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals, Vol. IX, ‘The Krupp Case’, in particular, 23 et seq. and 1338 et seq.

⁸⁵⁵ Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field (Lieber Code) 24 April 1863, Article 44.

contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi) of the Statute was drawn from article 28 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. It is also formally forbidden under article 47 of that Convention.

550 The list of war crimes in the Nuremberg Charter similarly included ‘plunder of public and private property’. It was under this count that several persons were indicted and sentenced by a US Military Tribunal under Control Council Law No. 10⁸⁵⁶.

551 The prohibition of pillage has furthermore been reiterated in article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949⁸⁵⁷. Finally, a similar prohibition is also contained in article 4 para. 2 (g) of the Add. Prot. I of 1977 as well as in article 4 para. 3 of the 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict. Besides, article 3 (e) of the Statute of the ICTY (referring to ‘plunder of public and private property’), article 4 (f) of the ICTR Statute (‘plunder’), as well as section 6.1. (b) (xvi) UNTAET Regulation No. 2000/15 on the Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction over Serious Criminal Offences, article 13 (b) No. 17 of the Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal (the wording of both of which is identical to the one in the Rome Statute), and finally article 3 (f) of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone (‘pillage’) contain similar prohibitions and make them war crimes subject to the jurisdiction of the respective tribunal.

An identical provision to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi), which in turn applies to non-international armed conflicts is contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute⁸⁵⁸.

552 The idea of including a prohibition of pillage into the list of war crimes which are subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC was contained in both the original proposals submitted by New Zealand and Switzerland⁸⁵⁹ and the one introduced by the United States⁸⁶⁰. The exact wording of current article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi) found its way into the Statute, however, from the text submitted by the United States.

553 b) Definition of ‘pillage’. There is no official definition of the term of ‘pillage’. It should be understood, however, as the unauthorized appropriation or obtaining of property in order to confer possession of it on oneself or on a third party against the will of the rightful owner. Accordingly, the definition embraces acts of plundering, looting and sacking⁸⁶¹. This is confirmed by the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi) which respectively refer to the fact that the perpetrator (1) must have appropriated certain property, (2) the perpetrator intended to deprive the owner of the property and to appropriate it for private or personal use, and that (3) the appropriation took place without the consent of the owner⁸⁶². It seems to be doubtful, however, whether the very notion of pillage, as the jurisprudence of the ICTY seems to imply, necessarily by and of itself contains an element of violence⁸⁶³.

554 More over, the requirement that the appropriation be carried out for ‘private or personal use’, as required in the second element, has rightly been criticized as overly restrictive and without foundation in historical as well as recent jurisprudence⁸⁶⁴. The ICTY Trial Chamber in the Hadžihasanović case held that the laws of war ‘do not allow arbitrary and unjustified pillage for army purposes or for the individual use of army members’⁸⁶⁵. Even more explicitly, the ⁸⁵⁶ For details UNWCC, LRTWC, Vol. X, 144 et seq. Trials Of War Criminals Before The Nuremberg Military Tribunals, ‘The Krupp Case’, in particular, 23 et seq. and 1338 et seq.

⁸⁵⁷ See also article 15 para. 1 of the GC I and article 18 para. 1 of the GC II.

⁸⁵⁸ For details see Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (e) (v).

⁸⁵⁹ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.2, 2. (vi).

⁸⁶⁰ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.1, (B) (ix).

⁸⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, 20 June 2007, para. 754; see also Prosecutor v. Fofana et al., SCSL-04-14-T, Judgment, 2 August 2007, para. 751.

⁸⁶² See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 328.

⁸⁶³ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 591.

⁸⁶⁴ Stewart, Coperate War Crimes (2011) 19.

⁸⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović, IT-01-47-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 15 March 2006, para. 52 (emphasis added).

Special Court for Sierra Leone has held that ‘the requirement of ‘private or personal use’ is unduly restrictive and ought not to be an element of the crime of pillage’⁸⁶⁶.

c) Isolated acts and organised forms. The prohibition covers both, pillage through individual acts without the consent of the military authorities resulting from isolated acts of indiscipline, as well as organized pillage⁸⁶⁷. It also covers officially authorized forms of plundering when the appropriation of the respective property was not imperatively demanded by military necessity. 555

Given the fact that the jurisdiction of the ICC shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole⁸⁶⁸, it is submitted that isolated incidents of pillage, which only concern items of marginal value and which are not committed on a somewhat larger scale would normally not be subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC. It has to be noted, however, that the elements of crimes, as adopted by the Assembly of States Parties, do not make reference to any such limitation. 556

d) Scope of property protected. As a matter of principle, the prohibition extends to all types of property, whether they belong to private persons or to communities or the State⁸⁶⁹. In the Katanga decision the Chamber held that ‘the pillaged property – whether moveable or immovable, private or public – must belong to individuals or entities who are aligned with or whose allegiance is to a party to the conflict who is adverse or hostile to the perpetrator’⁸⁷⁰. 557

The scope of the prohibition is however limited by a belligerent’s right of requisition and seizure⁸⁷¹. This seems to be inherent in the very term of ‘pillage’. The elements of crimes conform to this approach by stating in footnote 47 accompanying the elements of crimes that ‘appropriations justified by military necessity cannot constitute the crime of pillaging’ since under such circumstances the appropriations concerned would have never taken place for private for personal use. 558

This provision in the aforesaid footnote 47, however, has rightly been described as inaccurate⁸⁷². Because contrary to what footnote 47 seems to imply, military necessity must never function as an independent justification under the laws of war, except in those cases where ‘military necessity’ is explicitly mentioned as a legitimate exception to a given rule⁸⁷³. Pillage, however, is prohibited in absolute terms without any mentioning of a permissible ‘military necessity-exception’. 559

Moreover, during the negotiation of the Hague Regulations ‘military necessity’ was considered but dismissed as an acceptable justification for pillage because relevant exceptions had already been included into the Hague Regulations⁸⁷⁴. Therefore, rather than relying on ‘military necessity’ as such, in the IG Farben case the U.S. Military Tribunal referred to the acquisition of ‘private property against the will and consent of the former owner, [and] such action, not being expressly justified by any applicable provision of the Hague Regulations...’⁸⁷⁵. Similarly, and more recently, the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Martić case defined 560

⁸⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, 20 June 2007, para. 754; see also Prosecutor v. Fofana et al., SCSL-04-14-T, SCSL Trial Chamber, 2 August 2007, para. 160.

⁸⁶⁷ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 4542.

⁸⁶⁸ For details see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 8.

⁸⁶⁹ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 244.

⁸⁷⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 329.

⁸⁷¹ For details as to the right of requisition and seizure see above Zimmermann, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii), mn 484 et seq.

⁸⁷² Stewart, Corporate War Crimes (2011) 21.

⁸⁷³ See only Heck et al., Law Reports of Trials of Major War Criminals Vol. I, ‘Peelus Case’, cited in: Stewart, Corporate War Crimes (2011) 20.

⁸⁷⁴ Stewart, Corporate War Crimes (2011) 20.

⁸⁷⁵ United States v. Krauch et al., Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals Vol. III, ‘The IG Farben Trial’ 1081, 1133.

pillage as appropriation of either public or private property without the consent of the owner, subject to the same set of limitations set out in the 1907 Hague Regulations⁸⁷⁶.

- 561 e) Addressees of the prohibition. The prohibition is addressed not only to combatants but to any person, without restriction.
- 562 f) Scope of application. The prohibition of pillage seems to apply not only to occupied territory stricto sensu but also to the period which precedes the actual occupation of territory⁸⁷⁷. Accordingly, it also applies during the time of ongoing military operations⁸⁷⁸. This is confirmed by the fact that article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which had already enshrined the customary law prohibition of pillage, forms part of the general provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention relating to the status of civilians⁸⁷⁹. Besides, the very wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi) was, as mentioned, derived from article 28 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, which in turn figures in chapter I of that Convention dealing with means and methods of warfare. Finally, the elements of crimes, as adopted, neither contain any hint of such a limitation.
- 563 Yet, the Katanga decision held that the war crime of pillaging might only occur when the enemy's property has come under the control of the perpetrator since in the Chamber's view. Only then would the perpetrator be in a position to 'appropriate' such property⁸⁸⁰.
- 564 The addition of the words 'even when taken by assault' further underlines the fact that the prohibition applies to all different kinds of military situations, i.e. it applies regardless of whether a given area was conquered by force or whether the adversarial forces surrendered.

Preliminary remarks on subparagraphs (xvii)–(xx):

Prohibited weapons: Drafting History

- 565 The Statute confers the ICC jurisdiction over the employment of the prohibited weapons specifically described in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii), (xviii) and (xix). In addition, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) provides explicitly for the possibility to confer on the Court jurisdiction over further weapons fulfilling certain requirements by including them in an annex to the Statute.
- 566 The inclusion of offences relating to prohibited weapons was one of the most controversial and difficult issues to resolve at the Rome Conference⁸⁸¹. With regard to means of warfare and in particular weapons, contemporary international humanitarian law essentially takes two approaches. On the one hand, a general principle of humanitarian law prohibits the use of means of warfare that cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or are inherently indiscriminate, leaving it to practice to specify what types of weapons and other means of warfare are thereby excluded. On the other hand, certain weapons are banned per se under specific treaties and customary international law. In view of these two basic and parallel approaches of humanitarian law, negotiators of the Rome Statute debated whether the ICC should have jurisdiction over exhaustively listed prohibited weapons, or rather over a generic category of weapons which would be open to evolution over time in view of the evaluation of the customary law concerned⁸⁸².

⁸⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Martić, IT-95-11-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 June 2007, para. 102.

⁸⁷⁷ As to the scope of application of destroying or seizing the enemy's property under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute see Zimmermann and Geiß, above, mn 144 et seq.

⁸⁷⁸ Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995), mn 536.

⁸⁷⁹ Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (1995), mn 536.

⁸⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, 01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 Sept. 2008, para. 330.

⁸⁸¹ On the drafting history of article 8(2)(b)(xvii)–(xx), see von Hebel and Robinson, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999), 113–116; Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2001) 48–49; Clark (1998) 28 CalWestILJ 379; id., Letter to: Readers of my Tribute to Howard Berman on Weapons of a Nature to Cause Superfluous Injury or Unnecessary Suffering, or which are Inherently Indiscriminate (4 Aug. 1998).

⁸⁸² Some of the general clauses proposed up to the adoption of the Rome Statute were based on article 23 (e) Hague Regulations ('arms, projectiles, or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering'), while others drew on the more modern language in Additional Protocol I, prohibiting the employment of 'weapons, projectiles and

While the 1994 ILC Draft Statute did not include any offence criminalizing the employment of prohibited weapons⁸⁸³, the Preparatory Committee considered such offence early on. The 1996 Preparatory Committee sessions resulted in two different options of weapons-related offences, the first of which criminalized the ‘employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering’⁸⁸⁴, while the other option contained an exhaustive list of prohibited weapons, referring to biological and chemical weapons as well as ‘projectiles which are explosive or charged with fulminating or inflammable substances’ and expanding and flattening bullets⁸⁸⁵. At the February 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, the offence of employing poison or poisoned weapons met broad agreement and was therefore included without brackets⁸⁸⁶. In addition, the report of that session contains a longer, bracketed list of weapons, including reference to the ‘us[e] or the threat of use of nuclear weapons’. However, the list was still controversial, as was the question whether it should be exhaustive or indicative, and whether a general clause should head it⁸⁸⁷.

The December 1997 Preparatory Committee session resulted in four different options⁸⁸⁸. The first option contained a closed list of weapons referring to biological and chemical weapons as well as the three types of weapons now contained in paragraphs (xvii), (xviii) and (xix). The second option combined the same list of weapons with an open-ended clause allowing the Court to extend the list by those weapons that ‘become the subject of a comprehensive prohibition pursuant to customary or conventional international law’. The third option contained no list of weapons but only a general clause ruling out weapons and methods of warfare ‘which are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or which are inherently indiscriminate’. The last option contained a longer list of prohibited weapons, including anti-personnel mines, blinding laser weapons and ‘such other weapons or weapons systems as become the subject of a comprehensive prohibition pursuant to customary or conventional international law’. These four options were eventually transmitted to the Rome Conference⁸⁸⁹.

During the first weeks of the Diplomatic Conference, there was a deadlock on the weapons issue which was only resolved – as is often the case with regard to the most difficult issues at multilateral negotiations – in the final days of the Conference⁸⁹⁰. A general clause was material and methods of warfare that are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering’ (article 35) and weapons which are inherently ‘indiscriminate’ (in particular articles 51 para. 4 and 85 para. 3 (b) Add. Prot. I).

⁸⁸³ In contrast, article 20 (e) (i) of the 1996 ILC Draft Code criminalized the ‘employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering’.

⁸⁸⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee II 60 (2a) and 62 (2a).

⁸⁸⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee II 64: ‘(j) using certain categories of projectiles which are explosive or charged with fulminating or inflammable substances, such as those referred to in the St. Petersburg Declaration of 1868; (k) using bullets which expand or flatten easily inside the human body, as defined in the Hague Declaration of 29 July 1899;

(l) using asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases and bacteriological methods as defined in the Geneva Protocol of 1925, as well as microbial agents or toxins, as defined in the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention;

(m) using chemical weapons as defined in article 2 of the 1993 Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction’.

⁸⁸⁶ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997 10.

⁸⁸⁷ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997 10–11.

⁸⁸⁸ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997 8–11.

⁸⁸⁹ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft 22–24.

⁸⁹⁰ A first semi-formal sign of movement was the Bureau proposal on 6 July 1998, 12 days before the end of the Rome Conference, to narrow down the options to the following three options (the first of which was based on the first two proposals forwarded to the Diplomatic Conference), Discussion Paper of the Bureau on Part 2, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 July 1998), article 5 (o):

‘Option 1

Employing the following weapons, projectiles and material and methods of warfare which are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering:

- (i) Poison or poisoned weapons,
- (ii) Asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials or devices,
- (iii) Bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body, such as bullets with a hard envelope which does not entirely cover the core or is pierced with incisions, supported by many delegations but rejected by others, the latter ones arguing, inter alia, that its vagueness did not allow combatants to know what weapons would fall under ICC jurisdiction. The nuclear powers and other delegations strongly opposed an open clause automatically including weapons that might, in the future or by the judges, be considered contrary to customary international law.

570 The vast majority of delegations agreed that the employment of biological and chemical weapons should be included as war crimes under ICC jurisdiction. Yet, a few delegations from states of the non-aligned movement, sensitive to the threat of neighbouring states possessing nuclear weapons, viewed biological and chemical weapons (based on the 1993 Convention definition) as the ‘poor man’s weapons of mass destruction’, and did not agree on nuclear weapons to be treated differently. Arab states, India, Pakistan and Pacific states strongly sponsored the inclusion of nuclear weapons under ICC jurisdiction, and they were supported by a number of other states from Africa, Asia and Latin America. However, especially the nuclear powers (apart from Pakistan and India) adamantly opposed any reference to nuclear weapons. When it became clear that an agreement to include nuclear weapons could not be reached⁸⁹¹, delegations from the non-aligned movement strongly opposed the inclusion of biological and chemical weapons⁸⁹². Since this issue was a no-go for both sides, the Conference’s Bureau proposed, as a ‘compromise’ incorporated in the take-it-or-leave-it global package of the last day, a list which did not include any explicit reference to either nuclear, biological or chemical weapons⁸⁹³. Neither did the list refer to blinding laser weapons or the controversial issue of anti-personnel mines.

571 Since the majority of delegations considered the short list of prohibited weapons under the Statute clearly unsatisfactory, subparagraph (xx) was adopted as a reminder and ‘space-holder’ to explicitly refer to the possibility to add, at a future Review Conference or Assembly of States Parties, further weapons and means of warfare to the jurisdiction of the ICC. Of course, subparagraph (xx) might seem superfluous considering that articles 121 and 123 of the Statute provide that Review Conferences may amend the Rome Statute. However, it was meant to signal that, given that the list of weapons included under the Rome Statute in 1998 was considered too short by many delegations, the future inclusion of additional weapons under ICC jurisdiction was deemed necessary and desirable by the Rome Conference.

-
- (iv) Bacteriological (biological) agents or toxins for hostile purposes or in armed conflict,
 - (v) Chemical weapons as defined in and prohibited by the 1993 Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and On Their Destruction,
 - (vi) Such other weapons or weapons systems as become the subject of a comprehensive prohibition, subject to a determination to that effect by the Assembly of States Parties, in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 111 of this Statute;

Option 2

Employing the following weapons, projectiles and material and methods of warfare which are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or which are inherently indiscriminate:

[(i) – (v) are identical with (i) – (v) of Option 1]

- (vi) Nuclear weapons,
 - (vii) Anti-personnel mines,
 - (viii) Blinding laser weapons,
- [(ix) is identical with (vi) of Option 1];

Option 3

Employing weapons, projectiles and material and methods of warfare which are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or which are inherently indiscriminate in violation of international humanitarian law³.

⁸⁹¹ ‘To use the Statute to ban such weapons, despite 50 years of unsuccessful disarmament talks, might [have been] fatal for the creation of the Court’, von Hebel and Robinson, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 115.

⁸⁹² The Bureau proposal of 10 July 1998 had excluded nuclear weapons but still retained biological and chemical weapons, Bureau Proposal on Part 2, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 July 1998), p. 6.

⁸⁹³ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76 and Adds. (dated 16 July 1998, but coming out between 1 and 3 a.m. of 17 July 1998). Just before the adoption of the Draft Statute, the issue of nuclear weapons was again raised just in the Committee of the Whole, see Lee, The Rome Conference and Its Contributions to International Law, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 24–25.

Armed conflicts since 1998 have continued to witness the employment of means of warfare the legality of which is disputed. New technologies will continue to lead to the development of new and often controversial weapons⁸⁹⁴. Whether further weapons should be criminalized under the Rome Statute is therefore likely to continue to be one of the controversial issues at future Review Conferences and Assemblies of States Parties. 52

Against this background, it is not entirely surprising that no new weapons were incorporated under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) at the first Rome Statute Review Conference 2010 in Kampala. Both Belgium⁸⁹⁵ and Mexico⁸⁹⁶ had originally proposed to criminalize the use of further means of warfare, including biological, chemical and nuclear weapons. However, to avoid certain and strong controversy on the weapons issue – as was done also with regard to other issues that were highly controversial in Rome – it was eventually agreed to submit for discussion in Kampala only the proposal to criminalize the use of weapons listed in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii) – (xix) also in the context of armed conflicts not of an international character, and therefore include them under subparagraph (e). Delegations generally agreed that the prohibition of the use of these weapons in non-international armed conflicts reflects customary international law⁸⁹⁷. The plenary of the Review Conference therefore adopted this proposal by consensus and as the only amendment to the Statute regarding weapons⁸⁹⁸. 573

17. Paragraph 2(b)(xvii): Employing poison or poisoned weapons

Poison and poisoned weapons have been used as a means of warfare in ancient as well as more recent history and up until today⁸⁹⁹. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii) is drawn from and identical to article 23 (a) Hague Regulations. The use of poison and poisoned weapons in times of armed conflict has been banned since ancient times⁹⁰⁰ and is subject to a well-established prohibition⁹⁰¹. Article 70 of the 1863 Lieber Code provided that '[t]he use of poison in any manner, be it to poison wells, or food, or arms, is wholly excluded from modern warfare. He that uses it puts himself out of the pale of the law and usages of war'. 574

Poisoning wells has also been considered a violation of the laws and customs of war by the Responsibilities Commission of the 1919 Paris Peace Conference⁹⁰² and a war crime under 575

⁸⁹⁴ As, e. g., the use of cluster munitions and weaponry containing depleted uranium, see ICTY, Final Report to the Prosecutor by the Committee Established to Review the NATO Bombing Campaign Against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

⁸⁹⁵ The Belgian proposal included: the penalization of poison, poisonous gases and expanding bullets in article 8 para. 2 (e); the express criminalization of biological and chemical weapons as well as anti-personnel mines in both international and non-international armed conflicts; and the criminalization of weapons prohibited by Protocols I and IV to the Conventional Weapons Convention, i. e., non-detectable fragments and blinding laser weapons in both international and non-international armed conflicts. Letter by Belgium to the UN Secretary-General, Draft Amendments to the Rome Statute on War Crimes, 29 September 2009.

⁸⁹⁶ Mexico proposed to add the following provision to article 8 para. 2 (b): '... Employing nuclear weapons or threatening to employ nuclear weapons.' Letter by Mexico to the UN Secretary-General, Draft Amendments to the Rome Statute on War Crimes, Amendment to Article 8 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court regarding the use of Nuclear Weapons, 29 September 2009.

⁸⁹⁷ See ICRC Study on Customary IHL (2005) Rules 72 and 77.

⁸⁹⁸ Resolution RC/Res. 5, Annex I.

⁸⁹⁹ This method appears to have been used by the ancient Greeks, to poison the indigenous populations of colonies including today's United States, as well as in contemporary conflicts. See, e. g., Detter, The Law of War (2000) 252.

⁹⁰⁰ The Indian Code of Manu of around 200 Before Christ for instance provided that 'when the king fights his foes in battle, let him not strike with weapons concealed (in wood), nor with barbed, poisoned ... These are the weapons of the wicked', Sinha (2005) 87 IRevRC 291. Grotius had stated that the law of nations – 'at least among the better peoples' respectively 'the European and culturally related peoples' – for a long time had prohibited to kill the enemy with poison, to use poisoned weapons or to poison wells, Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis (1625), Third Book, Fourth Chapter, XV and XVI. Such a prohibition was also found in article 13 (a) of a Project of an International Declaration concerning the Laws and Customs of War of the 1874 Brussels Conference and in article 8 of the 1880 Oxford Manual.

⁹⁰¹ See, e. g., Green, in: id. (ed.), Essays of the Modern Law of War (1999) 352.

⁹⁰² 'Report of the Commission' (1920) 14 AJIL 115.

national laws⁹⁰³. The inclusion of this war crime under the Rome Statute was not controversial at the Rome Conference⁹⁰⁴. The poisoning of wells as well as water or food supplies clearly amounts to '[e]mploying poison or poisoned weapons' under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii).

576 In some writers' view, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii) also extends to the employment of at least certain biological weapons. For instance, Detter considers the prohibition of poison or poisoned weapons 'the first prohibition of [chemical and biological weapons] and it is clear that it covers weapons deliberately contaminated with germs or poisonous agents'⁹⁰⁵. Greenspan similarly states that '[g]as and bacteriological warfare may be regarded as particular instances of infringements against the general prohibition of poison or poisoned weapons in war'⁹⁰⁶. Also, the US Department of the Air Force has defined 'poison' as 'biological or chemical substances causing death or disability with permanent effects when, in even small quantities, they are inserted, enter the lungs or bloodstream, or touch the skin'⁹⁰⁷.

577 It is not clear whether, as some argue, by implication the prohibition of poison also covers *gas*⁹⁰⁸. The Oxford English Dictionary defines 'poison' as '[a]ny substance which, when introduced into or absorbed by a living organism, destroys life or injures health, irrespective of mechanical means or direct thermal changes. Popularly applied to a substance capable of destroying life by rapid action, and when taken in small quantity'⁹⁰⁹, thus possibly also applying to gas. However, the employment of gas is clearly covered under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii), which is the more pertinent provision in this context.

578 The Preparatory Commission avoided the difficult task of defining 'poison'. Instead, it adopted a threshold relating to the effects of the substance used, changing the nature of the absolute prohibition of poison under the Rome Statute to a prohibition of using a certain substance in a certain way that can be expected to create a defined result. Element 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii) requires that '[t]he substance [employed or released by the employed weapons] was such that it causes death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events, through its toxic properties'. The reference only to toxic properties suggests, firstly, that biological weapons are not covered. Secondly, the reference only to 'death or serious damage to health' suggests that attacks against animals or plants, for instance the use of herbicides, that do not seriously endanger the health of humans are not covered under subparagraph (xvii). Thirdly, the requirement of the result of 'death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events' establishes a minimum threshold⁹¹⁰. The phrase 'in the ordinary course of events' requires interpretation. The effect of certain substances on humans depends on factors such as the dosage and the concentration effecting the organism, the state and sensitivity of the organism as well as how the substance enters the organism. Alcohol, medicines and even numerous components of food consumed daily by millions of humans can be deadly in a high dosage. As Paracelsus rightly found, the difference between a poison and a medicine often lies only in the dosage. One way to understand the phrase 'in the ordinary course of events' might be as requiring that the amount or rather concentration of the substance would in circumstances comparable to those in which it is intended to be used likely cause death or serious damage to health. It is, therefore, to be construed as a restrictive requirement of this provision; it is meant to exclude from the scope of article 8

⁹⁰³ See, e.g., Australian Law Concerning Trials of War Criminals by Military Courts, V Law Reports 96 (1948); Netherlands East Indies Statute Book Decree No. 44 of 1946, XI Law Reports 94 (1949); Chinese Law governing the Trial of War Criminals of 24 Oct. 1946, XIV Law Reports 154 (1949); for further examples, see ICRC Study on Customary IHL (2005) Rule 72.

⁹⁰⁴ It had already been proposed in article 20 (e) (i) of the 1996 ILC Draft Code.

⁹⁰⁵ Detter, The Law of War (2000) 252.

⁹⁰⁶ Greenspan, The Modern Law (1959) 359.

⁹⁰⁷ U.S. Air Force's 1976 manual, International Law: The Conduct of Armed Conflict and Air Operations 6-5.

⁹⁰⁸ See Kelsen, Principles of International Law (1966) 97. See also Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal no. 437.

⁹⁰⁹ Oxford English Dictionary VII (1933) 1056.

⁹¹⁰ The addition of the qualifier 'serious' initially met some opposition, but was eventually adopted.

para. 2 (b) (xvii) such means of warfare the result of which – death or serious damage to health – is not inherent in the weapon itself, but rather accidental.

Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii) overlaps to a considerable degree with the war crime of using 579 gases and analogous liquids, materials and devices under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii), since the latter prohibition applies also to poisonous gases and possibly to poison in general, see below. With regard to gaseous forms of poisonous weapons, however, subparagraph (xviii) must be considered lex specialis in relation to subparagraph (xvii).

18. Paragraph 2(b)(xviii): ‘Employing gases and analogous liquids, materials or devices’

a) Humanitarian law base and drafting history. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) is drawn from 580 the 1925 Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare which prohibits ‘the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials or devices’. This prohibition is considered part of customary international law⁹¹¹.

The Protocol itself indicates that it reaffirms a pre-existing ban. In fact, the prohibition is 581 reflected with similar or even identical wording in several international instruments, in particular the 1899 Hague Declaration concerning Asphyxiating Gases (IV, 2), the Washington Treaty relating to the Use of Submarines and Noxious Gases in Warfare of 6 February 1922, which never entered into force since France did not ratify it, and in several peace treaties of 1919–1920, most notably in article 171 para. 1 of the Versailles Peace Treaty which contains the words ‘[t]he use of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases and all analogous liquids, materials or devices being prohibited ...’⁹¹².

As described above, the inclusion of offences criminalizing the employment of weapons of 582 mass destruction was one of the most controversial issues at the Rome Conference. While an offense explicitly referring to ‘chemical weapons’ or to the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention was not retained, subparagraph (xviii) survived. It cannot be excluded that some delegates at the Rome Conference were not fully aware that the eventually agreed language generally had been understood to also refer to chemical weapons. The wording dating back to 1925 gave rise to substantial discussion within the Preparatory Commission, including the question as to how far developments in the law relating to chemical and biological warfare since 1925 had to be taken into account, given the exclusion of an explicit reference to the 1993 Convention. The Preparatory Commission tried to partially clarify the vague wording stemming from the 1925 Protocol, debating in particular whether and, if so, to what extent the use of riot control agents would be criminalized under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii).

b) Material elements. aa) Chemical weapons. The wording of the 1925 Geneva Protocol, 583 as repeated in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii), has generally been understood to apply to a broad range of chemical weapons⁹¹³. The UN General Assembly for instance recognized in its Resolution 2603 A of 1969, adopted with 80 votes in favor, 3 against and 36 abstentions, that ‘the Geneva Protocol embodies the generally recognized rules of international law prohibiting the use in international armed conflicts of all biological and chemical methods of warfare, regardless of any technical developments’ and declared ‘as contrary to the generally recognized rules of international law, as embodied in the [1925 Geneva Protocol], the use in international armed conflict of: (a) *Any chemical agents of warfare – chemical substances, whether gaseous, liquid or solid – which might be employed because of their direct toxic effects on man, animals or plants ...*⁹¹⁴. Similarly, states parties to the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention ‘recall[ed] that the General Assembly of the United Nations has repeatedly condemned all actions contrary to the principles and objectives of the [1925 Geneva Protocol], [r]ecogniz[ed] that this Convention reaffirms principles and objectives of and obligations assumed under the Geneva Protocol of 1925 ... [and were] [d]etermined ... to exclude completely the possibility of the use of chemical weapons, through the implementation of the provisions of this Convention, thereby complementing the obligations assumed under the Geneva Protocol of 1925’⁹¹⁵. The UN Security Council likewise has condemned ‘the use of chemical weapons in the conflict between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, in violation of obligations under the [1925 Geneva Protocol]’⁹¹⁶.

⁹¹¹ See, e.g., Goldblat, Arms Control: The New Guide to Negotiations and Agreements (2002) 137; Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal no. 437; UN Doc. A/RES/2603 A (XXIV) (16 Dec. 1969); Final Declaration of the Conference of States Parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol and other Interested States on the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (7–11 Jan. 1989).

⁹¹² See, e.g., Goldblat, Arms Control (2002) 135; Van Wynen and Thomas, Legal Limits on the Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons (1970).

⁹¹³ See, e.g., Goldblat (1997) IRevRC 251, (‘the Geneva Protocol ... banned the use of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, usually referred to as chemical weapons’).

584 Based on the differing French and English version, there are two main interpretations as to what types of gases are ruled out by the prohibition. The English wording covers all types of gases since it refers to ‘asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases’ (emphasis added) without qualifying the term ‘other’. The French version of both article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) as well as the 1925 Geneva Protocol (which is authentic in both French and English) however refers to similar gases⁹¹⁷, suggesting that only gases with an effect similar to asphyxiation or poisoning are covered. According to Bothe, the drafting history of the 1925 Geneva Protocol as well as the opinio iuris after World War I indicates however that all types of gases were meant to be prohibited⁹¹⁸. Several authors⁹¹⁹ as well as the above-cited resolution of the UN General Assembly⁹²⁰ affirm that ‘any’ gaseous chemical substance is prohibited. Element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) reflects the view of the Preparatory Commission that all gases are covered under the prohibition: ‘The perpetrator employed a gas ...’. One can therefore say that while the text of the Protocol allows both a restrictive and a broad interpretation, states parties to the Protocol have interpreted it broadly⁹²¹.

585 A particularly difficult issue debated by the Preparatory Commission is whether the prohibition under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) also applies to riot control agents such as tear gas (insofar, of course, as it is used in the context of an armed conflict). One author, Spaight, noted in 1947 that ‘[t]he Gas Protocol prohibits ... not only poisonous and asphyxiating gases but also ‘other gases’ and (to emphasize the comprehensiveness of the prohibition) ‘all analogous liquids, materials or devices’. It condemns, therefore, not only lethal but also non-toxic or anesthetic gases. The argument that the use of a gas is permissible because its effect is not to kill but merely to stupefy temporarily those within its radius of action, cannot be sustained in face of the definite terms of the treaty’⁹²².

586 In 1930, the Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament Conference attempted to clarify this issue with regard to the 1925 Geneva Protocol. The French, the British as well as eleven other members of the Commission took the view that also lachrymatory gases such as tear gas are prohibited under the Protocol. Only the US, which was not party to the Protocol at that time, dissented and argued that it would be inconsistent to prohibit the use of gases in

⁹¹⁴ UN Doc. A/RES/2603 A (XXIV) (16 Dec. 1969) (emphasis added).

⁹¹⁵ Preamble, Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction of 13 Jan. 1993.

⁹¹⁶ UN Doc. S/RES/620 (26 Aug. 1988).

⁹¹⁷ ‘Le fait d’utiliser des gaz asphyxiants, toxiques ou similaires ...’ (emphasis added), as corrected on 30 November 1999.

⁹¹⁸ See, e.g., Bothe, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. III (1982) 84.

⁹¹⁹ See, e.g., Bothe, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. III (1997) 84; Sandoz, Des Armes Interdites en Droit de la Guerre (1975) 88. See also Detter, The Law of War (2000) 258.

⁹²⁰ UN Doc. A/RES/2603 A (XXIV) (16 Dec. 1969).

⁹²¹ Baxter and Buergenthal (1970) 64 AJIL 866.

⁹²² Spaight, Air Power and War Rights (3rd ed., 1947), cited in Whiteman (1968) 10 Digest of International Law 459. See also Rousseau, Le Droit des Conflits Armés (1983) 119 et seq.

armed conflict situations while they could be used in peacetime for police purposes⁹²³. The British government changed its position on 2 February 1970 because of its desire to use tear gas in Northern Ireland, announcing that the UK considered CS (a particular type of tear gas) and other such gases as outside the Protocol's scope, arguing that CS is not significantly harmful to man in other than exceptional circumstances and that CS smoke could be distinguished from older forms of tear gas as they existed in 1930⁹²⁴.

However, the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention does not prohibit riot control agents as long as they are not used as a method of warfare but intended for '[l]aw enforcement including domestic riot control purposes', and provided the types and quantities are consistent with such purposes⁹²⁵. Article II para. 7 of the Convention defines 'riot control agents' as '[a]ny chemical not listed in a Schedule, which can produce rapidly in humans sensory irritation or disabling physical effects which disappear within a short time following termination of exposure'. Some however argue that the vague phrase 'as a method of warfare' includes any action involving 'combatants', including traditional hostage rescue missions and human shields scenarios⁹²⁶.

Today, the US considers the Protocol as applying to lethal and incapacitating agents, which are defined as 'chemical agents producing symptoms that persist for hours or even days after exposure to the agent has terminated'⁹²⁷. Executive Order No. 11850 provides in more detail the US policy regarding riot control agents in armed conflict situations⁹²⁸. The use of riot control agents and chemical herbicides in war requires the approval of the US President⁹²⁹. In view of the US ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention, the US Operational Law Handbook notes that 'the authority to use RCA is potentially easier to obtain when the United States is not involved in a "war"', while also referring to the President's certification document which states that 'the United States is not restricted by the convention in its use of riot control agents in various peacetime and peacekeeping operations'⁹³⁰.

The Preparatory Commission had devoted particular attention to the question whether article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) would also apply to riot control agents. It was argued that it would ⁹²³ League of Nations, Preparatory Commission, Disarmament Conference, X, 6th sess. 311 (1931), cited in Detter, The Law of War (2000) 257 (fn. 358 and 359). See also Roberts and Guelff (eds.), Documents on the Laws of War (3rd ed., 2000) 155–156.

⁹²⁴ Statement by the Foreign Secretary, 795 HC, 1970, col. 18, cited in, Detter, The Law of War (2000) 257 (fn. 364). See also Roberts and Guelff (eds.), ibid., 156.

⁹²⁵ See articles I para. 5 and II paras. 1 (a) and 9 (d).

⁹²⁶ U.S. Army, Judge Advocate General's School, Operational Law Handbook (2002) 16, Chapter 2.

⁹²⁷ See U.S. Army, Operational Law Handbook (2002) 15, Chapter 2; U.S. Army, Field Manual (1956) 27–10, paras. 38 c and 38 d.

⁹²⁸ 'The United States renounces, as a matter of national policy, first use of herbicides in war except use, under regulations applicable to their domestic use, for control of vegetation within US bases and installations or around their immediate defensive perimeters, and first use of riot control agents in war except in defensive military modes to save lives such as:

- (1) Use of riot control agents in riot control situations in areas under direct and distinct US military control, to include controlling rioting prisoners of war.
- (2) Use of riot control agents in situations in which civilians are used to mask or screen attacks and civilian casualties can be reduced or avoided.
- (3) Use of riot control agents in rescue missions in remotely isolated areas, of downed aircrews and passengers, and escaping prisoners.
- (4) Use of riot control agents in rear echelon areas outside the zone of immediate combat to protect convoys from civil disturbances, terrorists and paramilitary organizations'.

Executive Order No. 11850, 40 Fed. Reg. 16187 (1975), cited in: U.S. Army, Operational Law Handbook (2014) 29, Chapter 2.

⁹²⁹ Ibid.

⁹³⁰ Cited in U.S. Army, Operational Law Handbook (2014) 29, Chapter 2. These situations are defined as those 'in which the U.S. is not engaged in the use of force of a scope, duration, and intensity that would trigger the laws of war with respect to U.S. forces'. The certification was made upon the requirement of the Senate that 'the U.S. is not restricted by the [Chemical Weapons Convention] in its use of riot control agents, including the use against 'combatants' in any of the following cases: when the U.S. is not a party to the conflict, in consensual (Chapter VI, UN Charter) peacekeeping operations, and in Chapter VII (UN Charter) peacekeeping operations', ibid.

be paradoxical if peace-keeping forces striving to control riots in situations where humanitarian law might apply, such as in UNMIK in Kosovo, could use bullets but not tear gas, since the latter generally would be less harmful.

590 However, a major concern at the time of the adoption of the Geneva Protocol of allowing any gas, including riot control agents, in armed conflict situations was that the adversary is usually unable to determine, at least prima facie, what types of gas and chemical substances are being used against them. Consequently, they may mistakenly reply ‘in kind’, leading to a full-out chemical weapons war. While this risk may have been higher in situations like the World War I trenches, a number of delegations as well as the ICRC argued that it should still not be underestimated. Also, it is difficult to distinguish between lethal and non-lethal agents. Gases generally considered ‘non-lethal’ may well be deadly or extremely harmful when used in high dosage, against particularly vulnerable persons like children or under other circumstances⁹³¹. The risk of a response ‘in kind’ because of mistaking irritating or disabling agents for lethal chemical weapons may be less predominant in a contemporary peace-keeping environment where international forces de facto discharge police functions including riot control (for instance in Kosovo after June 1999), and maybe also in long-term occupations with an occupying power discharging law and order functions.

591 In any event, the Preparatory Commission took the view that the use of non-lethal riot control agents in many circumstances would not constitute a war crime under the Rome Statute. Element 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) requires that ‘[t]he gas, substance or device was such that it causes death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events ...’ (emphasis added), establishing a minimum threshold focusing on the agent’s effect. This threshold however again requires interpretation. As explained above, substances generally described as non-lethal may become lethal depending on dosage, circumstances etc. The use of tear gas in closed rooms for instance may considerably raise the risk of death⁹³². While many were of the opinion that the minimum threshold focusing on the agent’s effect would exclude prosecution by the ICC of conduct that may be unlawful under general or broadly accepted conventional international law, the threshold was accepted based on jurisdictional grounds, that is, that the ICC should only deal with the most serious crimes. To ensure that the elements, seen by many delegations as more restrictive than required under general or conventional international law⁹³³, will be read as specific to the jurisdiction of the ICC and not as a reflection of international law, footnote 48 was added to element 2, underlining that ‘[n]othing in this element shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law with respect to development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons’. Nonetheless, there is no room for generalization: Insofar as a certain type of riot control agent has asphyxiating or toxic properties or is fashioned in a way to bring ⁹³¹ On non-lethal weapons and international law more generally, see, e.g., Heintze (2000) 18 Sicherheit und Frieden 2.

⁹³² For an overview of the hostage crisis in a Moscow theatre in 2002 during which a type of riot control agent was used and why, nonetheless, this incident does not serve to argue that riot control agents should be included as criminal under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii), see Křivánek, The Weapons Provisions in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and in the German Code of Crimes Against International Law (2010) 49–52.

⁹³³ See, for instance, article II paras. 1 and 2 of the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention:

‘For the purposes of this Convention:

1. ‘Chemical Weapons’ means the following, together or separately:
 - (a) Toxic chemical and their precursors, except where intended for purposes not prohibited under this Convention [see para. (9)], as long as the types and quantities are consistent with such purposes;
 - (b) Munitions and devices, specifically designed to cause death or other harm through the toxic properties of those toxic chemicals specified in subparagraph (a), which would be released as a result of the employment of such munitions and devices; ...
2. ‘Toxic Chemicals’ means: Any chemical which through its chemical action on life processes can cause death, temporary incapacitation or permanent harm to humans or animals. This includes all such chemicals, regardless of their origin or of their method of production, and regardless of whether they are produced in facilities, in munitions or elsewhere’ [emphasis added].

about death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events, the criminalization of its use according to Article 8 (2) (b) (xviii) of the Statute is not questionable⁹³⁴.

By requiring ‘death or serious damage to health’, element 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) also suggests that herbicides (agents the toxic effect of which mainly works on plants) were not meant as being automatically covered under the elements. Whether the 1925 Geneva Protocol also covers attacks against animal or plant life, including herbicides, is in fact controversial⁹³⁵. Nonetheless, the UN General Assembly declared in 1969 that the use in warfare of chemical agents which have their direct toxic effects on plants is ‘contrary to the generally recognized rules of international law’⁹³⁶. Also, the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention recognizes in its Preamble ‘the prohibition, embodied in the pertinent agreements and relevant principles of international law, of the use of herbicides as a method of warfare’ (emphasis added).

The term ‘device’ in ‘all analogous liquids, materials and devices’ is very broad and means technique, procedure and method⁹³⁷. Some delegations initially were in favor of deleting the word ‘device’ in the elements. It was, however, repeated also in the elements, since the term had been included in the 1925 Geneva Protocol to provide as broad a definition as possible. A commentary to the Protocol notes that the term ‘device’ ‘marks once more the intention of the authors [of the 1925 Geneva Protocol] to give to their definition a comprehensive and open-ended character’ and that otherwise ‘[i]t could be claimed, for instance, that ... an aerosol, which is a suspension of solid particles or liquid droplets in air, is neither a gas nor a liquid, a material or a substance’⁹³⁸. Correspondingly, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) might also extend to aerosol bombs, which are for instance used to fight combatants hiding out in a narrow valley or in caves.

In elements 1 and 2, the use of the word ‘substance’ instead of liquids and materials was not meant to indicate any change in substance⁹³⁹. The term ‘analogous’ however is incorrectly used in element 1. In the 1925 Geneva Protocol, the term ‘analogous’ is used to provide that the effects of the liquid, material or device must be similar to the effects of ‘asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases’⁹⁴⁰. The ICJ has affirmed that the words ‘analogous materials or devices’ ‘have been understood, in the practice of States, in their ordinary sense as covering weapons whose prime, or even exclusive, effect is to poison or asphyxiate’⁹⁴¹. The German Military Manual also states that the prohibition ‘does not refer to unintentional and insignificant secondary effects of otherwise permissible means of warfare’⁹⁴². Oeter commented that ‘if the asphyxiating or poisoning effect is merely a side-effect of a physical mechanism intended principally to cause totally different results (as, e.g., the use of nuclear weapons), then the relevant munitions do not constitute a ⁹³⁴ Garraway points to the understanding reached at the Rome Conference that ‘the use of riot control agents in most circumstances would be excluded from the scope of this offence’ (emphasis added); Garraway, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 180.

⁹³⁵ Bothe for instance finds in 1982 that ‘in the light of reservations and opposition expressed in UN debates, the expressions of opinio juris are not as numerous as would be necessary for the formation of a customary rule’ prohibiting herbicides. Bothe, in: Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. III (1982) 85. The US is also of the view that the prohibition does not cover herbicides, see, e.g., Executive Order No. 11850, cited in: U.S. Army, Operational Law Handbook (2014) 29, Chapter 2.

⁹³⁶ UN Doc. A/RES/2603 A (XXIV) (16 Dec. 1969).

⁹³⁷ The original French wording adopted in July 1998 in Rome referred to ‘engins analogues’ (emphasis added), which means rather tool, machine, apparatus. The wording corrected on 30 Nov. 1999 however refers to ‘procédés analogues’ (emphasis added), which means procedure, technique, method.

⁹³⁸ Stockholm Int’l Peace Research Institut (ed.), The Problem of Chemical and Biological Warfare, Vol. III (1973) 45.

⁹³⁹ See also Garraway, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 180.

⁹⁴⁰ Ibid.

⁹⁴¹ ICJ, Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (8 July 1996), para. 55 (emphasis added).

⁹⁴² Law of Armed Conflict, Manual, Joint Service Regulation 15/2, May 2013, DSK V230100262, marginal no. 472.

“poisonous gas”⁹⁴³. Bothe similarly found that ‘[w]here the primary injuring effect of a weapon results from heat or pressure, the weapon is not to be regarded as a chemical agent of warfare’⁹⁴⁴.

595 While many countries had initially reserved their right to use gases prohibited under the 1925 Geneva Convention as a reaction to their employment by an adversary, accepting only the obligation not to use them first⁹⁴⁵, article 120 of the Rome Statute does not permit any reservations. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) Rome Statute therefore applies to any employment – ‘first’ or ‘second’ use – of such gases in armed conflict situations.

It results from the above that a wide range, if not most chemical weapons can be subsumed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii)⁹⁴⁶.

596 bb) Biological weapons. A further issue is whether article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) and more specifically the phrase ‘analogous liquids, materials or devices’ also applies to biological weapons. Biological agents of warfare have been defined as ‘living organisms, whatever their nature, or infective material derived from them – which are intended to cause disease or death in man, animals or plants, and which depend for their effects on their ability to multiply in the person, animal or plant attacked’⁹⁴⁷. While toxins produced by living organisms scientifically constitute chemical agents, they are generally considered together with or as biological agents of warfare⁹⁴⁸.

597 Whereas the wording of subparagraph (xviii) does not clearly exclude its application also to liquids, materials or devices containing or using biological agents, the states that adopted the 1925 Geneva Protocol apparently took the view that the phrase ‘the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials or devices’ does not extend to the use of bacteriological methods of warfare. This is implicit in the Protocol’s formulation that ‘the High Contracting Parties ... accept [the] prohibition [of the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials or devices] [and] agree to extend this prohibition to the use of bacteriological methods of warfare ...’ (emphasis added). Even though the term ‘bacteriological’ is scientifically narrower than the term ‘biological’, it has generally been understood that the Geneva Protocol’s extension to ‘bacteriological methods of warfare’ applies to all biological weapons, including to viruses, fungi or rickettsiae not known at the time the Geneva Protocol was adopted⁹⁴⁹.

598 In view of the above as well as the reference to the ‘asphyxiating or toxic properties’ of the gas, substance or device in element 2, it appears that biological weapons are not generally covered under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii). Yet, the use of biological weapons could well result in excessive incidental civilian casualties and therefore amount to a war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (iv).

⁹⁴³ Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal no. 437.

⁹⁴⁴ Napalm for instance may lead to asphyxiation by the reduction of oxygen and may lead to festering burn injuries often leading to cancerous degenerations. Since its primary effects are, however, fire and heat, it is doubtful whether bombs using Napalm could be qualified as ‘analogous’ devices, Bothe, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. I (1982) 566.

⁹⁴⁵ Besides, a number of states have wholly or partially withdrawn their earlier reservations, and it seems doubtful whether, today, retaliation in kind with weapons prohibited under the 1925 Geneva Protocol accords with contemporary international law or the 1972 and 1993 conventions. See, e.g., Roberts and Guelff (eds.), Documents (2000) 155.

⁹⁴⁶ Compare, however, the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) with, e.g., section 12 para. 1 no. 2 of the German Code of Crimes against International Law, which explicitly penalizes the use of chemical weapons. See also Law of Armed Conflict, Manual, Joint Service Regulation 15/2, May 2013, DSK V230100262, marginal nos. 466 et seq., and Křivánek, The Weapons Provisions (2010) 118 et seq.

⁹⁴⁷ UN Doc. A/RES/2603 A (XXIV) (16 Dec. 1969).

⁹⁴⁸ See Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction of 10 April 1972; Bothe, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. I (1982) 566; Rauch, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. III (1982) 45; Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal no. 441.

⁹⁴⁹ See, e.g., Goldblat (1997) IRRevRC 251; Rauch, in: Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. III (1982) 45.

cc) No applicability to nuclear weapons. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) does not appear to apply to nuclear weapons, if only because the primary effects of nuclear weapons are not asphyxiating, poisonous or similar effects, but rather explosive, light/heat and radiation effects⁹⁵⁰.

19. Paragraph 2(b)(xix) ‘bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body’

a) Humanitarian law base and drafting history. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix) is drawn from the 1899 Hague Declaration (Declaration 3) Concerning the Prohibition of Using Bullets which Expand or Flatten Easily in the Human Body. This proscription is considered part of customary international humanitarian law⁹⁵¹. Bullets with certain features, such as bullets not completely surrounded by hard casing or notched with incisions, tend to flatten and expand when impacting upon the human body. This effect may cause significantly more serious injury than an equivalent standard bullet would, injury which often is particularly difficult to treat and may be unnecessary to arrive at legitimate military aims. This is why the declaration prohibited such bullets, ‘inspired by the sentiments which found expression in the [1868] Declaration of St. Petersburg⁹⁵²:

‘Considering: That the progress of civilization should have the effect of alleviating as much as possible the calamities of war;

That the only legitimate object which States should endeavour to accomplish during war is to weaken the military forces of the enemy;

That for this purpose it is sufficient to disable the greatest possible number of men;

That this object would be exceeded by the employment of arms which uselessly aggravate the sufferings of disabled men, or render their death inevitable;

That the employment of such arms would, therefore, be contrary to the laws of humanity ...’.

The intended object of the prohibition in the 1899 Hague Declaration was the projectile developed by the British Army for use against tribesmen in India, which had become known as the ‘dum-dum bullet’⁹⁵³.

b) Material elements. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix) criminalizes bullets that have the effect described⁹⁵⁴. The offense thus applies both to bullets having that effect because of the fashion in which they are manufactured, as well as to standard bullets ‘converted’ by individual soldiers and combatants on the battlefield, namely by piercing them with incisions⁹⁵⁵.

As to the types of bullets prohibited, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix) mentions two examples of bullets ‘which expand or flatten easily in the human body’, namely bullets ‘with a hard envelope which does not entirely cover the core’ or ‘with a hard envelope which ... is pierced with incisions’. As the words ‘such as’ in the offense’s definition make clear, this list of ⁹⁵⁰ See, however, ICJ, Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons paras. 55–56 (8 July 1996) and the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Weeramantry, in particular at IV(2)(d) and III(7) (‘The deliberate act of spreading lethal disease, be it by chemicals or germs or poisons or noxious fumes, has, even in ancient times been considered to be contrary to the laws of war. ... Nowhere in the age-old history of the laws of war – ancient or modern – is there found a principle which permits the poisoning of the enemy forces, leave alone the poisoning of the enemy population en masse. This is what nuclear weapons do (see my Dissent in the General Assembly Request, section II) – apart, that is, from poisoning the populations of non-combatant countries’); Dissenting Opinion of Judge Koroma. See also, e.g., Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal no. 432; Kalivretakis (2001) 15 EmoryILRev 683; Matheson (1997) 91 AJIL 417; Chesterman (1997) 44 NethILRev 149.

⁹⁵¹ McCoubrey, International Humanitarian Law (1998) 232–233.

⁹⁵² Preamble of the 1899 Hague Declaration, referring to the Declaration to the Effect of Prohibiting the Use of Certain Projectiles in Wartime, signed at St. Petersburg 29 Nov.–11 Dec. 1868.

⁹⁵³ Dum Dum was a British arsenal near Kolkata, where these bullets were invented, Vagts, The Hague Conventions and Arms Control, (2000), 94 AJIL 34. On the historical background of this declaration, see Kalshoven (1985 II) 191 RDC 213–217.

⁹⁵⁴ The original French version adopted in Rome ‘le fait d’utiliser des balles qui se dilatent ou s’aplatissent’, was corrected (on 30 Nov. 1999) to ‘le fait d’utiliser des balles qui s’épanouissent ou s’aplatissent’ (emphasis added), in accordance with the French text of the 1899 Declaration.

⁹⁵⁵ See, e.g., McCoubrey, International Humanitarian Law (1998) 232.

prohibited bullets is only illustrative and not exhaustive. Further guidance to determine what bullets might be covered under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix) can be found in the ‘sentiments which found expression in the [1868] St. Petersburg Declaration’, to which the Preamble of the 1899 Hague Declaration refers, including the prohibition of the ‘employment of arms which uselessly aggravate the sufferings of disabled men, or render their death inevitable’. These intentions, although not necessarily the technical specifications laid down in the 1868 St. Petersburg Declaration, remain valid to date. The German Military Manual prohibits more broadly ‘projectiles designed: to burst open or deform upon entering the human body; that start to tumble in the human body; or to cause shock waves leading to extensive tissue damage or even lethal shock’⁹⁵⁶. The US Department of the Army also has considered that a bullet ‘that will explode on impact with the human body would be prohibited by the law of war from use for antipersonnel purposes’⁹⁵⁷.

603 At any rate, in accordance with the clear wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix), the bullets must ‘expand or flatten easily in the human body’. During the negotiations of the material elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix), several delegations were concerned that the use of bullets, which expand or flatten easily in the human body, would be criminalized under any circumstances relating to armed conflicts. However, expanding bullets are used by some domestic police forces and other law enforcement agencies particularly for situations like hostage liberations where the use of an expanding instead of a conventional bullet decreases the risk of collateral damage to the hostages⁹⁵⁸. While hostage-taking may not typically arise in international armed conflicts of a traditional nature, it has occurred repeatedly in recent conflicts and, as was argued, may increasingly occur in future conflicts and conflicts with ‘terrorism’-related aspects. In addition, international peace-keeping forces are increasingly entrusted with police-like tasks in ongoing conflicts. Some delegations accordingly argued that expanding bullets were, under contemporary international law, not absolutely prohibited and that the ICC should not have jurisdiction over their use in situations such as a hostage liberation.

604 The Preparatory Commission however did not define situations in which the use of expanding bullets would not fall under ICC jurisdiction, but rather decided to require that the use of such bullets ‘violates the international law of armed conflict because they expand or flatten easily in the human body’. While this does not clarify the underlying issue, it opens the possibility to argue before the Court that a particular use of expanding bullets in hostage-taking situations or similar situations in a domestic law enforcement capacity would not violate such law⁹⁵⁹. It is however submitted that the use of such bullets as a method of warfare in a traditional warfare situation remains prohibited.

605 c) Mental elements. The transformation of the state obligation of not employing expanding bullets into a criminal offense defining the circumstances under which an individual incurs criminal responsibility poses particular problems with regard to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix). Article 30 Rome Statute appears to require more than the knowledge and intent to use a bullet (which would effectively amount to a strict liability standard), namely the knowledge that the bullet used expands or flattens easily in the human body in the ordinary course of events. Many simple foot soldiers however may be oblivious to the precise scientific effect on the human body of the bullet they receive or change according to a common practice in their company. They might however know that the bullet causes particularly grave injuries.

⁹⁵⁶ Law of Armed Conflict, Manual, Joint Service Regulation 15/2, May 2013, DSK V230100262, marginal no. 440.

⁹⁵⁷ Memorandum for US Army Armament Research, Development and Engineering Center (19 Feb. 1998), cited in ICRC Study on Third Set of War Crimes Within Art. 8(2)(B) Rome Statute 16 (4 August 1999). The ICRC also stated that there was a general consensus at an Expert Meeting in Geneva from 29 to 30 March 1999 on exploding bullets that ‘the prohibition on the intentional use against combatants of bullets which explode upon impact with the human body, which originated in the 1868 St. Petersburg Declaration, continues to be valid’, ibid.

⁹⁵⁸ Another form of domestic use of such bullets, for instance, is aircraft security.

⁹⁵⁹ See Garraway, in: Lee et. al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 181.

The Preparatory Committee debated various solutions to this difficult problem. One was that the perpetrator ‘knew or should have known’ that such bullets expand or flatten easily, a clear deviation from the article 30 standard⁹⁶⁰. Another proposal was that the perpetrator must be ‘aware of the prohibited status of the bullet’. This however would have introduced a strict mistake of law defense deviating from the article 32 standard. 606

As Garraway points out, the solution eventually adopted was to focus on the purpose of and ‘philosophy’ behind the prohibition⁹⁶¹. As stated above, the 1899 Hague Declaration refers to the sentiments expressed in the 1868 St. Petersburg Declaration which prohibits the employment of arms ‘which uselessly aggravate the sufferings of disabled men, or render their death inevitable’. The Preparatory Commission thus eventually adopted the mental requirement that the perpetrator ‘was aware that the nature of the bullets was such that their employment would uselessly aggravate suffering or the wounding effect’⁹⁶². 607

This of course leaves the ICC judges with the (difficult) task of interpreting the vague term ‘uselessly’ as used in element 3. The mental requirement in element 3 is a creation of the Preparatory Commission and must be interpreted in accordance with the Rome Statute and the underlying prohibition. In view of the objective of the 1899 Hague Declaration, element 3 clearly cannot mean that a person knowing that the expanding or flattening effect of a bullet offers a military advantage becomes immune to criminal responsibility. Delegations at the Preparatory Committee certainly did not want to automatically exempt from criminal responsibility persons of high rank issuing expanding bullets to be used in traditional warfare situations, irrespective of whether this person is convinced that the effect serves military goals since aggravating the wounds of adversary soldiers. The prohibition of dum-dum bullets does not allow for a ‘military necessity’ exception. 608

20. Paragraph 2(b)(xx): ‘Employment of means or methods of warfare included in an annex to this Statute’

Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) does not contain any operative definition of an offense. Instead, it refers to the possibility of a Review Conference, the first having taken place in Kampala in 2010 without any amendments based on this provision, or an Assembly of States Parties to add further weapons or methods of warfare under the jurisdiction of the ICC in accordance with the relevant amendment provisions set forth in articles 121 and 123 Rome Statute. This assertion in subparagraph (xx) is essentially superfluous, since states parties to the Rome Statute are free to add new crimes to the Rome Statute regardless of this specific provision. Nonetheless, it was adopted as a political signal that the current list of prohibited weapons is unsatisfactory and far from exhaustive⁹⁶³. 609

Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) stipulates that weapons, projectiles or material or methods of warfare to be added must, firstly, be ‘of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering’ or be ‘inherently indiscriminate’ in violation of international humanitarian law. This wording is particularly based on concepts articulated in articles 48 and 51 paras. 4 and 5 Add. Prot. I. Secondly, these weapons, projectiles, material or methods of warfare must be the subject of a ‘comprehensive prohibition’. These conditions raise the question of the relation between article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) and articles 121 and 123. Since states are free to bind themselves contractually, a Review Conference or Assembly of States Parties must also legally 610

⁹⁶⁰ The elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii)-1, -2 and -4, (b) (xxvi) and (e) (vii) contain such a deviation.

⁹⁶¹ See Garraway, in: Lee et. al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 182.

⁹⁶² It would have been preferable – since clearer – if the Preparatory Commission had repeated the entire relevant wording of the 1868 St. Petersburg Declaration. Element 3 could for instance have required that ‘[t]he perpetrator knew or should have known that the nature of the bullet was contrary to international humanitarian law or that it uselessly aggravates the sufferings of disabled men or renders their death inevitable’.

⁹⁶³ For the drafting history of this provision, see above.

be free to deviate from the two conditions under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx)⁹⁶⁴. Nonetheless, the two conditions bear at least some political relevance. It is unlikely that states parties to the Rome Statute will want to criminalize the use of weapons that are not subject to a ‘comprehensive prohibition’ or are not ‘of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering’ or ‘inherently indiscriminate’, considering these are the same notions that are the basis of the criminalization of the weapons in subparagraphs (xvii) – (xix).

611 The prohibition to cause unnecessary suffering or superfluous injury and the obligation to distinguish between combatants and non-combatants, that is, between legitimate military targets and illegitimate civilian targets, have become cardinal principles of international humanitarian law. Accordingly, weapons of a nature to cause such suffering or injury or which are inherently indiscriminate have become prohibited under humanitarian law⁹⁶⁵. Unnecessary suffering or superfluous injury may be understood as suffering or injury that is disproportionate and excessive in relation to the lawful military advantage pursued. Article 51 para. 4 Add. Prot. I prohibits indiscriminate attacks and defines them as ‘... b) those which employ a method or means of combat which cannot be directed at a specific military objective; or c) those which employ a method or means of combat the effects of which cannot be limited as required by this Protocol; and consequently, in each such case, are of a nature to strike military objectives and civilians or civilian objects without distinction’⁹⁶⁶.

612 The meaning of the term ‘comprehensive prohibition’ is not entirely clear. Earlier drafts had used the wording ‘such other weapons or weapons systems as become the subject of a comprehensive prohibition pursuant to customary or conventional international law’⁹⁶⁷. A comprehensive prohibition may exist under customary international law as evidenced by the opinio iuris and practice of States, or under conventional international law, in particular where a treaty prohibiting the employment of a specific weapon has been widely ratified. In both cases, almost universally accepted treaties would provide clear evidence of a comprehensive prohibition. It is not necessary that all States without exception have ratified such treaty. The qualified majority of states parties at a Review Conference or Assembly of States Parties will determine which weapons can be considered as subject of a comprehensive prohibition when debating adding further weapons under the jurisdiction of the ICC. After all, it is noteworthy that the delegations in Rome were mindful to criminalize only such conduct that could be based on a rule of customary international law.

⁹⁶⁴ Articles 121 and 123 do not exclude any part of the Statute from being amended, and article 121 para. 5 explicitly refers to an amendment also of article 8. The requirements stipulated in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xx) could therefore also be amended according to the general amendment provisions.

⁹⁶⁵ See ICJ, Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, paras. 78 et seq. (8 July 1996). As early as 1868, the Declaration of St. Petersburg stated that ‘[t]he only legitimate object which States should endeavor to accomplish during war is to weaken the military forces of the enemy’ and condemned the use of weapons ‘which uselessly aggravate the suffering of disabled men, or render their death inevitable’ (emphasis added). International provisions affirming this principle include article 23 (e) Hague Regulations which prohibits ‘to employ arms, projectiles, or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering’ (the wording ‘calculated to’ of the 1907 Hague Regulations stems from an incorrect translation of the authentic French wording ‘propre à causer des maux superflus’, see ICRC, Comments on Informal Working Paper on War Crimes of 13 Oct. 1997 (2 Dec. 1997), at (3); article 35 para. 2 Add. Prot. I; Preamble and article 3 of the Second Protocol to the 1981 Conventional Weapons Convention; article 3 of the ICTY Statute; Preamble of the Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on their Destruction of 18 September 1997 (‘Basing themselves ... on the principle that prohibits the employment in armed conflicts of weapons, projectiles and materials and methods of warfare of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering and on the principle that a distinction must be made between civilians and combatants’). See, e.g., Oeter, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (2013), marginal nos. 401, 448.

⁹⁶⁶ According, for instance, to the US Department of the Air Force, ‘[i]ndiscriminate weapons are those incapable of being controlled, through design or function, thus they cannot with any degree of certainty, be directed at military objectives. ... In addition, some weapons, though capable of being directed at military objectives, may have otherwise uncontrollable effects so as to cause disproportionate civilian injuries or damage’. U.S. Air Force’s 1976 manual, see note 678, para. 6-3. For a detailed study of relevant materials and instrument, see ICRC Study On Third Set Of War Crimes Within Art. 8(2)(B) Rome Statute 17–29 (4 Aug. 1999).

⁹⁶⁷ Emphasis added. See, e.g., Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, pp. 10 and 11; Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, pp. 23 and 24.

With regard to future considerations to add further prohibited weapons to the list under the Rome Statute, we may refer to the considerations during the Rome Conference to include land mines⁹⁶⁸ and blinding laser weapons⁹⁶⁹ as well as the issue of explicit references to biological⁹⁷⁰ and chemical⁹⁷¹ as well as nuclear weapons⁹⁷². Certainly, it is impossible to know what weapons will further be invented and developed. It is likely that the future will prove a need to prohibit and criminalize the use of yet unknown or not commonly deployed weapons⁹⁷³.

21. Paragraph 2(b)(xxi): ‘outrages upon personal dignity’

Literature: Hersh, S.M., ‘Torture at Abu Ghraib’, (10 May 2004) The New Yorker <<http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2004/05/10/torture-at-abu-ghraib>> accessed 21 October 2014; Oosterveld, V., ‘Evaluating the Special Court for Sierra Leone’s Gender Jurisprudence’, in: C.C. Jalloh (ed.), The Sierra Leone Special Court and its Legacy (CUP 2014) 234; Pictet, J.S. (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary, Vol. IV: Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (ICRC 1958); Sandoz, Y., Swinarski, Ch. and Zimmermann, B. (eds.), ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 Aug. 1949 (ICRC 1987).

a) Introduction. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) prohibits outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment in international armed conflict. 614

The Preparatory Commission⁹⁷⁴ for the ICC defined the elements for the ‘[w]ar crime of outrages upon personal dignity’ under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) as: 615

‘1. The perpetrator humiliated or otherwise violated the dignity of one or more persons. 2. The severity of the humiliation, degradation or other violation was of such degree as to be generally recognized as an outrage upon personal dignity. 3. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an international armed conflict. 4. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict’⁹⁷⁵.

⁹⁶⁸ The Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and On Their Destruction was opened for signature at Ottawa 3 Dec. 1997 and entered into force on 1 Mar. 1999. As of 1 July 2014 there were 162 states parties to the Convention (see www.icbl.org). According to article 1 (1) of the Convention, each state party undertakes never under any circumstances to use anti-personnel mines. While the use of anti-personnel mines hardly was prohibited under customary international law at the time of the Rome Conference in June/July 1998, the number of states parties to the Ottawa Convention is considerable and continues to grow.

⁹⁶⁹ On 1 July 2015, 105 states were parties to the Protocol on Blinding Laser Weapons (Protocol IV) of 13 October 1995 to the 1980 UN Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons, which entered into force on 30 July 1998. Blinding laser weapons have become prohibited even before they had been integrated in the weapons arsenals of armed forces and used in armed conflict.

⁹⁷⁰ The Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction of 10 April 1972 entered into force in 1975, and had, as of 1 July 2015, 172 States Parties. Biological weapons are also prohibited by the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare of 17 June 1925 (with 137 States Parties as of 1 July 2015), see above.

⁹⁷¹ The Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction of 13 January 1993 (entry into force on 29 April 1997) had, as of 1 July 2014, 190 States Parties (www.opcw.org). This Convention reaffirms and strengthens in particular the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare of 17 June 1925.

⁹⁷² For an overview of the types of weapons that might be considered to be included, see also Křivánek, The Weapons Provisions (2010) 165 et seq.

⁹⁷³ See, e.g., L. Doswald-Beck/G.C. Cauderay, The development of new anti-personnel weapons, 279 IRevRC 565 (1990); ICRC, Weapons that may Cause Unnecessary Suffering or Have Indiscriminate Effects, Report of the Work of Experts (1973).

⁹⁷⁴ The Preparatory Commission for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court was established by resolution F of the Final Act, which adopted the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on 17 July 1998. One of the mandates Resolution F established for the commission was that ‘[t]he Commission shall prepare proposals for practical arrangements for the establishment and coming into operation of the Court, including draft texts of ... Elements of Crimes’.

⁹⁷⁵ Report of the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Addendum, Part II, Finalized Draft Text of the Elements of Crimes, PCNICC/2000/1/Add.2, p. 33 (2000) (hereinafter: Report of the Preparatory

A footnote to ‘persons’ under the first element clarified that the term may include persons who are dead. The Commission further clarified that:

‘[i]t is understood that the victim need not personally be aware of the existence of the humiliation or degradation or other violation. This element takes into account relevant aspects of the cultural background of the victim’.

This definition remained unchanged when the Elements of Crime were adopted at the 2010 Review Conference at Kampala⁹⁷⁶.

616 b) Bases in humanitarian law. The humanitarian law treaty basis of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) derives verbatim from common article 3 para. 1 (c) of the Geneva Conventions of 1949. Common the principle of respect for the human personality and guarantees of humane treatment, to situations of internal armed conflict⁹⁷⁷. The Pictet Commentary to common article 3 para. 1 proclaims that the violations under items (a) to (d), like those of article 27 of the Geneva Convention IV⁹⁷⁸, are prohibited ‘absolutely and permanently, no exceptions or excuses being tolerated’⁹⁷⁹. In specific regard to violations of outrages upon personal dignity, the provision proscribes acts that were committed frequently during World War II and that the world public opinion found particularly revolting⁹⁸⁰.

617 A similar proscription of outrages upon personal dignities exists in the Add. Prots. of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions. Article 4 para. 2 Add. Prot. II provides Fundamental Guarantees to all persons who do not take direct part in or have ceased to take part in the hostilities. The provision explicitly prohibits ‘outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault’⁹⁸¹. The Pictet Commentary to the Protocol underscores that article 4 para. 2 (e) reaffirms and supplements common article 3 para. 1 (c) of the Geneva Conventions of 1949⁹⁸². The non-exhaustive list of conduct implicitly proscribed by common article 3 para. 1 (c), explicitly banned under article 4 para. 2 (e) rape, enforced prostitution and indecent assaults of any kind, the latter being forbidden acts, given by way of example.

618 A further treaty basis for outrages upon personal dignity is found in Article 75 para. 2 Add. Prot. I. The provision closely follows the text of article 4 Add. Prot. II⁹⁸³. Article 75 para. 2 (b) reads, ‘outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault’. The ICRC Commentary to the Add. Prot. I acknowledges article 75 para. 2 (b)’s tie to both common article 3 and article 27 of Geneva Convention IV⁹⁸⁴.

In addition to treaty law, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) reposes on recognized general customary law. The Add. Prot. I and the Geneva Conventions, replete with common article 3 Commission); see <<http://daccess-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N00/724/27/PDF/N0072427.pdf?OpenElement>> accessed 19 Oct. 2014.

⁹⁷⁶ See <<http://www.icc-cpi.int/nr/rdonlyres/336923d8-a6ad-40ec-ad7b-45bf9de73d56/0/elementsofcrimeseng.pdf>> accessed 17 Oct. 2014.

⁹⁷⁷ The guarantee of humane treatment unites common article 3 with several provisions in the four Geneva Conventions, such as article 27, and articles 31–34 of GC IV.

⁹⁷⁸ Acknowledgement of an organic relationship between common article 3 and article 27 of GC IV is essential to any analysis of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) of the ICC Statute. The Commentary to common article 3 notes that ‘humane treatment’ must be understood within the meaning of article 27. Pictet (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary (1958), Article 27, 38. The meaning attributed to outrages against personal dignity will be discussed in the concluding paragraphs of this section.

⁹⁷⁹ Pictet (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary (1958), Article 27, 38.

⁹⁸⁰ Ibid.

⁹⁸¹ The phrase ‘rape, enforced prostitution and indecent assault of any kind’ derives directly from article 27 of the GC IV.

⁹⁸² Sandoz et al. (eds.), ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 Aug. 1949 (1987), mn 4539.

⁹⁸³ Ibid., mn 3037.

⁹⁸⁴ Ibid., mn 1048.

are accepted customary law. The ‘core of Protocol II’, most likely including article 4 para. 2 (e), are also, beyond doubt part of the corpus of customary law⁹⁸⁵.

The ICTY and the ICTR have similar subject matter jurisdiction over acts such as those proscribed in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) of the Rome Statute. Article 4 (e) of the ICTR Statute, reflective of article 4 para. 2 of the Add. Prot. II allows for prosecution of ‘outrages on personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and indecent assault of any kind’. By way of contrast, the ICTY Statute neither explicitly common article 3 nor enumerates outrages upon personal dignity. The Tadić Appellate Chamber, however, held that article 3 of the ICTY Statute acts as a residual clause and covers, inter alia violations of the laws or customs of war that are not enumerated, empowering the Tribunal to include common article 3 offences within its subject matter jurisdiction⁹⁸⁶. 619

The Statute for the Special Court for Sierra Leone also incorporates under its list of serious violations of common article 3: ‘Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault’⁹⁸⁷. 620

The Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal proscribes outrages upon personal dignity in all types of armed conflict. In article 13 (b) war crimes explicitly include: 621

‘...Serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in international armed conflict, within the established framework of international law, namely, any of the following acts: (21) Committing outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment’⁹⁸⁸.

Under article 13 (c) it is underscored that outrages upon personal dignity is applied:

‘in cases of an armed conflict ... [when] committed against persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention or any other cause’.

c) Actus Reus. Acts potentially encompassed within article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) can readily be examined under the root principles of Geneva Law that prompted the drafting of common article 3 para. 1 (c), as well as article 4 para. 2 (e) Add. Prot. II, and article 75 para. 2 (b). Accordingly, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) is determined by overriding principle of humane treatment, as articulated in article 27 of Geneva Convention IV⁹⁸⁹. The Pictet Commentary to article 27, noted that what constitutes humane treatment – the correct way to behave towards a human being – flowed from the principles of respect. Clearly outrages on personal dignity originate out of this comprehensive respect for the person, honour, and family rights as recognized by the Geneva Conventions. 622

However, the Pictet Commentary to article 27 warned that: 623

‘It seems useless and even dangerous to attempt to make a list of all the factors that make treatment “humane”’⁹⁹⁰.

The drafters of common article 3 para. 1 (c) refrained from inserting a finite list that constituted outrages upon personal dignity. The now famous caveat in regard to torture also rationalized the conceptual, rather than detailed, nature of subsection (c). 624

‘However great the care taken in drawing up a list of all the various forms of infliction, it would never be possible to catch up with the imagination of future torturers who wished to satisfy their bestial instincts; and the more specific and complete a list tries to be, the more restrictive it becomes.

⁹⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 Oct. 1995, para. 117.

⁹⁸⁶ Tadić (Appeals Chamber Decision), see note 989, para. 69, whereby the Appeals Chamber held that protections of common article 3 apply through article 3 (of the ICTY Statute) to persons taking no active part in hostilities.

⁹⁸⁷ Article 3 (e), Statute for the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

⁹⁸⁸ Article 13 (b), Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal.

⁹⁸⁹ See Pictet (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary (1958), Article 27, 38: ‘What [common] Article 3 guarantees such person is humane treatment. We shall explain later, when discussing Article 27, the sense in which ‘humane treatment’ should be understood’.

⁹⁹⁰ Pictet (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary (1958), Article 27, 204.

The form of wording adopted is flexible, and at the same time, precise. The same is true of item (c)⁹⁹¹. (emphasis added).

625 The Commentary to article 75 para. 2 (b) Add. Prot. I confirms that outrages on personal dignity are not confined to specific acts, but:

‘refers to acts which, without directly causing harm to the integrity and physical and mental well-being of persons, are aimed at humiliating and ridiculing them, or even forcing them to perform degrading acts’⁹⁹².

626 In paragraph two, article 27 of Geneva Convention IV introduces the phrase ‘rape, enforced prostitution and indecent assault of any kind’ to illustrate acts that are inconsistent with human treatment. Respective provisions of the Additional Protocols included versions of the article 27 phrase to typify what is considered inhumane conduct. But neither Protocol attempts to name each act proscribed by outrages on personal dignity, nor could a finite list encompass ‘indecent assault of any kind’.

627 Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) of the Statute does not incorporate the language of article 27 of Geneva Convention IV, ‘rape, enforced prostitution and indecent assault of any kind’. It appears to intentionally use the common article 3 language, rather than the expanded wording of the Additional Protocols. The Statute of the Iraq Special Tribunal also lists rape and other acts of sexual violence of ‘comparable gravity’ separately, immediately following its article 13 (c)⁹⁹³. However, the drafting intent allows one to confidently assume that the scope of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), deliberately encompasses a wide range of inhumane acts.

628 ICTY and ICTR jurisprudence has shed light on acts incorporated within the meaning of outrages upon personal dignity, humiliating and degrading treatment. In the *Prosecutor v. Akayesu*⁹⁹⁴, the first case to opine on the actus reus of outrages upon personal dignity, the Trial Chamber held that sexual violence of many different levels may be classified as outrages upon personal dignity, and that such violence need not be limited to physical invasion of the body or even physical contact. The Akayesu Trial Chamber held that where the accused ordered the Interhamwe to undress a student and force her to perform gymnastics in a public courtyard, sexual violence that could qualify as an outrage upon personal dignity had occurred⁹⁹⁵.

629 In the *Prosecutor v. Furundžija*⁹⁹⁶ the Trial Chamber convicted the accused of torture and ‘outrages upon personal dignity, including rape’, as incorporated through article 3 of the ICTY Statute. The accused, a commander of the Jokers, a special Herceg-Bosna military force, arrested and then interrogated a civilian Muslim woman at the Jokers’ Headquarters. During the interrogation the woman was subjected to rapes, death threats, and threats of sexual mutilation. She was forced to swallow the body fluids and eat the human waste of a physical perpetrator. The Trial Chamber held that:

‘The general principle of respect for human dignity ... is intended to shield human beings from outrages upon their personal dignity, whether such outrages are carried out by unlawfully attacking the body or by humiliating and debasing the honour, the self-respect or the mental well being of a person’⁹⁹⁷.

‘... [S]exual assaults were committed publicly; members of the Jokers were watching and milling around the door of the pantry. They laughed at what was going on. The Trial Chamber finds that

⁹⁹¹ Ibid., 39.

⁹⁹² Ibid., Article 75 para. 2 (b). These crimes directly cause harm to the physical and mental well-being of persons.

⁹⁹³ Pictet (ed.), The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: Commentary (1958), Article 27, ‘(22) Committing rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity’.

⁹⁹⁴ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para. 688.

⁹⁹⁵ Ibid.

⁹⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 Dec. 1998.

⁹⁹⁷ Ibid., para. 183.

Witness A suffered severe physical and mental pain along with public humiliation, ... in what amounted to outrages upon her personal dignity and sexual integrity⁹⁹⁸.

The interpretation suggests that outrages upon personal dignity result from separate physical and mental pain of sexual abuse.

In the *Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al.*⁹⁹⁹ the Trial Chamber found the Accused guilty of 630 outrages against personal dignity. The Kunarac Trial held and subsequently the Kunarac Appeals Chamber confirmed that the specific acts of rape, compelling victims to dance naked on a table, and lending and selling victims to other men were all properly characterized as outrages upon personal dignity¹⁰⁰⁰. The Trial Chamber expressed the view that the acts must cause ‘serious humiliation or degradation to the victim’ there is no requirement that such suffering be ‘lasting’. There is, however, no minimum temporal element to the offence¹⁰⁰¹. If the humiliation were extremely fleeting it might be difficult to prove it was serious.

The Kunarac Trial Chamber also held that outrages upon personal dignity should be 631 evaluated on an objective rather than a subjective basis. The humiliation must be of such intensity that any reasonable person would be outraged¹⁰⁰². The crime requires:

‘(i) that the accused intentionally committed or participated in an act or an omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity, and (ii) that he knew that the act or omission could have that effect’¹⁰⁰³.

The Kunarac Appeals Chamber upheld this ‘objective threshold’, and reaffirmed that the 632 Trial Chamber was under no obligation to define the specific acts which may constitute outrages upon personal dignity¹⁰⁰⁴. Notably, in defining the elements of article 8 (2) (b) (xxi), the Preparatory Commission for the ICC supported the idea that there should be an objective threshold for determining if an outrage upon personal dignity has occurred.

Other ICTY and ICTR cases have ruled that using detainees as human shields or trench 633 diggers; forcing detainees to relieve bodily functions in their clothing; imposing conditions of constant fear of being subjected to physical, mental, or sexual violence on detainees; forced incest; burying corpses in latrine pits; leaving infants without care after killing their guardians; and removing a fetus from the womb comprise outrages upon personal dignity¹⁰⁰⁵.

In the *Prosecutor v. Delalić et al.*¹⁰⁰⁶ the indictment did contain charges of outrages upon 634 personal dignity, but rather charged several counts on ‘inhuman treatment’ and ‘cruel treatment’, that the Trial Chamber deemed violated ‘the respect for human dignity’¹⁰⁰⁷. The Delalić Judgment held the following acts to constitute an attack on one’s human dignity: forcing a father and son to physically beat each other¹⁰⁰⁸, leading detainees to plead for mercy so as not to be stunned by an electric cattle prod¹⁰⁰⁹, or; forcing brothers to perform oral sex on each other before other prisoners¹⁰¹⁰. These acts are likely to fall within the perimeter of outrages upon personal dignity within the meaning of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi).

Even though many cases involving rape and outrages upon personal dignity in the past 635 have dealt with crimes committed against women, however, the publicity and scandal

⁹⁹⁸ Ibid., para. 272.

⁹⁹⁹ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T & IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 Feb. 2001, para. 568.

¹⁰⁰⁰ Kunarac et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1003, para. 159.

¹⁰⁰¹ Kunarac et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1003, para. 501.

¹⁰⁰² Kunarac et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1003, paras. 504–506.

¹⁰⁰³ Kunarac et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1003, para. 514.

¹⁰⁰⁴ Kunarac et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1003, paras. 162–163.

¹⁰⁰⁵ See Prosecutor v. Bagosora, ICTR-96-7, Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, Trial Chamber, 2 Feb. 2005, para. 40 and fn. 84 (in which this ICTR Trial Chamber cites examples from Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 25 June 1999, para. 229 and Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 Nov. 2001, para. 173).

¹⁰⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 Nov. 1998.

¹⁰⁰⁷ Delalić et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1010, para. 544.

¹⁰⁰⁸ Delalić et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1010, paras. 1067–1070.

¹⁰⁰⁹ Delalić et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1010, paras. 1052–1059.

¹⁰¹⁰ Delalić et al. (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1010, paras. 1062–1066.

surrounding the humiliation of male prisoners in Abu Ghraib provides a vivid reminder that men also need the protection of such laws. In commenting on the sexual poses that male prisoners were forced to assume, the New Yorker observed:

‘Such dehumanization is unacceptable in any culture, but is especially so in the Arab world. Homosexual acts are against Islamic law and it is humiliating for men to be naked in front of other men, Bernard Haykel, a professor of Middle Eastern studies at New York University, explained ‘Being put on top of each other and forced to masturbate, being naked in front of each other – it’s all a form of torture...’¹⁰¹¹.

636 Cases involving male sexual assault, including sexual humiliation will certainly be justiciable under the safeguards of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi).

637 Although Furundžija did not distinguish outrageous acts between physical components of sexual violence, such as oral rape, and non-physical components of sexual violence, such as forced nudity or public display, when determining what constitutes outrages upon personal dignity Bagasora, Aleksovski, Kunarac and Akayesu affirmed that acts not of a sexual nature readily violate the prohibition. A finer analysis might evolve from the jurisprudence of the ICC when one considers the article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) compared to specific acts prohibited in subparagraph (xxii). The latter lists ‘rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization or other form of sexual violence also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions, and thus separates them from outrages upon personal dignity’¹⁰¹².

638 Although the Trial Chamber held that the circumstances must be coercive, it held that such coercion ‘may be inherent in certain circumstances, such as armed conflict’¹⁰¹³.

639 The SCSL confirmed and solidified the gender’s jurisprudence of ICTR and ICTY in its considerations of the war crime of outrages against personal dignity¹⁰¹⁴. Based on the appeal judgement v. Kunarac et al. and the ICC’s elements of crime, the Trial Chambers of SCSL in the AFRC, RUF and Taylor cases adopted similar elements of crime:

- i. The perpetrator humiliated, degraded or otherwise violated the personal dignity of the victim;
- ii. The humiliation, degradation or other violation was so serious as to be generally considered as an outrage upon personal dignity;
- iii. The perpetrator intentionally committed or participated in an act or omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity; and
- iv. The perpetrator knew that the act or omission could have such an effect.¹⁰¹⁵

640 In the Prosecutor v. Taylor the Trial Chamber considered ‘that sexual slavery, including abduction of women and girls as ‘bush wives’, a conjugal form of sexual slavery, is humiliating and degrading to its victims and constitutes a serious attack on human dignity, falling within the scope of outrages upon personal dignity’¹⁰¹⁶ and found the Accused guilty of such outrages upon personal dignity. Based on the Kunarac judgement the RUF judgement holds that ‘the actus reus of the offence is that there was an act or omission that caused serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise violated the personal dignity of the victim. The second element reflects that determination ... must be based on an objective assessment. It is not necessary that the act cause ‘lasting suffering’ to the victim’.¹⁰¹⁷

641 The relevance of the SCSL’s considerations of the war crime of outrages upon personal dignity on one hand side lies in the fact that it was largely supportive of already-existing ¹⁰¹¹ Hersh (10 May 2004) The New Yorker.

¹⁰¹² The separation of acts between article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) and article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) apparently is a deliberate attempt by the drafters to remove any connotation of the harm inflicted by sexual violence being focused on the shame, loss of honor or moral turpitude of the victim/survivor or that persons family.

¹⁰¹³ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 Sep. 1998, para. 688.

¹⁰¹⁴ Oosterveld, in: Jalloh (ed.), The Sierra Leone Special Court and Its Legacy (2014) 234, 253.

¹⁰¹⁵ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 431 with fn 1044.

¹⁰¹⁶ Taylor (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1019, para. 432.

¹⁰¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 2 March 2009 (RUF Judgment), para. 176. See also Prosecutor v. Brima, Kamara and Kanu, SCSL 04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 20 June 2007, para. 716, 718 and 719.

jurisprudence of the ICTY¹⁰¹⁸ on the matter. On the other hand, especially the Taylor Judgment provided important additional detail to the jurisprudence: In this Judgment the Chamber found that the specific act of sexual slavery amounted to an outrage of personal dignity, and that an outrage upon personal dignity could be aggravated by the addition of public element, such as rape in front of family members; or an additional element which deepens the humiliation and degradation, such as forced undressing prior to rape; or insertion of an object into the victim's vagina after the rape or gang rape¹⁰¹⁹.

Though, in Taylor the Chamber also took a very strict approach and did not consider evidence of sexual violence other than rape and sexual slavery under outrages upon personal dignity as the Prosecution did not provide notice to the Accused 'that any other forms of sexual violence were charged under this count'¹⁰²⁰. 641

d) Mens rea. In its General Introduction, the ICC Commission stated that for each material element there is a requirement of intent and knowledge (unless otherwise stated), and such a mens rea may be inferred through relevant circumstances and facts. Where value judgements are involved (the Commission gives examples such as 'inhumane' or 'severe') there is no need for the perpetrator to have 'personally completed a particular value judgement'¹⁰²¹. Arguably, 'outrage' is another such value judgement where this would not be necessary. 643

Certain aspects of the ICTY's jurisprudence on the mens rea of the prohibition of outrages upon personal dignity might supplement the Commission's general mens rea requirement. In the Aleksovski Appeals Judgment the appellant's contention that the mens rea of required specific intent was answered thus: 644

In particular, the Appeals Chamber does not interpret the observation in the ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols, that the term 'outrages upon personal dignity' refers to acts 'aimed at humiliating and ridiculing' the victim, [FN71] as necessarily supporting a requirement of a specific intent on the part of a perpetrator to humiliate, ridicule or degrade the victims. The statement seems simply to describe the conduct which the provision seeks to prevent. The Trial Chamber's indication that the mens rea of the offence is the 'intent to humiliate or ridicule' the victim [FN72] may therefore impose a requirement that the Prosecution was not obliged to prove and the Appeals Chamber does not, by rejecting this ground of appeal, endorse that particular conclusion¹⁰²².

The appellant further raised the issues of whether a discriminatory intent comprised part of the requirement of the mens rea of outrages upon personal dignity. Again, the ground was denied because: 645

'... the Appeals Chamber finds that it is not an element of offences under Article 3 of the Statute, nor of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity, that the perpetrator had a discriminatory intent or motive'¹⁰²³.

The Aleksovski Appeals Chamber, nonetheless, clarified that evidence of discrimination might be further proof of the perpetrators intent or knowledge, holding: 646

'This does not mean that evidence that an accused who had responsibility for detention conditions discriminated between detainees in the conditions and facilities provided would be irrelevant. If, because of deliberate discrimination between detainees, poor conditions of detention affect only one group or class of detainees, while other detainees enjoy adequate detention conditions, this is evidence which could contribute to a finding that the mens rea of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity is satisfied'¹⁰²⁴.

¹⁰¹⁸ I.e. the Kunarac Appeal Judgment.

¹⁰¹⁹ Oosterveld, in: Jalloh (ed.), The Sierra Leone Special Court and Its Legacy (2014) 234, 254; Taylor (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1019, 1196.

¹⁰²⁰ Taylor (Trial Chamber Judgment), see note 1019, para. 1194; Oosterveld, in: Jalloh (ed.), The Sierra Leone Special Court and Its Legacy (2014) 234, 254.

¹⁰²¹ Report of the Preparatory Commission, see note 979, p. 18.

¹⁰²² Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-AR77, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 30 May 2001, para. 27.

¹⁰²³ Aleksovski (Appeals Chamber Judgment), see note 1026, para. 28.

¹⁰²⁴ Aleksovski (Appeals Chamber Judgment), see note 1026, para. 27, fn. 73.

647 outrages upon personal dignity, the Aleksovski Appeals Chamber concluded that an outrage against personal dignity might be motivated ‘by contempt for the human dignity of another person’; however, it does not make such a motivation an element of the offence to be proved beyond reasonable doubt. The Defendant in the Kunarac case argued that to be found guilty of the crime he must have known his actions would (not just could) have the effect of serious humiliation. The Kunarac Appeals Chamber, however, again supported the Trial Chamber’s reasoning:

‘As the relevant act or omission for an outrage upon personal dignity is an act or omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity, an accused must know that his act or omission is of that character – i. e., that it could cause serious humiliation, degradation or affront to human dignity. This is not the same as requiring that the accused knew of the actual consequences of the act’¹⁰²⁵.

648 Furthermore, both the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber concurred that rarely would the nature of an accused’s knowledge be an issue, since once the objective threshold is met it would be difficult for the Defendant to argue that he or she did not have the same awareness as any reasonable person in the given situation¹⁰²⁶.

649 Confirming the ICTY Kunarac and Aleksovski Judgments the SCSL Trial Chamber recognised in its RUF Judgment that ‘the mens rea does not require that the Accused had a specific intent to humiliate or degrade the victims’, but that ‘the act or omission must, however, have been done intentionally and that the Accused must have known that his act or omission could cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity’. The Chamber considered that there is neither a ‘requirement to establish that the Accused knew of the actual consequences of the act, but only of its possible consequences’ nor that there is an ‘additional requirement to establish that the Accused had a discriminatory intent or motive’¹⁰²⁷.

650 In its Article 8 War Crimes Introduction, the Commission also explains that in regard to the mens rea regarding an international conflict, the perpetrator only need be aware of the factual circumstances that established the armed conflict. There is no need for awareness of facts that make it international or non-international, or for any legal judgement regarding an armed conflict or its international or non-international character.

651 The foregoing commentary on outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating or degrading treatment extends to internal armed conflict under article 8 para. 2 (c) (ii)¹⁰²⁸.

22. Paragraph 2(b)(xxii): Rape and other forms of sexual violence

Literature: Ambos, K., ‘Sexual offences in International Criminal Law, with a special focus on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court’, in: M. Bergsmo et al. (eds.), Understanding and Proving International Sex Crimes (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 143; Ambos, K., ‘The first Judgment of the International Criminal Court (Prosecutor v. Lubanga): A comprehensive analysis of the Legal Issues’ (2012) 12 ICLRev 115; Ambos, K., ‘Thematic Investigations and Prosecution of International Sex Crimes: Some Critical Comments from

¹⁰²⁵ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T & IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 Feb. 2001, para. 512; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, paras. 165–166.

¹⁰²⁶ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T & IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 Feb. 2001, para. 513.

¹⁰²⁷ See Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, para. 177.

¹⁰²⁸ Report of the Preparatory Commission, see note 979, 39. The elements for article 8 (2) (c) (ii) are ‘1. The perpetrator humiliated, degraded or otherwise violated the dignity of one or more persons. 2. The severity of the humiliation, degradation, or other violation was of such degree as to be generally recognized as an outrage upon personal dignity. 3. Such person or persons were either hors de combat, or were civilians, medical personnel or religious personnel taking no active part in the hostilities. 4. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established this status. 5. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an armed conflict not of an international character. 6. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict’. A footnote attached to ‘persons’ is identical to the one attached to the parallel element in article 8 (2) (b) (xxi).

a Theoretical and Comparative Perspective', in: M. Bergsmo, Thematic Prosecution of International Sex Crimes (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 291; Kelly D. Askin, War Crimes Against Women (1997); Christine Chinkin, Rape and Sexual Abuse of Women in International Law, 5 EJIL 326 (1994); Cohen, D., 'Prosecuting Sexual Violence from Tokyo to the ICC', in: M. Bergsmo et al. (eds.), Understanding and Proving International Sex Crimes (2012) 13; Buss, D., 'Learning our lessons? The Rwanda Tribunal record on prosecuting rape', in: C. McGlynn and V.E. Munro (eds.), Rethinking Rape Law. International and Comparative Perspectives (Routledge 2010) 61; Rhonda Copelon, 'Surfacing Gender: Re-Engraving Crimes Against Women in Humanitarian Law', 5 HastingsWomen'sLJ 2, 243 (1994); Sharon A. Healey, 'Prosecuting Rape under the Statute of the War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia', 21 BrookJIL 2, 327 (1995); Gekker, E., 'Rape, Sexual Slavery, and Forced Marriage at the International Criminal Court: How Katanga utilizes a ten-year-old rule but overlooks new jurisprudence' (2014) 25 HastingsWomen'sLJ 105; Greijer, S., 'Thematic Prosecutions for Crimes against Children' in: M. Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations of International Sex Crimes (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 137; Grewal, K., 'The Protection of Sexual Autonomy under International Criminal Law. The International Criminal Court and the Challenge of Defining Rape' (2012) 10 JICJ 373; Herring, J. and Dempsey, M.M., 'Rethinking the criminal law's response to sexual penetration. On theory and context', in: C. McGlynn and V.E. Munro (eds.), Rethinking Rape Law. International and Comparative Perspectives (Routledge 2010) 30; ICC-OTP, 'Strategic plan June 2012–2015' (October 2013); ICC-OTP, 'Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender Based Crimes' (June 2014); ICTR-OTP, 'Prosecution of sexual violence – Best practices manual for the investigation and prosecution of sexual violence crimes in post-conflict regions: Lessons learned from the Office of the Prosecutor for the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda' (30 January 2014); Koeing, A., Lincoln, R. and Groth, L., 'The jurisprudence of sexual violence' (May 2011) Working Paper of the Sexual Violence and Accountability Project, Human Rights Center/University of California, Berkeley < http://www.law.berkeley.edu/HRCweb/pdfs/SVA_Jurisprudence.pdf > accessed 22 January 2015; Françoise Krill, 'The Protection of Women in International Humanitarian Law', 249 IRRC 337 (1985); Theodor Meron, 'Rape as a Crime under International Humanitarian Law', 87 AJIL 424 (1993); Luping, D., 'Investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based crimes before the International Criminal Court' (2009) 17 AmUJGenderSocialPol&L 431; Maystre, M. and Rangel, N., 'Analytical and comparative digest of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL jurisprudence on international sex crimes', in: M. Bergsmo et al. (eds.), Understanding and Proving International Sex Crimes (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 511; Mischkowski, G. and Mlinarevic, G., "...and that it does not happen to anyone anywhere in the world' The trouble with rape trials – Views of witnesses, prosecutors and judges on prosecuting sexualized violence during the war in the former Yugoslavia' (medica mondiale 2009) < http://www.medica-mondiale.org/fileadmin/redaktion/5_Service/Mediathek/Dokumente/English/Documentations_studies/medica_mondiale_and_that_it_does_not_happen_to_anyone_anywhere_in_the_world_english_complete_version_dec_2009.pdf > accessed 29 January 2015; Mouthaan, S., 'Sexual violence against men and international law – Criminalizing the Unmentionable' (2013) 13 ICLRev 65; Mouthaan, S., 'The prosecution of gender based crimes at the ICC: Challenges and opportunities' (2011) 11 ICLRev 775; Olugbuo, B.C., 'Thematic prosecution of international sex crimes and stigmatization of victims and survivors: Two Sides of the same coin?', in: M. Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations of International Sex Crimes (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 109; Sellers, P.V., 'The prosecution of sexual violence in conflict: The importance of human rights as means of interpretation' (2007) < http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Women/WRGS/Paper_Prosecution_of_Sexual_Violence.pdf > accessed 29 January 2015; Stahn, C., 'Justice delivered or justice denied? The legacy of the Katanga judgement' (2014) 12 JICJ 809; Dorothy Q. Thomas/Regan E. Ralph, Rape in War: Challenging the Tradition of Impunity, 14 SAISRev 81 (1994); Tamara L. Tompkins, 'Prosecuting Rape as a War Crime: Speaking the Unspeakable', 70 NotreDameLRev 847 (1995); United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations, Review of the sexual violence elements of the judgements of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, and the Special Court for Sierra Leone in the light of Security Council Resolution 1820 (United Nations 2010); United Nations General Assembly/Security Council, 'Conflict-related sexual violence. Report of the Secretary General' A66/657-S/2012/33, 13 January 2012; Wildermuth, P. and Kneuer, P., 'Addressing the challenges to prosecution of sexual violence crimes before International Tribunals and Courts', in: M. Bergsmo et al. (eds.), Understanding and Proving International Sex Crimes (2012) 65; Women's Initiative for Gender Justice, 'ICC partially convicts Katanga in third trial judgement, acquitting Katanga of rape and sexual slavery' (May 2014) Legal Eye On The ICC < <http://www.iccwomen.org/WI-LegalEye5-14/LegalEye5-14.html#1> > accessed 30 January 2015.

a) Humanitarian law base and drafting history. The inclusion of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) 652 – as well as the almost identical parallel provisions in article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi) and article 7 para. 1 (g)¹⁰²⁹ – with its list of progressively defined crimes of sexual violence constituted a great advance for the protection of the rights of women in times of armed conflict¹⁰³⁰. The list reflects a new awareness about the seriousness of these sexual offenses in times of armed conflict and the fact that they frequently remained unpunished. Delegations at the Rome Conference were determined to signal to the world that such violence amounts to most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole that must not go unpunished. The progressive list and definition of the offenses relating to sexual violence is not least the result of sustained lobbying by the women's rights movement.

¹⁰²⁹ Despite the deviating contextual elements of war crimes under article 8 para. 2 (e) and crimes against humanity under article 7, these three provisions are to be interpreted identically; see Ambos, in Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 143, 151.

¹⁰³⁰ For an analysis and evaluation of the offences of sexual violence under the Rome Statute and/or their drafting history, see generally K. D. Askin, Sexual Violence in Decisions and Indictments of the Yugoslav and Rwandan Tribunals: Current Status, 93 AJIL 97 (1999); B. Bedont/K. Hall-Martinez, Ending Impunity for Gender

653 In prior humanitarian law codifications, rape and other forms of sexual violence were not articulated as such and had to be subsumed under general forms of mistreatment such as 'inhuman and degrading treatment' or 'wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health' and the relating nonspecific war crimes¹⁰³¹. These general offenses however do not recognize or might even trivialize the specific physical and often particularly acute long-term psychological harm and social stigma caused by sexual violence such as rape. Also, the criminalization of these general forms of mistreatment does not signal specifically and unmistakably that sexual violence is intolerable under any circumstances, including in armed conflict situations.

654 It was therefore deemed crucial by women's rights advocates as well as the delegations in Rome that rape and the other forms of sexual violence eventually listed are recognized by the Rome Statute as war crimes in their own right and as being equally serious as other forms of violence criminalized under international humanitarian law. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) gives a clear signal to the ICC Prosecutor that such forms of violence also need to be prosecuted. There is no longer any need to establish that the sexual conduct concerned can be subsumed under a generic form of mistreatment. Moreover, the Rome Statute confirms that rape and other forms of sexual violence may also amount to grave breaches subject to universal jurisdiction¹⁰³².

Crimes under the International Criminal Court, 6 BrownJWorldAff 1, 65 (1999); J. G. Gardam/M. J. Jarvis, Women, Armed Conflict And International Law (2001); D. M. Koenig/K. D. Askin, International criminal law and the International Criminal Court Statute: crimes against women, in: D. M. Askin/K. D. Koenig (eds.), Women And International Human Rights Law (2000); B. S. Moshan, Women, War, and Words: The Gender Component in the Permanent International Criminal Court's Definition of Crimes against Humanity, 22 FordhamILJ 154 (1998); C. Möller, Das tatbestandliche Verbot sexueller Gewalt in bewaffneten Konflikten: Von den 'Lieber Instructions' zum Vertragsstatut von Rom, 18 Sicherheit und Frieden 36 (2000); V. Oosterveld, 'The Making of a Gender-Sensitive International Criminal Court', 1 ILF 38 (1999); P. Viseur Sellers, 'The Context of Sexual Violence: Sexual Violence as violations of International Humanitarian Law', in: G. Kirk McDonald/O. Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive And Procedural Aspects Of International Criminal Law The Experience Of International And National Courts (2000). A useful resource in particular on more recent developments regarding sexual offenses under ICC jurisdiction is available at <http://iccwomen.org>.

¹⁰³¹ On the prohibition of sexual violence in international humanitarian and relating war crimes law prior to the adoption of the Rome Statute, see generally K. D. Askin, 'War Crimes Against Women: Prosecution In International War Crimes Tribunals' (1997); Askin (1999) 93 AJIL 97; C. Chinkin, 'Rape and Sexual Abuse of Women in International Law', 5 EJIL 326 (1994); R. Copelon, 'Surfacing Gender: Re-Engraving Crimes Against Women in Humanitarian Law', 5 HastingsWomen'sLJ 2, 243 (1994); K. Fitzgerald, 'Problems Of Prosecution and Adjudication of Rape and Other Sexual Assaults under International Law', 8 EJIL 638 (1997); S. A. Healey, 'Prosecuting Rape under the Statute of the War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia', 21 BrookJIL 2, 327 (1995); F. Krill, 'The Protection of Women in International Humanitarian Law', 249 IRRC 337 (1985); Th. Meron, 'Rape as a Crime under International Humanitarian Law', 87 AJIL 3, 424 (1993); D. Q. Thomas/R. E. Ralph, 'Rape in War: Challenging the Tradition of Impunity', 14 SAISRev 81 (1994); T. L. Tompkins, 'Prosecuting Rape as a War Crime: Speaking the Unspeakable', 70 NotreDameLRev 847 (1995); Sellers, in: McDonald/Swaak-Goldman (eds.), Substantive and Procedural Aspects of ICL (2000); M. T. A. Wilbers, 'Sexual abuse in times of armed conflict', 7 LeidenJIL 43 (1994). See also K. D. Askin, 'Women and International Humanitarian Law', in: K. D. Askin/D. M. Koenig (eds.) Women's Human Rights: A Reference Guide (1999); C. Chinkin, 'Women, the Forgotten Victims of Armed Conflict?', in: H. Durham/T. L. H. McCormack (eds.) The Changing Face Of Conflict And Efficacy Of International Humanitarian Law (1999); J. G. Gardam/H. Charlesworth, 'Protection of Women in Armed Conflict', 22 HumRQ 1, 148 (2000); R. Coomaraswamy/L. M. Kois, 'Violence Against Women', in: K. D. Askin/D. M. Koenig (eds.) Women's Human Rights: A Reference Guide (1999); D. Buss, 'Prosecuting Mass Rape: Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic', 10 Feminist Legal Studies 91 (2002); Möller, Das tatbestandliche Verbot sexueller Gewalt in bewaffneten Konflikten (2000) 36. For an updated list of article on women's issues in international humanitarian law, see also <http://www.law-lib.utoronto.ca/Diana/>.

¹⁰³² This results in particular from the drafting history of the Rome Statute as well as the Elements of Crimes and the state views expressed at the negotiations, and, arguably, also from the last part of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii).

Today, it is widely recognized that rape and other forms of sexual violence committed in armed conflict amount to war crimes as well as grave breaches. This however is a rather new development. Before, rape was sometimes seen as a natural consequence of war and military commanders, at times despite formal prohibitions, allowed or implicitly acquiesced to their troops' practice or even 'right' to rape the women of the adversary as a reward for fighting¹⁰³³. Even in more recent conflicts, rape has been used as a means of warfare, war strategy or policy¹⁰³⁴, and troops committing sexual violence were only infrequently prosecuted and punished. In the conflict in Yugoslavia in the 1990s, rape and forced pregnancy were utilized as instruments of targeted ethnic cleansing¹⁰³⁵. Similarly, systematic sexual crimes, especially rapes, during the genocide in Rwanda in 1994 were identified as a constituent part of the genocidal conduct.¹⁰³⁶

However, towards the end of the 20th century, it has been increasingly recognized that rape is both a war crime and a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions. Many national military codes prohibited and criminalized rape by soldiers in the early 20th century or even earlier. Article 44 of the 1863 Lieber Code prohibited 'all rape ... under the penalty of death'¹⁰³⁷. Article 46 Hague Regulations also stipulated the respect of '[f]amily honour and rights' which sometimes has been interpreted as (indirectly) prohibiting sexual violence.

As regards the criminalization of sexual violence on an international level, rape and the '[a]bduction of girls and women for the purpose of enforced prostitution' were included in the list of violations of the laws and customs of war prepared by the Responsibilities Commission of the 1919 Paris Peace Conference¹⁰³⁸. Nonetheless, rape or other forms of sexual violence were not specifically included under the jurisdiction of the Nuremberg and Tokyo International Military Tribunals and were not specifically charted in the indictments nor prosecuted, even though such offenses have been reported and documented, while article II para. 1 (c) Control Council Law No. 10 included rape as a crime against humanity. Rapes of civilian women and medical personnel were however prosecuted successfully in Tokyo under the categories of 'inhumane treatment', 'ill-treatment' and 'failure to respect family honour and rights'. More particularly, the then Foreign Minister Hirota and Generals Toyoda and Matsui were convicted by the Tokyo Tribunal for command responsibility for violations of the laws or customs of war committed by their soldiers in Nanking, which included widespread rapes and sexual assaults, and the US Military Commission convicted Yamashita for command responsibility for rape as a war crime¹⁰³⁹.

¹⁰³³ One well-known example of sexual violence in armed conflict has been the institutionalization of sexual slavery by the Japanese Army during World War II. Already in the 17th century, Grotius stated that whoever committed rape, 'even in war, should everywhere be subject to punishment', pointing out, however, that in many places the raping of women in time of war was considered permissible, Grotius, Rights of War (2005) 657, Third Book, Fourth Chapter. See also Askin, War Crimes against Women (1997) 18 et seq.

¹⁰³⁴ See, e.g., Askin, War Crimes against Women (1997) 274; United Nations General Assembly/Security Council, 'Conflict-related sexual violence. Report of the Secretary General' A/66/657-S/2012/33, 13 January 2012, paras. 5, 17–57; United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations, Review of the sexual violence elements of the judgements of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL (United Nations 2010).

¹⁰³⁵ See, e.g., Final Report of the Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), UN Doc. S/1994/674 (27 May 1994), section IV.F. and Annex IX and IXA; Askin, War Crimes against Women (1997) 273–287.

¹⁰³⁶ Prosecutor v. Seromba, No. ICTR-2001-66-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 March 2008, para. 46; see also Ambos, in Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 143, 170 with fn 138; see also Prosecutor v. Karemera and Ntirumpats, No. ICTR-98-44-T, Judgment and Sentence, Trial Chamber III, 2 February 2012, paras. 1666–1668.

¹⁰³⁷ See also article 47 Lieber Code of 1863, reprinted in: Schindler/Toman (eds.), Laws of Armed Conflict (1988) 10.

¹⁰³⁸ See also Askin, War Crimes against Women (1997) 42–45.

¹⁰³⁹ See Askin, War Crimes against Women (1997) 164–203; B. V. A. Röling/C. F. Rüter (eds.), 1 The Tokyo Judgment: The International Military Tribunal For The Far East, Apr. 29, 12. Nov. 1946, 1948, at 385 (1977); B. V. Röling/C. F. Rüter (eds.), II The Tokyo Judgment, 965, 971–972, 988–989 (1977). In the Yamashita case, the US Military Commission stated that 'where murder and rape ... are widespread offences, and there is no effective attempt by a commander to discover and control the criminal acts, such a commander may be held

Several national laws criminalize rape and other forms of sexual violence such as forced prostitution committed in connection with an armed conflict situation as a war crime¹⁰⁴⁰.

- 658 After WW II, article 27 para. 2 GC IV provided that '[w]omen shall be especially protected against any attack on their honour, in particular against rape, enforced prostitution, or any form of indecent assault'. Article 75 para. 2 (b) Add. Prot. I prohibits 'outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault',¹⁰⁴¹ while article 76 adds particular provisions on the protection of women: '1. Women shall be the object of special respect and shall be protected in particular against rape, forced prostitution and any other form of indecent assault. 2. Pregnant women and mothers having dependent infants who are arrested, detained or interned for reasons related to the armed conflict, shall have their cases considered with the utmost priority...'
- 659 However, these instruments characterize the named forms of sexual violence merely as an attack on the honor of women or other individuals and do not include such violence as grave breaches in their own rights nor specify that they may amount to specific grave breaches, failing to treat and specifically address them as most serious crimes of violence.
- 660 The non-binding UN General Assembly Resolution 3318 of 14 December 1974 contained a 'Declaration on the Protection of Women and Children in Emergency and Armed Conflict', which called on states to make '[a]ll efforts ... to spare women and children from the ravages of war', proclaiming that '[a]ll forms of repression and cruel and inhuman treatment of women and children ... committed by belligerents in the course of military operations or in occupied territories shall be considered criminal'.
- 661 In the 1990s, it became increasingly recognized that rape and other forms of sexual violence may amount to war crimes and grave breaches such as 'torture', 'inhuman treatment', and 'wilfully causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or health'¹⁰⁴². Of particular importance in this respect is the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, which responsible, even criminally liable, for the lawless acts of his troops ...', US Military Commission in Manila, Yamashita (7 Dec. 1945), reprinted in L. Friedman (ed.), The Law of War: A Documentary History 1597, Vol. II (1972). For further references, see Meron (1993) 87 AJIL 424, 426 (fn. 14); Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 168.

¹⁰⁴⁰ See, e.g., Australian Law Concerning Trials of War Criminals by Military Courts of 1945, V Law Reports 95 (1948); article 374(1) of the 1994 Penal Code of the Republic of Slovenia (coercion into prostitution, rape); article 612(3) of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 19/95 of 23 Nov. 1995) (induced or forced prostitution), article 142 of the Penal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; Chinese Law governing the Trial of War Criminals of 24 Oct. 1946, XIV Law Reports 152 et seq. (1949). Enforced prostitution in an armed conflict has been prosecuted by a number of national courts, see XV Law Reports 121 (1949). See also U.S. Military Commission in Manila, Yamashita (7 Dec. 1945), reprinted in Friedman (ed.), Law of War (1972) 1599.

¹⁰⁴¹ See also article 4 Add. Prot. II. On the historical development of prosecutions of sexual violence since WW II, see Cohen, in: Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 13 et seq.

¹⁰⁴² The UN Special Rapporteur on human rights in the former Yugoslavia Macowiecki stated that '[r]ape in [the context of article 27] is a grave breach of the Fourth Geneva Convention (article 147) and as such, a war crime', UN Special Rapporteur Macowiecki of the Commission on Human Rights, Report on the Situation of Human Rights in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia pursuant to Commission Resolution 1992/S-1/1 of 14 Aug. 1992, E/CN.4/1993/50 (1993), para. 89. The UN Special Rapporteur Linda Chavez stated that '[r]ape and sexual abuse of women and girls in situations of armed conflict (whether international or internal) constitute a grave breach of international humanitarian law' and that such sexual violence 'constitutes torture and inhuman treatment which causes suffering and serious bodily injury', Preliminary report of the special rapporteur on the situation of systematic rape, sexual slavery and slavery-like practices during periods of armed conflict, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1996/26 (16 July 1996), paras. 14 and 15 (see also paras. 16–19 and 25). The ICRC furthermore has confirmed inter alia in its Aide-mémoire of 3 Dec. 1992, in its statement of 14 Feb. 1997 before the Preparatory Committee, and in its Recommendations to the Rome Diplomatic Conference that the grave breach of 'wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health' covers rape. See, e.g., also Pictet (ed.), Commentaries Geneva Conventions iv (1960) article 147, 598; Final Declaration of the International Conference for the Protection of War Victims (30 Aug. to 1 Sept. 1993) (Geneva) (1 Sept. 1993), para. I3 (reiterating that acts of sexual violence directed notably against women and children 'constitute grave breaches of international humanitarian law'); 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, paras. 56–66; U.S. Department of State letter to Senator A. Specter (27 Jan. 1993), quoted in, Meron (1993) 87 AJIL 424, 427 (fn. 22).

elaborates on the definitions of international crimes involving forms of sexual violence.¹⁰⁴³ Article 4 para. 2 of the ICTR Statute confers jurisdiction over ‘outrages upon personal dignity, in particular ... rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault’, drawing on article 4 para. 2 (e) Add. Prot. II. In contrast, the ICTY Statute does not explicitly provide that forms of sexual violence amount to war crimes that can be prosecuted by the ICTY. In a number of cases, however, the ICTY Office of the Prosecutor has charged rape and other forms of sexual violence as war crimes under the ICTY Statute. More particularly, ICTY Chambers have consistently affirmed that such conduct may amount to a grave breach or a serious violation of the laws and customs of war¹⁰⁴⁴. The Čelebići Trial Chamber affirmed that ‘[t]here can be no doubt that rape and other forms of sexual assault are expressly prohibited under international humanitarian law’, referring to articles 27 GC IV, 4 para. 2 Add. Prot. II, 76 para. 1 Add. Prot. I, 46 Hague Regulations (which according to the ICTY implicitly prohibits rape and sexual assault by protecting family honor and rights) and 6 (c) of the Nuremberg Charter¹⁰⁴⁵.

The first proposals of lists of war crimes to be included under the Rome Statute had either not contained a specific reference to sexual violence or linked them to outrages upon personal dignity, reproducing the wording contained in article 75 para. 2 (b) Add. Prot. I albeit adding rape to it¹⁰⁴⁶. This reflected the traditional approach to sexual violence in prior international humanitarian law. The recognition as a grave breach was first proposed by New Zealand and Switzerland in the February 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee when ‘rape, enforced prostitution and other sexual violence of comparable gravity’ were listed in brackets as examples of the grave breach of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health¹⁰⁴⁷. The December 1997 session then separated sexual violence from the more general categories and created a separate, unbracketed category of war crimes in its own right for ‘rape, sexual slavery, enforced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, and any other form of sexual violence also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’¹⁰⁴⁸. This was not least the success of the lobbying of the Women’s Caucus for Gender Justice in the ICC, which coordinated the strategy of a great number of women’s human rights NGOs. The only form of sexual violence where dissent remained very strong prior even at the Rome Conference was the crime of ‘forced pregnancy’, with the Vatican arguing that this notion should be replaced by ‘forced impregnation’ for fear of a precedent with regard to abortions

662

¹⁰⁴³ On related jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, see ICTR-OTP, ‘Prosecution of sexual violence – Best practices manual (2014), Annex B pp. 1 et seq.; Mouthaan (2011) 11 ICLRev 775, 782 et seq., UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations, Review of the sexual violence elements of the judgements of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL (2010); Buss, in: McGlynn and Munro (eds.), Rethinking Rape Law (2010) 61 et seq.; Mischkowski and Mlinarevic, ‘The trouble with rape trials’ (2009) 1 et seq.; Maystre and Rangel, in: Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 511 et seq.

¹⁰⁴⁴ See in particular Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, paras. 596–598; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 475–496; Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, paras. 165–186 (as well as paras. 266–275, 279 and 295); Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 436–464 (as well as, e.g., paras. 6–11, 28–84, 162–197, 205 et seq. and also paras. 515 et seq. and 544–557); Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, paras. 175–183 (as well as, e.g., paras. 98–109). See also Prosecutor v. Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 27 Jan. 2000, paras. 220–229 and 285; Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, e.g. paras. 154, 165, 175, 193–194, 198, 206, 222, 231–232, 237, 377, 398, 425–427, 452, 468, 470, 536, 646); Prosecutor v. Krstić, IT-98-33-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 August 2001, paras. 509 and 513. For a list of ICTY and ICTR Rule 61 rulings and indictments alleging sexual violence, see Askin (1999) 93 AJIL 97, 99 (fn. 13) and 115–122.

¹⁰⁴⁵ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 476.

¹⁰⁴⁶ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 61 (para. 2(j)) and 63 (para. 3(e) (‘outrages upon personal dignity, in particular rape, enforced prostitution and other sexual violence of comparable gravity’)).

¹⁰⁴⁷ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 6 (para. A(c)).

¹⁰⁴⁸ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 11 (para. B(pbis)). Various delegations, such as Finland and Switzerland on 8 Dec. 1997, also stated in the December Preparatory Committee that rape was a grave breach.

or laws restricting or outlawing abortions. The establishment of the list of war crimes of sexual violence under the Rome Statute and even more so the drafting of their elements by the Preparatory Commission was to some extent a creative legislating exercise¹⁰⁴⁹, since these forms of violence had not per se constituted war crimes in their own right prior to the adoption of the Rome Statute and since relating international humanitarian law rules were not overly precise. The drafting history of the list and definition of the specific offences in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), including the dynamics concerning the debate on the inclusion of forced pregnancy, took a course largely parallel to the debate on the corresponding crimes against humanity provision in article 7 para. 1 (g), to the commentary of which accordingly can be referred.

- 663 Conduct qualifying as a war crime of sexual violence might at times also qualify as war crimes under the Rome Statute criminalizing general forms of mistreatment, such as the war crimes of torture (paragraph (a) (ii)-1), inhuman treatment (paragraph (a) (ii)-2), wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health (paragraph (a) (iii)), wounding a person hors de combat (article 8 para. 2 (b) (vi)), outrages upon personal dignity (paragraph (b) (xxi)), or might be inherent in the commission of conscripting and enlisting child soldiers (article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi))¹⁰⁵⁰. In addition, conduct addressed by the war crime of enforced sterilization may also amount to mutilation (paragraph (b) (x)) and conduct qualifying as forced pregnancy may also amount to unlawful confinement (paragraph (a) (vii)-2).
- 664 Moreover, conduct amounting to one of the six listed types of war crimes of sexual violence may amount to another type of sexual violence as a war crime. Sexual slavery for instance may well involve one or more acts amounting to rape or another form of sexual violence. Similarly, enforced prostitution may be connected to sexual slavery or involve other sexual violence. The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery indeed affirmed that '[s]exual slavery ... encompasses most, if not all forms of forced prostitution'¹⁰⁵¹. Lastly, the types of sexual violence listed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) are also criminalized as crimes against humanity under article 7 para. 1 (g) Rome Statute, provided the requisite elements are met¹⁰⁵². Sexual violence may furthermore amount to genocidal acts under article 6 para. (e) Rome Statute, in particular where forced pregnancy, rape, or enforced sterilization qualifies as 'imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group'¹⁰⁵³.
- 665 In its recent policy paper on sexual violence, the ICC-OTP announced a policy of prioritization with regard to crimes of a sexual nature, which is reflected in an approach to 'ensure that charges for sexual and gender-based crimes are brought whenever there is sufficient evidence to support such charges. [The OTP] will bring charges for sexual and gender-based crimes explicitly as crimes per se, in addition to charging such acts as forms of other violence within the competence of the Court where the material elements are met, e. g., charging rape as torture. The Office will seek to bring cumulative charges in order to reflect the severity and multifaceted character of these crimes fairly, and to enunciate their ranges, supported by the evidence in each case. In appropriate cases, the office will charge acts of sexual and gender-based crimes as different categories of crimes within the Court's jurisdic-

¹⁰⁴⁹ On the drafting history of the Elements of Crimes on sexual violence, see Rückert/Witschel, in: Fischer/Kress/Lüder (eds.), International and National Prosecution (2001) 80–87; Dörmann, in: Fischer/Kress/Lüder (eds.), International and National Prosecution (2001) 131–133.

¹⁰⁵⁰ see Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, paras. 16, 36, 577, 589, 598, 629–630, 890–896, 913, where TC I acknowledged sexual violence against Congolese child soldiers, but could not convict for such crimes since they have not been charged (ibid., esp. paras. 36, 629–630, 913); crit. ibid., Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, paras. 6, 16, 20 observing that the sexual element of the committed crimes becomes invisible and regretting a discrimination of the victims; crit. Ambos (2012) 12 ICLRev 115, 137–138. with fn. 156; see also Greijer, in: Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations (2012) 137, 157 et seq.

¹⁰⁵¹ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 31.

¹⁰⁵² See Ch. K. Hall, article 7, mn 41 et seq.

¹⁰⁵³ See W. A. Schabas, article 6, mn 21.

tion (war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide), in order to properly describe, inter alia, the nature, manner of commission, intent, impact and context. The Office will also seek to highlight the gender-related aspects of other crimes within its jurisdiction – for example, the recruitment of child soldiers and enslavement, and, in the case of the latter, their manifestation as trafficking in persons, in particular women and children.¹⁰⁵⁴

Also, one among the six strategic goals of the ICC-OTP in its current overall prosecutorial strategy is to pay particular attention to sexual and gender based crimes and those against children.¹⁰⁵⁵ 666

During the past years, the prosecution of sexual and gender based crimes in international criminal law gained increasing attention. The commission of sexual violence as international crimes comes along with noteworthy procedural particularities. Such crimes are often highly traumatic for its victims and witnesses, who therefore need to be protected sufficiently in accordance with articles 54 (1) (b) and 68 (1) ICC Statute – not least to prevent a secondary traumatization.¹⁰⁵⁶ Some argued for a need of prioritized, thematic focused prosecutions of international sexual crimes. Such a focused prosecution would entail a higher degree of the condemnation of sexual crimes in conflict situations.¹⁰⁵⁷ Relevant staff engaged in the prosecution of sexual crimes should be trained to handle respective specialties.¹⁰⁵⁸ However, while it is increasingly acknowledged that a widespread commission of sexual crimes is inherent part of many conflict situations,¹⁰⁵⁹ one could easily argue for a general need of such trainings for all staff members engaged in the field and witness examinations, especially when taking into account that the extent of sexual crimes may not be visible during the first investigative steps. 667

With the exception of the war crime of forced pregnancy, which by its nature can only be committed against women, the drafters of the Rome Statute intended all of the war crimes of sexual violence under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) to be defined, in principle, in a gender-neutral way. Thus, both victims as well as perpetrators may be of any sex and gender. This also results from the almost entirely gender-neutrally wording of the elements of crimes for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), and with regard to the war crime of rape is underscored in footnote 50 of the elements. Anything else than a gender neutral interpretation would contrast article 7 (3), which clarifies that the ‘term ‘gender’ refers to the two sexes, male and female, within the context of society’,¹⁰⁶⁰ and furthermore against the prohibition of discrimination pursuant to article 21 (3). Although thus far the majority of cases involving sexual offences at the international tribunals deals with violence against females, charges of rape against males are for the first time dealt with in Ntaganda.¹⁰⁶¹ The ICRC Commentary to article 75 Add. Prot. I indeed states that ‘[t]he provision relating in Article 75 to enforced 668

¹⁰⁵⁴ OTP, ‘Policy Paper SGBC’ (2014), summary paras. 7–8; on a contextualization of sexual violence in ICL, see Oosterveld, in: Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations (2012) 189 et seq.

¹⁰⁵⁵ ICC-OTP, ‘Strategic plan June 2012–2015’ (2013) para. 5, 58 et seq.

¹⁰⁵⁶ The ICC-OTP perceives itself obliged to caution and protective measures under Art. 68(1) ICC Statute, see OTP, ‘Policy Paper SGBC’ (2014) summary para. 5 and paras. 60 et seq. On best practices by the ICTR, see ICTR-OTP, ‘Prosecution of sexual violence – Best practices manual’ (2014) 1–81; Buss, in: McGlynn and Munro (eds.), Rethinking Rape Law (2010) 61 et seq.; for a study examining challenges of rape trials at the ICTY, see Mischkowski and Mlinarević, ‘The trouble with rape trials’ (2009); Wildermuth and Kneuer, in: Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 65, 116 et seq.; Olugbuo, in: Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations (2012) 109 et seq.

¹⁰⁵⁷ Ambos, in Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Prosecution of International Sex Crimes (2012) 291 et seq., Mouthaan (2011) 11 ICLRev 775, 786 et seq.

¹⁰⁵⁸ OTP, ‘Policy Paper SGBC’ (2014) summary para. 15 and paras. 60 et seq., 118–119; collecting pro and contra arguments, Bekou, in: Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Investigations (2012) 233 et seq.

¹⁰⁵⁹ Listing widespread sexual and gender based crimes in ongoing conflict situations: United Nations General Assembly/Security Council, ‘Conflict-related sexual violence. Report of the Secretary General’ A66/657-S/2012/33, 13 January 2012, paras. 17–57.

¹⁰⁶⁰ Article 7 (3) Rome Statute.

¹⁰⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision pursuant to article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 9 June 2014, para. 52. For an in-depth account on sexual violence against men in international law, see Mouthaan (2013) 13 ICLRev 65.

prostitution and indecent assault applies to everybody covered by the article, *regardless of sex*¹⁰⁶². The gender-neutrality of sexual offenses has also been affirmed by the UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery McDougall: ‘Rape is defined in gender-neutral terms, as both men and women are victims of rape. However, it must be noted that women are more at risk of being victims of sexually violent crimes and face gender-specific obstacles in seeking redress. Although this report retains ‘penetration’ in the definition of rape, it is clear that the historic focus on the act of penetration largely derives from a male preoccupation with assuring women’s chastity and ascertaining paternity of children. It is important, nevertheless, to emphasize that all forms of sexual violence, including but not limited to rape, must be condemned and prevented’¹⁰⁶³.

669 The ICC has not yet issued a conviction based on allegations of sexual crimes pursuant to article 8 (2) (b) (xxii). In March 2014, it acquitted Katanga, inter alia., for charges of accessory to rape and sexual slavery as a crime against humanity and as a war crime under article 8 (2) (e) (vi).¹⁰⁶⁴ However, a number of ongoing cases address charges of sexual violence. Charges of rape and sexual slavery were confirmed in the cases against *Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, Ntaganda*¹⁰⁶⁵ and *Bemba Gombo*¹⁰⁶⁶, moreover in the Kenyan case against *Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali*¹⁰⁶⁷, and in the situation concerning the Ivory Coast in the cases against *Gbagbo*¹⁰⁶⁸ and *Goudé*¹⁰⁶⁹. Also, the following arrest warrants and summons to appear contain charges involving sexual violence: in the situation in Sudan, the arrest warrants for *Al Bashir*¹⁰⁷⁰ *Ahmad Harun*¹⁰⁷¹, *Hussein*¹⁰⁷² and *Ali Kushayb*¹⁰⁷³. In the ¹⁰⁶² Pilloud/Pictet, in: Sandoz/Swinarski/Zimmermann (eds.), Commentary Additional Protocols (1987) 874 (No. 3049) (emphasis added) (arguing that this is also supported by the fact that ‘Article 76 (Protection of women), relating to the special protection to which women are entitled, reiterates the provision relating to enforced prostitution and indecent assault, specifically mentioning rape’, id.

¹⁰⁶³ A footnote to the cited paragraph states that ‘[v]iolent crimes of a homosexual nature are not explicitly mentioned in international humanitarian law ... That international humanitarian law, insofar as it provides protection against rape and other sexual assaults, is applicable to men as well as women is beyond any doubt as the international human right not to be discriminated against (in this case on the basis of sex) does not allow derogation’, 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 24.

¹⁰⁶⁴ Procureur v. Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, Jugement rendu en application de l’article 74 du Statut, Chambre de Première Instance II, 7 mars 2014; by the time of writing, no translation of the judgement into English was delivered yet. See ICC, ‘Summary of Trial Chamber II’s Judgment of 7 March 2014, pursuant to article 74 of the Statute in the case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga’ (2014) < http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Documents/986/14_0259_ENG_summary_judgment.pdf > accessed 30 January 2015, para. 35–36 and p. 30; see also Stahn (2014) 12 JICJ 809, 820 et seq.; Women’s Initiative for Gender Justice (May 2014) Legal Eye on the ICC.

¹⁰⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision pursuant to article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 9 June 2014, paras. 36, 49–52 (rape as CaH and war crime under article 8(2)(e)(vi)), and 53–57 (sexual slavery as CaH and war crime under 8(2)(e)(vi)), 76–82 (rape and sexual slavery as war crime under 8(2)(e)(vi)).

¹⁰⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Bemba Bombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) on the Charges against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 June 2009, para. 286.

¹⁰⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-382, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges pursuant to article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 January 2012, Count 5–6 on pp. 12–13, paras. 254 et seq., 428 c (on Cah).

¹⁰⁶⁸ Prosecutor v. Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-656, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges against Laurent Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 12 June 2014, paras. 74, 195–196, Count 2 on p. 128 (on CaH).

¹⁰⁶⁹ Prosecutor v. Goudé, ICC-02/11-02/11-186, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges against Charles Blé Goudé, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014, paras. 117–118, 188, 194 (Count 2, rape as CaH).

¹⁰⁷⁰ Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, p. 6 (recognizing a high amount of rapes) and para. vii.

¹⁰⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Harun, ICC-02/05-01/07-2, Warrant of arrest for Ahmad Harun, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 April 2007, count 10 and 39 (both persecution, article 7 (1) (h), count 14 (rape, article 8 (2) (e) (vi)), count 42–43 (rape under article 7 (1) (h) and 8 (2) (e) (vi)).

¹⁰⁷² Prosecutor v. Hussein, ICC-02/05-01/12-2, Warrant of Arrest for Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 March 2012, pp. 4, 9.

¹⁰⁷³ Prosecutor v. Kushayb, ICC-02/05-01/07-3, Warrant of arrest for Ali Kushayb, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 April 2007, count 10 and 39 (both persecution, article 7 (1) (h), count 14 (rape, article 8 (2) (e) (vi)).

Ugandan situation, charges of rape and sexual slavery are included in the arrest warrants for Kony¹⁰⁷⁴ and Otti¹⁰⁷⁵.

b) War crime of rape. According to the ICTY, ‘international law ... regards rape as the most serious manifestation of sexual assault’¹⁰⁷⁶. However, there had been no definition of rape in international humanitarian or human rights instruments prior to the Elements of Crimes elaborated by the Preparatory Commission. Domestic legal systems contain different definitions of rape¹⁰⁷⁷. A common denominator of the way rape is understood in both the Elements of Crimes as well as national legal systems and international case law is the distinction of two basic elements of this crime: The physical act, and the lack of valid consent or presence of coercive or similar circumstances.

In the Elements of Crimes, rape is defined as follows¹⁰⁷⁸: 671

1. The perpetrator invaded the body of a person by conduct resulting in penetration, however slight, of any part of the body of the victim or of the perpetrator with a sexual organ, or of the anal or genital opening of the victim with any object or any other part of the body.
2. The invasion was committed by force, or by threat of force or coercion, such as that caused by fear of violence, duress, detention, psychological oppression or abuse of power, against such person or another person, or by taking advantage of a coercive environment, or the invasion was committed against a person incapable of giving genuine consent.’

aa) The physical act of rape. The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery McDougall has suggested that the physical element of rape be defined as ‘the insertion ... of any object, including but not limited to a penis, into a victim’s vagina or anus; or the insertion ... of a penis into the mouth of the victim’¹⁰⁷⁹. 672

However, in the first case of the ad hoc international criminal tribunals to consider the definition of rape as a crime under international law, an ICTR Trial Chamber considered there was no commonly accepted definition of the term in international law, adding that ‘while rape has been historically defined in national jurisdictions as non-consensual sexual intercourse, variations on the form of rape may include acts which involve the insertion of objects and/or the use of bodily orifices not considered to be intrinsically sexual. ... The Tribunal defines rape as a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive’¹⁰⁸⁰. 673

The Furundžija Trial Chamber of the ICTY analyzed the specific elements of the crime of rape in more detail. Again, the Furundžija Trial Chamber found that the precise elements of rape could not ‘be drawn from international treaty or customary law, nor ... general principles of international criminal law or ... general principles of international law’. Consequently, the Chamber considered it necessary to ‘look for principles of criminal law common to the major legal systems of the world’ in order to ‘arrive at an accurate definition based on the criminal law principle of specificity (... ‘nullum crimen sine lege stricta’)’¹⁰⁸¹. The Furundžija Trial Chamber concluded that the main common element was (forced) 674

¹⁰⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Kony et al, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 September 2005 (Count 2 and 3 on pp. 12–13: rape; Count 1 on p. 12: sexual slavery).

¹⁰⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Kony et al, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 8 July 2005 (Count 3 on p. 13: rape; Count 1 on p. 12: sexual slavery).

¹⁰⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 175.

¹⁰⁷⁷ Rape and Sexual Assault: A Legal Study. Final Report of the United Nations Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992) (S/1994/674/Add.2 (Vol. I), Annex II; see also Ambos, in: Bergsmo et al. (eds.), International Sex Crimes (2012) 143, 149–150, recognizing a ‘cultural conditionality of criminal prohibitions that becomes particularly obvious in the context of sexual offences’.

¹⁰⁷⁸ ICC Elements of Crimes for Arts. 7 (1) (g)-1, 8 (2) (b) (xxii)-1 and 8 (2) (e) (vi)-1.

¹⁰⁷⁹ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 24.

¹⁰⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, paras. 686 and 688 (emphasis added), confirmed in Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 478–479.

¹⁰⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 177.

physical penetration¹⁰⁸². However, while many national legal systems were found to specify that rape can only be committed against a woman, others provide that rape can be committed against a victim of either sex, and still others use wording open for interpretation¹⁰⁸³. Another major discrepancy the Chamber found was that some domestic legal systems qualify forced oral penetration as rape while others qualify such act as sexual assault. The Furundžija Trial Chamber qualified the forced penetration of the mouth by the male sexual organ as the war crime of rape for two reasons. First, such penetration constitutes ‘a most humiliating and degrading attack upon human dignity’ and ‘an extremely serious sexual outrage’ that can be ‘just as humiliating and traumatic as vaginal or anal penetration’. Second, forced oral sex in prosecutions before the ICTY ‘is invariably an aggravated sexual assault as it is committed in time of armed conflict on defenseless civilians’¹⁰⁸⁴. In conclusion, the Furundžija Trial Chamber came to the following definition of the physical act of rape:

‘the sexual penetration, however slight:

- a) of the vagina or anus of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator or any other object used by the perpetrator; or
- b) of the mouth of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator; ...’¹⁰⁸⁵.

675 Element 1 for article 8 para. 2(b) (xxii)-1 Rome Statute suggests that the physical act of rape consists in that:

‘[t]he perpetrator invaded the body of a person by conduct resulting in penetration, however slight, of any part of the body of the victim or of the perpetrator with a sexual organ, or of the anal or genital opening of the victim with any object or any other part of the body’ (footnote omitted).

676 This formulation was, at the time of its adoption by the Preparatory Commission, one of the most progressive and broader definitions of rape under international and even national law. The definition derives to a large degree from the above-described jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals. The long and relatively complicated formulation is the result of the Preparatory Commission’s intention to draft a gender-neutral definition.

677 The general requirement that the perpetrator ‘invaded’ the body of a person is somewhat vague but was preferred as it appears broader than the term ‘penetrated’ and was ‘intended to be broad enough to be gender-neutral’¹⁰⁸⁶. Penetrating ‘any part of the body of the victim or of the perpetrator’ would include penetrating not only the anal or genital opening but in particular also the mouth. Therefore, the wording of the Elements also covers forcing a victim to perform fellatio on the perpetrator or another person¹⁰⁸⁷, performing fellatio on a victim, or even sexual intercourse forced on a man by a woman. The Elements also qualify as rape the penetration of the anal or genital opening of the victim with any object or any other part of the body (e.g. fingers). The ICTR has qualified as rape the thrusting of a piece of wood into the sexual organs of a woman as she lay dying¹⁰⁸⁸.

678 bb) No sexual autonomy (no ‘consent’/coercion). Under national legislations, sexual activity generally is not prohibited if there is consent. Similarly, it can be argued that the ¹⁰⁸² Ibid., para. 180; similar Ambos, in: Bergsmo et al., International Sex Crimes (2012), 143, 153 (‘every sexual penetration may constitute rape, whereas sexual behavior falling short of a penetration is not covered’).

¹⁰⁸³ Ibid., para. 180.

¹⁰⁸⁴ Ibid., paras. 182–184.

¹⁰⁸⁵ Ibid., para. 185. This definition has been confirmed in Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 438, and (more implicitly) also in Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, paras. 175–176.

¹⁰⁸⁶ Fn. 50 to element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-1.

¹⁰⁸⁷ In an obiter dictum, the Čelebići ICTY Trial Chamber found ‘that the act of forcing [the victims] to perform fellatio on one another ... could constitute rape for which liability could have been found if pleaded in the appropriate manner’, Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 1062–1066 (emphasis added) (the Trial Chamber instead determined inhuman as well as cruel treatment). See also Prosecutor v. Todorović, IT-95-9/1-S, Sentencing Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 July 2001, paras. 39–40 (and para. 66).

¹⁰⁸⁸ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 686.

above-described physical act of invading a person’s body cannot amount to a war crime where both sides consent. However, can there be genuine consent of a protected person in the particular situation of an armed conflict, since the environment of such conflict generally is coercive and dominated by unequal relations of power and fear?¹⁰⁸⁹ A prisoner of war may well formally ‘consent’ to sexual acts with the guards, but may do so only because of fear for her or his life. How should the issue of consent and criminal responsibility therefore be addressed with regard to sexual activity related to armed conflict?

The ICTY Furundžija Trial Chamber analyzed major legal systems of the world and found that all jurisdictions required:

‘an element of force, coercion, threat, or acting without the consent of the victim: force is given a broad interpretation and includes rendering the victim helpless’¹⁰⁹⁰.

Some jurisdictions were also found to indicate that the force or intimidation can be committed against a third person¹⁰⁹¹. According to the Furundžija Trial Chamber’s concise formula, rape requires ‘coercion or force or threat of force against the victim or a third person’¹⁰⁹², noting that the threat of force may be ‘express or implied and must place the victim in reasonable fear that he, she or a third person will be subjected to violence, detention, duress or psychological oppression’¹⁰⁹³.

The Kunarac ICTY Trial Chamber however found the concise Furundžija formula to be more restrictive than required by international law as it does not refer to ‘other factors which would render an act of sexual penetration non-consensual or non-voluntary on the part of the victim, which ... is ... the accurate scope of this aspect of the definition in international law’¹⁰⁹⁴.

In the Kunarac Chamber’s view, the national legal systems surveyed in Furundžija indicated that the common basic underlying principle was ‘that sexual penetration will constitute rape if it is not truly voluntary or consensual on the part of the victim’. It also pointed out that the Furundžija judgment itself referred to the alternative of the perpetrator acting without the victim’s consent and thereby suggested that the absence of consent or voluntary participation is relevant¹⁰⁹⁵. Against this background, the Kunarac Trial Chamber set out the following alternative factors in order to classify the sexual activity concerned as rape:

- (i) the sexual activity must be accompanied by force or threat of force to the victim or a third party;
- (ii) the sexual activity must be accompanied by force or a variety of other specified circumstances which made the victim particularly vulnerable or negated her ability to make an informed refusal; or
- (iii) the sexual activity must occur without the consent of the victim’¹⁰⁹⁶.

With regard to ‘[s]pecific circumstances which go to the vulnerability or deception of the victim’, the Kunarac Trial Chamber stated that the emphasis of national provisions concerned:

‘is that the victim, because of an incapacity of an enduring or qualitative nature (e.g. mental or physical illness, or the age of minority) or of a temporary or circumstantial nature (e.g. being subjected to psychological pressure or otherwise in a state of inability to resist) was unable to refuse to

¹⁰⁸⁹ For an in-depth account on the question, see Herring and Dempsey, in: McGlynn and Munro (eds.), Rethinking Rape Law (2010) 30 et seq.; Luping, (2009) 17 AmUJGenderSocialPol&L 431, 474.

¹⁰⁹⁰ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 180 (footnotes omitted).

¹⁰⁹¹ Ibid., para. 180.

¹⁰⁹² Ibid., para. 185.

¹⁰⁹³ Ibid., para. 174.

¹⁰⁹⁴ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 438 (emphasis in the original). Linking this development to the adoption of the Elements of Crimes: Werle/Jessberger, Principles ICL (2014), para. 974.

¹⁰⁹⁵ Ibid., para. 440 (emphasis in the original), referring to Prosecutor v. Furundžija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 180.

¹⁰⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 442, confirmed by Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, para. 177. See also Prosecutor v. Gacumbitsi, ICTR-2001-64-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 7 July 2006, paras. 127–132.

be subjected to the sexual acts. The key effect of factors such as surprise, fraud or misrepresentation is that the victim was subjected to the act without the opportunity for an informed or reasoned refusal. The common denominator underlying these different circumstances is that they have the effect that the victim's will was overcome or that her ability freely to refuse the sexual acts was temporarily or more permanently negated¹⁰⁹⁷.

In conclusion, the Kunarac Trial Chamber stated that:

[t]he basic principle which is truly common to these [domestic] legal systems is that serious violations of sexual autonomy are to be penalised. Sexual autonomy is violated wherever the person subjected to the act has not freely agreed to it or is otherwise not a voluntary participant.

683 In practice, the absence of genuine and freely given consent or voluntary participation may be evidenced by the presence of the various factors specified in other jurisdictions – such as force, threats of force, or taking advantage of a person who is unable to resist¹⁰⁹⁸.

684 Focusing on rape as a serious violation of sexual autonomy, the Kunarac Trial Chamber concluded that a sexual penetration qualifies as rape where it occurred ‘without the consent of the victim’, with consent having to be ‘given voluntarily, as a result of the victim’s free will, assessed in the context of the surrounding circumstances’¹⁰⁹⁹.

685 The Kunarac Appeals Chamber confirmed the Trial Chamber’s findings and, besides noting that there was no ‘resistance’ requirement, made some clarifications with regard to the element of force:

‘Force or threat of force provides clear evidence of non-consent, but force is not an element per se of rape. ... A narrow focus on force or threat of force could permit perpetrators to evade liability for sexual activity to which the other party had not consented by taking advantage of coercive circumstances without relying on physical force.

A threat to retaliate ‘in the future against the victim or any other person’ is [in some domestic jurisdictions] a sufficient indicium of force so long as ‘there is a reasonable possibility that the perpetrator will execute the threat. ... [I]t is worth observing that the circumstances ... that prevail in most cases charged as either war crimes or crimes against humanity will be almost universally coercive. That is to say, true consent will not be possible’¹¹⁰⁰.

686 The Kunarac Appeals Chamber went on to note several national criminal provisions which establish a strict liability of a person in a certain power position for engaging in sexual acts with a ‘victim’ under his influence because of the victim’s particular vulnerability due to the unequal power distribution. Given the inherent coerciveness of the situation, national legislatures thus decided that there was a need to presume non-consent and no evidence of apparent consent should be permitted. The provisions referred to penalize for instance sexual acts with prisoners and persons in custody of public authority regardless of whether the victim consented. An April 1998 amendment to the German Criminal Code for instance added ‘exploiting a situation in which the victim is unprotected and at the mercy of the perpetrator’s influence’ as equivalent to ‘force’ or ‘threat of imminent danger to life or limb’¹¹⁰¹.

687 The Furundžija Trial Chamber also seemed to suggest a non-refutable and abstract presumption of non-consent when stating that ‘any form of captivity vitiates consent’¹¹⁰². In a similar line of thought, the ICTR Akayesu Trial Chamber case merely required that rape be committed ‘under circumstances which are coercive’, noting that ‘coercive circumstances

¹⁰⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 452.

¹⁰⁹⁸ Ibid., paras. 457–458 (emphasis in the original).

¹⁰⁹⁹ Ibid., para. 460. The Kvočka Trial Chamber endorsed these holdings, Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, paras. 176–177; arguing for sexual autonomy as the central principle underlying the definition of rape: Grewal (2012) 10 JICJ 373.

¹¹⁰⁰ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, paras. 129–130 (footnotes omitted); see also Prosecutor v. Bagosora, No. ICTR-98-41-T, Judgment and Sentence, Trial Chamber I, 18 December 2008, para. 2199.

¹¹⁰¹ Ibid., para. 131 (see also paras. 132–133).

¹¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 271.

need not be evidenced by a show of physical force. ... [C]oercion may be inherent in certain circumstances, such as armed conflict or the military presence of Interahamwe among refugee Tutsi women at the bureau communal¹¹⁰³. In same vein, the Karamera TC held that ‘Given the horrific circumstances surrounding these attacks, it is clear that there could have been no consent for these acts of sexual violence’.¹¹⁰⁴

At the ICC, the Bemba Pre-Trial Chamber III held that ‘the term ‘coercion’ ... does not require physical force. Rather, threats, intimidation, extortion and other forms of duress which prey on fear or desperation may constitute coercion, and coercion may be inherent in certain circumstances, such as armed conflict or military presence.’¹¹⁰⁵ 688

The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery also argued in 1998 that ‘[t]he manifestly coercive circumstances that exist in all armed conflict situations establish a presumption of non-consent and negates [sic] the need for the prosecution to establish a lack of consent as an element of the crime’¹¹⁰⁶. 689

Within the Preparatory Commission, it was basically uncontroversial that sexual activity would not generally amount to a war crime where both sides genuinely consent. What was much debated, however, was how to define the type of ‘consent’ and the circumstances that may ‘justify’ sexual activity otherwise qualifying as rape with regard to the particular situation of an armed conflict. Eventually, the Preparatory Commission decided not to frame the issue of ‘consent’ in terms of a ground for excluding criminal responsibility, but rather to suggest (in element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-1), that one of the following four alternative circumstances must be made out in order for the physical act (described under element 1) to amount to a war crime: 690

1. The act was committed ‘by force’.
2. The act was committed ‘by threat of force or [by] coercion, such as that caused by fear of violence, duress, detention, psychological oppression or abuse of power, against such person or another person’ ...
3. The act was committed ‘by taking advantage of a coercive environment’ ...
4. The invasion ‘was committed against a person incapable of giving genuine consent’, with footnote 51 specifying that ‘a person may be incapable of giving genuine consent if affected by natural, induced or age-related incapacity’.

With regard to the interpretation of element 2, the analysis of the alternative circumstantial elements of rape in the Kunarac judgment may be helpful, since their formulation is partly similar and because the Elements of Crimes possibly inspired the subsequently delivered Kunarac decision. The Elements for instance also clearly suggest that taking advantage of a coercive environment suffices. The term ‘coercive environment’ can be understood as referring to, inter alia, vertical power relations between troops conquering a village and the inhabitants of that village or between a detained person and his or her guards. 691

¹¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 688.

¹¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Karamera and Ndirumpats, Judgment and Sentence, TC III, 2 February 2012.

¹¹⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) on the Charges against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, PTC III, 15 June 2009; see also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Chui, ICC-01/04-1/07-717, Decision on the confirmation of charges, TC I, 30 September 2008, para. 440.

¹¹⁰⁶ After suggesting that ‘rape’ must be committed ‘under conditions of force, coercion or duress’, the UN Special Rapporteur McDougall added that ‘[l]ack of consent or the lack of capacity to consent due, for example, to coercive circumstances or the victim’s age, can distinguish lawful sexual activity from unlawful sexual activity under municipal law. The manifestly coercive circumstances that exist in all armed conflict situations establish a presumption of non-consent and negates the need for the prosecution to establish a lack of consent as an element of the crime. In addition, consent is not an issue as a legal or factual matter when considering the command responsibility of superior officers who ordered or otherwise facilitated the commission of crimes such as rape in armed conflict situations. The issue of consent may, however, be raised as an affirmative defense as provided for in the general rules and practices established by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ...’, 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, paras. 25.

692 cc) Subjective element. The mental element requires, pursuant to article 30 Rome Statute, either dolus directus of the first or of the second degree.¹¹⁰⁷ 693 c) War crime of sexual slavery. The notion of ‘sexual slavery’ has not as such been defined under international humanitarian law treaties or other international conventions. In contrast, the more generic concept of ‘slavery’ has been defined in various conventions and considered a jus cogens norm in customary international law¹¹⁰⁸. Slavery (as well as slave trade) in its traditional forms was one of the earliest crimes to be recognized under international law. The 1926 Slavery Convention contains the first international definition of the offense. While the traditional forms of slavery (and slave trade) have almost ceased to exist, other forms of slavery and slavery-like practise such as servitude, forced labour and trafficking in women and children persist, including in situations of armed conflict. Besides the notorious ‘comfort women stations’ maintained by the Japanese during World War II, where more than 200’000 women were kept and forced to provide sexual services to Japanese soldiers¹¹⁰⁹, and the use of slave labor by Nazi Germany¹¹¹⁰, instances of slavery and sexual slavery could also be witnessed, inter alia, in the ‘rape camps’ in the former Yugoslavia¹¹¹¹ or the Rwanda or Liberia conflicts¹¹¹². International instruments have evolved to address these newer forms of slavery and slavery-like practices¹¹¹³. Article 4 para. 2 (f) Add. Prot. II prohibits ‘slavery and the slave trade in all their forms’¹¹¹⁴. Enslavement has been considered a crime against humanity since 1945¹¹¹⁵, and some ¹¹⁰⁷ According to article 30, ‘intent and knowledge’ is required. See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the confirmation of charges, TC I, 30 September 2008, para. 346; and Prosecutor v. Ntaganda, No. ICC-01/04-02/06-309, Decision pursuant to article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, PTC II, 9 June 2014, paras. 134 and 170.

¹¹⁰⁸ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 28 and Annex, para. 12. Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), paras. 9 and 51 (qualifying also sexual slavery ‘as an international crime and a violation of jus cogens norms in the exact same manner as slavery’). On international law concerning slavery more generally, see, e.g., M. Ch. Bassiouni, Enslavement as an International Crime, 23 NYJIL&Politics 445 (1991); Lassen, 57 NordicJIL 197 (1988). Further references are available at <http://www.law-lib.utoronto.ca/diana/slavery/articles.htm>.

¹¹⁰⁹ See, e.g., 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, Annex; Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), paras. 71–78; Judgment of the (ad hoc and non- governmental, NGO-created) Women’s International War Crimes Tribunal 2000 for the Trial of Japanese Military Sexual Slavery in the matter of the Prosecutors and the Peoples of the Asia-Pacific Region vs. Emperor Hirohito et al. and the Government of Japan, available at <http://iccwomen.org>; T. Yu, ‘Reparations for former comfort women of World War II’, 36 HarvJL 528 (1995); K. Parker/J. Chew, ‘Compensation for Japan’s World War II war-rape victims’, 17 HastingsL&ComplRev 497 (1994).

¹¹¹⁰ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 523–527; XXII International Military Tribunal, Judgment, 469, 476–481, 485–495, 502–516, 525–526, 536–537, 541–542, etc. 1947); U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, Erhard Milch (20 December 1946–17 April 1947), II Nuremberg Military Tribunal 355 (1997) (e.g. 773, 789–791); U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, O. Pohl and Others, (3 Nov. 1947), V Nuremberg Military Tribunal (1997); U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, C. Krauch and Others (IG Farben) (14 Aug. 1947–29 July 1948), X Law Reports 53 (1949); 53; U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, F. Flick and Others, VI Nuremberg Military Tribunal (1997).

¹¹¹¹ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 728–744 (Counts 18 and 22).

¹¹¹² See, e.g., 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 30.

¹¹¹³ See, e.g., Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery of 7 Sep. 1956; Convention concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour of 28 June 1930 (ILO Convention No. 29); Convention concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour of 25 June 1957 (ILO Convention No. 105); article 4 UDHR (prohibiting servitude and slavery and slave trade in all their forms); article 8 ICCPR (prohibiting slavery, slave-trade, servitude and forced or compulsory labor); article 4 ECHR (prohibiting slavery, servitude, forced or compulsory labor); article 6 ACHR (prohibiting slavery, involuntary servitude, slave trade, traffic in women and forced or compulsory labor); article 5 ACHPR (prohibiting slavery and slave trade). For an overview over the different instruments, see Bassiouni (1991) 23 NYJIL&Politics 445, 459–517.

¹¹¹⁴ One of the proposals compiled in the 1996 Preparatory Committee Report but not taken up into later compilations had included the war crime of ‘slavery, [and the slave trade,] [slave-related practices, and forced labour] in all their forms’, 1996 Preparatory Committee II 61 (para. 2(k)).

¹¹¹⁵ See, e.g., articles 6(c) Nürnberg Charter, 5(c) Tokyo Charter, 5(c) ICTY Charter, 3(c) ICTR Charter, 18(d) of the 1996 ILC Draft Code, and 7 paras. 1 (c), 2 (c) as well as 1 (g) Rome Statute. See generally Ch. K. Hall/K. Ambos, Article 7.

countries also considered that offence a war crime¹¹¹⁶. The ICTY has analyzed the elements of and international law relating to ‘enslavement’ in some detail in the Kunarac case¹¹¹⁷.

The definition of slavery under international law may serve as a guideline on how to understand the notion of ‘sexual slavery’, as the war crime of sexual slavery can be regarded as a particular form of slavery, namely slavery involving acts of a sexual nature¹¹¹⁸. This approach has also been adopted by the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2: While element 1 for the war crime of sexual slavery in essence (as we shall see) requires that the perpetrator engaged in slavery, the second element requires additionally that ‘[t]he perpetrator caused such person or persons to engage in one or more acts of a sexual nature’, addressing a particular type of slavery. This second element would certainly be met when a perpetrator exercised the power of control over sexual access involving rape or other forms of sexual violence¹¹¹⁹. 694

The traditional concept of slavery has been defined by the 1926 Slavery Convention. Its article 1 para. 1 contains what has been qualified as ‘the first comprehensive and now the most widely recognized definition of slavery’¹¹²⁰. 695

‘[T]he status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised’.

The ICTY Kunarac Appeals Chamber has referred to this traditional concept of slavery as ‘chattel slavery’, a term ‘used to describe slavery-like conditions. To be reduced to ‘chattel’ generally refers to a form of movable property as opposed to property in land’¹¹²¹. 696

The same Appeals Chamber distinguishes from the traditional concept of ‘chattel slavery’ the concept of slavery under contemporary international law, encompassing various contemporary forms of slavery. While these contemporary forms of slavery are also based on the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership, the victim is subject to a lesser degree of the destruction of the juridical personality. The Appeals Chamber considered that ‘these contemporary forms of slavery formed part of enslavement as a crime against humanity under customary international law’ already in 1992¹¹²². 697

Within the SCSL jurisprudence, it was discussed controversially whether forced marriages may constitute the crime of sexual slavery. In Brima et al., the Appeals Chamber overruled a conviction for sexual slavery,¹¹²³ and convicted for ‘other inhuman acts’ as a crime against humanity instead, while holding that ‘forced marriage is not predominantly a sexual crime’.¹¹²⁴ In Sesay et al., forced marriages were considered as both sexual slavery as well as ‘other inhuman acts’ cumulatively.¹¹²⁵ 698

Element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2 Rome Statute spells out the general element of sexual slavery by requiring that ‘[t]he perpetrator exercised any or all of the powers attaching 699

¹¹¹⁶ See, e.g., article II of the Chinese War Crimes Law of 24 October 1946, XIV Law Reports 153 (1949), (‘shall be considered a war criminal ... [a]lien combatants or non-combatants who during a war or a period of hostilities ... or prior to the occurrence of such circumstances ... nourish intentions of enslaving, crippling, or annihilating the Chinese Nation ... by such methods as ... (a) ... enslaving ... of its nationals’).

¹¹¹⁷ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, paras. 106–124; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 515–543.

¹¹¹⁸ See 1996 ILC Draft Code, Article 18, para. 10; 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 30.

¹¹¹⁹ The Women’s Caucus for Gender Justice had indeed proposed that the Elements require such exercise of power of control over sexual access, Women’s Caucus for Gender Justice, Revised proposal for elements under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), 1 (4 August 1999).

¹¹²⁰ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 27.

¹¹²¹ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 117, fn. 145.

¹¹²² Ibid., para. 117.

¹¹²³ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, TC, 20 July 2007, paras. 703–713.

¹¹²⁴ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-A, Judgment, AC, 22 February 2008, para. 195, see also paras. 181–203.

¹¹²⁵ Prosecutor v. Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-T, Judgment, TC, 2 March 2009 (no appeal). Crit. on a lack of allegations regarding forced marriages in the ICC Katanga case, Gekker (2014) 25 Hastings Women’s LJ 105, 106 et seq.

to the right of ownership over one or more persons’, a formulation directly derived from article 1 para. 1 of the 1926 Slavery Convention¹¹²⁶.

700 This definition suggests a technical and relatively limited element of legal ‘ownership’. However, no such ‘right’ exists under contemporary national as well as international law¹¹²⁷. National legal provisions that provided for a ‘right’ of one person to own another person have been abolished. The notion of slavery under the Rome Statute cannot, therefore, be interpreted as limited to the traditional form of slavery practiced before World War II. Not even most of the slave labor used by the Nazis during World War II would qualify as a form of slavery under such a restrictive reading since not acquired through commercial exchanges and consequently¹¹²⁸. Similarly, some of the ‘comfort women’ used by the Japanese were not sold or purchased but kidnapped, coerced and deception¹¹²⁹. It can hardly have been the intention of the drafters of the Rome Statute to create only a symbolic ICC jurisdiction over slavery. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) rather appears to have been intended to take into account the evolution of customary international law since World War II, which recognizes a number of situations as slavery. This broader approach is confirmed by the examples of slavery listed in element 1 and footnote 53 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2, which clearly go beyond the traditional technical notion of slavery and interpret the definition of slavery spelled out in element 1 as covering forms of slavery recognized under international law as it has evolved since World War II¹¹³⁰. A similar approach had also been taken by the ILC when it defined enslavement, included as a crime against humanity in its 1996 Draft Code, as ‘establishing or maintaining over persons a status of slavery, servitude or forced labour contrary to well-established and widely recognized standards of international law, such as the 1926 Slavery Convention ...; the 1956 Supplementary Convention ...; the [ICCPR]; and the 1957 [ILO] Convention No. 29 ...’¹¹³¹.

701 The fact that a person was not bought, sold or traded or that no pecuniary benefit exists does not, therefore, defeat a claim of slavery¹¹³². The reference to ‘ownership’ and the examples mentioned in element 1 (‘purchasing, selling, lending or bartering ... or ... imposing a similar deprivation of liberty’) however may indicate that slavery refers to subjecting a person to treatment akin to the treatment of chattel, that is, a possession or movable good¹¹³³, such as when a person is (significantly) deprived of his or her autonomy.

¹¹²⁶ ‘Slavery’ denotes the status or condition in which the victim finds himself, while the actus reus of the crime of slavery is ‘enslavement’, that is, establishing or maintaining a status of slavery.

¹¹²⁷ See also Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 118.

¹¹²⁸ Ch. K. Hall, Article 7.

¹¹²⁹ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, Annex, para. 7. See also ibid., Annex, para. 9 (f). The UN Slavery Rapporteur however stated that ‘the Japanese military’s enslavement of women throughout Asia during the Second World War was a clear violation, even at that time, of customary international law prohibiting slavery’, ibid., Annex para. 12.

¹¹³⁰ See also Bassiouni (1991) 23 NYJIL&Politics 445, 456–459.

¹¹³¹ 1996 ILC Draft Code, Article 18, para. 10. The Commentary on article 4 para. 2 (f) Add. Prot. II also appears to suggest that the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade and Institutions and Practises Similar to Slavery of 1956 and ‘certain institutions and practices comparable to slavery, such as servitude for the payment of debts, serfdom, the purchase of wives and the exploitation of child labour’ also may amount to the prohibited ‘slavery and the slave trade in all their forms’ (emphasis added), Junod, in: Sandoz/Swinarski/Zimmermann (eds), Commentary Additional Protocols (1987) 1376 (No. 4541).

¹¹³² See 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, paras. 28 and 45 as well as Annex, para. 22; Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), para. 8; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 542.

¹¹³³ A drafting proposal that became the discussion basis for the drafting of the elements of the war crime of sexual slavery had indeed proposed an element requiring that the perpetrator ‘treated a person as chattel by exercising any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership, including sexual access through rape or other forms of sexual violence’, Proposal submitted by Costa Rica, Hungary and Switzerland on certain provisions of article 8 para. 2 (b) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: (viii), (x), (xiii), (xiv), (xv), (xvi), (xxi), (xxii), (xxvi), UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.8 (19 July 1999) 4. This proposal had been inspired by the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report which perceived ‘treatment of a person as chattel’ as a requirement of slavery, ibid. para. 28.

Indeed, control and deprivation of one's autonomy – such as restrictions on the freedom of movement or also the control of sexual access – can be considered essential elements of slavery. The wording of element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2 Rome Statute actually suggests that slavery must involve a 'deprivation of liberty'. The UN Special Rapporteur has stated that '[t]he mere ability to extricate oneself at substantial risk of personal harm from a condition of slavery should not be interpreted as nullifying a claim of slavery. In all cases, a subjective, gender-conscious analysis must also be applied in interpreting an enslaved person's reasonable fear of harm or perception of coercion. This is particularly true when the victim is in a combat zone during an armed conflict ... and has been identified as a member of the opposing group or faction'¹¹³⁴.

Commentators on sexual slavery rarely explicitly address the question whether slavery requires that a person is deprived of liberty without lawful process. Insofar the deprivation of liberty must be unlawful, sexual violence occurring during a deprivation of liberty in accordance with international humanitarian law, for instance imprisoning prisoners of war or common criminals in internal conflicts, would not qualify as sexual slavery. The US Military Tribunal held in the Pohl case that persons are 'slaves if without lawful process they are deprived of their freedom by forceful restraint'¹¹³⁵.

The lack of resistance or of consent need not be proven for the war crime of sexual slavery. It may however be indirectly relevant with regard to the question whether the accused exercises a power attaching to the right of ownership. Circumstances which render it impossible to express consent, however, would be sufficient to presume the absence of consent¹¹³⁶.

The ICTY Kunarac Trial Chamber has considered various factors as possible indications that a particular phenomenon is a form of enslavement¹¹³⁷.

As the Kunarac Appeals Chamber held, it is not possible to enumerate exhaustively all of the contemporary forms of slavery which are comprehended in the expansion of the original idea. The central question turns on the quality of the relationship between the accused and the victim, with a number of factors determining that quality. For instance, it is not necessary that the enslavement or deprivation of liberty lasted indefinitely or at least for a prolonged ¹¹³⁴ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 29. The Women's Caucus for Gender Justice had even argued that 'there are many situations in the desperate situations of armed conflict where enslavement is inflicted without deprivation of liberty', Women's Caucus for Gender Justice, Revised proposal for elements under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) 1 (4 Aug. 1999).

¹¹³⁵ U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, O. Pohl and Others (3 November 1947) V Nuremberg Military Tribunal (1997) 970.

¹¹³⁶ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 120.

¹¹³⁷ '[I]ndications of enslavement include elements of control and ownership; the restriction or control of an individual's autonomy, freedom of choice or freedom of movement; and, often, the accruing of some gain to the perpetrator. The consent or free will of the victim is absent. It is often rendered impossible or irrelevant by, for example, the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion; the fear of violence, deception or false promises; the abuse of power; the victim's position of vulnerability; detention or captivity, psychological oppression or socio-economic conditions. Further indications of enslavement include exploitation; the exaction of forced or compulsory labour or service, often without remuneration and often, though not necessarily, involving physical hardship; sex; prostitution; and human trafficking. ... international law ... make clear that not all labour or service by protected persons, including civilians, in armed conflicts, is prohibited – strict conditions are, however, set for such labour or service. The "acquisition" or "disposal" of someone for monetary or other compensation, is not a requirement for enslavement. Doing so, however, is a prime example of the exercise of the right of ownership over someone. The duration of the suspected exercise of powers attaching to the right of ownership is another factor ...; however, its importance in any given case will depend on the existence of other indications of enslavement. [F]actors ... to be taken into consideration in determining whether enslavement was committed ... [thus] are the control of someone's movement, control of physical environment, psychological control, measures taken to prevent or deter escape, force, threat of force or coercion, duration, assertion of exclusivity, subjection to cruel treatment and abuse, control of sexuality and forced labour. ... [T]he mere ability to buy, sell, trade or inherit a person or his or her labours or services ... is insufficient, such actions actually occurring could be a relevant factor'. Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 542–543 (footnotes omitted), confirmed in Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 119. See also 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 29.

period of time. The duration however may be one factor that can be considered, with its importance depending on the existence of other indications of enslavement and on the context¹¹³⁸. Also, ‘slaves may be well fed, well clothed, and comfortably housed, but ... [t]here is no such thing as benevolent slavery. Involuntary servitude, even if tempered by humane treatment, is still slavery’¹¹³⁹.

707 The Kunarac Trial Chamber found two accused guilty of the crime against humanity of enslavement (besides rape and outrages upon personal dignity), as they, inter alia, denied two victims ‘any control over their lives ... during their stay there. They had to obey all orders, they had to do household chores and they had no realistic option whatsoever to flee the house ... or to escape their assailants. They were subjected to other mistreatments, such as ... rape ... The two women were treated as the personal property of Kunarac and DP 6. ... Both men personally committed the act of enslavement’¹¹⁴⁰.

708 Another accused, Kovač, was found guilty of the crime against humanity of enslavement (again besides rape and outrages upon personal dignity) for, inter alia, selling two female victims and ‘locking them up and by psychologically imprisoning them, and thereby depriving them of their freedom of movement. During that time, he had complete control over their movements, privacy and labour. He made them cook for him, serve him and do the household chores for him. He subjected them to degrading treatments, including beatings and other humiliating treatments’¹¹⁴¹.

709 The first examples element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2 Rome Statute mentions as qualifying as exercising powers attaching to the right of ownership are ‘purchasing, selling, lending or bartering such a person or persons’¹¹⁴². These (trans)actions of a commercial nature certainly are examples of the exercise of ownership and reflect the notion of slavery as it traditionally has been understood. Even the 1926 Slavery Convention had defined ‘slave trade’ in its article 1 para. 2 as including ‘all acts involved in the capture, acquisition or disposal of a person with intent to reduce him to slavery; all acts involved in the acquisition of a slave with a view to selling or exchanging him; all acts of disposal by sale or exchange of a slave acquired with a view to being sold or exchanged, and, in general, every act of trade or transport in slaves’.

710 Element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-2 however adds that ‘imposing ... a similar deprivation of liberty’ (emphasis added) also amounts to exercising powers attaching to the right of ownership, with footnote 53 to element 1 providing some examples of such similar deprivation of liberty. Yet, the examples listed make it clear that the term ‘similar’ does not mean that the deprivation of liberty must have a similar commercial element¹¹⁴³.

711 The first of the examples in footnote 53 is ‘in some circumstances ..., exacting forced labour’. International law does not prohibit all forced labor or service in armed conflicts, while particularly prohibiting compelling protected persons to serve in the armed forces or involving them in military operations of the adversary and setting strict conditions for the requisition of labor and services in armed conflicts such as those spelled out in articles 40 and 51 GC IV¹¹⁴⁴.

¹¹³⁸ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, paras. 119 and 121. With regard to the mens rea, the Kunarac Appeals Chamber stated that ‘[i]t is not required to prove that the accused intended to detain the victims under constant control for a prolonged period of time in order to use them for sexual acts’, ibid., para. 122.

¹¹³⁹ U.S. Military Tribunal at Nürnberg, O. Pohl and Others, (3 Nov. 1947), V Nuremberg Military Tribunal (1997) 970.

¹¹⁴⁰ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 742 and 745.

¹¹⁴¹ Ibid., paras. 775–782.

¹¹⁴² The proposal to add ‘abducting’ to this list did not eventually find its way into the Elements.

¹¹⁴³ The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery correctly stated that ‘[i]t is unnecessary and inappropriate to require any element of commercial transaction for the crime of sexual slavery. Most contemporary forms of slavery, including sexual slavery, do not involve payment or exchange ...’. Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), para. 29.

¹¹⁴⁴ See Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23T and IT-96-23/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, paras. 528–530 and 542.

A second example in footnote 53 is ‘otherwise reducing a person to servile status as defined in the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery of 1956’ (emphasis added). Article 1 in connection with article 7 (b) of that Convention provides that a person of servile status means a person in the condition or status resulting from any of the following institutions or practices:

- (a) Debt bondage, that is to say, the status or condition arising from a pledge by a debtor of his personal services or of those of a person under his control as security for a debt, if the value of those services as reasonably assessed is not applied towards the liquidation of the debt or the length and nature of those services are not respectively limited and defined;
- (b) Serfdom, that is to say, the condition or status of a tenant who is by law, custom or agreement bound to live and labour on land belonging to another person and to render some determinate service to such other person, whether for reward or not, and is not free to change his status;
- (c) Any institution or practice whereby:
 - (i) A woman, without the right to refuse, is promised or given in marriage on payment of a consideration in money or in kind to her parents, guardian, family or any other person or group; or
 - (ii) The husband of a woman, his family, or his clan, has the right to transfer her to another person for value received or otherwise; or
 - (iii) A woman on the death of her husband is liable to be inherited by another person;
- (d) Any institution or practice whereby a child or young person under the age of 18 years, is delivered by either or both of his natural parents or by his guardian to another person, whether for reward or not, with a view to the exploitation of the child or young person or of his labour’.

A third example mentioned in footnote 53 is the ‘trafficking in persons, in particular women and children’. The 1949 Trafficking Convention suggests that a person engages in trafficking in persons when he ‘to gratify the passions of another: (1) Procures, entices or leads away, for purposes of prostitution, another person, even with the consent of that person’¹¹⁴⁵. The 1999 Trafficking Protocol (not yet entered into force) provides a more recent definition of ‘trafficking in persons’:

‘the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person [or by other means (subparagraph (c))], for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs’¹¹⁴⁶.

A number of other international instruments prohibit the trafficking of persons¹¹⁴⁷. The UN Sub-Commission’s Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery has stated that ‘trans-border trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation is a contemporary form of slavery and constitutes a serious violation of human rights’¹¹⁴⁸.

¹¹⁴⁵ UN Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, UN GA Res. 317 (IV) (2 Dec. 1949), Art. 1(1).

¹¹⁴⁶ UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, UN Doc. A/RES/55/25 (15 November 2000), article 3. See A. Gallagher, ‘Human Rights and the New UN Protocols on Trafficking and Migrant Smuggling: A Preliminary Analysis’, 23(4) HumRQ 4, 975(2001).

¹¹⁴⁷ See, e.g., article 6 para. 1 ACHR; article 6 CEDAW; article 11 para. 1 of the 1989 UN Convention on the Rights of the Child; Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, UN Doc. A/RES/54/263 (25 May 2000). See also L. Chiang, ‘Trafficking in Women: An International Issue’, in: K. D. Askin/D. M. Koenig (eds.) Women’s Human Rights: A Reference Guide (1999); J. Chuang, ‘Redirecting the Debate over Trafficking in Women: Definitions, Paradigms, and Concerns’, 11 HarvHumRtsJ 65 (1998); C. K. Hall, Article 7, First Edition of this Commentary, 160–161 (mn 96); S. F. Toepfer/B. S. Wells, ‘The Worldwide Market for Sex: A Review of International and Regional Legal Prohibitions Regarding Trafficking in Women’, 2 MichJGender&L 83 (1994).

¹¹⁴⁸ Report of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery on its twenty-third session, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1998/14 (6 July 1998), recommendation 4, para. 1.

- 715 The list of examples in element 1 and footnote 53 of what may constitute a ‘similar deprivation of liberty’ is non-exhaustive. Correspondingly, other acts or omissions may amount to enslavement as defined in element 1 such as those indicated by the ICTY in the Kunarac case. One example is a forced marriage¹¹⁴⁹ (which in any event appears to qualify under ‘otherwise reducing a person to servile status’). Forced marriages may be distinguished from ‘arranged marriages’, in that arranged marriages, which exist in various parts of the world, are based on the consent of both parties (while not necessarily of both persons to be married) whereas forced marriages involve the lack of consent of at least one of the parties¹¹⁵⁰. The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery considered that ‘The repeated rape and sexual abuse of women and girls under the guise of ‘marriage’ constitutes slavery, as the victims do not have the freedom to leave, to refuse the sham ‘marriage’ or to decide whether and on what terms to engage in sexual activity’¹¹⁵¹. The Special Rapporteur therefore perceived sexual slavery as encompassing ‘situations where women and girls were forced into ‘marriage’, domestic servitude or other forced labour that ultimately involves forced sexual activity ... by their captors’¹¹⁵², qualifying as sexual slavery situations such as the sexual abuse of Burmese women and girls ‘after being forced into ‘marriages’ or forced to work as porters or minefield sweepers for the military’ or the forcing by Liberian combatants of women and girls into working as cooks and holding them as sexual slaves¹¹⁵³. It can also be argued that the control over sexual access itself is a form of exercising a power of ownership over a person¹¹⁵⁴.
- 716 d) War crime of enforced prostitution. ‘Enforced prostitution’ is prohibited under article 27 para. 2 GC IV as an attack on women’s honour and under article 75 para. 2 (b) Add. Prot. I as an outrage upon personal dignity. Article 76 para. 1 furthermore states that ‘[w]omen shall be the object of special respect and shall be protected in particular against ... forced prostitution ...’ (emphasis added)¹¹⁵⁵.
- 717 Enforced prostitution has been made punishable for instance under Australian and Chinese laws of 1945 and 1946, respectively¹¹⁵⁶. In a post-World War II trial, the Japanese hotel-keeper Awochi was found guilty of the ‘war crime of enforced prostitution’ for having forced Dutch women to practice prostitution in the premises of the club-restaurant in Batavia which at that time was occupied by Japanese forces¹¹⁵⁷.

¹¹⁴⁹ See 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, paras. 8 and 30.

¹¹⁵⁰ See Report of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery on its twenty-fifth session, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/23 (21 July 2000), para. 114.

¹¹⁵¹ Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), para. 13.

¹¹⁵² See 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 30.

¹¹⁵³ See 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 30. See also Update to the 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/21 (6 June 2000), paras. 10–22 and 53.

¹¹⁵⁴ The UN Special Rapporteur defined ‘slavery’ as ‘the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised, including sexual access through rape or other forms of sexual violence’, 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 27. See also Women’s Caucus for Gender Justice, Revised proposal for elements under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) 1 (4 Aug. 1999).

¹¹⁵⁵ As regards human rights instruments, article 6 CEDAW for instance requires states to, i.a., suppress ‘all forms of ... exploitation of prostitution of women’, and the Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, UN Doc. A/RES/317 (IV) (2 Dec. 1949), requires States in its article 1 para. 2 ‘to punish any person who, to gratify the passions of another: ... Exploits the prostitution of another person, even with the consent of that person’. The ILC also included ‘enforced prostitution’ in its list of crimes against humanity under the 1996 ILC Draft Code.

¹¹⁵⁶ Commonwealth of Australia War Crimes Act of 1945, V Law Reports 94–95 (1948), (referring to a list of war crimes including the ‘abduction of girls and women for the purpose of enforced prostitution’); Chinese Law governing the Trial of War Criminals of 24 Oct. 1946, XIV Law Reports 154 (1949), (‘Kidnapping females and forcing them to become prostitutes’). This war crime had also been included in the list of offences of the 1919 Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties.

¹¹⁵⁷ Awochi had been charged with having ‘in time of war and as a subject of a hostile power, namely Japan’ and ‘owner of the Sakura-Club, founded for the use of Japanese civilians’, committed ‘war crimes by, in violation of the laws and customs of war, recruiting women and girls to serve the said civilians ...’, and then under direct

The term ‘prostitution’ seems to suggest that sexual services are provided as part of an exchange and that the sexual activity may be offered and initiated by the victim and not necessarily by the perpetrator or a ‘client’. However, as the adjective ‘enforced’ makes clear, the victim is coerced or compelled to such exchange or offer, particularly to avoid harm to him- or herself or someone else or to obtain something necessary for survival¹¹⁵⁸. Enforced prostitution may cover a single act as well as a continuing situation¹¹⁵⁹. Again, this war crime of sexual violence protects women as well as men or children from enforced prostitution¹¹⁶⁰. In contrast for instance to rape, the ‘client’ engaging in an individual sexual act may not use any force or coercion or not even be aware of coercive circumstances.

The Elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-3 Rome Statute require two particular elements, the first being that the perpetrator caused the victim ‘to engage in one or more acts of a sexual nature by force, or by threat of force or coercion, such as that caused by fear of violence, duress, detention, psychological oppression or abuse of power, against such person or persons or another person, or by taking advantage of a coercive environment or such person’s or persons’ incapacity to give genuine consent’¹¹⁶¹.

Secondly, the perpetrator or another person (including the ‘client’) ‘obtained or expected to obtain pecuniary or other advantage in exchange for or in connection with the acts of a sexual nature’.

e) War crime of forced pregnancy. The Rome Statute is the first international, legally binding instrument that explicitly prohibits forced pregnancy, and criminalizes it as a war crime (and crime against humanity). The crime of forced pregnancy combines both (en)forced impregnation (pregnancy as a result of rape or some involuntary medical procedure) as well as (en)forced maternity (being forced to carry the pregnancy to term)¹¹⁶², the latter of which may have devastating consequences for the victim (social, financial, emotional, etc.) and has been used for reasons of ethnic cleansing. The notion of or indirect threat of the Kempei (Japanese Military Police) should they wish to leave, forcing them to commit prostitution with the members of the said club’, which the women and girls “were not able to leave freely”. The accused was found guilty of the war crime of ‘enforced prostitution’ based on article 1 para. 7 of Netherlands East Indies Statute Book Decree No. 44 of 1946 concerning the ‘Definition of War Crimes’ and establishing the jurisdiction over such crimes of the Netherlands Temporary Court-Martial at Batavia. The war crime was defined as ‘[a]bduction of girls and women for the purpose of enforced prostitution’. With regard to the ‘enforced prostitution’, on which the court put the accent, the court found that women and girls ‘intended for prostitution had to take up residence in a part of the club shut off for that purpose and from which they were not free to move’, having been under the serious threat with the Japanese military police should they try to leave, which threats, ‘in view of the nature of the police, ‘were rightly considered as being synonymous with ill-treatment, loss of liberty or worse’. Netherlands Temporary Court- Martial at Batavia, Washio Awochi (25 Oct. 1946), XIII Law Reports 122–124 (1949).

¹¹⁵⁸ The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery defined ‘[f]orced prostitution’ as generally referring to ‘conditions of control over a person who is coerced by another to engage in sexual activity’, noting, however, that ‘[t]he terms ‘forced prostitution’ or ‘enforced prostitution’ appear in international and humanitarian conventions but have been insufficiently understood and inconsistently applied’, 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, para. 31.

¹¹⁵⁹ See M. Boot, revised by C. K. Hall, Article 7 para. 1 (g)-3. The Commentary on article 27 para. 2 defined the term enforced prostitution as ‘the forcing of a woman into immorality by violence or threats’, Pictet (ed.), Commentaries Geneva Conventions Vol. IV (1960) article 27, 206. This old interpretation however is unsatisfactory, as it euphemistically puts the emphasis on the ‘immorality’.

¹¹⁶⁰ See Pilloud/Pictet, in: Sandoz/Swinarski/Zimmermann (eds.), Commentary Additional Protocols (1987) 874 (No. 3049).

¹¹⁶¹ Fn. 53 of the Elements of Crimes applies also, stating that ‘[i]t is understood that a person may be incapable of giving genuine consent if affected by natural, induced or age-related incapacity’. With regard to coercive environment and consent, reference can be made to what has been said with regard to the crime of rape, see above.

¹¹⁶² Some activists for the rights of the women did not support the term and definition of forced pregnancy, since it combines two crimes – the (en)forced impregnation (pregnancy as a result of rape or some involuntary medical procedure) and the (en)forced maternity (being forced to carry the pregnancy to term) – they deem should be addressed separately in their own right, Koenig/Askin, in: Askin/Koenig (eds.), Women&IHumRtsL (2000) 14 (fn. 50).

forced pregnancy became recurrently used in the UN system after reports from the conflict in the former Yugoslavia that Bosnian women were raped, impregnated and held in camps until it was too late for them to obtain an abortion, forcing them to bear the child of the rapist's ethnicity as part of a policy of 'ethnic cleansing'¹¹⁶³. The 1993 Vienna Declaration and Program of Action as well as the 1995 Beijing Platform of Action considered forced pregnancy as a violation of the fundamental principles of international human rights and humanitarian law and the Platform noted that grave violations of the human rights of women, including forced pregnancy, occur in particular under policies of ethnic cleansing¹¹⁶⁴.

721 During the 1996 Preparatory Committee meetings, it had been proposed to include 'forced impregnation' as a crime against humanity under ICC jurisdiction¹¹⁶⁵. While consensus on the crimes of sexual violence that should be covered under the Rome Statute was largely reached during the December 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, the proposed offence of 'enforced pregnancy' remained controversial and was opposed above all by the Holy See which preferred no such crime or at least a change of the wording to 'forced impregnation'¹¹⁶⁶. The primary concern of the Holy See was that the term (en)forced pregnancy 'could be interpreted as a justification of abortion, either in situations of armed conflict or as a precedent for other situations'¹¹⁶⁷. The Holy See also argued that the term 'forced pregnancy' is per se ambiguous, '[s]ince it is difficult to view the birth of an innocent human being as a crime; instead we have here a combination of crimes to which heavy penalties have already been attached: sexual violence, unlawful confinement, etc.'¹¹⁶⁸. 'Forcible impregnation' however was not acceptable to the delegations supporting the earlier, unbracketed wording 'forced pregnancy' text as it referred only to making a woman pregnant, whereas 'enforced pregnancy' involved keeping the woman pregnant.

722 The definition of the offence became a highly controversial issue at the Rome Conference itself. In order to allow for a compromise acceptable for all, interested delegations proceeded ¹¹⁶³ Final Report of the UN Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), UN Doc. S/1994/674 (27 May 1994), paras. 248 and 250 as well as Annex IX (Rape and Sexual Assault) (fn. 22). The Women's Caucus on Gender Justice in the ICC notes that forced pregnancy also occurred in Rwanda as well as during the period of African-American slavery, when women held as slaves were forced to bear children and were subjected to torture, beatings and other forms of coercion and deprivation if they did not, with some of these pregnancies being the result of rape, Women's Caucus for Gender Justice, The Crime of Forced Pregnancy (26 June 1998), available at <http://iccwomen.org/icc/rome/crime.htm>.

¹¹⁶⁴ Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, UN Doc. A/CONF.157/23 (12 July 1993), para. 38 ('Violations of the human rights of women in situations of armed conflict are violations of the fundamental principles of international human rights and humanitarian law. All violations of this kind, including in particular murder, systematic rape, sexual slavery, and forced pregnancy, require a particularly effective response' (emphasis added)); Beijing Platform of Action, Report of the Fourth World Conference on Women (Beijing, 4–15 Sep. 1995), UN Doc. A/CONF.177/20 (17 Oct. 1995), Annex II, paras. 132 and 11, as well as paras. 114, 135 and 142 (c). In resolutions on the elimination of violence against women and on the rights of the child, the Human Rights Commission has since 1995 repeatedly qualified forced pregnancy as a violation of international human rights and humanitarian law, calling for an effective response to such violations, see, e.g., UN Doc. E/CN.4/1995 (8 Mar. 1995), para. 5. See also generally A. T. Goldstein, Recognizing Forced Impregnation as a War Crime (1993).

¹¹⁶⁵ 'There were proposals to refer to rape committed on national or religious grounds; rape, other serious assaults of a sexual nature, such as forced impregnation; or outrages upon personal dignity ... with attention being drawn to recent acts committed as part of a campaign of ethnic cleansing', 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 98.

¹¹⁶⁶ The Holy See formally tabled a proposal during the March–April 1998 Preparatory Committee session, see UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/DP.13 (1 Apr. 1998).

¹¹⁶⁷ J.-L. Tauran, The Defence of Life in the Context of International Policies and Norms (11 Feb. 2000) (text at fn. 25) available at: http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/index.htm.

¹¹⁶⁸ Id., fn. 25. At the Rome Diplomatic Conference, the Women's Caucus stated that '[i]t is difficult to understand how the debate about the crime of enforced pregnancy has become a debate about abortion', suggesting that it was never their intention to have any effect on the legitimacy or legality under international law of national laws which criminalize the termination of pregnancy, Women's Caucus for Gender Justice, The Crime of Forced Pregnancy (26 June 1998), available at: <http://iccwomen.org/icc/rome/crime.htm>. See also Koenig/Askin, in: Askin/Koenig (eds.), Women and Int'l Human Rights Law (2000)14 (fn. 50).

to work out a compromise definition, with the Holy See as well as a few catholic and Arabic states insisting on a clear and unambiguous definition of the crime primarily to avoid that it might be used as a precedent with regard to abortion-issues. The adoption of the wording ‘forced pregnancy’ instead of ‘enforced pregnancy’ (emphasis added), which might more easily be understood as criminalizing laws against abortion, as well as the circumstantial element of pregnancy resulting from an act of force and the element of unlawful confinement of the pregnant woman was reached relatively easily. Particularly difficult, however, was to reach agreement on what ‘intent’ the perpetrator must have had. While Catholic and Arab states insisted on a high- threshold ‘ethnic-cleansing’ intent, others considered that such intent was only one of various reasons why the crime might be committed. A compromise definition which made the inclusion of the crime against humanity and war crime of forced pregnancy acceptable to all delegations was only reached on the second-last day of the Conference¹¹⁶⁹:

‘Forced pregnancy’ means the unlawful confinement of a woman forcibly made pregnant, with the intent of affecting the ethnic composition of any population or carrying out other grave violations of international law. This definition shall not in any way be interpreted as affecting national laws relating to pregnancy’ (article 7 para. 2 (f) Rome Statute). 723

The second sentence meets the main concern of the Holy See and other states in making it clear that national laws prohibiting abortion or otherwise providing for rules against abortion, or more precisely, adopting, applying or enforcing such laws, do not amount to forced pregnancy as defined under the Rome Statute. 724

A first, circumstantial element pre-existing the confinement is that the woman concerned has been forcibly made pregnant, be it by the perpetrator or any other person. The adjective ‘forcibly’ refers to the use of force or other coercion, that is, the lack of consent, such as in the case of rape or insemination without consent. 725

The main element of the actus reus of forced pregnancy however consists of unlawfully confining a woman that has previously and forcibly been made pregnant. Confining should be understood broadly as any form of deprivation of physical liberty. The term unlawful should, similarly to its use in other parts of the Rome Statute, be interpreted as meaning contrary to international law and standards. Yet, the Preparatory Commission did not stipulate in element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-4 and article 7 para. 1 (g)-4 that the confining must be ‘unlawful’. However, in view of the aim of the prohibition, confining a woman made forcibly pregnant in accordance with international humanitarian law (for instance as a prisoner of war) is insufficient to incur criminal responsibility under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-4, unless, it is submitted, the woman is prevented from accessing medical services and from a feasible abortion in time with the necessary special intent. 726

In any event, the Rome Statute requires that the perpetrator had a special intent¹¹⁷⁰. First, such intent can consist of affecting a population’s ethnic composition, including ethnic cleansing or otherwise weakening an ethnic group. Secondly, intent to carry out ‘other grave violations of international law’¹¹⁷¹ is sufficient even if rather vague. This second alternative may for instance cover medical experiments contrary to international law, while not covering pure sadism or, apparently, the mere intention that the child always reminds the woman and her family or community of what happened¹¹⁷². The Women’s Caucus For Gender Justice in 727

¹¹⁶⁹ On the drafting history, see Steains, in: Lee et al. (ed.) Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 365–369; von Hebel/Robinson, in: Lee (ed.), Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 100; Bedont/Hall-Martinez (1999) 6 BrownJWorldAff 1, 65.

¹¹⁷⁰ The Preparatory Commission had proposed to specify the intent by adding the words ‘to keep the woman pregnant’, a formulation which, however, met considerable opposition by some delegations, wherefore the Commission went back to the wording of the Statute, Rückert/Witschel, in: Fischer/Kress/Lüder (eds.), International and National Prosecution (2001) 85.

¹¹⁷¹ The term ‘other’ actually does not appear correct, as affecting the ethnic composition of any population is not as such a violation of international law.

¹¹⁷² See also T. A. Salzman, ‘Rape Camps as a Means of Ethnic Cleansing: Religious, Cultural, and Ethical Responses to Rape Victims in the Former Yugoslavia’, 20 HumRQ 365–366 (1998).

the ICC had intended at the Rome Conference that the crime of ‘forced pregnancy’ would also cover ‘[t]he impregnation of Jewish women under the Nazi regime in order to conduct medical experiments on them and/or their fetuses’, an offense that clearly could qualify under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-4, as well as ‘[t]he current trend to kidnap pregnant women, hold them, and sell their babies on the black market’, an offense that cannot be subsumed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii)- 4 since the women were not forcibly made pregnant (but might qualify under other war crimes such as sexual slavery)¹¹⁷³.

728 f) Enforced sterilization. Enforced sterilization has been punished in the context of war crimes trials relating to medical experiments conducted particularly in concentration camps during World War II¹¹⁷⁴.

729 According to element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-5, the actus reus of enforced sterilization consists of ‘depriving [a person of his or her] biological reproductive capacity’. This wording thus criminalizes the deprivation of a person to produce offspring. As footnote 54 of the Elements of Crimes makes clear, such deprivation does not cover ‘birth-control measures which have non-permanent effect in practice’, such as birth-control pills which can be stopped to be taken and the impact of which can be reversed. The war crime of enforced sterilization thus requires intent to permanently deprive of reproductive capacity.

730 The qualifying adjective ‘enforced’ suggests that the sterilization must be forcible, such as when it is against the will of the victim. Element 2 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-5 however approaches this issue somewhat differently, suggesting that the sterilization only amounts to a war crime if it was neither justified by the medical or hospital treatment of the victim nor carried with his or her genuine consent¹¹⁷⁵. Footnote 55 adds that ‘consent obtained through deception’ does not qualify as ‘genuine consent’, excluding for instance misinformation regarding the permanence or reversibility of the sterilization. The consent thus must be informed. Footnote 51 states that ‘a person may be incapable of giving genuine consent if affected by natural, induced or age-related incapacity’. In addition, it is submitted that justifying consent would have to be voluntary, anything else making little sense, in particular in times of armed conflict. However, a sterilization which is required and thus ‘justified’ in view of the health of the person concerned might still amount to the war crime of enforced sterilization insofar it is ‘forcible’ (including when occurring against the person concerned capable, voluntary and informed will); once more, the relationship between the Statute’s wording (‘enforced’) and the elements suggested by the Elements of Crimes is not entirely clear.

731 g) War crime of any other form of sexual violence. Forms of sexual violence that cannot be qualified under one of the five above-analyzed specific types of sexual violence offenses listed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-1 to -5 may still come under ICC jurisdiction insofar they qualify under the residual, open-phrased clause of ‘any other form of sexual violence also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’.

732 International humanitarian law prohibits not only rape and specific forms of sexual violence, but more generally ‘any form of indecent assault’. For instance, article 27 para. 2 GC IV provides that ‘[w]omen shall be protected against any attack on their honour, in particular against rape, enforced prostitution, or any form of indecent assault’. Similarly, article 76 para. 1 Add. Prot. I provides that ‘[w]omen shall be the object of special respect and shall be protected in particular against rape, forced prostitution and any other form of indecent assault’. Article 4 para. 2 Add. Prot. II prohibits, in internal armed conflicts, ‘at any time and in any place whatsoever ... outrages upon personal dignity, in particular ... any form of indecent assault’, thereby appearing to detail common article 3 sub-para. (c) and arguably extend the protection against indecent assaults also in international armed conflicts to protected persons other than women. Article 27 para. 1 GC IV furthermore provides that ‘[protected persons] shall at all times be humanely treated, and shall be protected especially against all acts of violence or threats thereof and against insults and public curiosity’.

¹¹⁷³ See Women’s Caucus For Gender Justice In the ICC, Priority Concerns Respecting War Crimes Article B(p bis) (not dated, on file with the author).

¹¹⁷⁴ Article II of the Chinese War Crimes Law of 24 Oct. 1946 considered a war criminal any ‘[a]lien combatants or non-combatants who during a war or a period of hostilities ... or prior to the occurrence of such circumstances ... nourish intentions of enslaving, crippling, or annihilating the Chinese Nation ... by such methods as ... destroying [people’s] power of procreation’, XIV Law Reports 153 (1949). See also Supreme National Tribunal of Poland, Rudolf F. F. Hoess (11–29 Mar. 1947), VII Law Reports 14–16 (1948); U.S. Military Tribunal No. 1, K. Brandt et al. (‘Medical Case’, Case No. 1), I+II Nuremberg Military Tribunal (1997).

¹¹⁷⁵ See also above, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-1.

Drawing on article 4 para. 2 (e) Add. Prot. II, the ICTR Statute in its article 4 para. 2 provides jurisdiction over ‘outrages upon personal dignity, in particular ... rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault’. The Čelebići Trial Chamber also stated that ‘[t]here can be no doubt that rape and other forms of sexual assault are expressly prohibited under international humanitarian law’ (emphasis added), referring inter alia to article 46 Hague Regulations, which according to the ICTY implicitly prohibits rape and sexual assault by protecting family honour and rights¹¹⁷⁶. The Furundžija Trial Chamber held that ‘international criminal rules punish not only rape but also any serious sexual assault falling short of actual penetration. It would seem that the prohibition embraces all serious abuses of a sexual nature inflicted upon the physical and moral integrity of a person by means of coercion, threat of force or intimidation in a way that is degrading and humiliating for the victim’s dignity’¹¹⁷⁷. The Akayesu ICTR Trial Chamber considered ‘sexual violence ... as any act of a sexual nature which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. Sexual violence is not limited to physical invasion of the human body and may include acts which do not involve penetration or even physical contact. The incident ... in which the Accused ordered the Interahamwe to undress a student and force her to do gymnastics naked in the public courtyard of the bureau communal, in front of a crowd, constitutes sexual violence. ... Sexual violence falls within the scope of ‘other inhumane acts’, ... ‘outrages upon personal dignity’, ... and ‘serious bodily or mental harm’ set forth in ... the Statute’¹¹⁷⁸. On the basis of the Akayesu decision, the Kvočka Trial Chamber held that sexual violence includes sexual mutilation (insofar not amounting to enforced sterilization), forced marriage (insofar not amounting to sexual slavery), forced abortion and even sexual molestation¹¹⁷⁹. The Todorović Trial Chamber qualified biting into a penis and kicking in the genital area as a sexual assault¹¹⁸⁰.

The UN Slavery Rapporteur defined sexual violence as ‘any violence, physical or psychological, carried out through sexual means or by targeting sexuality’, and stated that it ‘covers both physical and psychological attacks directed at a person’s sexual characteristics, such as forcing a person to strip naked in public, mutilating a person’s genitals, or slicing off a woman’s breasts. Sexual violence also characterizes situations in which two victims are forced to perform sexual acts on one another or to harm one another in a sexual manner’¹¹⁸¹.

In the negotiations leading to the adoption of the Rome Statute, the February 1997 Preparatory Committee proposed to incorporate ‘rape, enforced prostitution and other sexual violence of comparable gravity’ (in brackets) as examples of the grave breach of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health¹¹⁸², using the ‘comparable gravity’ as a threshold. The December 1997 Preparatory Committee session then made the sexual violence offences, including ‘any other form of sexual violence also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’¹¹⁸³, war crimes in their own right.

¹¹⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 476.

¹¹⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 186.

¹¹⁷⁸ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 688.

¹¹⁷⁹ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, para. 180 (fn. 343).

¹¹⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Todorović, IT-95-9/1-S, Sentencing Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 July 2001, para. 38 (and para. 66).

¹¹⁸¹ 1998 UN Slavery Rapporteur Report, paras. 21–22 (references omitted).

¹¹⁸² 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 6 (para. A(c)).

¹¹⁸³ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, p. 11 (para. B(pbis)).

736 According to element 1 for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)-6, the first element of the war crime of ‘any other form of sexual violence’ consists of either committing an act of a sexual nature against a person or causing a person to engage in an act of a sexual nature. In the Kenyan situation, PTC II rejected to apply ‘other form of sexual violence’ on male circumcisions and penile amputations arguing as follows:

‘not every act of violence which targets parts of the body commonly associated with sexuality should be considered an act of sexual violence. In this respect, the Chamber considers that the determination of whether an act is of a sexual nature is inherently a question of fact. The Chamber finds that the evidence placed before it does not establish the sexual nature of the acts of forcible circumcision and penile amputation visited upon Luo men. Instead, it appears from the evidence that the acts were motivated by ethnic prejudice and intended to demonstrate cultural superiority of one tribe over the other.’¹¹⁸⁴

737 Regrettably, the aforementioned decision failed to explain why the penile amputations were not to be subsumed under ‘enforced sterilization’. Secondly, to qualify as sexual violence under the Rome Statute, and not merely as an act of a sexual nature, such conduct must be qualified by an element of coercion, defined in the same way as in respect of the war crime of rape.

738 Thirdly, element 2 specifies that the conduct must have been ‘of a gravity comparable to that of a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ (emphasis added). This interpretation of the wording of the Rome Statute ‘also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ (emphasis added) however is less than obvious. The unclear meaning of the phrase ‘also constituting ...’ indeed gave rise to extensive debate and a sustained lobbying effort of the ICC Women’s Caucus. When analyzing the meaning of the phrase ‘also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) Rome Statute, it is helpful to distinguish between this phrase’s implications with regard to the five specific forms of sexual violence listed before the comma on the one hand, and with regard to the residual clause on the other hand.

739 In respect of the meaning with regard to the five specific forms of sexual violence, there are three possibilities: First, the phrase may be considered not at all to apply to the five specific forms of sexual violence, since, as can be argued, there is a comma separating the five forms from the phrase and since the phrase was only meant to indicate a threshold for the residual clause. Second, it can be argued that the phrase is merely an affirmation that the five specific forms of sexual violence in any event – without any need to prove it – amount to grave breaches. This meaning has been particularly propagated by the ICC Women’s Caucus. Thirdly, it could also be argued that even the five specific forms of sexual violence only come under ICC jurisdiction if it is demonstrated that under applicable international law, the specific act or the specific form of sexual violence amounts to a grave breach. This third way of interpretation must be rejected, since it was the specific intention of delegations at the Rome Conference to make the specifically listed forms of sexual violence war crimes in their own right and precisely to avoid the need to have to subsume these sex crimes under a more general form of mistreatment. This has been confirmed e contrario by the elements of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) which require only with regard to the residual clause that the sexual violence be ‘of a gravity comparable ...’, while omitting any such requirement with regard to the five specific forms of sexual violence. The specific forms of sexual violence thus either do not require amounting to a grave breach or per se, at any rate, amount to such a grave breach.

740 With regard to the meaning and implication of the phrase ‘also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ for the residual clause ‘any other form of sexual violence’, we can distinguish two main interpretations. First, the clause might be considered to provide that ‘any other form of sexual violence’ only comes under ICC jurisdiction insofar it also qualifies as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions. The conduct concerned must thus demonstrably either have fulfilled the elements of a grave breach¹¹⁸⁵, or the particular ‘other form of sexual violence’ must be recognized, under applicable international law, as a grave breach of its own (possibly including those not yet recognized as grave breaches at the time of the adoption of the Rome Statute)¹¹⁸⁶.

¹¹⁸⁴ Prosecutor v. Muthaura et al., ICC-01/09-02/11-382, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges pursuant to article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, PTC II, 23 January 2012, paras. 265–266 (on CaH).

After intensive lobbying of the Women’s Caucus, the ICC Preparatory Commission however suggested another interpretation, namely, that the phrase ‘also constituting a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ means ‘of gravity comparable to that of a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions’ (element 2, emphasis added). This interpretation, however, goes against the wording of the definition under the Rome Statute and, according to article 9 para. 3 Rome Statute, would thus not appear to bind the judges. All the same, it is the interpretation the states participating in the Preparatory Commission as well as the Assembly of States Parties wished to give to the phrase. From a teleological perspective, this interpretation appears to accord with the main rationale behind the phrase, since delegations at the Rome Conference above all intended to fix a certain threshold and to exclude ‘lesser’ forms of sexual violence or harassment that would not amount to most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole and thus not warrant prosecution before the ICC. ‘Any other form of sexual violence’ consequently must, in order to come under ICC jurisdiction, reach the minimum threshold of gravity comparable to a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions, such as torture, inhuman treatment, biological experiments, wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, or, arguably, one of the five specific forms of sexual violence listed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), insofar these are deemed to per se constitute grave breaches.¹¹⁸⁷

23. Paragraph 2(b)(xxiii): Utilizing the presence of a protected person to render certain objects immune from military operations

Literature: Anderson, K., Statement at the Conference of the Swiss Foundation for World Affairs, International Humanitarian Law and Human Rights: How Relevant are they in today’s wars? (2003); Arnold, R., The ICC as a New Instrument for Repressing Terrorism (2004); id., ‘Training With the Opposition: The Status of the ‘Free Iraqi Forces’ in the US’ war against Saddam Hussein’, (2003) 33 HeidelbergJIL 3, 631; Dinstein, Y., The Conduct of Hostilities under the Law of International Armed Conflict (2004); Elliott, H.W., ‘Open Cities and Undefended Places’, (1995) The Army Lawyer 39; Fenrick, W.J., ‘The Rule of Proportionality and Protocol I in Conventional Warfare’, (1982) 98 MillRev 91; id., ‘Attacking the Enemy Civilian as a Punishable Offence’, (1997) 7 DukeJComp&IL 539; Frank, D., ‘Commentary on Art. 8(2)(b)(xxiii)-Using protected persons as shields’, in: R. S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 199–201; Haas, J., ‘Voluntary human shields: status and protection under international humanitarian law’, in: R. Arnold and P.-A. Hildebrand (eds.), International Humanitarian Law and the 21st Century’s Conflicts: Changes and Challenges (2005); ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law, adopted by the Assembly of the ICRC on 26 February 2009, (2008) 90 (872) IRRC 991; Parks, W.H., ‘Air War and the Law of War’, (1990) 32 A.F.L.Rev. 1; Schmitt, M.N., ‘Bellum Americanum: The US view of Twenty-First Century War and Its possible implications for the law of armed conflict’, (1998) 19 MichJIL 1051; Schmitt, M., ‘Human Shields in International Humanitarian Law’, (2008–2009) 47 ColJTransnatL 292.

Article 8 para. 2(b)(xxiii) of the ICC Statute the first instance of criminalization of the use of human shields as an autonomous crime.¹¹⁸⁸ This is not a new phenomenon, however, and ¹¹⁸⁵ From a teleological point of view, an exception might be construed with regard to the scope of protected persons. This seems also warranted for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) in comparison to article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi), the latter of which does not contain such a restriction of the scope of protected persons (‘any other form of sexual violence also constituting a serious violation of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions’).

¹¹⁸⁶ A third was of interpretation that the phrase was only inserted to state that all six forms of sexual violence constitute grave breaches – besides constituting serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in international armed conflict – is not warranted, even if women’s rights advocates sometimes strived to lobby for this interpretation, since the Rome Conference clearly wished to fix a minimum threshold for the residual clause.

¹¹⁸⁷ See also Werle and Jessberger, Principles ICL (2014), para. 1180; Ambos, Treatise on ICL Vol. II (2014), p. 168 with fn. 390 (with further references).

¹¹⁸⁸ Report on the Seminar on ‘International Humanitarian Law and Current Armed Conflicts: Fausto Pocar and Marco Pedrazzi, The Involvement of the Civilian Population in Hostilities’, International Institute of Humanitarian Law Rome, 25 February 2011, at 2.

its ban was already set forth by article 51 para. 7 Add. Prot. I, which outlaws the use of civilians to shield points, areas, or military forces and articles 23 and 28 IV GC, article 19 I GC and article 12 Add. Prot. I, which prohibit the use of prisoners of war and medical units for the same purposes. The existing jurisprudence, however, in particular that of the ICTY, always condemned this type of conduct by charging it under different counts, such as ‘inhumane treatment’ (i.e. as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions of 1949) or cruel treatment;¹¹⁸⁹ ‘an outrage on personal dignity’¹¹⁹⁰ pursuant to common art. 3 to the four Geneva Conventions, or hostage taking.¹¹⁹¹ In the indictment against Radovan Karadžić (President of the Bosnia Serb area) and Ratko Mladić (Chief of its Armed Forces), the former Prosecutor Richard Goldstone alleged that ‘Bosnian Serb military personnel physically secured or otherwise held the UN peacekeepers against their will at potential NATO air targets, including the ammunition bunkers at Jahorinski Potok, the Jahorina radar site and a nearby communications centre in order to render these locations immune from further NATO air strikes’ in 1995.¹¹⁹²

744 Thus, this provision, which is based on the principle of distinction, synthesizes the content of the various humanitarian norms outlawing the use of ‘human shields’. At the same time, it refers to the duty to take precautions against the effect of an attack, stated in article 58 Add. Prot. I.

745 Even though the use of human shields in non-international armed conflicts has been condemned by States and by the United Nations, for example, with respect to the conflicts in Liberia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tajikistan and the former Yugoslavia and although it may be considered as amounting to customary law,¹¹⁹³ no mirror provision applicable to non-international conflicts is to be found in the ICC Statute. An alternative, however, is to apply Article 8 para. 2(c) iii of the ICC Statute, which prohibits the taking of hostages.¹¹⁹⁴

746 According to the Elements of Crime, the following criteria need to be met:

1. The perpetrator moved or otherwise took advantage of the location of one or more civilians or other persons protected under the international law of armed conflict.
2. The perpetrator intended to shield a military objective from attack or shield, favour or impede military operations.
3. The conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an international armed conflict.
4. The perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict.

747 In modern warfare there will inevitably be many instances where civilians and civilian objects will be located close to military objectives. Military headquarters, barracks, and militarily significant factories, for example, may often be located in urban areas adjacent to the civilian population. Military hospitals will usually be located on military bases. It may be necessary to send an armoured division through a city.

748 This provision prohibits parties to a conflict from taking action during the conflict to use civilians or other protected persons to shield military forces by, for example, locating military hospitals or prisoner of war camps or civilian internee camps or groups or school children

¹¹⁸⁹ Prosecutor v. Blaskić, IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber, Judgment, §§ 186; 716, 750 (Mar. 3, 2000). 186; For an analysis see Schmitt (2008–2009) 47 ColJTransnatL 292, at 307.

¹¹⁹⁰ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/I-T, Trial Chamber, Judgment, 229 (June 25, 1999).

¹¹⁹¹ Prosecutor v. Timohir Blaskić, IT-95-14-T, para. 750.

¹¹⁹² Prosecutor v. Karadžić and Mladić, IT-95-5-I, Indictment, (July 24, 1995), § 47.

¹¹⁹³ See Rule 97 (Human Shields, Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary, 338; Report on the Seminar on ‘International Humanitarian Law and Current Armed Conflicts: Fausto Pocar and Marco Pedrazzi, The Involvement of the Civilian Population in Hostilities’, International Institute of Humanitarian Law Rome, 25 February 2011, at 2; Schmitt (2008–2009) 47 ColJTransnatL 292, at 307.

¹¹⁹⁴ Report on the Seminar on ‘International Humanitarian Law and Current Armed Conflicts: Fausto Pocar and Marco Pedrazzi, The Involvement of the Civilian Population in Hostilities’, International Institute of Humanitarian Law Rome, 25 February 2011, at 2.

next to ammunition dumps. Criminal liability, however, arises not only if a person moves protected persons to the vicinity of a military objective, but also when he or she takes advantage of the location of protected persons in the area. Finally, responsibility arises when the military objective is moved towards the protected persons. The fact that the protected person may be a voluntary is irrelevant: the movement itself of the military personnel or objects is sufficient *per se*¹¹⁹⁵.

If a party to a conflict violates this provision, an attacking party remains bound to comply with the rule of proportionality and to pay due heed to the additional incidental casualties which might result. A military commander may not ignore incidental civilian casualties with a dismissive assertion that the other side located its defence industries in major cities to shield them from attack. However, as long as the ‘collateral damages’ remain proportionate and justified by military necessity, the mere fact that there may be civilians placed as ‘shield’ in front of a military objective does not render the latter immune from attack. However, the attacker will have to observe the precautionary measures set forth in article 57 Add. Prot. I (precautions in attack)¹¹⁹⁶.

Another interesting aspect is that of so-called voluntary human shields. These are persons who have freely chosen to place themselves near potential military targets in the hope that their presence will delay or prevent the attack¹¹⁹⁷. The voluntary element clearly distinguishes them from civilians taken as hostages and used as human shields¹¹⁹⁸. They qualify as civilians, in that they do not fulfill the definition of combatants provided by article 4 para. (A) III GC (i.e. the mirror image of the definition of prisoner of war, a status given only to combatants)¹¹⁹⁹ and article 43 Add. Prot. I. Some authors like Yoram Dinstein have tried to argue that voluntary human shields are civilians who decided to engage in combat and who, therefore, should be considered as ‘unlawful combatants’¹²⁰⁰. However, the fact that a civilian decides to engage, unlawfully, in combat, does not change his or her civilian status. The civilian, however, may be held criminally liable for having unlawfully engaged in the hostilities and lose protection for the time of his/her involvement in the hostilities¹²⁰¹. A third view, is that these are civilians who have compromised their civilian status and who, if injured or killed, should not be regarded as civilian collateral damage because they have volunteered to be at the military target. If captured they are not prisoners of war¹²⁰². They certainly are not, in that they retain civilian status and civilians have no right to prisoner of war treatment. Thus, as civilians, they will enjoy the same protection as other civilians under the principle of proportionality (i.e. civilian collateral casualties will have to be proportionate to the military advantage sought). It is then a different issue, whether the threshold of proportionality shall differ, in that they have themselves put at risk by voluntarily placing themselves in front of a military objective. It may be argued, that the proportionality rule (and the precautionary principle), in this case, shall apply in a more flexible way¹²⁰³, even though the obligations set forth in articles 51 para. 7 Add. Prot. I and 28 IV GC, from which article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiii) is drawn apply both in the case where civilians are hostages and where they have volunteered as human shields¹²⁰⁴.

¹¹⁹⁵ Frank, in: R. S. Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes, see note 281, 200.

¹¹⁹⁶ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary, see note 2, 628 (para. 1989 et seq.).

¹¹⁹⁷ See Haas, in: Arnold and Hildbrand (eds.), International Humanitarian Law and the 21st Century’s Conflicts: Changes and Challenges (2005).

¹¹⁹⁸ See Schmitt (1998) 19 MichJIL 1077; Haas, Voluntary human shields, see note 915, 5.

¹¹⁹⁹ On the distinction between civilians and combatants see Arnold, The ICC, see note 262, 125 et seq.

¹²⁰⁰ Dinstein, The Conduct of Hostilities, see note 201, 130; Haas, Voluntary human shields, see note 915, 5.

¹²⁰¹ Arnold (2003) 63 HeidelbergJIL 3, 642. See article 51 para. 3 Add. Prot. I. See on this ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law, adopted by the Assembly of the ICRC on 26 February 2009, (2008) 90 (872) IRRC 9991, at 1025.

¹²⁰² Haas, Voluntary human shields, see note 915, 6.

¹²⁰³ See on this Pocar and Pedrazzi, ‘The Involvement of the Civilian Population in Hostilities’, International Institute of Humanitarian Law Rome, 25 February 2011, at 3; Schmitt (2008–2009) ColJTransnatL 292 at 310.

¹²⁰⁴ See Haas, Voluntary human shields, see note 915, 12–13.

751 The issue of voluntary human shields was also heavily debated during an expert meeting organised in 2011 by the San Remo Institute for International Humanitarian Law. According to one view, voluntary human shields are by definition directly participating in hostilities, but the majority of experts held, instead, that also voluntary human shields would normally have to be considered as civilians. Ultimately, a broad consensus emerged on the fact that, regardless of whether they are to be considered as directly participating in hostilities, there would be no point in attacking them on their way to or from the military objective; and the fact that the voluntary human shields issue is of little practical relevance, as it is very difficult to verify their free will. In case of doubt, they surely would have to be considered involuntary, thus civilians.¹²⁰⁵ As far as the mental elements are concerned, element 1, i. e. the moving or taking advantage of the location of one or more protected persons, is covered by article 30 of the Statute, whereas a second and separate element is the ulterior motive to shield a military objective from an attack¹²⁰⁶.

24. Paragraph 2(b)(xxiv): Intentionally directing attacks against objects or personnel using the emblems of the Geneva Conventions Literature: Dörmann, K., Elements of war crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Sources and Commentary (2003); Wayne Elliott, H., ‘Open Cities and Undefended Places’, (1995) The Army Lawyer 39; Fenrick, W.J., ‘The Rule of Proportionality and Protocol I in Conventional Warfare’, 98 MillRev 91 (1982); id., ‘Attacking the Enemy Civilian as a Punishable Offence’, 7 DukeJComp&IL 539 (1997); Parks, W.H., ‘Air War and the Law of War’, 32 AFLRev 1 (1990); Pfüter, D., ‘Commentary to Art. 8(2)(b)(xxiv)’, in: R.S. Lee, The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 201–203; Rogers, A.P.V., Law on the Battlefield (1996).

752 Pursuant to the Elements of Crime, this crime is fulfilled if:

1. The perpetrator attacked one or more persons, buildings, medical units or transports or other objects using, in conformity with international law, a distinctive emblem or other method of identification indicating protection under the Geneva Conventions.
2. The perpetrator intended such persons, buildings, units or transports or other objects so using such identification to be the object of the attack.

753 Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv) is principally based on article 38 Add. Prot. I, stating that:

1. It is prohibited to make improper use of the distinctive emblem of the red cross, red crescent or red lion and sun or of other emblems, signs or signals provided for by the Conventions or by this Protocol. It is also prohibited to misuse deliberately in an armed conflict other internationally recognized protective emblems, signs or signals, including the flag of truce, and the protective emblem of cultural property.
2. It is prohibited to make use of the distinctive emblem of the United Nations, except as authorized by that Organization.

754 Other relevant provisions are articles 24–27, 36, 39–44 of the GC I, articles 42–44 of the GC II, articles 42–44 of the GC III, articles 18–22 of the GC IV and articles 8, 12, 13, 15, 18, 23 and 24 Add. Prot. I. The protection from attacks of medical and religious personnel and objects displaying the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions in conformity with international law has been recognised as a customary law principle applicable both to international and non-international armed conflicts.¹²⁰⁷ The mirror provision of the ICC Statute applicable in this latter kind of context is Article 8(2)(e)(ii). The official distinctive emblems in use at present are the Red Cross, the Red Crescent and, since the adoption by the 29th International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent in Geneva on 20– 21 June 2006, of the III Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, also the Red Crystal. Israel has been using the red shield of David (Magen David Adom – MDA). This symbol per se is not officially recognized (although now it may enjoy better protection by joint use with the Red Crystal)

¹²⁰⁵ Pocar and Pedrazzi, ‘The Involvement of the Civilian Population in Hostilities’, International Institute of Humanitarian Law Rome, 25 February 2011, at 2.

¹²⁰⁶ Frank, see note 912, 201.

¹²⁰⁷ Henckaerts and Doswald Beck, Customary, 102.

but, as it has been used to protect the same range of persons and objects as are entitled to use the Red Cross or Red Crescent, the principle is that attacks should not be directed against persons or objects displaying the red shield of David. Another important aspect is that whereas the Geneva Conventions protect persons and objects lawfully using the emblems of the Red Cross, Red Crescent and Red Crystal, other signs have been added by Additional Protocol I (e.g. flashing blue lights for ambulances, special radio frequencies or radar identification signals, etc. referred to in Annex 1 to Add. Prot. I, Chapter III, articles 6–9)¹²⁰⁸. The extended scope of protected signs under Add. Prot. I is reflected by the wording of Element I¹²⁰⁹.

In relation to the issue of the MDA, it is interesting to note that in June 2003, an agreement was signed between the ICRC and the Magen David Adom (MDA). This marked an important step in deepening cooperation between the two organizations, which had been working together closely for some time before that. In 2004, this agreement culminated in the signing on 9 June of a 2-year Cooperation Framework agreement and a one-year extension to the project agreements on Movement Integration, Law and Fundamental Principles, Emergency Medical Services/Disaster Preparedness Management and Restoring Family Links as per ICRC standard criteria. The areas of cooperation include also the dissemination of international humanitarian law. Moreover, with the support of the ICRC and the International Federation, the MDA has increasingly fulfilled the role of a fully-fledged national society at the international level. Since December 2000 the MDA has hosted a representative of the International Federation at its headquarters in Tel Aviv, with the aim of facilitating the full integration of the MDA into the International Movement. The ICRC and the International Federation have helped the MDA develop contacts with various national societies and MDA specialists have taken part in several annual meetings of National Society legal advisers, organized by the ICRC in Geneva¹²¹⁰. All these joint activities suggest that the MDA, as far as the emblem is concerned, should enjoy protection analogous to that granted to the officially recognized Red Cross and Red Crescent emblems. This view is supported also by Element I, according to which it is prohibited to attack persons or objects carrying a distinctive emblem in accordance with international law. All the agreements referred to above indicate that the MDA is carried in accordance with international law, even though it is not officially recognized under the four GCs and their two Add. Prots.

Persons entitled to display the distinctive emblem are:

- medical personnel, staff engaged in administration of medical units and establishments, and chaplains, article 24 GC I, articles 36–37 GC II,
- staff of national red cross/Red Crescent societies and other authorized voluntary aid societies, and of neutral country red cross/Red Crescent societies and
- members of armed forces specially trained as orderlies, stretchers bearers while so employed.

Objects and facilities entitled to display the emblem are:

- medical units and establishments,
- medical transports,
- medical aircraft,
- hospital ships,
- coastal rescue craft,
- hospital and safety zones and localities.

Concerning the mens rea, element I is covered by the mens rea contained in article 30 of the Statute¹²¹¹. In relation to non-international conflicts, a parallel provision is contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (ii) ICC Statute.

¹²⁰⁸ Pfirter, Article 8(2)(b)(xxiv), in: see note 281, Lee et al. (eds.), Elements Of Crimes 202. See note 33, Dörmann, Elements of war crimes 350.

¹²⁰⁹ See note 923, Pfirter, Article 8(2)(b)(xxiv), 202.

¹²¹⁰ ICRC, Press Release on Israel, 22 Feb. 2005, at: <http://www.icrc.org/web/eng/siteeng0.nsf/iwpList325/COE42770148ABB7FC1256E2E003C6777>; https://www.icrc.org/eng/resources/documents/misc/israel_mda_040204.htm

¹²¹¹ See note 921, Pfirter, Article 8(2)(b)(xxiv), 203.

25. Paragraph 2(b)(xxv): Starvation of civilians as a method of warfare

Literature: Buckingham, D.E., 'A Recipe for Change: Towards an Integrated Approach to Food under International Law', (1994) 6 PaceLLRev 296; Dinstein, Y., 'Siege warfare and the starvation of civilians', in: A.J.M. Delissen and G.J. Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict – Challenges Ahead (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1991); Van der Herik, L., 'Economic, Social and Cultural Rights – International Criminal Law's Blind Spot?', in: E. Riedel et al. (eds.), Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: Contemporary Issues and Challenges (OUP 2014); Melzer, N., ICRC Interpretative Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law (ICRC 2009); Mudge, G.A., 'Starvation as a Means of Warfare', (1970) 4 The International Lawyer 228; Pejic, J., 'The right to food in situation of armed conflict: the legal framework', (2001) 83 IRRC 1097.; Riordan, K.J., 'Shelling, Sniping and Starvation: The Law of Armed Conflict and the Lessons of the Siege of Sarajevo', (2010) 41 VUWLRev 149; Rogers, A.P.V., Law on the battlefield (Juris Publishing, 3rd ed., 2012); Rosenblad, E., 'Starvation as a Method of Warfare-Conditions for Regulation by Convention', (1973) 7 The International Lawyer. 252; Henckaerts, J.-M. and Doswald-Beck, L., The ICRC Customary International Humanitarian Law, I (CUP 2005); San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea (1994) 179; Rogers, A.P.V., Law on the Battlefield (Juris Publishing, 3rd ed. 2012); Physicians for Human Rights, War Crimes in the Balkans: Medicine Under Siege in the Former Yugoslavia 1991–1995 (1996) 91–99; Dörmann, K., Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Sources and Commentary (2003) 363; Blix, H., 'Means and Methods of Combat', in: UNESCO (ed.), International Dimensions of Humanitarian Law (1988) 144.

- 758 a) Humanitarian law base and drafting history. A central principle of international humanitarian law is that civilians shall be spared and protected from the effects of the hostilities.¹²¹² The civilian population as such must not be targeted and incidental injuries and suffering of civilians resulting from an otherwise lawful attack on a military objective must be proportional to the military advantage anticipated. It appears only consequent that using starvation of civilians as a method of warfare and destroying objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population is also prohibited under international humanitarian law. Today this prohibition reflects customary international law¹²¹³.
- 759 Formerly siege warfare by way of starvation was considered as an acceptable method of warfare and was lawful, including with regard to civilians inside the walls or borders of the besieged city or region¹²¹⁴. This rule was first restricted by article 23(g) Hague Regulations, which prohibits 'to destroy or seize the enemy's property, unless such destruction or seizure be imperatively demanded by the necessities of war', a prohibition essentially restated in article 53 GC IV. With the adoption of the Geneva Conventions, the prohibition became more detailed, but did not substantially modify the military necessity derogation contained in article 53 GC IV¹²¹⁵. Article 53 GC IV constitutes the foundation of the prohibition of starvation of the civilian population as a method of warfare, together with Articles 23 and 55.¹²¹⁶ Moreover, articles 59 to 62 GC IV establish a duty to allow the free passage of specific ¹²¹² See, e.g., article 51 Add. Prot. I; article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions.

¹²¹³ See, e.g., Buckingham (1994) 6 PaceLLRev 296; Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, The ICRC Customary International Humanitarian Law (CUP 2005), Rules 53 and 54 and related practice; San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflict at Sea 179, para. 102 (a); Eritrea Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Western Front, Aerial Bombardment and Related Claims, para. 105.

¹²¹⁴ See, e.g., Dinstein, in: Delissen and Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (1991); Rogers, Law on the battlefield (3rd ed. 2012) 140; Bothe et al., New Rules (2nd ed. 2013) 378-9. For instance, Article 17 of the 1863 Lieber Code declared that '[w]ar is not carried on by arms alone. It is lawful to starve the hostile belligerent, armed or unarmed, so that it leads to the speedier subjection of the enemy'.

¹²¹⁵ On the regulation of the use of starvation before the adoption of Additional Protocol I and II, see Mudge (1970) 4 The International Lawyer. 228; Rosenblad (1973) 7 The International Lawyer 252. See also Bothe et al., New Rules (1982) 378-9. Despite not modifying the military necessity derogation, Geneva Convention IV did ameliorate the rules applicable to sieges in that it obliges the Parties to endeavour to conclude local agreements for evacuating the wounded and sick, infirm and aged persons, children and maternity cases (see Article 17 GC IV).

¹²¹⁶ According to these provisions, passage is to be granted for shipments of medicines and medical supplies, objects necessary for religious services and basic food, clothing, and medical supplies for those in special need of protection.

consignments and protect and regulate relief actions¹²¹⁷. Articles 108 et seq. and 142 GC IV and article 72 et seq. and 125 GC III provide further rules on relief for detained persons.

Today, the most direct prohibition of starvation as a method of warfare is contained in article 54 Add. Prot. I. The provision also provides for a certain protection of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population. At the time of the adoption of the Protocol, this provision was considered as a new principle of international law applicable in armed conflict, whereas today, this rule would rather be seen as an application of the prohibition to attack civilians. Practice since has made this a customary rule. Also, the duty set forth in Article 55 GC IV has been extended to further supplies essential to the population's survival by article 69 Add. Prot. I. Moreover, articles 70 and 71 Add. Prot. I establish a duty to allow the free passage of specific consignments and protect and regulate relief actions. Paragraphs 103–104 of the San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflict at Sea reflect the corresponding obligation to provide for free passage of foodstuffs and other essential supplies.

Moreover, the deliberate starvation of civilians also appears to constitute, today, a war crime under customary international law. The 1919 Responsibilities Commission included the '[d]eliberate starvation of civilians' in the list of offenses constituting 'violations of the laws and customs of war' that should be prosecuted¹²¹⁸, and many national laws criminalize the deliberate starvation of civilians¹²¹⁹. Furthermore, the UN Security Council has repeatedly condemned the 'deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies'¹²²⁰ and affirmed the individual criminal responsibility of those that commit or order the commission of such acts.¹²²¹ Recently, the UN Security Council adopted several Resolutions on the conduct of hostilities in the Syrian Arab Republic.¹²²² Resolution 2139 specifically affirms that the use of starvation as a weapon of combat is prohibited by international humanitarian law and that forced starvation of civilians in Syria has to end.¹²²³

¹²¹⁷ Article 23 (g) Hague Regulations may also be considered as indirectly relevant in that it prohibits '[t]o destroy or seize the enemy's property, unless such destruction or seizure be imperatively demanded by the necessities of war'. See also articles 52 et seq. Hague Regulations and article 53 GC IV.

¹²¹⁸ The Nuremberg Tribunal however had held that it was, though regrettable, not unlawful for the besieging force to drive back, including by firing on, civilians that were trying to flee besieged Leningrad, von Leeb at al. (1953) AnnDig (1948) 389; id., XI Nuremberg Military Tribunals No. 10, 462, 541.

¹²¹⁹ See, e.g., German Joing Services Regulations, para. 1209 (ZDv) 15/2 (1992) (listing the '[s]tarvation of civilians by destroying, removing, or rendering useless objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population (e.g., foodstuffs, means for the production of foodstuffs, drinking water installations and supplies, irrigation works)' as a 'grave breach of international humanitarian law'), reprinted in Fleck (ed.), Handbook IHL (1999); Australian Law Concerning Trials of War Criminals by Military Courts, reproduced in UNWCC, V Law Reports 95 (1948); article 374 para. 1 of the Penal Code of the Republic of Slovenia of 1994; article 282 (b) of the Penal Code of the Empire of Ethiopia of 1957; article 612 para. 3 ('[i]njures gravely, deprives or does not procure indispensable alimentation ... to protected persons') and article 613 (c) of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 10/95) of 23 Nov. 1995.

¹²²⁰ (934) See, e.g., UN SC Res. 771 (1992), preamble; UN SC Res. 661 (1990) para 3; UN SC Res. 666 paras 3–8; UN SC Res. 670 (1990) para 3; See also Declaration on the Protection of Women and Children in Emergency and Armed Conflict, UN G.A. Res. 3318 (XXIX), para. 6 ('women and children belonging to the civilian population ... shall not be deprived of shelter, food, medical aid or other inalienable rights').

¹²²¹ See, e.g., UN SC Res. 787 (1992), para. 7 ('Condemns all violations of international humanitarian law, including in particular ... the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population ... and reaffirms that those that commit or order the commission of such acts will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts'); UN SC Res. 794 (1992), para. 5 ('Strongly condemns all violations of international humanitarian law occurring in Somalia, including in particular the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies essential for the survival of the civilian population, and affirms that those who commit or order the commission of such acts will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts'). See Buckingham (1994) 6 PacILRev 285.

¹²²² See e.g., UN SC Res. 2139 (2013); UN SC Res. 2118 (2013); UN SC Res. 2043 (2012).

¹²²³ Para 5 of the Resolution requests that the parties to the conflict cease depriving civilians of food and medicine as a weapon of war. The Resolution also requests that the parties to the conflict '(f)acilitate the expansion of humanitarian relief operations, in accordance with international humanitarian law...' and '(c)alls upon all parties to immediately lift the sieges of populated areas ... demands that all parties allow the delivery of humanitarian assistance ... and enable the rapid, safe and unhindered evacuation of all civilians who wish to leave.' (2013) UN SC Res. 2139.

- 762 As to the drafting history of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv), the 1996 Preparatory Committee had first considered to include an offense of ‘starving of the civilian population and prevention of humanitarian assistance from reaching them’¹²²⁴. This wording was changed in the Preparatory Committee session of February 1997 to a short ‘starvation of civilians’¹²²⁵. At the December 1997 session, however, this short wording was considered too vague and open. Delegations consequently agreed during that session on the wording that eventually prevailed in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv), providing that starvation is a war crime under the jurisdiction of the Court only where used as a method of warfare, drawing this qualifier largely from article 54 Add. Prot. I. Accordingly, the war crime of starvation of civilians under the Rome Statute is effected by intentionally ‘depriving them of objects indispensable to their survival, including wilfully impeding relief supplies as provided for under the Geneva Conventions’¹²²⁶. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) is important in that it is the first time that the war crime of starving civilians as such has been criminalized. Its inclusion under the Rome Statute as a war crime when committed in an international armed conflict was not controversial.
- 763 Acts qualifying as the war crime of starvation defined under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute might also amount to other war crimes under the jurisdiction of the ICC. The destruction of foodstuffs and facilities indispensable for the survival of civilians, for instance, may amount to a prohibited attack against civilian objects (article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii)), or a prohibited destruction of property of the adversary (article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) and (a) (iv)). The destruction of or damage to such indispensable objects, including widespread, long-term and severe incidental damage to the natural environment, as a result of an (otherwise) lawful attack against a legitimate military objective, might in addition amount to the war crime of causing excessive incidental damage defined under article 8 para. 2 (b) (iv). The evaluation whether the damage was excessive should also take into account the sustenance value to civilians of the destroyed objects. Lastly, article 8 para. 2 (a) (iii) criminalizing the willful causation of great suffering or serious injury to body or health of an adversary in the power of the party to the conflict to which the perpetrator belongs might be applicable¹²²⁷, as well as the war crime of unlawful deportation or transfer, or unlawful confinement defined in Article 8 (2) (a) (vii).
- 764 Furthermore, starvation may also constitute a crime under international criminal law outside the context of an armed conflict. For instance, severe and large-scale deprivation of food could be qualified as genocide, when all the other crime elements are met, by ‘deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part’ (article 6 para. c). The Elements of Crime clarifying that the reference to ‘conditions of life’ may include the deliberate deprivation of resources for survival, such as food or medical services.¹²²⁸ Moreover, starvation may also qualify as a crime against humanity (article 7 paras. 1 (b), (d), or (k) and (2) (b)). More precisely, the crime against humanity of extermination can cover food deprivation, as explicitly mentioned in Article 7 (2) (b) and in the Elements of Crime.¹²²⁹
- 765 Interestingly, President Al Bashir has been charged by the ICC Prosecutor with methods of destruction other than direct killing as an integral part of an overall genocidal policy and of the commission of crimes against humanity. These methods included: (i) subjecting the ¹²²⁴ See 1996 Preparatory Committee II 61.

¹²²⁵ Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997 11.

¹²²⁶ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997 12. Thereafter, the provision was not anymore debated as to its substance. Until the very end of the Rome Conference, in accordance with the law of non-international armed conflict, many delegations also favored to include starvation as a war crime in non-international armed conflicts, but the ‘final package’ did not include it in the list of war crimes in internal armed conflict situations. See UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C1/SR.5, para. 75.

¹²²⁷ See Physicians for Human Rights, War Crimes in the Balkans: Medicine under Siege in the Former Yugoslavia 1991–1995 (1996) 91–99.

¹²²⁸ See Lee (ed.), Elements of Crime (2001), Article 6(c), Element 4, fn. 4.

¹²²⁹ Lee (ed.), Elements of Crime (2001), Article 7(2)(b), Element 1, fn. 9.

group to destruction of their means of survival in their homeland; (ii) systematic displacement from their homes into inhospitable terrain where some died as a result of thirst, starvation and disease; (iii) usurpation of the land; and (iv) denial and hindrance of medical and other humanitarian assistance needed to sustain life in IDP camps.¹²³⁰ The Prosecution however did not charge Al Bashir with the war crime of starvation, which also would have included the above-mentioned slow-death measures.

b) Material elements. The war crime of starvation as a method of warfare under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) needs to be interpreted in particular in light of article 54 para. 1 Add. Prot. I on which the war crime is based, and to some degree by other IHL rules relating to relief actions. While the first paragraph of article 54 Add. Prot. I spells out generally that ‘[s]tarvation of civilians as a method of warfare is prohibited’, the precise meaning of this prohibition is developed in paragraphs 2 to 5 of article 54¹²³¹ and by the articles dealing with relief actions¹²³². Similarly, the first part of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) contains the general prohibition of ‘[i]ntentionally using starvation as a method of warfare’, while the second part of the provision specifies what is meant (‘depriving [civilians] of objects indispensable to their survival’, and further specify (‘including wilfully impeding relief supplies as provided for under the Geneva Conventions’). While article 54 Add. Prot. I is reproduced only incompletely in the second part of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv), there is no indication that delegations intended to deviate from article 54 Add. Prot. I and its modalities and exceptions. The Elements of Crimes do not add much to the definition.¹²³³

Besides, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute confirms the existence of a duty not to intentionally impede relief supplies provided for under customary international humanitarian law. Despite the fact that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute does not create or imply an obligation, e.g. to provide for sufficient food, water or other essential supplies, that does not otherwise exist under international law¹²³⁴, this does not impede the other applicable rules to come into play, such as the obligation to allow humanitarian relief actions subject to considerations of military necessity. International humanitarian law contains important rules designed to ensure the provision of humanitarian assistance to persons in need in armed conflict. Additional Protocol I specifies that offers of relief shall not be regarded as interference in the armed conflict or as unfriendly acts. The parties to a conflict and each State party to the Protocol must allow and facilitate rapid and unimpeded passage for all relief consignments, equipment and personnel, even if such assistance is destined for the civilian population of the adverse party. The parties to the conflict must protect relief consignments and facilitate their rapid distribution.¹²³⁵

aa) ‘starvation’. There is no definition given for ‘starvation’ in art 54(1) API, since its ordinary meaning is well understood. Accordingly, ‘starvation’ has different meanings. First, the concept in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) certainly applies to suffering from lack of food or water. Starvation is ‘the action of subjecting people to famine, i.e., extreme and general ¹²³⁰ ICC, The Prosecutor v. Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09, Second Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 12 July 2010, para. 34.

¹²³¹ See Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), para 2091: ‘[A] general principle only of course becomes fully operative when it is accompanied by rules of application: the remainder of [article 54 Add. Prot. I] is concerned with such application, as are several other articles in the Protocol, particularly those relating to relief actions’. At the 1974–1977 Diplomatic Conference, some concern was expressed about the scope of the general principle, but the Rapporteur expressed the view that the scope of the principle eventually adopted in article 54 para. 1 Add. Prot. I was developed by the remainder of the article and by the articles dealing with relief actions, CDDH/215/Rev. 1, para. 73; CDDH/III/264/Ref. 1, XV Official Records, 348–349.

¹²³² CDDH/215/Rev.1, para 73; CDDH/III/264/Rev.1, XV Official Records, pp. 348–349.

¹²³³ See Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001), War Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(xxv).

¹²³⁴ ‘[T]he actus reus for this offence could be the failure to fulfil a lawful duty This offence does not impose or imply a duty of care that does not otherwise exist in international law (e.g., to provide food for a civilian population)’, Proposal submitted by the United States of America UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 18.).

¹²³⁵ Article 70 Add. Prot. I.

scarcity of food'.¹²³⁶ Deprivation of safe water may also, in extreme situations, have direct repercussions for the life and health of individuals.¹²³⁷ For instance, in the Darfur report, the Commission of Inquiry recognized how water was used as a method of warfare: water pumps and wells were destroyed and poisoned by dropping the carcasses of cattle into them.¹²³⁸ Water needs a particular attention also because it is a survival mean for the civilian population when it comes to sanitations or as dangerous forces in the case of dams. The 26th ICRC International Conference stressed in this respect that 'water is a vital resource for victims of armed conflict and the civilian population and is indispensable to their survival' and called upon parties to conflict to take 'all feasible precautions to avoid, in their military operations, all acts liable to destroy or damage water sources and systems of water supply, purification and distribution solely or primarily used by civilians.'¹²³⁹

769 However, the meaning of 'starvation' is not necessarily restricted to a deprivation of food and water, but may also cover the deprivation of other essential things such as clothing, medical supplies or objects needed to harvest and process food. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) specifies that its prohibition of starvation extends to the deprivation of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilians. This is confirmed by the Elements of Crimes which require the completion of only one specific material element (other than a nexus to an armed conflict), namely that the perpetrator 'deprived civilians of objects indispensable to their survival'.¹²⁴⁰ Supporting the view that other objects than food and water are covered by the concept of starvation is the fact that article 8(2)(b)(xxv) specifies that the prohibition also extends to 'wilfully impeding relief supplies as provided for under the Geneva Conventions'. Such supplies are not limited to foodstuffs, but may include clothing, medical supplies and other objects. The above suggests that the word 'starvation' must be understood in a broader sense than only 'deprivation of food or water'.

770 Besides, dictionaries suggest that the notion of 'starvation' is not only understood as referring to having too little food to sustain life or health, but also as standing for deprivation or insufficient supply of some other essential things. In sum, the transitive verb of starving has not only the more restrictive meaning of killing by hunger or depriving of or keeping insufficiently supplied with food, but more generally can be understood as meaning to deprive of or to insufficiently supply with some essential commodity or something necessary to live, including causing to die of cold¹²⁴¹. In its intransitive form, to starve can correspondingly be understood to signify to suffer from deprivation or 'die, especially slowly from hunger, cold, grief, disease etc.'¹²⁴². In view of the above, it is submitted that 'starvation' in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute also extends to the deprivation of objects other than food and water insofar they are vital to the civilians' survival¹²⁴³.

771 bb) 'Objects indispensable to the survival of civilians'. Objects indispensable to the survival of civilians' are not defined in international humanitarian law. But this concept certainly includes the basic objects for subsistence of food and (clean) water. Furthermore, it is submitted that the notion also extends to facilities indispensable to produce, harvest, ¹²³⁶ Sandoz et al (eds.), Commentary (1987), para 1456.

¹²³⁷ Van der Herik, in: Riedel et al. (eds.), Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (OUP 2014) 12.

¹²³⁸ Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the United Nations Secretary General, 25 January 2005, paras 235 and 305.

¹²³⁹ Resolution 2F (a-b); IRRC (1996) 68.

¹²⁴⁰ Lee (ed.), Elements of Crimes (2001), Article 8(2)(b)(xxv), Element 1, at 31.

¹²⁴¹ See, e.g., New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (2nd ed. 1993); The Oxford English Dictionary (2nd ed. 1989); Webster's Ninth Collegiate Dictionary; Webster's Ninth Collegiate Dictionary (1989).

¹²⁴² New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (2nd ed. 1993).

¹²⁴³ The interpretation of 'starvation' in the ICRC Commentary and the ICRC study for the definition of the elements for article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) therefore appears too restrictive, as both only refer to causing the civilians to suffer hunger, even if 'shelter or clothing' were mentioned as possible objects indispensable to survival, see Sandoz et al (eds.), Commentary (1987), paras 653 and 655 (Nos. 2089 and 2103); ICRC, Study on Third Set of War Crimes within Art. 8(2)(b) Rome Statute (4 Aug. 1999), at 43. Cf. Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 363 et seq.

process or stock foodstuffs and assure the availability of water, such as the objects listed under article 54 para. 2 Add. Prot. I, namely ‘agricultural areas for the production of foodstuffs, crops, livestock, drinking water installations and supplies and irrigation works’.

However, given what has been stated above, the notion of ‘objects indispensable to the survival of civilians’ is not necessarily limited to objects related to food and water. It is correspondingly submitted that article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv), in line with the corresponding provision in Additional Protocol I, also prohibits the deprivation of other objects vital to the survival of a population and in particular medical supplies as well as basic shelter and clothing critical for the civilians’ survival under given climatic conditions¹²⁴⁴. Lastly, it is submitted that under certain circumstances, electricity sources may also be included in the notion of ‘objects indispensable to the survival of civilians’. Indeed, the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights concluded that stopping electricity sources may amount to the deprivation of objects indispensable for the survival of civilians, especially of hospital patients who die if electricity supplies are stopped for too long.¹²⁴⁵

cc) ‘Civilians’. Starvation methods are unlawful when directed against the civilian population. However, there is no rule prohibiting starvation of enemy combatants, unless they become hors de combat through wounds, sickness, shipwreck or capture. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) of the Rome Statute appears to be primarily intended to protect civilians from an adverse party to the conflict. However, it not only protects civilians belonging to an adverse party to the conflict finding themselves on that adverse party’s territory or in occupied territory, but also any other civilian population such as civilians belonging to the own party to the conflict or finding themselves on the territory of the own party to the conflict¹²⁴⁶.

There is no definition of civilian under international humanitarian law. The identification of civilian persons needs to be negatively effectuated. They are those who are not directly participating in hostilities. A civilian can also be defined as an individual who finds himself on the territory of a party to the conflict of which he does not have the nationality.¹²⁴⁷ This approach can be defined as the nationality criteria, which has not always been very pertinent. The protection civilians enjoy is lifted as soon as they are directly participating in hostilities and for the whole duration of their participation¹²⁴⁸. The threshold of participation and the duration is difficult to determine precisely¹²⁴⁹. Importantly, international humanitarian law deals with these difficulties by clarifying that in case of doubt as to the status of a person or an object, they are to be presumed civilians¹²⁵⁰. In addition, the presence of isolated ¹²⁴⁴ The list provided in article 54 para. 2 Add. Prot. I is not exhaustive as the words ‘such as’ make clear. See Solf, in: Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 339–340 (‘... the Committee action in adopting an illustrative listing indicates that other life sustaining objects such as clothing and shelter needed to sustain life under prevailing climatic conditions may also be covered by the prohibition’); Sandoz et al., Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 paras. 2102–2103; The Netherlands East Indies Statute Book Decree No. 44 of 1946 considered as a war crime the ‘[i]ntentional withholding of medical supplies from civilians’ (1949)XI Law Reports 94.

¹²⁴⁵ UN OHCHR, Report of the Mapping Exercise Documenting the Most Serious Violations of Human Rights and IHL Committed within the Territory of the DRC between March 1993 and June 2003 (Geneva: OHCHR, 2010), para 330.

¹²⁴⁶ Article 49 para. 2 Add. Prot. I provides that ‘[t]he provisions of [Protocol I] with respect to attacks apply to all attacks in whatever territory conducted, including the national territory belonging to a Party to the conflict but under the control of an adverse Party’. Article 54 Add. Prot. I also concerns ‘attacks’. Furthermore, article 54 para. 5 Add. Prot. I provides that a derogation from the prohibition of starvation may be made with respect to the civilian population in the own territory under the own party’s control where required by imperative military necessity. A contrario, civilians finding themselves in the territory of the starving party are also covered. The term ‘civilian population’ in Article 53(3)(b) refers rather to the population of an immediate area. (See CDDH/215/Rev.1, para 76). Article 54 Add. Prot. I in no way suggests that the ‘civilians’ with respect to whom its legal injunctions apply must be understood in a manner different from the general definition in article 50 Add. Prot. I.

¹²⁴⁷ See Article 4 GC IV and Article 50 Add. Prot. I.

¹²⁴⁸ See article 51(3) Add. Prot. I and Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), paras. 1942–1945.

¹²⁴⁹ See generally the ICRC Interpretative Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law (2009).

¹²⁵⁰ See Article 50(1) Add. Prot. I for civilian persons and Article 52(3) Add. Prot. I for civilian objects.

combatants within the civilian population does not relieve this population of its civilian quality.¹²⁵¹

- 775 dd) ‘Depriving of’. The conduct prohibited under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) is to ‘deprive’ civilians of objects indispensable to their survival. This first can be done, as spelled out by article 54 para. 2 Add. Prot. I, by attacking, destroying, rendering useless, or removing indispensable objects. Such active deprivation includes, for instance, destroying crops by defoliants or poisoning wells or springs, a particularly egregious form of starving civilians¹²⁵².
- 776 Secondly, a deprivation of indispensable objects could be fulfilled by impeding relief supplies, including transports and supplies of food, water, drinking water installations, blankets, clothing and other objects to protect against cold and weather, as well as medical supplies. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) explicitly covers the impeding of relief supplies ‘as provided for under the Geneva Conventions’. It is not entirely clear whether this phrase also refers to supplies as provided for under Add. Prot. I, which supplements the Geneva Conventions.¹²⁵³ However, in view of the fact that most Add. Prot. I provisions are now considered customary international law, the correct view seems to refer also to supplies provided for in the Protocol. Be it as it may, impeding relief supplies as provided under Add. Prot. I can also be subsumed under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) by way of the general formula of ‘depriving civilians of objects indispensable to their survival’.
- 777 Relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions with respect to relief supplies obliges States Parties to allow the free passage of certain types of goods intended for specific categories of the civilian population belonging to another State Party. This includes article 23 GC IV which requires every state to ‘allow the free passage of all consignments of medical and hospital stores ... intended only’ for civilians of another state and to ‘likewise permit the free passage of all consignments of essential foodstuff, clothing and tonics intended for children under fifteen, expectant mothers and maternity cases’. State practice also indicates that each party to the conflict must refrain from deliberately impeding the delivery of relief supplies to civilians in need in areas under its control.
- 778 Additional Protocol I compensated the obviously limited scope of this provision. Article 70 Add. Prot. I more generally requires parties to a conflict to ‘allow and facilitate rapid and unimpeded passage of all relief consignments, equipment and personnel provided in accordance with [Section II of Part IV of Add. Prot. I]’ with regard to the civilian population of its own as well as the civilian population of the adverse party to the conflict, except with regard to the civilian population in occupied territories the supply of which the Occupying Power must ensure on the basis of article 69 Add. Prot. I.
- 779 With regard to relief supplies for civilians in occupied territories, the Fourth Geneva Convention and Additional Protocol I have provisions dealing with relief assistance to civilians. An Occupying Power has an obligation to ensure the provision of food and medical supplies to the civilian population of an occupied territory and should bring in the necessary foodstuffs, medical stores and other articles if the resources of the occupied territory are inadequate. (articles 55 GC IV and 69 para. 1 Add. Prot. I). If the civilian population in the occupied territory is inadequately supplied, the Occupying Power must agree to and facilitate the relief by all means at its disposal. Articles 59 to 62 GC IV require the Occupying Power to permit the free passage of consignments of foodstuffs, medical supplies and clothing, and, if read in conjunction with article 69 Add. Prot. I, also bedding, means of shelter, other supplies essential to the survival of the civilian population of the occupied territory and objects necessary for religious worship. Besides, personnel participating in relief actions must be respected and protected under article 71 Add. Prot. I.

¹²⁵¹ See Article 50(3) Add. Prot. I.

¹²⁵² See Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), para. 2101. The poisoning could also amount to the war crime under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii).

¹²⁵³ Additional Protocol I, article 70(2), broadens the Geneva Conventions obligations to cover ‘rapid and unimpeded passage of all relief consignments, equipment and personnel’.

Articles 72–75 and 125 GC III and Annex III to GC III provide obligations of parties to the conflict with regard to prisoners of war, including the obligation of parties to the conflict to allow that prisoners of war receive individual parcels or collective shipments containing foodstuffs, clothing, medical supplies and other objects. In addition, articles 108, 109 and 142 GC IV contain special rules on relief for detained persons which, inter alia, provide that relief societies ‘shall receive from [the detaining] Powers ... all facilities ... for distributing relief supplies’.

In all of these cases, the provision of relief supplies is subject to certain conditions. Relief actions must be humanitarian and impartial in character and conducted without any adverse distinction. Article 70 para. 1 Add. Prot. I requires for instance the agreement of the party to the conflict controlling the territory through which the supplies must pass. This party may furthermore prescribe technical arrangements, including search, and make the permission conditional on a local supervision by a Protecting Power (article 70 para. 3 Add. Prot. I). However, article 70 para. 2 Add. Prot. I makes it clear that the parties to the conflict ‘shall allow and facilitate rapid and unimpeded passage of all relief consignments’, thus establishing an obligation in principle. Indeed the fact that consent is required does not mean that the decision on a relief operation is left to the discretion of the parties. The correct view is therefore that a State must accept relief actions when the civilian population is not adequately supplied and its survival is threatened and when relief which is humanitarian and impartial in nature is available and able to remedy the situation. Refusing a relief action or relief consignments is not a matter of discretion and agreement can be withheld only for exceptional reasons, not for arbitrary or capricious ones¹²⁵⁴. A refusal would be equivalent to a violation of the rule prohibiting the use of starvation as a method of combat.

Economic sanctions or blockades that deprive civilians of objects indispensable to the survival of civilians could also be prohibited under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute, insofar these measures take place in the context of and are associated with an armed conflict and insofar the requisite mental elements are present, except if one of the exceptions to the prohibition applies. Where a blockade or sanctions regime in the context of an armed conflict has the effect of starving the civilian population, the obligation to allow relief supplies to reach the population is triggered. Indeed, it should be emphasized that the object of a blockade is to deprive the adversary of supplies needed to conduct hostilities, and not to starve civilians.¹²⁵⁵ Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute confirms this obligation under Add. Prot. I by specifying that ‘impeding relief supplies’ may amount to the war crime of starvation. If the civilian population of the blockaded territory is however adequately provided with essential commodities, the blockaded objects are not ‘indispensable to their survival’ and thus could not fall under the prohibition of starvation¹²⁵⁶.

The prohibition to use starvation of civilians by depriving them of objects indispensable to their survival applies also to naval blockades insofar they may affect civilians on land¹²⁵⁷.

¹²⁵⁴ Sandoz et al (eds.), Commentary (1987), para. 2808.

¹²⁵⁵ Id. at para 2095.

¹²⁵⁶ Relief supplies assisting the civilian population with foodstuffs, water and medical supplies (on ‘humanitarian grounds’) should also for this reason generally be excluded from a blockade or sanctions regime if this regime might otherwise lead to starvation of civilians, irrespective of the basis on which these sanctions are decided and implemented. In fact, when deciding on economic sanctions with regard to situations of armed conflict, the Security Council in practice generally provided for ‘humanitarian exceptions’. See, e.g., UN Doc. S/Res/661 (6 Aug. 1990), para. 3 (c) (excluding ‘supplies strictly intended for medical purposes, and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs’); UN Doc. S/Res/666 (13 Sep. 1990); UN Doc. S/Res/670 (...), para. 3; UN Doc. S/Res/687 (3 Apr. 1991), paras. 20 et seq.; UN Doc. S/Res/757 (30 March 1992), paras. 4(c), 5 and 7; UN Doc. S/Res/820 (17 April 1993), para. 22 (a) and (b); UN Doc. S/Res/942 (23 Sep. 1994), paras. 7 (b) and (13 (b)); UN Doc. S/Res/943 (23 Sep. 1994), paras. 2 and 3 (excepting ‘foodstuffs, medical supplies and clothing for essential humanitarian needs’); UN Doc. S/Res/967 (14 Dec. 1994); UN Doc. S/Res/1302 (8 June 2000). See David, Principes de droit des conflits armés 259–261.

¹²⁵⁷ This follows clearly from the wording of article 49 para. 3 Add. Prot. I. The interpretation of the Rapporteur at the 1974–1977 Conference that the rule of article 54 para. 1 Add. Prot. I does not modify the law applicable to naval blockade, cited in Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), para. 2092, appears to be an interpreta-

Paragraphs 102–104 of the San Remo Manual state that a party declaring or establishing a naval blockade must allow the free passage of foodstuffs and medical supplies for the civilian population (as well as medical supplies for members of the armed forces) even in naval warfare. For example, the International Fact-finding Mission to investigate violations of international law resulting from the Israeli attacks on the flotilla of ships carrying humanitarian assistance in 2010 considered that the policy of blockade or closure regime, including the naval blockade imposed by Israel on Gaza was inflicting disproportionate civilian damage,¹²⁵⁸ and was therefore illegal. The Mission further found that the Israeli blockade constituted collective punishment of the people living in the Gaza Strip and thus was illegal and contrary to article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention.¹²⁵⁹

784 Thirdly, it is submitted that a qualified failure to fulfill a duty under international humanitarian law may also amount to depriving civilians of objects indispensable to their survival. For instance, an Occupying Power may fail to ensure food and medical supplies to the civilian population within the occupied territories¹²⁶⁰. In their proposal for the elements of crimes, the United States mentioned another example by commenting that ‘[a]s with murder, the actus reus for this offence could be the failure to fulfil a lawful duty: for example, feeding prisoners under the accused’s care’¹²⁶¹.

785 ee) Exceptions. Article 54 Add. Prot. I specifies that under specific exceptional circumstances objects indispensable to the survival of persons may be attacked, destroyed, removed or rendered useless. Firstly, objects being used as sustenance exclusively for armed forces may lawfully be attacked insofar this provides a definite military advantage (article 54 para. 3 (a) Add. Prot. I)¹²⁶². This obviously raises difficult issues related to evidence. Normally, this exception is generally applicable to supplies already in the hands of the adverse Party’s armed forces because it is only at that point that one could know that the objects will be used exclusively by the enemy armed forces. Furthermore, this test needs substantial refinement because objects in the military supply system intended for the sustenance of prisoners of war, the civilian population of occupied territory or persons classified as civilians serving with, or accompanying the armed forces, would fall within the terms of this exception.¹²⁶³

786 Secondly, actions against means of subsistence that serve civilians but additionally are used ‘in direct support of military action’ are not prohibited, unless such actions ‘may be expected to leave the civilian population with such inadequate food or water as to cause its starvation or force its movement’ (article 54 para. 3 (b) Add. Prot. I)¹²⁶⁴. However, as the ICRC Commentary rightly underlines, it is hard to see how foodstuffs, crops, livestock and supplies of drinking water could be used ‘in direct support of military action’. This phrase thus makes it clear that it is not lawful to attack means of subsistence that serve to feed both the civilian tion against the explicit wording of article 49 para. 3 Add. Prot. I and therefore does not appear convincing. David, Principes de droit des conflits armés (3rd ed. 2002) 261–263.

¹²⁵⁸ United Nations Human Rights Council, Report of the international fact-finding mission to investigate violations of international law, including international humanitarian and human rights law, resulting from the Israeli attacks on the flotilla of ships carrying humanitarian assistance, para. 59, UN Doc. A/HRC/15/21 (Sept. 27, 2010).

¹²⁵⁹ Id., para 60.

¹²⁶⁰ See article 55 GC IV and article 69 Add. Prot. I.

¹²⁶¹ Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 18.).

¹²⁶² However, Pilloud and de Preux assert that installations for drinking water and irrigation works are not covered by the exception provided under article 54 para. 3 (a) Add. Prot. I, since they are hardly used solely for the benefit of armed forces, Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), paras. 2109 and 2112.

¹²⁶³ See Bothe et al., New Rules (1982) 382–383, referring to Third Conventions, Art. 4(a)(4) and (5), Protocol I, Art. 50.

¹²⁶⁴ Article 23 (g) Hague Regulations prohibits such actions unless they are ‘imperatively demanded by the necessities of war’. The Spanish Penal Code provides for criminal jurisdiction over whoever ‘[a]ttacks, destructs, deprives of, or makes unusable goods indispensable for the survival of the civilian population, except if the adversary Party uses these goods in direct support of a military action or exclusively as means of subsistence of its armed forces’, article 613 (c) of the Spanish Military Penal Code (Ley orgánica 10/95 of 23 Nov. 1995) (emphasis added).

population and armed forces, unless such means are used in direct support of military action such where a food-storage place is used as cover or as an arms depot¹²⁶⁵. An attack would in any event be unlawful if it could be anticipated to have serious effects on supplies for the civilian population and the latter would thereby be forced to starve or move away.

Moreover, the principle of proportionality and the obligation to take precautions remain applicable. A commander who plans or conducts an attack is under an affirmative duty to take all feasible precautions in the choice of means and methods of attack in order to prevent erroneous targeting and to avoid or in any event minimize incidental injury to civilians and civilian objects. In this respect, where it is not clear whether means of subsistence only serve armed forces, a reasonable inquiry must take place¹²⁶⁶. 787

Thirdly, the deprivation of objects indispensable to the survival of civilians as incidental result of an otherwise lawful attack on a different military objective is not as such prohibited under article 54 Add. Prot. I. It however would be unlawful if it may be expected to cause excessive incidental damage. The result of starvation of civilians needs to be taken into account in weighing the proportionality of such incidental damage. 788

Fourthly, with regard to territory under a party's own control, article 54 para. 5 Add. Prot. I provides that derogations from the prohibition to attack, destroy, remove or render useless objects indispensable to the survival of civilians may be made ‘in the defence of (this party's) national territory against invasion ... where required by imperative military necessity’ (emphasis added).¹²⁶⁷ 789

Objects indispensable to the survival of civilians must not be made the object of reprisals (article 54 para. 4 Add. Prot. I).

ff) No result of starvation required. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute criminalizes ‘using starvation as a means of warfare’, specifying that also impeding relief supplies may qualify as the war crime of starvation. The only material element required by the elements of crimes is that there is a deprivation of certain objects. This suggests that it is not required that people actually die of starvation, and it would not even seem necessary that people actually starve as a result of the deprivation of indispensable objects. It appears sufficient that civilians are deprived of objects indispensable to their survival, that is, a deprivation that would cause them in the future to starve, without requiring that the deprivation takes its effect over time¹²⁶⁸. The perpetrator nonetheless must have intended to starve the civilians as a method of warfare. 790

¹²⁶⁵ Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), para. 2110. The absolute prohibition ruling out reflections of proportionality unless the means of subsistence are used in ‘direct support of military action’ has been criticized as overly inflexible by Dinstein who argues that ‘[t]he broad injunction against sieges affecting civilians is untenable in practice’ and that ‘an absolute prohibition of starvation of civilians in siege warfare is unjustifiable as well as utopian’. He would prefer that siege warfare with attendant starvation ‘is legitimate, provided that an offer is made by the besieging force to allow civilians to depart from the encircled town’; Dinstein, in: Delissen and Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (1991) 151–152. However, the increasing number of armed conflicts where ‘ethnic cleansing’ belongs to the main goals of a party to the conflict, including by means of forcing the population of a certain region, town or village to move away, shows the possible dangers to adopt Dinstein’s suggestion. Also, civilians in a besieged town may often fear to render themselves under the control of the attacking party, and in large towns and with regard to far-reaching modern warfare, it may also be practically difficult to apply such a solution, see David, Principes de droit des conflits armés(3rd ed. 2002) 260–261.

¹²⁶⁶ See U.S. Department of Defense, Letter from the General Council to Chairman, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (5 April 1971), reprinted in: (1971) 10 ILM 1302.

¹²⁶⁷ This appears to allow to a certain degree a policy of ‘scorched earth’ on the own territory in order to slow down an advancing invader. Pilloud and de Preux contend that this exception only applies to own territory, and not to adversary territory under one’s own control, Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), para. 2119. This means that this derogation can be made only by a Belligerent Party acting in defence of its national territory against invasion (within that part of the national territory which is under its own control), and only when it is motivated by ‘imperative military necessity’. See also Dinstein, in: Delissen and Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (1991) 149–150; Blix, in: UNESCO (ed.), International Dimensions of Humanitarian Law 144.

¹²⁶⁸ The element proposed by the United States that required ‘4. That, as a result of the accused’s acts, one or more persons died from starvation’, Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 18), was not included in the Elements of Crimes adopted by the Preparatory Commission.

- 791 c) Mens rea. aa) Intent to starve civilians. The crime must be committed with the intent to use the starvation as a method of warfare, that is, to deliberately provoke, increase or prolong the starvation by deprivation of objects indispensable for the survival with an aim to gain a military advantage, including for instance forcing civilians to transfer to another area or State¹²⁶⁹. In addition, it is required that the perpetrator wanted to take civilians as a target. In accordance with article 30 Rome Statute, all material elements of the war crime of starvation of civilians must be committed with intent and knowledge. The perpetrator must thus have intended, first, to deprive civilians of objects indispensable to their survival.
- 792 Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) explicitly provides that ‘willfully impeding relief supplies ...’ is also covered by the provision. The standard of ‘willfully’ includes recklessness and insofar would differ from the general standard under article 30 Rome Statute. However, delegations at the Diplomatic Conference may not have had the intent to deviate from the general rules regarding the mental element. Indeed, the General introduction of the Elements makes it clear that article 30 Rome Statute applies if no specific reference is made in the Elements to a particular mental element, which is not the case. Indeed, according to the Elements of the Crime, the requirement is that the perpetrator intended to starve civilians as a method of warfare.¹²⁷⁰ The intent requirement is explicitly stated in the elements of the crime and also appears to be an application of the default rule codified by Article 30. Accordingly, in order to prove the mens rea for the crime of intentionally using starvation of civilians as a method of warfare, because the word ‘intentionally’ is contained in the Article 8(2)(b)(xxv), the Prosecution will only have to prove the intent, as referred to in Article 30(2).¹²⁷¹ If the word ‘intentionally’ was not contained in the provision, the Prosecution, in order to prove the mens rea, would need to prove intent and knowledge, i. e. Article 30(2) and (3).
- 793 bb) Specific intent to starve as a method of warfare. Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) Rome Statute requires that the perpetrator be ‘intentionally using starvation of civilians as a method of warfare’. Element 2 requires that ‘[t]he perpetrator intended to starve civilians as a method of warfare’. This suggests that the perpetrator must have had the specific intent to starve civilians ‘as a method of warfare’. This excludes starvation as a result of unintended mismanagement.
- 794 The requirement that the starvation be used ‘as a method of warfare’ however calls for interpretation. Firstly, the expression ‘methods of combat’ generally refers to the manner in which armed forces engage in combat or to the way in which weapons are used.¹²⁷² It must be conducted to achieve a military advantage or other objective vis-à-vis an adversary party to the international armed conflict. In addition, starvation can also result from an act of omission. To deliberately decide not to take measures to supply the population with objects indispensable for its survival can become a method of combat by default, and would also be prohibited.¹²⁷³ Secondly, this notion certainly covers starvation to gain a military advantage, such as using starvation to achieve a speedier subjection of a besieged town or village, as was medieval warfare practice, or to pressure on the adversary to accept some other aim of the attacker. Another example may be to deprive civilians of indispensable goods in order to force them to move out of a certain area in order to facilitate the control over that area.

¹²⁶⁹ For instance, burning down crops puts the civilian population before the uneasy choice to either starve or move away, which may present a military gain in that the political and physical control over this territory or area is enhanced or will be easier to establish.

¹²⁷⁰ Element 2, article 8(2)(b)(xxv), 31.

¹²⁷¹ The relevant parts of Article 30 read as follow: ‘(1) Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge. (2) For the purpose of this article, a person has intent where: (a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct; (b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.’ (emphasis added).

¹²⁷² Sandoz et al., Commentary (1987), para. 1957.

¹²⁷³ Id., para 4800.

In today's armed conflicts, humanitarian assistance is increasingly denied as part of a deliberate policy to target civilians. This is why the scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv) may cover a wider range of motives. In particular, paragraph 2 of article 54 Add. Prot. I states it is prohibited to attack objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population 'for the specific purpose of denying them their sustenance value to the civilian population or to the adverse Party, whatever the motive, whether in order to starve out civilians, to cause them to move away, or for any other motive'. The ICRC Commentary on article 54 para. 1 Add. Prot. I also states that '[t]o use [starvation] as a method of warfare would be to provoke it deliberately ... It is clear that activities conducted for this purpose would be incompatible with the general principle of protecting the population, which the Diplomatic Conference was concerned to confirm and reinforce. Starvation is referred to here as a method of warfare, i. e., a weapon to annihilate or weaken the population'¹²⁷⁴. This reading gains support by the US proposal of elements on this war crime¹²⁷⁵.

It could thus be argued that the starvation and denial of the sustenance value of indispensable objects to the civilian population was a sufficient specific purpose of the perpetrator. In certain situations, it might be difficult to prove the specific intent to use starvation as a method of warfare, but if the outcome of impeding humanitarian assistance is obvious according to the ordinary course of events, the intention can be inferred. Accordingly, depriving civilians of indispensable objects with the intention, for instance, to 'ethnically cleanse' a region or town from a certain group of civilians, or to force targeted civilians to move away or take some other action intended or ordered by the perpetrator, would seem to meet the mens rea required under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxv)¹²⁷⁶.

26. Paragraph 2(b)(xxvi): Conscription or enlistment of children and their participation in hostilities*

Literature: Ambos, K., 'The First Judgment of the International Criminal Court (Prosecutor v. Lubanga): A Comprehensive Analysis of the Legal Issues', (2012) 12 ICLRev 115; Brett, R. and McCallin, M., Children: The Invisible Soldiers (1996); van Bueren, G., 'The international legal protection of children in armed conflicts', (1994) 43 I&CompLQ 809; Cohn, I. and Goodwin-Gill, G.S., Child Soldiers: The Role Of Children In Armed Conflicts (Clarendon Press 1994); Delissen, J.J.M., 'Legal Protection of Child Combatants after the Protocol: Reaffirmation, Development or a Step Backwards?', in: A.J.M. Delissen and G.J. Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict: Challenges Ahead (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1991) 156–157; Dutli, M.T., 'Captured child combatants', (1990) 278 IREvRC 421; Garraway, C., 'Elements of the Specific Forms of Genocide', in: R.S. Lee et al. (eds.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001); Graf, R., 'The International Criminal Court and Child Soldiers: An Appraisal of the Lubanga Judgment', (2012) 10 JICJ 945; Hamilton, C. and Tabatha, A.E.-H., 'Armed Conflict: the protection of children under international law', (1997) IJChildrenRts 1; Happold, M., 'Child Soldiers in International Law: The Legal Regulation of Children's Participation in Hostilities', (2000) 47 NethLLRev 27; Happold, M., 'International Humanitarian Law, War Criminality and Child Recruitment: The Special Court for Sierra Leone's Decision in Prosecutor v. Samuel Hinga Norman', (2002) 3 YbIHuM 226; von Hebel, H. and Robinson, D., 'Crimes within the Jurisdiction of the Court', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute – Issues, Negotiations, Results (Kluwer Law International 1999) 118, 206; Heintze, H.-J., 'Children need more protection under international humanitarian law: recent developments

¹²⁷⁴ Id. paras 2089–2090 (emphasis added).

¹²⁷⁵ '3. That the accused's act was intended as a method of warfare with the specific purpose of denying such objects to the targeted civilian population', Proposal by the United States of America, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2 (4 Feb. 1999) 18.

¹²⁷⁶ There is no indication that the Rome Diplomatic Conference intended to exclude starvation out of a motive of ethnic cleansing from the offense's scope of application. Rather than excluding the application of the offense to such conducts, the qualification 'as a method of warfare' likely was inserted not least to keep with the well-established international humanitarian law concept of starvation (as reflected, above all, under article 54 Add. Prot. I), to distinguish the war crime from the inadvertent and not specifically intended consequence often occurring in war times of starving of the civilian population, and to make it clear that no new international obligation or concept is created. The wording underlines that the conduct must be associated with an armed conflict, and that the rule does not criminalize, for instance, a failure to generally live up to internationally promoted standards of good governance.

* The authors are indebted to Jérôme Massé for his research assistance.

concerning Article 38 of the UN Child Convention as a challenge to the International Red Cross and Red Crescent movement', (1995) 4 HuV-I 200; Helle, D., 'Optional protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflict to the Convention on the Rights of the Child', (2000) 839 IRevRC 797; ICRC, 'Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child concerning involvement of children in armed conflicts, Position of the International Committee of the Red Cross', (1998) 322 IRevRC 107; Junod, S., 'Article 4 Add. Prot. II', in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1987) 1380; Kalshoven, F., Constraints on the Waging of War (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1987) 91; Krill, F., 'United Nations Convention on the rights of the child: a controversial article on children in armed conflicts', (1989) 12 Dissemination 11; Laucci, C., Digest of Jurisprudence of the Special Court for Sierra Leone 2003–2005 (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2007); Mann, H., 'International Law and the Child Soldier', (1987) 36 I&CompLQ 32; Maslen, S., 'Relevance of the Convention on the Rights of the Child to children in armed conflict', (1996) TransnatL&ContempProbs 329; Pilloud, C. and Pictet, J.S., 'Article 77 Add. Prot. I', in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (ICRC 1987); de Preux, J., 'Article 43 Add. Prot. I', in: Y. Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1987) 506; Vité, S., 'Between Consolidation and Innovation: The International Criminal Court's Trial Judgment in the Lubanga Case', (2012), 15 YbHumL 61.

797 a) Humanitarian law base and drafting history. The use of child soldiers in many of today's armed conflicts has become a matter of increasing international concern¹²⁷⁷. Easily manipulated and not questioning orders, children are at the risk of being exploited and even of being used as 'cannon fodder', under drugs or not, as decoys or in risky combat actions adult combatants are not willing to undertake. Besides the risk to their physical well-being active participation in armed hostilities teaches them the rule and culture of violence, disrupts their education and frequently results in gravest traumas, since children are even less capable to deal with the horrors of war than grown adults. Social reintegration poses particular problems for children that have never seen anything else than conflict and violence. Also, children's combat behavior is more erratic; they may more easily shoot indiscriminately at anything that moves. Since their conduct is more difficult to predict, they can present an increased danger for persons protected under humanitarian law, including civilians, humanitarian workers or persons *hors de combat*¹²⁷⁸. Interestingly enough, the very first judgment of the ICC, namely the Lubanga case issued on March 14, 2012¹²⁷⁹, is related to children in armed conflicts. Even if the situation in which that case took place has been classified by the Court as a non-international armed conflict (to which article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) rather applies)¹²⁸⁰, the findings of the Court are obviously crucial to the interpretation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) of the Rome Statute. Indeed, the numerous issues dealt with by the Court in that case receive the same reading no matter the classification of the situation. Besides, the Preliminary Chamber of the Court, when ruling on that case, left the classification of the situation (international or non-international in character) open. Therefore, the conclusions made in the Lubanga case could well be applied whatever the nature of the conflict, in the future¹²⁸¹.

798 The recruitment of children into armed forces or groups and their participation in armed conflicts has only recently become an object of international legal regulation¹²⁸². The first

¹²⁷⁷ Several factors may explain this. First, most of today's armed conflicts are of an internal nature, and the use of child soldiers appears more frequent in internal than in international conflicts. Children under fifteen have been reported to have participated in more than two dozen current or recent armed conflicts. Also, the roles they are called to play appear to have expanded. Not least, the proliferation of small caliber arms makes it easier to use child soldiers. Second, the age at which many societies and not least the 'international community' consider childhood to end has augmented. See, e.g., Happold, (2000) 7 NethILRev 28–29.

¹²⁷⁸ See Pilloud and Pictet, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 900 (No. 3183); Impact of Armed Conflict on Children, Report of the expert of the Secretary-General, Machel, submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 48/157, UN Doc. A/51/306 (26 Aug. 1996), paras. 34–62.

¹²⁷⁹ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012.

¹²⁸⁰ [ibid., para. 568.] or [Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 14 March 2012, ICC-01/04-01/06, para. 568 in which the Trial Chamber has decided that: 'g]iven the Chamber's conclusion that the UPC was engaged in a NIAC [...] it [was] unnecessary to interpret or discuss Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi).'] ¹²⁸¹ Cf. Geiss and Zimmermann, article 8 2 e) (vii).

¹²⁸² See generally Happold (2000) 47 NethILRev 27; Hamilton and Tabatha (1997) IJChildrenRts 1; Maslen (1996) TransnatL&ContempProb 329; Cohn and Goodwin-Gill, Child Soldiers: The Role of Children in Armed international instruments specifically addressing the issue are the 1977 Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions. The late development of armed conflicts directly concerns the relation between these children and the party to the conflict to which they belong. However, international humanitarian law, on the one hand, does not typically regulate relations between a party to a conflict and persons belonging to it. On the other hand, international human rights law, traditionally regulating relations between a state and its own citizens, does not typically regulate issues specifically relating to armed conflict situations. Today, the issue is both regulated by human rights instruments, such as the Convention for the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflict, or the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, as well as by international humanitarian law, either conventional or of customary nature.

Article 77 para. 2 Add. Prot. I provides that '[t]he Parties to the conflict shall take all feasible measures in order that children who have not attained the age of fifteen years do not take a direct part in hostilities and, in particular, they shall refrain from recruiting them into their armed forces'¹²⁸³. With regard to non-international armed conflict situations, article 4 para. 3 (c) Add. Prot. II prohibits to 'allow' children under fifteen to 'take part in hostilities'. According to the ICRC study on customary international humanitarian law, these provisions are of customary nature. Rule 136 of this study states that '[c]hildren must not be recruited into armed forces of armed group' while rule 137 says that '[c]hildren must not be allowed to take part in hostilities'. Both rules apply indifferently in international or non-international armed conflicts.

Article 38 paras. 2 and 3 of the virtually universally ratified 1989 UN Convention on the Rights of the Child similarly states: 800

'2. States Parties shall take all feasible measures to ensure that persons who have not attained the age of fifteen years do not take a direct part in hostilities.

3. States Parties shall refrain from recruiting any person who has not attained the age of fifteen years into their armed forces. ...'

In addition, the International Labour Organization Convention No. 182 of 17 June 1999 concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour requires States Parties to prohibit the worst forms of child labour, 'including forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict'¹²⁸⁴. The 1990 African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child¹²⁸⁵ provides in paragraph 2 of its article 22 entitled 'Armed Conflicts' that States Parties 'shall take all necessary measures to ensure that no child ['defined in its article 2 as every human being below the age of 18 years'] shall take a direct part in hostilities and refrain in particular, from recruiting any child'¹²⁸⁶.

At the negotiations of the Preparatory Committee and the Rome Conference, the majority 801 felt strongly that using child soldiers or recruiting them into armed forces should be a war crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC, considering that violating this virtually universally accepted prohibition was of most serious concern. Yet, a few states, and in particular the United States (who, together with Somalia, is the last state not having ratified the UN Child Convention), were of the view that the underlying prohibition had more of a human rights than humanitarian law character and had not been criminalized under customary international law. The precise formulation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) required intense negotiations on particular issues of controversy. The most debated issues included the required degree of Conflicts (1994); van Bueren (1994) 43 I&CompLQ 809; Delissen, in: Delissen and Tanja (eds.), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (1991) 156–157.

¹²⁸³ On the drafting history, see Mann (1987) 36 I&CompLQ 32.

¹²⁸⁴ See article 3 (a) of the Convention, which entered into force on 19 Nov. 2000.

¹²⁸⁵ OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/24.9/49 (1990), entered into force on 29 Nov. 1999.

¹²⁸⁶ See also, e.g. UN SC. Res. 1261 (25 Aug. 1999) and UN SC Res. 1314 (14 Aug. 2000); UN GA Res.52/145 (12 Dec. 1997), para. 12 ('urg[ing] all the Afghan parties to respect fully international humanitarian law and ... to prohibit the drafting and recruitment of children as para-combatants, [and] to ensure their reintegration into society ...').

participation in hostilities of the children, the activities proscribed, the insertion of the adjective ‘national’ before ‘armed forces,’ and the age limit of the children; issues that all have been discussed by the ICC in its first judgment.

- 802 The Preparatory Committee had forwarded four options to the Rome Diplomatic Conference: ‘Option 1: forcing children under the age of fifteen years to take direct part in hostilities. Option 2: recruiting children under the age of fifteen years into armed forces or using them to participate actively in hostilities. Option 3: (i) recruiting children under the age of fifteen years into armed forces or groups; or (ii) allowing them to take part in hostilities. Option 4: [no such war crime]’¹²⁸⁷. The Rome Conference eventually adopted option 2 as sub-paragraph (b) (xxvi) with only two changes: The replacement of the term ‘recruiting’ by ‘conscripting or enlisting’, particularly to meet the concern of the United States who sometimes reach children at an early stage with their recruitment campaigns, and the addition of the word ‘national’ before armed forces to meet a concern by Arab states.
- 803 Several states, supported by a few strongly lobbying NGOs, had strived to raise the relevant age to 18. This was rejected by delegations, primarily based on the argument that there was no adequate support for the customary status of the age limit of 18 in international law, which indeed appeared at least doubtful¹²⁸⁸. Several delegations however remained unhappy that the age limit under sub-paragraph (b) (xxvi) is not higher than 15 years.
- 804 The goal to raise the minimum age of child soldiers became also one of the key issues during the negotiations leading to the adoption on 25 May 2000 of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict. Even if some of the Protocol’s provisions are not beyond criticism and are hardly in line with the general principles of humanitarian law¹²⁸⁹, the Optional Protocol certainly further elaborates the protection of children against recruitment and participation in hostilities¹²⁹⁰.

¹²⁸⁷ 1998 ILC Draft Statute, pp. 24–25.

¹²⁸⁸ Articles 77 para. 2 and 38 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child apply to children who have not attained the age of 15 years, while containing an obligation of States Parties to endeavor to give priority to the oldest persons when recruiting persons under the age of eighteen years. Even the Optional Protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflict adopted in 2000, that is, after the adoption of the Rome Statute, does not provide for the age of 18 for the recruitment by states and does not contain a direct criminalization of recruitment by states of children under 18. See also ICRC (1998) 322 IRevRC 107, at Parts I and II (referring to legal arguments and arguments based on practice for the minimum age of 18). The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has not (yet) answered a question of one state party in this regard, see Initial Report of Switzerland under the Optional Protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflict, Summary Record, UN Doc. CRC/C/SR.1082, para. 9. While the Committee’s concluding observations in this case lack an affirmation of the customary law status of a war crime of recruiting children under 18, it underlines that states parties to the Optional Protocol should provide for criminal jurisdiction over recruitment of children under 18 from that state party’s territory for military activities abroad, Consideration of Reports Submitted by States Parties under article 8 Optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict, Concluding observations: Switzerland, UN Doc. CRC/C/OPAC/CHE/CO/1 (17 Mar. 2006), para. 8.

¹²⁸⁹ As a matter of principle, international humanitarian law establishes the same obligations of parties to the conflict. Article 4 of the Optional Protocol, which was mainly negotiated by human rights experts since it was a Protocol to a human rights convention, however burdens armed groups more strongly than state forces, prohibiting the former to recruit or use persons under the age of 18 years, while states parties only must take ‘feasible measures to prevent such recruitment and use ...’.

¹²⁹⁰ ‘Article 1: States Parties shall take all feasible measures to ensure that members of their armed forces who have not attained the age of 18 years do not take a direct part in hostilities.

Article 2: States Parties shall ensure that persons who have not attained the age of 18 years are not compulsorily recruited into their armed forces.

Article 3: 1. States Parties shall raise the minimum age for the voluntary recruitment of persons into their national armed forces from that set out in article 38, paragraph 3, of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, taking account of the principles contained in that article and recognizing that under the Convention persons under the age of 18 years are entitled to special protection. ... 3. States Parties that permit voluntary recruitment into their national armed forces under the age of 18 years shall maintain safeguards to ensure, as a minimum, that ... (d) Such persons provide reliable proof of age prior to acceptance into national military service. ...

Article 4: 1. Armed groups that are distinct from the armed forces of a State should not, under any circumstances, recruit or use in hostilities persons under the age of 18 years. 2. States Parties shall take all feasible measures to Article 4 para. c of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone established by an Agreement between the United Nations and Sierra Leone affirms the Court’s power to criminally prosecute persons who committed the ‘serious violation [...] of international humanitarian law’ of ‘[c]onscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities’¹²⁹¹, taking into account the recently adopted formulation of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) Rome Statute¹²⁹². With regard to this earlier draft, the UN Secretary-General’s report had affirmed that ‘the prohibition on child recruitment has by now acquired a customary international law status’ and appeared to consider that the crime defined in article 4 para. c of the draft Statute and committed in internal armed conflict had the character of customary international law since, at least, 30 November 1996¹²⁹³.

Article 28 D, related to war crimes, of the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of justice and human rights¹²⁹⁴ refers to the age of 18 regarding conscription, enlistment and active participation in hostilities.

b) An unusual war crime. The three offenses defined under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) Rome Statute, namely conscription, enlistment and use of children to actively participate in hostilities, comprise a particularity distinguishing them from most other war crimes. They primarily protect children against their own authorities as is clear from the essence of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi). Perpetrator and victims of these war crimes thus may belong to the same party to the conflict. This criminalization of acts committed against or ‘vis-à-vis’ persons belonging to the same party to the conflict deviates fundamentally from the general thrust of international humanitarian law and the law of war crimes, which typically regulate acts committed against persons belonging to an adversary party to the conflict. Relations between a State and its own nationals are more characteristically the subject of human rights law. The prohibitions underlying the offense defined in sub-paragraph b (xxvi) thus comprise typical human rights aspects and indeed partially are based on human rights instruments, while undoubtedly having a link to armed conflicts and the preparation for such conflicts.

However, the wording of the provision in no way excludes its application to the use, enlistment or conscription of children belonging to another party to the conflict or indeed of *any other child*¹²⁹⁵. It would not make sense to protect children belonging to the same party to the conflict but not those not belonging to that party. These considerations apply to both the use of children to participate actively in hostilities as well as to their enlistment or conscription into armed forces.

prevent such recruitment and use, including the adoption of legal measures necessary to prohibit and criminalize such practices. ...’.

On the new Optional Protocol, see, e.g., Happold (2002) 3 YbIHuML 226.

¹²⁹¹ Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, annexed to the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, signed on 16 January 2002 pursuant to Security Council resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 Aug. 2000, available at <<http://www.rscsl.org/Documents/scsl-statute.pdf>> accessed 20 January 2015.

¹²⁹² An earlier draft had criminalized the ‘[a]bduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities’, enclosure ([Draft] Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone) to the Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, UN Doc. S/2000/915 (4 October 2000). On the recent practice of the Special Court, see Laucci, Digest of Jurisprudence of the Special Court for Sierra Leone 2003–2005 (2007).

¹²⁹³ See Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, UN Doc. S/2000/915 (4 October 2000), paras. 12 (in connection with article 1 of the enclosed Draft Statute) and 17.

¹²⁹⁴ As adopted during the 23rd Ordinary Session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the African Union, available at <http://www.au.int/en/sites/default/files/PROTOCOL%20ON%20AMENDMENTS%20TO%20THE%20PROTOCOL%20ON%20THE%20AFRICAN%20COURT%20-%20EN_0.pdf> accessed 20 January 2015.

¹²⁹⁵ The ICRC Commentary to article 77 para. 2 Add. Prot. I notes ‘that this provision is primarily concerned with the nationals of the recruitment State, though without excluding nationals of other States’ and that article 77 ‘is not subject to any restrictions as regards its scope of application; it therefore applies to all children who are in the territory of States at war, whether or not they are affected by the conflict’. See Pilloud and Pictet, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 902 (No. 3191) and 898–899 (Nos 3174 and 3177).

- 809 Enlisting or conscripting children under 15 belonging to another party to a conflict into the armed forces additionally might amount to the grave breach of compelling service in the forces of a hostile Power (article 8 para. 2 (a) (v) Rome Statute) or the war crime of coercing participation in military operations against the person's own country or forces (article 8 para. 2 (b) (xv) Rome Statute), war crimes which apply to persons belonging to the adverse party to the conflict irrespective of their age.
- 810 c) War crime of conscripting or enlisting children. aa) 'Conscripting or enlisting ... into the ... armed forces'. If there was no definition neither in international law of the notions of 'conscripting' and 'enlisting' into armed forces, nor in the Elements of Crimes, the ICC in its first judgment has given its interpretation of these two war crimes. "[E]nlisting" is defined as "to enrol on the list of a military body" and "conscripting" is defined as "to enlist compulsorily". Therefore, the distinguishing element is that for conscription there is the added element of compulsion.¹²⁹⁶ Moreover according to the Court "[t]he manner in which a child was recruited, and whether it involved compulsion or was "voluntary", are circumstances which may be taken into consideration by the Chamber at the sentencing or reparations phase, as appropriate. However, the consent of a child to his or her recruitment does not provide an accused with a valid defence."¹²⁹⁷ It must also be noticed that the Court is of the opinion that these war crimes are 'continuous in nature' since '[t]hey end only when the child reaches 15 years of age or leaves the force or group'¹²⁹⁸.
- 811 Up to the beginning of the Rome Conference, the proposals for the eventual article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) included only the term 'recruiting'¹²⁹⁹. At the Rome Conference, however, a small number of delegations, including the United States, feared that the term recruiting could be understood as also prohibiting recruitment campaigns addressed to children under the age of fifteen, even though such endeavors to have persons join the armed forces do not necessarily aim at an immediate beginning of military training within the armed forces. In order to exclude that the war crime would also extend to such early recruitment campaigns, the United States proposed the eventually adopted wording of 'conscripting or enlisting'¹³⁰⁰. The ICC, however, later has considered that "conscripting" and "enlistment" are both forms of recruitment¹³⁰¹.
- 812 Another concern particular to the United Kingdom delegation was to rule out the application of the provision to children under fifteen who enter schools funded, supervised or operated by the armed forces. In view of the terms eventually selected and the negotiating history, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) does not apply to recruitment campaigns nor membership in scout groups. However, the enrolment in educational institutions operated or supervised by armed forces could qualify insofar it constitutes or is tantamount to an 'enlistment into armed forces'¹³⁰². This would not appear to be the case if children under 15 in these

¹²⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 608.

¹²⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 617.

¹²⁹⁸ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 618.

¹²⁹⁹ See Mann (1987) 36 I&CompLQ 32. According to major English dictionaries, 'to recruit' is defined as 'to enlist new soldiers; to get or seek for fresh supplies of men for the army', The Oxford English Dictionary 191, and 'to persuade someone to become a new member of an organization, esp. the army', The Cambridge International Dictionary (1995) 1188.

¹³⁰⁰ See von Hebel and Robinson, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 118.

¹³⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 607.

¹³⁰² In this regard, it may be interesting to consider that according to article 3 para. 5 of the Optional Protocol on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflicts the requirement for States Parties to raise the recruitment age to at least 16 years does not apply 'to schools operated by or under the control of the armed forces of the States Parties, in keeping with articles 28 and 29 of the convention on the Rights of the Child'. Articles 28 and 29 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child recognize the right of the child to education, require states to take measures to ensure that school discipline is administered in a manner consistent with the child's human dignity, and states certain goals of the education. Article 3 para. 5 of the Optional Protocol thus implies that, in the view of the states adopting the Protocol, the prohibition under article 38 of the Convention to recruit children under 15 may also apply to enrolment in schools operated by or under the control of the armed forces, and provides that such schools must respect the child's human dignity and direct the education towards certain educational institutions receive an essentially civilian curriculum providing secondary education or vocational training. However, if the enrolment of children under 15 in such institution would mean that they thereby are eligible for armed combat in the event of an armed conflict or that they may be used to participate in hostilities even if under 15, the effects would be sufficiently similar to a direct enlistment into the armed forces to be considered, considering the offense's humanitarian object and purpose, as qualifying under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi). But what if children enrolled in such a school receive a primarily military training, including in military combat, but do not in any way become eligible for armed combat before they reach 15 years?

bb) 'National armed forces'. The wording 'national armed forces' was accepted as a compromise. The adjective 'national' was added to 'armed forces' in order to meet the concerns of several Arab States who feared that 'armed forces' alone might be applied to the Intifada and young Palestinians joining it. An earlier proposal had suggested the words 'regular armed forces'. Several delegations however strongly opposed a limitation of the scope of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) to 'regular' armed forces. Article 43 para. 1 Add. Prot. I provides that the armed forces of a party to the conflict 'consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct of its subordinates, even if that Party is represented by a government or an authority not recognized by an adverse Party'. The party to the conflict thus need not be represented by a recognized government or authority or state¹³⁰³. In the Lubanga case, referring inter alia to article 43 of Add. Prot. I and to its commentary, the Preliminary Chamber considered 'that, under article 8 (2) (b) (xxvi) of the Statute, the term "the national armed forces" is not limited to the armed forces of a State'¹³⁰⁴. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber, even if it focused on article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) of the Rome Statute, given the classification of the situation as a non-international conflict, still specified that '[s]ubject to one significant difference in wording (conscription or enlistment of children into "national armed forces" (Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) of the Statute) as opposed to "armed forces or groups" (Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the Statute), the elements of these two crimes are similar'¹³⁰⁵. This confirms the conclusion according to which the ruling of the Court in the Lubanga case also applies to international armed conflict, i. e. to article 8(2)(b) (xxvi). 813

cc) Any need of a nexus to an armed conflict? Article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) criminalizes 'conscripting or enlisting children under the age of fifteen years into the national armed forces'. While the second part of sub-paragraph (xxvi) contains an explicit reference to 'hostilities' and seems to require the existence of hostilities and, thus, an armed conflict, the first part of the provision relating to conscription and enlistment does not contain any such reference. 814

The legal sources of the prohibition underlying the offense other than the Rome Statute do not restrict its applicability to times of armed conflict. The relevant parts of article 77 para. 2 Add. Prot. I¹³⁰⁶ and article 38 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child as well as the Optional Protocol to that Convention do not contain any restriction of the prohibition of recruitment of children to times of armed conflict. 815 goals (which, it is submitted, cannot be exclusively military objectives). For the different options that were discussed during the negotiations leading to the adoption of the Optional Protocol, see, e.g., Report of the working group on a draft optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on involvement of children in armed conflicts on its second session, E/CN.4/1996/102 (21 Mar. 1996), in particular paras. 102 et seq. See also Helle (2000) 839 IRevRC 801–80 805.

¹³⁰³ See de Preux, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 506 et seq., paras. 1659 et seq.. See also article 1 para. 4 Add. Prot. I.

¹³⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of the charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 285.

¹³⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, 14 March 2012, ICC-01/04-01/06, para. 568.

¹³⁰⁶ Article 3 Add. Prot. I specifies that the Conventions and the Protocol apply during armed conflict, '[w]ithout prejudice to the provisions which are applicable at all times'. Common article 2 to the Geneva Conventions similarly implies that certain provisions of the Geneva Conventions (and through article 1 para 3 Add. Prot. I also of Add Prot. II) must be 'implemented in peacetime'.

816 Yet, a main objective of the prohibition of incorporating children into armed forces appears to be, as above seen, to protect them from involvement in armed conflict. Having children incorporated into the armed forces makes it difficult to keep them out of armed conflicts since that would upset the mechanics of armed forces. Armed hostilities may suddenly and unexpectedly break out, and it is unrealistic to expect that all children will immediately be expelled from armed forces as soon as an armed conflict breaks out. Keeping children out of armed forces also helps to avoid that they might qualify as legitimate targets under humanitarian law. Permitting children's conscription and enlistment in times of peace is hardly coherent with the aim of protecting them. The provision is given full effectiveness only if conscription and enlistment of children is proscribed both in the presence as well as absence of an armed conflict. In addition, permitting conscription or enlistment of children in times of peace would lead to not overly convincing consequences. If an armed conflict should suddenly break out, the retention in the armed forces of a child conscripted or enlisted prior to the conflict's outbreak would either be considered lawful, in which the prohibition to conscript or enlist children would be greatly undermined. The other possibility is to consider the retention of the children unlawful and a war crime, since such retention is equivalent to a conscription or enlistment. This however would also seem an awkward and not very practical solution, and would not reach those who first conscripted or enlisted the children. To this end, the ICC in the Lubanga case clarified that '[a]lthough it may often be the case that the purpose behind conscription and enlistment is to use children in hostilities, this is not a requirement of the Rome Statute.'¹³⁰⁷ The Chamber further rejects 'the defence contention that "the act of enlistment consists in the integration of a person as a soldier, within the context of an armed conflict, for the purposes of participating actively in hostilities on behalf of the group."¹³⁰⁸

817 dd) War crime of using children to participate in hostilities. The wording 'using them to participate actively' was introduced in the Preparatory Committee meeting of March/April 1998. The proposal deviates from treaty provisions applicable to international armed conflicts which prohibit the 'direct' participation of children in hostilities¹³⁰⁹. Article 4 para. 3 (c) Add. Prot. II, reaffirmed by rule 137 of the ICRC study of customary international humanitarian law, provides that children under fifteen shall not be 'allowed to take part in hostilities', which excludes any participation of children in non-international armed conflicts. Paradoxically, thus, the protection of children is broader in non-international than in international conflicts¹³¹⁰. The Rome Conference remedied this discrepancy to some degree by criminalizing the use of children to 'actively' participate in hostilities, a wording that may be understood to prohibit a broader range of participation than 'direct' participation. The ICC later confirmed this interpretation in its judgment of 2012, stating that 'the expression "direct participation" [...] was clearly intended to import a wide interpretation to the activities and roles that are covered by the offence of using children under the age of 15 actively to participate in hostilities.'¹³¹¹ Indeed, working in a munitions factory for instance might be considered an active but not a direct participation¹³¹², what the Court also believes. According to the judges, what matters is 'whether the support provided by the child to the combatants exposed him or her to real danger as a potential target.'¹³¹³

¹³⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 609.

¹³⁰⁸ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 609.

¹³⁰⁹ See in particular article 77 para. 2 Add. Prot. I and article 1 of the 2000 Option Protocol to the Rights of the Child Convention.

¹³¹⁰ See also ICRC (1998) 322 IRevRC 107, Part III (referring to legal arguments and arguments based on practice for the prohibition of direct and indirect participation).

¹³¹¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012, para. 627.

¹³¹² It is therefore regrettable that the Optional Protocol, adopted after the Rome Conference, refers only to 'direct' participation. See also Pilloud and Pictet, in: Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) 901 (No. 3187); Helle 839 IRevRC 801–802; Happold 47 NethLLRev 35–36; Kalshoven, Constraints on the waging of war (1987) 91.

¹³¹³ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, 14 March 2012 para. 628.

The formulation that eventually found its way into article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi), including the words ‘to participate actively’, was introduced with a footnote at the March-April 1998 session of the Preparatory Committee which specified under what understanding the wording was to be adopted. As delegations adopted the provision without opposing to this proposed understanding of the wording, and since this understanding seemed to find general agreement also at the negotiations of the elements of this war crime¹³¹⁴, the wording of the footnote may serve as an interpretational guideline:

“The words “using” and “participate [actively]”¹³¹⁵ have been adopted in order to cover both direct participation in combat and also active participation in military activities linked to combat such as scouting, spying, sabotage and the use of children as decoys, couriers or at military checkpoints. It would not cover activities clearly unrelated to the hostilities such as food deliveries to an airbase or the use of domestic staff in an officer’s married accommodation. However, use of children in a direct support function such as acting as bearers to take supplies to the front line, or activities at the front line itself, would be included within the terminology¹³¹⁶.”

As confirmed by the ICC in its first judgment, this understanding also keeps with the underlying aim of the provision to keep children out of armed hostilities and takes into account the risks for their physical as well as psychological well-being resulting from such involvement. It for instance clearly rules out that children are used as spies, and hopefully thereby also diminishes the chances that children are correspondingly perceived and treated by an adversary party¹³¹⁷.

To be sure, the child that actively participates in hostilities does not commit any criminal act under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi). Sub-paragraph b (xxvi) makes it an offence to ‘use’ such participation. The ‘use’ specifies the connection that must exist between the person using the participation and the child’s active participation.

However, it is not necessary that the child is forced to participate, even if the Rome Conference adopted the language of ‘using them to participate actively’ and not the proposed alternative wording ‘allowing them to take part’. Inciting a child by words or acts to carry guns to a front line also qualifies under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi). Furthermore, even if a child is participating in hostilities on its own volition, ‘using’ that child for such purpose and profiting from its ‘work product’ would still be prohibited. Military commanders that do not take measures to ensure that children under fifteen are not used to participate actively in hostilities may in addition be criminally responsible on the basis of their command responsibility (article 28 Rome Statute).

d) Knowledge that the child is under 15. According to the default standard of the requisite mens rea spelled out in article 30 of the Rome Statute, the perpetrator must have been aware of the circumstance that the child was under the age of 15 years. This ‘awareness’ may include dolus eventualis, that is, a situation in which the perpetrator did not know that the child was under 15, but thought this might be possible and went ahead anyway. According to element 3 to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvii), it is even sufficient that ‘[t]he perpetrator knew or should have known that such person or persons were under the age of 15 years’. This standard of mens rea clearly deviates from the requirement of awareness ¹³¹⁴ As all interpretative footnotes contained in the 1998 ILC Draft Statute, the footnote to the present war crime did not either appear in the text of the Statute itself. The drafters of both the Rome Statute and the Elements of Crimes however clearly had the footnote in mind when drafting and adopting the two instruments. At the Preparatory Commission, it had been proposed to insert the footnote in the elements. The length and type of the footnote however was not adapted to the concise Elements of Crimes. Also, it was pointed out that the footnote had already been recorded in the travaux préparatoires of the Rome Statute and that academic literature would or had already referred to it (including the prior edition of this Commentary), an argument which eventually prevailed. See note 263, Von Hebel and Robinson, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of The Rome Statute (1999) 118; Garraway, in: Lee et al. (eds.), Elements of Crimes (2001) 206.

¹³¹⁵ It was specified orally during the negotiations when the language and footnote were presented and explained that the qualifier ‘actively’ was unintentionally omitted in the document containing that language.

¹³¹⁶ 1998 ILC Draft Statute 25 (fn. 12 to article 5, War Crimes, B (t) Option 2).

¹³¹⁷ See Happold, (2000) 47 NethILRev 36.

under article 30 Rome Statute. The formulation ‘should have known’ appears to imply that it is sufficient that the perpetrator could have known the age of the child had he not been wilfully blind to it or had he taken reasonable and feasible safeguards to avoid using or conscripting or enlisting a child under 15, in particular when the person’s appearance did not permit to exclude with certainty that he or she clearly was above 15 years. This essentially creates a duty to take reasonable and feasible safeguards against using or conscripting or enlisting children under 15.¹³¹⁸

D. Article 8 para. 2 (c)–(f) and para. 3: War crimes committed in an armed conflict not of an international character

Literature General: Abi-Saab, G., ‘Wars of National Liberation in the Geneva Conventions and Protocols’, (1979) IV RdC 353; Aldrich, G., ‘Progressive Development of the Laws of War: A Reply to Criticisms of the 1977 Geneva Protocol I’, (1985/86) 26 VirgJIL 703; Ambos, K., ‘Aktuelle Probleme der deutschen Verfolgung von ‘Kriegsverbrechen’ in Bosnien-Herzegowina’, (1999) NStZ 226; Arnold, R., ‘The development of the notion of war crimes in non-international conflicts through the jurisprudence of the UN Ad Hoc Tribunals’, (2002) 3 HuV-I 134; id., The ICC as a New Instrument for Repressing Terrorism (2004); Bothe, M., ‘War crimes in non-international armed conflicts’, in: Y. Dinstein, War Crimes in International Law (1996) 293; Breitegger, A., ‘Aktuelle Beiträge der internationalen Strafjustiz zur Entwicklung des humanitären Völkerrechts’, (2010) 11 ZIS 712–725; Byron, C., ‘Armed conflicts: international or non-international?’, (2001) JCSL 63; Cassese, A., ‘The Geneva Protocols of 1977 on the Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict and Customary International Law’, (1984) 3 PacificBasinLJ 71; id., ‘The Nicaragua and Tadić Tests Revisited in Light of the ICJ Judgment on Genocide in Bosnia’, (2007) 18 EJIL 649; Corn, G., ‘Hamdan, Lebanon, and the Regulation of Armed Hostilities: The Need to Recognize a Hybrid Category of Armed Conflict’, (2006) 40 VandJ.TransnatL 295; Corn, G. and Talbot Jensen, E., ‘Transnational Armed Conflict: A Principled Approach to the Regulation of Counter-Terror Combat Operations’, (2009) 42 ISLRev 46; Cullen, A., The Concept of Non-International Armed Conflict in International Humanitarian Law (2010); Fleck, D., ‘Humanitarian protection in non-international armed conflicts – the new research project of the International Institute of Humanitarian Law’, (2000/2001) IsYbHumRts 1; Frulli, M., ‘The Criminalization of Offences against Cultural Heritage in Times of Armed Conflict: The Quest for Consistency’, (2011) 22 EJIL 203–217; Geiß, R., ‘Armed violence in fragile States – Low intensity conflicts, spill-over conflicts and sporadic law enforcement operations by third parties’, (2009) IRevRC 127–142; Geiß, R. and Siegrist, M., ‘Has the armed conflict in Afghanistan affected the rules on the conduct of hostilities?’, (2011) 93 IRevRC 11; Graditzky, T., ‘La responsabilité pénale pour violation du droit international humanitaire applicable en situation de conflit armé non international’, (1998) RICR 29; Gray, C., ‘Bosnia and Herzegovina: Civil War or Inter-State Conflict? Characterisation and Consequences’, (1996) BYbIL 165; Green, L., ‘Criminal responsibility of individuals in non-international conflicts’, (2002) GYbIL 82; Hall, C. K., ‘The Jurisdiction of the Permanent International Criminal Court over Violations of Humanitarian Law’, in: F. Lattanzi (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Comments on the Draft Statute (1998) 19; Kellenberger, J., ‘Humanitäres Völkerrecht gilt im Libanon-Konflikt’, (30 July 2006) NZZ 3; Kleffner, J.K., ‘Scope of Application of Humanitarian Law’, in: Fleck, D., The Handbook of IHL (2013) 43; Kolb, R., ‘The Jurisprudence of the Yugoslav and Rwandan Criminal Tribunals on Their Jurisdiction and on International Crimes (2000–2004)’, (2004) 75 BYbIL 269; Kreß, C., ‘Der Jugoslawien-Strafgerichtshof im Grenzbereich zwischen internationalem bewaffnetem Konflikt und Bürgerkrieg’, in: H. Fischer and S. Lüder (eds.), Völkerrechtliche Verbrechen vor dem Jugoslawien-Tribunal, nationalen Gerichten und dem internationalen Strafgerichtshof – Beiträge zur Entwicklung einer effektiven internationalen Strafgerichtsbarkeit 15; id., ‘Some Reflections on the International Legal Framework governing Transnational Armed Conflicts’, 15 JCSL, 245–274; id., ‘War crimes committed in non-international armed conflict and the emerging system of international criminal justice’, (2000/2001) IsYbHumRts 103; Kretzmer, D., ‘Targeted killings of suspected terrorists: extra-judicial executions or legitimate means of defense?’, (2005) 16 EJIL 171–212; Kritsiotis, D., ‘The Tremors of Tadić’, (2010) 43 ISLRev 262–300; Kussbach, E., ‘Die Rechtsstellung nationaler Befreiungsbewegungen im humanitären Völkerrecht’, in: H. Miehsler et al. (eds.), Jus humanitatis – Festschrift zum 90. Geburtstag von A. Verdross (1980) 499; La Haye, E., War Crimes in Internal Armed (2010); Lubell, N., Extraterritorial Use of Force against Non-State Actors (2010); MacCoubrey, H., ‘War crimes jurisdiction and a permanent International Criminal Court’, (1998) JArmConflL 9; Meindersma, C., ‘Applicability of humanitarian law in international and internal armed conflict’, (1994) HagueYbIL 113; Meron, T., ‘Cassese’s Tadić and the law of non-international armed conflicts’, in: L. Chand Vorah et al. (eds.), Man’s Inhumanity to Man – Essays on International Law in Honour of Antonio Cassese (2003) 553; id., ‘Classification of Armed Conflict in the Former Yugoslavia: Nicaragua’s Fallout’, 92 AJIL 236 (1998); id., ‘War crimes law comes of age’, (1998) 92 AJIL 462; ¹³¹⁸ The question is dealt with in the Lubanga case by the Trial Chamber. See Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 1014-1017. See also Ambos (2012) 12 ICLRev 115, at 150.

Paust, J., 'Post-9/11 Overreaction and Fallacies Regarding War and Defense, Guantanamo, the Status of Persons, Treatment, Judicial Review of Detention, and Due Process in Military Commissions', (2004) 79 Notre Dame LRv 1335; Pejić, J., 'The protective scope of common article 3: more than meets the eye', (2011) 93 IRevRC 189; Schabas, W. A., 'Punishment of non-state actors in non-international armed conflict', (2003) Fordham ILLJ 907; Schindler, D., The Different Types of Armed Conflicts According to the Geneva Conventions and Protocols, II Recueil de Cours 117 (in particular 133 et seq. and 145 et seq.) (1979); Schöndorf, R. S., 'Extra-State Armed Conflicts: Is There a Need for a New Legal Regime?', (2004) 37 NYJIL&Pol. 1; Sivakumaran, S., 'Re-envisioning the International Law of Internal Armed Conflict', (2011) 22 EJIL 219–264; id., 'War crimes before the Special Court for Sierra Leone – Child Soldiers, Hostages, Peacekeepers and Collective Punishments', (2010) 8 JICJ 1009–1034; Spieker, H., 'The International Criminal Court and non-international armed conflicts', (2000) Leiden JIL 395; Spinedi, M., 'On the Non-Attribution of the Bosnian Serbs' conduct to Serbia', (2007) JICJ 829; Stewart, J., 'Towards a single definition of armed conflict in International Humanitarian Law: A critique of internationalized armed conflict', (2003) IRevRC 313–350; Vité, S., 'Typology of armed conflicts in International Humanitarian Law, legal concepts and actual situations', (2009) IRevRC 69–94; Werle G. and Jessberger F., Principles of International Criminal Law (2014); Willmott, D., 'Removing the distinction between international and non-international armed conflict in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2004) MelbJIL 196; Zimmermann, A., 'The Second Lebanon War: Jus ad bellum, jus in bello and the Issue of Proportionality', (2007) 11 MPYbUNL 99; Zischg, R., Nicht-internationaler bewaffneter Konflikt und Völkerrecht (in particular 26 et seq.) (1996).

Specific literature on the elements of crimes: Ambos, K., 'Some preliminary reflections on the mens rea requirements of the crimes of the ICC Statute and of the elements of crimes', in: L. Chand Vorah et al. (eds.), Man's Inhumanity to Man – Essays on International Law in Honour of Antonio Cassese (2003) 11; Dörmann, K., 'Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court: the elements of war crimes – Grave breaches and violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949', (2000) RICR 771; id., 'Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court: the elements of war crimes – Part II: other serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in international and non-international armed conflicts', (2001) RICR 461; id., Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Sources and Commentary (2002); id., 'War crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, with a special focus on the negotiations on the elements of crimes', (2003) MPYbUNL 341; von Hebel, H. and Kelt, M., 'Some comments on the elements of crimes for the crimes of the ICC Statute', (2000) YbIHuM 273; Triffterer, O., 'Kriminalpolitische und dogmatische Überlegungen zum Entwurf gleichlautender "Elements of Crimes" für alle Tatbestände des Völker-mordes', in: B. Schünemann (ed.), Festschrift für Claus Roxin zum 70. Geburtstag am 15. Mai 2001 (2001) 1415.

I. General remarks

During the work of both, the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court as well as during the Rome Conference, the inclusion of war crimes committed in armed conflicts not of an international character was rather difficult to achieve. Given the fact that more and more of the armed conflicts of today do not possess an exclusive international character and that besides, proving such a character might be difficult, it seemed to be mandatory to most delegations to include in the Statute at least a core of acts that would constitute war crimes also in situations of non-international armed conflicts.

The two main proposals submitted to the Preparatory Committee in February 1997 demonstrated however a significant divergence in this regard. While the proposal elaborated by the ICRC, formally submitted by New Zealand and Switzerland¹³¹⁹, contained a rather elaborate list of war crimes applicable to armed conflicts not of an international character, the proposal submitted by the United States¹³²⁰ limited the list of war crimes applicable to non-international armed conflicts to serious breaches of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949. Over time the position of the United States changed to the extent that they became one of the proponents of including war crimes committed in internal armed conflicts into the Statute. Conversely, a number of countries including inter alia India, Pakistan, China and Turkey, were rather reluctant in either accepting any provision dealing with internal armed conflict or could at most agree to include the reference to common article 3.

The current list now contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) is significantly longer than the list of prohibited acts mentioned in the Add. Prot. II to the four Geneva Conventions. Still, the

¹³¹⁹ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.2.

¹³²⁰ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.1.

Statute does not completely follow the approach of the ICTY, which had stated that ‘what is inhumane and consequently proscribed, in international wars, cannot but be inhumane and inadmissible in civil strife’¹³²¹. Since the adoption of the Rome Statute the tendency to assimilate the rules applicable in international and in non-international armed conflict, as demonstrated by recent national codifications of international criminal law such as e.g. the German Code of Crimes against International Law or by the ICRC study on customary international humanitarian law, has some exceptions notwithstanding been further reinforced.

826 It should also be mentioned that most of the provisions of the part dealing with internal armed conflict exactly mirror provisions already contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) dealing with international armed conflict. Given this partial identity, the comments will in those cases be limited to a pure reference to the respective other provisions¹³²².

827 On the whole, approximately half of the provisions, i.e. article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii), (iv), (v), (vi), (vii), (xiv), (xv–xxi), (xxiii), (xxiv) and (xxv), were not taken over from the part on international armed conflict. This is partly due to the fact that some of the provisions are by their very nature not applicable to internal warfare such as e.g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiv) which as far as international armed conflicts are concerned, refers to the act of declaring abolished in a court of law the rights and actions of the nationals of the hostile party. Other proposed provisions concerning internal armed conflicts were considered by at least a certain number of participating States, not to have yet reached the status of customary international law and for this reason were not included.

828 At the time of the Rome Conference this was also true with respect to the non-inclusion of provisions relating to the use, in internal armed conflicts, of prohibited weapons. Accordingly, notwithstanding the (correct) determination by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in the case against *Dusko Tadić*¹³²³, that also in cases of civil strife, customary rules have developed which prohibit the use of specific weapons¹³²⁴, a provision similar in nature to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii)–(xix) was at a rather late stage of the negotiations deleted from the proposal finally submitted by the Bureau to the Rome conference¹³²⁵. The resulting lacunae, however, was remedied at the Kampala Review Conference¹³²⁶. Following a proposal drafted by Belgium¹³²⁷ the Kampala Review Conference, by consensus, adopted three crimes regarding the use of prohibited weapons in non-international armed conflict. Specifically, article 8 para. 2 (e) of the Statute was extended to include the crimes of employing poison or poisoned weapons (xiii), employing asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids materials or devices (xiv), employing bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body (xv). These new provisions which have not yet entered into force replicate the provisions found in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii), (xviii) and (xix) of the Statute that apply to international armed conflict as adopted in Rome.

829 Finally, notwithstanding article 8 para. 2 (d), (f) and para. 3, the general scope of application of the provisions dealing with internal armed conflicts is, compared with Add. Prot. II, significantly larger. In particular, it also applies to armed conflicts between several organized armed groups¹³²⁸.

¹³²¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 119.

¹³²² Such references, do not however, necessarily imply a complete identification with the view of the authors commenting on the respective provisions dealing with international armed conflict.

¹³²³ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, paras. 127 et seq. (127 and 134).

¹³²⁴ See in particular para. 124 of the above mentioned judgement which stipulated that ‘... there undisputedly emerged a general consensus in the international community on the principle that the use of those weapons [the Court here refers to chemical weapons, the author] is also prohibited in internal armed conflicts’.

¹³²⁵ See, e.g. the working document submitted by the bureau on 6 July 1998 (UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53), which in its article 5 (War Crimes), D., I) had left the issue still open.

¹³²⁶ See below commentary to article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiii), (xiv) and (xv).

¹³²⁷ The so-called ‘Belgian proposal’ is included in Annex III to Resolution ICC-ASP/8/Res.6, 26 November 2009, available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/ICC-ASP-8-Res.6-ENG.pdf> last accessed May 2015.

¹³²⁸ For details see below Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (f), 988 et seq.

The provisions dealing with non-international armed conflict apply from the initiation of such an armed conflict¹³²⁹ and extend beyond the mere cessation of hostilities until a peaceful settlement is achieved¹³³⁰. Until that moment international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory under the control of one of the Parties to the conflict, irrespective of whether actual combat takes place there or not¹³³¹.

Not every serious crime committed during the respective internal armed conflict can, however, be regarded as a violation of article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) of the Statute. In order to amount to a war crime such acts must possess a certain nexus with the armed conflict, such as having been committed in the course of the fighting. The rationale of the nexus requirement is to distinguish war crimes from domestic crimes and to prevent random criminal occurrences from being characterized as war crimes¹³³². The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that '[w]hat ultimately distinguishes a war crime from a purely domestic offence is that a war crime is shaped by or dependent upon the environment – the armed conflict – in which it is committed'¹³³³. Yet, the establishment of the nexus does not require that the armed conflict be causal to the commission of the crime¹³³⁴. Instead and in line with the jurisprudence of both, the ICTY and the ICTR, it is sufficient that the alleged acts were related to the hostilities occurring in other parts of the territories controlled by the parties to the conflict¹³³⁵. In the Katanga decision the ICC has held that '[a]s neither the Statute nor the Elements of Crimes define the phrases 'in the context of' and/or 'was associated with', the Chamber applies the case-law of the international tribunals'¹³³⁶. The two tribunals, the Special Court for Sierra Leone as well as the ICC Pre-Trial Chambers have held that there is a sufficient nexus provided the armed conflict played a substantial role in the perpetrator's ability to commit the crime, in his decision to commit it, the manner in which it was committed or the purpose for which it was committed¹³³⁷. Hence, if it can be established [...] that the perpetrator acted in furtherance of or under the guise of the armed conflict, it would be sufficient to conclude that his acts were closely related to the armed conflict¹³³⁸. It should be noted, however, that the ¹³²⁹ Ibid.

¹³³⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70; see also Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 183 and 194; Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 15 June 2009, para. 229.

¹³³¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70.

¹³³² Prosecutor v. Boskoski and Tarculovski, IT-04-82-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 10 July 2008, para. 293; Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 140 et seq; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 422 et seq.

¹³³³ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96- 23/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 58; Prosecutor v. Blagojević, IT-02-60-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 17 January 2005, para. 536.

¹³³⁴ Prosecutor v. Nđindiliyimana et al., ICTR-00-56-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 17 May 2011, para. 2132, quoting Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al., ICTR-98-41-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 18 Dec. 2008, para. 2231; Prosecutor v. Semanza, ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 15 May 2003, para. 517, quoting Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., T-96-23 & IT-96- 23/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 58. See also Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 May 2003, para. 569; Prosecutor v. Setako, ICTR-04-81-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 September 2011, para. 249; Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 20 June 2007, paras. 246–247; Prosecutor v. Perišić, IT-04-81-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 6 September 2011, para. 73.

¹³³⁵ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70; and Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 193.

¹³³⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 381.

¹³³⁷ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96- 23/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 58; 7, Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 26 May 2003, para. 569; for further details see Kolb (2004) BYIL 280–281. See also Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 Jan. 2007, para. 288. Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 563.

¹³³⁸ Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96- 23/1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 58.

catalogue of additional criteria for the establishment of the nexus-requirement as proposed by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Kunarac by making reference e. g. to the question whether the perpetrator is a combatant or whether the victim is a member of the opposing party¹³³⁹, appears to be overly limited since a war crime may be committed irrespective of whether the perpetrator or the victim is a combatant/fighter or a civilian.

832 It should also be noted that the introduction to the elements of crimes relating to war crimes in its last part provides that the offender must have been aware of the factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict that this requirement is implicit in the terms ‘took place in the context of and was associated with’. On the other hand, said introduction also provides that there is no requirement that the perpetrator must have been aware of the facts that established the character of the conflict as either being international or non-international.

II. Classification of armed conflicts as ‘international armed conflicts’ or ‘armed conflicts not of an international character’

833 Determining whether a given armed conflict must be characterised as an international armed conflict or an armed conflict not of an international character is of major importance, given that under the ICC Statute, only in the former case the Court would be competent to judge upon those serious violations of the laws and customs of war enshrined in article 8 para. 2 (b) of the Statute. On the other hand, the prohibitions contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) apply in accordance with lit. (d) and (f) of said provision only in situations of armed conflicts not of an international character. In the Lubanga judgment of March 2012 the Trial Chamber has accordingly emphasized the continuous importance of distinguishing the two conflict categories under the Rome Statute¹³⁴⁰.

834 Such determination, however, often proves to be a rather difficult issue involving both complicated legal and factual questions. Indeed, four situations have to be distinguished where this distinction has to be made, i. e.

- (1) armed conflicts which take place exclusively between two or more States¹³⁴¹;
- (2) armed conflicts which take place within the territory of a given State without third States being involved in the armed conflict¹³⁴²;
- (3) armed conflicts where there is fighting between governmental armed forces on the one side and organised armed groups on the other and where at the same time third States are also involved in the armed conflict¹³⁴³;
- (4) and finally those armed conflicts between a State’s regular armed forces and transnational non-state armed groups which do not occur within the territory of the respective State¹³⁴⁴.

835 It is in particular with respect to the third and fourth categories that problems arise regarding either the necessary threshold of involvement of such third State in order for a given conflict to become internationalised or the very legal character of such transnational armed conflicts. Recently, the temporal and geographical scope of application of international humanitarian law pertaining to non-international armed conflicts has also become an issue of controversy. Legal issues might, however, also arise in the two other situations, such as, e. g., the question whether situations described in article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I of 1977 do also, for the purposes of the Statute of the ICC, amount to international armed conflicts.

836 In any event, the very object and purpose of IHL militates in favour of the protection deriving from this body of law to be as broad as possible. Yet, given that the protection

¹³³⁹ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 567.

¹³⁴⁰ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC 01/04-01/06, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 539.

¹³⁴¹ See below (aa).

¹³⁴² See below (bb).

¹³⁴³ See below (cc).

¹³⁴⁴ See below (dd).

accorded by the rules on international armed conflicts is broader than those relating to internal conflicts, it seems to be appropriate, in case of doubt, to apply those governing international armed conflicts¹³⁴⁵. Likewise, and in regard specifically to article 8 of the Statute, it would not be in line with the overall intention of the Rome Statute if, for example, the intentional launching of an attack in the knowledge that such attack will cause incidental loss of life or injury to civilians as provided for in article 8 para. 2 (b) (iv) would only be applicable in armed conflicts between States as such, but not if such attack is being conducted by a non-State actor operating from the territory of a given State. The same consideration might refute the suggestion to let the applicability of e. g. article 8 para. 2 (b) (and rules governing international armed conflicts generally) be dependent on the will of the affected third State.

1. Armed conflicts taking place exclusively between two or more States

Armed conflicts which take place between two or more States clearly possess an international character¹³⁴⁶. In the Lubanga decision the Chamber, relying on the ICJ's holding in the Case concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo, stated that it 'considers an armed conflict to be international in character if it takes place between two or more States; this extends to the partial or total occupation of the territory of another State, whether or not the said occupation meets with armed resistances'¹³⁴⁷. Examples of other recent international armed conflicts are the conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia (1998–2000), as well as the conflicts in Afghanistan (2001–2002), Iraq (2003–2004), Georgia (August 2008) and the military intervention by members of NATO in Libya (2011). It is in such situations that article 8 para. 2 (a) and (b) of the Statute apply. It is worth noting, however, that this is true regardless of whether or not one of the parties to the conflict has been recognized as constituting a State by the respective adversary, provided that it indeed possesses the necessary requirements to be considered a State under international law¹³⁴⁸. This has also been confirmed throughout the jurisprudence of the ICTY, which, on several occasions, has qualified the conflict between Yugoslav forces on the one side and Croatian or Bosnian forces on the other, as being international in character, notwithstanding the fact that the then Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia respectively the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had at the relevant time not (yet) recognized the respective other State¹³⁴⁹.

¹³⁴⁵ See for a similar view following mutatis mutandis the authors' position on the matter the OTP's Article 53(1) Report 'Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia' of 6 November 2014, available at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/otp/OTP-COM-Article_53%281%29-Report-06Nov2014Eng.pdf> accessed 24 June 2015, para. 35 ('Additionally, as the protection accorded by the rules on international armed conflicts is broader than those relating to internal conflicts, it seems appropriate for the limited purpose of a preliminary examination, in cases of doubt, to apply those governing international armed conflicts.').

¹³⁴⁶ See the majority decision of the ICTY in the Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 25 June 1999, para. 8, where the court states that 'an international armed conflict requires the involvement of two States'.

¹³⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC 01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 Jan. 2007, para. 209; ICJ, Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 229, para. 172; See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 240; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 223. See also Prosecutor v. Lubanga, Dyilo, ICC 01/04-01/06, Judgment, 14 March 2012, paras. 541, 542.

¹³⁴⁸ See also article 4 Add. Prot. I which states that the application of both Add. Prot. I as well as the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 shall not affect the legal status of the Parties to the conflict.

¹³⁴⁹ See in particular the confirmation of the indictment by Judge Riad in Prosecutor v. Mrksic et al., No. IT-95-13-I, Confirmation of the indictment, 7 November 1995, ICTY Jud. Rep. 1994/95 II, p. 1091; Prosecutor v. Nikolic, IT-94-2-R61, Review of indictment pursuant to Rule 61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Trial chamber, 20 October 1995, ICTY Jud. Rep. 1994/95 II, 771; Prosecutor v. Karadžić & Mladić, Review of the indictments pursuant to Rule 61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Trial Chamber, 16 July 1996, para. 30, quoted by Jones, The Practice 19 and finally the judgment rendered by Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 569.

2. Conflicts which take place within the territory of a given State without third States being involved in the conflict

- 838 Armed conflicts occurring in the territory of a State in which no third State is involved might take two different forms: There might exist
- either an armed conflict between, on the one side, governmental armed forces and on the other side, one or more organised armed groups
 - or an armed conflict exclusively between armed groups¹³⁵⁰.
- 839 With regard to armed conflicts that take place exclusively between armed groups, it seems obvious that such a situation cannot amount to an international armed conflict. Indeed, article 8 para. 2 (f) expressly qualifies armed conflicts that take place between several organized armed groups as constituting armed conflicts not of an international character.
- 840 As to the first alternative mentioned above, however, i. e. armed conflict between governmental armed forces on the one hand and organized armed groups on the other without third States being involved, it might be said that such situations will normally also fall within the category of internal armed conflicts as provided for in article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e). Article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I provides, however, that at least for the purposes of said protocol, the notion of international armed conflicts as defined in article 2 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949, also encompasses so-called wars of national liberation¹³⁵¹. That notion emerged from several resolutions of the General Assembly and notably Res. 3103 (XXVIII) adopted on 12 December 1973 which stated that ‘armed conflicts involving the struggle of peoples against colonial and alien domination and racist régimes are to be regarded as international armed conflicts in the sense of the 1949 Geneva Conventions’. The debate leading to the adoption of Add. Prot. I of 1977 demonstrated to what extent such an approach was controversial¹³⁵². Still, article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I now provides that international armed conflicts include ‘armed conflicts in which peoples fight against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist régimes in the exercise of their right to self-determination, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations’.
- 841 It might be said that, as of today, the rule contained in article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I has become a generally binding rule of customary international law¹³⁵³ with the possible exception of those countries which have persistently objected to the formation of such rule including inter alia Israel¹³⁵⁴. Besides, it is binding on all parties of Add. Prot. I as forming part of their respective treaty obligations. Accordingly, whenever an armed conflict occurs on the territory of a State Party to Add. Prot. I in which article 1 para. 4 of said protocol comes into play, the armed conflict possesses an international character.
- 842 The question therefore arises whether this rule applies only as far as general humanitarian law (and particular Add. Prot. I) is concerned or whether it extends to the Statute of the ICC as well. In that regard, one has to first take into account the fact that article 8 of the Statute does not contain a clause similar to article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I. To the contrary, the definition of internal armed conflicts as contained in article 8 para. 2 (f) seems to encompass any form of protracted armed conflict between governmental authorities and organized armed groups. Accordingly, argumentum e contrario, one might be tempted to argue that any such situation – even if falling within the ¹³⁵⁰ See article 8 para. 2 (f), second phrase, second alternative of the Statute. Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 231; Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 57.

¹³⁵¹ See for that notion, e.g., Abi-Saab (1979) IV Rdc 353 et seq., in particular 370 et seq. and 403 et seq.

¹³⁵² For a detailed description of this debate see Abi-Saab (1999) IV RDC 403 et seq.

¹³⁵³ See for such a proposition, e.g., Cassese (1984) 3 PacificBasinLJ 71; but see also for a different position Aldrich (1985/86) 26 VirgJIL 703: ‘the provision is a dead letter’ and Klefner, in: Fleck, Handbook (2013) 46.

¹³⁵⁴ Cassese (1984) 3 PacificBasinLJ 71.

scope of application of article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I – can for the purposes of the Statute of the ICC not be considered to constitute an international armed conflict.

On the other hand, this would entail the necessary result that any such war of national liberation would eventually be subject to two different set of rules, i.e. those applying to international armed conflicts for purposes of general rules of humanitarian law and those applying to internal armed conflicts under the Statute of the ICC. Notwithstanding, the practical relevance of such a result would be rather limited. First, the scope of application of article 1 para. 4 was intended to be limited to a narrow group of situations. In fact, as far as can be seen to date no conflict has ever been qualified in accordance with article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I. Second, countries most concerned have in the past avoided becoming parties to Add. Prot. I. Besides, wars against colonial domination are now a thing of the past¹³⁵⁵ and the reference to racist régimes only applies to ‘régimes founded on racist criteria’ such as, e.g., the former apartheid régime in South Africa¹³⁵⁶. In particular, said provision was not deemed to apply to conflicts in which a certain ethnic group or the inhabitants of a given territory attempt to secede outside a colonial context¹³⁵⁷. Besides, in order to internationalise the conflict – and as a consequence to eventually also make applicable article 8 para. 2 (a) and (b) of the Statute of the ICC –, the respective authority representing the people struggling for self-determination must beforehand have made a declaration in accordance with article 96 para. 3 of Add. Prot. I¹³⁵⁸.

3. Armed conflicts where there is fighting between governmental armed forces on the one side and organised armed groups on the other and where at the same time third States are also involved in the armed conflict

Non-international armed conflicts might become internationalised by the fact that one or more States become involved in the conflict. Yet, two scenarios ought to be distinguished: 844

If third States intervene on the side of the governmental armed forces, this does not alter the conflict qualification, i.e. the conflict continues to qualify as a non-international armed conflict¹³⁵⁹. Thus, although due to the external intervention such a conflict features an international element and could thus be said to have been internationalized in the colloquial sense of the term, the legal qualification of the conflict remains unaffected.

If, however, one or more third States intervene on the side of the organized armed group, the conflict qualification might, depending on the degree of intervention, be altered. Thus, in the Lubanga Case the Chamber referred to the Tadić decision¹³⁶⁰ and held that ‘... an internal armed conflict that breaks out on the territory of a State may become international – or, depending on the circumstances, be international in character alongside with an internal armed conflict – if (i) another State intervenes in that conflict through its troops [on the side of an armed group fighting the government of a State] (direct intervention), or if (ii) some of the participants in the internal armed conflict act on behalf of that other State (indirect intervention)’¹³⁶¹.

As to the issue of direct intervention on the side of the organized armed group, it was the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY which held that, due to the involvement of the Croatian Army 845

¹³⁵⁵ Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 134; Kleffner, in: Fleck, Handbook (2013) 46.

¹³⁵⁶ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) No. 112.

¹³⁵⁷ Kleffner, in: Fleck, Handbook (2013) 46.

¹³⁵⁸ As to further problems involved in the procedure provided for in article 96 para. 3 see Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) Nos. 1088–1089.

¹³⁵⁹ Geiß and Siegrist (2011) 93 IRevRC 11, 15.

¹³⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-A, Judgement, Appeal Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 84.

¹³⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC 01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 209. In the Katanga decision the Chamber qualified the conflict as an international armed conflict but did not explain whether it considered the conflict to be international due to a direct intervention or due to an indirect intervention, i.e. Uganda’s overall control over the relevant armed groups; Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 240.

in Bosnia-Herzegovina and due to the involvement of the Yugoslav National Army in hostilities in Croatia, as well as in Bosnia-Herzegovina until its formal withdrawal, the respective conflict possessed an international character¹³⁶². Similarly, in the Katanga decision the Chamber found ‘sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that Uganda directly intervened in this armed conflict through the Ugandan People Armed Forces (‘the UPDF’)¹³⁶³.

846 Direct intervention, however, need not necessarily always occur on the side of one of the parties of an armed conflict. For example, in March 2011 when certain NATO States directly intervened in Libya where at the time a non-international armed conflict between Libyan governmental forces and the forces of the National Libyan Council was ongoing, this intervention triggered an international armed conflict between the respective intervening States and Libya alongside the ongoing non-international armed conflict. Similarly, when NATO States directly intervened in the Kosovo conflict in 1999, they did not intervene on the side of the UCK, but rather on their own behalf. In such cases of independent direct intervention the qualification of the already ongoing non-international armed conflict remains unaffected. Instead, such independent intervention triggers an additional armed conflict which may qualify as an international or a non-international armed conflict depending on whom the intervener is fighting against. Admittedly, however, there are currently no clear-cut criteria for the determination of whether an intervention is ‘independent’ or in support of one of the parties to the conflict. The mere fact, however, that one side of the conflict de facto benefits from such an intervention, as was the case for the armed groups in Libya and Kosovo, seems insufficient to internationalize the whole conflict. On the other hand, the mere intention of the intervener cannot be decisive either, given that conflict qualification is always to be assessed on the basis of objective criteria. Therefore, the determination hinges on the degree of collaboration between the intervener on the one hand and the parties to the conflict on the other.

847 As far as the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina and clashes between the Croatian Government and Croatian Serb rebel forces in the Krajina region are concerned, the ICTY Appeals Chamber held that those conflicts had to be considered as to be of an internal nature, unless a direct involvement of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could be proven¹³⁶⁴. This ‘indirect intervention’ standard was further developed by Trial Chamber II of the ICTY in its decision of May 7, 1997 where the majority considered that an armed conflict might only be qualified as an international armed conflict if the relevant military actions can be imputed to a third (State) party involved in the conflict, i. e. if the third party exercises effective control over the organized armed group(s)¹³⁶⁵. In that regard the Chamber applied the test developed by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the Nicaragua case¹³⁶⁶ for purposes of State responsibility. It considered that even where the third party plays a role of vital importance for the insurgent, for example through granting logistical support, but lacks command and control of the insurgent armed forces, the conflict does not possess an international character¹³⁶⁷. Judge McDonald, to the contrary, while applying the same agency test derived from the Nicaragua judgement, found in her dissenting opinion that the appropriate test is one of ‘dependency and control’ and that a showing of ‘effective control’ is not required¹³⁶⁸ in order to internationalise the armed conflict.

¹³⁶² Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 72.

¹³⁶³ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 240. However, the Chamber additionally also relied on the support Uganda had provided to the armed groups; ibid.

¹³⁶⁴ Ibid.

¹³⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, reprinted in: (1997) ILM 928; cf. also the review of that decision by Scharf, AJIL 718 et seq. (1997).

¹³⁶⁶ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Reports 1986, 14, 62, para. 109.

¹³⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, reprinted in: (1997) ILM 928.

¹³⁶⁸ Separate and Dissenting Opinion McDonalds in the above-mentioned case, para. 4.

One might seriously question whether the standard developed by the ICJ in the Nicaragua case for purposes of State responsibility might validly be applied in order to determine whether a given armed conflict is international or internal¹³⁶⁹. Indeed, as stated by a Trial Chamber of the ICTY in the Rajic case, even when applying the Nicaragua standard, a significant and continuous military intervention by an outside State in support of one of the fighting factions is sufficient to transform the conflict into an international one¹³⁷⁰.

This was further confirmed by the decision of the ICTY in the Aleksovski case, where the majority – while still upholding the Nicaragua test as such – found that the decisive test is to consider whether the insurgent groups ‘are acting on behalf of a foreign State’¹³⁷¹, i. e. that they are either ‘acting under the overall control’ of that State¹³⁷² or that there is at least an ‘indirect involvement of that country in the armed conflict’¹³⁷³.

In order to determine such overall control or involvement, one should apply a standard which takes into account a bundle of factors, namely

- the possible extent of the direct foreign military intervention;
- the historical, ideological and political ties that exist between the insurgents and the third party¹³⁷⁴;
- the extent of logistical support granted, including the dependency of the insurgents from such outside support;
- the extent of the integration of the respective military command structures;
- the recognition of actors involved in the conflict by outside parties and finally
- the position taken by relevant United Nations organs and in particular the position taken by the Security Council.

A similar approach was chosen by a Trial Chamber of the ICTY in the Čelebići case¹³⁷⁵ which inter alia also referred to the common purpose between the third State involved (i. e. in casu the FRY) and the insurgents (i. e. the Bosnian Serbs)¹³⁷⁶. Finally, it was the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY, which in its last decision in the Tadić case¹³⁷⁷, found that the Nicaragua test is not persuasive¹³⁷⁸. Instead, it considered that the control required by the third party may be deemed to exist when that State has a role in organising, co-ordinating or planning the military actions of the organized armed group, in addition to financing, training and equipping the group or providing operational support to it¹³⁷⁹, thus demonstrating a close personal, organisational and logistical interconnection between the insurgents and the respective third State¹³⁸⁰. The Tadić Appeals decision also found that control by a State over subordinate armed forces or militias or paramilitary units may be of an overall character and does not necessarily include the issuing of specific orders by the State or the direction of each individual operation¹³⁸¹. This standard of overall control was also confirmed by the Pre-Trial

¹³⁶⁹ See for such a distinction, e.g., Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 23; see also Dissenting Opinion Rodrigues in the Aleksovski case, Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 25 June 1999, para. 21 and already Meron (1998) 92 AJIL 237.

¹³⁷⁰ See Prosecutor v. Rajić, No. IT-95-12, Review of the Indictment pursuant to Rule 61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Trial Chamber, 13 September 1996, para. 13.

¹³⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, Joint Opinion of the Majority, Judge Vohrah and Judge Nieto-Navia, 25 June 1999, para. 10.

¹³⁷² Ibid., para. 27.

¹³⁷³ Ibid., para. 11.

¹³⁷⁴ For the relevance of this factor, e.g., the decision of the Bayerisches Oberstes Landesgericht in the case of Public Prosecutor v. Djajić, (1998) NJW 394.

¹³⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 204 et seq.

¹³⁷⁶ Ibid., para. 262.

¹³⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999.

¹³⁷⁸ Ibid., paras. 116 et seq.

¹³⁷⁹ Ibid., para. 137.

¹³⁸⁰ See for that proposition the unpublished decision of the German Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf 2 StE 8/96, positively quoted by the Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 129, note 154.

¹³⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 137.

Chamber I in its Lubanga decision of 29 January 2007 and in the subsequent Trial Chamber judgment of 14 March 2012¹³⁸².

- 852 Yet, it has to be noted, that this overall control test may not be applied with regard to situations of occupation since the law of occupation requires a direct and effective degree of control by the respective occupying power in accordance with customary international law, as reflected in Article 42 of the Hague Regulations of 1907¹³⁸³. Against this background, Pre-Trial Chamber I, in the Lubanga decision, had held that there was sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that, as a result of the presence of the Republic of Uganda as an occupying Power, the armed conflict which occurred in Ituri can be characterised as an armed conflict of an international character from July 2002 to 2 June 2003¹³⁸⁴, while in light of the paucity of evidence before it, the Chamber was not in a position to find that there was sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that Rwanda played a role that can be described as direct or indirect intervention in the armed conflict in Ituri¹³⁸⁵.
- 853 However, a somewhat different reasoning was adopted in the Katanga decision where the Chamber did not explicitly qualify Uganda as an occupying Power but relied on a direct intervention of Uganda through the Ugandan People Armed Forces (UPDF) finding sufficient evidence for a ‘direct participation of significant numbers of UPDF troops in several military operations on behalf of different armed groups’ and also ‘that Uganda was one of the main supplier of weapons and ammunitions to these armed groups and that the respective recipients’ ability to successfully attack other groups was aided by this Ugandan military assistance’¹³⁸⁶.
- 854 Notably, in the Case concerning the Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the ICJ held, in sharp contrast to the ICTY Appeals Chamber judgment in the Tadić case, that the ‘overall control’ test as developed throughout the jurisprudence of the ICTY, was not appropriate concerning the determination of State responsibility¹³⁸⁷. Nevertheless, the ICJ observed, that since ‘logic does not require the same test to be adopted in resolving two issues, which are very different in nature’¹³⁸⁸, the ‘overall control’ test may still be applicable and suitable when deciding whether an armed conflict is international or non-international in nature¹³⁸⁹.
- 855 Finally, the issue of a possible internationalisation of a particular, otherwise non-international armed conflict arises where UN peacekeeping forces, acting under a ‘robust’ mandate, are involved in the conflict. Yet, any such involvement is not, as such, capable of changing the legal character of the conflict itself for purposes of article 8 of the Statute and thus is not, ¹³⁸² Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 541; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 211.

¹³⁸³ Prosecutor v. Naletilic and Martinovic, IT-98-34-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 March 2003, para. 214 et seq.; but see also Prosecutor v. Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber, Judgment, 3 March 2000, para. 149; for further details see, Kolb (2004) 75 BYIL. 283–285; Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 229, para. 172; Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Advisory Opinion, ICJ Rep. 2004, 167, para. 78 and p. 172, para. 89; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 212.

¹³⁸⁴ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 220.

¹³⁸⁵ Ibid., para. 226. In its judgment of 14 March 2012, however, the Trial Chamber in view of the conduct under consideration qualified the conflict as a non-international armed conflict, Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, paras. 565–567.

¹³⁸⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 240.

¹³⁸⁷ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), Judgment, ICJ Rep. 2007, para. 402 et seq.

¹³⁸⁸ Ibid., para. 405; for a critical appraisal of this consideration see Spinedi (2007) JICJ 829.

¹³⁸⁹ Ibid., para. 404; Cassese (2007) 18 EJIL 649; Werle and Jessberger Principles (2014), 415.

in itself, capable of internationalising it. This conclusion may be derived from the very structure of article 8 of the Statute itself, and more specifically from the fact that directing attacks against peacekeeping forces constitutes a war crime in both, international armed conflicts under article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii), and in non-international armed conflicts under article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii). It thus logically follows that, at least for purposes of the Rome Statute and regardless of any qualification for purposes of international humanitarian law generally, an armed conflict also involving UN peacekeeping troops does not necessarily and by itself, constitute an international armed conflict. Rather, the overall conflict must be qualified as being either of an international or a non-international character irrespective of the involvement of peacekeeping forces as such.

4. Conflicts between a State's regular armed forces and transnational non-state armed groups which do not occur within the territory of the respective State ('transnational armed conflicts')

As a result of the attacks of September 11, 2001 there has been an intensive and still ongoing international debate on how to qualify the subsequent military operations forming part of the so-called US-led 'war on terror' between a State's regular armed forces – in particular those of the United States and their allies – and non-state entities. And even though it seems that the 'global war on terror' phraseology has now been dropped from diplomatic parlance, the qualification problems associated with the extraterritorial use of force against non-state actors have remained. These operations are characterized by the fact that they do not occur within the territory of the respective State, but that they take place within the territory of (a) third State(s). Qualification problems in this context have arisen e.g. with regard to the 2006 conflict between the Israeli armed forces and Hezbollah forces in Northern Lebanon, with respect to the 2007 conflict between Turkish governmental forces and Kurdish armed groups in Northern Iraq, concerning Colombian military operations against the FARC on the territory of Ecuador in 2008 or, more recently, with regard to Kenya's military operation against Al-Shabaab on the territory of Somalia which commenced in October 2011. 856

On the one hand, such conflicts possess an extraterritorial character, given that military force is being used on the territory of another State. On the other hand, they typically lack a genuine inter-state element, given that the military action is not directed against another State as such, but rather against non-state entities such as Al Qaeda, Hezbollah, the PKK or Al-Shabaab that are present on another State's territory. Such conflicts may thus be best described as 'transnational armed conflicts'¹³⁹⁰ or 'extra-state hostilities'¹³⁹¹. It should be noted however, that these are merely descriptive terms suitable to capture a new phenomenon but not (yet) a new legal category of armed conflict. Thus, the problem remains to qualify a given transnational armed conflict as either an international or a non-international armed conflict or both. As the very term to describe the phenomenon indicates, this type of conflict raises some analytical difficulties concerning the traditional international/non-international dichotomy in international humanitarian law generally, and the Rome Statute in particular, as the emergence of this new kind of conflict was not foreseen when the respective treaties, including the Rome Statute, were drafted. 857

Although the term 'transnational armed conflict' is appropriate in pointing out the crucial characteristics of the phenomenon as such, it has to be first emphasized, however, that in most cases, counter-terrorist operations will not even constitute an armed conflict within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions or the ICC Statute. In legal terms they rather possess the character of police missions aimed at repressing severe crime, even if carried out by regular armed forces¹³⁹². As such they are comparable to the contemporary counter-piracy opera- 858

¹³⁹⁰ See, e.g., Corn (2007) 40 VandJTransL 295, 299.

¹³⁹¹ Schöndorf (2004) 37 NYJIL&Pol 1, 3.

¹³⁹² See, e.g., Paust (2004) 79 NotreDameLRev 1335, 1342.

tions in the Gulf of Aden, which, albeit carried out by the navies of various states, qualify as multinational police operations that are governed primarily by human rights law rather than humanitarian law. Likewise, isolated terrorist acts such as those that have occurred inter alia in London, Mumbai, Madrid, Casablanca or Bali, are usually not capable of yet amounting to an armed conflict¹³⁹³. It follows that, as a rule, article 8 of the Statute will, at least as a matter of principle, not be applicable to these new forms of organised violence, even if the United States Supreme Court in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld has taken the position that common article 3, as a minimum standard, was applicable to the conflict during which the detainee had been captured, thereby implicitly confirming the U.S. government's assertion that counter-terrorist operations conducted by U.S. forces¹³⁹⁴ forming part of the so-called 'war on terror' constituted an armed conflict in the sense of international humanitarian law and thus also within the meaning of the Rome Statute. The ICRC has however rightly rejected the assumption that there is an ongoing armed conflict of global dimensions and has instead, adopted a case-by-case approach concerning the classification of the various different situations of violence that have occurred in the fight against terrorism¹³⁹⁵.

859 Such a case-by-case approach reveals that, notwithstanding the general caveat regarding the application of international humanitarian law in the fight against terrorism mentioned above, there have been a number of cases in which the hostilities between a State's armed forces and a non-State actor with the primary goal to suppress terrorist activities did indeed amount to an armed conflict, the most important examples being the war waged by the U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan that started in October 2001, and the 2006 Second Lebanese War between Israel and Hezbollah

860 In cases where counter-terrorist operations of a State indeed result in an armed conflict, an important distinction has to be drawn.

On the one hand, if the conflict between the State and an organised armed group takes place on a territory subject to belligerent occupation by the acting State, it might be argued that it would possess an international character where and to the extent that the armed group either belongs to the armed forces of the occupied State respectively to the entity representing the people in question¹³⁹⁶. This is due to the fact that it would be contradictory to, on the one hand, have the belligerent occupation as such being governed by the Fourth Geneva Convention and customary international law, and, on the other hand, regulate the conduct of hostilities on the occupied territory between occupying forces and insurgent forces representing the occupied territory by norms governing internal conflict only¹³⁹⁷. Yet, article 1, para. 4 Add. Prot. I confirms that only certain types of armed conflicts taking place in a situation of occupation might amount to international armed conflicts since even under article 1, para. 4 Add. Prot. I armed conflicts taking place in occupied territories only qualify as international armed conflict provided further criteria are met, namely that the non-State group involved in the conflict is representative of a people exercising its right of self-determination and thus requiring that the non-State party to the conflict constitutes more than a mere group de facto exercising control over a certain part of the occupied territory.

861 On the other hand, if the armed conflict is taking place on the territory of a third State which is, as such, not party to the hostilities in question, the situation is more complex. One example is the war between Israel and Hezbollah, where this non-state group operated on ¹³⁹³ Arnold, Repressing Terrorism (2004) 111 et seq. See also mn 302.

¹³⁹⁴ Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 65 (2006).

¹³⁹⁵ Pejic (2011) 93 IRevRC 189, 196.

¹³⁹⁶ In the Lubanga decision the Pre-Trial Chamber held 'that, as a result of the presence of the Republic of Uganda as an occupying Power, the armed conflict which occurred in Ituri can be characterised as an armed conflict of an international character from July 2002 to 2 June 2003' and thereby arguably assumed that occupation internationalizes any other conflict; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 220.

¹³⁹⁷ Cassese, International Law (2005) 420. This line of reasoning was affirmatively cited by the Supreme Court of Israel in its decision on the Israeli government's 'targeted killings' policy in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, see The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The Government of Israel, (2006) 769/02 HCl, para. 18 et seq.

and from Lebanese territory, the actions of which could however not be attributed to the State of Lebanon¹³⁹⁸. In its Hamdan decision, the U.S. Supreme Court held that such kind of incidents come within the scope of non-international conflicts, relying on an analysis of the term ‘non-international’ itself. The Court rightly held that non-state armed entities are not and are not even able to be ‘High Contracting Parties’ of the Geneva Conventions. According to this view, the phrase ‘not of an international character’ has to be literally interpreted and thus comprises every kind of armed conflict that is not carried out between nations, i.e. sovereign States¹³⁹⁹. In sharp contrast thereto, however, the Supreme Court of Israel took a position which is antithetic to this conclusion. The Israeli Supreme Court argued that the above considerations regarding situations of belligerent occupation are not restricted to such situations, but that the law dealing with international armed conflicts should apply in any case of armed conflict that crosses the borders of a State, thus equating the term ‘international’ with ‘transborder’¹⁴⁰⁰.

The better view, however, is to qualify conflicts that involve a non-state actor as non-international armed conflicts even if they involve a cross-border element. The concept of international armed conflict as it is laid out in article 2 common to the Geneva Conventions as well as customary international law, requires States to be on each side of the conflict¹⁴⁰¹. Certainly, article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I¹⁴⁰² evidences that if a specific rule exists, the concept of international armed conflict may exceptionally be extended also to conflicts between States and non-state actors. However, article 1 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I has remained controversial, as far as can be seen it has never been applied in practice and its conditions are evidently not fulfilled in the transnational scenarios under consideration.

Of course, the extension of the non-international armed conflict model to transnational constellations, i.e. a State fighting a non-state actor in the territory of another State, is not without problems either. The traditional conception of a non-international armed conflict has certainly been that of an internal armed conflict confined to the territory of a single State. This traditional conception is vividly reflected in the wording of common article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions which speaks of conflicts ‘occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties’, and even more clearly in the wording of article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II which talks of conflicts ‘which take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party’.

Moreover, the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Tadić spoke of armed conflicts ‘within a state’¹⁴⁰³ and also the Rome Statute in article 8 para. 2 (f) speaks of conflicts ‘that take place in the territory of a State’. Thus, even more explicitly in the Bemba decision the ICC Chamber concluded that an armed conflict not of an international character ‘takes place within the confines of a State territory’¹⁴⁰⁴. All of these various references to State territory would seem to defy the assumption of a global armed conflict.

But do they also defy the idea of an extraterritorial non-international armed conflict in the territory of another State? Whereas the wording of article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II, namely the word ‘its’ indeed requires that the armed group controls part of the territory of the state which it is fighting¹⁴⁰⁵, the wording of common article 3, which refers to ‘the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties’ and thus not necessarily only to the territory of the State party to the conflict, is open enough to also accommodate the extraterritorial dimension. Increasingly, such an evolutive reading of common article 3 finds support in the literature

¹³⁹⁸ See Zimmermann (2007) 11 MPYbUNL 99, 109 et seq.

¹³⁹⁹ Cassese, International Law (2005) 67.

¹⁴⁰⁰ The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The Government of Israel (2006) 769/02 HCI, para. 18.

¹⁴⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 541. See also Krefß (2010) 15 JCSL 255.

¹⁴⁰² See above mn 251.

¹⁴⁰³ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70.

¹⁴⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 231.

¹⁴⁰⁵ Lubell, Use of Force (2010) 100.

and arguably also in State practice, at least in as much as an extraterritorial dimension of the concept of non-international armed conflicts is accepted in situations like Afghanistan, where external States in support of the Afghan government are party to a non-international armed conflict outside their own territory¹⁴⁰⁶. Thus, it is submitted that the conception of a non-international armed conflict is best suited and increasingly supported, inter alia by the US Supreme Court's Hamdan decision, to capture extraterritorial violence of a certain intensity between a State and an organized armed group.

866 This of course does not bar the existence of a parallel international armed conflict between the intervening State and the State on whose territory the fighting between the external State and the non-state actor takes place. Thus, an international armed conflict would clearly come into existence if there was fighting between the two State's armed forces or if the intervening State occupied part of the host State's territory¹⁴⁰⁷. The possibility of a mixed armed conflict, i. e. the concurrent existence of an international and a non-international armed conflict was not only endorsed by the ICRC with respect to the armed conflict in Lebanon in 2006¹⁴⁰⁸. Moreover, this possibility has also been endorsed in the Lubanga decision, where the Chamber held that an armed conflict may be 'international in character alongside an internal armed conflict'¹⁴⁰⁹. Similarly, in the Lubanga judgment the Trial Chamber held that 'international and non-international armed conflicts may coexist'¹⁴¹⁰.

III. Violations of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions Literature: Gasser, H.-P., 'Armed Conflicts Within the Territory of a State', in: W. Haller et al. (eds.), Im Dienst an der Gemeinschaft, Festschrift für D. Schindler (1989) 225; id., 'Protection of the Civilian Population', in: Fleck, D. (ed.), The Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflicts (2008) 237; Green, L. C., 'Criminal responsibility of individuals in non-international conflicts', (2002) GYbIL 82; Hall, C. K., 'The Jurisdiction of the Permanent International Criminal Court over Violations of Humanitarian Law', in: F. Lattanzi (ed.), The International Criminal Court – Comments on the Draft Statute (1998) 19 (in particular 36–38); Kreß, C., 'War crimes committed in non-international armed conflict and the emerging system of international criminal justice', (2000/2001) IsYbHumRts 103; La Haye, E., War Crime in Internal Armed Conflicts (2010); Meindersma, C., 'Violations of common article 3 of the Geneva conventions as violations of the laws or customs of war under article 3 of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia', (1995) NethILRev 375; Moir, L., 'Violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions', in: J. Doria et al. (eds.), The Legal Regime of the ICC: Essays in Honour of Prof. I. P. Blishchenko (2009) 619; Momtaz, D., 'War crimes in Non-International Armed Conflicts Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court', (1999) YbILC 177; Pejić, J., 'The Protective Scope of Common Article 3: More than meets the eye', (2011) 93 IRevRC 189–225; Schabas, W. A., 'Punishment of non-state actors in non-international armed conflict', (2003) FordhamILJ 907; Schindler, D., 'The Different Types of Armed Conflicts According to the Geneva Conventions and Protocols', (1979) II Recueil de Cours 121; Schmitt, M., 'Deconstructing direct participation in hostilities: The constitutive elements', (2010) 42 NYJIL&Pol 697; Sivakumaran, S., 'Courts of Armed Opposition Groups – Fair Trial or Summary Justice?', (2009) 7 JICJ 489–513; Spieker, H., 'The International Criminal Court and non-international armed conflicts', (2000) LeidenJIL 395; Zimmermann, A., 'The Creation of a Permanent International Criminal Court', (1998) MPYbUNL 169 (in particular 196–197); id., 'Implementing the Statute of the International Criminal Court – the German Example', in: L. Vohrah et al. (eds.), Man's Inhumanity to Man – Essays in Honour of Antonio Cassese (2003) 977.

1. General remarks

867 a) Introduction. The inclusion of violations of common article 3 into the Statute was opposed by a few States, namely China, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and also Turkey. This is surprising since this provision, according to the ICJ, contains a minimum yardstick in cases

¹⁴⁰⁶ See ibid., 111; Pejić 93 (2011) IRevRC 201; Kreß (2010) 15 JCSL 255; Kretzmer, (2005) 16 EJIL 189 et seq.; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014), 419, 420.

¹⁴⁰⁷ Kreß (2010) 15 JCSL 256.

¹⁴⁰⁸ Kellenberger (30 July 2006) NZZ 3.

¹⁴⁰⁹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 209.

¹⁴¹⁰ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 540, referring to Prosecutor v. Tadić, see note 14, para. 84.

of civil strife¹⁴¹¹. Furthermore, both the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY as well as the ICTR¹⁴¹² had already prior to the Rome conference explicitly confirmed that under current rules of customary international law, violations of common article 3 even in internal armed conflicts entail the individual criminal responsibility of the person committing such acts¹⁴¹³. The criminalization of serious violations of common article 3 was further confirmed by article 4 of the Statute of the ICTR. Since the Rome conference this development has been further confirmed by both, founding instruments of international criminal tribunals such as the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone or the regulation adopted by the United Nations administration of East Timor providing for the jurisdiction of special courts in East Timor as well as the one of the Iraqi Special Tribunal, as well as finally by domestic legislation such as, for example, the German Code of Crimes against International Law (Völkerstrafgesetzbuch)¹⁴¹⁴.

b) Existence of an armed conflict not of an international character. Common article 3 868 expressly states that ‘in cases of armed conflict not of an international character ... each Party shall be bound to apply, as the minimum’ its provisions. Thus the formula contained in the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute does not seem to contain a significant distinction when compared to the formula already used in common article 3 itself¹⁴¹⁵.

The ICRC has taken the position that the conflict under consideration, in order to qualify 869 for the purposes of common article 3 as an armed conflict, must have lead to combat and to the use of armed forces¹⁴¹⁶. Notwithstanding the threshold requirements contained in article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f) of the Statute, it is generally established that for a non-international armed conflict, whether it involves only armed groups or also governmental armed forces on one side of the conflict, two objective requirements must be met.

First, the hostilities must reach a certain level of intensity¹⁴¹⁷. The Appeals Chamber in the 870 Tadić case held that there is an armed conflict ‘whenever there is [...] protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organised armed groups or between such groups within a state’¹⁴¹⁸. With regard to the ICC Statute the Pre-Trial Chamber in Bemba held that the threshold contained in the first sentence of article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f), first sentence, of the Statute requires any armed conflict not of an international character to reach a certain level of intensity which exceeds that of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence or other acts of a similar nature¹⁴¹⁹. In fact, it was already in the Akayesu judgement that the ICTR had stated that ‘the term armed conflict in itself suggests the existence of hostilities between armed forces organized to a greater or lesser extent [and that] [t]his consequently rules out situations of internal ¹⁴¹¹ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep., 1986, 14, 114, para. 218.

¹⁴¹² Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 608.

¹⁴¹³ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, paras. 128 et seq. The relevant part of the judgement explicitly stipulated that ‘... customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of common article 3’.

¹⁴¹⁴ For further details see e.g. Zimmermann, in: Vohrah et. al. (eds.), Inhumanity (2003) 977.

¹⁴¹⁵ But see also Hall, in: Lattanzi (ed.), Comments (1998) 37–38.

¹⁴¹⁶ See CICR (ed.), Convention de Genève (1956) 40 et seq. (in particular 42).

¹⁴¹⁷ See only Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 225.

¹⁴¹⁸ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70. See also Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 233; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 229.

¹⁴¹⁹ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 225.

disturbances and tensions¹⁴²⁰. In assessing the required intensity of the conflict Trial Chambers of the ICTY have considered a variety of indicative criteria¹⁴²¹ such as the gravity of attacks and their recurrence¹⁴²², the number of victims¹⁴²³, the temporal and territorial expansion of violence and the collective character of hostilities¹⁴²⁴, the mobilization of volunteers and the distribution and type of weapons among both parties to the conflict¹⁴²⁵, whether various parties were able to operate from a territory under their control¹⁴²⁶, an increase in the number of government forces¹⁴²⁷, the fact that the conflict led to a large displacement of people¹⁴²⁸ as well as whether the conflict had attracted the attention of the UN Security Council and whether it was specifically addressed or even qualified as such by the Security Council¹⁴²⁹.

- 871 Second, the non-governmental armed group(s) involved in the conflict must possess a certain degree of organization¹⁴³⁰ said requirement being inherent in the very notion of ‘armed groups’ notwithstanding the fact that unlike Art. 8 para. 2 (f) neither Art. 8 para. 2 (c) nor common Art. 3 GC I-IV as such expressis verbis contain such requirement. In Lubanga the Pre-Trial Chamber held that ‘the involvement of armed groups with some degree of organisation and the ability to plan and carry out sustained military operations would allow for the conflict to be characterised as an armed conflict not of an international character’¹⁴³¹.

¹⁴²⁰ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 620; recalled in Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 230.

¹⁴²¹ For a summarily depiction of these various indicative factors, see Prosecutor v. Fatmir Limaj et al., IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, paras. 94–134, 170; Prosecutor v. Ramush Haradinaj et al., No. IT-04-84-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 3 April 2008, para. 49. The ICTY uses the same test as the ICTY, see Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, paras. 619–26; Prosecutor v. Clément Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, No. ICTR-95-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 21 May 1999, para. 170; Prosecutor v. Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, Judgment and Sentence, Trial Chamber I, 27 January 2000, para. 250; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, Judgment and sentence, Trial Chamber I, 6 December 1999, paras 92–93; Prosecutor v. André Ntagerura et al. (Case Name ‘Cyangugu’), No. ICTR-99-46-T, Judgment and sentence, Trial Chamber III, para. 767; Prosecutor v. Semanza, ICTR-97-20-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 15 May 2003, paras. 355 and 514; Prosecutor v. Ignace Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 7 June 2001, paras. 99–101; Prosecutor v. Jean de Dieu Kamuhanda, No. ICTR-95-54A-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 22 January 2004, paras. 721–24. For an analysis of the relevant jurisprudence see La Haye, War Crimes in Internal Armed Conflicts (2010) 9 et seq.

¹⁴²² Prosecutor v. Tadić, Opinion and Judgment, Trial Chamber, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 565; Čelebići Case, IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, paras. 186–89.

¹⁴²³ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 235.

¹⁴²⁴ Prosecutor v. Tadić, Opinion and Judgment, Trial Chamber, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, paras. 566, 568; Prosecutor v. Kunarac, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, para. 567, Čelebići Case, IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 186, Prosecutor v. Stakić, IT-97-24-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 31 July 2003, para. 572.

¹⁴²⁵ Čelebići Case, IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 188; Prosecutor v. Milošević, IT-02-54-T, Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, 16 June 2004, paras. 30–31; Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, paras. 136, 138, 156, 169, 161, 164–166.

¹⁴²⁶ Čelebići Case, IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 187; Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, paras. 146, 158, 159.

¹⁴²⁷ Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, paras. 146, 159 and 164–65.

¹⁴²⁸ Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, para. 167.

¹⁴²⁹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 235; Čelebići Case, IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 190; Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 567.

¹⁴³⁰ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 234. See also Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, paras. 94–134, 170.

¹⁴³¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 233.

In order to assess the second requirement, i.e. the organization of the parties to the conflict, the ICTY has taken into account such factors as the existence of headquarters, designated zones of operation and the ability to transport and distribute arms¹⁴³². In the Limaj case the Trial Chamber pointed out that some degree of organization by the parties will suffice to establish the existence of an armed conflict¹⁴³³. In assessing whether the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) possessed the characteristics of an organized armed group the Trial Chamber in Limaj took into account inter alia the following criteria: the structure of the KLA with a general staff and the existence of eleven zones with one commander for each zone¹⁴³⁴, the weapons distribution channels¹⁴³⁵, the use of uniforms¹⁴³⁶, the adoption of internal regulations¹⁴³⁷, the nomination of a spokesperson¹⁴³⁸, the issuance of orders¹⁴³⁹, political statements and communiqués¹⁴⁴⁰, the establishment of headquarters¹⁴⁴¹, the capacity to launch co-ordinated action between KLA units¹⁴⁴², the establishment of a military police and disciplinary rules¹⁴⁴³, the ability of the KLA to recruit new members¹⁴⁴⁴ and its capacity to provide military training¹⁴⁴⁵.

With respect to the jurisprudence of the ICC, the Pre-Trial Chamber in Bemba concurred 872 with Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Lubanga case (albeit in the context of article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute which, unlike Art. 8 para. 2 (c), expressly requires the armed groups involved in the conflict to be ‘organized’) by stressing the need for the armed groups in question to have the ability to plan and carry out military operations for a prolonged period of time¹⁴⁴⁶. In the Bemba decision the Chamber added that organized armed groups must be under responsible command and that in this regard, responsible command entails some degree of organization of those armed groups, including the possibility to impose discipline and the ability to plan and carry out military operations¹⁴⁴⁷. In the Callixte Mbarushimana decision, the Chamber, referred inter alia to the FDLR’s hierarchical structure and high level of internal organization, the existence of a political and a military wing, and the FDLR’s constitutive instruments which included a statute, a ‘règlement d’ordre intérieur’ and a disciplinary code which provided the organisation’s internal disciplinary system¹⁴⁴⁸. Against this background the Chamber was satisfied that there are substantial grounds to believe that the FDLR as an armed group possessed the degree of organisation required under article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute¹⁴⁴⁹.

¹⁴³² Prosecutor v. Milošević, IT-02-54-T, Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, 16 June 2004, paras. 23–24.

¹⁴³³ Prosecutor v. Limaj, No. IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, para. 89 (emphasis added).

¹⁴³⁴ Ibid., paras. 94–97.

¹⁴³⁵ Ibid., paras. 121–22.

¹⁴³⁶ Ibid., paras. 123–24.

¹⁴³⁷ Ibid., paras. 98 and 110–12.

¹⁴³⁸ Ibid., paras. 99 and 102.

¹⁴³⁹ Ibid., paras. 100, 105, 109.

¹⁴⁴⁰ Ibid., paras. 101–3.

¹⁴⁴¹ Ibid., para. 104.

¹⁴⁴² Ibid., para. 108.

¹⁴⁴³ Ibid., paras. 113–17.

¹⁴⁴⁴ Ibid., para. 118.

¹⁴⁴⁵ Ibid., paras. 119–20.

¹⁴⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 234; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 233; Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 91.

¹⁴⁴⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 232; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 234.

¹⁴⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10, Decision on the confirmation of Charges, Pre Trial Chamber I, 16 December 2011, para. 104.

¹⁴⁴⁹ Ibid., para. 106.

- 873 The sole notion of ‘armed conflict’ in and of itself already excludes the applicability of article 8 para. 2 (c) to internal disturbances, a result that is further confirmed by article 8 para. 2 (d) of the Statute¹⁴⁵⁰. Paragraph 1 of the introduction to the war crimes part of the elements of crimes adopted by the Assembly of States Parties under article 9 specifically confirms that the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (c) are subject to the limitations contained in article 8 para. 2 (d) of the Statute. In that regard it referred, in particular, to the criteria referred to during the drafting of common article 3 in 1949¹⁴⁵¹. Thus, the very term of ‘armed conflict’ in itself already presupposes the existence of hostilities between armed forces organized to a greater or lesser extent¹⁴⁵².
- 874 As a matter of principle, the prohibitions contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) also apply outside the actual theatre of military operations, i. e. in the whole territory under the control of a party, regardless of whether or not actual combat takes place¹⁴⁵³, provided, however, that there is a nexus between the conduct concerned and the armed conflict¹⁴⁵⁴, e. g. that the acts in question are not solely committed by the respective perpetrator for purely personal motives¹⁴⁵⁵.
- 875 Since article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute, unlike the second sentence of article 8 para. 2 (f), does not contain a reference to a protracted armed conflict, there is no minimum duration requirement of the conflict as such. Moreover, the limitations contained in article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II do not, subject to the exclusionary rule contained in article 8 para. 2 (d) of the Statute¹⁴⁵⁶, apply as such. In both the Bemba and the Lubanga decisions it was pointed out that the requirement contained in article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II, that the organized armed group(s) exert control over a part of the territory, is not a requirement under article 8 para. 2 (f) and thus even less under article 8 para. 2 (c)¹⁴⁵⁷.
- 876 In order to render article 8 para. 2 (c) applicable, the conflict must not possess an international character¹⁴⁵⁸.
- 877 c) Serious violations of article 3. Article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute presupposes that ‘serious’ violations of common article 3 have taken place. This limitation is in line with relevant precedents and in particular with both, article 4 of the Statute of the ICTR¹⁴⁵⁹ and the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY¹⁴⁶⁰. This limitation can be seen as a concretisation of article 5 of the Statute, which limits the jurisdiction of the Court to those crimes which are of concern to the international community as a whole¹⁴⁶¹.

¹⁴⁵⁰ As to the exclusion of mere internal disturbances and similar tensions contained in article 8 para. 2 (d) see below mn 910 et seq.

¹⁴⁵¹ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 619; for a more detailed analysis of these criteria see Pictet (ed.), Commentary iv, (1958) article 3, 36.

¹⁴⁵² Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 620.

¹⁴⁵³ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 69; confirmed by Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 185 and Prosecutor v. Kayishema, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, paras. 176, 182 et seq.

¹⁴⁵⁴ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, paras. 572 and 617.

¹⁴⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 636.

¹⁴⁵⁶ For details see Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (d), mn 910.

¹⁴⁵⁷ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 236; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyllo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 233.

¹⁴⁵⁸ For further details see Zimmermann and Geiß, Preliminary remarks on article 8 para. 2 (c) – (f), mn 823.

¹⁴⁵⁹ The chapeau of that provision reads: ‘The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions ...’ (emphasis added).

¹⁴⁶⁰ See Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 128, which stated that ‘customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of common article 3’ (emphasis added). But see also for a contrary proposition Hall, in: Lattanzi (ed.), Comments (1998) 38.

¹⁴⁶¹ For details see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 15.

In practice, it is however hard to imagine which violations of one of the provisions contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i)–(iv) would not at the same time ipso facto also qualify as serious violations of common article 3. This is confirmed by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in the Tadić case which held for purposes of article 3 of the Statute of the ICTY that acts constitute serious violations of the laws and customs of war if they ‘constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values’ (which is clearly the case with regard to common article 3) and that ‘the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim’¹⁴⁶². Thus, the only possible example of a non-serious violation of common article 3 might be the singular passing of a short term (!) imprisonment without adequate judicial guarantees. In all other cases, and in particular when acts threatening the physical integrity and safety of persons are committed, the threshold of ‘serious violations’ of common article 3 will always be fulfilled.

d) Persons protected by the provision. Article 8 para. 2 (c) does not contain a new list of persons who may qualify as victims of one of the acts listed in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i)–(iv). Instead, it simply reiterates the group of individuals already mentioned in common article 3 itself. The text presupposes, as is indicated by the word ‘including’, that the notion of ‘persons taking no active part in hostilities’ embraces the two other notions of ‘members of armed forces who have laid down their arms’ and ‘persons placed hors de combat’. Indeed, these three notions seem to overlap. Consequently, in the Bemba decision the Pre-Trial Chamber II simply noted that article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute covers crimes committed by persons taking no active part in hostilities¹⁴⁶³. It has to be noted, however, that the list following the word ‘including’ (‘y compris’ in the French text) is not exhaustive. The Preparatory Commission drafting the elements of crimes under article 9 of the Rome Statute has further defined the group of persons protected under article 8 para. 2 (c) by providing that the persons concerned are either hors de combat, or are civilians, medical personnel, or religious personnel (including non-confessional non-combatant military personnel carrying out a similar function)¹⁴⁶⁴.

The notion of ‘persons taking no active part in hostilities’ does not only refer to civilians in the strict sense, but also comprises those persons who, while beforehand having possessed the status of combatants or ‘fighters’, have ceased to take a direct part in hostilities¹⁴⁶⁵. Indeed, both the ICTY and the ICTR have considered the terms ‘taking active part in hostilities’ and ‘taking direct part’ (as e.g. used in articles 4 and 13 of Add. Prot. II) to have the same meaning¹⁴⁶⁶.

According to the ICRC’s Interpretive Guidance on the notion of direct participation in hostilities, in order to qualify as a direct participation in hostilities, a specific act must meet three cumulative criteria: First, the act must meet the required threshold of harm, i. e. it must be likely to adversely affect the military operations of a party to an armed conflict or alternatively, to inflict death, injury, or destruction. Second, there must be a direct causal link between the act and the harm and thirdly, there must be a belligerent nexus in that the act must be specifically designed to directly cause the required threshold of harm in support of a party to the conflict and to the detriment of the other¹⁴⁶⁷. What is more, the ICRC ¹⁴⁶² Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 94.

¹⁴⁶³ See Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 237.

¹⁴⁶⁴ See the element of crimes which is common to all provisions contained in article 8 para. 2 (c).

¹⁴⁶⁵ Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 640.

¹⁴⁶⁶ See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 629, respectively Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 615. See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, CC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 266.

¹⁴⁶⁷ ICRC, Interpretive guidance on the notion of direct participation in hostilities (2009), available at: <<http://www.icrc.org/eng/resources/documents/article/review/review-872-p991.htm>> last accessed September 2015, 46. For a critique see Schmitt (2010) 42 NYJIL&Pol 697, 739.

recommends that for the purposes of the principle of distinction in non-international armed conflict, persons who are members of State armed forces or organized armed groups of a party to the conflict do not qualify as civilians and that in non-international armed conflicts, organized armed groups constitute the armed forces of a non-State party to the conflict and consist only of individuals who have a ‘continuous combat function’, i. e. whose continuous function it is to take a direct part in hostilities¹⁴⁶⁸.

882 In the Appeal Judgment in the Strugar case the ICTY provided examples of ‘direct participation in hostilities’, namely bearing, using or taking up arms, taking part in military or hostile acts, activities, conduct or operations, armed fighting or combat, participating in attacks against enemy personnel, property or equipment, transmitting military information for the immediate use of a belligerent, and transporting weapons in proximity to combat operations¹⁴⁶⁹. In the RUF case the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone held that the use of force in self-defence, whether by peacekeepers or civilians, does not constitute a direct participation in hostilities¹⁴⁷⁰.

883 In order for individuals to qualify as ‘members of armed forces who have laid down their arms’, two requirements must be fulfilled:

First, the individuals concerned must have been members of armed forces. In case of governmental forces this would include all the armed forces constituted under the respective domestic law even if they are not formally part of the respective military¹⁴⁷¹. In case of non-governmental armed forces, it presupposes the existence of a certain structure and organs as well as a system for allocating authority and internal discipline¹⁴⁷².

Besides, those persons must have laid down their arms, i. e. must have indicated their intention to cease combat activities¹⁴⁷³.

884 The notion of ‘persons placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention or any other cause’, taken over from common article 3 into article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute, is nowadays defined in article 41 para. 2 of the Add. Prot. I of 1977 under which a person is hors de combat if he or she is in the power of an adverse party; he or she has clearly expressed an intention to surrender or has been rendered unconscious or is otherwise incapacitated by wounds or sickness, and therefore is incapable of defending himself or herself, provided, however, that in any case he or she abstains from any hostile act and does not attempt to escape. Besides, article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute in line with common article 3, confirms that detention, too, puts a person hors de combat and that furthermore also other similar situations can bring about such a status.

885 The ICTY has held in the Tadić case¹⁴⁷⁴ that the protection under common article 3 extends at least to all those persons, covered in the case of an international armed conflict, by the grave breaches regime, i. e. civilians, prisoners of war, wounded and sick members in the field and wounded and finally sick members of the armed forces at sea.

886 e) Possible offenders. It has to be noted that both, military personnel and civilians can be possible perpetrators of the crimes listed in article 8 para. 2 (c)¹⁴⁷⁵.

¹⁴⁶⁸ Ibid., 27. For a critique of the ‘continuous combat function-category’ see Alston, Report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, Study on targeted killings, A/HRC/14/24/Add.6, 28 May 2010, para. 65.

¹⁴⁶⁹ Prosecutor v. Strugar, IT-01-42-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 17 July 2008, para. 177.

¹⁴⁷⁰ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 October 2009, para. 530; citing Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al., ICTR-98-41-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 18 December 2008, paras. 2175, 2239; Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003), 455–456.

¹⁴⁷¹ Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), mn 4462.

¹⁴⁷² Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), mn, mn 4463.

¹⁴⁷³ Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), mn, mn 1618.

¹⁴⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 615.

¹⁴⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 1 June 2001, paras. 443–445.

2. The different subparagraphs

The fact that the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute uses the term ‘namely’ 887 indicates that the list of crimes in (i)–(iv) is exhaustive. Otherwise the use of the words ‘in particular’ would have been appropriate. This is further confirmed by the equally authentic French version, which refers to ‘les actes ci-après’. Accordingly the violation of other obligations also contained in common article 3, and in particular the violation of the obligation referred to in its paragraph 2 to collect and care for the wounded and sick, does not constitute a criminal offence under article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute¹⁴⁷⁶.

a) Paragraph 2(c)(i): Violence to life and person. Article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) prohibits 888 violence to life and persons, and in particular, criminalizes murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and finally torture.

The term ‘violence’ frequently occurs throughout the Statute¹⁴⁷⁷. The elements of crimes related to article 8 para. 2 (c) do not further define the notion of violence. In the context of article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), it only refers to acts of physical violence directed against the life or physical integrity of a person. This may be derived, argumentum e contrario, from the fact that article 4 para. 2 (a) of Add. Prot. II expressly went beyond the scope of the prohibition contained in common article 3 to also cover violence to the mental well-being of a person¹⁴⁷⁸. Any such acts directed against the mental well-being of persons such as e.g. giving the impression that a person would be executed, might, however, come either under the term of cruel treatment¹⁴⁷⁹ or under that of ‘torture’¹⁴⁸⁰.

aa) Murder. The term ‘murder’ is also used in article 7 para. 1 (a) of the Statute as constituting a 889 crime against humanity. Article 7 does not, however, contain a definition of that term. The ICTY as well as the Special Court for Sierra Leone have held that the elements of the offence of murder as a crime against humanity and as a war crime are identical¹⁴⁸¹. However, in the context of crimes against humanity, such acts must have been committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population¹⁴⁸². In the context of article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), to the contrary, also the killing of adversary combatants constitutes a crime, provided they have laid down their arms or have been placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention or any other cause¹⁴⁸³. The elements of crimes rightly take the position that apart from persons being hors de combat, also civilians, medical personnel, as well as religious personnel (including non-confessional non-combatant military personnel carrying out a similar function) taking no active part in the hostilities, are possible victims. Thus, it is necessary to establish that at the time of the commission of the crime the victims were taking no active part in the hostilities¹⁴⁸⁴.

With respect to personnel involved in peacekeeping missions, in the Abu Garda Decision, 890 the Chamber noted that protection does not cease if such persons only use armed force in exercise of their right to self-defence and that any determination as to whether a person is ¹⁴⁷⁶ See also Hall, in: Lattanzi (ed.), Comments (1998) 38 who before the Rome conference argued for the inclusion of that provision into the current article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute. Any such inclusion would have, however, raised the general issue of the punishability of omissions, see Ambos, article 25, mn 53 et seq.

¹⁴⁷⁷ See inter alia article 7 para. 1 (g), article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f) and finally article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi).

¹⁴⁷⁸ Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), mn 4532.

¹⁴⁷⁹ See below mn 894.

¹⁴⁸⁰ See below mn 895.

¹⁴⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Blagojević, IT-02-60-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 17 January 2005, para. 556; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 323; Prosecutor v. Naletilic and Martinovic, IT-98-34-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 31 March 2003, para. 248; Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 412.

¹⁴⁸² For details see Hall and Ambos, article 7, mn 18 et seq.

¹⁴⁸³ See already above mn 884 et seq.

¹⁴⁸⁴ See above mn 884 et seq. See also Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jamus, No. ICC-02/05-03/09, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 March 2011, para. 102.

directly participating in hostilities must be carried out on a case-by-case basis¹⁴⁸⁵. With regard to the attacks on AMIS personnel, the Chamber in the Jerbo decision found that there was no evidence suggesting that prior to the attack or at the time of the attack AMIS personnel took any direct part in hostilities or used force beyond self-defence¹⁴⁸⁶.

Even single individual murders amount to a violation of that provision, provided the required nexus to the armed conflict is established.

891 As has rightly been pointed out by the ILC¹⁴⁸⁷, murder is a crime that is clearly understood and well defined in the domestic law of every State. The ICTR, ICTY and the Special Court for Sierra Leone have consistently defined murder as the death of the victim which results from an act or omission by the accused, committed with the intent either to kill or to cause serious bodily harm with the reasonable knowledge that it would likely lead to death¹⁴⁸⁸. In the specific context of article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), it refers to the intentional killing of one or more persons protected under that provision without lawful justification. This is confirmed by the elements of crimes with respect to the war crime of murder committed in non-international armed conflict, which uses the formula ‘killed one or more persons’.

892 The crime of murder requires a causal link between the conduct and the result and may be committed by action or omission¹⁴⁸⁹. It must be established beyond reasonable doubt that the perpetrator’s conduct substantially contributed to the death of the victim¹⁴⁹⁰. This does not necessarily require proof that the dead body of that person has been recovered¹⁴⁹¹. The death of the victim may be demonstrated through circumstantial evidence, provided it is the only inference that may reasonably be drawn from the acts or omissions of the perpetrator¹⁴⁹². Such circumstantial evidence may include factors such as proof of incidents of mistreatment against the alleged victim, pattern of mistreatment and disappearances of individuals in the location in question, general climate of lawlessness, length of time which has elapsed since ¹⁴⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, confirmed in Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jamus, ICC-02/05-03/09, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 March 2011, para. 102.

¹⁴⁸⁶ Ibid., para. 703.

¹⁴⁸⁷ (1996) ILC Yearbook 96.

¹⁴⁸⁸ See e.g. Prosecutor v. Blagojević, IT-02-60-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 17 January 2005, para. 556; Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, para. 259; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 423; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 324; Prosecutor v. Jelisić, IT-95-10-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 14 December 1999, para. 35; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber, Judgment, 3 March 2000, para. 181; Prosecutor v. Stakić, IT-97-24-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 31 July 2003, para. 584; Prosecutor v. Krstić, IT-98-33-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 August 2001, para. 485. For ICTR jurisprudence, see Prosecutor v. Kayishema, ICTR-95-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 21 May 1999, para. 140; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 7 June 2001, paras. 84–85. Regarding the Special Court for Sierra Leone see Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 412.

¹⁴⁸⁹ Prosecutor v. Perišić, IT-04-81-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 6 September 2011, para. 103; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 274. See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 287.

¹⁴⁹⁰ Prosecutor v. Orić, No. IT-3-68-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 June 2006, para. 347; Prosecutor v. Brima et al., IT-95-11-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 12 June 2007, para. 689; Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 413.

¹⁴⁹¹ Prosecutor v. Perišić, IT-04-81-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 6 September 2011, para. 103; Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, para. 260; Prosecutor v. Martić, IT-95-11-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 12 June 2007, para. 59; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 326; Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 240.

¹⁴⁹² Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, para. 260; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 20 February 2001, para. 458; Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997, para. 240; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 327; Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, IT-98-32-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 25 February 2004, para. 120; Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 20 June 2007, para. 689; Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 413.

the person disappeared and the fact that the alleged victim has not been in contact with others whom he would have been expected to contact¹⁴⁹³.

bb) Mutilations. The prohibition of ‘mutilations’ applies in both international armed conflicts¹⁴⁹⁴, as well as in internal conflicts¹⁴⁹⁵. Reference can therefore be made to the definition developed within the commentary on article 8 para. 2 (b) (x)¹⁴⁹⁶. It has to be noted, however, that notwithstanding the fact that the article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) uses the term ‘physical mutilations’, both provisions have to be nevertheless understood as having synonymous meanings since the ‘mutilation’ in itself refers to an act of physical violence. This is confirmed by the fact that the respective elements of crimes adopted with regard to both provisions are, mutatis mutandis, identical in that regard. Conversely, in the context of a non-international armed conflict, the Special Court for Sierra Leone has dismissed the requirement of causing death or seriously endangering the health of a person as superfluous with respect to Article 3 of its Statute, arguing that albeit contained in article 11 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I, it does not form part of the violation under common article 3 and article 4 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II¹⁴⁹⁷.

Indeed, article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), unlike article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi), does not contain such a result requirement. Accordingly, the war crime contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) does not require that the conduct caused death or seriously endangered the physical or mental health of the victim¹⁴⁹⁸.

cc) Cruel treatment. Unlike the other terms used in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i), the notion of ‘cruel treatment’ is not contained in other provisions of Part 2 of the Statute¹⁴⁹⁹. It is however contained in most of the universal or regional human rights instruments such as, inter alia, article 7 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 5 para. 2 of the American Convention on Human Rights and article 5 second sentence of the African Charter on Human and People’s Rights¹⁵⁰⁰. With regard to humanitarian law, references to cruel treatment are contained in article 87 of the Third Geneva Convention and article 4 para. 2 (a) of Add. Prot. II. According to the jurisprudence of the ICTY¹⁵⁰¹, the offence of cruel treatment under common article 3 (and accordingly under article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) of the Statute) carries the same meaning as inhuman treatment in the context of the grave breaches provisions¹⁵⁰². In the same vein, the Preparatory Commission drafting the elements of crimes considered that the content of the term ‘inhuman treatment’ as contained in article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii) and that of the term of ‘cruel treatment’ as used in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) are identical. Accordingly the elements for both crimes are also identical in that regard. Thus, for the purposes of common article 3, all acts of torture by the same token also constitute cruel treatment¹⁵⁰³. However, this latter offence further extends to all intentional acts or omissions which cause serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitute a serious attack on human dignity¹⁵⁰⁴. Thus, treatment that does not meet the purposive requirement for the offence of torture constitutes cruel ¹⁴⁹³ Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 327.

¹⁴⁹⁴ Article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

¹⁴⁹⁵ Article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi).

¹⁴⁹⁶ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (x), mn 437.

¹⁴⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 20 June 2007, para. 725. See also Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber I, 2 March 2009, para. 182.

¹⁴⁹⁸ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 396.

¹⁴⁹⁹ But see article 55 of the Statute, which provides that a person who is subject to an investigation under the Statute, shall not be subjected to any form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; for details see Hall and Jacobs, article 55, mn 6.

¹⁵⁰⁰ The European Convention does not refer to ‘cruel treatment’; instead its article 3 uses the terms torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

¹⁵⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 443.

¹⁵⁰² See above Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii), mn 95.

¹⁵⁰³ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 443.

¹⁵⁰⁴ Ibid.

treatment¹⁵⁰⁵. Indeed, whether a particular act amounts to cruel treatment is to be determined on a case-by-case basis¹⁵⁰⁶. In the Limaj case, the Trial Chamber held that under the specific circumstances of this case ‘unlawful seizure’, ‘unlawful detention for prolonged periods’ and ‘interrogation’ in and of themselves did not amount to a serious attack on human dignity within the meaning of cruel treatment under Article 3 of the Statute of the ICTY, thereby leaving open the possibility of a different legal qualification of such acts under different circumstances¹⁵⁰⁷. In the Taylor judgment the Trial Chamber of the SCSL noted that cruel treatment may encompass also acts of mutilation¹⁵⁰⁸.

895 dd) Torture. Finally, the notion of ‘torture’ appears also in both the list of crimes against humanity¹⁵⁰⁹ and the list of the grave breaches of the four Geneva Conventions¹⁵¹⁰. Notwithstanding the fact that article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute – unlike article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)– does not expressis verbis refer to the notion of torture as defined for the purposes of crimes against humanity, that term still has to be applied in line with the definition contained in article 7 para. 2 (e)¹⁵¹¹.

896 The ICTY has defined the crime of torture as the intentional infliction, by act or omission, of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental¹⁵¹², for a prohibited purpose, such as obtaining information or a confession, punishing, intimidating, humiliating, or coercing the victim or a third person, or discriminating, on any ground against the victim or a third person¹⁵¹³. In the context of internal armed conflicts, it thus in particular also includes acts by non-state actors involved in the armed conflict since outside the Torture Convention the public official requirement of torture does not constitute a requirement under customary international law in relation to the criminal responsibility of an individual¹⁵¹⁴. This view was shared by the Preparatory Commission drafting the elements of crimes which therefore are identical in that regard for both crimes. Indeed it was the ICTY which had already stated that ‘[t]he characteristics of the offence of torture under common article 3 [which is mirrored in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) of the Rome Statute] and under the ‘grave breaches’ provisions of the Geneva Conventions [i. e. article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii) of the Rome Statute], do not differ¹⁵¹⁵.

897 With respect to the question whether ‘severe pain or suffering’ has been caused, the Appeals Chamber in Brđanin had to consider whether a new, higher standard regarding the requisite amount of harm had developed under customary international law, as had been claimed by the accused who based his argument on the so-called 2002 Bybee Memorandum¹⁵¹⁶. The argument was rightly rejected by the Appeals Chamber, for lack of any support of the argument that a new intensity threshold had developed under customary international law. Inter alia the Chamber held that already the Torture Convention’s drafting history makes it clear that ‘severe pain or suffering’ is not synonymous with ‘extreme pain or suffering’¹⁵¹⁷. Thus, it follows that acts inflicting physical pain may amount to torture even ¹⁵⁰⁵ Ibid.

¹⁵⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. Limaj, IT-03-66-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, para. 232.

¹⁵⁰⁷ Ibid.

¹⁵⁰⁸ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 435.

¹⁵⁰⁹ Hall and Stahn, article 7 para. 1 (f).

¹⁵¹⁰ Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (ii).

¹⁵¹¹ For details see Hall and Stahn, article 7 para. 2 (e) and Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, paras. 446 et seq.

¹⁵¹² Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 3 April 2007, para. 242; Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 September 2004, para. 481; Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 162; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 468.

¹⁵¹³ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, para. 289; Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., No. IT-98-30/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 November 2001, para. 141.

¹⁵¹⁴ Prosecutor v. Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, para. 284; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 148.

¹⁵¹⁵ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 443.

¹⁵¹⁶ Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 September 2004, para. 246.

¹⁵¹⁷ Ibid., para. 249.

when they do not cause pain of the type accompanying serious injury¹⁵¹⁸. Whether ‘severe pain or suffering’ has been inflicted is a fact-specific inquiry and the findings of the Appeals Chamber in the Naletilić and Martinović Appeal Judgment remain valid: ‘Existing case-law has not determined the absolute degree of pain required for an act to amount to torture. Thus, while the suffering inflicted by some acts may be so obvious that the acts amount per se to torture, in general allegations of torture must be considered on a case-by-case basis so as to determine whether, in light of the acts committed and their context, severe physical or mental pain or suffering was inflicted’¹⁵¹⁹.

It has to be mentioned in particular that rape or other forms of sexual violence, too, notwithstanding that it they are not explicitly mentioned in article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) of the Statute, can also constitute torture¹⁵²⁰.

In the Bemba decision the Chamber pointed out that the perpetrator’s intent to inflict pain or suffering for such a purpose as obtaining information or a confession, punishment, intimidation or coercion or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, constitutes a specific intent, which has to be proven by the Prosecutor¹⁵²¹.

b) Paragraph 2(c)(ii): Outrages upon personal dignity. Article 8 para. 2 (c) (ii) prohibits outrages upon personal dignity and in particular criminalizes humiliating and degrading treatment. Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions as well as article 4 para. 2 (e) of Add. Prot. II prohibit outrages upon personal dignity. The wording of this provision, as well as the respective wording of the elements of crimes as adopted under article 9 of the Statute, is identical to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi) of the Statute, reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵²².

In the Bemba decision Pre-Trial Chamber II found that in this particular case the count of outrage upon personal dignity under article 8 para. 2 (c) (ii) was fully subsumed by the count of rape, which was deemed the most appropriate legal characterization of the conduct presented¹⁵²³. In the Taylor judgment the Trial Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone held that ‘[...] sexual slavery, including the abduction of women and girls as ‘bush wives’, a conjugal form of sexual slavery, is humiliating and degrading to its victims and constitutes a serious attack on human dignity, falling within the scope of outrages upon personal dignity’¹⁵²⁴.

c) Paragraph 2(c)(iii): Taking of hostages. Article 8 para. 2 (c) (iii) prohibits the taking of hostages, which in the case of an international armed conflict, constitutes a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions. The very same prohibition is accordingly also contained in article 8 para. 2 (a) (viii) of the Statute, reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵²⁵ even more so since the respective wording of the elements of crimes as adopted under article 9 of the Statute is also identical.

There has been some disagreement about whether unlawful detention is a requirement of the offence or whether an initially lawful detention could also suffice. The wording of the respective elements of crimes which refer to persons ‘otherwise held hostage’ as well as the finding of the Special Court for Sierra Leone in the RUF case according to which ‘the precise ¹⁵¹⁸ Ibid., para. 251.

¹⁵¹⁹ Prosecutor v. Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 3 May 2006, para. 299; cited and confirmed in Prosecutor v. Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 1 September 2004, para. 251.

¹⁵²⁰ See as to the jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 597 and as far as the ICTY is concerned Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 496.

¹⁵²¹ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 294.

¹⁵²² See Arnold and Wehrenberg, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxi).

¹⁵²³ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 312.

¹⁵²⁴ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 432.

¹⁵²⁵ See Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (viii).

means by which the individual falls into the hands of the perpetrator is not the defining characteristic of the offence; it is rather, a secondary feature' and 'it could not be otherwise, for it would mean that the crime of hostage-taking could never arise out of an initially lawful detention'¹⁵²⁶ militate in favour of a broad understanding which also comprises an initially lawful detention¹⁵²⁷. Accordingly, it is not required that the requisite intent be present at the moment of the initial detention, it may crystallize also at a later stage¹⁵²⁸.

- 904 d) Paragraph 2(c)(iv): Passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement. Article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) prohibits the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court¹⁵²⁹, affording all judicial guarantees which are generally recognized as indispensable. It is similar in nature, although not completely identical, to the prohibition contained in article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi) of the Statute¹⁵³⁰. Accordingly the elements of crimes adopted with respect to the two provisions also slightly differ: on the one hand the elements concerning article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi) refer to the deprivation of a fair and regular trial by 'denying judicial guarantees as defined, in particular, in the third and the fourth Geneva Conventions of 1949'¹⁵³¹; on the other hand, the elements adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) require that the court involved 'did not afford the essential guarantees of independence or impartiality, or [...] did not afford all other judicial guarantees generally recognized as indispensable under international law'. Article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) guarantees certain minimum due process rights before either a sentence is passed or an execution against a person protected by article 8 para. 2 (c) takes place.
- 905 The provision does, however, generally leave intact the right of the established authorities to prosecute, try and eventually also punish, both members of armed forces and civilians, who may have committed an offence related to the ongoing internal armed conflict¹⁵³².
- 906 The sentences pronounced may include capital punishment where provided for in the respective domestic law and where not prohibited by treaty law. Unlike article 6 of Add. Prot. II, common article 3 [and accordingly neither article 8 para. 2 (c)] does not, as such, prohibit the pronouncement of the death penalty upon persons under the age of 18. Still, under certain specific circumstances, the death penalty might still amount to cruel treatment under article 8 para. 2 (c) (i)¹⁵³³ and might thus constitute a crime under the Statute¹⁵³⁴.
- 907 The term 'regularly constituted court' appears in both common article 3 as well as in article 75 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I¹⁵³⁵. Given the fact that the Statute, unlike the chapeau of article 6 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II, has verbatim retained the language of common article 3, also non-governmental armed groups are, notwithstanding the problems involved¹⁵³⁶, bound to set up 'regularly constituted Courts' before a sentencing might take place, thereby prohibiting special courts set up on an ad hoc-basis¹⁵³⁷.

¹⁵²⁶ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 October 2009, para. 598.

¹⁵²⁷ See Sivakumaran (2010) 8 JICJ 1009, 1032.

¹⁵²⁸ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 October 2009, para. 597; See also Sivakumaran (2010) 8 JICJ 1009, 1033.

¹⁵²⁹ Since a court of law is normally constituted of several persons, a footnote added to element 1 with regard to article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) clarifies that the term '[t]he perpetrator' as used in the elements of crimes does not address the different forms of individual criminal responsibility as regulated by articles 25 and 28 of the Statute'.

¹⁵³⁰ See Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi), passim.

¹⁵³¹ For further details see Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (a) (vi).

¹⁵³² Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), mn 4597.

¹⁵³³ See in particular the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the Soering case, Soering v. United Kingdom, Ser. A, No. 161.

¹⁵³⁴ Triffterer, Preliminary Remarks, in: Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute (2nd edition 2008) mn 76, fn. 120, holds with reference to article 80 the opinion that the death penalty as such cannot constitute such a crime.

¹⁵³⁵ See also article 66 GC IV which refers to 'properly constituted Courts'.

¹⁵³⁶ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987), mn 4600; Sivakumaran (2009) 7 JICJ 489.

¹⁵³⁷ Gasser, in: Fleck (ed.), Handbook (2008) mn 576.

The Courts called upon to pronounce sentences must afford all judicial guarantees which are generally recognised as indispensable. This formula by using the term ‘indispensable’ seems to be less broad than the one contained in article 75 para. 4 of Add. Prot. I, which more generally refers to ‘generally recognised principles of regular judicial procedure’. The wording of the chapeau of article 6 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II is mutatis mutandis identical to common article 3¹⁵³⁸ (and thus also to article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) of the Statute). Therefore, one can argue that the minimum list of essential guarantees contained in article 6 para. 2 (a)–(f) of Add. Prot. II¹⁵³⁹ also applies to article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv) of the Statute. This is true notwithstanding the fact that a Swiss/Hungarian/Costa Rican proposal¹⁵⁴⁰ to include a specific list of indispensable guarantees in the elements of crimes was not accepted since the rejection of this list was not based on the non-acceptance of the guarantees listed, but was rather based on the idea that such an illustrative list could suggest that rights omitted were not indispensable, that there could be a discrepancy between the proposed list and those guarantees contained in the Statute itself, and finally that violation of just one guarantee might not necessarily constitute a war crime¹⁵⁴¹. With regard to the latter concern, a footnote accompanying the elements of crimes provides that ‘the Court should consider whether, in the light of all relevant circumstances, the cumulative effect of factors with respect to guarantees deprived the person or persons of a fair trial’¹⁵⁴². This does not preclude, however, that depending on the circumstances the denial of one single guarantee might not in itself amount to a violation of this provision¹⁵⁴³.

IV. Article 8 para. 2(d): scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (c)

Literature: See Preliminary remarks on para. 2 (c)–(f) and para. 3.

1. Existence of a non-international armed conflict

The first part of article 8 para. 2 (d) simply repeats the requirement already contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) that a non-international armed conflict must exist before that last provision becomes applicable¹⁵⁴⁴. Article 8 para. 2 (d) therefore limits the jurisdiction of the Court, a fact that is further confirmed by the introduction to the war crimes section of the elements of crimes adopted under article 9 of the Statute¹⁵⁴⁵. Said introduction specifically provides that ‘[t]he elements for war crimes under article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) are subject to the limitations addressed in article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f), which are not elements of crimes’. Accordingly the Preparatory Commission drafting the elements of crimes did not discuss the meaning and content of article 8 para. 2 (d).

2. Exclusion of situations of internal disturbances and tensions

The first and the second part of the provision are linked by the word ‘thus’ (‘donc’ in the French version). The Statute thereby, similar to the last words of article 1 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II, reaffirms that any internal conflict, in order to qualify under the Statute as an ‘armed ¹⁵³⁸ Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 650: ‘... preamble of para. 2 [of article 6 Add. Prot. II] is taken over from common article 3 para. 1 (d) with minor drafting changes’ (emphasis added).

¹⁵³⁹ For detailed comments on that list Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 651–652 as well as ICRC Commentary, mn 4602–4610.

¹⁵⁴⁰ PCNICC/1999/WGEC/Dp. 10, 19 July 1999.

¹⁵⁴¹ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 409.

¹⁵⁴² See note 59 accompanying element 4 adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (c) (iv).

¹⁵⁴³ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 409.

¹⁵⁴⁴ For details see already above Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (c), mn 833 et seq.

¹⁵⁴⁵ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 225.

conflict not of an international character’, must be above the lower threshold contained in the second half of that phrase.

- 911 The threshold was literally taken over from article 1 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II with the sole exception that the last ‘and’ was replaced by an ‘or’. This seems, however, to simply constitute a technical error which was not supposed to have any substantive impact on the interpretation of the provision. Accordingly one can, in order to interpret that provision, largely draw from the travaux préparatoires and the interpretation of that provision¹⁵⁴⁶.
- 912 It is submitted that the pure notion of ‘armed conflict’, as defined above¹⁵⁴⁷, would have in itself been sufficient to remove the situations referred to in the second part of article 8 para. 2 (d) from falling within the scope of application of article 8. This was confirmed in the Akayesu judgement where the ICTR stated that the ‘term armed conflict in itself suggests the existence of hostilities between armed forces organized to a greater or lesser extent [and that] [t]his consequently rules out situations of internal disturbances and tensions’¹⁵⁴⁸. Thus, this last part of the provision is mainly of a declaratory and illustrative nature.
- 903 The notion of ‘internal disturbances and tensions’ is not defined in article 8 para. 2 (d). Instead the provision simply contains a non-exhaustive list of examples which might however serve as guidance in order to determine the existence of internal disturbances and tensions. Generally speaking, one might say that internal disturbances exist when a State uses armed force to maintain order without that use of force amounting to an armed conflict. Internal tensions might be said to exist when such force is used as a preventive measure¹⁵⁴⁹.
- 914 The ICTY has held that situations of ‘civil unrest’ and ‘terrorist activities’ do not amount to an armed conflict¹⁵⁵⁰. Within the context of the Statute of the ICC, the latter exclusion is further confirmed by the fact that the Rome Conference had deliberately decided to exclude terrorist acts from the jurisdiction of the ICC¹⁵⁵¹ notwithstanding the fact that terrorist acts might, depending on the circumstances and in particular their scale, constitute crimes against humanity.

V. Other serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflicts not of an international character

Literature: See Preliminary remarks on para. 2 (c)–(f) and para. 3.

- 915 It must be considered one of the main positive results of the Rome Statute that the provisions on war crimes committed in internal armed conflict were not limited to violations of common article 3, but that they also extent to other serious violations of the laws and customs of war¹⁵⁵², especially since Add. Prot. II had at the time of its drafting not yet retained the concept of grave breaches.
- 916 The wording of the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (e) is, apart from the replacement of the words ‘in international armed conflicts’ by the words ‘in armed conflicts not of an international character’, identical to the wording of the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (b), reference to which is therefore made¹⁵⁵³.

¹⁵⁴⁶ See in that regard in particular Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary, mn 833 et seq.

¹⁵⁴⁷ Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (c), mn 260.

¹⁵⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 620; see also Situation in the Central African Republic in the Case of: Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 230.

¹⁵⁴⁹ Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary (1987), mn 4477.

¹⁵⁵⁰ Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 185. See also for further references Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8, para. 2 (c), mn 833 et seq.

¹⁵⁵¹ For details see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 4.

¹⁵⁵² For details of the extent of that inclusion see Zimmermann and Geiß, Preliminary Remarks on para. 2 (c)–(f) and para. 3: War crimes committed in an armed conflict not of an international character, mn 833 et seq.

¹⁵⁵³ See Dörmann, chapeau to article 8 para. 2 (b), para. 180.

1. Paragraph 2(e)(i): Attacks against the civilian population

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (i).

The prohibition to direct attacks against the civilian population as such as well as against individual civilians is already contained in article 13 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II of 1977. Besides, both article 8 para. 2 (e) (i) of the Statute as well as the respective elements of crimes adopted in that regard are identical in wording to the parallel provision contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (i) and the elements adopted thereto, reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵⁵⁴. 917

It should be noted, however, that the closely linked prohibition not to direct attacks against civilian objects which, as far as international armed conflicts are concerned, is contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) of the Statute, is not reflected in the part on serious violations of the laws and customs of war committed in internal armed conflict. This is mainly due to the fact that a provision similar in nature to article 52 para. 1 of Add. Prot. I is lacking in Add. Prot. II and that accordingly the customary law nature of such a prohibition in internal armed conflict seemed to be doubtful. 918

Article 8 para. 2 (e) (i) of the Statute does not require that the civilian population is the sole and exclusive target of the attack¹⁵⁵⁵. In this regard ICC Chambers distinguish two scenarios, namely (i) when individual civilians not taking direct part in the hostilities or the civilian population are the sole target of the attack or (ii) when the perpetrator launches the attack with two distinct specific aims: (a) a military objective, within the meaning of articles 51 and 52 of the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (‘the AP I’); and simultaneously, (b) the civilian population or individual civilians not taking direct part in the hostilities¹⁵⁵⁶. However, the Chamber in the Mbarushimana decision pointed out that this latter scenario must be distinguished from disproportionate attacks in violation of the principle of proportionality in which case the targeting of the civilian population is not the aim of the attack but an incidental consequence thereof¹⁵⁵⁷. 919

With respect to the notion of direct participation in hostilities the Chamber in the Mbarushimana decision, like the Chamber in the Abu Garda decision, noted that neither a customary nor treaty law definition of this notion exists, but that the ICRC’s study on the direct participation in hostilities provided useful guidance¹⁵⁵⁸. Nevertheless, the Chamber adopted a rather restrictive interpretation of what amounts to a direct participation in hostilities and noted that loss of protection ‘is only clear when a civilian uses weapons or other means to commit violence against human or material enemy forces, unless in self-defence¹⁵⁵⁹. Moreover, the Chamber pointed out that ‘practice indicates that supplying food and shelter and sympathizing with one belligerent party is an insufficient reason to deny civilians protection against attack¹⁵⁶⁰. Although the Chamber in the Mbarushimana case referred to the ICRC’s study as ‘useful guidance’, it is not clear whether it intended to approve of the ICRC’s approach according to which all members of an organized armed group who have a ‘continuous combat function¹⁵⁶¹ no longer qualify as civilians. 920

The Chambers statement that ‘a civilian population comprises all civilians as opposed to members of armed forces and any other legitimate combatants’ is ambiguous because the 921

¹⁵⁵⁴ See Dörmann, article 8 para. 2 (b) (i) and Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 265 et seq.

¹⁵⁵⁵ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 16 December 2011, para. 142.

¹⁵⁵⁶ Ibid.; Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, paras. 272, 273.

¹⁵⁵⁷ Ibid.

¹⁵⁵⁸ Ibid., para. 148.

¹⁵⁵⁹ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶⁰ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶¹ ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law (2009) 27.

reference to ‘members of armed forces’ is not necessarily to be equated only with members of (regular) state armed forces and could also be said to comprise the armed forces of a non-state party to the conflict. However, the reference to ‘any other legitimate combatants’ rather militates in favour of a narrow understanding of the wording ‘members of armed forces’, i. e. one which only comprises legitimate combatants of the State’s regular armed forces. However, such an approach would lead to the result that in a non-international armed conflict the non-state party’s armed forces would continue to qualify as civilian and would therefore remain part of the civilian population. This, however, is contrary to the basic tenet of the principle of distinction and it is for this reason that the better view is to qualify those members of organized armed groups who have a continuous combat function, for the purposes of the conduct of hostilities, as ‘fighters’ without civilian status¹⁵⁶².

2. Paragraph 2(e)(ii): Attacks against installations and personnel using the distinctive emblems

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv).

922 Article 11 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II prohibits to direct attacks against medical units and transports. Besides, article 12, second phrase of Add. Prot. II contains the obligation to respect the distinctive emblem of the Geneva Conventions. This basic obligation now forms the object of article 8 para. 2 (e) (ii) of the Statute, also providing for individual criminal responsibility in times of internal armed conflict.

923 Article 8 para. 2 (e) (ii) of the Statute is identical in wording to the parallel provision contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵⁶³. The same is true with regard to the respective elements of crimes which are also identical.

3. Paragraph 2(e)(iii): Attacks against United Nations and associated personnel

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii) and Emanuelli, C.C., ‘The Protection afforded to Humanitarian Assistance Personnel under the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel’, (1996) HuV-I 4; Kirsch, P., ‘The Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel’, (1995) International Peacekeeping 102; Lepper, S. J., ‘War crimes and the protection of peacekeeping forces’, (1995) AkronLRev 411; Weiner, R. O. and Ni, A.F., ‘Beyond the laws of war: peacekeeping in search of a legal framework’, (1996) ColHumRtsLRev 293; Bangura, M. A., ‘Prosecuting the crime of attack on peacekeepers: A Prosecutor’s challenge’, (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 165–181.

924 The inclusion of both, article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii) and (e) (iii) of the Statute, is closely linked to the non-inclusion of violations of the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel into the Statute¹⁵⁶⁴. It is largely based on, although not identical to, a proposal submitted to the Rome Conference by Spain¹⁵⁶⁵.

925 Both provisions, i. e. article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii) and (e) (iii), are identical in wording. Reference is therefore made to the commentary on article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii)¹⁵⁶⁶. It has to be noted, however, that the original text, as adopted at the Rome Conference, had still referred in article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii) to the protection granted to peace-keeping operations and related missions ‘under the law of armed conflict’, as compared to the current version which refers to the protection given ‘under the international law of armed conflict’¹⁵⁶⁷.

926 In the Garda decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber I, with respect to the question whether a given mission constitutes a peacekeeping mission, absent any specific legal basis in the UN Charter, noted three characteristic principles for a mission to qualify as a peacekeeping ¹⁵⁶² Ibid.

¹⁵⁶³ See Arnold and Wehrenberg, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxiv).

¹⁵⁶⁴ See Zimmermann, article 5, mn 3.

¹⁵⁶⁵ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.1.

¹⁵⁶⁶ See Cottier and Baumgartner, article 8 para. 2 (b) (iii).

¹⁵⁶⁷ See Corrections to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, UN Doc C.N.777.1998. TREATIES-8 (Annex).

mission, ‘namely (i) consent of the parties; (ii) impartiality; and (iii) the non-use of force except in self-defence’¹⁵⁶⁸.

Moreover, the Majority in the Garda decision concluded that with respect to article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii) of the Statute, personnel involved in peacekeeping missions enjoy protection from attacks unless and for such time as they take a direct part in hostilities or in combat-related activities and that such protection does not cease if such persons only use armed force in exercise of their right to self-defence¹⁵⁶⁹. 927

The Chamber also noted the non-exhaustive list of criteria established by the Special Court for Sierra Leone in the RUF case in order to determine whether peacekeeping personnel were entitled to protection¹⁵⁷⁰. The criteria referred to by Trial Chamber I of the Special Court for Sierra Leone were: ‘(a) the relevant Security Council resolutions for the operation; (b) the role and practices actually adopted by the peacekeeping mission during the particular conflict; (c) their rules of engagement and operational orders; (d) the nature of the arms and equipment used by the peacekeeping force; (e) the interaction between the peacekeeping force and the parties involved in the conflict, (f) any use of force between the peacekeeping force and the parties in the conflict, and (g) the nature and frequency of such force and the conduct of the alleged victim(s) and their fellow personnel’¹⁵⁷¹. This list was confirmed by the Appeals Chamber, which noted that out of these criteria, ‘the most important are those that relate to the facts on the ground, in particular, any use of force by the peacekeeping mission’¹⁵⁷². Indeed, it seems that the indicative criteria set up by the Trial Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone at least in part conflate the issue of whether a mission qualifies as a peacekeeping mission and whether personnel involved in such a mission enjoys protection from attack. As far as the latter issue, i.e. loss of protection due to a direct participation in hostilities, is concerned, it is difficult to see what relevance a Security Council Resolution could have in this regard. Therefore, in accordance with the Appeals Chamber, the focus should be exclusively on those criteria that relate to the facts on the ground. 928

With respect to the protection of civilian objects in non-international armed conflict, the Chamber in the Garda decision took note of the absence of a war crime equivalent to article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) in the catalogue of crimes pertaining to non-international armed conflict¹⁵⁷³. However, in view of the customary law character of the definition contained in article 52 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I, which also applies to non-international armed conflicts¹⁵⁷⁴, the Majority concluded that ‘installations, material, units or vehicles involved in a peacekeeping mission in the context of an armed conflict not of an international character shall not be considered military objectives, and thus shall be entitled to the protection given to civilian objects, unless and for such time as their nature, location, purpose or use make an effective contribution to the military action of a party to a conflict and insofar as their total or partial destruction, capture or neutralization, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage’¹⁵⁷⁵. 929

¹⁵⁶⁸ Situation in Darfur, Sudan in the Case of: Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 71. Notably, the Majority’s legal interpretation of each of the elements of the crime provided for in article 8(2)(e)(iii) of the Statute in the Abu Garda decision in paragraphs 64–94 was confirmed in Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jamus, ICC-02/05-03/09, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 March 2011, para. 61.

¹⁵⁶⁹ Ibid., para. 83. See also: Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 October 2009, para. 530.

¹⁵⁷⁰ Ibid., para. 84.

¹⁵⁷¹ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber I, 2 March 2009, para. 234.

¹⁵⁷² Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 26 October 2009, para. 529.

¹⁵⁷³ Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 85.

¹⁵⁷⁴ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary, i (2009) 25–36; the ICTY Appeals Chamber reached the same conclusion in following cases: Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 17 December 2004, para. 59 and Prosecutor v. Galić, IT-98-36-T, Appeal Judgment, 30 November 2006, para. 190.

¹⁵⁷⁵ Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 89.

- 930 With respect to the mens rea the Chamber in the Garda decision confirmed that the Chamber's findings in the Katanga decision also apply to article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii) and that therefore, 'in addition to the standard mens rea requirement provided in article 30 of the Statute, the perpetrator must intend to make individual civilians not taking direct part in the hostilities or the civilian population the object of the attack. This offence therefore; first and foremost, encompasses dolus directus of the first degree'¹⁵⁷⁶.
- 931 Finally, in the Garda decision the Majority was of the view that the fifth element of the Elements of Crimes relating to article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii) of the Statute 'excludes the defence of mistake of law provided for in article 32 of the Statute, as only knowledge in relation to facts establishing that the installations, material, units or vehicles and personnel were involved in a peacekeeping mission is necessary, and not legal knowledge pertaining to the protection thereof'¹⁵⁷⁷.

4. Paragraph 2(e)(iv): Attacks against cultural objects, places of worship and similar institutions

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (ix).

- 932 Even in times of internal armed conflict, cultural objects as well as places of worship are already protected under article 16 of Add. Prot. II of 1977. Besides, the 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict also applies. It must, however, be considered a novelty that such behaviour, even when committed in non-international armed conflicts, is considered a war crime, even more since new elements, such as the protection of buildings dedicated to education, were added.
- 933 The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (iv) of the Statute (and indeed the elements of crimes adopted in that regard) is identical to the wording of sub-paragraph b (ix) (respectively to the wording of the elements of crimes adopted concerning article 8 para. 2 (b) (ix)), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵⁷⁸.

5. Paragraph 2(e)(v): Pillage

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi).

- 934 The wording of the prohibition of pillage contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute was drawn from article 28 of the Regulations Concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land annexed to the 1907 Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land.¹⁵⁷⁹ Such prohibition is also contained in article 4 para. 2 (g) of Add. Prot. II of 1977. In the Jerbo decision the Chamber recalled that '[a]ccording to the Elements of Crimes, for a conduct to constitute the crime provided for under article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute, the following objective elements are required: (i) the perpetrator appropriated certain property; and (ii) the appropriation was without the consent of the owner'¹⁵⁸⁰. In the Bemba decision the Chamber observed that article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute 'entails a somewhat large-scale appropriation of all types of property, such as public or private'¹⁵⁸¹, movable or immovable property, which goes beyond mere sporadic acts of violation of property rights'¹⁵⁸². The ¹⁵⁷⁶ Ibid., para. 93; Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 271.

¹⁵⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, 8 February 2010, para. 94.

¹⁵⁷⁸ See Arnold and Wehrenberg, article 8 para. 2 (b) (ix).

¹⁵⁷⁹ Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 169.

¹⁵⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Nourain and Jamus, ICC-02/05-03/09, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 March 2011, para. 111. See also Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 452.

¹⁵⁸¹ See also Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 453.

¹⁵⁸² Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 317. With regard to article 8 para. 2

Chamber further observed that a ‘certain monetary value’ of the property at issue is not required but that in view of the Court’s mandate set out in article 1 of the Statute and the formulation ‘other serious violations’ in article 8 para. 2 (e), ‘cases of petty property expropriation may not fall under the scope of article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute’ and that the seriousness of the violation in question has to be assessed in light of the particular circumstances of the case.

In the Taylor judgment the Trial Chamber pointed out that ‘the perpetrator must have specifically intended to deprive the owner of the property and to appropriate it for private or personal use’¹⁵⁸³. In the Taylor judgment Trial Chamber II of the Special Court for Sierra Leone further held that the crime of pillage ‘[...] covers both organised or systematic appropriation and the isolated acts of individuals’¹⁵⁸⁴.

The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (v) of the Statute is identical to the wording of article 2 para. 2 (b) (xvi), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁵⁸⁵. Identical considerations also apply with regard to the respective elements of crimes adopted by the Assembly of States Parties.

6. Paragraph 2(e)(vi): Rape and other forms of sexual violence

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) and Healey, S. A., ‘Prosecuting Rape under the Statute of the War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia,’ (1995) 21 BrookJIL 2, 327; Meron, T., ‘Rape as a Crime under International Humanitarian Law’, (1993) 87 AJIL 424; Maedl, A., ‘Rape as weapon of war in the eastern DRC? The victim’s perspective’, (2011) 33 HumRtsQ. 128–147.

The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi) is, mutatis mutandis, identical to the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii) to which can accordingly be made¹⁵⁸⁶.

In its decision of 15 June 2009 in the Bemba case Pre-Trial Chamber II found that the victims ‘were raped, by force, or by threat of force or coercion’¹⁵⁸⁷. The ICTY and ICTR, as well as the Special Court for Sierra Leone, all have held that ‘[f]orce or threat of force provides clear evidence of non-consent, but force is not an element per se of rape’¹⁵⁸⁸.

It has to be noted, however, that as far as forms of sexual violence other than rape are concerned, reference is made – unlike in the case of international armed conflicts, where reference is made to those acts also constituting grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions – to common article 3. Accordingly the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi), which are otherwise identical to the ones adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii), also differ in that regard.

The last phrase brings ‘any other form of sexual violence also constituting a serious violation of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions’ within the jurisdiction of the ICC¹⁵⁸⁹. It has to be understood as meaning that acts of sexual violence other than rape, sexual slavery, enforced sterilisation and enforced prostitution committed in internal armed conflict would only come within the jurisdiction of the ICC if, and to the extent, that they

(b) (xvi) see also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, paras. 329–331.

¹⁵⁸³ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 319; See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 331, albeit with respect to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi); Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 452.

¹⁵⁸⁴ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 453.

¹⁵⁸⁵ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvi), passim.

¹⁵⁸⁶ See Cottier and Mzee, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii).

¹⁵⁸⁷ Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08, Decision pursuant to article 61 (7) (a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the charges of the Prosecutor, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 18 September 2009, para. 286.

¹⁵⁸⁸ Prosecutor v. Tharcisse Renzaho, ICTR-97-31-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber I, 14 July 2009, para. 791; Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al., ICTR-98-41-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 18 December 2008, para. 2199; Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 129; Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, see note 312, para. 147.

¹⁵⁸⁹ Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 168; Werle and Jessberger, Principles (2014) 442.

also constitute by the same token a serious violation of common article 3¹⁵⁹⁰. This interpretation of the relevant formula is confirmed by the use of the term ‘also’, as well by the very fact that the second alternative ‘any other form of sexual violence’ is separated by a comma from the other alternatives, thus making it clear that the additional formula ‘constituting a serious violation of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions’ has to be understood as a qualifying element.

- 941 The formula, by using the word ‘also’, further confirms, if need existed, that the specific acts listed in article 8 para. 2 (e) (vi) of the Statute, i.e. rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy and enforced sterilization, all per se constitute serious violations of common article 3¹⁵⁹¹.

7. Paragraph 2(e)(vii): Recruitment of children

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi).

- 942 The main idea underlying article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) of the Statute can already be found, although in a somewhat modified way, in article 4 para. 3 (c) of Add. Prot. II as well as in article 38 paras. 2 and 3 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.
- 943 The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) of the Statute is similar to the wording of article 8 para. 2 sub-para. b (xxvi), reference to which can accordingly be generally made¹⁵⁹². One main difference in the wording of these provisions, however, has to be noted: in the case of an international armed conflict according to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) only the conscription or enlistment of children into national armed forces constitutes a crime. In contrast thereto, in case of an armed conflict not of an international character, the prohibition of conscription or enlistment of children by virtue of the wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) extends to all armed forces article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) speaks of enlisting children under the age of fifteen years ‘into armed forces or groups’. Besides, given the specificities of internal armed conflict, the conscription or enlistment of children into armed groups is similarly punishable.
- 944 In light of this textual difference the respective elements of crimes, which otherwise are identical, also differ in that regard. It must be noted, however, that Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Lubanga decision of 29 January 2007 leveled out this textual difference in the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) and 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) by holding that under article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) of the Statute, the term ‘national armed forces’ is not limited to the armed forces of a State¹⁵⁹³. This interpretation of the term ‘national armed forces’ was confirmed in the Katanga decision of 26 September 2008¹⁵⁹⁴. In Lubanga the Chamber referred to article 43 of Add. Prot. I and its commentary as well as article 1 of the 1907 Hague Regulations concerning the laws and customs of war and rightly noted that, in the context of an international armed conflict, Add. Prot. I does not require that the armed forces be governmental forces¹⁵⁹⁵. Moreover, the ¹⁵⁹⁰ See already Zimmermann (1998) MPYbUNL 194–195. But see also Hall, in: Lattanzi (ed.), Comments (1998) 33, who seems to take a different view.

¹⁵⁹¹ See in that regard in particular the decision of the Trial Chamber in the Čelebići case, which found that rape does, under certain circumstances, constitute torture, (Prosecutor v. Delalić, IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 496) and Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 2 September 1998, para. 597 and thus also constitute a violation of paragraph 1 (a) of common article 3. See also the findings of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, Fernando and Raquel Mejía v. Peru, (Report No. 5/96, Case 10970, (1995) Ann. Report of the Inter-American Comm. on Hum. Rts. 157 as well as of the European Court of Human Rights, Aydın v. Turkey, Judgment of 25 September 1997, para. 86), which have determined that rape of women by state organs constitutes a specific form of torture; see finally also the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, UN Doc E/CN.4/1995/34, para. 18, where the Special Rapporteur refers to the fact that rape constitutes a specific traumatic form of torture.

¹⁵⁹² See Arnold and Wehrenberg, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi).

¹⁵⁹³ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 285.

¹⁵⁹⁴ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 249.

¹⁵⁹⁵ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 272.

Chamber considered whether the adjective ‘national’ qualifying the term ‘armed forces’ implies a limitation to governmental armed forces. It relied on the jurisprudence of the ICTY¹⁵⁹⁶, which has accorded the term ‘national’ as it is found in article 4 para. 1 of the Fourth Geneva Convention a wider meaning beyond mere nationality and held that ‘interpreting the term ‘national’ to mean ‘governmental’ can only undermine the object and purpose of the Statute of the Court, which is none other than to ensure that ‘the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole’ must no longer go unpunished¹⁵⁹⁷.

Unfortunately, however, the Chamber did not consider at all why the drafters of the Statute had introduced this textual difference in articles 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) and para. 2 (e) (vii) in the first place. Given that a parallel interpretation of the word ‘national’ in article 4 para. 1 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) of the Rome Statute is certainly not compelling, the argumentation is primarily supported by the overall object and purpose to punish most serious crimes. This is also reflected in the concluding remark of the Chamber according to which ‘it would be absurd that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo could incur criminal responsibility for the crime of enlisting or conscripting children under the age of fifteen years only in the context of an internal armed conflict solely because the FPLC, as an armed force, could not be described as a ‘national armed force’ within the meaning of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) of the Statute’¹⁵⁹⁸. Of course, the textual difference between articles 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi) and para. 2 (e) (vii) of the Statute marks a rare instance in which – at least in view of the different wording – the ambit of criminalized behaviour is wider in relation to non-international armed conflicts than it is with respect to international armed conflicts. The Chamber in Lubanga has levelled out this difference largely on the basis of the object and purpose of the Rome Statute not to let serious offences go unpunished.

As desirable as such an equalization-approach appears, such a line of argumentation, without at least giving due regard to the original intention of the drafters of the Rome Statute, is problematic. After all, the very same logic could be used to level out other intentional differences between the criminalization of behaviour in international and non-international armed conflicts. Against this background the Trial Chamber in its Lubanga judgment spoke of a ‘significant difference in wording’ between article para. 2 (b) (xxvi) and article para. 2 (e) (vii)¹⁵⁹⁹ and emphasized that despite all tendencies towards the assimilation of international and non-international armed conflicts the Court must heed the distinction contained in the Rome Statute and that ‘[t]he Chamber does not have the power to reformulate the Court’s statutory framework’¹⁶⁰⁰. Judge Benito, however, in her separate and dissenting opinion followed the reasoning of the Pre-Trial Chamber arguing that ‘It would be contrary to the ‘object and purpose’ of the Rome Statute and contrary to internationally recognised human rights (and thus contrary to Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute) to exclude from the prohibition of child recruitment, and armed group, solely for the nature of its organization (State or non-state armed group)’¹⁶⁰¹.

Since the Statute does not limit the prohibition of enlistment and conscription to the national or regular armed forces of a given State, it has to be understood as embracing all organized governmental armed forces, groups and units including, where applicable, those formations of the armed forces not included in the definition of the army under the domestic legislation of that State¹⁶⁰², but still enjoying combatant status.

¹⁵⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 166.

¹⁵⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 281.

¹⁵⁹⁸ Ibid., para. 284.

¹⁵⁹⁹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 568.

¹⁶⁰⁰ Ibid., para. 539.

¹⁶⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, 14 March 2012, para. 13.

¹⁶⁰² See for a similar definition of the notion of ‘armed forces’ in article 1 para. 1 Add. Prot. II, Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) mn 4462.

948 Given the fact that article 8 para. 2 (f) limits the scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (e) of the Statute to situations in which organized armed groups are involved, the notion of ‘groups’ as contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) has to be similarly limited to such groups, i. e. armed groups, which possess a minimum of organization. In this regard the Special Court for Sierra Leone has ruled that the elements of ‘armed forces or groups’ entail that the armed forces or groups must be under responsible command, which entails a degree of organization which should be such as to enable the armed groups to plan and carry out concerted military operations and to impose discipline within the armed group¹⁶⁰³. On the other hand since neither article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) nor article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute mention the further requirements which are otherwise to be found in article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II, such as in particular the exercise of territorial control and the requirement of being under responsible command, they do not form part of the elements to be proven as far as the second alternative of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) is concerned.

949 Moreover, it should be noted that the requirement of using children to participate actively in hostilities, at least with respect to non-international armed conflicts, is not to be equated with a direct participation in hostilities that may lead to a loss of protection from direct attack. The Special Court for Sierra Leone (Trial Chamber I) seems to assume that these notions are similar¹⁶⁰⁴. However, whereas the purpose of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) is the protection of children by describing the scope of what amounts to a prohibited use of children, direct participation in the realm of the conduct of hostilities pertains to the loss of protection from direct attack. Against this background it appears plausible in light of the object and purpose to better protect children in times of armed conflict to accord a wider meaning of the phrase ‘active participation in hostilities’ under international criminal law. Such a wider interpretation has been endorsed in the Lubanga judgment of March 2012¹⁶⁰⁵. This argument finds some support in the wording of article 4 (3) (c) of Add. Prot. II which, unlike the wording of article 77 para. 2 of Add. Prot. I regarding international armed conflicts, merely prohibits to allow children ‘to take part in hostilities’, while omitting the word ‘direct’¹⁶⁰⁶. From this it may be inferred that a wider meaning can be accorded to the notion of active participation in hostilities with respect to the war crime of using children for military activities linked to combat than it would have in the realm of the conduct of hostilities where direct participation in hostilities amounts to an exception to the general rule according to which civilians are protected from direct attacks and where accordingly it should be interpreted restrictively. Therefore, in Lubanga the trial chamber held that ‘[t]hose who participate actively in hostilities include a wide range of individuals, from those on the front line (who participate directly) through to the boys or girls who are involved in a myriad of roles that support the combatants’¹⁶⁰⁷. The decisive factor in deciding, therefore, if an ‘indirect’ role is to be treated as active participation in hostilities is whether the support provided by the child to the combatants exposed him or her to real danger as a *potential target*¹⁶⁰⁸. In the Taylor judgment, the Trial Chamber II of the Special Court for Sierra Leone also referred to whether the ‘children would constitute legitimate military targets’¹⁶⁰⁹ and adopted a similar approach of assessing active participation on a case-by-case basis holding that: ‘[u]sing children to participate actively in the hostilities

¹⁶⁰³ Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 20 June 2007, para. 738.

¹⁶⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber I, 2 March 2009, para. 1723. Notably, Trial Chamber II adopted a wider approach Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 444.

¹⁶⁰⁵ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 627.

¹⁶⁰⁶ Sivakumaran (2010) 8 JICJ 1019.

¹⁶⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 628 (emphasis added).

¹⁶⁰⁸ Ibid. (emphasis added). Judge Benito argued in favor of an even broader interpretation of the notion ‘to participate actively in hostilities’; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, Separate and Dissenting Opinion Benito, ICC-01/04-01/06, Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, 14 March 2012, para. 15.

¹⁶⁰⁹ Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 1604.

encompasses putting their lives directly at risk in combat, but may also include participation in activities linked to combat such as carrying loads for the fighting faction, finding and/or acquiring food, ammunition or equipment, acting as decoys, carrying messages, making trails or finding routes, manning checkpoints or acting as human shields¹⁶¹⁰. On this basis the Chamber held that inter alia ‘the use of a child to guard a diamond mine put the child at sufficient risk to constitute illegal use of the child...’ given that the diamond mines in Sierra Leone were crucial sources of revenue for the warring parties¹⁶¹¹. Conversely, the Chamber held that the performance of domestic chores does not constitute active participation in hostilities¹⁶¹². Under international humanitarian law the terms direct participation and active participation in hostilities are synonymous¹⁶¹³. Therefore, a wide interpretation of the term ‘active participation’ in the context of article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii) potentially could have repercussions on the interpretation of the notion of direct participation in hostilities in other contexts, namely when a civilian’s loss of protection from direct attack is at issue. Such an overly wide interpretation of the criteria leading to the loss of protection of civilian persons, however, cannot be sustained. It would be contrary to the general rule according to which civilians are protected from direct attack.

8. Paragraph 2(e)(viii): Prohibition of forced movement of civilians

Literature: Fleck, D., ‘Kriegslisten und Perfidieverbot’, in: id. (ed.), Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung des humanitären Völkerrechts für bewaffnete Konflikte (1973) 116; Geissler, N., Der völkerrechtliche Schutz der internally displaced persons (1999) in particular 111 et seq.; Gimmerthal, M., Kriegslist und Perfidieverbot im Zusatzprotokoll vom 10. Juni 1977 zu den vier Genfer Rotkreuz-Abkommen von 1949 (1990) (Zusatzprotokoll I); Henckaerts, J.-M., ‘Deportation and transfer of civilians in time of war’, (1993) VandJTransnatL 469; Hofmann, R., ‘Internally displaced persons and das Völkerrecht’, in: U. Beyerlin et al. (eds.), Recht zwischen Umbruch und Bewahrung – Festschrift für Rudolf Bernhardt (1995) 417; id., ‘International Humanitarian Law and the Law of Refugees and Internally Displaced Persons’, in: European Commission, Law in Humanitarian Crises – How Can International Humanitarian Law Be Made Effective in Armed Conflicts? (1995); Jasica, R., ‘Der Kombattantenbegriff in den Zusatzabkommen von 1977 zu den Genfer Abkommen von 1949’, in: W. Voigt (ed.), Völkerrechtliche Beiträge der Tagungen der Justitiare und Konventionsbeauftragten des Deutschen Roten Kreuzes 1957–1989 (1995) 261; Lerner, N., ‘Ethnic cleansing’, in: Y. Dinstein (ed.), War Crimes in International Law (1996) 107; Meindersma, C., ‘Legal issues surrounding population transfers in conflict situations’, (1994) NethILRev 31; Melzer, N., ICRC Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Law (2009); Finucane, B., ‘Enforced disappearance as a crime under international law: A neglected origin in the laws of war’, (2010) 35 YaleJIL 171; Ott, L., Enforced Disappearance in International Law (2011); Geiß, R., ‘Ethnic Cleansing’, MPEPIL (2012, online version).

The wording of the prohibition of forced movement of civilians was literally taken, some 950 minor drafting changes notwithstanding, from article 17 para. 1, first sentence of Add. Prot. II¹⁶¹⁴, which in turn was derived from article 49 para. 2 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. As far as international armed conflicts are concerned, a similar prohibition can be found in article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii) of the Statute¹⁶¹⁵ which does not cover, however, the Party’s own nationals in national territory not occupied by an adverse Party.

As recent examples of internal armed conflicts have demonstrated, practices of so-called 951 ‘ethnic cleansing’ in order to facilitate in the future the domination of one ethnic group over another in a given area or in order to create a fait accompli for a future peace settlement, have become a common practice of many armed conflicts. Besides, the need for such a prohibition might arise, where similar policies are used in counter-insurgency operations in order to deprive guerrilla groups of the support they derive from the local population¹⁶¹⁶.

¹⁶¹⁰ Also Prosecutor v. Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber II, 18 May 2012, para. 444.

¹⁶¹¹ Ibid., para. 1459.

¹⁶¹² Ibid., para. 1411.

¹⁶¹³ Melzer, Interpretive Guidance (2009) 43.

¹⁶¹⁴ It has to be noted that the French text uses a slightly modified wording of article 17 para. 1 Add. Prot. II since it does not refer to ‘raisons militaires impératives’ but to ‘impératifs militaires’ which does not, however, entail a difference in substance as compared to the first mentioned provision.

¹⁶¹⁵ See Cottier and Baumgartner, article 8 para. 2 (b) (viii).

¹⁶¹⁶ Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 691. For genocide by so-called ‘ethnic cleansing’ see Schabas, article 6, mn 19.

- 952 The use of the term ‘ordering’ makes it clear that only acts which are directly aimed at removing the respective civilian population from a given area are prohibited. Thus, other acts which do not possess such a character but which lead to the same result, such as the intentional starvation of the civilian population in order to force them to leave a certain area, are not prohibited by article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute. This is confirmed by the fact that an explicit prohibition to that effect had been part of the original proposal submitted by New Zealand and Switzerland¹⁶¹⁷, which was not retained. Such acts might, however, be covered by article 8 para. 2 (e) (iii) or (xii) of the Statute.
- 953 Violations of article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute cannot be solely committed by the person actually ordering a displacement, but by anybody whose individual criminal responsibility is engaged by virtue of articles 25 *et seq.*¹⁶¹⁸, notwithstanding the fact that element 3 of the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) requires that ‘[t]he perpetrator was in a position to effect such displacement by giving such order’.
- 954 Given the fact that article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute, unlike article 17 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II which speaks of ‘civilians’, refers to the ‘civilian population’, it seems that only the forced displacement of a minimum number of civilians is prohibited. This conclusion is however somewhat contradicted by the fact that the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) interchangeably use both terms.
- 955 Article 17 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II also contains a specific prohibition to compel civilians to leave their own country¹⁶¹⁹. Thus, the question arises whether a similar behaviour is also prohibited under article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute. Given the broad wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute, it seems to be correct to assume, however, that such cross-boundary measures also constitute forced displacements.
- 956 The displacement must further occur for ‘reasons related to the conflict’. Accordingly displacements which take place for other reasons such as epidemics or natural disasters are not covered by that provision¹⁶²⁰.
- 957 The ordering of a displacement of a civilian population does not constitute a war crime under the Statute if it is done to protect that very same population from dangers.
- 958 Article 8 para. 2 (e) (viii) of the Statute, by using the words ‘imperative military reasons’, seems to imply that not every situation of military necessity might justify a displacement of a civilian population since the text indicates that only most serious military reasons, which are of an imperative nature, can do so¹⁶²¹. It has to be noted, however, that the elements of crimes adopted by the Assembly of States Parties imply that the term ‘imperative military reasons’ and the notion of ‘military necessity’ have the same meaning.

9. Paragraph 2(e)(ix): Prohibition of perfidy

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi).

- 959 The prohibition of perfidy as contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix) of the Statute resembles article 23 (b) of the 1907 Hague Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. Unlike the parallel provision contained in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) of the Statute, which is completely identical to that provision, the text of article 23 (b) of the 1907 Hague Regulations has been modified in order to make it compatible with the specificities of armed conflicts not of an international character.
- 960 More specifically, since armed conflicts not of an international character do not take place between different States, the words ‘individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army’, as ¹⁶¹⁷ UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.1/DP.2, War Crimes, para. 3 (xi).

¹⁶¹⁸ For details see Ambos, article 25.

¹⁶¹⁹ Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) mn 4858.

¹⁶²⁰ Ibid., No. 4855 with further references to the drafting history of article 17 Add. Prot. II.

¹⁶²¹ Ibid., No. 4853; see also Geissler, Internally displaced persons (1999) in particular 126 et seq. See also Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 474: ‘military necessity is qualified by referring to “imperative military reasons”. The situation should be scrutinized most carefully, as the adjective “imperative” reduces to a minimum cases in which displacement may be ordered’ (with further references).

contained in article 23 (b) of the 1907 Hague Regulations, were replaced by the words ‘combatant adversary’. The Elements of Crimes, which were otherwise taken over from those adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi), were accordingly modified.

Unlike in the case of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi) of the Statute, where also the perfidious killing of civilians, i. e. persons not falling within the definitions contained in articles 43 and 44 of Add. Prot. I, belonging to the enemy nation can constitute a crime coming within the jurisdiction of the Court¹⁶²², the scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix) of the Statute is limited to the treacherous killing or wounding of combatant adversaries. It has to be noted that this provision does not refer to enemy combatants, but instead to combatant adversaries, i. e. to adversaries who take part in hostilities. This careful distinction was made in order to avoid the impression that there might exist the notion of ‘combatants’ in non-international armed conflict¹⁶²³. This interpretation is further confirmed by the French text, which refers to ‘un adversaire combatant’ and not to ‘un combatant adversaire’. Given this interpretation of article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix) of the Statute, the treacherous killing of any person, who is participating in the fighting on behalf of the adversarial side, is prohibited.

Otherwise, the content of both provisions, article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix) and (b) (xi) of the Statute as well as the respective elements of crimes, are identical. Reference to those provisions is accordingly made¹⁶²⁴.

10. Paragraph 2(e)(x): Quarter

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii).

The wording of the prohibition to order that there shall be no survivors, as now contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (x) of the Statute, was drawn from article 23 (d) of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. Such prohibition is also contained in article 40 Add. Prot. I but it has no equivalent in Add. Prot. II.

The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (x) of the Statute, as well as the elements of crimes as adopted in that regard, are identical to the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii) and to the respective elements of crimes, reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁶²⁵.

11. Paragraph 2(e)(xi): Prohibition of physical mutilations

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

In case of an internal armed conflict coming within the jurisdiction of the ICC, the mutilation of persons not taking part in hostilities is already prohibited by virtue of article 8 para. 2 (c) (i) of the Statute. This general prohibition is further elaborated by article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi), the text of which is based on both article 11 Add. Prot. I and article 5 para. 2 (e) Add. Prot. II.

Compared with the parallel provision relating to international armed conflict¹⁶²⁶, the only difference that can be discerned is that the words ‘in the power of an adverse party’ were replaced by the words ‘in the power of another party to the conflict’. The same is true, mutatis mutandis, with regard to the respective elements of crimes. Given the definition of armed conflict as contained in article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute¹⁶²⁷, therefore any mutilation or unwarranted medical or scientific experiment undertaken on behalf of either governmental authorities or on behalf of organized armed groups comes within the definition of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xi).

¹⁶²² See Cottier and Grignon, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi), mn 115 et seq., as well as Fleck, in: id. (ed.), Bewaffnete Konflikte (1973) 116: ‘Artikel 23 b HLKO verbietet mit der “meuchlerischen Tötung oder Verwundung” die Ausnutzung der Arglosigkeit eines Soldaten oder Zivilisten der gegnerischen Partei ...’ (emphasis added) as well as Gimmerthal, Kriegslist (1990) 50 and Bothe et al. (eds.), New Rules (1982) 204.

¹⁶²³ Add. Prot. II does neither acknowledge such status, see Jasica, in: Voit (ed.), Beiträge (1995) 261.

¹⁶²⁴ See Cottier and Grignon, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xi).

¹⁶²⁵ See Cottier and Grignon, article 8 para. 2 (b) (xii).

¹⁶²⁶ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

¹⁶²⁷ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (f).

12. Paragraph 2 (e)(xii): Prohibited destruction

- 967 The wording of the prohibition of destroying the property of an adversary, now contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute, was drawn from article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. A similar prohibition is also contained in article 53 of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, but no similar provision can be found in Add. Prot. II, except that its article 14 prohibits the destruction of objects which are indispensable to the survival of the civilian population.
- 968 Compared with the parallel provision relating to international armed conflict¹⁶²⁸, i. e. article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii) of the Statute, which is completely identical to article 23 (g) of the 1907 Hague Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, two differences between the Hague Law and article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute have to be noted:
- 969 On the one hand, the words ‘the enemy’s property’ were replaced by the words ‘the property of an adversary’. The same is true, mutatis mutandis, for the elements of crimes, as compared to the elements of crimes adopted with regard to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xiii). On the other hand, the term ‘war’ was replaced by the notion of ‘conflict’. Both of these changes are due to the specific character of internal armed conflicts. As to the use of the term ‘adversary’ instead of ‘enemy’, it has to be noted that in non-international armed conflicts, the members of the different parties to the conflict are usually nationals of the same State and as such cannot be considered ‘enemies’ in the technical sense. In the context of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute, the term ‘adversary’ thus refers to any person, who is considered to belong to another party to the conflict, such as the government, insurgents or as article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute demonstrates, belongs to an opposing organized armed group.
- 970 Since article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) of the Statute, unlike article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix), does not refer solely to combatant adversaries, both the property of persons participating in hostilities and that of civilians is protected against destruction or seizure.
- 971 Since the term ‘war’ commonly refers to cases of armed conflicts between different States (see e.g. article 2 common to the four Geneva Conventions), it was replaced in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) as well as in the elements of crimes by the term ‘conflict’ respectively ‘armed conflict not of an international character’, which can already be found in the chapeau of article 8 para. 2 (e). Given that the war crime of intentionally directing attacks against civilian objects as it is laid out in article 8 para. 2 (b) (ii) as well as the war crime of intentionally causing disproportionate collateral damage, as laid out in article 8 para. 2 (b) (iv) of the Statute, were deliberately omitted from the catalogue of war crimes applicable to non-international armed conflicts in article 8 para. 2 (e) of the Statute, the crime contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii) should not be interpreted to apply to the conduct of hostilities as such. In order to maintain a meaningful distinction between the war crime of intentionally directing attacks against civilian objects and of causing disproportionate collateral damage on the one hand, and the war crime of destroying or seizing the property of an adversary on the other hand, as it is required by the very systematic of article 8 of the Statute itself, at least a minimum degree of de facto territorial control should be required for the crime contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xii).
- 972 Otherwise, the content of both, article 8 para. 2 (e) (ix) and (b) (xi) (and indeed the respective elements of crimes) is identical, reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁶²⁹.

¹⁶²⁸ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

¹⁶²⁹ See Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (b) (x).

Preliminary remarks on subparagraphs (xiii)–(xv):
Prohibited weapons in non-international armed conflicts

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii)–(xx) and Geiß, R., ‘Poison, gas and expanding bullets – the extension of the list of prohibited weapons at the Review Conference of the International Criminal Court in Kampala’, (2011) YbIHumL 337–352; Watkin, K., ‘Chemical agents and expanding bullets – limited law enforcement exceptions or unwarranted handcuffs?’, (2006) 36 IsYbHumRts 43–69; Coupland, R. and Loye, D., ‘The 1899 Hague Declaration concerning Expanding Bullets – A treaty effective for more than 100 years faces complex contemporary issues’, (2003) 85 IRevRC 135–142; Fry, J., ‘Gas smells awful – U.N. forces, riot-control agents, and the chemical weapons convention’, (2009/10) 31 MichJIL 475–558; Boothby, W. H., Weapons and the Law of Armed Conflict (2009); Zimmermann, A. and Sener, M., ‘Chemical Weapons and the International Criminal Court’, (2014) 108 AJIL 436–448.

At the Kampala Review Conference, following a proposal by Belgium¹⁶³⁰, three war crimes 973 relating to the use of prohibited weapons in non-international armed conflict were adopted by consensus. Article 8 para. 2 (e) of the ICC Statute was extended to include the crimes of: (xiii) Employing poison or poisoned weapons, (xiv) Employing asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials or devices, and (xv) Employing bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body. This is the first time that crimes relating to prohibited weapons have been adopted specifically with regard to non-international armed conflicts, even though the ICTY has interpreted article 3 of its Statute, which refers to the ‘employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering’ to include war crimes committed in international as well as non-international armed conflicts¹⁶³¹.

The ‘Belgian proposal’ aimed to streamline the law applicable in international and non- 974 international armed conflicts, to bring article 8 of the ICC Statute more in line with existing customary international law and to respond to humanitarian needs in contemporary armed conflicts¹⁶³². Indeed, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has argued for a long time that the prohibition to use poison, gas and expanding bullets by virtue of customary international law also applies to non-international armed conflicts and that infringements of these prohibitions incur individual criminal responsibility¹⁶³³. This position has been confirmed by the ICTY¹⁶³⁴ and increasingly it has found support among States. The German international criminal code (‘Völkerstrafgesetzbuch’), for example, prohibits the use of these weapons in international and non-international armed conflicts¹⁶³⁵.

The original ‘Belgian proposal’ had been far more extensive than what was ultimately 975 adopted in Kampala¹⁶³⁶. Belgium had initially proposed to amend the Statute’s weapons provisions not only with respect to internal armed conflicts but also in relation to international armed conflicts, by adding crimes relating to the use of biological and chemical ¹⁶³⁰ The so-called ‘Belgian proposal’ is included in Annex III to Resolution ICC-ASP/8/Res.6, 26 November 2009, available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/ICC-ASP-8-Res.6-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶³¹ Geiß (2011) YbIHumL 337–352.

¹⁶³² See Assembly of State Parties, 8th Session, Report of the Bureau on the Review Conference, ICC-ASP/8/43/Add.1, Annex I, 10 November 2009, p. 2, available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP8/ICC-ASP-8-43-Add.1-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶³³ See only the ICRC Statement at the First Review Conference of the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) Kampala, 31 May – 11 June 2010, available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/RC2010/Statements/ICC-RC-gendeba-ICRC-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶³⁴ In the Čelebići case it was stated that: ‘The Trial Chamber finds that both the substantive prohibitions in common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and the provisions of the Hague Regulations (which contain both the prohibition of poison and the use of weapons which might cause unnecessary suffering (article 23 a) and e)) constitute rules of customary international law which may be applied by the International Tribunal to impose individual criminal responsibility for the offences alleged in the Indictment’; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 316.

¹⁶³⁵ See article 12 (1) Nr. 1–3 of the German ‘Völkerstrafgesetzbuch’, available at: <<http://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/bundesrecht/vstgb/gesamt.pdf>> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶³⁶ United Nations, Reference: C.N.733.2009.TREATIES-8, Belgium: Proposal of Amendments, 29 October 2009.

weapons as well as to the use of anti-personnel mines¹⁶³⁷. In addition, Belgium had originally suggested amendments concerning the weapons defined in Protocols I and IV of the 1980 Conventional Weapons Convention, i.e. the Protocol on Non-Detectable Fragments (Protocol I, 1980) and Blinding Laser Weapons (Protocol IV, 1995) – and during the very early stages, the Cluster Munitions Convention and Protocols II and III of the 1980 Conventional Weapons Convention on Mines, Booby-traps (Protocol II, 1980) and Incendiary Weapons (Protocol III, 1980)¹⁶³⁸. Belgium had argued that these proposals corresponded to treaty prohibitions that are widely ratified and widely considered to have acquired international customary law status¹⁶³⁹. The proposed amendments, however, did not find broad support and were dropped already at the November 2009 session of the Assembly of States Parties. From the beginning Belgium had always emphasized that it was not the intent of the sponsors of these proposals to insist for amendments to be transferred to the Kampala Review Conference if they did not attract an overwhelming support¹⁶⁴⁰.

976 Already in 1998 an early ICC Draft Statute, adopted by the Preparatory Committee in April 1998, had contained parallel provisions concerning prohibited weapons in international and non-international armed conflicts. In the course of the Rome Conference and in spite of objections raised by Sweden and Australia¹⁶⁴¹, however, the weapons provisions pertaining to non-international armed conflicts were dropped. Apparently this was part of a tacit package deal, according to which nuclear weapons – one of the most contentious issues in 1998 – were deleted from the list of prohibited weapons altogether, while the attempt to adopt provisions dealing with the use of weapons also in non-international armed conflicts was abandoned in return¹⁶⁴².

977 Notably, a similar constellation recurred prior to the Kampala Review Conference. Parallel to the Belgian proposal, Mexico submitted a proposal suggesting to include a prohibitory paragraph on ‘employing or threatening to employ nuclear weapons’ in article 8 of the Statute¹⁶⁴³. Obviously, this contentious issue could have stalled any progress at the Kampala Review Conference, especially given the fact that the conference had already to deal with the highly controversial issue of the crime of aggression. Therefore, the Assembly of State Parties, at its 8th meeting in November 2009, decided that the issue of nuclear weapons should not be discussed at the Kampala conference and that instead it would be addressed at the 9th session of the Assembly of State Parties¹⁶⁴⁴. With this all potential obstacles to the adoption of the truncated ‘Belgian proposal’ had been removed. Thus, the three crimes were adopted not only by consensus but, with the exception of the crime of ‘employing bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body’, also without any significant debate.

978 In terms of substance the three provisions contain nothing new. The crimes now contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiii), (xiv) and (xv) correspond to historic categories of prohibited weapons. They are specifications of the general prohibition of weapons that are of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or are by nature indiscriminate. Moreover, the newly adopted provisions replicate the provisions found in article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii), (xviii) and (xix) of the Statute and the same Elements of Crimes apply to both categories of crimes. In accordance with article 121 para. 5 of the ICC Statute the amendments will enter

¹⁶³⁷ United Nations, Reference: C.N.733.2009.TREATIES-8, Belgium: Proposal of Amendments, 29 October 2009, ‘Amendment 2’, p. 5.

¹⁶³⁸ Ibid., ‘Amendment 3’, p. 6.

¹⁶³⁹ Ibid., pp. 2, 5, 6.

¹⁶⁴⁰ Ibid., p. 3.

¹⁶⁴¹ See, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34, paras. 4 (Sweden), 108 (Australia).

¹⁶⁴² Cottier and Křivánek, article 8 para. 2(b), Preliminary remarks on subparagraphs (xvii)-(xx), mn 570.

¹⁶⁴³ See Assembly of State Parties, 8th Session, Report of the Bureau on the Review Conference, ICC-ASP/8/43/Add.1, Annex III, 10 November 2009, pp. 9–11, available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP8/ICC-ASP-8-43-Add.1-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶⁴⁴ Available at: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/ICC-ASP-8-Res.6-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015.

into force for those State Parties which have accepted them one year after the deposit of their instruments of ratification or acceptance.

13. Paragraph 2(e)(xiii): Employing poison or poisoned weapons

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii).

The prohibition of poison is one of the oldest prohibitions of a means of warfare under international law¹⁶⁴⁵. An early example for a codified reference to the prohibition is article 70 of the 1863 Lieber Code, which provides that ‘the use of poison in any manner be it to poison wells, or food, or arms, is wholly excluded from modern warfare’. Moreover, the use of poison or poisonous weapons is prohibited in international and non-international armed conflicts by virtue of customary international law¹⁶⁴⁶. The wording of the crime contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiii) of the Statute is drawn from and identical with article 23 (a) of the 1907 Hague Regulations. Moreover, the wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiii) is, mutatis mutandis, identical to the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xvii), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁶⁴⁷. The only potentially contentious issue concerning this crime is the definition of ‘poison’; specifically the question in how far the use of gas and certain biological weapons are covered¹⁶⁴⁸. This issue, however, was not touched upon during the Kampala Review Conference. In fact, already in 1998 the Preparatory Commission had avoided the difficult task of defining ‘poison’. Instead it adopted a threshold relating to the effects of the substance used. This threshold-requirement is reflected in the corresponding Elements of Crimes which require that ‘the substance was such that it causes death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events through its toxic properties’¹⁶⁴⁹. Since these same Elements of Crimes apply to the amendment contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiii), it was not necessary to further discuss this issue at the Kampala conference.

14. Paragraph 2(c)(xiv): Employing asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials or devices Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii).

The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiv) is drawn from the 1925 Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare which in turn reaffirmed earlier prohibitions laid out in the 1899 Hague Declaration concerning Asphyxiating Gases and, for example, article 171 of the Versailles Peace Treaty¹⁶⁵⁰. According to the ICRC Customary Law Study the prohibition of employing chemical weapons is a customary law rule applicable in international and non-international armed conflicts¹⁶⁵¹. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiv) is, mutatis mutandis, identical to the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁶⁵².

During the Rome Conference in 1998, the most contentious issue with regard to the prohibition of certain gases was the question of how far the use of riot control agents, such as tear gases, would henceforth be criminalized under the article 8 para. 2 (b) (xviii) of the ICC

¹⁶⁴⁵ With regard to the new crime see generally Geiß (2011) YbIHL 337–352.

¹⁶⁴⁶ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law, I (2009) 72.

¹⁶⁴⁷ Cottier and Krivánek, article 8 para. 2(b)(xvii), mn 574 et seq.

¹⁶⁴⁸ Ibid.

¹⁶⁴⁹ Elements of Crime, ICC-ASP/1/3 (part II-B), p. 28, available at: <<http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/336923D8-A6AD-40EC-AD7B-45BF9DE73D56/0/ElementsOfCrimesEng.pdf>> last accessed September 2015; see Cottier and Krivánek, article 8 para. 2(b)(xvii), mn 574 et seq.

¹⁶⁵⁰ Article 171 (1) of the Versailles Peace Treaty provides: ‘The use of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases and all analogous liquids, materials or devices being prohibited, their manufacture and importation are strictly forbidden in Germany.’ The text is available at: <<http://net.lib.byu.edu/~rdh7/wwi/versa/versa4.html>> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶⁵¹ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary Humanitarian Law, I (2009)74.

¹⁶⁵² Cottier and Krivánek, article 8 para. 2(b)(xviii), mn 581 et seq.

Statute¹⁶⁵³. As with the war crime of employing poison or poisonous weapons, the problem was ultimately ‘resolved’ in the Elements of Crimes. The explicit reference to a gas, substance or device that causes ‘death or serious damage to health in the ordinary course of events’ in the second element, means that the use of riot-control agents is typically excluded from the ambit of the war crime of using asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases. Because ‘in the ordinary course of events’ the use of riot-control gases usually does not cause death or serious damage to health. This discussion was not revisited in Kampala. This is somewhat astounding given that it is first and foremost in the context of non-international armed conflicts, i. e. in conflicts in which State armed forces oppose organized armed groups that the distinction of law-enforcement and other military operations is often brought to the fore and where the use of riot-control agents is more likely to occur than in international armed conflicts. The absence of any significant discussion of this matter in Kampala indicates that the compromise that was found during the Rome Conference, as it is now reflected in the Elements of Crimes, i. e. the reference to a substance’s effects in the ordinary course of events, is regarded as a suitable compromise also with respect to non-international armed conflicts. It follows that the use of riot-control agents in the context of a non-international armed conflict typically will not amount to a war crime. Because even in the rare instance that the employment of a riot-control agent leads to death or serious injury, e. g., loss of eyesight in case of the use of tear gas, in order to amount to a war crime in the sense of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xiv), it would still be necessary to show that this occurred ‘in the ordinary course of events’, which it seems will only rather exceptionally be the case.

15. Paragraph 2(e)(xv): Employing bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body

Literature: See article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix). Scheffer, D., ASIL Insights: States Parties approve new crimes for International Criminal Court, 22 June 2010, available at: <<http://www.asil.org/insights/volume/14/issue/16/states-parties-approve-new-crimes-international-criminal-court>> last accessed September 2015.

982 The prohibition of expanding bullets was introduced in 1899 by the Hague Declaration concerning the Prohibition of Using Bullets which Expand or Flatten Easily in the Human Body. The 1899 Declaration in turn was inspired by the 1868 Declaration of St. Petersburg, which aimed to outlaw excessively cruel weapons and constituted a direct reaction to the development of the so-called ‘dum-dum bullet’. The wording of article 8 para. 2 (e) (xv) is drawn from the 1899 Declaration and mutatis mutandis, identical to the wording of article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix), reference to which can accordingly be made¹⁶⁵⁴.

983 It must be noted, however, that some delegations in Kampala were rather reluctant to extend the ICC’s jurisdiction over the crime now contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xv). They argued that the use of such bullets is necessary and particularly useful in certain law enforcement operations. In fact, similar concerns had already been expressed at the Rome conference in relation to article 8 para. 2 (b) (xix)¹⁶⁵⁵. Indeed, the use of certain bullets that have the properties of the bullets described in article 8 para. 2 (e) (xv), in particular semi-jacketed or hollow-tipped bullets, has two operational advantages in certain law enforcement operations¹⁶⁵⁶. First, bullets that expand – unlike the standard military full metal-jacket bullets – tend to remain in the body of the targeted person. This characteristic minimizes the risks for bystanders. Secondly, precisely because all or most of the energy of an expanding bullet is transferred to the body of the targeted person these bullets have considerable so-called ‘man-stopping-power’, which minimizes the risk for law enforcement officials and bystanders. Therefore, these bullets can be of particular utility when confronting an armed

¹⁶⁵³ Ibid., mn 589 et seq.

¹⁶⁵⁴ Cottier and Krivánek, article 8 para. 2(b)(xix), mn 600 et seq.

¹⁶⁵⁵ Ibid., mn 603.

¹⁶⁵⁶ See also Hampson, Study on human rights protection during situations of armed conflict, internal disturbances and tensions, submitted to the Council of Europe, Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH), DH-DEV(2002) 1, para. 32.

person in an urban environment, in a crowd, in hostage rescue operations, at check-points and during house-searches. The ICRC Customary Law Study accordingly acknowledges that expanding bullets are commonly used by the police in law enforcement situations¹⁶⁵⁷.

Against this background, at the Kampala conference some delegations would have preferred to insert an explicit exception regarding the use of expanding bullets for law enforcement purposes into the Elements of Crimes. Ultimately, however, the Elements of Crimes remained unaltered. Nevertheless, the concerns of these delegations about an overly broad criminalization of the use of expanding bullets in non-international armed conflicts found expression in Resolution 5 concerning the Amendments to article 8 of the Rome Statute as it was adopted by the Review Conference on 10 June 2010. 984

First of all, Resolution 5 in its seventh unnumbered preambular paragraph stipulates that the Elements of Crimes ‘...specify that the conduct took place in the context of and was associated with an armed conflict, which consequently confirms the exclusion from the Court’s jurisdiction of law enforcement situations’¹⁶⁵⁸. Indeed, it is possible to conduct concurrent law enforcement operations in the context of an ongoing armed conflict. For example, police operations in response to a theft or bank-robbery without a nexus to a specific armed conflict remain outside the laws of war and are issues of criminal law enforcement irrespective of whether they are carried out in the course of an armed conflict. However, there is a risk that parties to an armed conflict could use the wording in Resolution 5 in order to qualify other operations, i.e. operations that have a nexus to a specific armed conflict, such as for example certain house-searches, check-point controls or similar operations, per se as law enforcement operations in order to circumvent the jurisdiction of the ICC. In this regard it must be noted that the Elements of Crimes do not contain such a sweeping ‘law-enforcement exception’. Rather, what matters according to the fourth element of crime, to which Resolution 5 refers, is the general requirement of whether there is nexus of the conduct in question to the armed conflict or not. 985

Secondly, preambular paragraph 9 of Resolution 5 stipulates that the crime of using expanding bullets is committed ‘only if the perpetrator employs the bullets to uselessly aggravate suffering or the wounding effect upon the target of such bullets, as reflected in customary international law’¹⁶⁵⁹. In this regard, some delegations in Kampala referred explicitly to the ‘specific intent’ to ‘uselessly aggravate suffering or the wounding effect’ in the target¹⁶⁶⁰. Such a ‘specific intent requirement’, however, is incongruous with the established Elements of Crimes. The third element of crime merely requires that the perpetrator ‘was aware that the nature of the bullets was such that their employment would uselessly aggravate suffering or the wounding effect’¹⁶⁶¹. A ‘specific intent requirement’, as opposed to the ‘awareness-requirement’ contained in the Elements of Crimes, would considerably narrow the scope of the crime. 986

It has already rightly been pointed out that a Resolution by the Review Conference does not affect the Elements of Crimes and that the wording of the Resolution should be understood as being consistent with the knowledge element specified in the Elements of Crimes¹⁶⁶². Indeed, Article 21 para. (1) (a) of the Statute establishes a hierarchy of applicable law by providing that ‘[t]he Court shall apply: In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence’. Nevertheless, the problem remains that 987

¹⁶⁵⁷ Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law, I (2009) 77.

¹⁶⁵⁸ Resolution RC/Res.5, 10 June 2010, preambular 7 (emphasis added).

¹⁶⁵⁹ Resolution RC/Res.5, 10 June 2010, preambular 9 (emphasis added).

¹⁶⁶⁰ Scheffer, ASIL Insights: States Parties approve new crimes for International Criminal Court, 22 June 2010, available at: <<http://www.asil.org/insights/volume/14/issue/16/states-parties-approve-new-crimes-international-criminal-court>> last accessed September 2015.

¹⁶⁶¹ Elements of Crimes, third element on article 8 para. 2(e)(xv).

¹⁶⁶² Amnesty International, Public Statement, Comments regarding the language included in the resolution amending article 8 of the Rome Statute, adopted in plenary on 10 June 2010, available at: <http://www.iccnw.org/documents/AI_Public_Statement_on_Weapons_Amendment_20100611_SJ.pdf> last accessed May 2015.

there is agreement that expanding bullets are not prohibited absolutely¹⁶⁶³, that they may lawfully be used in specific law enforcement operations and that in modern, asymmetric armed conflicts the distinction between law enforcement operations and the conduct of hostilities is sometimes blurred. For the purposes of the Rome Statute this means that whenever expanding bullets are used in operations that have a nexus to a specific armed conflict, the decisive issue will be whether the perpetrator ‘was aware that the nature of the bullets was such that their employment would uselessly aggravate suffering or the wounding effect’ in accordance with the third element of crime¹⁶⁶⁴.

VI. Article 8 para. 2 (f): scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (e)

Literature: See above Preliminary Remarks on para. 2 (c)-(f) and para. 3 and Cullen, A., ‘The definition of non-international armed conflict in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: An analysis of the threshold of application contained in article 8 (2) (f)’, (2008) 12 JCSL 419–445; Zimmermann, A., ‘Die Wirksamkeit rechtlicher Hegung militärischer Gewalt – Ausgewählte Aspekte der Anwendbarkeit und Systemkohärenz des humanitären Völkerrechts’, in: id. et Al. (eds.), Moderne Konfliktformen – Humanitäres Völkerrecht und privatrechtliche Formen (2010) 7, 11.

1. Existence of a non-international armed conflict

988 The first part of the first sentence of article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute simply repeats the requirement, already contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) of the Statute, that a non-international armed conflict must exist before the prohibitions contained in article 8 para. 2 (e) become applicable¹⁶⁶⁵. Article 8 para. 2 (f) therefore, like article 8 para. 2 (d), limits the jurisdiction of the Court¹⁶⁶⁶. This is further confirmed by the introduction to the war crimes section of the elements of crimes adopted under article 9 of the Statute. Said introduction specifically provides that ‘[t]he elements for war crimes under article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) are subject to the limitations addressed in article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f), which are not elements of crimes’. Accordingly the Preparatory Commission, when drafting the elements of crimes, did neither discuss the meaning and content of article 8 para. 2 (d) nor (f).

2. Exclusion of situations of internal disturbances and tensions

989 The second part of the first sentence of article 8 para. 2 (f) – parallel to article 8 para. 2 (d) – also excludes situations of internal disturbances and tensions from the scope of application of article 8 para. 2 (e)¹⁶⁶⁷.

3. Armed conflict that takes place in the territory of a State

990 The original Bureau proposal submitted to the Rome Conference¹⁶⁶⁸ had foreseen that the armed conflict, in order for the Court to be able to exercise its jurisdiction, must take place in the territory of a State Party to the Statute of the ICC. If included in that way, the provision might have been interpreted as to exclude the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC over situations of internal armed conflicts for violations of the crimes now listed in article 8 when committed in the territory of a non-State Party even if the Security Council had referred the situation to the ICC by virtue of article 13 (b) of the Statute¹⁶⁶⁹ or where the State concerned had accepted the Court’s jurisdiction under article 12 para. 3 of the Statute.

¹⁶⁶³ Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes (2003) 292..

¹⁶⁶⁴ Cottier and Krivánek, article 8 para. 2(b)(xix), mn 607.

¹⁶⁶⁵ For details see already Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (c), mn 270 et seq.

¹⁶⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 225.

¹⁶⁶⁷ For details see already Zimmermann and Geiß, article 8 para. 2 (d), mn 297 et seq.

¹⁶⁶⁸ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59, introductory paragraph to Section D, second sentence, p. 9.

¹⁶⁶⁹ For details to referrals by the Security Council see Schabas and Pwrella, article 13, mn 16.

As article 8 para. 2 (f) is now phrased, the crimes committed within the context of an internal armed conflict can also be prosecuted by the ICC even if the State in the territory of which the internal armed conflict took place is not a contracting party, provided that either there has been a Security Council referral under article 13 (b) of the Statute¹⁶⁷⁰, the crimes have been committed by a person who possesses the nationality of a contracting party in accordance with article 12 para. 2 (b) of the Statute¹⁶⁷¹, or where the territorial State has accepted the Court's jurisdiction ad hoc on the basis of article 12 para. 3 of the Statute.

4. Existence of protracted armed conflict

It was the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY, which in its decision in the Tadić case¹⁶⁷² first determined that an armed conflict exists when there is 'protracted armed violence ... within a State'¹⁶⁷³. This threshold, the inclusion of which into the Statute was proposed in a slightly modified form by Sierra Leone¹⁶⁷⁴, is significantly lower than the one contained in article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II which requires sustained and concerted military operations and which indeed had still been referred to in the Bureau proposal of 19 July 1998¹⁶⁷⁵.

The term 'protracted' seems to imply a certain time element, which as far as article 1 of Add. Prot. II is concerned, is contained in the term 'sustained'. It has to be noted, however, that unlike in the case of sustained armed violence, the operations need not be kept going continuously by the conflicting Parties. This is confirmed by the French version, which unlike the French version of article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II, does not refer to military actions which can be qualified as being 'opérations continues' but simply to the fact that the armed conflicts between the different parties must take place 'de manière prolongée'. In this regard the Chamber in Lubanga held that the requirement of 'protracted armed conflict' in article 8 para. 2 (f) focuses on the need for the armed groups in question to have the ability to plan and carry out military operations for a prolonged period of time¹⁶⁷⁶. This was confirmed in the Bashir decision where the Chamber also observed that 'to date, control over the territory by the relevant organised armed groups has been a key factor in determining whether they had the ability to carry out military operations for a prolonged period of time'¹⁶⁷⁷.

Nevertheless, it has been clarified that the element of territorial control as such is not a determinative criterion for the establishment of a non-international armed conflict¹⁶⁷⁸. Notwithstanding it may be used – as was the case in the Bashir and Katanga decisions, as ¹⁶⁷⁰ Schabas and Pewrella, article 13, mn 16.

¹⁶⁷¹ See Schabas and Pewrella, article 12, mn 18.

¹⁶⁷² Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70.

¹⁶⁷³ This view was confirmed by the decisions Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 16 November 1998, para. 183 and in Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, para. 59.

¹⁶⁷⁴ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.62.

¹⁶⁷⁵ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59, introductory paragraph to Section D, second sentence, p. 8.

¹⁶⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 234; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 233; Prosecutor v. Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10, Decision on the Confirmation of charges, 16 December 2011, para. 103.

¹⁶⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 4 March 2009, para. 60. See also Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 239 where the Chamber held that the armed groups in question 'had the capacity to plan and carry out sustained and concerted military operations, insofar as they held control of parts of the territory of the Ituri District'.

¹⁶⁷⁸ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 236; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 536.

an indicative criterion. Nevertheless, Chambers of the ICC have pointed out that ‘in addition to the requirement that the violence must be sustained and have reached a certain degree of intensity, article 1.1 of the Additional Protocol II provides that the armed groups must: (i) be under responsible command implying some degree of organisation of the armed groups, capable of planning and carrying out sustained and concerted military operations and imposing discipline in the name of a de facto authority, including the implementation of the Protocol; and (ii) exercise such control over territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations’¹⁶⁷⁹. In this context they have held that the Tadić definition, which requires ‘protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State’ echoes the two criteria of Additional Protocol II, except that the ability to carry out sustained and concerted military operations is no longer linked to territorial control¹⁶⁸⁰. In other words ICC Chambers have linked and assimilated the requirement of protracted armed violence to the threshold contained in article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II¹⁶⁸¹. Thus, in addition to the requirement that armed groups must have a certain degree of organization, ICC Chambers have also referred to the ability to plan and carry out sustained military operations¹⁶⁸². In Katanga the Chamber went further by referring not only to sustained but also to concerted military operations¹⁶⁸³.

995 There has been ample debate whether by virtue of the reference to ‘protracted armed conflict’ article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute sets a higher threshold than article 8 para. 2 (d) or whether a uniform conception of non-international armed conflict applies under the Rome Statute, the separation of article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f) merely being the result of convoluted drafting and diplomatic concessions made during the drafting stages¹⁶⁸⁴. Notably, in the Bemba decision the Chamber explicitly contemplated the possibility of such a uniform interpretation of article 8 para. 2 (d) and (f). It held that the argument could be raised as to whether the requirement of ‘protracted armed conflict’ may nevertheless be applied also in the context of article 8 para. 2 (d) of the Statute. Yet, irrespective of such a ‘possible interpretive approach’, the Chamber did not deem it necessary to decide on the matter in the case at hand given that the period in question covered approximately five months and was therefore to be regarded as protracted in any event¹⁶⁸⁵.

996 Notably, however, in the Bemba decision the Chamber assimilated articles 8 para. 2 (d) and (f) in so far as it held that ‘[e]ven though mention of opposing parties to the conflict is made expressis verbis in article 8(2)(f) of the Statute but not in article 8(2)(d) of the Statute, the Chamber holds that this characteristic element in the context of an armed conflict not of an international character is a well-established principle in the law of armed conflict underlying the 1949 Geneva Conventions to which the Statute refers in article 8(2)(c) and (d) of the Statute [and that] [t]herefore, the Chamber holds that this element also applies to article 8(2)(c) of the Statute’¹⁶⁸⁶.

¹⁶⁷⁹ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 232; Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 4 March 2009, para. 59.

¹⁶⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 233; Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 4 March 2009, para. 59.

¹⁶⁸¹ See Zimmermann, in: id. et. al (eds.), Moderne Konfliktformen (2010) 7, 11.

¹⁶⁸² Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 233; Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 4 March 2009, para. 59.

¹⁶⁸³ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 239.

¹⁶⁸⁴ See only Cullen (2007) 12 JCSL 419–445.

¹⁶⁸⁵ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 235.

¹⁶⁸⁶ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 232.

5. Possible parties to the conflict

By virtue of its article 1 para. 1 Add. Prot. II to the four Geneva Conventions only applies 997 to situations where the armed forces of a Government confront dissident armed forces or where the governmental forces fight against insurgents who are organized in armed groups. Notwithstanding an ICRC proposal to the contrary, Add. Prot. II does not apply to armed conflicts between several armed groups such as in the case of so-called failed States¹⁶⁸⁷. Similarly, the Bureau proposal of 10 July 1998 had also still contained that concept¹⁶⁸⁸.

In contrast thereto, article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute has, also in that regard upon initiative 998 by Sierra Leone¹⁶⁸⁹, taken up the wider Tadić formula¹⁶⁹⁰ and accordingly now covers armed conflicts which occur either between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups¹⁶⁹¹. Thus three situations are covered:

- armed conflicts between governmental authorities and dissident governmental authorities,
- armed conflicts between governmental authorities and organized armed groups and
- armed conflicts between several organized armed groups.

For the purposes of article 8 para. 2 (f) of the Statute, the term ‘governmental authorities’ 999 (‘les autorités du gouvernement’) has replaced the term ‘armed forces’. Given this fact and the broad character of this term, it has to be understood as including not only the regular armed forces of a State, but rather all different kinds of armed personnel provided they participate in the required protracted armed violence, including, where applicable, units of national guards, the police forces, border police or other armed authorities of a similar nature.

The term ‘organized armed groups’ implies some kind of organization, capable of carrying 1000 out protracted armed violence. It is important to note, however, that the Statute, given the experiences of the last twenty years after the adoption of Add. Prot. II deliberately does not require that such armed forces have a responsible command or that they effectively exercise control over part of the territory of a State¹⁶⁹². In other words, it is clear that article 8 para. 2 (f) has not adopted the stricter threshold of article 1 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II. Thus, there might also exist an armed conflict involving guerilla groups acting in small independent operational groups or similar forms of armed groups, provided that there is indeed protracted armed violence on a larger scale which can be characterized as an armed conflict.

E. Article 8 para. 3: Maintenance of law and order by legitimate means Literature: See Preliminary Remarks on article 8 para. 2 (c)-(f) and para. 3, and Baptista, E. C., Jus cogens em direito internacional (1997); Dupuy, R. J. and Leonetti, A., ‘La notion de conflit armé à caractère non-international’, in: A. Cassese (ed.), The New Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (1979) 258; Furet, M.-F., Martinez, J.-C. and Dorandeu, H., La guerre et le droit (1979) 173–175 and 187–188; Hannikainen, L., Peremptory Norms (Jus Cogens) in International Law: Historical Development, Criteria, Present Status (1988); Kasto, J., Jus Cogens and Humanitarian Law (1994); Milanovic, M. and Hadzi-Vidanovic, V., ‘A taxonomy of armed conflict’, in: N. D. White (ed.), Research Handbook on International Conflict and Security Law (2013) 256.

¹⁶⁸⁷ For details see Sandoz et al. Commentary (1987), mn 4461.

¹⁶⁸⁸ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59, introductory paragraph to Section D, second sentence, p. 8.

¹⁶⁸⁹ UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.62.

¹⁶⁹⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 2 October 1995, para. 70.

¹⁶⁹¹ Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, paras. 231, 232; Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest, 4 March 2009, para. 60; Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 September 2008, para. 239; Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 234.

¹⁶⁹² Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 536; Prosecutor v. Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor, 15 June 2009, para. 236.

- 1001 The wording of article 8 para. 3 of the Statute is taken from article 3 para. 1 of Add. Prot. II. The first part of that last provision which provides that ‘nothing in this Protocol [i. e. Add. Prot. II] shall be invoked for the purpose of affecting the sovereignty of a State’ was however not retained since that might have undermined the whole idea of the ICC as such. It is noteworthy that while the Preparatory Commission drafting the elements of crimes under article 9 of the Statute specifically provided in the introduction to the elements on war crimes that both article 8 para. 2 (d) and article 8 para. 2 (f) limit the jurisdiction of the Court, no reference is made to article 8 para. 3 in the text of the elements of crimes as such nor in its introduction.
- 1002 It has to be further noted that the addition of a provision which – somewhat in line with the idea contained in article 3 para. 2 of Add. Prot. II – would have excluded the jurisdiction of the Court where an external party had interfered in the conflict¹⁶⁹³ as indeed proposed during the drafting of the Statute, was not included in the text of the Statute.
- 1003 The fact that article 8 para. 3 of the Statute refers to the responsibility of a Government to maintain or re-establish law and order, as compared to Add. Prot. II, which refers to the responsibility of the Government, is to be considered a pure technical change which does not alter the substance of the provision. In practice therefore, article 8 para. 3 of the Statute might, if ever, only legitimize actions taken on behalf of the respective Government of the State in which the internal armed conflict is taking place and its armed forces, but not actions by members of armed forces of a third State, or action taken by insurgents or non-governmental armed groups. Accordingly, the first question the Court would have to ask itself in a given case is whether an accused who is relying on article 8 para. 3 of the Statute, was indeed acting on behalf of the legitimate Government of the State concerned.
- 1004 Of course, it may at times be disputed who the respective Government is at a given time. In particular, difficulties in the application of article 8 para. 3 may arise where, in the course of a non-international armed conflict, States begin to recognize the rebel forces as the new legitimate Government of a country and where a change of the Government is at issue. With respect to article 8 para. 3 of the Statute, the question is raised up until which point in time an accused may claim to have acted on behalf of the old government and from when on an accused could claim having acted on behalf of the new government. Of course, recognition respectively de-recognition, which in any case may take different forms¹⁶⁹⁴, by individual States can hardly be decisive as to whether an accused may rely on article 8 para. 3 of the Statute. For the sake of legal certainty in the realm of article 8 para. 3 of the Statute, a change in the Government should only be assumed once the aspirant Government has gained widespread control over the country and where it has been widely recognized¹⁶⁹⁵.
- 1005 The Statute of the ICC provides that a person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment. Thus, a provision like article 8 para. 3 of the Statute, which refers to the powers and responsibilities of the organs of a State seems at first glance to be misplaced in the Statute. Still, it has to be noted that whenever a Government is taking an action which is legitimate under article 8 para. 3 of the Statute, any participation therein can ipso facto not give rise to individual criminal responsibility. Accordingly article 8 para. 3 of the Statute would have been better placed in article 21¹⁶⁹⁶.
- 1006 The fact that article 8 para. 3 of the Statute only refers to action which is undertaken to maintain or re-establish law and order in the State or to defend the unity and territorial integrity of the State clarifies that action undertaken for other purposes, i. e. for example to pursue a genocidal policy, can never be justified. Thus, one might say, that article 8 para. 3 of the Statute not only excludes illegitimate means but also the pursuance of illegitimate goals.

¹⁶⁹³ The proposal contained in UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.74 was submitted by Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam.

¹⁶⁹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁶⁹⁵ Milanović and Hadzi-Vidanovic, in: White and Henderson (ed.), Handbook (2013) 256.

¹⁶⁹⁶ For details see McAuliffe deGuzman, article 21.

The most crucial part of the provision under consideration are the last words which underline that only ‘legitimate means’ might be used to maintain or re-establish law and order in the State or to defend the unity and territorial integrity of the State. If the State’s authority had been totally reserved in that regard, the part of the Statute on internal armed conflict would have run the risk to be almost completely deprived of its very substance and meaning¹⁶⁹⁷. 1007

The reference to ‘legitimate means’ in a way therefore refers back to the list of war crimes contained in article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) of the Statute, since any act which would run counter to one of the specific prohibitions contained therein cannot be considered legitimate. Otherwise these specific prohibitions would themselves have become pure shells. Accordingly, even reasons of state security might not be invoked in order to justify the commission of any of the war crimes listed in article 8 para. 2 (c) and (e) of the Statute¹⁶⁹⁸. 1008

This interpretation of para. 3 is further confirmed by the fact that at least the content of common article 3 is by now considered to constitute a peremptory norm of general customary international law¹⁶⁹⁹, derogation of which is not allowed by virtue of article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. 1009

¹⁶⁹⁷ See for a parallel proposition with regard to article 3 para. 1 Add. Prot. II, Sandoz et al. (eds.), Commentary (1987) mn 4501.

¹⁶⁹⁸ Ibid.

¹⁶⁹⁹ See for even more far-reaching propositions Hannikainen, Peremptory Norms (1988) 620–621; Kasto, Jus Cogens (1994) 50–51 and Baptista, Jus Cogens (1997) 464 and 474.

Article 8bis Crime of aggression

1. For the purpose of this Statute, 'crime of aggression' means the planning, preparation, initiation or execution, by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State, of an act of aggression which, by its character, gravity and scale, constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

2. For the purpose of paragraph 1, 'act of aggression' means the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations. Any of the following acts, regardless of a declaration of war, shall, in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, qualify as an act of aggression:

- (a) The invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State, or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack, or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof;
- (b) Bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State or the use of any weapons by a State against the territory of another State;
- (c) The blockade of the ports or coasts of a State by the armed forces of another State;
- (d) An attack by the armed forces of a State on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State;
- (e) The use of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State, in contravention of the conditions provided for in the agreement or any extension of their presence in such territory beyond the termination of the agreement;
- (f) The action of a State in allowing its territory, which it has placed at the disposal of another State, to be used by that other State for perpetrating an act of aggression against a third State;
- (g) The sending by or on behalf of a State of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above, or its substantial involvement therein.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'The Crime of Aggression after Kampala', (2010) 53 GYbIL 463; Anggadi, F., French, G. and Potter, J., 'Negotiating the Elements of the crime of aggression', in: S. Barriga. and C. Krefß(eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (CUP 2012) 58; Barriga, S., 'Negotiating the Amendments on the crime of aggression', in: S. Barriga and C. Krefß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (CUP 2012) 3; Barriga, S. and Grover, L., 'A Historic Breakthrough on the Crime of Aggression', (2011) 105 AJIL 517; Bertram-Nothnagel, J. F., 'A Seed for World Peace Planted in Africa: The Provisions on the Crime of Aggression Adopted at the Kampala Review Conference for the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2010) 2 African Legal Aid Quarterly 9; Blokker, N. and Krefß, C., 'A Consensus Agreement on the Crime of Aggression: Impressions from Kampala', (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 889; von Braun, L. and Micus, A., 'Judicial Independence at Risk: Critical Issues regarding the Crime of Aggression Raised by Selected Human Rights Organizations', (2012) 10 IJCJ 111; Broms, B., 'The Definition of Aggression', (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299; Bruha, T., Die Definition der Aggression (Duncker & Humblot 1980); Cassese, A., 'On Some Problematical Aspects of the Crime of Aggression', (2007) 20 LeidenJIL 841; Cherif Bassiouni, M. and Ferencz, B., 'The Crime Against Peace and Aggression: From its Origins to the ICC', in: M. Cherif Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, I (Martinus Nijhoff 3rd edition 2008); Clark, R. S., 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International, Criminal Court Considered at the First Review Conference on the Court, Kampala, 31 May-11 June 2010', (2010) 2 GoJIL 689; Clark, R.S., 'The Crime of Aggression', in: C. Stahn., and G. Sluiter(eds.), The emerging practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 709; Creegan, E., 'Justified Uses of Force and the Crime of Aggression', (2012) 10 IJCJ 59; Dinstein, Y., 'The Distinction Between War Crimes and Crimes Against Peace', (1994) 24 IsYbHumRts 1; Dinstein, Y., War, Aggression and Self-Defence (CUP, 5th edition, 2011); Ferencz, B., Defining International Aggression: The Search for World Peace (Oceana 1975); Ferencz, D. M., 'The Crime of Aggression: Some Personal Reflections on Kampala', (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 905; Gaja, G., 'The Long Journey Towards Repressing Aggression', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, I (OUP 2002) 427; Glaser, S., 'Quelques remarques sur la définition de l'aggression en droit international pénal', in: S. Hohenleitner, L. Lindner and F. Nowakowski(eds.), Festschrift Rittler (Scientia 1957) 383; Glueck, S., The Nuremberg Trial and Aggressive War (Knopf 1946); Gray, C., International Law and the Use of Force (OUP, 2nd edition, 2004); Griffiths, R. L., 'International Law, the Crime of Aggression and the Ius Ad Bellum', (2002) 2 ICLRev 301; Heller, K. J., 'Retreat from Nuremberg: the Leadership Requirement in the Crime of Aggression', (2007) 18 EJIL 477; Heller, K. J., 'The Uncertain Legal Status of the Aggression Understandings', (2012) 10 JICJ 229; Heinsch, C. R., 'The Crime of Aggression after Kampala: Success or Burden for the Future?', (2010) 2 GoJIL 713; Hummrich, M., Der völkerrechtliche Straftatbestand der Aggression (Nomos 2001); Kaul, H.-P., 'Is It Possible to Prevent or Punish Future Aggressive War-making?', (2011) FICHL Occasional Paper Series 1; Kemp, G., Individual Criminal Liability for the International Crime of Aggression (Intersentia 2010); Krefß, C., 'The Crime of Aggression Before the First Review Conference', (2007) 20 LeidenJIL 851; Krefß, C., 'Time for Decision: Some Thoughts on the Immediate Future of the Crime of Aggression: A Reply to Andreas Paulus', (2009) 20 EJIL 1129; Krefß, C., Barriga, S., Grover, L. and von Holtzendorff, L., 'Negotiating the Understandings on the crime of aggression', in: S. Barriga, and C. Krefß, (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (CUP 2012) 81; Krefß, C. and von Holtzendorff, L., 'The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression', (2010) 8 JICJ 1179; McDougall, C., The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2013); Mancini, M., 'A Brand New Definition for the Crime of Aggression: The Kampala Outcome', (2012) 81 NordJIL. 227; Manson, R., 'Identifying the Rough Edges of the Kampala Compromise', (2010) 21 CLF 417; May, L., Aggression and Crimes Against Peace (CUP 2008); Milanovic, M., 'Aggression and Legality: Custom in Kampala', (2012) 10 JICJ 165; Müller-Schieke, I. K., 'Defining the Crime of Aggression Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2001) 14 LeidenJIL 409; Murphy, S. D., 'Aggression, Legitimacy and the International Criminal Court', (2009) 20 EJIL 1147; O'Connell, M. E. and Niyazmatov, M., 'What is Aggression? Comparing the Jus ad Bellum and the ICC', (2012) 10 JICJ 189; Paulus, A., 'Second Thoughts on the Crime of Aggression', (2009) 20 EJIL 1117; Politi, M., 'The ICC and the Crime of Aggression: A Dream that Came Trough and the Reality Ahead', (2012) 10 JICJ 267; Randelzhofer, A. and Dörr, O., 'Article 2 (4)', in: B. Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (OUP, 3rd ed., 2012) 200; Randelzhofer, A. and Nolte, G., 'Article 51', in: B. Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (OUP, 3rd ed., 2012) 1397; Reisinger Coracini, A., 'Evaluating Domestic Legislation on the Customary Crime of Aggression Under the Rome Statute's Complementarity Regime', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter(eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 727; Reisinger Coracini, A., 'The International Criminal Court's Exercise of Jurisdiction over the Crime of Aggression – at Last ... in Reach ... over Some', (2010) 2 GoJIL 745; Rosenfeld, F., 'Individual Civil Responsibility for the Crime of Aggression', (2012) 10 JICJ 249; Sayapin, S., The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (Springer 2014); von Schaack, B., 'Negotiating at the Interface between Law and Politics: The Crime of Aggression', (2011) 49 ColJTransnatL., 505; von Schaack, B., 'Par in Parem Imperium Non Habet: Complementarity and the Crime of Aggression', (2012) 10 JICJ 133; von Schaack, B., 'The Aggression Amendments: points of Consensus and Dissension', in American Society of International Law (ed.), Proceedings of the 105th Annual Meeting, (2012) ASIL 154; Schabas, W. A., 'Origins of the Criminalization of Aggression: How Crimes Against Peace Became the "Supreme International Crime"', in: M. Politiani G. Nesi(eds.), The International Criminal Court and the Crime of Aggression (Ashgate 2004) 17; Scharf, M. P., 'Universal Jurisdiction and the Crime of Aggression', (2012) 53 HarvILJ 357; Scheffer, D., 'The Complex Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute', (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 897; Schmalenbach, K., 'Das Verbrechen der Aggression vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof: Ein politischer Erfolg mit rechtlichen Untiefen', (2010) 65 JZ 745; Sellars, K., 'Delegitimizing Aggression, First Steps and False Starts after the First World War', (2012) 10 JICJ 7; Sellars, K., Crimes Against Peace' and International Law (CUP 2013); Solera, O., Defining the Crime of Aggression (Cameron May 2007); Stone, J., 'Hopes and Loopholes in the 1974 Definition of Aggression', (1977) 71 AJIL 224; Trahan, J., 'A Meaningful Definition of the Crime of Aggression', (2012) 33 PennJIL. 101; Trahan, J., 'Is Complementarity The Right Approach For The International Criminal Court's Crime of Aggression? Considering the Problem of "Overzealous" National Court Prosecutions', (2012) 45 CornJIL 569; Trahan, J., 'The Rome Statute's Amendment on the Crime of Aggression: Negotiations at the Kampala Review Conference', (2011) 11 ICLRev 49; Ventura, M. and Gillett, M., 'The Fog of War: Prosecuting Illegal Uses of Force as Crimes Against Humanity', (2013) 12 WashUGlobalStudRev. 523; Weigend, T., 'In general a principle of justice: The Debate on the 'Crime against Peace' in the Wake of the Nuremberg Judgement', (2012) 10 JICJ 41; Weisboard, N., 'Judging Aggression', (2011) 50 ColJ.TransnatL. 82; Wenaweser, C., 'Reaching the Kampala Compromise on Aggression: The Chair's Perspective', (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 883; Werle, G., 'The Crime of Aggression between International and Domestic Criminal Law', in: S. Manacorda and A. Nieto Martín (eds.), Criminal Law between War and Peace (Cuenca 2009) 405; Wills, A. G., 'The Crime of Aggression and the Resort to Force against Entities in Statu Nascendi', (2012) 10 JICJ 83; Zimmermann, A., 'Amending the Amendment Provisions of the Rome Statute: The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression and the Law of Treaties', (2012) 10 JICJ 209; Zimmermann, A., 'The Creation of a Permanent International Criminal Court', (1998) MPyBUNL 169; Zourek, J., 'Enfin une définition de l'agression', (1974) 20 AFDI 9.

See also the literature on articles 5, 15bis and 15ter.

Content

A. Introduction.....	1
B. Drafting history of article 8bis	3
C. Relationship of article 8bis with other provisions of the Statute	6
I. Article 5 para. 2	6
II. Article 10	7
III. Articles 15bis and 15ter	9
IV. Article 20 para. 3	10
V. Article 25 para. 3bis	12
VI. Article 31 para. 1 lit. c)	13
D. Article 8bis para. 1	14
I. 'For the purpose of this Statute (...)'	14
II. '(...) 'crime of aggression' (...)'	17
III. '(...) means the planning, preparation, initiation or execution (...)'	21
1. '(...) planning (...)'	23
2. '(...) preparation (...)'	28
3. '(...) initiation or execution (...)'	31
IV. '(...) by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State (...)'	33
1. General issues	33
2. '(...) by a person (...)'	35
3. '(...) in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action (...)'	36
4. '(...) of a State (...)'	43
V. '(...) of an act of aggression (...)'	45
VI. '(...) which, by its character, gravity and scale constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.'	46
1. '(...) constitutes a (...) violation of the Charter of the United Nations'...	46
2. '(...) by its character, gravity and scale constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.'	50
a) General questions	50
b) '(...) by its character (...)'	61
c) '(...) gravity (...)'	62
d) '(...) and scale (...)'	63
e) '(...) constitutes a manifest violation (...)'	65
aa) General questions	65
bb) Contentious cases of 'manifest' violations of the Charter of the United Nations	69
aaa) Preventive and pre-emptive self-defense	70
bbb) Self-defense against non-State actors	74
ccc) Humanitarian intervention/Responsibility to Protect	77
ddd) Implicit authorizations by the Security Council and 'revitalization' of previous Security Council authorizations ...	80
eee) Intervention upon invitation	82
fff) Rescue of nationals abroad	85
E. Article 8bis para. 2	87
I. General questions	87
II. Chapeau	88
1. 'For the purpose of paragraph 1 (...)'	88
2. '(...) 'act of aggression' (...)'	89
3. '(...) means the use of armed force (...)'	90
4. '(...) by a State (...)'	91
5. '(...) against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.'	94
6. 'Any of the following acts (...) in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974 (...)'	99
7. '(...) regardless of a declaration of war (...)'	104
8. '(...) shall (...) qualify as an act of aggression?'	106
III. Article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – g)	107
1. Lit. a): invasion, attack, military occupation or annexation	107
a) General issues	107
b) '(...) invasion (...)'	108
c) '(...) or attack (...)'	109
d) '(...) by the armed forces of a State (...)'	111

e) ‘(...) of the territory of another State (...)’	113
f) ‘(...) or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack (...)’	115
g) ‘(...) or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof (...)’	121
2. Lit. b): bombardment or use of weapons	123
a) ‘Bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State (...)’	123
b) ‘(...) or the use of any weapons by a State against the territory of another State’	126
3. Lit. c): blockade	128
4. Lit. d): attack on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State	132
5. Lit. e): violation of stationing agreements and unlawful extension of presence	136
a) General issues	136
b) Violations of stationing agreements	137
c) Unlawful extension of presence	139
6. Lit. f): allowing one’s territory to be used for an act of aggression	140
7. Lit. g): sending of irregular forces	144
a) General issues	144
b) ‘The sending by or on behalf of a State (...)’	145
c) ‘(...) of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries (...)’	150
d) ‘(...) which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above (...)’	154
e) ‘(...) or its substantial involvement therein.’	155
8. Other forms of aggression not listed	157
F. Article 8bis and the exercise of domestic jurisdiction over the crime of aggression	159

A. Introduction

Article 8bis consists of three parts. Article 8bis para. 1 defines the ‘crime of aggression’,¹ consisting of an ‘act of aggression’ which, ‘by its character, gravity and scale, constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations’. Article 8bis para. 2 then defines such an ‘act of aggression’² by largely referring to the wording of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974 (hereinafter: GA Resolution 3314 [‘Definition of Aggression’])². The chapeau of article 8bis para. 2 accordingly sets out the notion of an ‘act of aggression’ in a generic manner, while article 8bis para. 2 lit. a)–g) then lists specific types of such acts of aggression. Finally, article 8bis para. 1 also defines the various modalities of the crime of aggression, as well as circumscribes who might commit any such crime of aggression.

Under the Kampala amendment, the first sentence of article 9 para. 1 now also provides that Elements of Crimes under article 9, as adopted by the contracting parties at Kampala, shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application of article 8bis, too. The respective elements of crimes relating to article 8bis have been adopted as Annex II of Resolution RC/Res. 6, and have accordingly been incorporated into the overall elements of crimes without any specific issues arising as to their legal relevance and impact on the interpretation of the statutory provision concerned, i. e. article 8bis³.

¹ Also see Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 482, who differentiates between the ‘micro level’ of the individual crime (para. 1) and the ‘macro level’ of the collective State act of aggression (para. 2).

² UN Doc A/RES/29/3314 (XXIX) (14 December 1974), Annex: Definition of Aggression.

³ See generally on the normative relevance and impact of the elements of crimes adopted under article 9 Godirov and Clark, article 9, passim.

B. Drafting history of article 8bis

- 3 While the drafting history of article 8bis prior to the Kampala Review Conference is discussed above⁴, it is worth noting that the main debates concerning the crime of aggression that took place during the said conference focused on the conditions for the Court's exercise of its jurisdiction when it comes to the crime of aggression. In particular, the Kampala negotiations focused on the respective role of the Security Council.
- 4 Somewhat in contrast thereto no changes occurred during the Kampala Review Conference vis-à-vis the substance of the definition of the crime of aggression, which was adopted verbatim as already contained in the proposal by the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression (SWGCA)⁵.
- 5 While the Kampala Review Conference did not bring along discussions on the definition of aggression itself or on the Elements of Crimes (of which a complete draft text was already existent⁶), the President's First Paper reflected progress on the drafting of the two Understandings related to the substance of the crime of aggression, namely Understandings no. 6 and 7, which aim to further define the content and substance of the crime⁷.

C. Relationship of article 8bis with other provisions of the Statute

I. Article 5 para. 2

- 6 With the entry into force of the amendment on the crime of aggression in accordance with para. 1 of the enabling Resolution RC/Res.6, article 5 para. 2 of the Statute lost its relevance. From the moment defined in article 15bis/ter paras. 2 and 3 onwards, the Court will furthermore be able, in accordance with article 5 para. 1, to exercise its jurisdiction with regard to the crime of aggression, subject to the temporal limitations laid down in article 15bis/ter para. 2.

II. Article 10

- 7 Understanding no. 4, as adopted by the Kampala Review Conference with regard to the amendment on the crime of aggression, which ought to be taken into account as an additional tool of interpretation within the meaning of article 31 para. 2 lit. b) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties⁸, provides that article 8bis defining the crime of aggression (and accordingly also the underlying acts of aggression) ought to have no bearing on general international law. It provides:

‘It is understood that the amendments that address the definition of the act of aggression and the crime of aggression do so for the purpose of this Statute only. The amendments shall, in accordance with article 10 of the Rome Statute, not be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.’

⁴ Zimmermann, article 5, mn 30 et seq.

⁵ ICC- ASP/8/Res. 6, 26 November 2009.

⁶ Anggadi, French and Potter, in: Barriga and Krefß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 58, 59.

⁷ President's First Paper, 10 June 2010, in: Barriga and Krefß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 774. For the drafting process of the Understandings, also see Krefß, Barriga, Grover and von Holtendorff, in: Barriga and Krefß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 81, 91 et seq. For details on the respective Understandings and their drafting details, see mn 38.

⁸ 1155 UNTS 331.

Said understanding thus not only contains an explicit reference to article 10 of the Rome Statute, but mirrors article 10, reference to which can therefore be made⁹. Indeed given that article 8bis, containing the definition of the crime of aggression, was inserted into Part 2 of the Rome Statute, Understanding no. 4 is redundant since the very same effect is already reached by article 10, which specifically refers to the interpretation of ‘this part’ i. e. Part 2.

III. Articles 15bis and 15ter

While article 8bis contains the substantive definition of the crime of aggression, articles 15bis and 15ter contain the requirements for the Court to exercise its treaty-based jurisdiction (article 15bis) respectively its jurisdiction to be exercised on the basis of a Security Council referral (article 15ter).

IV. Article 20 para. 3

Para. 7 of the enabling resolution adopted at the Kampala Review Conference (Resolution RC/Res.6) provides that the chapeau of article 20 para. 3, as revised, will also refer to persons who have been tried by another court for conduct also ‘proscribed under Article (...) 8bis.’ They shall accordingly, as a matter of principle and subject to the bona fide character of the domestic proceedings as defined in article 20 para. 3, not be tried by the Court with respect to the same conduct. This is true notwithstanding the adoption of Understanding no. 5 of the ‘Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression’, which inter alia provides that ‘the amendments [on the crime of aggression] shall not be interpreted as creating the (...) obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State’. While it has been claimed that this Understanding aims at discouraging States from proceeding with domestic cases for the commission of the crime of aggression, the inclusion of a reference to article 8bis into the text of article 20 para. 3 confirms, if there was need, that the principle of complementarity fully applies also when it comes to the crime of aggression. At the same time, the sole legal effect of any possible lack of genuine domestic proceedings under the principle of complementarity is that the ICC could then exercise its jurisdiction; yet, to state the obvious, this does not amount to any form of legal obligation to prosecute any possible crime of aggression.

Given the fundamental distinction between jus ad bellum and jus in bello rules, it is however only domestic proceedings addressing violations of the jus ad bellum amounting to a crime of aggression that can bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction with regard to article 8bis.

V. Article 25 para. 3bis

In line with article 8bis para. 1 according to which the crime of aggression may only be committed by ‘a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State’, article 25 para. 3bis provides that, while the various forms of perpetration, as well as aiding and abetting, as foreseen in article 25 para. 3, also apply with regard to the crime of aggression, any person to be eventually held criminally responsible with regard to the said crime by the Court must have been in a position required by both article 8bis para. 1 and article 25 para. 3bis.

⁹ See Triffterer/Heinze, article 10, passim, in particular mn 13.

VI. Article 31 para. 1 lit. c)

- 13 Article 31 para. 1 lit. c) refers to the notion of self-defense as a possible ground excluding criminal responsibility under the Statute under specific narrow circumstances. Yet, this reference is only made so as to exclude criminal responsibility with regard to certain specific acts. Said provision does not however, by the same token, also address the issue of inter-State self-defense under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations¹⁰ respectively under the applicable rule of customary international law. Moreover, to the extent military force is being used within the limits of article 51 of the Charter respectively customary international law, such action does not amount to a violation of the Charter of the United Nations at all, and even less a manifest violation thereof which, therefore, ipso facto, excludes such action to even constitute an act of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2.

D. Article 8bis para. 1

I. ‘For the purpose of this Statute (...)’

- 14 The introductory words of article 8bis para. 1, ‘[f]or the purpose of this Statute’ are identical to the very same formula used in articles 6, 7 and 8 para. 2 respectively. The phrase confirms, in line with article 10¹¹, that the definition of the crime of aggression, just like the definition of genocide under article 6, of crimes against humanity under article 7, or finally of war crimes under article 8, is meant to be only relevant for the purpose of the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction.
- 15 The drafters of the Kampala amendment found it appropriate and necessary, however, to further confirm this as part of the enabling Resolution RC/Res.6, which in its Annex III contains ‘Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression’. Understanding no. 4 accordingly provides:

‘It is understood that the amendments that address the definition of the act of aggression and the crime of aggression do so for the purpose of this Statute only. The amendments shall, in accordance with article 10 of the Rome Statute, not be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.’

- 16 This does not prejudice, as indeed article 10 confirms, however, that the definition of the crime of aggression, when compared with articles 6, 7 and 8, is even more closely interrelated with customary international law generally, and the Charter of the United Nations in particular, than those other provisions, and might thus influence the further development of general international law beyond the parameters of international criminal law, the saving clause in the chapeau of article 8bis para. 1 notwithstanding.

II. ‘(...) ‘crime of aggression’ (...)’

- 17 Article 8bis is centered around the term of the ‘crime of aggression’ instead of referring to a ‘war of aggression’, the latter terminology having been used in both, the statutes of the two post-World War II International Military Tribunals¹², as well as in article 5 of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’). Indeed, while the latter distinguished between ‘aggression’

¹⁰ 1 UNTS 16.

¹¹ See generally on article 10, Triffterer/Heinze, in this volume, in particular, mn 2.

¹² Article 6 lit. a) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (1950) 1 Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, xi; article 5 lit. a) of the Charter of the

as such (giving rise to international responsibility only¹³) and a ‘war of aggression’ (only the latter amounting to a ‘crime against international peace’ under the terms of the aforesaid resolution¹⁴), article 8bis instead chooses another approach by using the terms ‘act of aggression’ as defined in para. 2 (committed by a State) and the ‘crime of aggression’ as defined in para. 1 (committed by an individual). Article 8bis thus avoids any reference to the loaded notion of a ‘war of aggression’.

Article 8bis para. 1 provides that certain ‘acts of aggression’, namely those which due to their character, gravity and scale, constitute manifest violations of the Charter of the United Nations, entail individual criminal responsibility under the Court’s statute. Article 8bis thereby confirms the idea that certain qualified violations of the prohibition of the use of force and thus the jus ad bellum, just like serious violations of the jus in bello, as well as acts of genocide and crimes against humanity, do not only entail State responsibility, but also carry with them individual criminal sanctions under international law.

This approach, at least as a matter of principle, stands in line with both, article 6 lit. a) of the Statute of the International Military Tribunal and with article 5 lit. a) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, under which the ‘planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a war of aggression, or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances’, respectively the ‘planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a declared or undeclared war of aggression, or a war in violation of international law, treaties, agreements or assurances’, constituted a crime against peace. This approach had then been followed in article 5 para. 2 of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) according to which a ‘war of aggression’ was said to constitute a crime against international peace. Finally, it had been the ILC which incorporated in its 1996 Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind the crime of aggression.¹⁵

The concept of individual criminal responsibility for the crime of aggression is also mirrored in State practice, since a significant, although not yet overwhelming number of States have, albeit with variations, incorporated the crime of aggression into their respective domestic law or are in the process of doing so¹⁶. What is more is that recent domestic court decisions¹⁷ have also confirmed the customary law character of the individual criminal responsibility for the crime of aggression arising under international law.

III. ‘(...) means the planning, preparation, initiation or execution (...)’

The phrase ‘(...) planning, preparation, initiation or execution (...)’ is, mainly for obvious historical reasons, largely identical to the formula used in both, article 6 lit. a) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg and in article 5 lit. a) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, except that in the English version of article 8bis para. 1 the term ‘waging of a war’ was replaced by the term ‘execution’, which is due to the fact that the term ‘war of aggression’ was replaced by the word ‘act of aggression’. This seems to constitute, however, a mere linguistic change rather than a change entailing a difference in substance, even more so since the French version had retained the term ‘l’exécution d’un acte d’agression’. In the equally authentic French versions of the two texts there are however further differences when one compares the Nuremberg and Tokyo formula with the current wording. More specifically, the phrase ‘la direction, la préparation, le déclenchement ou la poursuite’ (of a war of aggression) was

International Military Tribunal for the Far East, in: Boister and Cryer (eds.), Documents on the Tokyo International Military Tribunal, Charter, Indictment and Judgments (2008) 8.

¹³ See article 5 para. 2, 2nd sentence of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’).

¹⁴ See article 5 para. 2, 1st sentence of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’).

¹⁵ International Law Commission, ILC Yearbook 1996, ii (part ii), 15, 42.

¹⁶ As to the current status of States having incorporated the crime of aggression into their domestic law see <http://crimeofaggression.info/documents//1/Status_Report-ENG.pdf> last accessed September 2015, 6 et seq.

¹⁷ See e.g. the decision of the House of Lords, R v. Jones et al. (2006) 45 ILM 992.

replaced by the ‘planification, la préparation, le lancement ou l’exécution’ of an act of aggression. These changes were not all strictly necessitated by the above-mentioned change in terminology of a ‘war of aggression’ (as used in both, the Nuremberg and the Tokyo statutes) versus the ‘act of aggression’ terminology, as used in the Kampala amendment to the Rome Statute.

- 22 Any proposition that the first three forms of conduct, as contained in article 8bis, namely the planning, preparation or initiation of an act of aggression are identical as far as their substance is concerned, would make the three terms largely redundant. They thus have to be understood as comprising different, albeit similar, forms of committing the crime of aggression as defined in article 8bis para. 1. Accordingly, the mere participation in a single one of the four alternative stages of committing the crime already entails criminal responsibility, provided however that the act of aggression has eventually been committed in the first place¹⁸.

1. ‘(...) planning (...)’

- 23 At first glance, the use of the term ‘planning’ (‘la planification’ in French) might imply that even the mere preparation of plans for a future act of aggression, provided such act of aggression were to reach the threshold provided for in article 8bis para. 1, could already amount to the commission of the crime of aggression, even if the aggression as such were then not to take place. Such a far-reaching understanding of the notion of ‘planning’ would have been in line with the fact that under article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations already the threat of the use of force does amount to a violation of international law generally, and the Charter of the United Nations in particular¹⁹. Yet, the third of the Elements of Crimes concerning article 8bis, adopted simultaneously in Kampala with the amendment proper, confirms that the respective act of aggression must indeed have been committed. It specifically provides:

‘The act of aggression – the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations – was committed.’²⁰

- 24 Accordingly, the act of aggression must have actually taken place so as to render the planning thereof a crime under international law entailing individual criminal responsibility. This deliberate limitation to exclude mere attempts of aggression from the scope of application of article 8bis, which must be taken at face value, stands in line with customary international law, given that all relevant precedents only considered acts of aggression that had actually taken place to eventually constitute a crime of aggression²¹. Article 25 para. 3 lit. f), providing for criminal responsibility in case of attempt, does not contradict this requirement that the actual act of aggression must have taken place since the term ‘attempt’, as used in article 25 para. 3 lit. f), applies to the individual act of participation in a given crime (of aggression as it were) rather than to the act of aggression committed by a State, which act has to be completed²². A 2005 SWGCA discussion paper mentioned two (albeit one might say rather academic) examples of such attempts to commit the crime of aggression: first, when a high-level State official begins to participate in a meeting aimed at preparing an act of aggression, before being prevented from taking part in the actual ¹⁸ See mn 15 as to the requirement that the act of aggression has indeed taken place.

¹⁹ Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 42–43; Stürchler, The Threat of Force in International Law (2009).

²⁰ See RC/Res.6, Annex II, Amendments to the Elements of Crimes for Article 8bis, Elements, para. 3, which reads:

‘The act of aggression – the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations – was committed.’

²¹ ICC–ASP/4/32, Annex II.B, 380.

²² Mancini (2012) 81 NordJIL 227, 242.

decision-making; and second, when a high-ranking military officer is close to giving an important order in the course of the execution of the use of force, but is prevented from completing the act of ordering²³.

In line with an interpretation of article 8bis in conformity with customary international law, the term ‘planning’ does not cover the general consideration of political plans to eventually, at a later stage only, commit an act of aggression. Rather, it is only the participation in the development of specific (military or other) plans and operations of the State concerned with the commitment of a specific act of aggression that ought to fall within the meaning of the term ‘planning’, in order not to excessively extend the scope of application ratione temporis of the crime.

Such a narrow interpretation is confirmed by the French (but also the Spanish) text of article 8bis para. 1, which, unlike the Nuremberg and Tokyo precedents, does not use the term ‘direction’ anymore. Yet, this term would have already excluded any such temporal extension, while the French term ‘planification’ (and ‘planifica’ in the Spanish text), as now used in the context of article 8bis, even more strongly confirms that the notion of ‘planning’ solely refers to the ability of the perpetrator to direct the aggression by way of drawing up ‘a design or scheme’²⁴ for the aggression that is then being committed.

This limited understanding of the notion of ‘planning’ is further confirmed by the context of article 8bis in that the group of possible offenders is defined as those persons able ‘to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State’. This limitation of the scope ratione personae of the crime underlines that it is only concrete and specific actions constituting (qualified) violations of the prohibition of the use of force (rather than mere threats of force) that are being criminalized, but not acts which do not yet amount to such violations.

2. ‘(...) preparation (...)’

Similar considerations do apply, mutatis mutandis, to the notion of ‘preparation’: only those offenders that fulfill the leadership criteria laid down in article 8bis and then participate (within the meaning of article 25) in an act of aggression, be it only in its very initial stages, i. e. when the aggression is still only being prepared, but not yet implemented, commit the crime of aggression, provided the further criteria of article 8bis are also fulfilled.

In contrast to the ‘planning’ of an act of aggression, the ‘preparation’ of such an act refers to the taking of concrete steps to implement the plan²⁵. Inter alia, such preparation may consist, depending on which specific alternative of article 8bis para. 2 is being committed by the State concerned, e. g. in the transport of weaponry or other military material to be used for the act of aggression, in the actual deployment of troops to the vicinity of a border to start hostilities, or in acts of a similar nature that will, when seen from an outside perspective, form part and parcel of the forthcoming actual violation of the prohibition of the use of force.

In that regard one has to, in particular, take note of the decision of the ICJ in the Nicaragua case, according to which ‘in international law there are no rules, other than such rules as may be accepted by the State concerned, by treaty or otherwise, whereby the level of armaments of a sovereign State can be limited’²⁶. Hence, the participation by a person exercising control of a State in the military build-up of a given State is, in and of itself, legal under international law, and may thus a fortiori neither be considered to entail individual criminal responsibility under the heading of ‘preparation’ of the crime of aggression even if, later on, an act of aggression is being committed by that very State.

²³ ICC-ASP/2/10, Annex II., as summarized in: Barriga and Krefß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 471, 480.

²⁴ Greenspan, The Modern Law of Land Warfare (1959) 455.

²⁵ Greenspan, The Modern Law of Land Warfare (1959) 455.

²⁶ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 135, para. 269.

3. ‘(...) initiation or execution (...)’

- 31 The ‘initiation’ of an act of aggression describes the very commencement of the use of armed force, as defined in article 8bis para. 2. Given that various of the alternative acts of aggression as defined in article 8bis para. 2 (such as a naval blockade²⁷ or the mere extension of the presence of armed forces in foreign territory beyond the termination of a stationing agreement²⁸) do not require the actual start of hostilities²⁹, the question when exactly the respective ‘act of aggression’ is being initiated depends on which form of such an act of aggression is being considered.
- 32 Finally, the term ‘execution’ covers all subsequent acts of actually carrying out and performing acts of aggression, following the initiation of such acts, as described above³⁰.

IV. ‘(...) by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State (...)’

1. General issues

- 33 The crime of aggression can be committed only by leaders of the State, to which the underlying act of aggression is attributable. Without this limiting criterion, every individual soldier of the armed forces having contributed to the hostilities would otherwise, as a matter of principle, have to face trial. Article 8bis thus constitutes the only one of the four crimes, for which the Court has substance-matter jurisdiction under article 5 of the Rome Statute, which limits the range of potential perpetrators of such a crime. This pays tribute to the different nature of the crime of aggression, which, in contrast to the Statute’s other crimes listed in article 5, is not focused on the protection of individuals or on the protection of a given protected group, but rather on the protection of a State from the use of armed force by another State³¹ and thereby by the same token also aims at the protection of the international legal system with the prohibition of the use of force at its core.
- 34 Already article II para. 2 lit. f) of Law No. 10 of 20 December 1945 by the Control Council for Germany³² considered a ‘high political, civil or military (including General Staff) position [...] or [a] high position in the financial, industrial or economic life’ a prerequisite in order to fall within the group of possible offenders when it comes to crimes against peace. In the same vein in 1950, the ILC concluded that only ‘high-ranking military personnel and high State officials’ could be capable of waging a war of aggression³³. Accordingly, the consent that also for purposes of the Court’s Statute, the crime of aggression ought to remain a leadership crime became established early in the drafting process for what is now article 8bis, namely in the 2002 Coordinator’s Paper of the Preparatory Committee’s Ninth Session³⁴.

²⁷ See mn 128.

²⁸ See mn 139.

²⁹ But see Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence (5th edition 2011) 141.

³⁰ See mn 31.

³¹ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 722; also see Dinstein (1994) 24 IsYbHumRts. 1, 4 et seq.

³² Control Council Law No. 10 (1950) 1 Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, xvi.

³³ International Law Commission, Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nuernberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, with commentaries, ILC Yearbook 1950, ii, 376, para. 117.

³⁴ PCNICC/2002/WGCA/RT.1, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 398: ‘For the purpose of this Statute, a crime of aggression means an act committed by a person who, being in a position to exercise control over or direct the political or military action of a State [...]’ In the Coordinator’s paper of the tenth session of the Preparatory Committee, the word ‘effectively’ has been added to the definition, PCNICC/2002/WGCA/RT.1/Rev.1, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 412: ‘[...] being in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State [...]’.

2. ‘(...) by a person (...)’

The use of the term ‘by a person’³⁵ in article 8bis para. 1 exercising control over or directing the political or military action of a State does not indicate that only one person can be responsible of the crime of aggression. As a matter of fact, footnote 1 attached to the second Element of Crimes adopted concerning the crime of aggression and related to the leadership requirement confirms in unequivocal terms that ‘[w]ith respect to an act of aggression, more than one person may be in a position that meets these criteria of exercising such degree of control’³⁶. This stands in line with the judgment of the United States Military Tribunal which, in the High Command case, stressed that even in a dictatorship, more than one individual can bear responsibility for the planning, preparation, initiation or the execution of an act of aggression³⁷.

3. ‘(...) in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action (...)’

In practice, the group of people exercising sufficient control over or directing the political or military action of a State, in order to be covered by the leadership requirement as set out in article 8bis para. 1, encompasses at the very least heads of States and governments, as well as ministers of defense and other military leaders such as high-level generals³⁸. Given the wording of the provision which refers to the ability to effectively exercise or direct the action of the State from which the act of aggression emanates, it is the factual capability to exercise such control or direction that is decisive, rather than the formal rank, de jure position or title of the person concerned³⁹. Accordingly, also mere de facto heads of States or government or de facto commanders of armed forces of a State, who are in a position of effective control of their respective State, are subject to the Court’s aggression-related substance-matter jurisdiction.

At the same time, heads of State exercising merely ceremonial functions, but not being able, neither de jure nor de facto, to participate in the decision-making process which leads to the alleged act of aggression contemplated in article 8bis para. 2, are not capable of committing the crime of aggression within the meaning of the Court’s Statute.

In order to possibly commit the crime of aggression, a person concerned must either have alternatively been able to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of the State in question. While the ‘to direct’ limb of the phrase hints more at a positive action taken by the person concerned, the ‘to control’ limb seems to indicate that the crime of aggression might also be committed by way of supervision, provided the person concerned could thereby exercise effective influence on the course of action leading to the act of aggression.

Within the framework of the SWGCA, it was considerably debated whether industrialists who are closely involved with the State’s actions should be covered by this provision. The post-1945 Nuremberg trials against high-ranking German industrialists demonstrated the potential of industrialists’ involvement in the crime of aggression. As a matter of fact, article II para. 2 lit. f) of Control Council Law No. 10 of 1945 included persons as possible indictees ³⁵ Emphasis added.

³⁶ RC/Res.6, Annex II, Amendments to the Elements of Crimes for Article 8bis, Elements, para. 2, fn. 1, emphasis added.

³⁷ High Command case (United States of America v. Wilhelm von Leeb et al.) (1950) 12 Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council Law No. 10, 462, 486: ‘No matter how absolute his authority, Hitler alone could not formulate a policy of aggressive war and alone implement that policy by preparing, planning and waging such a war’.

³⁸ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 722.

³⁹ UN Doc PCNICC/2002/WGCA/L.1/Add.1 (18 January 2002), Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Historical Review of Developments relating to Aggression, Addendum, 32, referring to the Nuremberg trials; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (3rd edition 2014) 542.

of crimes against peace, who ‘held high position in the financial, industrial or economic life’ of Germany, one of its Allies, co-belligerents or satellites. In the trial of the major war criminals, Gustav Krupp, the head of the Krupp AG, was indicted inter alia for participation in the Nazi conspiracy to commit crimes against peace and its eventual commission⁴⁰. The final judgment stressed that business men cooperated in Hitler’s aggressive war and made themselves parties to his plan⁴¹. Though in the subsequent I.G. Farben and Krupp cases, all defendants were acquitted of charges with regard to crimes against peace due to a lack of evidence, the respective tribunals stated that this should not be interpreted as excluding respective responsibility in general⁴². In the High Command and in the Ministries cases, the tribunals adopted a ‘shape or influence’ criterion, relying on whether the defendants had had the power to shape or influence the State’s policy⁴³. In the Roehling case, the leader of the coal and metal business Roehling was convicted of having encouraged and contributed to the preparation and conduct of aggressive wars⁴⁴.

- 40 However, a SWGCA proposal to use language closer to that of the Nuremberg decisions, namely the ‘shape and influence’ formula instead of the ‘exercise control over or to direct’ formula was rejected, which might be perceived as a legitimate decision, given that in democracies the ‘shape and influence’ criterion might affect an excessively large range of individuals⁴⁵. On the other side, the actual terms of article 8bis para. 1 do not per se exclude economic (or religious, or revolutionary) leaders from criminal responsibility, as long as their position allows them to exercise control over or to direct a State’s political or military action⁴⁶.
- 41 It is further sufficient that any possible indictee has exercised control over or directed either the political or the military action of the State concerned. In the former case, i. e. in the case of a political direction or control, there must however be a link between such a political role on the one hand, and the military action giving rise to the indictment relating to the crime of aggression on the other.
- 42 Finally, the term ‘political or military action’ ought to be understood in light of the overall object and purpose of the provision. Accordingly, it is only the control or direction of ‘political or military action’ that leads to an act of aggression that is relevant in order to determine whether a person can have possibly committed the crime of aggression.

4. ‘(...) of a State (...)’

- 43 It is only persons that direct the actions of a State that are suitable offenders under article 8bis para. 1. Article 8bis para. 1 thus reiterates the inter-state character of the crime of aggression, as laid down in the chapeau of article 8bis para. 2 with its double statehood requirement (‘by a State’/‘against (...) another State’)⁴⁷.

⁴⁰ Before being considered medically unfit for trial, (1947) 1 Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, 27, 42, 75.

⁴¹ Judgment, (1948) 22 Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal 424 et seq., 468.

⁴² Farben case (United States of America v. Krauch et al.) (1952) 8 Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, 1081, 1125 et seq.; Krupp case (United States of America v. Krupp et al.) (1950) 9 Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, 390, 393; also see Heller (2007) 18 EJIL 477, 483 et seq.

⁴³ High Command case (United States of America v. Wilhelm von Leeb et al.) (1950) 12 Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council Law No. 10, 462, 489; Ministries case (United States v. von Weizsäcker et al.) (1952) 14 Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council Law No. 10, 314, 425.

⁴⁴ Roehling case (Military Government of the French Zone of Occupation in Germany v. Roehling et al.) (1952) 14 Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, 1075, 1095. Later on, the conviction was reversed by the Superior Military Government Court of the French Zone of Occupation in Germany.

⁴⁵ Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 490.

⁴⁶ Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 490; Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 723; Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 260; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (3rd edition 2014) 550.

⁴⁷ See mn 91 et seq.

Since the text of article 8bis para. 1 refers to ‘a’ State (rather than to ‘his or her State’), 44 there is no requirement that the offender possesses the nationality of the State from which the underlying act of aggression would then emanate. As a matter of fact, there have been situations in the past where a ruler of State A (also) controlled the political or military action of State B, leading State B to then commit an act of aggression.

V. ‘(...) of an act of aggression (...)’

Given that article 8bis para. 2 contains an explicit definition of what is meant by the term 45 ‘act of aggression’, as used in article 8bis para. 1⁴⁸, the (anyhow limited) practice of the Security Council under article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations, which uses the same terminology of ‘act of aggression’ is only relevant in that it sheds light on the meaning of the various terms used in article 8bis para. 2.

VI. ‘(...) which, by its character, gravity and scale constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.’

1. ‘(...) constitutes a (...) violation of the Charter of the United Nations’

In order to eventually constitute a crime of aggression, the underlying act of aggression 46 must, first and foremost, constitute a violation of the Charter. According to article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations⁴⁹, all Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations. The Charter itself knows two exceptions to this provision, namely either an authorization by the Security Council to use force under Chapter VII (possibly combined with Chapter VIII in case of military action by a regional organization or arrangement) or the right of self-defense under article 51 of the Charter (the Charter’s enemy State clauses in articles 53 and 107 having become obsolete⁵⁰).

Unlike article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations, which in its last part refers to 47 the use of force ‘inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations’⁵¹, article 8bis simply refers to (aggravated) uses of force in (manifest) ‘violation of the Charter’. It is however generally acknowledged that for purposes of the Charter prohibition of the use of force, such acts are lawful not only in those cases that are explicitly specified in the Charter itself as exceptions to article 2 para. 4, but also in scenarios universally recognized under customary international law as accordingly not amounting to a violation of the Charter⁵². Given that article 8bis para. 1 in turn refers back to the question as to whether a given use of force constitutes a violation of the Charter, exceptions to the prohibition of the use of force, as recognized in customary international law, are also relevant when it comes to make a finding on the crime of aggression as set out in article 8bis.

In line with article 2 para. 4 of the Charter, which is addressed to all members of the 48 organization, article 8bis para. 1 refers to violations of the Charter of the United Nations (rather than violations of customary law), which as a matter of fundamental rules of treaty

⁴⁸ See mn 88 et seq.

⁴⁹ 15 UNCTAD 335.

⁵⁰ As to the possibility of deleting the enemy state clauses from the Charter as part of an overall reform see UN Docs. A/RES/50/52 (11 December 1995), para. 3; A/RES/60/1 (16 September 2005), para. 177, as well as Eitel, in: Varwick and Zimmermann (eds.), Die Reform der Vereinten Nationen – Bilanz und Perspektiven (2006) 315.

⁵¹ As to this notion see Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 37 et seq.

⁵² Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 38.

law only applies to its contracting parties. In the unlikely (but not completely academic⁵³) event that individuals being nationals of a State, which is not a member of the United Nations, but nevertheless bound by the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression, are responsible for the use of armed force, the question arises whether such acts may then possibly amount to ‘violations of the Charter’ despite the fact that the State concerned is not bound by the Charter as such. Yet, an interpretation of article 8bis in light of its object and purpose seems to indicate that what is meant by article 8bis are not (manifest) violations of the Charter of the United Nations per se, but rather (also) violations of the substantive parallel customary law prohibition on the use of force⁵⁴ as enshrined in the Charter, also being binding upon non-member States by virtue of customary law.

- 49 As confirmed by no. 2 of the introduction to the Elements of Crimes relevant for article 8bis, as adopted in Kampala, ‘[t]here is no requirement to prove that the perpetrator has made a legal evaluation as to whether the use of armed force was inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.’

2. ‘(...) by its character, gravity and scale constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.’

- 50 a) General questions. In contrast to the rather broad definition of aggression, as contained in the GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) for the purposes of State responsibility, and so as to eventually provide guidance to the Security Council when making a determination under article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations, which does not require any aggressive intent and, besides contains, as will be shown below, a broad list of possible acts of aggression⁵⁵, article 8bis limits criminal accountability to severe acts by using a threshold that can be found neither in the Charter of the United Nations, nor in GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’). This threshold clause captures the ‘qualitative difference’ between an act of aggression and the individual *crime*⁵⁶.
- 51 This part of article 8bis para. 1 has accordingly been criticized for providing a carte blanche for all uses of armed force that do not yet amount to a certain scale⁵⁷, thereby eventually leading to a weakening of the general prohibition of the use of force, as contained in article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations and in customary international law, at least when it comes to the use of military force below the threshold now laid down in article 8bis. On the other hand, a comparison with the regime of international humanitarian law, where during the last 20 years a line of jurisprudence involving only serious violations of international humanitarian law has evolved, indicates that the prosecution of merely such grave violations can nevertheless strengthen the overall obedience towards the general rule (even if not all violations of international humanitarian law were falling within the jurisdiction of the various international criminal courts and tribunals)⁵⁸.
- 52 As the drafting history indicates, the said restriction of manifest violations of the Charter of the United Nations was inserted in order ‘to exclude some borderline cases’⁵⁹ of the use of

⁵³ See e.g. the situation of Palestine having become a contracting party of the Rome Statute without being at the same time a member of the United Nations, and possibly also became bound by the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression under the principle codified in article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of treaties, given that Palestine acceded to the Rome Statute after the Kampala amendment had already entered into force; as to the various ways to become bound by the aggression-related amendments see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 13–14.

⁵⁴ As to this questions, i.e. the identity in content of the treaty-based prohibition of the use of force and the respective customary law prohibition see Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 93 et seq., paras. 174 et seq.

⁵⁵ See mn 107 et seq.

⁵⁶ Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 199.

⁵⁷ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 726; Paulus (2009) 20 EJIL 1117, 1122.

⁵⁸ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 731; also see Öberg (2009) 873 RevRC 163.

⁵⁹ Informal inter-sessional meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression, Assembly of State Parties, 5th session 2006, ICCASP/5/SWGCA/INF.1 (5 September 2006), para. 19; emphasis added.

force, which, while amounting to a violation of article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations, did not warrant to be considered a crime of aggression. More specifically, the threshold clause is meant to serve a twofold purpose:

For one the formula was meant to exclude ‘(...) minor border skirmishes and other small-scale incidents’⁶⁰ from the scope of application of article 8bis. This was meant to take into account the judgment of the ICJ in the Nicaragua case (as confirmed by both the Court itself in the Oil Platforms case, and by the Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission). In the former case, the Court had observed for one that it is ‘necessary to distinguish the most grave forms of the use of force (those constituting an armed attack) from other less grave forms’⁶¹. It also found that in considering whether a given operation amounts to an armed attack, ‘its scale and effects’ have to be taken into account⁶². By the same token the Court had further found that ‘a mere frontier incident’ does not yet amount to an armed attack⁶³, while the Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission even went further when stating that ‘[l]ocalized border encounters between small infantry units, even those involving the loss of life, do not constitute an armed attack for purposes of the Charter [of the United Nations]’⁶⁴. Accordingly, it was argued that a somewhat more limited use of military force, while prohibited under article 2 para. 4 of the Charter, should even less constitute a crime of aggression.

At the same time the restriction was also inserted so as to exclude from its scope of application acts whose illegal character would be debatable rather than manifest⁶⁵.

The need for this restriction was however seriously debated in the SWGCA. In the end the opponents of any such limitation agreed in return for the removal of other restrictions. It is against this background that the requirement of a ‘war of aggression’ was deleted from former drafts, and that any limitations to the list of potential acts of aggression (as defined in GA Resolution 3314 [‘Definition of Aggression’]) were rejected. Instead, article 8bis now contains the criterion that any act of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 must also by its character, gravity and scale constitute a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

This narrow concept was confirmed in Understandings no. 6 and 7 annexed to RC/Res. 6 (2010), which provide:

‘6. It is understood that aggression is the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force; and that a determination whether an act of aggression has been committed requires consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, including the gravity of the acts concerned and their consequences, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.’

respectively

‘7. It is understood that in establishing whether an act of aggression constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, the three components of character, gravity and scale must be sufficient to justify a ‘manifest’ determination. No one component can be significant enough to satisfy the manifest standard by itself.’

Understanding no. 6, just like article 8bis para. 2 itself, draws largely on language forming part of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’). In line with preambular paragraph 5 of the annex to the said resolution, which contains the definition of aggression, Understanding no. 6 perceives aggression as ‘the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use ⁶⁰ Barriga, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 3, 29.

⁶¹ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 101, para. 191; see also Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA), ICJ Rep. 2003, 161, 187, para. 51.

⁶² Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 103, para. 195.

⁶³ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 103, para. 195.

⁶⁴ Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission, Jus ad Bellum (Partial Award, Ethiopia’s Claims 1–8, 19 December 2005), (2009) 135 ILR 479, para. 11.

⁶⁵ Barriga, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 3, 29.

of force’, without however thereby adding much (if anything) to the actual definition contained in article 8bis itself, given that the very text of article 8bis even requires a manifest violation of international law.

57 What is more is that Understanding no. 6, almost (though not completely verbatim) echoing article 2 of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’), ‘requires consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, including the gravity of the acts concerned and their consequences, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations’. While article 2 of the GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) was meant to acknowledge the prerogatives of the Security Council in making (or not making) a determination of aggression, as contemplated in article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations⁶⁶, this part of Understanding no. 6 in turn is addressed to the organs of the Court when making determinations as to whether an act of aggression has been committed. In doing so, the gravity of the acts concerned and their consequences, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, have to be then taken into account. It is thus somewhat striking that under the Kampala formula, the gravity of the relevant act serves a twofold purpose: under Understanding no. 6 it contributes to determine whether (in line with GA Resolution 3314 [‘Definition of Aggression’]) even an act of aggression has taken place. Once this first threshold is fulfilled, any such act (accordingly thereby amounting to an act of aggression) must then be judged upon once again inter alia in light of its gravity in order to determine whether it amounts to a manifest violation of the Charter and thus constitutes a crime of aggression. It is however somewhat difficult to see what different factors could then be taken into account in order to determine the gravity of such an act when it comes to this second layer of gravity. What is more is that Understanding no. 6 refers to the gravity of the relevant act and its consequences, while article 8bis para. 1 simply refers to the gravity as such. This seems to imply that for purposes of the second step, i.e. the process of determining a manifest violation of the Charter, and thus potentially a crime of aggression, the consequences of the act ought not to be further taken into account. This is due to the fact, that such consequences seem to not ipso jure form part of the concept of ‘gravity’, as confirmed by the wording of Understanding no. 6 where, as shown, the notion of ‘gravity’ and the ‘consequences’ of an act are put side by side.

58 Article 8bis para. 1 mentions three specific criteria to determine whether an act of aggression constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, namely the character, gravity and scale of such an act. Understanding no. 7 then further attempts to clarify the relationship between the three factors of character, gravity and scale.

For one, by referring in the plural to the fact that the three components of character, gravity and scale must be sufficient (‘doivent être suffisamment importants’ in the French version), to justify a ‘manifest’ determination, it seems to provide that all of those three components must be fulfilled to the degree necessary⁶⁷. On the other hand, the wording of the last sentence of Understanding no. 7, which refers to the fact that ‘[n]o one component can be significant enough to satisfy the manifest standard by itself leaves in the blur whether all three components – character, gravity and scale – must be fulfilled⁶⁸, or whether the fulfillment of two of them would be sufficient. During the drafting process of what was to become Understanding no. 7, a consensus on this issue was hard to reach. Notably, in particular the United States, despite of not even being a State party of the Statute and thus not being subject to the Court’s jurisdiction under article 15bis para. 5⁶⁹, favored a cumula-

⁶⁶ Article 2 of the Definition of Aggression reads: ‘The first use of armed force by a State in contravention of the Charter shall constitute prima facie evidence of an act of aggression although the Security Council may, in conformity with the Charter, conclude that a determination that an act of aggression has been committed would not be justified in the light of other relevant circumstances, including the fact that the acts concerned or their consequences are not of sufficient gravity.’

⁶⁷ Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (3rd edition 2014) 549.

⁶⁸ Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 484.

⁶⁹ Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 34 et seq.

tive approach, thereby arguably per se excluding humanitarian interventions from the scope of application of article 8bis, given the alleged humanitarian character of such military operations⁷⁰. Not least the Iranian delegation argued in turn that the fulfillment of two of these three criteria ought to be sufficient; however, the final compromise as proposed by Canada and the United States was adopted without opposition⁷¹.

The final wording of what is now Understanding no. 7 constitutes a compromise, which, however, does not necessarily solve the issue. On the one hand, the second sentence of Understanding no. 7, and in particular the phrase ‘No one component (...) by itself’ could be read as a support for a strict interpretation of the manifest standard, i. e. one under which the fulfillment of only two of the three elements would suffice for an act of aggression to amount to a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations. 59

On the other hand, an interpretation of article 8bis para. 1 as such in line with its very wording, as required by article 31 para. 1 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, militates in favor of a cumulative requirement, since article 8bis para. 1 uses the conjunctive ‘and’ instead of an ‘or’ (‘by its character, gravity and scale’). Likewise, the first sentence of Understanding no. 7 refers to ‘the three components of character, gravity and scale’⁷² which ‘must be sufficient’. While this part of Understanding no. 7 is not fully conclusive, given that it could be also read as meaning that apart from those three components there is no need for further criteria to be also fulfilled, it seems that the last sentence of Understanding no. 7 at least requires that two of the components are fulfilled. Such interpretation, i. e. that one component is not sufficient, while a fulfilment of all the three of them is not required either, would also be in line with the character of Understanding no. 7 as a compromise formula. Such result can also be understood as being compatible with the very wording of article 8bis para. 1 (‘character, gravity and scale’), since the ‘and’ contained therein could very well be understood as not necessarily requiring that all three components of ‘character and gravity and scale’ are fulfilled at the same time. 60

b) ‘(...) by its character (...)’. The term ‘character’ refers, as confirmed by the French wording (‘par sa nature’), to the nature of the act of aggression to be possibly qualified as a crime of aggression. Given the drafting history of article 8bis para. 1, this is to be understood as referring to the (actual) subjective motivation of the persons responsible for the use of force, i. e. whether they rather aim at occupying or annexing foreign territory or whether instead they, for example, aim at protecting fundamental human rights of a given population⁷³. 61

c) ‘(...) gravity (...)’. The terms ‘gravity’ and ‘scale’ are intertwined and somewhat hard to distinguish. Yet, given that it cannot be assumed that the text contains redundant wording, one might say that the gravity requirement relates more to the seriousness or significance of the use of force, i. e. constitutes more of a qualitative criterion, while the scale is more a quantitative criterion. This is confirmed, once again, by the French and Spanish texts of article 8bis para. 1, in which the terms ‘gravité’/‘gravedad’ versus ‘ampleur’/‘escala’ make this distinction clearer. Accordingly, the notion of ‘gravity’ involves a determination as to the nature of the means used. To give but one example, it thus seems easier to assume that the invasion or bombardment of a foreign country, contemplated in article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) and b) respectively can, by their very nature, more easily fulfill the criterion of gravity, than, for example, a mere violation of a stationing agreement, provided for in article 8bis para. 2 lit. e). 62

In determining the gravity of an act of aggression, the amount of damage caused to the attacked state ought to also be taken into account. In this regard, it has to be noted, however, that for purposes of article 8bis it is irrelevant whether such damages by the same token did

⁷⁰ See mn 54.

⁷¹ Kreß, Barriga, Grover and von Holtendorff, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 81, 96 et seq.

⁷² Emphasis added.

⁷³ See also mn 77.

(or did not) amount to a violation of applicable rules of jus in bello (and possibly even war crimes within the meaning of article 8). This is due to the fundamental distinction of jus ad bellum and jus in bello, only the former being regulated by article 8bis.

- 63 d) ‘(...) and scale (...)’. As previously mentioned⁷⁴, the notion of ‘scale’ (‘ampleur’ in French/‘escala’ in Spanish) refers to the level or magnitude of the alleged act of aggression. In order to evaluate such ‘scale’, one has to take into account the use of armed force ratione loci and ratione temporis. Put otherwise, the more widespread and the longer such force is being employed, the easier it is to make a positive finding as to the required scale of the military operation, so as to constitute a crime of aggression.
- 64 It is worth noting, however, that only those parts of the military operation that by the same token run counter to the prohibition of the use of force might be taken into account. Thus, for example, a military use of force justified under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations might constitute an illegal use of force to the extent to which the alleged acts of self-defense are no longer proportionate, e.g. because they extend far beyond the actual armed confrontation and threat⁷⁵. In the same vein, what might constitute, like in the case of the attack of the United States against Iraq in 2003, an act of aggression, can later turn into an occupation in line with international law, once the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, provides for a legal basis for such an occupation.⁷⁶
- 65 e) ‘(...) constitutes a manifest violation (...)’. aa) General questions. According to the Amendments to the Elements of Crimes relating to article 8bis adopted in Kampala, ‘[t]he term ‘manifest’ is an objective qualification’⁷⁷, which is thus independent from subjective opinions⁷⁸ as to the legality or illegality of the respective military operation or indeed, as to its character as a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations. As a matter of course, as again the Elements of Crimes relating to article 8bis confirm, there is neither a ‘requirement to prove that the perpetrator has made a legal evaluation as to the ‘manifest’ nature of the violation of the Charter of the United Nations.’⁷⁹ The perpetrator must have been aware, however, as again confirmed by the Elements of Crimes relating to article 8bis, ‘of the factual circumstances that established that such a use of armed force was inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations’, and, besides, he must have also been aware of the further ‘factual circumstances that established such a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations’⁸⁰.
- The very same considerations would then accordingly also apply mutatis mutandis to the various components constituting the manifest character of the violation of the Charter of the United Nations, namely the factual elements determining the character, the gravity, and the scale of the act of aggression.
- 66 In practice, the Court might have difficulties assessing whether a given act of aggression constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations. As a court of international criminal law, some consider its legitimacy to rule on questions of *jus ad bellum as doubtful⁸¹, especially concerning ‘grey area’ cases. An excessive use of its respective authority might provide States with a further reason to criticize the Court⁸². On the other ⁷⁴ See mn 62.

⁷⁵ See e.g. the example of the taking of an airport several hundred kilometers away from the actual front given by the ICJ, Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 223, para. 147.

⁷⁶ UN Doc. S/RES/1483 (22 May 2003).

⁷⁷ RC/Res.6, Annex II, Amendments to the Elements of Crimes for Article 8bis, Introduction, para. 3.

⁷⁸ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 727.

⁷⁹ See RC/Res.6, Annex II, Amendments to the Elements of Crimes for Article 8bis, Elements, Introduction, para. 4.

⁸⁰ RC/Res.6, Annex II, Amendments to the Elements of Crimes for Article 8bis, Elements, paras. 4, 6; see also further Pigaroff and Robinson, article 30, passim.

⁸¹ McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 158; Fife, in: Bergsmo (ed.), Human Rights and Criminal Justice for the Downtrodden: Essays in Honour of Asbjorn Eide (2003) 53, 73; Kreß (2007) 20 LeidenJIL 851, 859.

⁸² McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013), 163.

hand, the long and tedious process of including the crime of aggression into the Rome Statute indicates that, eventually, the State parties must have been very aware of the responsibility and competence they were thereby referring to the ICC.

At the same time, the requirement of a ‘manifest’ violation might lead to a situation in which in almost all relevant cases justifications for an illegal use of force might be adduced that are, while being wrong on substance, not that far-fetched so as to enable the State concerned, as well as the alleged offenders, to at least make a plausible claim that the said use of force was not ‘manifestly’ illegal⁸³, which involves the risk of making article 8bis de facto not only jurisdiction-wise (given the Court’s limited scope of jurisdiction under article 15bis⁸⁴) but also substance-wise, largely a lettre morte or, at best, symbolic in nature.

The broad notion of ‘manifest’ violations of the prohibition of the use of force and the ensuing ‘grey areas’ when it comes to contentious cases of the use of force has to be also seen in light of the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege certa and in light of article 22 para. 2, which provides that ‘[t]he definition of a crime shall be strictly construed, (...) shall not be extended by analogy’, and that ‘[i]n case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favor of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted’⁸⁵. That provision will prove its particular relevance with regard to criminal responsibility arising from the above-mentioned grey areas of the use of force. In such instances, the Court will then have to take into account not only the case law of the ICJ, but also relevant State practice (as well as the practice of the political organs of the United Nations) concerning previous, somewhat similar situations of the use of force⁸⁶.

bb) Contentious cases of ‘manifest’ violations of the Charter of the United Nations. While there is no fixed ‘canon’ of scenarios where the issue will most likely arise, whether a given military action will amount to a violation of the Charter of the United Nations, let alone a ‘manifest’ one, issues of preventive/pre-emptive self-defense, self-defense against non-state actors operating from the territory of another State, humanitarian intervention, implicit authorizations and revitalization of previous Security Council resolutions, interventions upon invitation, as well as the rescue of one State’s own nationals abroad will be among the most likely scenarios in which the issue of whether such uses of forces amount to a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations will arise.

aaa) Preventive and pre-emptive self-defense. Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations provides that nothing in the Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense, if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. This definition has, ever since its incorporation into the Charter, given rise to a number of controversies.

For one, while the ICJ (and following its jurisprudence also the Ethiopian-Eritrean Claims Commission)⁸⁷ has held that the term of armed attack is narrower than the scope of article 2 para. 4⁸⁸, only the gravest forms of the use of force constituting armed attacks⁸⁹, the matter has remained somewhat controversial⁹⁰. This raises the question whether an armed response to a use of force, which is short of an armed attack within the meaning of the jurisprudence of the ICJ would then not only be unlawful under the Charter, but rather also manifestly unlawful within the meaning of article 8bis para. 1.

⁸³ See for such proposition Paulus (2009) 20 EJIL 1117, 1122 et seq.

⁸⁴ For details see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, passim, in particular mn 4 and 5.

⁸⁵ For details as to article 22, see Broomhall, in this volume.

⁸⁶ Schmalenbach (2010) JZ 745, 747.

⁸⁷ See already mn 53.

⁸⁸ Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 6.

⁸⁹ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 101, para. 191; Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA), ICJ Rep. 2003, 161, 186, para. 51.

⁹⁰ Wilmshurst (2006) 55 ICL 963.

- 71 If an armed attack occurs, the exercise of the right of self-defense must be both, necessary and proportionate⁹¹. However, surpassing the threshold of necessity and proportionality will not automatically lead to a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.
- 72 Finally, article 51 does not expressis verbis refer to a right of anticipatory self-defense. However, it is widely accepted that States have a right of anticipatory self-defense against an imminent attack⁹² under customary law, as the customary right of self-defense exists alongside the Charter of the United Nations⁹³, provided there is ‘a necessity of self-defense, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation’ as set out in the famous *Caroline formula*⁹⁴. Such instances of preventive self-defense involving the use of armed force would then not amount to a violation of the Charter, let alone a manifest one.
- 73 In contrast thereto, instances of alleged ‘pre-emptive’ self-defense against a possible attack which is said to occur in the farer future, as alluded to in the United States National Security Strategy of 2002, which stipulated that the right of pre-emptive self-defense which would be legal ‘even if uncertainty remains as to the time and place of the enemy’s attack’⁹⁵, would not only amount to a violation of the Charter as such, but also to a manifest one. This assumption is supported by the unequivocal reaction by the international community to Israel’s bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor Osirak in 1981⁹⁶, and to the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003⁹⁷. At the very least, as of today, the ICJ has clarified in its judgment in the Armed Activities case between the DRC and Uganda that ‘Article 51 of the Charter may justify a use of force in self-defence only within the strict confines there laid down’ and that ‘[i]t does not allow the use of force by a State to protect perceived security interests beyond these parameters’ given that ‘[o]ther means are available to a concerned State, including, in particular, recourse to the Security Council’⁹⁸. Given this unequivocal 2005 statement by the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, it stands to reason that any future instance of such alleged ‘pre-emptive’ self-defense would amount to a ‘manifest’ violation of the Charter of the United Nations.
- 74 bbb) Self-defense against non-State actors. Self-defense against non-State actors, namely terrorist groups, operating from the territory of another State, remains a matter of dispute. For purposes of article 8bis, this raises the question whether the use of military force against such groups, when taking place in a third State (the ‘target State’), constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter.
- If the target State itself can be held responsible for the acts carried out by such groups under the regular rules of State responsibility, and further provided such terrorist acts are comparable to acts of regular armed forces, the right to self-defense would be triggered⁹⁹. This would then in turn not only exclude a manifest violation of the Charter, but any such violation tout court.
- 75 Were this however not the case, i. e. in situations in which the acts of the non-state actor are not attributable to a State, the ICJ in its Advisory Opinion on the Construction of a Wall case found that the inherent right of self-defense only applies ‘in the case of armed attack by one State against another State’¹⁰⁰. This approach has however been challenged not only ⁹¹ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 94, para. 176; Oil Platforms, (Iran v. USA), ICJ Rep. 2003, 161, 198, para. 76; Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, Advisory Opinion, ICJ Rep. 1996, 226, 245, para. 41.

⁹² Bowett (1972) 66 AJIL 1, 4.

⁹³ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 94, para. 176.

⁹⁴ (1857) 29 BFSP 1126, 1138.

⁹⁵ <<http://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/nsc/nss/2002/nss5.html>> last accessed September 2015.

⁹⁶ UN Doc S/RES/487 (19 June 1981); Sifris (2003) 4 MelbJIL 521, 537.

⁹⁷ Also see mn 80.

⁹⁸ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 223, para. 148.

⁹⁹ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 823.

¹⁰⁰ Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Advisory Opinion, ICJ Rep. 2004, 136, 194, para. 139, emphasis added.

by the practice of the Security Council when adopting Resolution 1368 one day after the terrorist attacks of 9/11 in which it referred to ‘the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with the Charter’¹⁰¹. This was affirmed by Resolution 1373, as the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, adopted several measures on international terrorism, obliging all states to ‘[t]ake the necessary steps to prevent the commission of terrorist acts’¹⁰². What is more is that the ICJ in its Armed Activities case between the DRC and Uganda left it deliberately open whether attacks emanating from non-State actors may trigger the right of self-defence¹⁰³. Yet, there is at least some amount of State practice indicating that large-scale terrorist attacks, especially when originating from the territory of States which deliberately failed to prevent them, can amount to an armed attack in the sense of article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, hence triggering the right of self-defence¹⁰⁴.

At the very least and given the current debate on the matter, it thus seems to be safe to assume that the use of military force as a reaction to armed attacks emanating from non-State actors would not amount to a ‘manifest’ violation of the Charter of the United Nations, as required by article 8bis para. 1 in order for such use of force to eventually constitute a crime of aggression. 76

cc) Humanitarian intervention/Responsibility to Protect. In cases of massive human rights violations where the Security Council does not authorize the use of force, and where self-defence is not applicable either, it has been argued that the concept of humanitarian intervention may justify the use of force¹⁰⁵. This concept is an attempt to legalize the use of armed force in and directed against a foreign state for the prevention or discontinuation of massive human rights violations. State practice referred to, in order to justify the legality of such behavior, encompasses the interventions by India in Bangladesh (1971), Vietnam in Cambodia (1978), Tanzania in Uganda (1979), the USA in Grenada (1983) and, most prominently, NATO member States in Kosovo (1999). 77

However, one might doubt whether these examples do indeed fulfill the requirements to provide for a new rule of customary international law, namely extensive and uniform state practice as well as sufficient *opinio iuris*¹⁰⁶, even more so since both of the two interventions for primarily humanitarian reasons, the Indian invasion in Bangladesh¹⁰⁷ as well as the NATO intervention in Kosovo¹⁰⁸, were condemned by a majority of States, while even the NATO states themselves (apart from Belgium), in front of the ICJ, did not rely on the concept of humanitarian intervention¹⁰⁹.

One may argue that the approval of the relatively new concept of the ‘Responsibility to Protect’ (R2P) implies that humanitarian intervention has by now amounted to international custom, or is currently in the process of doing so. Still, even under the concept of ‘R2P’ it is mainly, if not exclusively, the Security Council that might provide for an authorization to use military force¹¹⁰. 78

¹⁰¹ UN Doc S/RES/1368 (12 September 2001), preambular part, para. 3.

¹⁰² UN Doc S/RES/1373 (28 September 2001), para. 2(b).

¹⁰³ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 223, para. 147.

¹⁰⁴ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 824–5; also see UN Doc S/RES/1701 (11 August 2006) referring to the attacks by Hezbollah in Lebanon upon Israel; more restrictive Tams (2009) 20 EJIL 359, 378 et seq.

¹⁰⁵ Lillich (1967) 53 IowaLRev 325, 347; Greenwood (2000) 49 ICLQ 926; cf. Simma (1999) 10 EJIL 1.

¹⁰⁶ Article 38(1) lit.b ICJ Statute; North Sea Continental Shelf (Germany v. Denmark), ICJ Rep. 1969, 3, 43 para. 74; Right of Passage over Indian Territory (Portugal v. India), ICJ Rep. 1960, 6, 40.

¹⁰⁷ UN Doc A/RES/2793(XXVI) (7 December 1971); Schachter (1984) 82 MichLRev 1620, 1629.

¹⁰⁸ China (UN Doc S/PV/3988 [24 March 1999]); Russia (ibid.); India (UN Doc S/1999/328 [26 March 1999]); Non-Aligned Movement (UN Doc S/1999/451 [21 April 1999]); Rio Group (UN Doc A/53/884 [26 March 1999]); Group of 77 (UN Doc A/55/74 [12 May 2000]), para. 54.

¹⁰⁹ Legality of Use of Force (Serbia and Montenegro v. Belgium), ICJ, Oral Pleadings of Belgium, CR 99/15, 11, para. 16.

¹¹⁰ World Summit Outcome, UN Doc A/RES/60/1 (24 October 2005), paras. 79, 139; UN Doc S/RES/1674 (28 April 2006); UN Doc A/59/565 (2 December 2004), para. 203.

- 79 Yet, if one were to take the position that a humanitarian intervention constitutes a violation of the Charter of the United Nations, it still remains a matter of discussion whether, by its character, it would then also constitute a manifest violation thereof and could thus also amount to a crime of aggression. It was during the Kampala Review Conference, that the then Legal Adviser of the US Department of State insisted that the inclusion of that sentence had to be understood in a way that any humanitarian intervention carried out, in order to prevent genocide, war crimes, or crimes against humanity, could ipso facto not constitute a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations¹¹¹. A respective understanding to that effect as proposed by the United States was however not adopted¹¹². Yet, this does not automatically indicate that such humanitarian intervention would then amount to a manifest violation of the Charter, in light of its goals and hence its character¹¹³.
- 80 ddd) Implicit authorizations by the Security Council and ‘revitalization’ of previous Security Council authorizations. Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations enables the Security Council to authorize measures which are necessary to maintain peace and security, including the authorization to use military force. In 2003, the United States, as well as the United Kingdom, given the absence of an explicit Security Council authorization to use military force against Iraq, tried to justify their invasion of Iraq by relying on an ‘implicit’ authorization contained in Security Council Resolution 1441 (2002) and/or on an alleged ‘revitalization’ of the authorization to use all necessary means to restore peace and security in the region as contained in Resolution 678 (1990)¹¹⁴. Those attempts were however vehemently rejected by the majority of States¹¹⁵, although due to the lack of precedence and in light of the somewhat divided scholarly views on the matter, the invasion might not have, at the time, amounted to a *manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations¹¹⁶.
- 81 It is in light of these very experiences that the Security Council has in its more recent practice either specifically stated that it only authorized measures under article 41 of the Charter (i. e. non-military measures)¹¹⁷, or that the use of military force would require an additional resolution¹¹⁸. At least in those latter cases, the use of military force without such additional explicit authorization would then amount to a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, and hence constitute a crime of aggression.
- 82 eee) Intervention upon invitation. Another contentious scenario which might, depending upon the circumstances of the individual case, amount to a manifest violation of the Charter as contemplated in article 8bis, relates to ‘interventions upon invitation’, i. e. military interventions by foreign troops in an internal armed conflict upon the invitation of the legitimate government of the State concerned¹¹⁹. Given a valid (rather than a fabricated)

¹¹¹ Statement by Harold Koh to the Conference, 4 June 2010, available at <<http://www.State.gov/s/l/releases/remarks/142665.htm>> last accessed September 2015.

¹¹² Mancini (2012) 81 NordJIL 227, 236.

¹¹³ McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 162.

¹¹⁴ UN Doc S/2003/350 (21 March 2003); UN Doc S/2003/351 (21 March 2003); Foreign & Commonwealth Office UK, Iraq: Legal Position Concerning the Use of Force (17 March 2003), <<http://www.parliament.stationery-office.co.uk/pa/cm200203/cmselect/cmstaf/405/3030407.htm>> last accessed September 2015.

¹¹⁵ Russia, France, China and Chile (UN Doc S/PV.4714 [7 March 2003]); the Non-Aligned Movement and the League of Arab States (UN Doc S/PV.4726 [26 March 2003]); Belgium (UN Doc A/58/PV.8 [23 September 2003]); Germany (Federal Administrative Court, Judgment of 21 June 2005, 2 WD 12.04).

¹¹⁶ Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, ii (2014) 201.

¹¹⁷ See the practice relating to sanctions on Iran: UN Docs. S/RES/1737 (23 December 2006); S/RES/1747 (24 March 2007); S/RES/1803 (3 March 2008); S/RES/1929 (9 June 2010).

¹¹⁸ See already UN Doc S/RES/1737 (23 December 2006), para. 24 c), which ‘[adopt further appropriate measures under Article 41 of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to persuade Iran to comply with these resolutions and the requirements of the IAEA, and] underlines that further decisions will be required should such additional measures be necessary’, thereby not even referring to measures according to article 42 but only to article 41 of the Charter of the United Nations; the same provision has been repeated verbatim in the following resolutions.

¹¹⁹ Nolte, ‘Intervention by Invitation’, in: MPEPIL, mn 1.

official invitation by the government of the territorial State concerned, that State's sovereignty is considered not to be violated by following up on the invitation, hence neither amounting to an illegal use of force, nor even less an act of aggression, as defined in article 8bis. This view is supported, inter alia, by recent State practice including the sending of a Regional Assistance Mission to the Solomon Islands (created by the Pacific Islands Forum in order to restore international security)¹²⁰, as well as the French intervention in Mali since 2012.

However, in situations when the respective government is no longer to be considered the effective government of the State concerned (and thus no longer able to represent the State or to issue a legally valid 'invitation' or consent), intervention to support such government becomes illegal¹²¹. Yet, depending on the facts of the ground, which in many cases will be disputed, such use of force might not yet be 'manifestly' illegal, as required by article 8bis so as to constitute a crime of aggression.

On the other hand, where the intervening State uses a fabricated 'invitation' forced upon the respective government, any such military intervention would then constitute an obvious and manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations¹²².

fff) Rescue of nationals abroad. While in the 19th century, it has been a common practice to use military force in order to protect nationals abroad, the adoption of the Charter of the United Nations rendered such actions more controversial, since attacks on individuals abroad do not amount to an armed attack against the home State of the persons concerned itself¹²³. Still, there is relevant State practice and opinio juris, which indicates that at least a significant number of States take the position that military operations limited in their scale, duration and purpose are legal under international law. Most prominently, following the Israeli rescue operation in the Entebbe incident, the debates in the Security Council were inconclusive and the opinion of States on the matter were divided, even when the UN Secretary General, Kurt Waldheim, condemned these actions as a serious violation of Uganda's sovereignty¹²⁴. The position taken in 1993 by the United Kingdom FCO might be taken as a guideline in that respect. The United Kingdom argued that '[f]orce may be used (...) against threat to one's nationals if: (a) there is good evidence that the target attacked would otherwise continue to be used by the other State in support of terrorist attacks against one's nationals; (b) there is, effectively, no other way to forestall imminent further attacks on one's nationals; (c) the force employed is proportionate to the threat'¹²⁵.

On the other hand, and somewhat similar to interventions upon invitation, the concept of using military force, in order to (allegedly) rescue threatened nationals may give rise to abuse, the invasion of Grenada in 1983 and of Panama in 1989 by the United States possibly being examples at hand¹²⁶. It would thus, once again, depend on the circumstances of the specific case to determine whether indeed, the operation was not only limited in kind, but also aiming at rescuing nationals genuinely in danger, or whether instead the concept was only relied on to justify an otherwise manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

¹²⁰ French (2005) 24 AfricanYbIL 337, 426 et seq.

¹²¹ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 835; Nolte, 'Intervention by Invitation', in: MPEPIL, mn 11.

¹²² As to the necessary degree of consent and further details see Nolte, 'Intervention by Invitation', in: MPEPIL, mn 12.

¹²³ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 829; Beyerlin (1977) ZaöRV 213, 220.

¹²⁴ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 829; cf. UN Doc S/PV.1939 (9 July 1976), para. 13.

¹²⁵ (1993) 64 BYbIL 732.

¹²⁶ Shaw, International Law (7th edition 2014) 830, also see there for further practice.

E. Article 8bis para. 2

I. General questions

87 Both the chapeau of, as well as the list of acts amounting to acts of aggression contained in Art 8bis para. 2, mirror the wording of articles 1 and 3 of GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression') adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1974. The definition of aggression contained in the said resolution aimed, as confirmed by operative paragraph 4 of the resolution, at guiding the Security Council, when making a determination on the existence of an act of aggression within the meaning of article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations. Notwithstanding, the SWGCA nevertheless supported its adaption to the context of criminal responsibility, an aspect which has been somewhat heavily criticized¹²⁷.

II. Chapeau

1. 'For the purpose of paragraph 1 (...)'

88 The introductory words of article 8bis para. 2 confirm that the definition of what constitutes an act of aggression under this very paragraph is only meant to be relevant in order to find out whether or not a crime of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis para. 1 has been committed. In line with Understanding no. 4 already discussed above¹²⁸, neither article 8bis para. 2 nor indeed article 8bis in toto are meant to have a direct impact on general international law in line with article 10.

2. '(...) 'act of aggression' (...)'

89 As confirmed by the list of examples forming part of article 8bis para. 2, an 'act of aggression' requires a lower degree of gravity than the notion of an 'armed attack' within the meaning of article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. As a matter of fact, as shown above¹²⁹, short-term military actions, while already arguably amounting to an act of aggression, do not necessarily constitute an armed attack, or indeed a crime of aggression as defined in article 8bis.

3. '(...) means the use of armed force (...)'

90 Article 8bis aims primarily at upholding the general prohibition of the use of force, as contained in article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations, the latter prohibiting both the threat and use of force generally. By using the formula 'use of armed force', the wording of article 8bis para. 2 embraces a more restrictive approach than article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations, the wording of which refers to the 'use of force' in general (as well as the threat of force, which in any event would exceed the adequate subject of criminalization given the current status of customary law on the matter)¹³⁰. Hence undeniably, political or economic force is not covered by article 8bis¹³¹. It ought to be noted, however, that even the scope of article 2 para. 4 is limited to the use of military force, as confirmed by para. 7 of the Preamble of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as by article 44 thereof, and, finally, by the Friendly Relations Declaration¹³².

¹²⁷ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 723.

¹²⁸ See mn 7.

¹²⁹ Supra mn 53.

¹³⁰ Kreß and von Holtzendorff (2010) 8 JICJ 1179, 1190.

¹³¹ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 342.

¹³² UN Doc A/RES/25/2625 (24 October 1970); as to further details see Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 17 et seq.

4. ‘(...) by a State (...)’

As already indicated by article 8bis para. 1 (‘by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State’)¹³³, article 8bis para. 2 clarifies for good that an act of aggression in the sense of this provision can only be committed by a State, not by private actors¹³⁴. Accordingly, leaders and high-rank members of paramilitary or terrorist groups cannot be capable of the crime of aggression with respect to acts committed by those groups. The prosecution of such private individuals under such circumstances remains entirely within the various States’ domestic jurisdiction. 91

Under certain circumstances, the commission of armed force by private actors can nevertheless be attributable to a State under the regular rules of State responsibility, as codified in the ILC Articles on State Responsibility¹³⁵ and, in particular, article 8 thereof. Accordingly, the ‘effective control standard’, as developed by the ICJ in its Nicaragua judgment, and more recently confirmed in its judgment on the merits in the (Bosnian) Genocide case, applies in order to eventually determine whether an act of aggression, even when committed by private actors, is nevertheless attributable to a State and thus constitutes ‘the use of armed force by a State’ within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2¹³⁶. 92

A specific form of such ‘indirect’ use of force by a State is then referred to in article 8bis para. 2 lit. g) as one possible act of aggression¹³⁷. 93

5. ‘(...) against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.’

This formula largely resembles the wording of article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations, except that in line with article 1 of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) the words ‘against the sovereignty’ were added and that the words ‘inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations’ were replaced by the words ‘inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations’. While – with regard to GA Resolution 3314 – the addition of ‘sovereignty’ resulted from the focus of the newly independent (former colonial) countries on their sovereignty, the term ‘inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations’ was meant to cover also formal provisions of the Charter, such as those of Chapter VI¹³⁸. 94

These words must however not be read in a way to imply that the provision is meant to only cover those instances of the use of military force which are directed against or aim at altering or abolishing another State’s sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence¹³⁹. As a matter of fact, the respective latter parts of the wording of both, article 1 of the GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’), and already beforehand the similar formula of ‘in any other matter inconsistent with Purposes of the United Nations’ in article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations are meant to reconfirm the general character of the prohibition of the use of force¹⁴⁰. The notion of ‘integrity’ should be understood as ‘inviolability’, prohibiting any kind of forcible trespassing involving the use of military force¹⁴¹. 95

¹³³ See mn 43.

¹³⁴ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 260.

¹³⁵ UN Doc A/56/83 (12 December 2001).

¹³⁶ See mn 146 et seq.

¹³⁷ See mn 144 et seq.

¹³⁸ Bruha, Die Definition der Aggression (1980) 114.

¹³⁹ Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 37.

¹⁴⁰ Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 37 and 39 (referring to the travaux préparatoires of article 2 para. 4).

¹⁴¹ Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 37; Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence (5th edition 2011) 91.

- 96 The term ‘of another State’ indicates that only situations involving two States are covered¹⁴². Neither mere inner-State conflicts, nor acts against private actors are encompassed unless, obviously, such acts, while being directed against non-State actors take place on the territory of another State. The term’s standing within the provision does not mean that the use of armed force ‘in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations’ does not require an action directed against another State.
- 97 The applicability of article 8bis para. 2, as indeed the applicability of the prohibition of the use of force in general, does not depend on the de facto effectiveness of another State’s sovereignty, or put otherwise the prohibition (and eventually the exposure to punishment under article 8bis) also encompasses the use of armed force against so-called ‘failed States’¹⁴³.
- 98 The last alternative ‘or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations’ serves to fill in possible gaps in the scope of application of article 8bis para. 2. At the same time, it ensures that the use of military force that is in line with the Charter, and in particular when justified as an exercise of the right to self-defense under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, or when authorized by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, does not amount to an act of aggression¹⁴⁴. At the same time, the more formalistic notion of the ‘Charter of the United Nations’ in article 8bis para. 2 (in contrast to ‘the Purposes of the United Nations’ formula, as used in article 2 para. 4 of the Charter of the United Nations) indicates that also instances of the use of armed force allegedly in line with such purposes might amount to an act of aggression¹⁴⁵.

6. ‘Any of the following acts (...) in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974 (...)’

- 99 The phrase ‘[a]ny of the following acts’ must be read as meaning ‘all of the following acts’ rather than as ‘only the following acts’, since the list of acts enumerated in article 8bis para. 2 (just like the one in GA Resolution 3314 [‘Definition of Aggression’]) was not meant to be an exhaustive one.¹⁴⁶ Indeed, the chapeau of article 8bis para. 2 2nd sentence states that the provision has to be interpreted in accordance with GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’), article 4 of which in turn explicitly provides that ‘[t]he acts enumerated above are not exhaustive and [that] the Security Council may determine that other acts [also] constitute aggression under the provisions of the Charter’. This is confirmed by the drafting history of the GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’), according to which the list of acts of aggression laid down in lit. a) – g) (and accordingly now also the list of acts contained in article 8bis para. 2) was not intended as an exclusive and strict rule, but rather as interpretation material for the Security Council¹⁴⁷.
- 100 During the drafting process in the SWGCA of what is now article 8bis, there were proposals such as one by Germany, which wanted to introduce a more clearly defined narrow definition of what amounts to an act of aggression, restricting the potential scope of such acts¹⁴⁸. In the end, however, there was no majority for such proposals. The majority of delegations in favor of the current text held, as summarized in the Official Records of the SWGCA, that even ‘[a]cts other than those listed could [...] be considered acts of aggression,

¹⁴² Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 342.

¹⁴³ Randelzhofer and Dörr, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 200, mn 40; for further details see Geiß, Failed States (2005) 123 et seq.

¹⁴⁴ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 343.

¹⁴⁵ See also already mn 77.

¹⁴⁶ For a different view, see Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 487.

¹⁴⁷ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 355.

¹⁴⁸ Krefß (2009) 20 EJIL 1129, 1136.

provided that they were of a similar nature and gravity to those listed and would satisfy the general criteria contained in the chapeau of paragraph 2¹⁴⁹.

While this open-ended character of the list of possible acts of aggression seems to be relatively unproblematic (and even necessary) in the context of Security Council decisions under article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations, this vagueness might conflict with the criminal law principle of legality, as enshrined in article 22¹⁵⁰. However, it seems to be generally acknowledged that the principle of legality has a narrower scope in international law as compared to domestic (criminal) law¹⁵¹. Accordingly, other clauses of international criminal law comprise somewhat similar open-ended elements as well, such as article 3 ICTY Statute¹⁵², or specifically within the framework of the Rome Statute itself article 7 para. 1 lit. k) ICC Statute, which refers to '[o]ther inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health'¹⁵³. Notwithstanding, it is still recommendable to ensure that the notion of what constitutes a crime of aggression (and accordingly also as a condicio sine qua non what constitutes an act of aggression) is not expanded too extensively. Any other possible acts of aggression not listed as such in article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – g) should accordingly be narrowly construed and may only be considered as such provided they possess mutatis mutandis the same character and gravity as one or more of the acts listed¹⁵⁴.

At the same time, as the first introductory provision of the Elements of Crimes pertaining to article 8bis confirms, 'any of the acts referred to in article 8bis, paragraph 2, qualify as an act of aggression.' Put otherwise, it must be assumed that any of the acts listed can, as a matter of principle, reach the threshold, as set out in article 8bis para. 1. Finding otherwise would not only run counter to the provision just quoted but also, and even more importantly, to the very structure of article 8bis in toto.

Finally, over time, the military operations of a State may fulfill one or even more of the alternatives listed in article 8bis para. 2 even if they, when they began, did not yet amount to an act of aggression.

7. '(...) regardless of a declaration of war (...)'

In modern international law, a declaration of war does no longer constitute a necessary requirement for either the existence of an armed conflict, or indeed an act of aggression. It was already during the drafting process of the 1933 Convention for the Definition of Aggression¹⁵⁵ that the requirement of such a declaration had become obsolete, given that article 2 para. 1 of the said treaty had referred to a declaration of war as one among several examples of acts of aggression, indicating its character as nothing but one specific form of aggression.

After World War II, declarations of war have become very rare. With the Geneva Conventions of 1949¹⁵⁶, such declarations have also lost their legal significance for purposes of international humanitarian law, since common article 2 para. 1 of the four Geneva Conventions provides that the Conventions 'shall apply to all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict which may arise between two or more of the High Contracting Parties, even if the state of war is not recognized by one of them'. Accordingly, it does not ¹⁴⁹ ICC-ASP/6/20/Add.1, Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Resumed Sixth Session, New York, 2–6 June 2008, Official Records, Annex II, Report of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression, 14, para. 34.

¹⁵⁰ See generally Broomhall, article 22, in this volume.

¹⁵¹ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 724.

¹⁵² 'The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons violating the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to: [...]'.
Such violations shall include, but not be limited to: [...].

¹⁵³ Emphasis added; as to this provision see Hall and Stahn, article 7, mn 95 et seq.

¹⁵⁴ Clark (2010) 2 GoJIL 689, 696.

¹⁵⁵ 147 LNTS 69.

¹⁵⁶ 75 UNTS 31; 75 UNTS 85; 75 UNTS 135; 75 UNTS 287.

matter for purposes of article 8bis whether one or both parties refer to their use of military force eventually constituting an act of aggression as a mere ‘police operation’, a ‘humanitarian’ or ‘peacekeeping operation’, or simply deny being involved in any such use of force in the first place.

8. ‘(...) shall (...) qualify as an act of aggression:’

- 106 The acts named in article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – g) do not constitute examples of crimes of aggression, but merely of acts of aggression. In order for such an act to also qualify as a crime of aggression coming within the jurisdiction of the Court, it therefore must also fulfill the additional conditions set out in article 8bis para. 1.

III. Article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – g)

1. Lit. a): invasion, attack, military occupation or annexation

- 107 a) General issues. Article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) refers to the classic form of aggression, subdivided into the invasion, the attack, the military occupation or annexation of the territory of a foreign State. This provision reflects customary international law¹⁵⁷. At most, one can discuss whether the inclusion of military occupation and annexation was really necessary or is, at least partially, redundant given that both forms of aggression presuppose that an invasion or attack has previously taken place¹⁵⁸.
- 108 b) ‘(...) invasion (...)’. An ‘invasion’ requires that the aggressor State’s armed forces illegally trespass another State’s frontiers, thereby breaching the principle of the inviolability of State borders¹⁵⁹. It does not matter whether such invasion then takes place by land forces, by way of a military operation via the sea, or by airborne troops. Classical examples of an invasion would be the invasion of Poland by German troops in September 1939, or the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi armed forces in 1990.
- 109 c) ‘(...) or attack (...)’. The term ‘attack’ describes ‘the act of falling upon with force or arms, of commencing battle’, ‘an offensive operation’; an onset or an assault¹⁶⁰. Given the context within which the term ‘attack’ is used in article 8bis, namely for purposes of the jus ad bellum, the jus in bello definition of ‘attack’ as contained in article 49 para. 1 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions¹⁶¹ (namely that ‘attack’ means ‘acts of violence against the adversary, whether in offence or in defence’) is irrelevant. At the same time, any such act must not necessarily amount to an armed attack within the meaning of article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations¹⁶², in order for it to constitute an ‘attack’ within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2. Rather, it is article 8bis para. 1 that would determine the necessary threshold so as for the act of aggression concerned in form of an ‘attack’ to eventually even amount to a crime of aggression.
- 110 It ought to be also noted that any use of armed force in line with international law and, in particular, either in exercise of the right of self-defense under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, or by virtue of an authorization by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, does not constitute an ‘attack’ within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a).
- 111 d) ‘(...) by the armed forces of a State (...)’. In order for either an invasion or an attack to constitute an act of aggression for purposes of GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggres-

¹⁵⁷ Dinstein, ‘Aggression’, in: MPEPIL, mn 25; also indicated by Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), Separate Opinion of Judge Simma, ICJ Reports 2005, 334, 335, para. 3.

¹⁵⁸ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 348.

¹⁵⁹ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 266.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Oxford English Dictionary Online.

¹⁶¹ 1125 UNTS 3.

¹⁶² As to the threshold requirements for a use of force amounting to an armed attack see already mn 37.

sion’), and accordingly now also for purposes of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), it must (at least also) involve the armed forces of the invading respectively attacking State. The provision thus constitutes a lex specialis to the general rules of attribution, as having been codified in the ILC’s Articles on State Responsibility. More specifically, any forms of invasion or attack taking place by ‘armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries’, the acts of which could eventually be (also) attributed to the sending State under article 8 of the ILC Articles of State Responsibility, are governed by article 8bis para. 2 lit. g).

For purposes of jus in bello, the ‘armed forces’ of a party to an armed conflict (and thus also of a State when it comes, as in then scenarios covered by article 8bis, to international armed conflicts) are defined in article 43 para. 1 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions as all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that State for the conduct of its subordinates, regardless of whether they constitute land, naval or air forces. Given that this definition was not only adopted in 1977, i. e. after GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) had been adopted, but also for purposes of jus in bello, it cannot, as such, be considered as authoritative when it comes to article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), but may serve as a helpful tool in defining the group of persons, action of which is relevant to determine whether an invasion respectively an attack has taken place. In any event, given the object and purpose of the provision, namely to protect the attacked respectively the invaded State, the acts of any organs of a State which involve the use of military force are to be considered acts of ‘armed forces’, such acts by non-organs being covered by article 8bis para. 2 lit. g). 112

e) ‘(...) of the territory of another State (...)’. In order to make a finding as to whether an act of aggression in the form of an ‘invasion’ or ‘attack’ has taken place, the Court will eventually have to make a finding as to whether (as might be claimed) the alleged aggressor State has a valid title to the territory concerned, or rather not. If the former were the case, there would be not an invasion of or attack of the territory of another State, even if the said other State had effective control of such territory. Put otherwise, the provision does protect the sovereignty of the invaded or attacked State. In contrast thereto, where the attacked State only exercised de facto control over the territory, sovereignty however lying with the invading State, there would not be, as required, an invasion or attack of the territory of another State. 113

It is worth noting that the first part of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) dealing with the invasion or attack of ‘the territory of another State’ does not, unlike the latter part thereof, also refer to the invasion or attack of ‘the territory of another State or part thereof’. It stands to reason, however, that it is the very act of invading or attacking a foreign State that amounts to an act of aggression as such, even if the aim is to ‘only’ do so on limited geographic basis. 114

f) ‘(...) or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack (...)’. Under article 42 of the Hague Regulations of 1907, having codified customary law on the matter, (military) ‘occupation’ refers to situations where a State’s military forces exercise effective control and authority over the territory of another State¹⁶³. In line with article 49 para. 2 of the 4th Geneva Convention, a situation of occupation may also arise where the said occupation (i. e. in the case of article 8bis the one which is the result of an invasion or attack) meets with no armed resistance. 115

The words ‘however temporary’ confirm that even a temporary occupation, i. e. one which is limited in time, amounts to an act of aggression. Yet, in order to reach the threshold provided for in article 8bis para. 1, a certain minimum duration of the occupation is required so as to provide for a violation of the prohibition of the use of force serious enough 116 to constitute a crime of aggression. This is true, in particular, where the occupation is not only limited in time, but also merely extent to a small border area only.

¹⁶³ Convention (IV) respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and its Annex: Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, in: Scott, The proceedings of the Hague Conferences (1920) 621; also see Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 230, para. 173.

- 117 Notwithstanding the fact that the part of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) dealing with occupation does not, contrary to the part dealing with annexation of territory, explicitly state that even a partial occupation (just like a partial annexation) amounts to an act of aggression, an interpretation of the provision in line with customary international law provides that this is the case, a possible argumentum e contrario notwithstanding.
- 118 Under the terms of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), the occupation must result from an ‘invasion’ or ‘attack’, and must thus be the result of a use of force in violation of international law. Thus, an occupation of foreign territory which came about as the result of an exercise of the right of self-defense does not, as such, constitute an act of aggression¹⁶⁴. During the drafting of GA resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’), the question whether an ‘excessive defensive’ occupation caused by the exercise of the right of self-defense, but lasting for several years or even decades after the initial exercise of such a right, constitutes an act of aggression, could not be agreed upon. Accordingly, the question was deliberately left open¹⁶⁵, nor was it addressed again when article 8bis was drafted. However, an unreasonably long-lasting occupation might amount to an ‘excess’ of self-defense, and might then, depending on the specific circumstances, constitute an act of aggression by and of itself¹⁶⁶.
- 119 While, under the terms of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), the invasion or attack must be directed against the territory of a foreign State, the provision does not require the ensuing occupation to then necessarily also relate to the territory of another State. This is confirmed by the very text of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), which refers to ‘any military occupation’. As a matter of fact, as the case of Palestine demonstrates, even an inter-State armed conflict might lead to the occupation of territory which, at least at the time the occupation took place, did not form part of a foreign State, or later on did not possess that status anymore.
- 120 Finally, where the Security Council, like in the case of Iraq, ex post facto legitimizes an occupation regime, even one created by a violation of the Charter of the United Nations¹⁶⁷, this either does not constitute an occupation covered by article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) in light of its object of purpose, or at the very least such an occupation would then not amount to a violation of the Charter, and even less a manifest one, the illegality of the prior invasion or attack notwithstanding.
- 121 g) ‘(...) or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof (...)’. ‘Annexation’ covers the forcible acquisition of a State’s territory by another state in violation of international law. Additionally, an annexation normally requires a previous effective occupation, combined with the intention to appropriate the territory permanently¹⁶⁸. Under article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), any such annexation must be the result of the use of force.
- 122 In line with the practice of the Security Council, even acts of a State purporting to extend its domestic laws to occupied territory and assimilating it to its own territory, while not formally ‘annexing’ as such, might nevertheless amount to a (de facto) annexation¹⁶⁹ also covered by that part of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) here under consideration. In particular, this might be true where an occupying power physically separates part of the occupied territory adjacent to its own territory from the remainder of the occupied territory and, at the same ¹⁶⁴ Bruha, Die Definition der Aggression (1980) 246.

¹⁶⁵ Bruha, Die Definition der Aggression (1980) 245 et seq.

¹⁶⁶ For the question whether an excessive exercise of the right of self-defense may generally amount to a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, see mn 71.

¹⁶⁷ UN Doc S/RES/1483 (22 May 2003).

¹⁶⁸ Hofmann, ‘Annexation’, in: MPEPIL, mn 1.

¹⁶⁹ Hofmann, ‘Annexation’, in: MPEPIL, mn 33; see e.g. UN Doc S/RES/497 (17 December 1981), para. 1: ‘[...] the Israeli decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration in the occupied Syrian Golan Heights is null and void and without international legal effect’.

time, transfers its own population into that very part of the occupied territory, while eventually simultaneously clearing it from the indigenous population¹⁷⁰.

2. Lit. b): bombardment or use of weapons

a) ‘Bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State (...)’. The term ‘bombardment’ describes any attack from land, sea, or air bases with heavy weapons which, like artillery, shells, missiles, or aircraft, are capable of destroying enemy targets at a greater distance beyond the specific battle lines¹⁷¹. In contrast to article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), lit. b) encompasses cases which do not require the attacking State’s armed forces to physically cross the border. The notion of ‘bombardment’ against the territory of another State covers not only situations where the weapon system is located on the attacking State’s territory, but also where such systems have already been deployed on the territory of the State being attacked.

Given that article 8bis para. 2 lit. b) criminalizes violations of the jus ad bellum, it does not (only) criminalize bombardments of certain protected persons or objects, deriving from the principles of proportionality and distinction inherent in the jus in bello and criminalized by various provisions of article 8. Rather, the norm refers generally to bombardments of another State’s territory in general¹⁷².

The further elements of the provision covering bombardments, namely that such bombardment is undertaken by ‘the armed forces of a State’ and is further directed ‘against the territory of another State’ are identical to the terms used in article 8bis para. 2 lit. a), reference to which is therefore made¹⁷³.

b) ‘(...) or the use of any weapons by a State against the territory of another State’. The second alternative of article 8bis para. 2 lit. b) refers to the use of ‘any weapons’. Accordingly, while during the drafting process of what was to become GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) it had been proposed to introduce a specific reference to weapons of mass destruction, those weapons were in the end only referred to in the fifth preambular paragraph of the said resolution. Article 8bis in turn does not contain any such reference at all. However, the term ‘use of any weapons’¹⁷⁴ is broad enough to include the different kinds of weapons of mass destruction.

As in the case of the first alternative of article 8bis para. 2 lit. b) referring to ‘bombardments’, the use of weapons must be directed against another State¹⁷⁵. It is worth noting, however, that the second alternative of article 8bis para. 2 lit. b) generally refers to ‘the use of any weapons by a State’. This stands in contrast to the first alternative thereof, which requires the ‘bombardment by the armed forces of a State’¹⁷⁶. It thus stands to reason that any such use of weapons therefore constitutes an act of aggression by the respective State, whenever the action involved can be attributed to the attacking State under general rules of the law of State responsibility, even when not emanating from the armed forces of this State as such.

3. Lit. c): blockade

Article 8bis para. 2 lit. c) criminalizes ‘[t]he blockade of the ports or coasts of a State by the armed forces of another State’. The term ‘blockade’ describes belligerent operations to prevent vessels from entering or exiting ports or coastal areas belonging to another nation.

¹⁷⁰ See for such proposition Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Advisory Opinion, ICJ Rep. 2004, 136, 184, para. 121.

¹⁷¹ McDonald and Bruha, ‘Bombardment’, in: MPEPIL, mn 1.

¹⁷² Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 267.

¹⁷³ See mn 111 et seq. and mn 113.

¹⁷⁴ Emphasis added.

¹⁷⁵ For further details see mn 113.

¹⁷⁶ Emphasis added.

It can take various forms, such as interdiction operations by vessels, or by mining the access routes to harbors. While a blockade has always been a common measure of economic warfare and constitutes a violation of the State's territory, it can also be directed against the armed forces of another State, in order to prepare an invasion or to cut off the other State's troop supply¹⁷⁷. Given that a blockade does not necessarily involve the actual use of armed force, it is lit. c) of article 8bis para. 2 that raises in particular the question whether such operations would always reach the threshold provided for in article 8bis para. 1¹⁷⁸.

Under international humanitarian law (once States have entered into an armed conflict), a blockade is only prohibited if it has the sole purpose of starving the civilian population or denying it other objects essential for its survival, or if the damage to the civilian population is, or may be expected to be, excessive in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated from the blockade¹⁷⁹. However, since article 8bis generally, and article 8bis para. 2 lit. c) in particular, do not criminalize violations of the jus in bello, but rather those of the jus ad bellum, such restrictions do not apply. Rather, any blockade may constitute an act of aggression, even if it abided by the limitations set out in international humanitarian law.

129 The blockade must then have the effect of blocking access to either the ports or the coasts of a State. Given that the provision uses both terms in the plural, it stands to reason that the blockade of one single port does not fulfill the necessary criteria in order to constitute a blockade within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 lit. c), unless such port would provide for the only access to the coasts of the victim State, and would thus by the same token amount to a blockade of the coasts of such victim State.

130 Since the provision covers only the coastal part of a State's transportation system, landlocked States are not protected. As a matter of fact, already when GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression') was drafted, a proposal in the respective Special Committee aimed at introducing an equivalent for the barring of passage to the open sea, but a majority of States was not willing to expand the scope of what is now the equivalent provision in article 8bis para. 2 lit. c). While one might assume an exception for land-locked States (and therefore an act of aggression) in extreme cases, e.g. when a State cuts off all communication routes of another State¹⁸⁰ for purposes of State responsibility, no such analogy seems to be permissible, given the unequivocal wording of article 8bis para. 2 lit. c) in light of article 22 para. 2 1st sentence¹⁸¹.

131 Article 8bis para. 2 lit. c) once again requires that the blockade is being undertaken by the term 'armed forces' of the attacking State, and may thus be carried out by land, air or naval forces¹⁸².

4. Lit. d): attack on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State 132 Article 8bis para. 2 lit. d), which refers to '[a]n attack by the armed forces of a State on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State', is mutatis mutandis identical to lit. a), reference to which is therefore made¹⁸³. Its special purpose consists in the protection of State positions abroad. At least for purposes of article 8bis para. 2 lit. d) it is however only military facilities that are considered to constitute such protected positions, but ¹⁷⁷ Heintschel von Heinegg, 'Blockade', in: MPEPIL, mn 1; Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 268.

¹⁷⁸ See mn 46 et seq.

¹⁷⁹ Doswald-Beck (ed.), San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea (1995), Article 102.

¹⁸⁰ Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 24.

¹⁸¹ For details see Broomhall, article 22, mn 36 et seq.

¹⁸² Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 24; see as to the notion of 'armed forces' also mn 111 et seq.

¹⁸³ Supra mn 109 et seq.

not diplomatic missions and nationals¹⁸⁴. On the other hand, the provision also applies to military positions of a State on disputed territory¹⁸⁵. The term ‘fleets’ was chosen carefully to indicate that an attack on commercial fishing vessels or civilian aircraft would not amount to an act of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 lit. d)¹⁸⁶. Even less would then boarding and search operations against commercial vessels, regardless of their legality under international law, fulfill the criteria laid down in article 8bis para. 2 lit. d).

The 2003 judgment of the ICJ in the Oil Platforms case had left open whether ‘the mining of a single military vessel might be sufficient to bring into play the “inherent right of self-defence” and would thus also constitute an armed attack¹⁸⁷. Such determination is then in turn relevant for purposes of article 8bis para. 1, when it comes to the gravity of the act and in order to decide whether such operation would then also eventually amount to a crime of aggression.

It remains unclear whether the attack has to directly target such military positions (e.g. by shooting at a ship or killing its crew), or whether the provision also applies when the attack merely forcefully hinders a plane or a ship to follow its course¹⁸⁸. At the very least, however, such latter operations will hardly ever fulfill the ‘character’, ‘gravity’, and ‘scale’ criteria, as contained in article 8bis para. 1¹⁸⁹.

Given its wording, which specifically relates to attacks ‘on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State¹⁹⁰, article 8bis para. 2 lit. d) does not cover attacks on a State’s objects stationed in outer space¹⁹¹. This is confirmed by the fact that GA Resolution 3314 (‘Definition of Aggression’) was adopted seven years after the Outer Space Treaty¹⁹², which leads to the conclusion that the drafters excluded space objects deliberately from the scope of application of the provision, and the same is true with respect to the Kampala Review Conference, which again could have easily included space objects into the definition of protected military ‘outposts’.

5. Lit. e): violation of stationing agreements and unlawful extension of presence

a) General issues. Article 8bis para. 2 lit. e) stipulates that ‘[t]he use of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State, in contravention of the conditions provided for in the agreement or any extension of their presence in such territory beyond the termination of the agreement’ constitutes an act of aggression. The provision has been drafted not the least in the light of post-World War II practice of forming military alliances, which routinely provide for army installments of one State within other member States¹⁹³, but which may be misused against either the receiving State, or indeed for military action against a third State, thereby exposing the receiving State in turn then being the object of military counter-attacks.

The paragraph includes two specific forms of acts of aggression, one being the use of force in contravention of the specific conditions of the agreement providing for the stationing of troops, while the second encompasses the use of force after the armed forces should have already left the foreign territory due to the lapse or termination of the agreement.

b) Violations of stationing agreements. With respect to the first alternative, namely ‘[t]he use of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the ¹⁸⁴ Verdross and Simma, Universelles Völkerrecht (3rd edition 1984) 290, mn 473.

¹⁸⁵ Randelsofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 26, with reference to the Argentinian invasion on the Falkland Islands in 1982.

¹⁸⁶ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 351.

¹⁸⁷ Oil Platforms, (Iran v. USA), ICJ Rep. 2003, 161, 195, para. 72.

¹⁸⁸ Bruha, Die Definition der Aggression (1980) 117.

¹⁸⁹ See mn 50 et seq.

¹⁹⁰ Emphasis added.

¹⁹¹ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 273.

¹⁹² 610 UNTS 205.

¹⁹³ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 352.

agreement of the receiving State, in contravention of the conditions provided for in the agreement’, it ought to be noted that it requires that the stationing forces are being ‘used’, the French text using the term ‘emploi’. This does not seem to imply, however, that such troops then have to necessarily use military force against the territorial State in the sense of an attack. On the other hand, the term ‘use of armed forces’ implies that there must be some element of genuine coercion inherent in the behavior of the troops of the sending State, a mere technical violation of a stationing agreement not amounting to the actual use of armed forces within the meaning of the provision.

138 In line with the text of the provision, the said armed forces must find themselves on the territory of the receiving State with the agreement of the receiving State. Given the further wording, such ‘agreement’ has to take the form of a treaty, as confirmed by both the English and the French text, first using the general wording ‘with the agreement’/‘avec l’agrément’, but then later referring to the conditions set out in the respective ‘agreement’/‘accord’.

139 c) Unlawful extension of presence. With respect to the second case, namely the ‘extension of [the] presence [of armed forces]¹⁹⁴ of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State] beyond the termination of the agreement’, it ought to be noted that, as the ICJ held in the Armed Activities case, an agreement ‘facilitat[ing] the orderly withdrawal of (...) foreign forces (...) carries no implication as to [their] (...) military presence having been accepted as lawful¹⁹⁵. At most, the principle of bona fide might imply that States must be given a reasonable amount of time to withdraw their troops, once a stationing agreement has been terminated¹⁹⁶.

6. Lit. f): allowing one’s territory to be used for an act of aggression 140 Article 8bis para. 2 lit. f) regulates a State assisting another State in perpetrating an act of aggression by allowing its territory to be used by said other State to commit an act of aggression.

For one, the State must use the territory which was placed at its disposal to actually commit an ‘act of aggression’ against a third State within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – e), or lit. g).

141 Furthermore, given the fact that the territory must have been placed at the disposal of the State undertaking the act of aggression, it is only the voluntary provision of territory that itself then constitutes an act of aggression. Accordingly, cases in which a State has unsuccessfully tried to prevent such misuse¹⁹⁷, or in which the State has been illegally invaded and occupied itself by the aggressor State, which now uses the territory to commit acts of aggression against additional States, are not covered by article 8bis para. 2 lit. f). On the other hand, it does not matter whether the territorial State had placed its territory at the disposal of the State committing the act of aggression by way of a treaty, or otherwise.

142 As a matter of principle, it is obviously not prohibited to allow another State to use one’s territory for the stationing of armed forces or the installment of arms¹⁹⁸. In order for the receiving State therefore to itself commit an act of aggression, it must be aware of the kind of use of its territory to be made by the primary aggressor State in order to itself then qualify as an aggressor State¹⁹⁹. What is more is that the provision further requires that there must be some specific ‘action [...] in allowing its territory [...], which it has placed at the disposal of another State, to be used by that other State for perpetrating an act of aggression against a ¹⁹⁴ As to the notion of armed forces see mn 111 et seq.

¹⁹⁵ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 210, paras. 97, 99.

¹⁹⁶ Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 29.

¹⁹⁷ Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 30, with further references.

¹⁹⁸ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 269.

¹⁹⁹ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 353.

third State²⁰⁰. Put otherwise, the conclusion of a stationing agreement by the host State without then taking any further steps towards allowing an act of aggression to take place does not yet fulfill the requirements underlying article 8bis para. 2 lit. f). This is confirmed by the drafting history of that part of GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression') mirroring article 8bis para. 2 lit. f). In particular, the wording 'with the acquiescence and agreement of the former' contained in a draft of the said resolution was substituted by the current wording, in order to exclude merely passive behavior from the scope of lit. f)²⁰¹.

Finally, it is only the status of the host State vis-à-vis the Rome Statute generally and the Kampala amendments specifically that is relevant when it comes to determine whether the Court has jurisdiction under article 15bis para. 4 and para. 5 respectively. 143

7. Lit. g): sending of irregular forces

a) General issues. Article 8bis para. 2 lit. g) covers forms of 'indirect' aggression by sending irregular forces of various kinds into another State to then carry out acts of armed force in such latter State. In accordance with article 8bis para. 1, it is then not the actual persons carrying out the acts of armed violence belonging to non-State armed groups that eventually commit a crime of aggression, but rather the persons controlling or directing the State policy of sending such irregular forces into another State. 144

b) 'The sending by or on behalf of a State (...)'. While what is now article 8bis para. 2 lit. g) had been very controversial during the drafting process of what was to become GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression'), in its Nicaragua case, as later confirmed in the Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo case, the ICJ considered it to constitute a reflection of customary international law²⁰². 145

The term 'sending' implies (and thus also requires) a sufficiently close link between the 'sending' State and the non-State group actually carrying out the armed operations, so that the latter would then have to either be qualified as de facto organs of the sending State, or at least as being controlled by the 'sending' State within the meaning of article 8 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility²⁰³. 146

This triggers the question as to the necessary degree of control that is required to equate the sending and conduct of the mentioned non-State actors – armed bands, groups, irregulars and mercenaries – with direct acts of the sending State under the said article 8 of the ILC Articles. In its Nicaragua judgment, the ICJ held that such control must amount to 'effective control'. By 'effective control', the Court meant a situation where the State directly controls the perpetration of specific acts²⁰⁴. 147

As is well-known, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY contested the Nicaragua judgment's effective control test. In its Tadić case, the Tribunal argued that the Nicaragua test was inconsonant with both the logic of the law of State responsibility and with judicial, as well as with State practice²⁰⁵, the required degree of control being one of 'overall' control over subordinate armed forces or military or paramilitary units 'going beyond the mere financing and equipping of such forces and involving also participation in the planning and supervision of military operations'²⁰⁶. 148

²⁰⁰ Emphasis added.

²⁰¹ See Bruha, Die Definition der Aggression (1980) 263.

²⁰² Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 103, para. 195; also see Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 222, para. 146.

²⁰³ Randelzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 33.

²⁰⁴ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, 64 et seq., para. 115.

²⁰⁵ The Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, No. IT-94-1, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, paras. 115–45.

²⁰⁶ The Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, No. IT-94-1, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 145.

- 149 In its 2007 judgment in the in the Bosnian Genocide case, the ICJ however rightly upheld the position laid out in the Nicaragua judgment and plainly rejected the criticism brought up by the ICTY in the Tadić case. The Court argued that the overall control criterion was useful for concluding whether a State was involved in a conflict on another State's territory and hence whether a conflict was international, but underlined that the ICTY was not called upon to decide on questions of State responsibility²⁰⁷. Accordingly, in order for insurgents to having been sent 'by or on behalf of a State' for purposes of article 8bis para. 2 lit. g), they must either qualify as de facto organs, or be within the effective control of the 'sending' State.
- 150 c) '(...) of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries (...)'. For purposes of the jus ad bellum issue addressed in article 8bis para. 2 lit. g) 'armed bands' and 'groups' do not seem to require a certain degree of organization and organizational coherence and hierarchy, such as a command structure and the capacity to sustain military operations. This is confirmed by an argumentum e contrario with article 8 para. 2 lit. f), which unlike article 8bis para. 2 lit. g) here under consideration, refers to 'organized' armed groups. The term 'groups' should also encompass private military and security companies²⁰⁸.
- 151 'Irregulars' are understood as opposed to the term of 'regular armed forces' as used in international humanitarian law. Under article 43 para. 1 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, the armed forces of a State party to a conflict consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct of its subordinates, even if that Party is represented by a government or an authority not recognized by an adverse Party. In contrast thereto, the term 'irregular forces' comprises militia or voluntary corps²⁰⁹ not subject to a formal chain of command, and not forming part of the armed forces of a party to a conflict.
- 152 The term 'mercenary' is defined in both, article 47 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions and in article 1 of the 1989 International Convention Against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries²¹⁰. Accordingly, a mercenary is any person who is specially recruited locally or abroad in order to fight in an armed conflict; is motivated to take part in the hostilities essentially by the desire for private gain and, in fact, is promised, by or on behalf of a party to the conflict, material compensation substantially in excess of that promised or paid to combatants of similar rank and functions in the armed forces of that party; is neither a national of a party to the conflict nor a resident of territory controlled by a party to the conflict; is not a member of the armed forces of a party to the conflict; and has not been sent by a State which is not a party to the conflict on official duty as a member of its armed forces.
- 153 The third parties listed in article 8bis para. 2 lit. g), namely armed bands, groups, irregulars and mercenaries, are not meant to encompass single individuals (although the last two may theoretically do so) since they were supposed to commit acts similar in gravity to the one otherwise listed in article 8bis para. 2²¹¹.
- 154 d) '(...) which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above (...)'. The various actors just referred to (i. e. armed bands, groups, irregulars and mercenaries) must actually 'carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above', i. e. as listed in article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) – f). Not only must they therefore use 'armed force' as defined above²¹², but

²⁰⁷ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), ICJ Rep. 2007, 43, 210, para. 404.

²⁰⁸ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 270.

²⁰⁹ Cf. Convention (IV) respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and its Annex: Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 18 October 1907, Regulation 1.

²¹⁰ 2163 UNTS 75.

²¹¹ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 354.

²¹² See mn 111.

those acts must also be directed against a third State. Finally, such acts must be similar in gravity to the other acts mentioned in article 8bis. It is worth noting, however, that the comparison only relates to the gravity of their acts but not to their scale, or indeed their character²¹³.

e) '(...) or its substantial involvement therein.' In contrast to the first alternative of article 8bis para. 2 lit. g), i. e. the 'sending by or on behalf of a State', the second alternative, i. e. '[the State's] substantial involvement', pays tribute to the difficulties of providing evidence for the first alternative²¹⁴. This second alternative is vaguer than the first one and has not yet been sufficiently addressed by international courts. In the Armed Activities case, the ICJ did not properly differentiate between these two alternatives of article 3 lit. g) of GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression') (now reproduced in article 8bis para. 2 lit. g)), but merely indicated that this form of State aggression generally requires a careful assessment of the standard and burden of proof²¹⁵.

As a matter of principle, allowing non-State actors to make use of one's territory in order to prepare for acts of aggression similar to those listed in article 8bis para. 2 against persons or property situated in another State may be considered as the respective host State's 'substantial involvement' within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2 lit. g)²¹⁶. It remains doubtful, however, whether a mere failure to take repressive measures against such acts (be it for a lack of ability or willingness) ought to be already considered to give rise to a substantial involvement, and thus eventually even give rise to a punishment for a crime of aggression.

8. Other forms of aggression not listed

Given that article 8bis para. 2 merely repeats the respective wording of GA Resolution 3314 ('Definition of Aggression'), modern methods of warfare, such as the use of 'cyberforce', unforeseeable in 1974, but a major topic in modern international law²¹⁷, have not been listed in article 8bis either. However, as shown above, the list of possible acts of aggression, as contained in article 8bis para. 2, is not exhaustive²¹⁸, although any other acts should be interpreted narrowly and must equate the character of the acts listed in order to also amount to an act of aggression for purposes of article 8bis para. 2.

In that context, it is worth noting that in the context of the notion of 'armed attacks' in the sense of article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, the ICJ has held that the exercise of the right to self-defense does not depend on the type of weapon employed for a given attack²¹⁹. Still, it remains difficult to interpret this statement in a way that electronic measures could be treated as 'weapons' in the sense of article 8bis para. 2 lit. b)²²⁰. At the very least, methods of 'cyber warfare' would have to bring about destructive effects comparable to those of conventional weapons, such as the disabling of the State's infrastructure²²¹ in order to constitute an act of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis para. 2.

²¹³ For the content of these three terms see mn 61 et seq.

²¹⁴ Broms (1977) 154 (I) RdC 299, 354.

²¹⁵ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), ICJ Rep. 2005, 168, 222, para. 146.

²¹⁶ Sayapin, The Crime of Aggression in International Criminal Law (2014) 260.

²¹⁷ See generally Schmitt (ed.), Tallin Manual on the International Law Applicable to Cyber Warfare (2013).

²¹⁸ Supra mn 99 et seq.

²¹⁹ Legality of the Threat of Use of Nuclear Weapons, Advisory Opinion, ICJ Rep. 1996, 226, 244, para. 39.

²²⁰ For a different view, see Randalzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 43.

²²¹ Randalzhofer and Nolte, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (3rd edition 2012) 1397, mn 43, with further references.

F. Article 8bis and the exercise of domestic jurisdiction over the crime of aggression

- 159 The exercise of the Court's jurisdiction with regard to the crime of aggression is, just as with regard to the other crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, governed by the principle of complementarity set out, in particular, in article 17. In accordance therewith, no. 5 of the 'Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression', adopted as part of the enabling Resolution RC/Res.6, underlines 'that the amendments [i. e. articles 8bis, 15bis and 15ter] shall not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State'²²².
- 160 For one, the phrase confirms, if ever there had been need, that the principle of complementarity underlying the Court's overall jurisdictional scheme, does not carry with it an implicit obligation to punish the respective crime, which crime is subject to the Court's complementary jurisdiction.²²³ On the other hand, said formulation leaves it deliberately open, however, whether States are entitled or eventually even obliged, under general international law, to exercise their domestic criminal jurisdiction with regard to the crime of aggression committed by their own nationals, individuals other than their own nationals or, eventually, even exercise universal jurisdiction in that regard.

²²² RC/Res.6, Annex III, Understandings Regarding the Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the Crime of Aggression, para. 5.

²²³ Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (3rd edition 2014) 556.

Article 9 Elements of Crimes

1. Elements of Crimes shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6, 7, 8 and 8 bis. They shall be adopted by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties.

2. Amendments to the Elements of Crimes may be proposed by:

- (a) Any State Party;
- (b) The judges acting by an absolute majority;
- (c) The Prosecutor.

Such amendments shall be adopted by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties.

3. The Elements of Crimes and amendments thereto shall be consistent with this Statute.

Literature: Badar, M. E., 'Dolus Eventualis and the Rome Statute without it?', (2009) 12 NCLRev 433; Barriga, S. and Kress, C., The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012); Barriga, S. and Grover, L., 'A Historic Breakthrough on the Crime of Aggression', (2011) 105 AJIL 517; Bassiouni, M.C. (ed.), The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998); id., Substantive Criminal Law (1978); Beddard, R. 'Retrospective Crime', (1995) 145 NLJ 663; Campbell, T., Seven Theories of Human Society (1980); Clark, R.S., 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences', (2001) 12 CLF 291; id., 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubanga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings', (2008) 19 CLF 519; id., 'Elements of Crimes in Early Confirmation Decisions of the Pre-Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Court', (2008) 6 NZYBIL 209; id., 'Negotiating Provisions Defining the Crime of Aggression, its Elements and the Conditions for ICC Exercise of Jurisdiction Over It', (2009) 20 EJIL 1103, 1106-13; id., 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Considered at the First Review Conference on the Court, Kampala, 31 May-11 June 2010', (2010) 2 GoJIL 689; Dewey, J., 'Logical Method and Law', (1924) 10 CornLQ 17; Dörmann, K., Doswald-Beck, L. and Kolb, R., Elements of War Crimes Under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Sources and Commentary (2002); Finnin, S., Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25 (3) (b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2012); Friman, H., 'Offences and Misconduct against the Court', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 605; Glaser, S., Infraction internationale (1957); Kelsen, H., 'Will the Judgment of the Nuremberg Trial Constitute a Precedent in International Law?', (1947) 1 ILQ 153; id., Pure Theory of Law (1989); McLachlan, C.L., 'The Principle of Systemic Integration and Article 31 (3) (c) of the Vienna Convention', (2005) 54 ICLQ 2779; Meron, T., 'International Criminalization of Internal Atrocities', (1995) 89 AJIL 554; Oosterveld, V., 'Gender-Based Crimes against Humanity', in: L. N. Sadat (ed.), Forging a Convention for Crimes Against Humanity (2011) 78; Plawski, S., Etude des principes fondamentaux du droit international pénal (1972); Pound, R., An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law (1951); Popper, The Poverty of Historicism (1957); Robinson, P.H., 'Should the Criminal Law Abandon the Actus Reus/Mens Rea Distinction?', in: S. Shute, J. Gardner, and J. Horder (eds.), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 187; Trahan, J., 'The Rome Statute's Amendment on the Crime of Aggression: Negotiating at the Kampala Review Conference', (2011) 11 ICLRev 49; Triffterer, O., 'Kriminalpolitische und dogmatische Überlegungen zum Entwurf gleichlautender 'Elements of Crimes' für alle Tatbestände des Völkermordes', in: B. Schünemann et al. (eds.) Festschrift für Claus Roxin (2001) 1114; Wise, E.M., 'Part 3. General Principles of Criminal Law', 13^{ter} NEP (1998) 49.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	9
I. Paragraph 1.....	9
1. 'Elements of Crimes'.....	11
a) Material Elements of Crimes.....	13
aa) Conduct.....	14
bb) Circumstances.....	17
cc) Consequences.....	20
dd) Causation.....	23
b) Mental Elements of Crimes.....	25

aa) Intent, knowledge or both.....	26
bb) Inferring knowledge.....	27
cc) Knowledge of consequences.....	28
dd) Intent as to conduct and consequences.....	29
ee) Knowledge and the causation puzzle.....	30
2. 'shall assist'.....	31
3. 'interpretation and application'.....	32
4. Adoption.....	35
II. Paragraph 2.....	36
1. 'Amendments to the Elements ...'.....	36
2. Subjects entitled to propose amendments.....	37
a) Any State Party.....	37
b) The judges.....	38
c) The Prosecutor.....	39
III. Paragraph 3.....	40
C. Special remarks: The juridical weight of the Elements of Crimes.....	41

A. Introduction/General remarks

1 Article 9 deals with the elements of crimes enumerated in articles 6, 7 and 8 and potentially the crime of aggression when the amendment process concerning it is completed pursuant to article 5 para. 2 of the Statute¹. 'Elements' are those basic building blocks of a physical ('material') or mental kind that taken together constitute 'the crime' or provide the necessary and sufficient conditions for the prosecution to establish 'guilt'. Initially when the Statute was being drafted, and at some later stages of its consideration, it was not intended to include such an article. As can be seen from the draft prepared by the ILC² and several reports of the Preparatory Committee, the respective text was absent in the Draft Statute. After some delegations expressed their concerns about the conformity of the definitions of crimes within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC with the nullum crimen sine lege principle, the Preparatory Committee, at one of its meetings, took note of the proposal to elaborate the precise elements of crimes³. It was argued that the crimes 'should be defined with the clarity, precision and specificity required for criminal law in accordance with the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege)⁴. Furthermore, it was suggested that each crime should be 'defined in a separate article identifying the essential elements of the offences and the minimum qualitative and quantitative requirements'⁵. Those requirements were meant to include, inter alia, the indication of circumstances in which, perpetrators by which and victims against which certain acts would constitute a crime⁶. The way the negotiations

¹ Article 9 as adopted in 1998 does not refer specifically to elements for the crime of aggression, but Res. F annexed to the Final Act contemplated the drafting of 'a provision on aggression, including the definition and Elements of Crimes of aggression and the conditions under which the International Criminal Court shall exercise its jurisdiction with regard to the crime'. For the text of the Final Act and Annexes thereto see UN Doc A/CONF.183/10, reproduced in Vol. I of the official records of the Conference, UN Doc A/CONF.183/13, p. 67 (2002). The aggression Amendments adopted in 2010 in Kampala contemplate (a) adding a reference to Elements for the new article 8bis in article 9, and (b) a negotiated list of Elements for aggression. See ICC Doc. RC/Res. 6 (2010), Annex I, para. 6 (amendment to article 9) and Annex II (amendments to Elements of Crimes re aggression). Modes of liability under article 25(3) of the Statute have taken on significant importance in the early jurisprudence of the Court. For some creative suggestions about drafting Elements for those provisions, see Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25 (3) (b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2012).

² 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

³ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 17, para. 56, p. 41, para. 180. The Preparatory Committee also noted that not all delegations welcomed the proposal. The U.S. was, throughout, the most insistent delegation on the elements issue. For the view that precise elements of crimes should be elaborated see also ad hoc Committee Report p. 12, para. 57. For the reports of the Preparatory Committee see Bassiouni (comp.), The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998).

⁴ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 3, p. 16, para. 52.

⁵ Ibid., para. 53.

⁶ Ibid.

developed from 1996 onwards, it was contemplated that the detail in the definition of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court (war crimes, in particular) would far exceed that in such instruments as the Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters and the Statutes of the Tribunals for Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. There would, moreover, for the first time in the constituent instrument of an international tribunal – or indeed in any concluded international criminal law treaty – be a comprehensive general part to go with the special part. Adding possibly even more detailed elements would take the principle of legality up yet another level.

That a person may only be convicted and punished on the basis of law is a long and well-established legal principle. Indeed, it is one of the most fundamental principles that underlie the concept of the rule of law. It derives from a broader principle that legal consequences of human behaviour must be predictable. To ensure this, the law should be precisely formulated. This is widely recognized not only by academic writers⁷, but also by international case law. Thus, for instance, the European Court of Human Rights has insisted that:

‘... a norm cannot be regarded as a ‘law’ unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable a citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able – if need be with appropriate advice – to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail’⁸ (emphasis added).

It does not take much imagination to realize the utmost importance of this passage in the field of criminal law. Given its repressive character, a person must not only be able to foresee but, indeed, has the right to know in advance what types of conduct will be regarded as criminal by the competent authorities. This principle has been approved by the European Court of Human Rights in the Kokkinakis case, where it stated that:

‘... an offence must be clearly defined by law. This condition is satisfied where the individual can know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the court’s interpretation of it, what acts and omissions will make him liable’⁹ (emphasis added).

Another important value involved is that, in the absence of precise definitions, there is always the possibility of arbitrary enforcement by the prosecution.

Now, the question arises with regard to the degree of certainty of the definitions of crimes: what does it mean to ‘be clearly defined by law’? It might be argued, for instance, that for a definition to be clear, it should be precisely stated. But does that take us any further from the initial uncertainty? The other possible way of addressing the question is, perhaps, to say that a definition should be narrowly formulated. But this is a misleading point also, since ‘clarity’, ‘precision’ and ‘narrowness’ are different notions¹⁰. There is, yet, another term that is used – ‘specificity’¹¹. Specificity, as opposed to generality, of a provision refers to its detailed character. This is quite understandable. The more detailed a provision is, the easier its application. It is also important from the point of view of predictability, i. e. if a particular legal provision is detailed, that a person can reasonably be expected to be able to foresee the legal consequences of his or her conduct which falls within the scope of that provision. But one has to bear in mind that ‘detailed’ is not to be understood as limited to a particular set of factual situations known to lawmakers in advance¹². Of course, it goes without saying that,

⁷ See literature.

⁸ See Sunday Times v. UK, 2 EHRR 245, Series A, Vol. 30, para. 49.

⁹ See Kokkinakis v. Greece, Series A 260-A (1993).

¹⁰ ‘Clarity’ refers to the state or quality of being easy to understand; ‘precision’ means accuracy; ‘narrowness’ is to be understood as ‘limited in range or scope’. It should be noted, however, that among the three, the first and the second notions, that is, ‘clarity’ and ‘precision’ are to some extent interdependent, since one can reasonably say that the more accurate a definition is, the clearer its meaning, while such logical a connection can hardly be made with regard to the notion of ‘narrowness’. For the differences among the meanings of the said notions see e.g. Crowther (ed.), Oxford Advanced Learner’s Dictionary of Current English (1998) 203, 206, 772, 773, 907.

¹¹ Supra note 4.

¹² This is quite apart from the more philosophical query concerning the prescriptive, rather than descriptive, nature of legal propositions.

when the law is being drafted, lawmakers do reflect in the text their conceptualized vision of some past events that gave rise to the moral necessity to criminalise a particular type of conduct¹³. But this is just the point that, when doing so, they do not compile a complete catalogue of prohibited acts or omissions, but rather define them by means of general terms like, for instance, ‘making improper use of a flag of truce’ or ‘committing outrages upon personal dignity’¹⁴. General terms, in order to satisfy the requirements of nullum crimen sine lege principle, should be certain, that is to say, beyond reasonable doubts¹⁵. In other words, there must be a common understanding among legal professionals as to their core meaning. On the other hand, it also seems to be widely accepted that terms should not be given an absolute meaning. In the case of Sunday Times v. UK, the European Court of Human Rights has insisted that:

‘... whilst certainty is highly desirable, it may bring in its train excessive rigidity and the law must be able to keep pace with changing circumstances. Accordingly, many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, are vague ...’¹⁶.

- 4 However, the very fact that we recognize the inherent vagueness of terms we use should not be exaggerated. Not unreasonably, it can be argued that vague terms can cause ambiguity which, in turn, makes us unable to ensure full respect for the rights of the accused¹⁷. This is especially true of the non-retroactivity principle, since vague terms are potentially capable of being interpreted in such a way that extends the original definition of a particular crime to such factual situations which were not intended to be covered by that definition¹⁸. As the European Commission of Human Rights held in the Gay News case:

‘... it is excluded ... that any acts not previously punishable should be held by the courts to entail criminal liability, or that existing offences should be extended to cover facts which previously did not constitute a criminal offence’¹⁹.

¹³ The phrase ‘events that gave rise to the moral necessity’ should not be understood as expressing the author’s opinion as to the possibility of derivation of ‘ought’ from ‘is’ – it is just a figure of speech.

¹⁴ ‘Even ‘the war’ or ‘the army’ are abstract concepts, strange as this may sound to some. What is concrete is the many who are killed; or the men and women in uniform, etc. ...’; Popper, The Poverty of Historicism (1957) 136.

¹⁵ It is because we define our practice by means of language, we very often come to confusion or misunderstanding about what that practice really is. Therefore, it becomes crucial that we, first of all, have a clear concept before defining it. The lack of such a concept can easily lead to the ‘extreme generality [of the definition] amounting to vacuity when ill-defined and amorphous concepts are used to cover very many different things to no significant explanatory benefit’. Campbell, Seven Theories of Human Society (1980) 44. It may be worth mentioning here the name of a Polish scholar R. Lemkin who is said to be the first to invent in 1944 the term ‘genocide’ instead of previously used one – ‘the Holocaust’ – which was given quite specific meaning, viz., the mass killing of Jews by the Nazis before and during the Second World War.

¹⁶ Supra note 8.

¹⁷ For the view that ambiguity in terms can affect the rights of the accused see note 3, Ad Hoc Committee Report, p. 12, para. 57.

¹⁸ This concern has been reflected in article 22 para. 2 of the Rome Statute which provides that ‘the definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy’.

¹⁹ See Gay News & Lemon v. UK, Vol. 28, D. R. 77, para. 9. Note: in the mentioned volume that case is referred to as X Ltd. & Y v. UK. It should be noted, however, that the two phrases used in the Commission’s decision, – ‘not previously punishable’ and ‘previously did not constitute a criminal offence’, – have different implications. The former implies that certain act was either permitted, or at least not prohibited, or, while prohibited, not sanctioned by an appropriate penal provision. The latter, quite obviously, means that an act was not considered as criminal prior to the entry into force of a particular enactment. But this, by itself, is not to say that that act was legal, since while all criminal acts are illegal, not all illegal acts are criminal. It deserves to be mentioned here, how an academic writer as eminent as Professor Hans Kelsen addressed this query in his comments on the judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal: ‘A retroactive law providing individual punishment for acts which were illegal though not criminal at the time they were committed, seems ... to be an exception to the rule against ex post facto laws. The London Agreement is such a law. It is retroactive only in so far as it established individual criminal responsibility for acts which at the time they were committed constituted violations of existing international law, but for which this law has already provided only collective responsibility ... Since ... the persons who committed these acts were certainly aware of their immoral character, the retroactivity of the law applied to them can hardly be considered as absolutely incompatible with justice’. Kelsen (1947) 1 ILQ 153. Interestingly, the International Military Tribunal characterized the principle nullum crimen sine lege as ‘not a

So far, only some substantial issues of the definitions were being considered, in particular that they should be certain and contain the essential elements of crimes. But defining crimes is also a matter of method. During the Preparatory Committee's meetings different views were expressed with regard to the method of the definitions²⁰. The view that crimes which had already reached the customary law status should be included into the Statute seemed to be widely accepted, even though there were doubts as to whether particular crimes were, at the moment, part of the customary international law. Obtaining a consensus on just which crimes were currently part of customary law was no mean feat. Not surprisingly, quite a number of delegations viewed the Statute as a codifying instrument and therefore opposed the idea that newly made crimes be included into it. Others, given that the application of the Statute was to be prospective, had few qualms about engaging in progressive development of the law. Apart from that, delegations had to come to an agreement not only on which crimes should be within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC, but also on how to define them. Some delegations favoured that crimes 'should be defined by enumeration of the specific offences rather than by reference to the relevant legal instruments'²¹. By doing so they were seeking to 'provide greater clarity and transparency, to underscore the customary law status of the definitions, to avoid a lengthy debate on the customary law status of various instruments, to avoid possible challenges by States that were not parties to the relevant agreements, to avoid the difficulties that might arise if the agreements were subsequently amended and to provide a uniform approach to the definitions of the crimes irrespective of whether they were the subject of a convention'²². There was also a suggestion to combine the two approaches.

Those who thought of the Statute as merely a procedural instrument put forward an argument that the elaboration of the precise elements of crimes would duplicate or even interfere with the work of the ILC on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind²³. Other delegations were of the opinion that the crimes should be defined exhaustively rather than illustratively 'so as to ensure the principle of legality, to provide greater certainty and predictability ... and to ensure respect for the rights of the accused'²⁴. Some of them proposed that 'the constituent elements of crimes should be set forth in the Statute or in an annex to provide ... additional guidance to the Prosecutor and the Court ... and to avoid any political manipulation of the definitions'²⁵. This proposal was opposed by several delegations. They regarded such a scrupulous elaboration of elements of crimes as a 'complex and time-consuming task'. Furthermore, they considered it unnecessary 'to provide the detailed elements of crimes, [since] ... the general definitions contained in the relevant instruments had been sufficiently precise for their practical application'²⁶. Reference was also made to the statutes of the two international criminal tribunals – for the limitation of sovereignty, but ... in general a principle of justice'. On this view it was not unjust to punish those who knew they were acting in 'defiance of all international law'. Nevertheless the Tribunal considered that the acts had been made criminal by 1939: 'The Charter makes the planning or waging of war of aggression or a war in violation of international treaties a crime; and it is therefore not strictly necessary to consider whether and to what extent aggressive war was a crime before the execution of the London Agreement In the opinion of the Tribunal, the solemn renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy necessarily involves the proposition that such a war is illegal in international law [R]esort to a war of aggression is not merely illegal, but is criminal', cited from (1947) 41 AJIL 172.

²⁰ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 3, p. 16, para. 54.

²¹ Ibid.

²² Ibid.

²³ Ibid., para. 52. As it turned out the ILC's final version of its Draft Code, which became available during the 1996 meetings of the Preparatory Committee, was a pale shadow of former efforts. Its very general listing of offences was quickly over-shadowed by much more detailed drafting in the Rome Statute. For the 1996 Draft Code, see Report of the International Law Commission, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 10, at 9, UN Doc A/51/10 (1996).

²⁴ Ibid., para. 55. See also notes 8, 9 and 17.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 17, para. 56.

²⁶ Ibid.

former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda – which merely enumerate the crimes within their subject-matter jurisdiction and lack any provision whatsoever concerning the constituent elements thereof²⁷. It should, perhaps, be noted here, that several crimes were not included into the Statute purportedly because, apart from the political considerations, there was no appropriate definition, identifying the essential elements of the crimes concerned, which the majority of delegations could accept²⁸. Nevertheless, the lack of such a definition did not prevent the inclusion of the crime of aggression within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC, subject to being defined later²⁹.

- 7 The concern was also expressed as to whether it would be necessary or possible at all to elaborate precise elements for each crime included into the Statute³⁰. Thus, for instance, article 7 para. 1 (k) refers to ‘other inhumane acts’³¹. The wording does not, by itself, make it clear which acts should be deemed to be ‘inhumane acts of a similar character’, even though it does provide for a particular harm requirement. This encouraged some delegations to oppose the inclusion of the said provision into the Statute. They argued that it ‘... would not provide the clarity and precision required by the principle of legality, would not provide the necessary certainty concerning crimes that would be subject to international prosecution and adjudication, would not sufficiently guarantee the rights of the accused and would place

²⁷ See, for instance, articles 2 (Grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions), 3 (Violations of the laws or customs of war), 4 (Genocide) and 5 (Crimes against humanity) of the Statute of the ICTY.

²⁸ They were the so-called treaty-crimes, such as crimes of terrorism (e.g. offences under the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Fixed Platforms located on the Continental Shelf), and crimes involving the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances (e.g. 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1988 UN Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances). See Res. E adopted at the end of the Rome Conference and annexed to the Final Act of the Conference, note 1, regretting ‘that no generally acceptable definition of the crimes of terrorism and drug crimes could be agreed upon for the inclusion, within the jurisdiction of the Court...’ and recommending that the matter be taken up at a Review Conference. It was not possible to obtain a consensus that these matters should be addressed at the first Review Conference in 2010 and the matter is being addressed at glacial pace in a Working Group on Amendments.

²⁹ See article 5 para. 2 of the Rome Statute and note 1. For more on the successful efforts to define the crime of aggression, see Barriga and Kress (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012); Barriga and Grover (2011) 105 AJIL 517; Clark (2010) 2 GoJIL 689; Trahan (2011) 11 ICLRev An important part of the drafting of the amendments entailed fitting the new material into the existing structure of the general part of the Statute and the existing Elements of Crimes. See Elements of the Crime of Aggression, Proposal Submitted by Samoa, UN Doc PCNICC/2002/WGCA/SP.2 (2002) and Clark (2009) 20 EJIL 1103, 1106-13.

³⁰ Interestingly, delegations that favoured the further elaboration of elements of crimes within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court seemed to be not very much concerned about the offences against the administration of justice contained in articles 70 and 71 of the Statute, since none of their proposals dealt with elements thereof. Does this mean that those offences were considered to be of such minor importance that the elaboration of their elements could be left entirely to the Court and to domestic tribunals? Or, are the definitions of the offences against the administration of justice so clear that they can be taken for granted? And, if so, what about the weight of the principle of legality so jealously advocated by all delegations? During the work of the Preparatory Commission after Rome, no serious effort was made to devise elements for these offenses, although the Rules that spell out some of the ‘principles and procedures’ governing them suggest that the general principles of criminal law contained in Part 3 of the Statute will apply, perhaps with some awkwardness. See generally, discussion of articles 70 and 71 in this Commentary and Friman, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2001) 605. Nor did the principle of legality or the desire for further elements extend to explicating the grounds for the exclusion of responsibility contained in article 31 of the Statute – they are left quite open-ended.

³¹ Subparagraph (k) of article 7, para. 1 reads as follows: ‘Other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health’. As adopted, the Elements of Crimes try to deal with the open-ended nature of this subparagraph by defining ‘character’ in a footnote asserting that: ‘It is understood that ‘character’ refers to the nature and gravity of the act’. In the course of discussion of the provision and its elements, candidates for inclusion in the category included mutilation, human experimentation and particularly violent assaults. For other potential examples, see Oosterveld, in: Sadat (ed.), Forging a Convention for Crimes Against Humanity (2011) 78, 99–100.

an onerous burden on the Court to develop the law³². No doubt these general words have to be read ejusdem generis in light of the specific proscriptions that precede them in article 7.

Disputes as to whether precise elements of crimes should be elaborated and included into the Statute continued at the Rome Conference as well. Although all delegations agreed that crimes should be defined with clarity and precision, not all of them were in favour of further elaboration of their constituent elements³³. The main disputable issues were the placement of elements (in the Statute or in an annex, or otherwise) and their legal force. The delegation of the United States of America proposed at the Rome Conference to make in the text of article 5 (Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court) a cross-reference to an annex, where elements were supposed to be placed³⁴. After several discussions a particular article XX appeared in the Bureau Proposal paper³⁵. There it was proposed that elements of crimes should be 'formulated, interpreted and applied in a manner consistent with the terms of articles'³⁶ defining crimes within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC. According to the paragraph 4 of article XX, it appeared that the Prosecutor could not exercise his or her power to commence an investigation before elements were adopted³⁷. A few days after the Bureau proposed to insert article XX into the Part 2 of the Draft Statute, the delegation of the United States of America proposed to modify the text by adding, inter alia, wording which was said to be aimed at revealing the real purpose of having the precise elements of crimes elaborated³⁸. None the less, some delegations doubted that this proposal was intended to impose additional limitations on the Court's jurisdiction.

The final version of the provision concerning Elements of Crimes appeared in the Draft Statute in 16 July 1998 formulated by the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole³⁹. It was ³² 1996 Preparatory Committee I., note 3, p. 25, para. 101.

³³ Several of the NGOs represented at the Rome Conference did not welcome the proposal either. Thus, for instance, International Commission of Jurists commented: '... the ICJ considers that the current definition of crimes in the Draft Statute generally meets the requirements of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege. There is no need at this stage for any further elaboration on the material and mental elements of crimes'. Definition of Crimes, ICJ Brief No. 1 to the UN Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court (June 1998), p. 3.

³⁴ See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.8 submitted to the Committee of the Whole on 19 June 1998. The text of the US's proposal read as follows: 'At the end of the 'Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court' section, add the following language:

'Definitional elements for these crimes, contained in annex XXX, shall be an integral part of this Statute, and shall be applied by the Court in conjunction with the general provisions of criminal law, in its determinations'. This proposal was accompanied by proposal containing suggested definitional elements, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.10. This was a revised version of material circulated in New York towards the end of the Preparatory Committee's work but not taken up in the draft of the Statute sent to Rome.

³⁵ The Bureau – the steering body of the Committee of the Whole – proposed on 10 July 1998 that a separate article, dealing with elements of crimes, be placed in Part 2 of the Draft Statute (Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law). See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59. It should be noted, however, that previously on 6 July 1998 the Bureau, in its discussion paper submitted to the Committee of the Whole, referred to the need to draft a specific provision concerning elements of crimes. See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (bold text at p. 10). The Bureau's proposal was opposed by a number of delegations. NGOs, as has already been mentioned (see note 33), also expressed their concerns as to whether it was really needed to further work on those elements. Thus, a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross, in her statement of 8 July 1998, said: 'If such a document [annex containing elements of crimes] is drafted, it is of imperative importance that it be done with extreme care. A great deal of existing law is to be found in detailed treaty provisions and in both international and national law that interprets international humanitarian law provisions. An inaccuracy could create the danger of such a document amounting to unintended international legislation rather than a reflection of existing law'. (Information conveyed by New Zealand). See UN Doc A/CONF.183/INF/10.

³⁶ See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59.

³⁷ The original text of paragraph 4 of the Bureau's proposed article XX reads as follows: 'Elements of crimes shall be adopted before the Prosecutor commences an investigation'. See note 35.

³⁸ The new proposal of the US delegation concerning the Bureau paper of 10 July 1998 was to continue paragraph 1 of article XX by the following sentence: 'They [elements of crimes] shall be applied by the Court in reaching determinations as to guilt'. See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.69 (14 July 1998). Detailed draft elements had been submitted by the US delegation to the Committee of the Whole on 19 June 1998. See note 34, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.10.

³⁹ See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.2.

numbered article 9 and its text was slightly amended compared with the previously proposed ones. Delegations agreed, after all, to include such an article into the Statute and adopted it in the so-called ‘package deal’⁴⁰.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

- 9 ‘Crime’, as a concept, is a theoretical construction. This is why definition is so important⁴¹. Defining, in its turn, is not merely a matter of choosing among terms. If we accept that a word is, to a considerable extent, a name of a concept, then it becomes quite clear why it is necessary to be consistent in terminology when defining that concept. From this point of view, it may be of interest to note that the term ‘definitional elements’, used in the draft annex proposed by the United States delegation⁴², does not seem to be entirely satisfactory, since it may be understood either as elements of the crimes as such or as elements of the definitions of crimes. Of course, elements of crimes are expressed in definitions but, this is just the point that, they are quite often expressed by means of different terms. Thus, for instance, pursuant to article 30 of the general part of the Statute, a mental element is an indispensable constituent element of all crimes within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC. It is, therefore, essential for criminal liability under the Rome Statute. Nevertheless, it can be easily noticed that in the ‘special part’ of the Statute, articles 6, 7 and 8, the mental element of various crimes is not defined identically⁴³. Different terms are used in the Statute to express the mental element of crimes: ‘deliberately’, ‘with knowledge’, ‘intentional[ly]’, ‘with the intent’, ‘with the intention’, ‘wilful[ly]’, ‘wantonly’. These appear, on their face, to be elements of definitions and led to some difficulties when the Preparatory Commission came to elaborate on the Elements of Crimes. The problem arose largely because the general part provisions were, to a substantial degree, drafted by Justice officials without careful regard to what was happening with the special part; the special part materials were, for the most part, negotiated by Foreign Affairs and Military officials with careful regard to existing treaty

⁴⁰ The ultimate document adopted at Rome, A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.2, came out late at night on 16 July 1998 – the day before the Rome Conference finished its work. There was no discussion of substantive issues concerning the Statute in the Committee of the Whole during that day. Most delegations were unwilling to break the hard-won compromise on the next and final day of the Conference when the Committee did not meet until the evening. In the evening, procedural motions were adopted taking remaining proposed amendments off the table and then the Bureau’s proposed Statute was adopted as a package without amendment.

⁴¹ During the Preparatory Committee’s sessions, delegations had to make a choice between the two proposed words ‘definition’ and ‘description’. The Preparatory Committee, at one of its meetings, noted that ‘the choice of using the word ‘description’ or ‘definition’ was dependent upon answering the question whether the definition of crimes would be solely within the Statute (in which case the term ‘definition’ would be appropriate) or whether further elaboration of the elements of the definition of a crime in the Statute might be contained in an annex (in which case the term ‘description’ might be appropriate given that this term could encompass both the statutory definition and the annexed elaboration of elements)’. See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, note 3, p. 82. Ultimately, the word ‘definition’ was chosen (see e.g. article 22 para. 2 of the Rome Statute). Needless to say, for some, the word ‘description’ is an unhappy term, in particular for the purposes of criminal law (see note 12). As was suggested elsewhere: ‘... just as the mere describing of certain conduct as violating international law does not make it so, yet it may be so as a general principle of international law, so also describing certain conduct as criminal under international law does not ipso facto make it an international crime. ... [T]he actual crime’s existence and character are dependent not on [its description in a particular international instrument] but on general principles of international law’. See Study on Ways and Means of Ensuring the Implementation of International Instruments Such as the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, including the Establishment of the International Jurisdiction Envisaged by the Convention, (E/CN.4/1426, 1981), p. 6, para. 28 and p. 7, para. 33.

⁴² See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.10.

⁴³ The drafters of the aggression amendments in the new article 8 bis seem to have been aware of the problem and avoided using any ‘mental’ words that might cause confusion with article 30.

language, much of which had state responsibility rather than individual criminal responsibility in mind. In drafting the Elements, most of these varying ways of expressing culpability elements were rendered in terms of intent and knowledge⁴⁴.

Once we realize that ‘crime’ is a theoretical construction, it becomes crucial to identify its constituent elements in order to have clear legal criteria as to who may be held criminally responsible and for what⁴⁵. Consequently, one has to be very careful when defining crimes so as to duly reflect all the necessary requirements concerning the principle of nullum crimen sine lege. This is particularly true of the international criminal law, since number, content and meaning of those elements can and, indeed, do vary from one legal system to another. Thus, for instance, in civil law countries causation is not considered to be a separate element of a crime, while in common law systems it typically is. It is important that such conceptual difficulties not be overlooked or underestimated.

1. ‘Elements of Crimes’

Article 9 of the Rome Statute refers to the Elements of Crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC without explaining further what is meant⁴⁶. In the Preparatory Committee’s reports the principal issues concerning the said elements were addressed in the ‘General Principles of Criminal Law’ part of the Draft Statute. There two separate articles were drafted: article 28 Actus Reus and article 29 *Mens Rea*⁴⁷. These two articles, together with other relevant provisions, were meant to provide for clear guidance in respect of corpus delicti of crimes included into the Draft Statute. At an early stage of the drafting in New York, the ‘actus reus’ article included an effort to deal with causation, but this was omitted before Rome. In Rome, the draft on the floor asserted in paragraph 1 that conduct for which a person can be criminally responsible can constitute either an act or an omission or a combination thereof. Paragraph 2 asserted that, unless it was otherwise provided, a person can be responsible for an omission only where (a) the omission is part of the definition of the crime either expressly or by necessary implication, or (b) that person failed to perform an act that he has an obligation to perform in order to prevent the resulting crime. Subsequently, at the Rome Conference, article 28 was deleted, in part at least since it was said to be redundant⁴⁸; article 29 was renamed ‘mental element’ and became article 30 of the Statute.

With the provision on actus reus, formerly contained in draft article 28 removed, it was left to article 30 to provide a structure of what might reasonably be regarded as the elements of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Article 30 was the focus of much discussion during the drafting of the Elements by the Preparatory Commission, since it appeared to provide a key to the connections between the special and general parts of the Statute. Article 30, as has been noted, is headed ‘mental element’. It asserts, in paragraph 1, that ⁴⁴ See note 49 and para. 2 of the General Introduction to the Elements, quoted in the text following that note.

⁴⁵ See note 6.

⁴⁶ Compare with article 22 (Elements of an International Crime) of the Draft Convention on the Establishment of an International Penal Tribunal for the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid and other International Crimes. See (E/CN.4/1426, 1981), p. 37. That draft asserted that an international crime ‘shall contain four elements: a material element, a mental element, a causal element and harm’. ‘Material element’ was further described as a voluntary act or omission. A serious defect of this important effort to address the subject was its failure to come to grips with ‘circumstance’ elements, a defect addressed in article 30 of the Rome Statute. On the other hand, note the references in the text to the absence of a causation provision in the Rome Statute. Causation had been addressed in the Apartheid Draft.

⁴⁷ Such terminology is widely used in both common law and civil law countries.

⁴⁸ See Report of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGRP/L.4/Add.1 (29 June 1998) and note the following comment in ‘Chairman’s suggestion for articles 21, 26 and 28’, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.1 (15 June 1998): ‘Another option would be to have no article dealing with omission. It seems that the substantive content of paragraph 2 (a) is largely covered by whatever is stated in the definitions of the crimes, and paragraph 2 (b) would to some extent be covered by article [28] on command responsibility at least if the approach is taken to state this as a responsibility rather than non-immunity.’ One suspects that another part of the explanation for its deletion was simply that it had become too hard to achieve a consensus on it.

‘[u]nless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge’ (emphasis added). The reference to ‘material elements’ (a term which replaced ‘physical elements’ late in the day with no explanation on the record) invites the question: what might be material elements? An examination of the definitions of intent and knowledge that follow in paragraphs 2 and 3 suggests that the drafters conceived material elements as being of three possible types: conduct elements; consequence elements and circumstance elements. These terms represent concepts that are all familiar in various legal systems, although the terminology varies. Thus article 30 para. 2 (a) defines ‘intent’ in relation to ‘conduct’ (‘a person has intent where ... that person means to engage in the conduct’). It defines intent also ‘in relation to a consequence’ in para. 2 (b) (where ‘that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events’). Finally, knowledge is defined in a way which introduces the concept of a ‘circumstance’. (Para. 3 says that ‘knowledge’ means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events.) A reasonable inference from these definitions of mental elements is that they are defined with reference to the appropriate non-mental (‘material’) elements that were at the basis of the drafters’ conceptual scheme.

Conduct, one normally thinks of as amounting to an act or omission. A consequence (or a ‘result’, or ‘harm’) is what follows from the act or omission. There is, however, overlap and many participants in the Rome process and afterwards seemed to have different notions of what constituted each of these categories. Moreover, some legal systems, especially in the common law, have a distinct category of element called ‘causation’. Causation represents a link between conduct and consequence. As a result of the omission of the earlier draft on actus reus (which itself hardly contained a comprehensive understanding of causation) there is no specific reference to causation in the Rome Statute. It must probably be subsumed in some way in either conduct or consequences. The reference to ‘circumstances’ was a crucial one and caused much debate during the drafting of the Elements. It is seldom defined, yet we know it when we see it. It relates to the nature of the prohibited conduct, or to the nature of the consequences, or to the situation in which they occur. It is not something in itself that the perpetrator ‘does’, but is rather part of the ‘scene’. In bigamy, that I am already married is a circumstance element when I am charged with going through a second ceremony already being married. That the property belonged to another is a circumstance element in theft or wilful damage. International Criminal Law is rife with similar possibilities. Did this take place in and armed conflict (national or international)? Was the victim protected by the Geneva Conventions? Was the killing (to be a crime against humanity) part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population? The drafters of the Elements ultimately decided to adopt a structure thus based on article 30’s distinction between mental and material elements and on the three kinds of material elements therein mentioned.

- 12 The requirement of ‘intent and knowledge’ was understood as a default rule during the drafting of the Elements, to be departed from if clearly required by the Statute (and in a few other instances when it was thought sensible in light of existing case-law or the instincts of the participants)⁴⁹. Accordingly, the General Introduction to the Elements provides, in relevant part:

⁴⁹ For the argument that the drafters of article 30 meant to exclude liability as a general rule based on negligence (as that term is understood by either common lawyers or civil lawyers), recklessness (as understood by common lawyers) and dolus eventualis (as understood by civil lawyers) see Clark (2001) 12 CLF 299 et seq.; id. (2008) 19 CLF 519 at 525 and 529, cited in Decision of Trial Chamber, 14 March 2012, Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06, para. 1011 note 2722; Badar (2009) 12 NCLRev 433. The Elements do not contain any references to culpability based on recklessness or dolus eventualis. Controversially, however, they do include a few examples of forms of negligence (all of them cases where some sort of mistake may be involved): Elements, article 6 (e), Genocide by forcibly transferring children (perpetrator ‘knew or should have known that the person or persons were under the age of 18 years’); article 8 para. 2 (b) (vii) –1, –2 and –4, War crimes of improper use of flags, insignias, emblems, etc. (‘Perpetrator knew or should have known of the prohibited nature

2. As stated in article 30, unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge. Where no reference is made in the Elements of Crimes to a mental element for any particular conduct, consequence or circumstance listed, it is understood that the relevant mental element, i.e., intent, knowledge or both, set out in article 30 applies. Exceptions to the article 30 standards, based on the Statute, including applicable law under its relevant provisions are indicated below.

7. The elements of crimes are generally structured in accordance with the following principles:
As the elements of crimes focus on the conduct, consequences and circumstances associated with each crime, they are generally listed in that order;
When required, a particular mental element is listed after the affected conduct, consequence or circumstance;
Contextual circumstances are listed last.⁷

The category ‘contextual circumstances’ was a spin-off from ‘circumstance’ that some participants thought was an unnecessary (but probably harmless) division of the circumstance category. In practice it refers to only three items, a manifest pattern of similar conduct in the case of genocide⁵⁰; a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population, in the case of crimes against humanity; and an armed conflict, in the case of war crimes. These are the basic circumstance elements that give the crimes the ‘international’ character that makes them appropriate for jurisdiction in an international tribunal.

a) Material Elements of Crimes. It is useful to say some more about each of the material elements derived from article 30, conduct, circumstances and consequences. It will also be helpful to say a little about ‘causation’ which represents either a ‘missing’ element, to be filled in later by the Court, or something implicit in conduct and consequences. 13 of such use’); article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxvi), and article 8 para. 2 (e) (vii), War crime of using, conscripting or enlisting children in international and non-international conflict, respectively (‘knew or should have known that such person or persons were under the age of 15 years’). Whether these examples were compliant with article 30 and the meaning of existing ‘case-law’ (if any) was hotly debated before a consensus was arrived at. Sooner or later they are bound to give rise to arguments based on article 9 para. 3 about their consistency with the Statute. In Lubanga Dyilo, the Trial Chamber did not need to address the issue, since the prosecution undertook to prove, and the Chamber found, that Lubanga ‘was fully aware that children under the age of 15 had been, and continued to be, enlisted and conscripted by the UPC/FPLC and used to participate actively in hostilities during the timeframe of the charges.’ (Para. 1347.) Thus, subjective knowledge was present.

aa) Conduct. ‘Conduct’, in most criminal law usages, comprises both an act and an omission⁵¹. For a conduct to be punishable or to constitute a crime, it must be voluntary, 14

⁵⁰ This was a highly disputed addition in the Elements. While many participants thought it was implicit in the basic understanding of what constitutes genocide, others noted that there is no specific language to that effect in article 6 of the Statute or in the Genocide Convention, from which article 6 is taken. It, too, will no doubt give rise to argument before the Court about whether it is consistent with the Statute, as required of the Elements by article 9 para. 3. Equally controversial was the mental element that should be applied to it. Some participants saw it as merely a jurisdictional element (albeit of a ‘material/circumstance’ kind) to which no mental element was necessary. Others thought that it should be subject to article 30’s intent and knowledge standard. The result was a convoluted compromise that tells to Court that it is on its own without any ‘assistance’ from the Elements: ‘Notwithstanding the normal requirement for a mental element provided for in article 30, and recognizing that knowledge of the circumstances will usually be addressed in proving genocidal intent, the appropriate requirement, if any, for a mental element regarding this circumstance will need to be decided by the Court on a case-by-case basis’. (Introduction to Elements for Genocide.) It should perhaps be noted that the ‘additional element’ added by the Preparatory Commission requires proof of a ‘manifest pattern’ which is presumably determined objectively; it does not require proof of a plan or policy. One is reminded of the dictum of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY that ‘the existence of a plan or policy is not a legal ingredient of the crime. However, in the context of proving specific intent, the existence of a plan or policy may become an important factor in most cases. The evidence may be consistent with the existence of a plan or policy, or may even show such existence, and the existence of a plan or policy may facilitate proof of the crimes’. (Prosecutor v. Jelisić, Case No. IT-95-10-AA, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 5 July 2001).

⁵¹ The draft article on actus reus provided: ‘Conduct for which a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment as a crime can constitute either an act or an omission, or a combination thereof’. See Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 64, article 28.

that is to say, it must have been willed by a perpetrator⁵². The two notions ‘act’ and ‘omission’ are in no way self-evident. Nor is it always prima facie clear where the distinction between them lies, since they can both lead to the same result⁵³. Furthermore, one can reasonably ask: when does a failure to act amount to an omission for the criminal law purposes? Or, what are the legal implications of the difference between ‘causing harm’ and ‘letting harm occur’⁵⁴?

Many delegations questioned the appropriateness of omissions for the purposes of the Rome Statute. It was argued that crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC can be committed only by an act. Indeed, it follows from the wording of the definitions that many crimes stipulated in the Statute are capable of being committed only by some kind of violent act. Such terms as ‘deliberately inflicting’, ‘forcibly transferring’, ‘attack’, ‘employing the weapons’, ‘rape’, ‘torture’, ‘taking of hostages’, etc. leave no doubt as to whether a crime so defined can be committed by an omission.

- 15 Quite obviously, for a person to be held criminally responsible for an omission, a particular crime should be defined in terms of failure to act. The draft article on actus reus contained a specific reference to this requirement providing that ‘... a person may be criminally responsible and liable for a punishment for an omission where ... the omission is specified in the definition of the crime’⁵⁵. As has been noted the very definitions of most of the crimes under the Rome Statute explicitly provide that they can be committed only by an act. Yet, there are some that can be said to provide room for such an interpretation that encompasses omissions as well. Thus, such a crime as wilful killing (article 8 para. 2 (a) (i)) is capable of being interpreted in such a way that includes faults of omission too. In that case it would cover, for instance, failure to feed prisoners of war, or to provide medical care to wounded persons, or to rescue shipwrecked persons belonging to hostile armed forces⁵⁶. Coming back to the question whether a failure to act amounts to an omission for the purposes of criminal law, it has to be kept in mind that a person may only be held criminally responsible for an omission when there existed a prior duty to act. Here, the specific question arises in respect of the source of such duty. The draft article on actus reus made criminal responsibility for an omission conditional upon pre-existing duties under the Statute⁵⁷. A provision so worded could raise concerns as to its scope. It might be understood, if taken literally, in its strictest sense according to which the Statute is the only source of such duties⁵⁸. On the other hand, there are those who would argue that a criminal statute can hardly be said to establish ‘primary’ duties to act or abstain from acting in a certain way. Indeed, it is the Hague Conventions of 1907, the Geneva Conventions of 1949 together with the two Additional Protocols of 1977, a number of other international instruments (and ⁵² The term ‘willed conduct’ in this context should, perhaps, be clarified in a sense that it refers to the controllability thereof as opposed to actio libera in causa. Furthermore, the word ‘willed’, here, is not to be understood as imposing a particular mens rea threshold, such as ‘specific intention’, etc.

⁵³ Is, for example, ‘starvation’ a result of the deprivation of access to food (in which case it, seemingly, constitutes an act) or failure to feed (in which case it constitutes an omission)?

⁵⁴ Is, for instance, failure to feed prisoners to be qualified as ‘causing harm’ or ‘letting harm to occur’? And, does the distinction really make a practical difference?

⁵⁵ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, note 51, pp. 64 et seq., article 28 para. 2 (a).

⁵⁶ Pictet (ed.), Commentary on the Geneva Convention I (1952) 371; id. (ed.), Commentary on the Geneva Convention II (1960) 267; id., Commentary on the Geneva Convention III (1960) 626 et seq.; id. (ed.), Commentary on the Geneva Convention IV (1958) 597. A footnote to the Elements asserts that the conduct element of extermination – one of the crimes against humanity (article 7 para. 1 (b)) – ‘could include the deprivation of access to food and medicine’.

⁵⁷ The draft article 28 provided that: ‘... a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for an omission where the person ... is ... under a pre-existing [legal] obligation under this Statute to avoid the result of [the] crime ...’. Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, note 51, pp. 64–65 (paragraph 2 (b)). (Emphasis added.)

⁵⁸ The Preparatory Committee noted that some ‘delegations thought that, in the context of the offences of the Statute, breach of an obligation under the Statute to avoid the result of a crime was sufficient’. See note 51 (fn. 15, p. 66).

possibly customary law) that proscribe particular types of conduct. Therefore, the source of pre-existing duties is potentially much wider than the Statute itself. However one makes the analysis, it will be impossible to interpret the Statute in some instances without a reference out to such sources in order to understand duties.

Omissions are criminally punishable only where a person failed to prevent the harm from which victims have a special right or, speaking in Hohfeldian terms, privilege to be protected. Persons entitled to a special protection and their respective rights are well determined. Yet, the Statute's most specific aspect of criminally punishable omissions (article 28) is failure of a person occupying a particular position of power to prevent the commission of a crime by his or her subordinates. Here a person appears to be responsible for crimes committed by others. But this is so only at first glance. In fact, it is just a figure of speech. No one may be held responsible for crimes which he or she has not committed or participated in their commission himself or herself. Individual responsibility is a fundamental principle of criminal law. What indeed a commander or other superior is responsible for is his or her own criminal conduct, that is to say, failure 'to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress [the commission of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court] or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution'⁵⁹. Moreover, in this context, the very crimes that have been committed by subordinates are conceived of as being a result of superior's failure to exercise control properly over them as explained article 28 mn 22 et seq.

bb) Circumstances. Acts and omissions do not take place in a vacuum. In most, if not in all, instances human beings act or abstain from acting because they think, rightly or wrongly, that those particular circumstances so require. It is therefore very important in order to justly evaluate human conduct to take into account the attendant circumstances. An act that prima facie seems to be a crime does not necessarily lead to perpetrator's responsibility or punishment. Thus, for instance, a person who commits such an act while defending himself or herself may not be held criminally liable provided that the method of defence was proportionate to the real danger to his or her life. This is a matter of grounds for excluding of criminal responsibility⁶⁰. Apart from that, the same acts committed in different circumstances are not qualified identically. Thus, such acts as rape, torture, deportation, etc. can be qualified either as crimes against humanity or war crimes, depending, inter alia, upon the attendant circumstances. In the Rome Statute those circumstances are generally defined in the chapeau of the respective articles. There, the special thresholds have been provided for, so as to distinguish particular categories of crimes. Let us take, for instance, torture. This offence, in order to be qualified as a crime against humanity, needs to be committed 'as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population'⁶¹. It follows from the wording of this provision that isolated acts of torture, while being criminally punishable under national jurisdictions, do not constitute a crime against humanity, as defined in the Rome Statute, and consequently, do not fall within the jurisdiction of the ICC. So, it might be argued that if the circumstances mentioned above are present, then even a single act of torture can lead to criminal responsibility of a perpetrator⁶². However, this is excluded by article 7 para. 2 lit. a of the Rome Statute. That article defines 'attack directed against any civilian population', in the context of which certain acts need be committed so as to be qualified as crimes against humanity, as 'a course of conduct involving the multiple commission of [those] acts'. The phrase 'multiple commission of acts' explicitly provides that a single act does not constitute a crime against humanity, even if committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population.

⁵⁹ See article 28 paras. 1 (b) and 2 (c) of the Rome Statute. Interestingly, and quite in contrast to the argument suggested in the text, this provision has been commented in such a way that makes the Statute itself a source of the duty concerned. See Wise, 'Part 3. General Principles of Criminal Law', 13ter NEP (1998) 49 et seq. Here, the author, while commenting on responsibility of commanders and other superiors, writes: 'In this instance, the Statute itself imposes a duty to act'. Some remain of the opinion that a criminal statute does not impose a duty, but rather reinforces one provided for elsewhere. Thus, concerning the responsibility of commanders it is article 87 of the Add. Prot. I that stipulates duties 'to prevent or suppress', the breach of which serves as a ground of criminal responsibility of commanders and other superiors (see also article 86 of the Protocol). On the relationship between treaties and the general law, see McLachlan (2005) 54 ICLQ 2779.

⁶⁰ During the discussion of the Elements by the Preparatory Commission post-Rome, some delegations were strongly of the view that the grounds of exclusion of responsibility should be regarded as 'elements' of the relevant crimes. Others took a different view. No definitive conclusion was reached and the Preparatory Committee took a pragmatic approach by simply leaving the issue for another day. This pragmatic conclusion is recorded in paragraph 5 of the General Introduction to the Elements thus: 'Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility or the absence thereof are generally not specified in the elements listed under each crime'. In the United States, the Model Penal Code includes within the definition of 'element of an offense' such 'conduct', 'attendant circumstances' and 'result of conduct' as 'negatives an excuse or justification for such conduct'. The most important practical effect of this definition, under the structure of the Code, is that the burden of proving that the conditions for the defence are not met lies with the prosecution – the burden of proof in respect of all elements lies on the prosecution. Justifications and excuses, in the Model Penal Code, seem to be examples of 'attendant circumstances'.

- 18 Furthermore, some crimes can only be committed in very specific circumstances. These are the so-called 'war crimes'. The very term explicitly provides that there must be an armed conflict so as to particular offences can be qualified as 'war crimes'. Indeed, such acts as 'bombarding of towns which are undefended and which are not military objectives', 'killing a combatant who has surrendered at discretion', etc. clearly imply, by their definition, active hostilities and do not raise conceptual difficulties. But the issue is complicated by the fact that quite a number of crimes can be committed both in time of peace and in time of war. Thus, for instance, genocide is such a crime⁶³. So are crimes against humanity⁶⁴. In this view, if we, again, take torture as an example, but this time committed during an armed conflict, we can be slightly puzzled. What does make torture a war crime? Is it sufficient that it merely be committed during an armed conflict? In case of the positive answer to the latter question, do we not assume that crimes against humanity cannot be committed during an armed conflict? Can the nature of an armed conflict (international or non-international) affect the qualification of torture as a war crime as opposed to a crime against humanity?

Again, the very term 'torture' does not specify acts by means of which it can be committed. From this point of view, what does make 'torture' different from 'inhumane treatment' or 'outrages upon personal dignity'? Can, for instance, rape be regarded as a form of torture? If it can, then how is it supposed to be differentiated from rape as a separate crime provided for by article 7 para. 1 (g) and article 8 para. 2 (b) (xxii)⁶⁵?

⁶¹ See article 7 para. 1 of the Statute.

⁶² As the ICTY has held: '... a single act by a perpetrator taken within the context of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population entails criminal responsibility and an individual perpetrator need not to commit numerous offences to be held liable'. See Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Judgement and Opinion, Trial Chamber, 14 July 1997, para. 649.

⁶³ Article 1 of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide provides that 'genocide, whether committed in time of peace or in time of war, is a crime under international law'. Somewhat surprisingly, article 6 of the Rome Statute which defines the crime concerned in terms of the Genocide Convention lacks the specific reference to the possibility of committing genocide in time of peace as well as in time of war, but that must be implicit.

⁶⁴ '... customary international law no longer requires any nexus between crimes against humanity and armed conflict'. See Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-A, Decision on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, para. 141.

⁶⁵ Obviously, the last three questions cannot be satisfactorily answered if only the conduct element of crimes is taken into consideration. As paragraph 9 of the General Introduction to the Elements puts it: 'A particular conduct may constitute one or more crimes'. Circumstances, or 'contextual circumstances', are crucial in determining whether, for instance, a homicide may be prosecuted as genocide, a crime against humanity or a war crime – or all three. Like many legal words, 'circumstance' may have more than one meaning, depending upon context. We have already discussed in the text the use of 'circumstance' to denote one of the material elements of a crime. Note, however, how the word is used in paragraph 3 of the General Introduction to the Elements: 'Existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances'. Here 'circumstances' is used to describe physical characteristics of the situation which, in themselves, are probably not 'elements' of the offence but which enable the fact-finder to draw relevant inferences about one of the elements. Intent to kill, for example, may be inferred from the use of a machete on someone's head. Note also the reference

Apart from that, some acts can be qualified as a particular crime only when there is a connection with other crimes. Thus, for instance, persecution has been defined in the Rome Statute in such a way that makes its adjudication by the ICC conditional upon the connection of the crime concerned with any other crime within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court. Consequently, persecution on specified grounds of persons belonging to any identifiable group or collectivity does not amount to a crime against humanity, as defined in the Rome Statute, if committed out of the context of any crime defined in articles 6, 7 and 8 of the Statute. That the attendant circumstances or context in which acts are committed do serve as a qualifying criterion can also be illustrated by the crime of apartheid. Article 7 para. 2 (h) of the Rome Statute defines apartheid as inhumane acts committed in the context of an institutional regime of systematic oppression and domination by one racial group over any other racial group or groups. It is this particular context, inter alia, that makes it possible to make a distinction between the two crimes – apartheid and genocide⁶⁶.

A context is not necessarily composed only of factual circumstances. For the qualification of quite a number of crimes specific legal requirements are indispensable. Thus, for a deportation or forcible transfer of population to be a crime against humanity, there must be two legal requirements: first, persons being deported or forcibly transferred must be lawfully present in the area concerned, and second, deportation or forcible transfer must be conducted without grounds permitted under international law⁶⁷. Here, as in the case of torture considered above, a particular conceptual difficulty can arise. How should acts of deportation or transfer defined respectively in article 7 para. 2 (d) and article 8 para. 2 (a) (vii) be differentiated? Obviously, the fact that deportation or transfer is taking place during an armed conflict does not, by itself, make it a war crime⁶⁸. There must be a connection with the course of an armed conflict⁶⁹. In other words, the qualifying criterion is not just an overlap in time, but also, and most importantly, an interconnectedness between the acts concerned and the conduct of military operations, including their planning and preparation. The last comment equally concerns any other war crime enumerated in article 8 para. 2.

Crimes can also be qualified, inter alia, on the basis of their object. Thus, the object of crimes against humanity is a civilian population only, while acts constituting war crimes can, and normally are, directed against persons belonging to armed forces too. Furthermore, war crimes can also be committed against the civilian population in occupied territories, while victims of crimes against humanity can be any civilian population, including the population of the Occupying Power, if there is one. Apart from that, the object of war crimes can be not only human beings, but also property, installations, material, vehicles, the natural environment, historic monuments, hospitals and any other object specifically defined and protected in article 28 para. a (i) of the Rome Statute (responsibility of military commander) to 'the circumstances at the time' which phrase is used to set up the possibility of negligence liability. 'Circumstances' when used to describe a situation for evidentiary purposes typically (but not invariably) appears in the plural. 'Circumstance' when used to describe an element typically (but not invariably) appears in the singular.

⁶⁶ In the Preamble of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid (1973), which also has a normative dimension, there is a reference to the overlapping character of acts of genocide and apartheid. Thus, it says that 'certain acts of [genocide] may also be qualified as acts of apartheid'.

⁶⁷ See article 7 para. 1 (d) and 7 para. 2 (d) of the Statute. In an example of a finesse used many times in drafting The Elements, para. 3 of the Elements of the 'crime against humanity of deportation or forcible transfer of population' requires the prosecution to prove only that: 'The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established the lawfulness of such presence'. This drafting technique is used to avoid the difficulties connected with the 'mistake of law' defence in article 32 of the Statute. The element in question is regarded as a factual one and thus the emphasis is shifted to the perpetrator's evaluation of the facts rather than an evaluation of the (more difficult) legal situation. Whether such efforts are consistent with the Statute may provide room for future argument pursuant to article 9 para. 3 of the Rome Statute. For a similar finesse, see note 73.

⁶⁸ Otherwise we will not be able to reasonably argue that crimes against humanity can be committed both in time of war and in time of peace. Furthermore, it is now well-established that crimes against humanity need not be connected with military conduct (see note 64).

⁶⁹ That there must be a connection with an armed conflict is implicit in all war crimes. But, perhaps, most explicitly it has been provided for in paragraph 2 (e) (viii) of article 8 which criminalises 'ordering the displacement of the civilian population for reasons related to the conflict ...' (emphasis added).

by international humanitarian law. The object of some crimes like, for instance, murder, extermination, deportation, taking of hostages, etc. is defined in general terms. However, there are crimes that have a very specific object. Among such crimes ‘forcibly transferring children of the group to another group’, ‘compelling a prisoner of war to serve in the forces of a hostile Power’ can be exemplified. The very definitions of these crimes explicitly state the object against which certain acts are directed: children and a prisoner of war, respectively. Yet, the definitions of some other crimes do not verbally name their object, but the natural meaning of their context leave no doubt as to what a certain criminal act is directed against. Thus, for instance, ‘forced pregnancy’ can only be understood as some kind of violent acts the victim of which is a woman, since, naturally, only women are capable of being impregnated⁷⁰. Despite the fact that such crimes as ‘rape’, ‘sexual slavery’ and ‘enforced prostitution’ are mostly committed against women, men also can be victimized by the crimes concerned⁷¹. The Elements follow the Statute in taking a gender neutral approach to such crimes by using the word ‘persons’ to describe victims, except in those cases like ‘forced pregnancy’ that can only be committed against women.

20 cc) Consequences. ‘Material element of a crime’ can also include some kind of harmful result. Needless to say, that for harm to be a constituent element of a crime, it must be provided for by a definition thereof⁷². In other words, whenever a crime is conceived of as including harmful result and a definition of that result is provided, harm becomes an indispensable material element of the crime concerned which the Rome Statute subsumes under the category of ‘consequences’. For the qualification of most of the crimes within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC, causing a certain physical result is decisive. Thus, crimes defined in terms of ‘killing’, ‘murder’, ‘extermination’, ‘physical destruction’, ‘loss of life’ are all about causing death to human beings. The definitions of some other crimes concern physical (bodily) or mental harm. Wherever the object of a crime is something tangible (property, installations, hospitals, buildings dedicated to a certain purpose, such as religion, education, art, etc.) or defined in terms of a certain area (towns, villages, or other areas immune from military operations), or even conceived of more generally, as in case with natural environment, the damage caused to such an object constitutes a harmful result. Apart from physical, mental and property kinds of harm, there can also be moral ones. Thus, harm caused by acts constituting such crimes as persecution, imprisonment, enforced disappearance, deprivation of the rights of fair and regular trial, conscripting or enlisting children under the age of fifteen into armed forces, etc. is clearly moral, since it concerns the basic human rights. All these can be considered ‘consequences’.

21 The consequence requirement can be explicitly provided for by a definition (e.g. ‘wilful killing’, ‘extensive destruction of property’) or be implicit in the concept of a crime (e.g. ‘bombarding of towns which are undefended and which are not military objectives’, ‘rape’). If a definition of a crime, apart from the reference to harm itself, contains also a particular value-judgment in respect of the harm concerned, then the actually caused harm must be of a certain character which meets a statutory evaluative requirement. Such an evaluative requirement can, as harm itself, be either explicitly provided for by a definition (e.g. ‘causing serious bodily or mental harm’, ‘wilfully causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or health’) or implicit in the concept of a crime (e.g. ‘torture’, ‘inhumane treatment’, ‘outrages upon human dignity’)⁷³.

⁷⁰ For the statutory definition of ‘forced pregnancy’ see article 7 para. 2 (f).

⁷¹ In quite a number of national jurisdictions the statutory object of such crime as rape can only be women. Moreover, there may well be a case where a criminal law provision is worded or judicial practice is developed in such a way that excludes criminal responsibility of a man who has raped his wife.

⁷² Article 22 (Elements of an International Crime) of the Draft Convention on the Establishment of an International Penal Tribunal for the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid and other International Crimes provided that ‘[t]he element of harm shall depend upon the definition of the crime ...’. See E/CN.4/1426,1981, p. 37. That harm must be provided for by a definition of a crime does not mean, however, that it must necessarily be verbally stated; it is possible to arrive at the respective conclusion by means of deduction if a particular crime has been conceived of as including a certain harm requirement. Thus, for instance, the concept of crimes defined in terms of directing attacks against civilian population or certain objects perhaps implies that there must be some harmful result, even though definitions of such crimes in the Statute and the Elements do not contain any reference to harm.

It has been mentioned above that a consequence is a constituent element of a crime only when it has been so conceived and its definition provided. It is therefore not an indispensable element of all crimes. Indeed, the concept of such crimes as ‘declaring that no quarter will be given’, ‘declaring abolished, suspended or inadmissible in a court of law the rights and actions of the nationals of a hostile party’, ‘ordering the displacement of the civilian population for reasons related to the conflict, unless the security of the civilians involved or imperative military reasons so demand’ does not require any harmful result. It means that merely ‘declaring’ or ‘ordering’ constitutes, in this context, a completed crime⁷⁴. Harm, in this case, would be contingent upon the subsequent acts of subordinates and serve as an aggravating factor – or as an element of further crimes, responsibility for which might fall to be decided under articles 25 and 28 of the Statute. 22

dd) Causation. Whenever a crime is conceived of as including both act/omission and a certain harmful result, a specific conceptual difficulty arises. This is a matter of causation. It is quite common to think that the connection between act/omission and a certain harmful result is of factual nature. However, this is too much simplistic an approach. Of course, if a soldier shoots at civilians not taking part in hostilities or combatants who have surrendered at discretion and they immediately die, such a connection between the act of the former and death of the latter can be explained in terms of cause-in-fact, since the act and the result concerned are physical and therefore capable of being linked to each other as cause and effect. But suppose that those combatants died not immediately, but subsequently in a hospital where they were intentionally deprived of medical care. What, in this case, would be the cause of their death? Obviously, the very fact that the wounded died not immediately, but subsequently, did not break the chain of causation. Speaking in physical terms, the cause (but perhaps now one cause) had always been the same, i. e. they died because they were shot. Moreover, deprivation of medical care is not a physical act, if it is an act at all, and it is conceptually difficult to view it as the physical cause of death of the wounded persons concerned. But what is it, then, that medical personnel are responsible for? Yet we have little difficulty in concluding that it is entirely appropriate to attribute the deaths, as a legal matter, both to the soldier who did the shooting and the medical personnel who failed to act or who acted improperly. Legal cause, then, can very much be a question of legal attribution. There can be more than one cause and not every one of them need to be regarded as ‘but for’ antecedents of the proscribed result. 23

Another, perhaps even more puzzling example, is the crime of ‘making improper use of a flag of truce ... resulting in death or serious personal injury’. It is evident that making ⁷³ Para. 4 of the General Introduction to the Elements provides that ‘With respect to mental elements associated with elements involving value judgement, such as those using the terms ‘inhumane’ or ‘severe’, it is not necessary that the perpetrator personally completed a particular value judgement, unless otherwise indicated’. On how this provision came about, see Clark (2001) 12 CLF 322 et seq. For similar efforts to avoid difficulties with circumstance elements involving ‘legal’ evaluations, see note 67.

⁷⁴ That ‘ordering’, in this context, constitutes a completed crime is important. It is important inasmuch as it differs from giving orders to commit any other crime within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC. In the latter case ‘ordering’ is a form of participation in or contribution to the commission of a crime ‘which in fact occurs or is attempted’. See article 25 para. 3 (b) of the Rome Statute. Two issues – qualification of a crime and determination of the role that a person played in the commission thereof – must be conceptually differentiated. However, there seems to be an exception to this. Article 25 para. 3 (e) provides that a person who ‘in respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide’ shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment. Direct and public incitement to commit genocide was criminalised already in 1948 by the article III (c) of the Genocide Convention and conceived of as having a feature of a completed crime, i. e. no subsequent act or harm is required so as to a person be held criminally responsible and liable for punishment. Like an attempt, it is an ‘inchoate’ offence. The Genocide Convention, article III (b), also criminalised the inchoate offence of conspiracy to commit genocide, even where the genocide did not occur. This is not carried forward into the Rome Statute.

improper use of a flag of truce or of the military insignia and uniform of the enemy or of the United Nations cannot by itself cause death or serious personal injury. In this view, what meaning is to be given to the word ‘resulting’? Furthermore, the principle of causation is unhelpful for determination of criminal responsibility of commanders or superiors, as defined in article 28 of the Rome Statute, or any person who orders, solicits or induces the commission of a crime. The consequences of such an order or incitement cannot be consistently described or explained in terms of factual causation. Some notions of attribution are essential⁷⁵.

- 24 It was once proposed, however, to define causal element as follows: ‘conduct is the cause of a result when it is an antecedent but for which the result in question would not have occurred ...’⁷⁶. The concept of ‘but for’ is at the very core of this definition. It provides that if a particular result would have occurred but for an antecedent conduct, then the latter cannot be regarded as its cause. Thus, as is seen, this concept is of an exclusionary nature and is hard to apply to cases where multiple causes are involved. Nor is it of any help for the matter of imputation of criminal responsibility⁷⁷. ‘But for’ causation is especially unhelpful in analyzing the responsibility of those such as aiders or abettors or participants in a group with a common purpose whose responsibility falls to be determined under article 25 of the Statute. Their actual contribution of a ‘causal’ nature may be quite minimal – certainly not of a ‘but for’ nature – and yet their criminal responsibility is believed to be appropriate. The draft article 28 on actus reus also contained a reference to causation. The linguistic form of it was, however, optional, that is, three alternative words were proposed to be used in respect of the connection between the harm and individual’s conduct: ‘caused’, ‘accountable’, and ‘attributable’⁷⁸. If the choice is limited only to these terms, then, to be consistent, the last one is preferable⁷⁹. After all, the question to be solved by the Court is not – ‘What is the cause of a particular harmful result?’, but rather – ‘Who is [justly] responsible for that result?’⁸⁰.

- 25 b) Mental Elements of Crimes. A material element of a crime is thus necessary but not sufficient for the qualification thereof. Most, if not all, of the questions, posed above, cannot be satisfactorily answered if a particular mental state of a perpetrator is not taken into consideration. Moreover, and as far as criminal responsibility is concerned, a person may be held liable for punishment only if his or her conduct was voluntary or willed⁸¹. It is, indeed, an elementary point that only when a person controlled his or her conduct, is it just to

⁷⁵ In this regard, comments during the drafting process that causation was ‘largely a factual matter which the Court itself could consider and decide upon’ missed the mark. 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 3, p. 45, para. 198; Preparatory Committee Decisions Feb. 1997, p. 27, fn. 22; Zutphen Draft, p. 59, fn. 97.

⁷⁶ See article 22, Draft Convention on the Establishment of an International Penal Tribunal for the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid and other International Crimes, (E/CN.4/1426, 1981), p. 37.

⁷⁷ ‘Imputation, which expresses itself in the concept of responsibility, is ... not the connection between a certain behavior and an individual who thus behaves – as assumed by traditional theory; for this, no connection by a legal norm is necessary, because the behavior and the behaving individual cannot be separated ... Imputation, implied in the concept of responsibility, is the connection between a certain behavior, namely a delict, with a sanction’. Kelsen, Pure Theory of Law (1989) 81.

⁷⁸ See e.g. 1998 Preparatory Committee, note 51, p. 65, article 28 para. 3: ‘A person is only criminally responsible under this Statute for committing a crime if the harm required for the commission of the crime is caused by and [accountable] [attributable] to his or her act or omission’.

⁷⁹ ‘The idea that an accused can be held responsible only for harmful results which are attributable to his own conduct is, in fact, somewhat wider than a causation rule. It carries forward the basic proposition ... that criminal responsibility is individual and therefore a matter of what the accused has or has not done – not a matter of what others have done or what extraneous circumstances have accidentally produced’. Wise, ‘Part 3. General Principles of Criminal Law’, 13ter NEP (1998) 49.

⁸⁰ ‘That an individual is responsible for his behavior means that he may be punished for this behavior; and that he is irresponsible, or not responsible, means that he, for the same behavior ... may not be punished. That means, that in the first case a definite behavior is, in the second case this behavior is not, connected with punishment; that the behavior is or is not a condition for punishment; that punishment is or is not imputed to the behavior’. Kelsen, Pure Theory of Law (1989) 81.

⁸¹ See note 52.

impute responsibility to him or her. An appropriate mental state on the part of a person who is responsible for the material element is therefore indispensable for determination of guilt. Apart from that, it is also very important for the qualification of crimes. For instance, it is the specific mental state requisites that lie at the very basis of the concept of such crime as genocide, and that are conceived of as providing a criterion for differentiation thereof from such a crime against humanity as extermination. To put it in other way, mental state requisites are conceived of as constituting a mental element of a crime. The latter, as a crime itself, is a theoretical construction and it is therefore of utmost importance to be consistent in terminology so as to a definition be in accordance with a concept.

aa) Intent, knowledge or both. The principal issues of mental element of crimes are generally defined in article 30. There it has been provided that '[u]nless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge'. The conjunctive 'and' implies that the mental element is composed of two sub-elements: first, intellectual sub-element – knowledge; second, moral sub-element – intent. This means (at least for many civil lawyers) that the state of mind of a perpetrator must encompass both sub-elements in order that responsibility be imputed to him or her. Common lawyers tend to see the 'and' as disjunctive – in some situations intent (as to result, for example) is crucial; in others (such as circumstance elements) it is knowledge that is important⁸².

It has already been mentioned more than once that it is indispensable that conduct be voluntary. By this it is meant that a person must control his or her behaviour, i. e. be aware of what he or she is doing so as to be held responsible. Without this requirement there can be no responsibility⁸³. Awareness of the nature of a conduct implies awareness of the attendant circumstances. For quite a number of crimes, as defined in the Rome Statute, it is required that a person be aware of not only what he or she is doing, but also of what conduct others are engaged in or even of what others are intending or have planned to do. For instance, the intent of the perpetrator 'to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such' (which must presuppose some awareness) is decisive for the qualification of the accused conduct as genocide⁸⁴; awareness of a widespread or systematic attack is needed in order to qualify a particular conduct as a crime against humanity; a person to be held responsible for a conduct contributing to the commission or attempted commission of a crime by a group must be aware of the intention of the group to commit that crime; the knowledge of what forces or subordinates were doing or about to do is also indispensable for criminal responsibility of commanders or other superiors.

bb) Inferring knowledge. For the purpose of criminal responsibility, knowledge can (in some situations) be not only actual but also imputed. In the first case, it is a matter of proof. It has to be proved that a person knew, at the time the crime was being committed, that he or she was engaged in criminal conduct. Of course, as paragraph 3 to the General Introduction to the Elements notes, 'Existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances'. In the case of imputed knowledge, what is required is proof that there existed events of which a person in the situation of the accused cannot be reasonably said to be unaware. Not knowing what is known to everyone is, although possible, not a reasonable defence. The specific aspect of this appears in respect of criminal responsibility of commanders⁸⁵. Thus, article 28 para. 1 (a) has made responsibility of a commander conditional; inter alia, upon attributed knowledge of crimes committed by forces under his or her effective ⁸² Clark (2001) 12 CLF 302 et seq. The General introduction to the Elements, reproduced in Annex II of this work, reflects this ambiguity when it refers to 'intent, knowledge or both'.

⁸³ See article 32 para. 1 of the Rome Statute.

⁸⁴ Note also the 'contextual element' note 50, added to genocide by the Preparatory Commission.

⁸⁵ The specificity of a commander's responsibility is in his or her ability to control armed forces. That position imposes a special duty to know what those forces are doing or about to do. The negligent attitude to the duty command and control. The phrase ‘owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known’ makes it impossible for a commander to reasonably deny knowing about criminal conduct which forces under his or her effective command and control were engaged in. This is the most striking application in the Statute itself of the ‘unless otherwise provided’ language at the beginning of article 30 of the Statute. Article 28 provides an explicit exception to the intent and knowledge standard both with a kind of negligence standard for military commanders and, a recklessness or dolus eventualis standard (in article 28 para. b) for other superiors.

- 28 cc) Knowledge of consequences. Knowledge, as defined in article 30 para. 3, means awareness not only of an existing circumstance but also ‘that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events’. Knowledge about a consequence that is likely to occur is perhaps better called foresight. Foresight, however, is even more complex a concept than knowledge. It is ‘knowledge’ about what has not yet occurred. The issue is also complicated by the degree of uncertainty in the likelihood of a particular result. Did the given act inevitably lead to the result the foresight of which is attributed to a perpetrator, or may be that result was only one of several possible consequences of the act concerned? Furthermore, for the purpose of criminal responsibility, foresight is never taken separately, but only in connection with intent or recklessness. Indeed, foresight of particular consequences is very important for determination that a person acted or abstained from acting intentionally or recklessly. From this point of view, it is somewhat strange that article 30 defined both knowledge and intent in terms of ‘awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events’. Since recklessness seems to have been rejected as a basis of responsibility under the Statute (and, at least in the Elements, none of the drafting leaves this as a possibility) then the appropriate standard (knowledge) involves foresight of a near certainty – awareness that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.
- 29 dd) Intent as to conduct and consequences. Knowledge about the attendant circumstances is, of course, very important. But for quite a number of crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC it is not sufficient that a person merely be aware of what conduct he or she is engaged in. The statutory definitions of those crimes clearly provide that there must be some kind of intent. The concept of intent is also complex. It has, as defined in article 30 para. 2, two contextual meanings: one is related to conduct, another – to a consequence. It follows from this that, whenever a crime is conceived of as including both conduct and harmful result, it has to be proved before the Court that a person acted or abstained from acting intentionally and that the result in question was also intended. If the concept of a crime does not encompass harm, then it is enough to prove that an act or omission was intended. It is not required, it should be noted, that a person specifically intends to commit ‘a crime’. If it is proved that he or she was acting intentionally in respect of conduct of a consequence or knowingly in respect of a circumstance, then it becomes irrelevant whether a perpetrator was aware of criminal nature of the conduct concerned, unless there exist situations provided for in articles 32 and 33 para. 1 (a), (b) and (c)⁸⁶.
- 30 ee) Knowledge and the causation puzzle. In addition, it should be noted that intent also provides, to some extent, a solution to the puzzling issue of causation, considered above. That is to say that, when it is proved that a person, engaged in criminal conduct, intended the occurrence of a particular harmful result, that result can be said to be caused by him or her.

concerned creates a risk of the forces becoming uncontrolled. Uncontrolled armed forces, in their turn, are potentially capable of committing crimes.

⁸⁶ A full appreciation of intent and knowledge requires an understanding of how mistakes of fact and law amount to a denial of the relevant mental element. Articles 32 and 33 present potential grounds for the exclusion of responsibility related in particular to knowledge in respect of circumstance elements. For the different approaches to the exceedingly difficult questions of mistake of law in this context, see Triffterer, Article 32, this Commentary, and Clark (2001) 12 CLF 308 et seq. See also note 73 concerning elements involving a ‘value judgement’.

Thus, for instance, if a person, who is in charge of providing medical care to wounded, intentionally deprives them of it in the knowledge that such a deprivation will inevitably lead to their death, then, for the purpose of criminal responsibility, the conduct concerned can be regarded as the cause of the harmful result in question. This is so, even though it may be quite appropriate to regard another cause as also relevant, such as a particular physical act or series of acts – a shooting or shootings for instance.

2. ‘shall assist’

It has been mentioned that the text of article 9 reflects the political compromise reached at the very end of the Rome Conference. The phrase ‘shall assist’ is one of the results of that compromise. It substituted for the previously proposed wording. Indeed, during the Rome Conference it was suggested that elements of crimes ‘shall be applied by the Court in reaching determinations as to guilt’⁸⁷. Undoubtedly, ‘shall be applied’ is much stricter wording than ‘shall assist in application’. It implies that annexed elements of crimes are as binding as the main provisions of the Rome Statute, that the Court has very narrow discretion, if at all, concerning application thereof, and that the definitions of crimes are not certain enough to be applied as such⁸⁸. From this point of view, the phrase ‘shall assist in application’ is quite flexible. It connotes that it is the definitions of crimes, first of all, that are to be applied, that the Court does have, to a reasonable extent, discretion in the interpretation thereof, and that the binding force of the statutory definitions of crimes and annexed elements is hardly the same.

3. ‘interpretation and application’

It has long become common to a considerable number of jurists to think that the process of adjudicating is composed of three stages: first, finding or choosing a particular rule to be applied; second, interpreting the found or chosen rule; third, applying the interpreted rule. Such mode of thinking is largely formed by the positivistic, in particular extreme versions of analytical jurisprudence. It conceives law as a logically complete system of rules that provide all possible and correct answers to individual cases. Furthermore, and as far as logic is concerned, the concept of judicial process is definitely affected by the syllogistic pattern of reasoning. This is to say that, all a judge has to do, according to such a conception, is to deduce a particular conclusion from the two given premises. The simplest way of describing this process is the following:

- Rule ‘R’ provides that a certain type of conduct is a crime (major premise);
- A person ‘A’ had been engaged in that type of conduct (minor premise);
- ‘A’ has committed a crime; or, ‘A’ is a criminal (conclusion).

This, it has to be said, is too much simplistic a conception. First of all, a judge never starts from the major premise. What is done at the beginning of the process of adjudication is an examination of a particular factual situation brought before the Court. A judge must be convinced that all necessary evidence has been duly scrutinized before he or she could decide whether the conduct in question is a crime. Furthermore, it is not always prima facie clear which provision is to be applied to a given case. Is, for instance, forced castration or sterilization a war crime, as defined in article 8 para. 2 (b) (x) and (e) (xi), or a crime against humanity, as defined in article 7 para. 1 (g), or a crime of genocide, as defined in article 6 para. d? Indeed, the reasoning process is not as one that has been described above. But nor is it totally contrary to it. The two premises are interrelated. Examination of facts and choosing a rule to be applied constitute a harmonic process and cannot be separated⁸⁹. Moreover, since any rule is to an extent vague, the contextual interpretation thereof is unavoidable⁹⁰. For this, judges do use discretion. It is wrong to think that discretion in application is used only when a case is hard, i. e. when it is not clear whether it falls under any legal provision. Given the constant changes that take place in circumstances, it is even necessary to keep the law flexible so that it can be easily adapted to new situations⁹¹. Of course, criminal law provisions may not be interpreted to the detriment of an accused and extended by analogy⁹². But this is not to be understood as prohibition of developing law by judges. Thus, the very Statute allows the ICC to ‘apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions’⁹³. Furthermore, as the European Commission of Human Rights held in one of its decisions:

⁸⁷ See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.69; also UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.8.

⁸⁸ These considerations, inter alia, encouraged a number of delegations during the Diplomatic Conference to oppose the elaboration of elements of crimes with a view of their being annexed to the Statute. It is also worth considering, how the very idea of elaboration of elements of crimes corresponds to the requirements for necessary qualifications that candidates for election to the Court ought to meet (see article 36 para. 3 (b) of the Rome Statute). After all, those who meet those requirements are not lay people or soldiers in the field, who need be clearly instructed of what they are allowed or not allowed to do. Nor is a criminal statute a military manual. On the other hand, probably the main proponents of drafting elements were the military members of the United States delegation. For them, the paradigm of elements seems to have been (not unreasonably) military manuals. Their concern, in particular, was for articulating clear rules for soldiers and they were more concerned with the material than the mental elements.

‘... constituent elements of an offence such as e.g. the particular form of culpability required for its completion may not be essentially changed, at least not to the detriment of the accused, by the case law of courts. On the other hand, it is not objectionable that existing elements of the offence are clarified and adapted to new circumstances which can reasonably be brought under the original concept of the offence’⁹⁴.

- 34 It follows from this passage that law-applying and law-developing are to a considerable extent interrelated. Indeed, application of law, including criminal law, is a creative rather than a mechanical process. That detailed rules are easy to be applied is true only with regard to simple cases. For hard cases, detailed rules are unhelpful. Moreover, paradoxically, the more detailed rules are, the more cases are left uncovered by them⁹⁵. From this point of view, again, what weight is to be given to the Elements of Crimes? Obviously, they should not be treated as having the same binding force as the statutory definitions of crimes. They are to operate as guidance rather than rules⁹⁶.

4. Adoption

- 35 Article 9 provides that elements of crimes ‘shall be adopted by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties’. This provision should be read within the context of Annex I (F) (5) (b) to the Final Act⁹⁷ and article 112 para. 2 (a). In the first mentioned document it has been provided that elements of crimes shall be drafted by the Preparatory Commission. It should be noted, however, that during the Preparatory Committee’s sessions it was once proposed that elements of crimes be elaborated by absolute majority of judges, provided that elements so elaborated did not create any new crime. Elements elaborated by ⁸⁹ Dewey (1924) 10 CornellLQ 17.

⁹⁰ By ‘contextual interpretation’ here is meant that an interpreting authority must take into account the context to which a rule is applied. It does not refer to any particular rule of interpretation, such as the ‘mischief rule’.

⁹¹ ‘... the law must be able to keep pace with changing circumstances’, note 8, Sunday Times v. UK. (Notice again the different meaning of ‘circumstances’ in this statement from its meaning in article 30 of the Rome Statute. See note 65).

⁹² See Rome Statute article 22 para. 2.

⁹³ See Rome Statute article 21 para. 2.

⁹⁴ See Gay News & Lemon v. UK, Vol. 28, D. R. 77, para. 9.

⁹⁵ ‘As the relations with which the law must deal become more numerous and situations calling for legal treatment become more complicated, it is no longer possible to have a simple, definite, detailed rule for every sort of case that can come before a tribunal ...’; Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law (1951) 77.

⁹⁶ It should perhaps be noted that the words ‘interpretation and application’ which appear in this article and in article 119, the dispute settlement provision in the Statute, are common words in compromissory clauses of treaties. As such, they carry much interpretative baggage. See generally the useful discussion in Judge Higgins’s Separate Opinion in Oil Platforms (Iran v. U.S.), Preliminary Objection, 1996 ICJ 847.

⁹⁷ For the Final Act see note 1.

the Court were supposed to be subject to further approval by States Parties. It was also suggested that elements not yet approved might provisionally be applied by the Court prior to their approval, but an element not approved should lapse after all⁹⁸. Later, at the Rome Conference, it was proposed that elements of crimes be adopted by the Preparatory Commission itself⁹⁹. But some delegations considered that the proposal gave too much competence to the Preparatory Commission and that it could lead to the practice of international legislating beyond the consent of sovereign States. It was therefore decided, for the sake of compromise, to entrust it to the Assembly of States Parties. The Preparatory Commission could only recommend draft elements of crimes for adoption. It is the Assembly of States Parties which had the final say in this issue, although it in fact adopted the Preparatory Commission's language unchanged¹⁰⁰.

According to article 9, for elements of crimes to be adopted, the decision ought to be reached by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties. This provision is to be kept in contrast to the one stipulated in article 112 para. 7 (a) which says that, unless a consensus can be reached, 'decisions on matters of substance must be approved by a two-thirds majority of those present and voting provided that an absolute majority of States Parties constitute the quorum for voting'. It is clear from the text of article 9 that there must be a two-thirds majority of the total number of the members of the Assembly of States Parties, not just of those taking part in voting, in order that elements of crimes be adopted.

In actual practice, the Assembly of States Parties adopted the Elements at its first meeting by consensus, exactly as they came from the Preparatory Commission with no attempt to improve upon that body's efforts¹⁰¹.

II. Paragraph 2

1. 'Amendments to the Elements ...'

Paragraph 2 of article 9 deals with procedural aspects of amendments to the elements of crimes, i. e. subjects entitled to propose them and their adoption. It provides that amendments to the elements of crimes shall be adopted by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties. As is seen, the rule of adoption of amendments to the elements is identical to the one of adoption of the very elements of crimes. But there are some substantial issues which do not seem to be evidently easy to resolve. Thus, for instance, why have such a strict rule of amending the elements? Does it not treat amendments to the elements of crimes as a matter of subsequent legislation? To what extent, if at all, has the Court discretion in developing the original elements of crimes? What if amendments significantly changed the elements? What, then, about cases previously adjudicated by the Court? How is the Court to decide a case before it, if the elements were amended during the trial? Of course, one can say that such a strict rule of amending the elements is necessary in order to keep them consistent with the principle of nullum crimen sine lege and also reflect the consent of sovereign States, that amending the elements is, indeed, a matter of legislation, that the Court is to apply the law as it is and not to develop it, let alone the creation thereof, that the amended elements are subject to the principle of lex posterior derogat legi priori, if new elements are more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted, and to the principle of lex ad praeteriam non valet, if new elements are to the detriment of him or her.

There is hardly any reasonable argument that could be put forward against these considerations, except for the one that concerns the role of courts in developing law. But ⁹⁸ For the details of the proposal see Zutphen Draft, p. 50.

⁹⁹ The proposal submitted by the delegation of the U.S. of America. See UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.69.

¹⁰⁰ See Rome Statute article 112 para. 2 (a).

¹⁰¹ Doc. ICC-ASP/1/3, para. 22 (2002). The Elements of the Crime of Aggression were likewise adopted by consensus at the Kampala Review Conference.

the difficulty is one of the reasonableness of having at all such a provision included into the Statute, its interpretation within the context of other provisions thereof, and the legal force of elements and amendments thereto. Does such a strict rule of adopting and amending the elements give to the latter the same binding force as the statutory definitions of crimes? Obviously not. This is clear also from the differences between the rules for amending the Statute itself and the rules for amending the Elements of Crimes. Are amendments to the Elements conceived of as changes in the original concepts of the crimes? Definitely not. Why, then, have such a rule? Why not leave it completely to the Court? Unfortunately, these questions are now rhetorical. None the less, it still does make sense to ask whether the Court may itself elaborate concrete elements of crimes and provisionally apply them on an ad hoc basis when questions arise that are not dealt with in the Elements as adopted (or in the Court's opinion dealt with wrongly), provided that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, defined in article 22, is respected.

2. Subjects entitled to propose amendments

- 37 a) Any State Party. That any State Party to an international treaty may propose amendments thereto, is an elementary point, which derives from the principle of sovereign equality of States. All States Parties to an international treaty ought to have equal rights with regard to its concluding and amending. A treaty that disrespects this principle cannot be valid ab initio. Why only States Parties are entitled to propose amendments is also quite clear. According to the pacta tertiis nec noscent prosunt principle, States, not bound by an international treaty, are not entitled under it either. It has, however, be kept in mind that amendments to the Elements of Crimes are subject to a procedure very different from the one designed for amendments to the statutory provisions¹⁰².
- 38 b) The judges. Article 9 para. 2 provides that the judges acting by an absolute majority may also propose amendments to the Elements of Crimes. Provided that there are 18 judges of the Court¹⁰³, 10 of them shall constitute an absolute majority. The principal issues of the role of judges in developing law have been briefly considered above. It is somewhat regrettable that judges have not been expressly allowed to elaborate elements of crimes on a case by case basis. Instead, they would have to do what judges were in principle not supposed to do. They would have to draft amendments and then propose them to the Assembly of States Parties. The inconsistency of this task with judicial functions is evident. The judges would be supposed to draft in advance legal provisions which they would have to apply subsequently. One suspects that the judges will find a way simply to make rulings of law that they will avoid characterizing as being concerned with elements, thereby avoiding the theoretical complications in having them 'ratified' by the Assembly of States Parties.
- 39 c) The Prosecutor. That the Prosecutor also has been entitled to propose amendments to the elements of crimes is hardly surprising. After all, if judges may do that, why should not the Prosecutor? Furthermore, because the Prosecutor ought to investigate all facts and evidence relevant to an assessment of whether there is criminal responsibility, and, in doing so, investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally¹⁰⁴, he or she is required to very well know what the constituent elements of crimes are. This requirement connotes knowing about changing circumstances in which crimes are committed. If the Prosecutor considers that, owing to the significantly changed circumstances, that were not previously intended to be covered by original elements of crimes, there is a need to criminalise particular aspects of human behaviour, he or she may initiate the amending process by proposing to the Assembly of States Parties newly drafted elements. Moreover, the Prosecutor is probably in the best position to assess whether there are any shortcomings or gaps in the law to be applied. Needless to say there are some limits on the extent to which the Assembly of States Parties can interpret or re-interpret the meaning of the definitions in the Statute for the benefit of the judges or the Prosecutor by re-examining The Elements. At some point, an amendment to the Statute itself would become necessary. The Prosecutor has no formal power to recommend amendments to the Statute itself but would have to convince a State Party to do so¹⁰⁵.

¹⁰² Note, however, that those amendments 'to provisions of an institutional nature' that fall within article 122 of the Statute are to be adopted by a very similar process to that provided for adopting and amending The Elements.

¹⁰³ According to article 36 para. 2 the number of judges can be increased, as well as reduced, but not below 18.

¹⁰⁴ Rome Statute, article 54 para. 1 (a).

III. Paragraph 3

Paragraph 3 of article 9 provides that ‘the elements of crimes and amendments thereto shall be consistent with [the] Statute’. This provision clearly means that the relation between the Statute and the annexed elements of crimes, as well as amendments thereto, is not subject to the lex posterior derogat legi priori principle. Furthermore, it follows that the statutory definitions of crimes rank higher than annexed elements thereof. Consequently, the principle to be applied here is lex superior derogat legi inferiori. It becomes much clearer when this provision is taken in the light of article 51 para. 5 related to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. That article provides that ‘in the event of conflict between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Statute shall prevail – (emphasis added)’. So, it is for the Court to decide to what extent annexed elements of crimes and amendments thereto are consistent with the Statute¹⁰⁶. It also seems that the Court has the power of judicial review in respect of the former. 40

C. Special remarks: The juridical weight of the Elements of Crimes

Paragraph 1 of article 9 says that the Elements ‘shall assist’ the Court. Implicit in the notion of assistance is that sometimes the Elements will not be helpful – they may be unhelpful or just plain wrong and in such instances should be put aside by the Court. This conclusion is underscored by paragraph 3’s admonition that the Elements ‘shall be consistent with this Statute’. Reading the two paragraphs together, it is apparent that The Elements have less juridical weight than the Statute itself. The Court should, no doubt, give substantial deference to the conclusions of the Preparatory Commission and the Assembly of States Parties as to what the appropriate standards are. Ultimately, though, it is the Court’s call on whether what is promulgated in The Elements is consistent with the Statute itself (including the principles of interpretation contained in article 21 thereof.¹⁰⁷ 41

¹⁰⁵ See Clark, Article 121, mn 6.

¹⁰⁶ It is this consideration, inter alia, that makes strange the provision entitling the Court to propose amendments to the elements of crimes.

¹⁰⁷ Note that, in terms of the dispute settlement provisions in article 119 of the Rome Statute, deciding upon the compatibility of a particular Element with the Statute will always arise in the consideration of a case involving a particular individual and therefore will inevitably be a matter ‘concerning the judicial functions of the Court’ and thus within its competence to decide. See Clark, Article 119, mn 11.

Article 10

Nothing in this Part shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.

Literature: Acquaviva, G., ‘Was a Residual Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals Really Necessary?’, (2011) 9 JICJ 789; Ambos, K., ‘The Crime of Aggression after Kampala’, (2010) 53 GYbIL 463; Arsanjani, M.H. and Reisman, W.M., ‘The International Criminal Court and the Congo’, in: L.N. Sadat and M.P. Scharf (eds.), The Theory and Practice of International Criminal Law (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2008) 325; Baughen, S., ‘Holding Corporations to Account: Crafting ATS Suits in the UK?’, (2013) 2 BritJAmLS 533; Bos, ‘1948–1998: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Statute of the International Criminal Court’ (1998–1999) 22 FordhamLLJ 229; A. Chandrachud, N., ‘Continuing Relevance of Customary International Law in the Development of International Humanitarian Law’, (2009) 21 (2) SriLankaJIL 55; Conforti, B. and Focarelli, C., The Law and Practice of the United Nations (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 4th edition 2010); Denis, C., ‘Critical Overview of the “Residual Functions” of the Mechanism and its Date of Commencement (including Transitional Arrangements)’, (2011) 9 JICJ 819; Edwards, G.E., ‘International Human Rights Law Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: The Search and Seizure Right to Privacy’, (2001) 26 Yale JIL 323; Globke, C., Die Auslieferung an den Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (Mohr Siebeck 2009); Greenawalt, A.K.A., ‘The Pluralism of International Criminal Law’, (2011) 86 IndLJ 1063; Grover, L., Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2014); id., ‘A Call to Arms: Fundamental Dilemmas Confronting the Interpretation of Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court’, (2010) 21 EJIL 543; Heinsch, R., ‘The Crime of Aggression After Kampala’, (2010) 2 GoJIL 713; Heinze, A., International Criminal Procedure and Disclosure (Duncker & Humblot 2014); Heller, K., ‘The Uncertain Legal Status of the Aggression Understandings’, (2012) 10 JICJ 229; Krefß, C. et al., ‘Negotiating the Understandings on the crime of aggression’, in: Barriga and Krefß (eds.), The Trauvaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (CUP 2012) 81; Lüders, B., Die Strafbarkeit von Völkermord nach dem Römischen Statut für den Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (BWV Berliner Wiss.-Verlag 2004); Kim, Y.S., The International Criminal Court (A Commentary of the Rome Statute) (Wisdom House 2003); Lyons, C.W., ‘Ineffective Amnesty: The Legal Impact on Negotiating the End to Conflict’, (2012) 47 WakeForestLRev 799; Mancini, M., ‘A Brand New Definition for the Crime of Aggression’, (2012) 81 NJIL 227; McDougall, C., The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the ICC (CUP 2013); Meyer, T., ‘Codifying Custom’, (2011–2012) 160 UPaLRev 995; Milanović, M., ‘Is the Rome Statute Binding on Individuals?’, (2011) 9 JICJ 25; Nabil Jurdi, N., ‘The Domestic Prosecution of the Crime of Aggression After the International Criminal Court Review Conference’, (2013) 14 MelbJIL 129; Olásolo, H., Estudios de derecho penal internacional (Instituto Nacional de Ciencias Penales 2010); Paust, J., ‘The International Criminal Court Does Not Have Complete Jurisdiction Over Customary Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes’, (2009–2010) 43 JohnMarshallLRev 681; Pinto Soares, P., ‘Positive Complementarity and the Law Enforcement Network’, (2013) 46 IsLRev 320; Rayfuse, R., ‘The Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind’, (1997) 8 CLF 43; Sadat, L.N., ‘Custom, Codification and Some Thoughts About the Relationship Between the Two’, (1999–2000) 49 DePaulLRev 909; id., The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law (Transnational Publishers 2002); id., ‘Crimes Against Humanity in the Modern Age’, (2013) 107 AJIL 334; Saif-Alden Wattad, M., ‘The Rome Statute and Captain Planet’, (2009) 19 FordhamEnvntLRev 265; Sató, H., ‘Modes of International Criminal Justice and General Principles of Criminal Responsibility’, (2012) 4 GoJIL 765; id., ‘The Defense of Superior Orders in International Law’, (2009) 9 ICLRev 117; Sheppard, D., ‘The International Criminal Court and “Internationally Recognized Human Rights”’, (2010) 10 ICLRev 43; Trahan, J., ‘The Rome Statute’s Amendment on the Crime of Aggression’, (2011) 11 ICLRev 49; van der Vyver, J.D., ‘Prosecuting the Crime of Aggression in the International Criminal Court’, (2010–2011) 1 NatSec&ArmedConflictLRev 1; Young, R., ‘“Internationally Recognized Human Rights” Before the International Criminal Court’, (2011) 60 ICLQ 189.

Content

A. General remarks: Drafting history and purpose	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	9
I. Subject matters	10
1. Articles and rules ‘in this Part’	11
2. Scope of international law concerned: ‘existing or developing rules’	13
3. Interpretation ‘limiting or prejudicing in any way’	14
II. Interpretation ‘for purposes other than this Statute’	16
C. Special remarks: Relation to articles 21 and 22	17

A. General remarks: Drafting history and purpose

Article 10 is the only article in the Statute without a heading. This is due to the fact that early proposals left open the question of whether a comparable rule should be included in this Statute as a separate article or be placed in article 5, which at that time (partly as draft article 20) was already headed ‘Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court’¹. The Draft was nominated ‘Y’ with the note that it was ‘relating to the part of the Statute dealing with the definition of crimes’². In addition, it was mentioned that ‘[a]rticle 21 paragraph 3 (Nullum crimen sine lege), and article 20 (Applicable law) deal with related issues’³.

At that time, the purpose of the draft was not to limit the further development of the recently established and increasingly recognized punishability of crimes under international law⁴; the mere fact that there was dispute over which of these crimes should fall under the jurisdiction of the Court and that a compromise may limit them to ‘the most serious crimes of international concern’ (article 1), should not bar their progressive development towards new crimes within this category nor raise the impression that the lack of an agreement about an international jurisdiction for certain crimes would mean that such crimes and their punishability directly under international law do not exist. At that stage, for instance, aggression was not included in article 5. The discussion touched the problem of whether a codification of international law should merely declare and systematize existing rules or also include ‘progressive development’⁵. With regard to aggression the finally achieved compromise was, for example, the acknowledgement of such a crime and the acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court over all its alternatives, but the exercise of the jurisdiction had been postponed by former article 5 para. 2 until ‘a provision is adopted...defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime’.

When the issue was finally decided at the end of the Rome Conference in favour of a separate article, no appropriate heading covering all aspects addressed was at hand. In addition, some participants hoped that article 10 of the Draft Statute⁶ might make way for the definition of aggression⁷, which is now provided for in article 8*bis*. According to this idea, article 9 of the Draft Statute⁸ could later be amended by article 10 Draft Statute as its new

¹ See also Arsanjani and Reisman, in: Sadat and Scharf (eds.), Theory and Practice of ICL (2008) 325, 333.

² See Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/CONF.183/2/Add.1, 14 April 1998, p. 25; see also Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, ii (2005) 83–84; Bennouna, ‘Article 10’, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire article par article, i (2012) 561.

³ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/CONF.183/2/Add.1, 14 April 1998, p. 25. The quoted sentences were repeated with the same wording, only referring to the old numbers for articles 20 and 21 from the Zutphen Draft; see Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, The Netherlands, A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998, p. 32.

⁴ See also Arsanjani and Reisman, in: Sadat and Scharf (eds.), Theory and Practice of ICL (2008) 325, 333.

⁵ See article 15, ILC Statute, adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 174 (II) of 21 November 1947, as amended by resolutions 485 (V) of 12 December 1950, 984 (X) of 3 December 1955, 985 (X) of 3 December 1955 and 36/39 of 18 November 1981; see also Rayfuse (1997) 8 CLF 43, 78 et seq. In fact, while a majority of states where in favour of that clause, India and the United States supported the deletion of Article Y’, see Kim, International Criminal Court (2003) 198.

⁶ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Draft Statute, article 10, which concerned the relationship between the U.N. Security Council and the International Criminal Court, in Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court (1998) 132–133; Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Trauvaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012), p. 251.

⁷ Cf. the 1998 Rome Summary Records (18 June) (excerpts), inter alia statement of Diaz Paniagua in Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Trauvaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012), p. 263, para. 81 (‘[...] the crime of aggression should be included in the Statute, but [...] the definition should be discussed in the context of article 10.’); Fadl (Sudan) in ibid., p. 266, para. 125; Hamdan (Lebanon) in ibid., p. 267, para. 131.

⁸ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Draft Statute, article 9, which was headed ‘Acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court’, see Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court (1998) 131.

paragraph 4 and then renamed number 10, while the definition of the crime of aggression and 'the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime' could be included in a new article 9.

Following years of intensive deliberations and preparatory work of the 'Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression', the States Parties agreed on a definition of the crime of aggression, including special conditions for the exercise of its jurisdiction,⁹ at the first Review Conference of the ICC¹⁰. However, the view was expressed that article 8*bis* significantly departs from customary international law¹¹. As a result, an 'Understanding'¹², based on a U.S. proposal¹³, was added to the amendments to reiterate, recalling article 10, that those amendments must 'not be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.'¹⁴ However, the legal status of these Understandings – and their legal value – remains unclear¹⁵. Since the Understandings are annexed to Resolution RC/Res. 6, they could not become part of the Rome Statute itself¹⁶. Some therefore doubt that they have any effect whatsoever, considering that article 21 does not refer to understandings as such¹⁷, and arguing that article 31 para. 2 VCLT is not applicable in these circumstances¹⁸. Be that as it may, even if Understandings had a bearing on the interpretation of the Rome Statute through a contextual interpretation¹⁹, it is unlikely that this is of any relevance with regard to Understanding 4, since it resembles article 10 to a large extent²⁰.

- 3 Earlier drafts for a Statute did not provide any rule comparable with what is now article 10²¹. Such a provision did not appear necessary or advisable whatsoever, since constant development and permanent improvement was somehow guaranteed by the sources of

⁹ Resolution RC/Res.6, The Crime of Aggression (28 June 2010). For a detailed analysis see Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 34 et seq.; Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463 et seq.; Trahan (2011) 11 ICLRev 49, 49; van der Vyver (2010–2011) 1 NatSec&ArmedConflictLRev 1, 1; Mancini (2012) 81 NJIL 227.

¹⁰ For an analysis of the Review Conference see Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 34 et seq.

¹¹ RC/11, Annex III, Report of the Working Group on the Crime of Aggression, p. 47, para. 16 ('Furthermore, a view was expressed that the definition on aggression would not reflect customary international law and that this should be recognized in the understandings. Only the most serious forms of illegal use of force constituted aggression.'). See also Koh (Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State), Statement at the Review Conference of the International Criminal Court, available at <<http://www.state.gov/s/l/releases/remarks/142665.htm>> accessed 24 May 2015.

¹² Annex III of Resolution RC/Res.6 contains seven 'Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression', see in more detail Heller, (2012) 10 JICJ 229–248.

¹³ Trahan (2011) 11 ICLRev 49, 73–76. There is a certain irony in the fact that the US made this proposal, considering that it supported the deletion of article Y (being now article 10) at the Rome Conference, see Kim, International Criminal Court (2003) 198.

¹⁴ Review Conf. Res. RC/Res.6, ICC Doc. ICCASP-RC/11, Annex III, Understanding 4 (June 11, 2010); van der Vyver (2010–2011) 1 NatSec&ArmedConflictLRev 1, 51.

¹⁵ See generally McDougall, Aggression (2013) 113 et seq.

¹⁶ McDougall, Aggression (2013) 113; Heller, (2012) 10 JICJ 229, 234 et seq.

¹⁷ Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 730; McDougall, Aggression (2013) 114.

¹⁸ Heller, (2012) 10 JICJ 229, 237 et seq.; Heinsch (2010) 2 GoJIL 713, 730; McDougall, Aggression (2013) 114 et seq., who – however – is in favour of applying article 32 para. 1 VCLT, see ibid. at 117 et seq.

¹⁹ A broad contextual interpretation would necessarily also have to take into account these 'Understandings'. A way to conduct such a contextual interpretation within the Rome Statute is described in Heinze, International Criminal Procedure (2014) 92 et seq.

²⁰ In the same vein Heller (2012) 10 JICJ 229, 232. It can be assumed, however, that the question about the legal value of Understanding 4 would have become more relevant if the U.S.A. had succeeded in adding a clause that went beyond the wording of article 10, reading: '[...] and shall not be interpreted as constituting a statement of the definition "crime of aggression" or "act of aggression" under customary international law.', see Kreß in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Trauvaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 81, 93. This 'would have explicitly divorced the new treaty definition from existing customary international law' and was therefore opposed by a large number of delegations, see ibid.

²¹ See for the 1926 Bellot and ILA as well as the AIDP and the 1937 Draft Statute of the League of Nations, the 1951 Draft Code, Draft Statute and 1954 Draft Code Triffterer, 'Preliminary Remarks' (2008), mn 2 et seq. with further references. See also Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, ii (2005) 95, where no other drafts are mentioned.

international law as mentioned in article 38 ICJ Statute. It was important to leave all doors open for establishing a most effective direct enforcement model as soon as possible²². Examples for such a development are, for instance, the Genocide Convention 1948²³ and the Geneva Conventions 1949²⁴. Genocide had been experienced in the Second World War in all its cruel appearances. But all endeavours to include political and cultural groups and thus to broaden the scope of genocide in these directions were unsuccessful²⁵. However, it was not questioned that former codifications of the definition of war crimes could not bar the amendments to that definition introduced by the Add. Prot. I and II 1977²⁶, since this progressive development was independent from the source of international law²⁷. Moreover, both the Conventions against Apartheid²⁸ and Torture²⁹ show that there was and still is an open development in that regard. Accordingly, the renewed mandate of the ILC in 1981³⁰ concerning the Draft Code has been extended to ‘take into account’ the progressive development of international law since 1954³¹.

The Statutes for the ICTY and the ICTR are without a corresponding regulation. At that time, it appeared self-evident that the jurisdiction of both ad hoc Tribunals, limited to certain criminological appearances restricted by a time period and under territorial aspects, as expressed in common article 1 of the ICTY and of the ICTR Statute, could neither bar the interpretation of the existing international law beyond their limited aims nor prejudice its future development.

However, once the Preparatory Committee was charged with drafting ‘a widely acceptable consolidated text of a convention’³², it was considered more important to find possibilities for a compromise than to strive for a perfect solution in one or the other direction – even at that early stage of the drafting process.

²² For the legal possibilities within the ILC see, for instance, Rayfuse (1997) 8 CLF 43, 43 et seq. with further references; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 16 et seq., and in general for international criminal law Triffterer, ‘Preliminary Remarks’ (2008), mn 14 et seq. Prior to the ‘resurrection’ of the ICC project in 1989, there was ‘little law and even fewer mechanisms to enforce the three “core” crimes deemed most heinous of all at Nuremberg’, see Sadat (1999–2000) 49 DePaullRev 909, 909.

²³ Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 9 December 1948, 78 UNTS 277, which came into force on 12 January 1951. See Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 10.

²⁴ In more detail, see Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 11 et seq.

²⁵ Cf. Schabas, ‘Article 6’, in this volume, mn 16.

²⁶ Cf. Cottier, ‘Article 8’, in this volume, mn 7, 11, 17.

²⁷ Cottier, ‘Article 8’, in this volume, mn 7 (‘The main sources of this IHL branch are the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 as well as the two Additional Protocols of 1977 and customary international law, which is of popular relevance with regard to the law applicable to non-international armed conflicts.’, fn. omitted); Chandrasanan (2009) 21 Sri Lanka JIL 55, 61 (‘The Additional Protocols 1 & 11 of 1977, further codified and developed existing customary rules relating to international armed conflict and to a lesser extent non international armed conflict.’). Even the 1907 Hague Convention on Laws and Customs of War contained a clause that read: ‘The provisions contained in the Regulations referred to in Article 1, as well as in the present Convention, do not apply except between Contracting Powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the Convention.’, see Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 18 October 1907, article 2; see also Meyer (2011–2012) 160 UPaLRev 995, 1040.

²⁸ Apartheid was declared a crime against humanity in a series of international instruments, from the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity (GARes. 2391 (XXIII)) of 26 November 1968, entered into force 11 November 1970. See article 1(b): ‘[...] and inhuman acts resulting from the policy of apartheid [...]’ to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid (GARes. 3068 (XXVIII)), 28 UN GAOR Supp. (No. 30) at 75, UN Doc.A/9030 (1974), 1015 UNTS 243, entered into force 18 July 1976. See article 1(1): ‘The States Parties to the present Convention declare that apartheid is a crime against humanity [...]’. See generally Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 113 et seq.

²⁹ Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (GA Res. 39/46 of 10 December 1984, entered into force 26 June 1987).

³⁰ GA Res. 36/106, 10 December 1981; also in YbILC 1983 II 2, 12 et seq.; 1984 II 2, 9 et seq.; 1985 II 2, 9 et seq.

³¹ See GA Res. 36/106 in UNYBbILC 1983 II 2, 12, para. 38 (‘[...] taking duly into account the results achieved by the process of the progressive development of international law; [...]’).

³² See GA Res. [on the report of the Sixth Committee (A/51/627)], UN Doc.A/RES/51/207 of 16 January 1997 (emphasis added), available at <<http://www.un.org/ga/documents/gares51/ga51-207.htm>> accessed 19 February 2015.

This attitude was confirmed by the fact that on 15 December 1997 the General Assembly adopted Resolution 52/160³³ (without a voting), in which it mandated the Diplomatic Conference to finalize and adopt a convention on the establishment of an international criminal court³⁴. It recognized ‘the importance of concluding the work of the conference through the promotion of general agreement on matters of substance’³⁵. The precondition of such an agreement was, of course, that this progressive development could not be barred by any target or result.³⁶ This precondition seems to be without an alternative from both a theoretical and practical point of view: New conventions may be created on the subject matter and other aspects and the laws and customs of war may do the same within their respective legal framework.

- 5 The Rome Statute itself is the best example of the fact that elements of crimes may be codified, thereby providing more detailed guidance on the interpretation of crimes than it has been the case with earlier codifications. This becomes self-evident comparing the definitions in the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR with those contained in the Rome Statute, for example with regard to ‘other inhumane acts’ as crimes against humanity: Unlike the rather general reference to ‘other inhumane acts’ in the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, article 7 para. 1 (k) of the Rome Statute defines these acts in more specific terms³⁷.
- 6 Against this background the purpose of article 10 appears as a kind of ‘reservation clause’³⁸, as it is contained in the Statute notwithstanding article 120, according to which ‘[n]o reservations may be made to this Statute’, for instance in article 124 with regard to war crimes for a period of seven years. Article 10 clarifies that all articles in Part 2 are limited to the purpose of building an agreement between the States Parties and shall have no binding effect going beyond the subject matter and the scope of the Statute and the Party’s agreements. This means that States are bound, for instance, by the definitions of crimes, as contained in articles 6–8, when exercising their national jurisdiction on behalf of the international community as a whole over crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court and also when cooperating (vertically) with the Court, which is exercising its complementary jurisdiction. But otherwise, with regard to their (merely) internal ius puniendi over other crimes under international law and cooperation on the horizontal level with other states, they are free to decide scope and notion of these issues. With regard to the introduction of article 8*bis*, article 10 and Understanding 4³⁹ have the effect that the amendments should not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State⁴⁰.

³³ See GA RES/52/160 [on the report of the Sixth Committee (A/52/651)], 15 December 1997, available at <http://www.un.org/en/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=A/RES/52/160> accessed 24 May 2015.

³⁴ See also Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Introduction and Draft Organization of Work, UN Doc. A/Conf.183/2 (1998), paras. 6 et seq., available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/uploads/tx_ltpdb/doc18476.pdf> accessed 24 May 2015.

³⁵ See GA RES/52/160 [on the report of the Sixth Committee (A/52/651)], 15 December 1997, p. 1 (emphasis added), available at <http://www.un.org/en/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=A/RES/52/160> accessed 24 May 2015.

³⁶ See also Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 265.

³⁷ With regard to the lack of precision of that category, see, e.g., Prosecutor v. Kupreškić, No. IT-95-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 14 January 2000, para. 563. With regard to ‘other inhumane acts’ having a different scope than its antecedents like the Nuremberg Charter and the ICTR and ICTY Statutes, see Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-717, Decision on the confirmation of charges, PTC I, 30 September 2008, para. 450. For further references see Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 114 et seq.

³⁸ It could also be labelled as a ‘preservation’ clause to preserve the ‘role of custom in the development of normative standards of conduct in the area of international criminal justice’, see Sadat, ICC and Transformation of International Law (2002) 263. In the same vein Satō (2009) 9 ICLRev 117, 136, or a ‘without prejudice clause’, see Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 264, 265.

³⁹ Annex III of Resolution RC/Res.6.

⁴⁰ Review Conference of the Rome Statute, International Criminal Court, Non-Paper by the Chair: Further Elements for a Solution on the Crime of Aggression, ICC Doc RC/WGCA/2 (25 May 2010) [4]; Nabil Jurdi (2013) 14 MelbJIL 129, 138–140.

The ‘reservation’ in article 10 appears to be understandable, since codifications like the Rome Statute have advantages and disadvantages⁴¹. The advantage is that both the provisions and especially elements of crimes are more precise than they usually are when defined by the laws and customs of war or other customary international law. A codification increases certainty and awareness of prohibitions and thereby vindicates the rule of law and the possibility of achieving a preventive effect⁴². However, the Rome Statute illustrates very clearly that its articles represent a minimum amount of consent in many aspects. States thus shape international law by codifying parts of the unwritten rules on the subject. -The purpose of article 10 is first, to avoid the impression that what has thus been codified is the only possible interpretation or a reflection of the minimum consent in the community of nations as a whole and second, to guard against these impressions being used to thwart the future development of international law outside the Statute⁴³. The Statute thus expresses what is in any event accepted in international law. ‘Nothing in this Part (therefore) shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than (which means not laid down in) this Statute’ (brackets added).

Up to the last minute and during the Rome Conference, it was proposed to include the draft, headed ‘Y’,⁴⁴ in article 5, ‘since it [article 10] applies to all (at that time only) three crimes within the Court’s jurisdiction’ and was not only applicable within the context of war crimes⁴⁵. When aggression was included at the last minute of the Rome Conference – with the two conditions described in former article 5 para. 2 – the need to leave open additional interpretation and development had increased still further.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

Article 10 is construed differently compared to all other articles in the Statute, combining two elements of legal drafting: With regard to all articles in Part 2 – in which article 10 is situated approximately in the middle – it first presupposes a permissible interpretation (as also mentioned in article 9) of these articles and, second, prescribes that this interpretation shall have no ‘limiting or prejudicing’ effect on ‘existing or developing rules of international law for the purposes other than this Statute’⁴⁶, which means outside the Statute on the national and the international level.

I. Subject matters

The scope of article 10 includes and combines three subject matters with regard to which it provides an exception at the end.

1. Articles and rules ‘in this Part’

The introductory wording refers to Part 2 as a whole, scil. articles 5–21 inclusive. ‘Nothing in this Part’ comprehends each provision and rule within these articles. The restriction to Part 2 reflects the result of the drafting process: Even the original idea of including what is ⁴¹ In more detail Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 570.

⁴² See, for instance, Olásolo, Estudios de derecho penal internacional (2010) 61 et seq.; Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 570 with further references. About ‘legal certainty’ as a goal of codification Heinze, International Criminal Procedure (2014) 107 et seq. with further references.

⁴³ In the same vein Satō (2009) 9 ICLRev 117, 136.

⁴⁴ In more detail Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 269.

⁴⁵ Bassiouni and Wexler, Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, 13ter NEP (1998) 4, brackets added; Sadat (1999–2000) 49 DePaulLRev 909, 917.

⁴⁶ About the phrase ‘[f]or the purpose of this Statute’ in other articles of the Rome Statute see Paust (2009–2010) 43 JohnMarshallLRev 681, 682.

now article 10 in a paragraph of article 5 involved a reference to both article 5 itself and the following articles providing for definitions of the crimes listed in article 5. This proposal extended to the case the draft called 'Y' should be situated as a separate article in this part.

As previously mentioned, during the drafting process, Part 2 was headed only 'crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court', which listed not only definitions of crimes but also more or less comprehensive regulations for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court. Part 2 is now more comprehensively named 'Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law' and contains much more detailed regulations on the subject matter than the original one in the drafting process. This extension was necessary, because Part 2 contains two of the most difficult compromises achieved at the Rome Conference, first on the question of complementarity and second on trigger mechanisms.

Compromises necessarily result in the parties giving up parts of their original demands. Against this background it becomes clear why the mutual concessions that were made to achieve the compromise were limited to the original motivating purpose as far as possible: to establish the ICC and not destroy the hope of the community of nations that its basic legal values would be protected by an international criminal jurisdiction inherent to this community. This compromise can therefore not be applied to law outside the Statute by interpreting the rules of Part 2 as 'limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law'. The aim was to leave space for a 'limiting or prejudicing' internal interpretation of Part 2 but to exclude its effect beyond the scope of this Statute. In particular, the compromises regulated in Part 2 shall not bar the development 'outside' the Statute.

- 12 Article 10 expresses no opinion on the interpretation of articles and rules in other Parts of the Rome Statute. Its applicability is rather limited to Part 2. Nevertheless, the drafting process of the provision indicates that a limiting or prejudicing interpretation of all those articles outside Part 2, which were adopted as a compromise or describe a status quo, should equally not bar the interpretation of 'existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute'⁴⁷. This applies, for instance, to article 25, which covers – together with all other articles in Part 3 – only some of the general principles of criminal law that have to be applied by the ICC in accordance with article 21⁴⁸. Thus, article 10 can be viewed as generally rejecting the provisions of the Rome Statute to be universally binding law and was even used for an attempt to argue against the influence of the Rome Statute on the 'jurisprudence of other courts applying ICL'⁴⁹.

International cooperation and judicial assistance, described in Part 9, may also need additional regulations to guarantee the most effective prevention of crimes under international criminal law and to exclude impunity for abuses of power. The very structure of the Rome Statute as a convention between the States Parties supports this notion. States Parties to the Rome Statute can only agree upon a limiting and prejudicing interpretation 'within the jurisdiction of the Court' and within the boundaries of the Statute, notwithstanding the Statute's actual influence on the evolution of ICL by establishing minimum rules of conduct.⁵⁰

Amendments and Review Conferences have, therefore, a limited power to change the law for internal purposes. They may, but they not necessarily have binding effect, for example, on present and future regional ad hoc Tribunals, when they interpret the Statute in a certain dimension.

⁴⁷ In the same vein Satō (2012) 4 GoJIL 765, 796.

⁴⁸ See also Milanović (2011) 9 JICJ 25, 30. Crit. Baughen (2013) 2 BritJAmLS 533, 546 with fn. 77.

⁴⁹ Greenawalt (2011) 86 IndLJ 1063, 1108: 'If the Rome Statute happens to fill some gaps in substantive ICL primarily for the convenience of agreeing on a single approach for purposes of the ICC's own jurisprudence, then there is no particular reason why the ICC's approach should dictate the jurisprudence of other courts applying ICL.' This view, however, disregards the actual influence of the Rome Statute on the evolution of international law and serves as an illustrating example that article 10 can be read in two ways, which will be elaborated in more detail below (mn 16).

⁵⁰ See mn 16.

2. Scope of international law concerned: 'existing or developing rules'

The scope of the formulation 'existing or developing rules of international law' covers the whole legal order of the community of nations, whatever rules belonging to this field are addressed. Although there is no explicit reference to customary international law, it nevertheless is 'the thrust of the text'⁵¹. Thus, article 10 is to be read as a reminder that the Part 2 provisions cannot be invoked to narrow or otherwise negatively affect existing or developing customary rules. This being said, it seems that in some instances the Statute 'arguably goes beyond customary law'⁵². The introduced article 8bis, for instance, may help broaden the scope of application of the existing customary rule on the crime of aggression⁵³. This is an illustrating example that the Rome Statute and the amendments to it will eventually influence the evolution of customary international law⁵⁴.

Since international criminal law is part of international law insofar as that term comprehends the legal order of the community of nations, it is also concerned with the law of immunities and privileges, that may develop differently from what is now generally accepted or agreed upon by the States Parties to the Statute⁵⁵. The question becomes vital with regard to article 27 and the draft articles on State responsibility; the latter were adopted by the ILC at its 53rd session (2001)⁵⁶.

Even though the individual criminal responsibility is regulated outside Part 2, the relevant article 25 refers in paragraph 4 expressly to the fact that 'no provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility should affect the responsibility of States under international law'. This confirms that the interpretation of articles and rules of Part 2 cannot bar such a development or claim to be obeyed as a binding guideline. Of course, it is up to the progressively developing process concerning international law to consider the jurisprudence of the ICC in the same manner as is already done with regard to the ICTY and the ICTR. Theoretically, the development of changes in humanitarian law, for instance defining new crimes against humanity – not yet falling within the jurisdiction of the Court –, cannot be blocked by the Statute. However, from a practical point of view, it can be expected that on subject matters the Statute deals with in a compromising way, such a (progressive) development outside the possibilities provided for by review or an amendment of the Statute appears improbable.

⁵¹ Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 270. In the same vein Satō (2009) 9 ICLRev 117, 136 ('This provision might be significant in enabling some "vacuum" of customary international law to be preserved consciously.'). Saif-Alden Wattad (2009) 19 FordhamEnvtlLRev 265, 270 with fn. 26; Globke, Auslieferung (2009) 302. For a more differentiated view see Milanović (2011) 9 JICJ 25, 30 ('The point of this article is obviously to divorce the Statute from customary law, although this is not necessarily fatal to the jurisdictional reading of the Statute.').

⁵² Milanović (2011) 9 JICJ 25, 30; Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 564 with further references.

⁵³ Mancini (2012) 81 NJIL 227, 246.

⁵⁴ Mancini (2012) 81 NJIL 227, 246.

⁵⁵ In 2011, the PTC I of the ICC found that there was no difference in that regard, see Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-139, Decision Pursuant to Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 12 December 2011, paras. 9 et seq., 43 ('[T]he Chamber finds that customary international law creates an exception to Head of State immunity when international courts seek a Head of State's arrest for the commission of international crimes. There is no conflict between Malawi's obligations towards the Court and its obligations under customary international law; [...]'). See also Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-140-ENG, Decision pursuant to article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the refusal of the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the Court with respect to the arrest and surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 13 December 2011, para. 13. For a general analysis see Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law (2014) 270 et seq., 277 with further references; Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 406 et seq., 413.

⁵⁶ The Commission has dealt with this topic on its 51st Session in Geneva, 3 May–23 July 1999; see GA Res. 53/102 (9 Dec. 1998). See in more detail Triffterer/Burchard, 'Article 27', in this volume, mn 11 et seq.

3. Interpretation ‘limiting or prejudicing in any way’

- 14 This element concerns the interpretation of articles or rules contained in this Part in a certain way. The provision precludes only an interpretation which is ‘limiting or prejudicing in any way’. A ‘limiting’ interpretation is narrowing or thwarting the enlargement of the scope of what is regulated in an article or rule of the Statute⁵⁷. ‘Prejudicing’ includes both possibilities, making them a binding rule for future applications in the subject matter, which has already been dealt with under mn 13⁵⁸.
- 15 In that regard, the establishment of both the ad hoc and hybrid or ‘mixed’ Tribunals needs to be mentioned. Especially the hybrid or ‘mixed’ tribunals are Janus-faced in that regard: On the one hand, they are situated on site (except the STL), i.e. ‘where the crimes of their subject matter jurisdiction took place’⁵⁹. This ensures ‘a certain proximity to the local, crime-affected population’⁶⁰ and thereby contributes to the positive complementarity paradigm of the ICC⁶¹. On the other hand, the establishment of these tribunals, as well as Truth and Reconciliation Commissions, is not advisable after the ICC has come into operation and exercises its jurisdiction over the crimes in question⁶². Nevertheless, there may be exceptional circumstances, like for governments in transition, which make it preferable for the Security Council to establish an ad hoc Tribunal parallel to the ICC. This is particularly important with regard to ad hoc Tribunals for crimes committed outside the jurisdiction of the ICC. Thus, what is defined in article 17 para. 2 with regard to unwillingness will only be applicable to cases before the ICC and cannot be ‘interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way’ the law to be applied in cases before the ICTY and the ICTR (and the Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals⁶³). The same is true for present or later established post-conflict institutions like the Truth and Reconciliation Commission or special hybrid courts, dealing with crimes under international law.

II. Interpretation ‘for purposes other than this Statute’

- 16 The formulation ‘for purposes other than this Statute’ implies that for purposes of the Statute every admissible interpretation of any article or rule may limit or prejudice the applicability of other ‘existing or developing rules’⁶⁴. For instance, article 9 provides for the development of new scope and notions of elements of crimes only as long as they are ‘consistent with this Statute’ in accordance with paragraph 3. Furthermore, the elements of crimes state at the end of each of the definitions of the specific forms of genocide: ‘The conduct took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against ⁵⁷ Similarly Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 267 (‘The reference to “limiting” might be to the exclusion of some crimes under customary international law or retrogressive definitions of crimes in the Rome Statute’).

⁵⁸ See also Triffterer, ‘Preliminary Remarks’ (2008), mn 63.

⁵⁹ Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 51.

⁶⁰ Ambos, Treatise on ICL I (2013) 51.

⁶¹ For a definition see Review Conference, Resolution ICC-ASP/8/Res.9. In more detail see Pinto Soares (2013) 46 IsLRev 320 et seq.

⁶² In the same vein Wilmshurst, in: Cryer et al. (eds.), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (2014) 181, 199 with further references (‘It is to be expected that there would be opposition if the establishment of similar courts under the UN auspices were proposed in the future with jurisdiction coinciding with that of the ICC’).

⁶³ Established by SC Resolution 1966 (2010) of 22 December 2010. See <<http://www.unmict.org/en>> accessed 24 May 2015; Acquaviva (2011) 9 JICJ 789, 793; Denis (2011) 9 JICJ 819.

⁶⁴ See also Arsanjani and Reisman, in: Sadat and Scharf (eds.), Theory and Practice of ICL (2008) 325, 334 (‘While this may not exclude interpretations involving reasonable adaptation of a particular provision to specific circumstances, it would appear [...] to be a far cry from a general license to engage in extensive interpretation of the Statute’).

that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction⁶⁵. This contextual element is not provided for in the wording of article 6 and has been rejected by both the ad hoc Tribunals⁶⁶ and the ICJ⁶⁷. Nevertheless, the Pre-Trial Chamber in Al Bashir affirmed the necessity of such an element, clarifying that only then the ‘threat against the existence of the targeted group [...] becomes concrete and real, as opposed to just being latent and hypothetical’⁶⁸. For the Chamber, article 10 became ‘meaningful insofar as it provides that the definition of the crimes in the Statute and the Elements of Crimes shall not be interpreted “as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute”⁶⁹. As a result, the majority of the Pre-Trial Chamber considered that ‘Elements of Crimes and the Rules must be applied unless the competent Chamber finds an irreconcilable contradiction between these documents on the one hand, and the Statute on the other hand’⁷⁰.

Another example is article 8 para. 3, which is in part phrased similarly to article 10. Especially with regard to this regulation, the purpose of article 10 becomes obvious: Whatever the development in international law with regard to article 2 para. 7 of the UN Charter may be⁷¹ – where the jurisdiction of the ICC is concerned, the approach authorized by article 8 para. 3 may be interpreted in a limiting or prejudicing way for the application of the Statute of the ICC, but not for the outside development of rules of international law concerning this subject matter.

Finally, in its decision authorizing the Prosecutor to proceed with an investigation in the Kenya situation, the majority of Pre-Trial Chamber II referred to the jurisprudence of other tribunals with regard to the element ‘State or organizational policy’ in Article 7 para. 2 (a)⁷². It did so with regard to, inter alia, the form and content of the ‘policy’ and the entity behind ⁶⁵ See Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3, Article 6 (a)-4, 6 (b)-4, 6 (c)-5, 6 (d)-5, 6 (e)-7; Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), 17; Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 272.

⁶⁶ See Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-3, Decision on the Prosecution’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, PTC I, 4 March 2009, paras. 117 et seq.; Prosecutor v. Jelisić, No. IT-95-10-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 5 July 2001, para. 48; Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, No. ICTR-95-1-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 1 June 2001, para. 138; Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 12 December 2012, para. 745.

⁶⁷ Cf. ICJ, Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia, Judgment, 26 February 2007, paras. 373 (‘The dolus specialis, the specific intent to destroy the group in whole or in part, has to be convincingly shown by reference to particular circumstances, unless a general plan to that end can be convincingly demonstrated to exist; and for a pattern of conduct to be accepted as evidence of its existence, it would have to be such that it could only point to the existence of such intent.’) and 376; see also Bennouna, ‘Article 10’, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire article par article, i (2012) 565. The ICJ confirmed its view in Croatia v. Serbia, Judgment, 3 February 2015, para. 143 et seq. It also clarified, that the criterion applied by the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Judgment in the Tolimir case (see Prosecutor v. Tolimir, No. IT-05-88/2-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 12 December 2012, para. 745) was ‘in substance identical with that laid down by the Court in its 2007 Judgment’, see para. 148.

⁶⁸ Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, 4 March 2009, para. 124. Drawing on the telos of article 6 to argue in favour of a contextual element Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), 18.

⁶⁹ Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, 4 March 2009, para. 127.

⁷⁰ Prosecutor v. Bashir, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, 4 March 2009, para. 128. Accordingly, the context element may be regarded ‘as part of the (subjective) offence definition, more concretely, the “intent to destroy” requirement, as its “carrier” or “holder”’, see Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), 18; Lüders, Völkermord (2004), 93 et seq.

⁷¹ The non-intervention clause in this article reads: ‘Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorise the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.’ However, the interpretation of that article does not allow for an application to the human rights field, scil. states cannot ‘plead this rule as a bar to international concern and consideration of internal human rights’, see Shaw, International Law (6th ed. 2008) 273. In other words, article 2 para. 7 of the Charter cannot bar the development of human rights law. See in detail Conforti and Focarelli, Law and Practice (2010) 165 et seq.

⁷² Situation Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, PTC II, 31 March 2010, para. 86 et seq. About this decision in more detail see Sadat (2013) 107 AJIL 334, 368 et seq.

that policy⁷³. In his dissenting opinion, Judge Kaul questioned these jurisprudential references to other tribunals. He instead invoked article 10⁷⁴ and conducted a careful and lengthy analysis of both the historic origins of crimes against humanity and article 7 para. 2 (a)⁷⁵.

Nevertheless, since a codification of international law also includes ‘progressive development’⁷⁶, the provisions of the Rome Statute ‘will eventually influence the evolution of international law’⁷⁷ and state practice⁷⁸. As an example serves the interpretation of article 7: Notwithstanding the interpretive provision of article 10, Article 7 is increasingly regarded as codifying the customary international law of crimes against humanity⁷⁹, inter alia by the European Court of Human Rights⁸⁰, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights⁸¹, U.S. federal courts⁸², the UK House of Lords⁸³ and the UK Court of Appeal⁸⁴. Moreover, the case law of the ICTY points to the Rome Statute to that effect⁸⁵. As Sadat puts it, ‘[i]t is an explicit ⁷³ Situation Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, 31 March 2010, para. 86 et seq. About these elements see in more detail Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014), 67 et seq. with further references.

⁷⁴ Situation Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, 31 March 2010, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, para. 32: ‘[...] to conduct a careful analysis before drawing an analogy with or relying on the jurisprudence of other tribunals. Article 10 of the Statute reinforces the assumption that the drafters of the Statute may have deliberately deviated from customary rules as evinced in the jurisprudence of other courts and tribunals in providing that “[n]othing in this Statute shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than in the Statute.” (Fn. omitted).

⁷⁵ Situation Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, 31 March 2010, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, para. 33 et seq. See for further examples Lyons (2012) 47 WakeForestLRev 799, 823 et seq.

⁷⁶ See mn 1.

⁷⁷ Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 271.

⁷⁸ Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 571 with further references in fn. 183.

⁷⁹ Sadat (2013) 107 AJIL 334, 372–374.

⁸⁰ Korbely v. Hungary, No. 9174/02, Judgment, 19 September 2008, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Loucaides (‘[O]ne may take the recent Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court as declaratory of the definition in international law of this crime.’). See also Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 271.

⁸¹ González Medina and Family v. Dominican Republic, Judgment (Preliminary objections, merits, reparations and costs), 27 February 2012, para. 128 with fn. 154; García and Family Members v. Guatemala, Judgment (Merits, Reparations and Costs), 29 November 2012, para. 97 with fn. 138; Gudiel Álvarez et al. (‘Diario Militar’) v. Guatemala, Judgment (Merits, Reparations and Costs), 20 November 2012, para. 193 with fn. 190; The Rio Negro Massacres v. Guatemala, Judgment (Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations and Costs), 4 September 2012, para. 115 with fn. 189; Contreras et al. v. El Salvador, Judgment (Merits, Reparations and Costs), 31 August 2011, para. 82 with fn. 102; Gelman v. Uruguay, Judgment (Merits and Reparations), 24 February 2011, para. 65 with fn. 64, para. 67.

⁸² Wiwa v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. Not Reported in F.Supp. 2 d, 2002 WL 319887 S.D.N.Y., February 28, 2002, at 9–10.

⁸³ R. v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate Ex p. Pinochet Ugarte (No.1) [2000] 1 A.C. 61 House of Lords at 78 (‘The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (adopted by the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court on 17 July 1998) provides for jurisdiction in respect of genocide as defined, crimes against humanity as defined but in each case only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this statute.’). See also R. v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate Ex p. Pinochet Ugarte (No.2) [2000] 1 A.C. 119 House of Lords.

⁸⁴ UK Court of Appeal, SK (Zimbabwe) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2012] 1 W.L.R. 2809 Court of Appeal (Civil Division), 2835 (‘This citation of authority and learning no doubt needs to be treated with care. The ICTY Statute is not the same as the Rome Statute, for the former lists the crimes against humanity without specifying requirements and elements and instead derives those from customary international law; and it has been said (by Professor Cassese) that the Rome Statute’s requirement of the “in connection with” link is not required by customary international law. Nevertheless, in my judgment it is not possible to read such texts without the strong impression that the drafters and interpreters of the various Statutes, which after all are by and large equally based on the same material, are uniformly seeking the same ingredients for such crimes: a combination of flexibility and definition, and a concentration on the most serious of crimes, marked by really serious consequences, so that, in one or another form, under one or another label, the crimes against humanity will be recognised for what they are intended to be. [...]’).

⁸⁵ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Stakić, No. IT-97-24-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber II, 31 July 2003, para. 672 with fn. 1329; Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, No. IT-02-54-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber III, 16 June 2004, fn. 43 and accompanying text; Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, No. IT-97-25-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber II, 15 March 2002, para. 473 with fn. 1424; Prosecutor v. Krstić, No. IT-98-33-T, Judgement, Trial Chamber, 2 August 2001, para. 522. For further examples see Schabas, The International Criminal Court (2010) 271.

acknowledgment that the Statute establishes minimum rules of conduct and that others (and the Court itself) must read it that way at all times⁸⁶. However, the references mentioned as examples of the codification of customary international law and the view that the Statute establishes minimum rules of conduct somehow invalidate article 10 as promoting the progressive development of international law outside the Statute, since article 10 ‘cuts both ways’ and can also be used to ‘stress the differences between the text in the Statute and their less prolix ancestors in the Geneva Conventions and related instruments’⁸⁷.

C. Special remarks: Relation to articles 21 and 22

During the drafting process it has been repeatedly mentioned that what are now articles 21 and 22 ‘deal with related issues’⁸⁸. Article 21 provides article 10 with substance and specificity⁸⁹. This is true with regard to article 21 para. 3, according to which even the interpretation of the Statute, that shall be applied ‘in the first place’, ‘must be consistent with recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender ...’⁹⁰. As article 10 promotes the continuing existence of customary law, allowing it ‘to develop alongside treaty law even where the two contain identical rules’⁹¹, article 21 para. 3 has the same function with regard to ‘internationally recognized human rights’, which continue ‘to evolve inexorably’⁹². Despite the fact that its meaning is still unclear⁹³, the phrase ‘internationally recognized human rights’ recognizes customary international human rights⁹⁴. In a dissenting opinion to a decision of the ICC Appeals Chamber, Judge Pikiš therefore pointed out that ‘[i]nternationally recognized may be regarded those [sic] human rights acknowledged by customary international law and international treaties and conventions’⁹⁵. Article 21 therefore enables the judges ‘to develop jurisdictional boundaries by importing extraneous materials as part of the task of identifying applicable law’⁹⁶. As described elsewhere in this volume⁹⁷, an ICC Trial Chamber has once declined to apply an ⁸⁶ Sadat (1999–2000) 49 DePaullRev 909, 923. Diff. Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 571.

⁸⁷ See Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2011) 93, who, inter alia, offers the example of Judge Schomburg’s separate and partially dissenting opinion in Prosecutor v. Galić, No. IT-98-29-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 30 November 2006, p. 218, para. 20: ‘[...] [E]ven though I am fully aware of Article 10 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, it must be pointed out that the Rome Statute does not have a provision referring to terrorization against a civilian population. If indeed this crime was beyond doubt part of a customary international law, in 1998 (!) states would undoubtedly have included it in the relevant provisions of the Statute or in their domestic legislation implementing the Statute.’, fn. omitted. See also Grover (2010) 21 EJIL 543, 571.

⁸⁸ See mn 1.

⁸⁹ Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2013), 657.

⁹⁰ Generally McAuliffe deGuzman, ‘article 21’, in this volume, mn 48 et seq.; Bennouna, ‘Article 10’, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire article par article, i (2012) 563 et seq.

⁹¹ Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 268.

⁹² Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (2011) 211.

⁹³ For a detailed interpretation of the phrase ‘internationally recognized human rights’ see, e.g., Sheppard (2010) 10 ICLRev 43, 48 et seq.; Young (2011) 60 ICLQ 189 et seq.; Edwards (2001) 26 YaleJIL 323, 378 et seq.

⁹⁴ Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 119, 120; Bos (1998–1999) 22 FordhamLJ 229, 234 (‘In so far as human rights instruments are universally recognized as part of international customary law, the ICC must respect them in its proceedings.’).

⁹⁵ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-424, Decision on the Prosecutor’s ‘Application for Leave to Reply to “Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d’appel du Procureur”’, AppC, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georgios M. Pikiš, para. 3; about this decision see also Sheppard (2010) 10 ICLRev 43, 48.

⁹⁶ Young (2011) 60 ICLQ 189, 207.

⁹⁷ McAuliffe deGuzman, ‘article 21’, in this volume, mn 52.

article of the statute by invoking article 21 para. 3⁹⁸. This provision therefore proved to be a tool for ‘interpreting the Court’s sources of law expansively or even disregarding them entirely’ in case a Court’s provision falls short of human rights protections⁹⁹ – just as article 10 addresses, inter alia, those provisions that fall short of custom.

Other ‘principles and rules of international law ...’ rank – article 21 para. 1 (b) – ‘[i]n the second place’ (following the Statute) and shall be applied (only) ‘where appropriate’¹⁰⁰. It goes without saying that what has been declared to be ‘appropriate’ for cases within the jurisdiction of the Court, may not be appropriate for those within an internationalized (national) jurisdiction.

- 18 Article 22 para. 3 (originally drafted for the same Part as article 10 and now situated at the beginning of Part 3) proceeds along the same line as article 10, by stipulating that a (progressive) development of law ‘independently of this Statute’ shall not be limited or prejudiced by article 22 or its interpretation (‘This article shall not affect ...’).¹⁰¹ However, this only applies to the principle nullum crimen sine lege and with regard to ‘the characterization of any conduct as criminal under international law’¹⁰². This supports the notion, that the application of article 10 as a general rule is not limited to Part 2 where the article is situated, especially considering the drafting process, where – as already mentioned – the reference to article 10 was made in the context of what is now article 21, ‘Applicable law’, and even the bounds of Part 2 in article 22, ‘Nullum crimen sine lege’, which is now situated in Part 3¹⁰³.

⁹⁸ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-3003-tENG, Decision on an Amicus Curiae Application and on the ‘Requête Tendante à Obtenir Présentations des Témoins DRC-D02-P-0350, DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 aux Autorités Néerlandaises aux fins d’asile’ (Articles 68 and 93(7) of the Statute), TC II, 9 June 2011, para. 73. The decision was later overturned on appeal, see Prosecutor v. Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-02/12-158, Order on the implementation of the cooperation agreement between the Court and the Democratic Republic of Congo concluded pursuant article 93 (7) of the Statute, AppC, 20 January 2014, para. 29.

⁹⁹ McAuliffe deGuzman, ‘article 21’, in this volume, mn 52.

¹⁰⁰ See McAuliffe deGuzman, ‘article 21’, in this volume, mn 9 et seq.; see also Triffterer, ‘Preliminary Remarks’ (2008), mn 64 et seq.

¹⁰¹ See also Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 267 et seq.

¹⁰² See Broomhall, ‘article 22’, in this volume, mn 51; see also Triffterer, ‘Preliminary Remarks’ (2008), mn 62. According to Grover, ‘[l]egality is an adjudicative tool, meaning that the outcomes it produces do not speak to whether conduct is condemned or not by the international community.’, Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2014) 268.

¹⁰³ See mn 1 and 16; see also Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2013), 657 with fn. 24.

Article 11

Jurisdiction ratione temporis

1. The Court has jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute.

2. If a State becomes a Party to this Statute after its entry into force, the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute for that State, unless that State has made a declaration under article 12, paragraph 3.

Literature: Bourgon, S., 'Jurisdiction ratione temporis', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002); Cazala, J., 'Article 11 – Compétence ratione temporis', in: J. Fernandez and X. Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire Article par Article (Éditions A. Pedone 2012); Condorelli, L. and Villalpando, S., 'Can the Security Council Extend the ICC's Jurisdiction?', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002); Heri, C., 'Enforced Disappearance and the European Court of Human Rights' ratione temporis Jurisdiction: A Discussion of Temporal Elements in Janowiec and Others v. Russia', (2014) 12 JICJ 751; Rastan, R., 'Testing Cooperation: The ICC and National Authorities', (2008) 21 LeidenJIL 431; id., 'Jurisdiction', in: C. Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP 2015); Saland, P., International Criminal Law Principles, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: the Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations and Results (Kluwer Law International 1999); Sarooshi, D., The United Nations and the Development of Collective Security: the Delegation by the UN Security Council of its Chapter VII Powers (Clarendon 1999); id., 'The Peace and Justice Paradox', in: D. McGoldrick et al. (eds.), The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues (Hart 2004); Schabas, W., Genocide in International Law (CUP 2nd edition 2009); El Zeidy, M., 'The Ugandan Government Triggers the First Test of the Complementarity Principle: An Assessment of the First State's Party Referral to the ICC', (2005) 5 ICLRev 83.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	13
I. Paragraph 1: Entry into force of the Statute.....	13
1. Continuing crimes	16
2. Continuing crimes under human rights instruments.....	17
3. Continuing crimes under the Rome Statute	21
II. Paragraph 2: Entry into force for particular States	28

A. Introduction/General remarks

Article 11 establishes the temporal threshold for the activation of the Court's jurisdiction 1 at the date of entry into force of the Statute, which occurred on 1 July 2002. Whereas the other facets of the Court's jurisdiction – jurisdiction ratione materiae, ratione personae and ratione loci – may be modified or applied in the alternative, paragraph 1 of article 11 represents an absolute bar on the scope of the Court's competence.¹ Paragraph 2 of article 11 regulates the activation of the Court's temporal jurisdiction for States joining the ICC after its entry into force. For those signatory States that deposited the instruments necessary to bring the Statute into force, temporal threshold will apply from the date of the entry into force of the Statute itself, per article 11(1). For those States that become Parties to the Statute thereafter temporal jurisdiction will apply from the first day of the month after the 60th day following the deposit by such State of its instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.² Nonetheless, article 11(2) recalls that an acceding State may also lodge a declaration under article 12(3) with respect to the time period during which it remained a non-Party State, thereby investing the Court with jurisdiction from an earlier time although no earlier than the restriction contained in article 11(1).

¹ Subject-matter jurisdiction may evolve through amendment to the Statute. Personal and territorial jurisdiction can be exercised in the alternative for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, are modified to be applied cumulatively for aggression, and might be applied either alternatively or cumulatively for any other category of crimes to be added to the Statute. Although the Assembly of States Parties theoretically may amend any aspect of the ICC Statute at any time, any amendment of article 11 would also require modification to articles 22 and 24 and is thus unlikely.

- 2 Article 11 should be read together with article 24 which provides that no-one will be held criminally responsible under the Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute.³ The two provisions obtain the same result: article 11 specifies procedurally the date from which the prospective exercise of temporal jurisdiction should be calculated, while article 24 encapsulates the principle of non-retroactivity itself.⁴ Article 22(1) further enshrines the principle that no person shall be criminally responsible under the Statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court (nullum crimen sine lege). While the latter focusses on the necessity for an appropriate statutory prohibition existing at the time the offence is committed, the reference to ‘crime within the jurisdiction of the Court’ necessarily includes the notion of the temporal restriction expressed in article 11.⁵
- 3 The drafting history for articles 11 (temporal jurisdiction), 22 (nullum crimen sine lege) and 24 (non-retroactivity) is closely interrelated and together provides the context for the chapter under review. The early ILC Draft Statutes did not contain a provision on temporal jurisdiction. This is because the jurisdictional scheme was linked from the outset to existing crimes under international treaties which had already entered into force. The mandate of the ILC to study the desirability and possibility of establishing a mechanism for the adjudication of international crimes first arose from the General Assembly’s adoption of the Genocide Convention, with its accompanying reference in article VI to the possibility of prosecution before an ‘international penal tribunal’. Part B of the resolution that adopted the Genocide Convention invited the ILC to consider the establishment of ‘an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction will be conferred upon that organ by international convention’.⁶ Thus, early on the question of an international criminal court was framed as one which would serve as a procedural vehicle for the application of crimes which were codified elsewhere.⁷ As the ILC’s work progressed on the parallel project to develop a Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, it was envisaged that the future court would either apply the Code of Crimes once adopted as a treaty or otherwise exercise jurisdiction by reference to specified crimes that were prohibited under other multilateral treaties in force. This explains why, as late as 1994, the

² See Article 126.

³ See Pangalangan, in: Triffterer/Ambos (3rd ed.) mn 12, who notes the notion of conduct in article 24 includes both acts and omissions. See also Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: the Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 196–197.

⁴ Pangalangan, in: Triffterer/Ambos (3rd ed.) mn 8.

⁵ See Broomhall, in Triffterer/Ambos (3rd ed.) mn 52.

⁶ A/RES/260 (III) B, 9 December 1948. The wording is based on a Sixth Committee resolution adopted on the joint proposal of The Netherlands and Iran assigning consideration of the creation of an international tribunal to the ILC, in view of intractable differences during the negotiation of the genocide convention as to the viability of establishing such a court at that time; A/C.6/248. See discussion in Schabas, Genocide in International Law (2009) 444–454. While the General Assembly had called for the codification of international offences as early as 1946 (see infra note 10), the mandate to also consider the establishment of a court as a corollary to the draft code of crimes was first posited in 1948.

⁷ As the commentary to the ILC draft Statute recalled, one of the basic ideas underlying the jurisdictional scheme was that ‘the court should exercise jurisdiction over crimes of an international character defined by existing treaties, and that—as a corollary—the statute itself would be primarily procedural and adjectival’; A/49/10, p. 36. This same concept appears in the 1992 Report of the Working Group on the Question of an International Criminal Jurisdiction, see Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fourth session, A/47/10, reprinted in 1992 YbILC Vol II, pp. 67–68. As the commentary to the 1994 ILC Statute goes on to observe: ‘It is not its function to define new crimes. Nor is it the function of the statute authoritatively to codify crimes under general international law. With respect to certain of these crimes, this is the purpose of the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind ...’; ibid., p. 38.

final ILC draft Statute presented to the General Assembly contained only a provision on nullum crimen sine lege linked to the relevant entry into force date under each treaty.⁸ Given the existence of a relevant temporal limitation for the crimes contained in each of these instruments which were external to the draft Statute, and absent codification of substantive law in the Statute itself, the Commission appears to have considered unnecessary the need to define a temporal threshold for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction. Since the entry into force of each instrument differed, it would in any event have been difficult to establish a uniform temporal bar.

Considerations of non-retroactivity, nonetheless, played a central role in early discussions on the nullum crimen principle and are often referred to interchangeably in documents from this period. The concept of non-retroactivity forms a key focus of debates in the ILC during the 1950s, with concern often expressed for the need to avoid the criticism levelled in Nuremberg and Tokyo with respect to the retroactive application of penal law.⁹ Indeed, one of the first decisions of the General Assembly, after affirming the principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal and the judgment of the Tribunal, was to call for the codification of relevant offences thereunder in an 'International Criminal Code'.¹⁰ Thus, throughout the subsequent discussions within the United Nations surrounding the draft code and the draft statute, central focus was given to the need to ensure that any international criminal jurisdiction asserted by the future court would be done on the basis of offences clearly articulated in extant applicable law.

After the ILC presented its finalized text for the draft Statute in 1994, States were quick to reject in the Ad Hoc Committee the approach of applying substantive law by reference. Instead, the Committee moved to elaborate the crimes within the draft Statute itself, based largely on the same nullum crimen concerns: '[a]s regards the specification of crimes, the view was expressed that a procedural instrument enumerating rather than defining the crimes would not meet the requirements of the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege) and that the constituent elements of each crime should be specified to avoid any ambiguity and to ensure full respect for the rights of the accused'.¹¹ With the idea of including substantive crimes came for the first time discussion on the need to

⁸ Draft article 39 provided that an accused would not be held guilty: (a) in the case of genocide, aggression, war crimes and crimes against humanity 'unless the act or omission in question constituted a crime under international law'; and (b) in the case of other treaty crimes 'unless the treaty in question was applicable to the conduct of the accused at the time the act or omission occurred'; Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-sixth session, A/49/10(1994), reprinted in 1994 YbILC Vol II, pp. 55-56, referring to crimes under draft article 20(a)-(e). The same approach had been adopted in article 41 of the earlier 1993 ILC draft Statute which applied nullum crimen sine lege by reference to crimes in force through other instruments, except that 1993 draft foresaw three categories of applicable law: '(a) a treaty which was in force [and applicable with respect to the accused]; (b) customary international law; or (c) national law enacted in conformity with the relevant treaty'; Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-fifth session, A/48/10(1993), reprinted in 1993 YbILC Vol II, p. 119, referring to crimes under draft articles 22 and 26. The bracketed text was contained in the draft provision and accompanying commentary in view of the difference of opinion within the Commission as to whether, for the principle of legality to apply, the State party must have domestically incorporated the relevant crime pursuant to the relevant treaty obligation or whether criminal responsibility could flow directly under international law from the treaty concerned.

⁹ Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction, Report by RJ. Alfaro, Special Rapporteur, A/CN.4/15, 3 March 1950, reproduced in 1950 YbILC Vol II., pp. 14-16.

¹⁰ A/RES/95(1), 11 December 1946: 'Directs the Committee on the codification of international law established by the resolution of the General Assembly of 11 December 1946, to treat as a matter of primary importance plans for the formulation, in the context of a general codification of offences against the peace and security of mankind, or of an International Criminal Code, of the principles recognized in the Charter of the Nurnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal'. The following year the General Assembly, in resolution 177(II) of 21 November 1947, tasked the ILC with the formulation of the Nuremberg principles as well as a draft code of crimes against the peace and security of mankind.

¹¹ Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/50/22, 6 September 1995, p. 12. For discussion on the negotiations over subject-matter jurisdiction in terms of 'core crimes' and other 'treaty crimes' see Zimmerman, in: Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2008), art. 5, at mn 1-7.

establish a general temporal bar: ‘Several delegations were of the view that it would be important to include in the statute the principle of the non-retroactivity of its provisions’.¹²

- 6 This basic link to the principle of non-retroactivity, considered as ‘fundamental to any criminal legal system’, was recalled in subsequent Preparatory Committee discussions which recognized both the need for the principle of non-retroactivity to be ‘clearly spelled out in the Statute’ and that ‘the temporal jurisdiction of the Court should be limited to those crimes committed after the entry into force of the Statute’.¹³ The compilation prepared by the informal working group at the 1996 sessions of the Preparatory Committee dealing with general principles of criminal law developed three proposals, under the overall heading draft ‘Article A’, to deal with the separate, but related concepts of nullum crimen/nulla poena sine lege, non-retroactivity and the temporal start-date of jurisdiction. The first essentially retained the approach of the ILC in article 39 of the 1994 draft Statute, but added that the conduct must not only have constituted a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, but also that ‘such conduct occurred after the entry into force of this Statute’.¹⁴ Proposal 2 combined a temporal specification with the principle of nullum crimen sine lege: ‘This Statute applies only to a conduct that is done after the entry into force of this Statute, and no conduct shall be punished by this Court unless it is an offence under the definition of the crimes of this Statute’.¹⁵ Proposal 3, entitled ‘Jurisdiction ratione temporis’ essentially contained the three elements that found their way into the final adopted text for article 11: (i) date of entry into force of the Statute; (ii) date of entry into force for States acceding to the Statute at a later date; and (iii) declarations lodged by States to cover the period between (i) and (ii). Specifically, proposal 3 provided: ‘The Court has jurisdiction only in respect of acts committed after the date of entry into force of this Statute’; ‘When a State becomes party to this Statute after its entry into force, the Court has jurisdiction only in respect of acts committed by its nationals or on its territory or against its nationals after the deposit by that State of its instrument of ratification or accession’; and ‘A non-party State may, however, by an express declaration deposited with the Registrar of the Court, agree that the Court has jurisdiction in respect of the acts that it specifies in the declaration’.¹⁶ The only part of Proposal 3 that did not survive in any form into the final text is draft paragraph 2, which dealt with the possibility of temporal overlap with the mandate of pre-existing ad hoc tribunals established by the Security Council and the latter’s primacy: ‘The Court has no jurisdiction in respect of crimes for which, even if they have been committed after the entry into force of this Statute, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has decided before the entry into force of this Statute to establish an ad hoc international criminal tribunal. The Security Council may, however, decide otherwise’.¹⁷
- 7 When the issue was taken up anew in 1997, the Preparatory Committee largely left the proposals untouched, save for their placement. The February 1997 session reproduced nullum crimen sine lege as article A, based largely on article 39 of the 1994 ILC draft Statute, while non-retroactivity appeared as new article Abis.¹⁸ The latter contained a draft paragraph 2 which retained in bracketed holding text the bulk of the 1996 Proposal 3 as described above. The August 1997 session further adopted, in bracketed optional text, an untitled article 21*ter* relating to the temporal jurisdiction: paragraph 1 contained in un-bracketed text

¹² Report of the Ad Hoc Committee, A/50/22, p. 12.

¹³ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/51/22, Vol. I, 13 September 1996, pp. 43–44. The discussion linked these concepts to the nullum crimen/nulla poena sine lege principle.

¹⁴ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, A/51/22, Vol. II, 13 September 1996, p. 79.

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 80.

¹⁶ Ibid.

¹⁷ Ibid.

¹⁸ Decisions taken by the Preparatory Committee at its session held from 11 to 21 February 1997, A/AC.249/1997/L.5, 12 March 1997, pp. 19–20.

the existing formulation of present day article 11(1).¹⁹ The rest of the paragraph in bracketed text recalled the second element of the 1996 Proposal 3, but omitted any reference to the third element related to declarations.²⁰ Paragraph 2 of article 21*ter* maintained the reference to Security Council established tribunals.²¹

The draft text submitted to the Rome Conference following the inter-sessional meeting in Zutphen in January 1998 retained the formula adopted by the February 1997 Preparatory Committee in article A (nullum crimen sine lege), renumbered as article 15, and article Abis (non-retroactivity), renumbered as article 16,²² while article 8, now entitled 'Temporal jurisdiction', replicated article 21*ter* from the August 1997 session with the accompanying explanatory note: 'N.B. There is an interrelationship between this article and article 16[A bis] (Non-retroactivity).'

In Rome, the initial proposal of the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole was to combine the provisions on temporal jurisdiction and non-retroactivity.²³ The proposal, formulated in three parts, consisted of paragraph 1, corresponding to the present article 24(1); paragraph 1*bis*, corresponding to the present article 11(2); and paragraph 2, corresponding to the present article 24(2). The wording of each mirrored closely the texts as finally adopted, save for minor modification. For example, the phrase appearing in the Zutphen draft to describe the activation of temporal jurisdiction for acceding States was changed from 'after the deposit by that State of its instrument of ratification or accession' to the more precise wording 'after the entry into force of this Statute for that State', which mirrors the formulation of present in article 126.

The Bureau proposal also deleted the draft paragraph on previously established ad hoc Tribunals. As noted above, the provision would have granted exclusive jurisdiction to such tribunals, established by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, where they were created prior to the entry into force of the Statute and continued to exercise temporal jurisdiction thereafter. The practical impact of the provision would have been limited to the territory of the former Yugoslavia in the light of open-ended prospective jurisdiction of the ICTY, since the temporal jurisdiction of the ICTR was already limited to events occurring during 1994. This question was not just theoretical, since after the adoption of the Rome Statute the ICTY asserted jurisdiction over events occurring first in Kosovo and later in Macedonia. The risk of competing jurisdictions may well have been limited in the light of complementary. Although the ICTY is not a State with jurisdiction within the meaning of article 17, the ICC Prosecutor may well have reflected on the object and purpose of article 17 and article 53(1)(b), and consulted with the ICTY Prosecutor in the same way it is meant to consult and seek additional information from national authorities, in determining whether to proceed. With the adoption of completion strategies for the ICTY and the cut-off date for the submission of pending indictments in December 2004, this question has now become moot.

In the final package presented by the Bureau, it decided to separate out the provisions on temporal jurisdiction and non-retroactivity into the placement they now more appropriately occupy in Part 2 on jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law, and Part 3 on general principles of criminal law, respectively.²⁴

¹⁹ The only difference is the words 'in respect of' as opposed to the finally adopted 'with respect to'.

²⁰ The concept of declarations nonetheless continued to be treated in draft article 21*bis* and 22.

²¹ Decisions taken by the Preparatory Committee at its session held from 4 to 15 August 1997, A/AC.249/1997/L.8/Rev.1, 14 August 1997, p. 5.

²² Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, The Netherlands, A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998. Paragraph 2 of article 16[Abis], which contained bracketed holding text from former 1996 Proposal 3, was now deleted with the explanation that the proposals were treated under other provisions, namely articles 7[21 bis] (Preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction), 8[21*ter*] (Temporal jurisdiction) and 9[22] (Acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court).

²³ See A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 July 1998) and A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 July 1998).

²⁴ The final wording of article 11 as adopted appears in the Bureau's package proposal for Part 2; A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.2 (16 July 1998).

- 12 In relation to the operation of article 11 with other provisions of the Statute, discussions in Rome also examined the tension between the notion of ‘continuing crimes’ and the Court’s limitations ratione temporis. For example, during the 9th meeting of the Committee of the Whole the representative of Lebanon pointed out that draft article 8 on temporal jurisdiction ‘did not cover acts that began before but continued after the entry into force of the Statute. Care should be taken not to bar prosecution for such acts, and the words “unless the crimes continue after that date” should be added at the end of paragraph 1’.²⁵ As Per Saland, Chairman of the Working Group on General Principles of Criminal Law, observes, the impossibility of reaching consensus on the issue was ultimately resolved in Rome by keeping the construction ambiguous, thereby leaving it to the Court to settle the issue.²⁶ As discussed below, the Preparatory Commission returned to the issue in the context of the elements of the crimes of enforced disappearance,²⁷ reducing the scope for some of the ambiguity, while leaving other issues unresolved.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: Entry into force of the Statute

- 13 The temporal parameters of the Court’s jurisdiction are restricted to crimes committed after its entry into force, which occurred on 1 July 2002. This date also serves as the entry into force of the Statute with respect to the territory and nationals of those States that deposited their instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession as part of the 60 needed to bring the treaty into effect.²⁸
- 14 The phrase ‘jurisdiction ... with respect to crimes’ refers to the crimes listed in article 5. Although the term ‘crime’ in article 5 is distinguished from the use of ‘offence’ under article 70 of the Statute, it is axiomatic that the Court will not be faced with alleged offences against the administration of the Court that pre-date the actual investigation or prosecution of such crimes. Article 11 does not treat the Court’s temporal jurisdiction with respect to new crimes added to the Statute, which are regulated separately according to the amendment procedure in article 121. Instead, it establishes an absolute bar on the retroactive exercise of ICC jurisdiction prior to its entry into force. With respect to prospective temporal jurisdiction, the start-date for the exercise of jurisdiction over war crimes committed on the territory or by the nationals of a State Party may be postponed for an initial 7 year period pursuant to article 124.²⁹
- 15 Whereas the treaty-based limitations on the exercise of personal and territorial jurisdiction can be overcome by a Security Council referral, this is not the case for the Court’s temporal parameters.³⁰ Under the former, the Security Council does not amend the jurisdictional scheme of the Statute, but instead enables an extension of the existing bases of jurisdiction to the territory and/or nationals of States that would not otherwise be amenable to the Court’s reach. The ability to do so flows from the Council’s powers under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter to take compulsory measures with respect to UN Member States, as well as

²⁵ A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.9, 20 Nov. 1998, para. 73.

²⁶ Saland, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations and Results (1999) 196–197, referring to the lack of agreement on the choice of a verb to go with the word ‘conduct’ in article 24 – such as ‘committed’, ‘occurred’, ‘commenced’ or ‘completed’ – was only resolved by suggesting the removal of any verb, even if stylistically it did not read well in English, enabling thereby the Court to settle the issue.

²⁷ See commentary on article 7 in this edition.

²⁸ See article 126 on entry into force provisions.

²⁹ See infra note 76.

³⁰ See commentary below on art. 11(2), mn 28, et seq., for States that become Party to the Statute after its entry into force.

the obligation of UN Member States to accept and carry them out.³¹ The Council's actions, thus, modify the obligations of the concerned UN Member State(s) towards the ICC: creating obligations where there were none, and enabling the exercise of ICC jurisdiction which would otherwise be invalid. The ICC Statute does not create or confer the Council's power in this regard, but merely provides a procedural vehicle (article 13(b)) to enable the Court to recognize and act upon such measures, which are based on authority external to the Statute itself.³² By contrast, the Council cannot alter or modify the ICC Statute, for example by amending the temporal bar contained in article 11, just as it cannot amend the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court or the operation of any other provision. Unlike the ad hoc Tribunals, the ICC is not a subsidiary organ of the Council in the sense that the principal organ possesses the competence to determine the membership, structure, mandate and duration of existence of its subsidiary organ.³³ Since the ICC is a distinct international organization, the Security Council cannot authorize the Court to exceed the scope of its own powers under the Statute and so act ultra vires its own legislative framework.³⁴ For this reason, other international courts and tribunals, including the varying categories of 'hybrid' or 'internationalized' jurisdictions, such as the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, Special Panels for Serious Crimes in East Timor or the Extraordinary African Chambers within the courts of Senegal, may continue to be set up by the international community to deal with historical allegations notwithstanding the establishment of the ICC.³⁵

1. Continuing crimes

In terms of crimes that pre-date the Statute's entry into force, but whose occurrence continues past 1 July 2002, it may be worth distinguishing between two different categories of 'continuing crimes': (a) conduct where the actus reus is partly completed in the past, the effects of which continue to this day; and (b) conduct that constitutes an ongoing course of criminal activity, all of whose material elements continue to occur on a daily basis.³⁶ In the case of the former, the notion of continuing crimes is particularly helpful because of the bifurcated character of certain crimes. For example, the crime of enforced disappearance involves (i) arrest, detention or abducted (first stage), followed by (ii) refusal to acknowledge that deprivation of freedom or to give information on the fate or whereabouts of that individual (second stage), which together form the actus reus, but may be separated over extended periods of time.³⁷ The term 'continuing crimes' serves to emphasise the persisting responsibility of State ³¹ See Articles 25 and 103, United Nations Charter.

³² The same considerations apply to article 16 of the Statute. See Rastan, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (2015), p. 157 at fn. 75.

³³ Sarooshi, The United Nations and the Development of Collective Security: the Delegation by the UN Security Council of its Chapter VII Powers (1999) 130; Condorelli and Villalpando, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2002) 572.

³⁴ Sarooshi, in: McGoldrick et al. (eds.), The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues (2004) 106–107. The principle of attribution holds that an international organisation cannot act beyond the powers attributed to it by its constituent treaty; cf. Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law: Unity within Diversity (2011) 157; Rastan, (2008) 21 LeidenJIL 431–444. The principle is also sometimes referred to as the 'principle of speciality'; see Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, Advisory Opinion, 8 July 1996, ICJ Report 1996, para. 25.

³⁵ Cazala, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale: Commentaire article par article (2012) 570.

³⁶ See El Zeidy (2005) 5 ICLRev 83–119, 90–99. See also Williams, in: Triffterer (ed.), Commentary (2008), art. 11, mn 2; and Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Volume II (2014), p. 112, referring to the concept of 'Dauerdelikt'.

³⁷ For the crime of enforced disappearance under article 7(1)(i) of the Rome Statute, the material elements require that the perpetrator arrested, detained or abducted an individual (originating act) and subsequently refused to acknowledge that deprivation of freedom or to give information on the fate or whereabouts of that individual (ongoing act); or in the alternative, that the perpetrator (i) refused to acknowledge the arrest, detention or abduction, or to give information on the fate or whereabouts of such person or person, and (ii) such refusal was preceded or accompanied by that deprivation of freedom.

authorities in these circumstances.³⁸ As described below, although footnote 24 of the elements of crimes has clarified the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to bifurcated crimes which only partly occur within the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, there appears to be much greater scope with respect to conduct that constitutes an ongoing course of criminal activity.

2. Continuing crimes under human rights instruments

- 17 Established in 1980 by the United Nations Human Rights Commission to examine questions relevant to enforced or involuntary disappearances of persons, the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearance has in particular helped develop the conceptual elements of the definition of enforced disappearance and the attendant notion of continuing crimes, leading to the adoption in 1992 of the United Nations Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance. With regard to article 17 of the Declaration,³⁹ the Working Group stated in its General Comment of 2011: '[w]hen an enforced disappearance began before the entry into force of an instrument or before the specific State accepted the jurisdiction of the competent body, the fact that the disappearance continues after the entry into force or the acceptance of the jurisdiction gives the institution the competence and jurisdiction to consider the act of enforced disappearance as a whole, and not only acts or omissions imputable to the State that followed the entry into force of the relevant legal instrument or the acceptance of the jurisdiction'.⁴⁰ The Working Group further held that 'one consequence of the continuing character of enforced disappearance is that it is possible to convict someone for enforced disappearance on the basis of a legal instrument that was enacted after the enforced disappearance began, notwithstanding the fundamental principle of non-retroactivity. The crime cannot be separated and the conviction should cover the enforced disappearance as a whole'.⁴¹ Nonetheless, following the entry into force of the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, the Committee on Enforced Disappearance, which was established thereunder, took the opposite approach based on the much more restrictive language of article 35 of the Convention.⁴² In particular, article 35 limits the Committee's competence 'solely in respect of enforced disappearances which commenced after the entry into force of this Convention' or in the case of acceding States, 'enforced disappearances which commenced after the entry into force of this Convention for the State concerned'.⁴³ Accordingly, the Committee held that it will not adjudicate cases that commenced before the Convention entered into force for the State concerned.⁴⁴

³⁸ See e.g. Chapman Blake v. Guatemala, Merits, IACtHR Series C No 36, IHRL 1419 (IACtHR 1998), [1998] IACtHR 1 (24 January 1998). See also discussion in Pangalangan, in this volume, art. 24, mn 13.

³⁹ Article 17(1) of the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance provides: 'Acts constituting enforced disappearance shall be considered a continuing offence as long as the perpetrators continue to conceal the fate and the whereabouts of persons who have disappeared and these facts remain unclarified'; A/RES/47/133 (18 December 1992).

⁴⁰ Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, General Comment on Enforced Disappearance as a Continuous Crime, para. 3, reproduced in Report of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, UN Doc.A/HRC/16/48, 26 January 2011, p. 12. The Working Group was established by the Human Rights Commission by resolution 20 (XXXVI) of 29 February 1980 and most recently renewed by Human Rights Council resolution A/HRC/RES/27/1 of 25 September 2014.

⁴¹ Ibid., para. 5.

⁴² The Committee on Enforced Disappearances and the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances continue to coexist side by side in view of their separate and independent mandates, although they are intended to collaborate and coordinate their activities.

⁴³ Article 35 of the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance provides: '1. The Committee shall have competence solely in respect of enforced disappearances which commenced after the entry into force of this Convention. 2. If a State becomes a party to this Convention after its entry into force, the obligations of that State vis-à-vis the Committee shall relate only to enforced disappearances which commenced after the entry into force of this Convention for the State concerned'; A/61/448 (20 December 2006), UNTS Vol. 2715, entered into force 23 December 2010.

⁴⁴ Committee on Enforced Disappearances, Statement on the Ratione Temporis Element in the Review of Reports Submitted by States Parties under the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, 15 November 2013, Annex IV, p. 19.

In a number of decisions on communication received pursuant to the First Optional Protocol (individual complaints mechanisms) to the ICCPR, the Human Rights Committee has declared that ‘it could not consider an alleged violation of human rights said to have taken place prior to the entry into force of the Covenant for a State party, unless it is a violation that continues after that date or has effects which themselves constitute a violation of the Covenant after that date’.⁴⁵ Thus, for example, in Ibrahima Gueye et al. v. France, it held that the discriminatory effects of legislation enacted prior to the Optional Protocol came into force for France constituted a present day violation of article 26 of the Covenant.⁴⁶ In other cases, including those of enforced disappearance, the Committee was not satisfied that the violations persisted after the relevant entry into force date based on the facts of the case at hand.⁴⁷

At the regional level, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACtHR) has since the late 1980s pioneered the development of case law on the continuing nature of violations under the American Convention on Human Rights, including in cases of enforced disappearance.⁴⁸ As the Inter-American Court has held: ‘the Court has competence to examine human rights violations that are continuing or permanent even though the initial act violating them took place before the date on which the Court’s contentious jurisdiction was accepted, if the said violations persist after the date of acceptance, because they continue to be committed; thus, the principle of non-retroactivity is not violated’.⁴⁹ In the case of Rio Negro Massacres v. Guatemala, e.g. based on the foregoing the IACtHR held itself competent to examine alleged continuing human rights violations arising from facts occurring between 1980 to 1982, prior to the entry into force its contentious jurisdiction for Guatemala in 1987, in relation to forced disappearance; the absence of an impartial and effective investigation into the facts of the case; the adverse effects on the personal integrity of the next of kin and survivors in relation to investigation of the facts; the failure to identify those who were executed and disappeared; the ‘destruction of the community’s social fabric’, and forced displacement.⁵⁰ However, the Inter-American Court did not consider itself competent to rule on other allegations which occurred prior to 9 March 1987 for which no continuing violation could be established.⁵¹

A similar approach has been followed broadly by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), although more recent cases have sought to define the outer scope of its temporal jurisdiction vis-à-vis continuing crimes. In Cyprus v. Turkey, in relation to alleged article 2 violations (right to life) that occurred in 1974, the ECtHR held that the ongoing failure of Turkey to discharge the procedural obligation to investigate such violations amounted to a ⁴⁵ Ibrahima Gueye et al. v. France, Human Rights Committee, Communication No. 196/1986, 6 April 1989, para. 5.3. See also Miguel A. Millan Sequeira v. Uruguay, Communication No. 6/1977, UN Doc.CCPR/C/OP/1 at 52 (1984), para. 16; Sandra Lovelace v. Canada, Communication No. R.6/24, UN Doc.Supp.No. 40 (A/36/40) at 166 (1981), para. 7.3; Eugeniusz Kurowski v. Poland, Human Rights Committee, Communication No. 872/1999, 11 April 2003, para. 6.4.

⁴⁶ Ibrahima Gueye et al. v. France, para. 10.

⁴⁷ See Norma Yurich v. Chile, Communication No. 1078/2002, UN Doc.CCPR/C/85/D/1078/2002 (2005) and Cifuentes Elgueta v. Chile, HRC Communication No. 1536/2006, UN Doc.CCPR/C/96/D/1536/2006, 28 July 2009, para. 8.5. in both cases the Committee observed that the original acts of arrest, detention or abduction, as well as the refusal to give information about the deprivation of freedom occurred before the entry into force of the Covenant for the State party, and no acts of refusal to give information appeared to continue after the entry into force of the Optional Protocol (individual complaint mechanism). It also considered as relevant the fact that upon ratifying the Optional Protocol, Chile made a declaration to the effect that the Committee’s competence applied only in respect of acts occurring after the entry into force for Chile of the Optional Protocol or, in any event, acts which began after 11 March 1990.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras, Merits, Judgment of July 29, 1988. Series C No. 4, para. 155–185, Chapman Blake v. Guatemala, Preliminary objections, IACtHR Series C no 27, (1996), para. 39; González Medina and family members v. Dominican Republic, Preliminary objections, merits, reparations and costs, Judgment of February 27, 2012. Series C No. 240, para. 50.

⁴⁹ Rio Negro Massacres v. Guatemala, Judgment of 4 September 2012, IACtHR, para. 37.

⁵⁰ Ibid., para. 38.

⁵¹ Ibid., para. 39.

continuing violation.⁵² In Veeber v. Estonia, the ECtHR similarly stated that while the Convention is binding on each of the Contracting States only in respect of facts occurring after its entry into force in respect of that Party, it ‘recalls that it has endorsed the notion of a continuing violation of the Convention and its effects as to temporal limitations of the competence of Convention organs.’⁵³ In more recent decisions, the ECtHR sought to clarify further the distinction between the substantive obligations under the Convention (e.g. right to life) and the ‘detachable’ procedural obligations that attach thereto (obligation to carry out an effective investigation) and which may persist even if the alleged act occurred prior to the relevant entry into force date, and in so doing placing conditions on their application.⁵⁴ In a set of principles developed in the cases of Šilih v. Slovenia and Janowiec and Others v. Russia, the ECtHR held that its temporal jurisdiction as regards compliance with the procedural obligation of Article 2 in respect of deaths that occur before the critical date is not open-ended. It developed a three-tiered test to govern its application: (i) where the death occurred before the critical date, the ECtHR’s temporal jurisdiction will extend only to the procedural acts or omissions in the period subsequent to that date; (ii) the procedural obligation will come into effect only if there was a ‘genuine connection’ between the death as the triggering event and the entry into force of the Convention; and (iii) a connection which is not ‘genuine’ may nonetheless be sufficient to establish the ECtHR’s jurisdiction if it is needed to ensure that the guarantees and the underlying values of the Convention are protected in a real and effective way.⁵⁵ Applying these principles, in the Šilih case, the ‘genuine connection’ standard was satisfied since the lapse of time between the triggering event and the ratification date remained reasonably short, and a significant proportion of the investigative steps required for ensuring compliance with the procedural obligation under Article 2 were carried out after the ratification date. By contrast, in Janowiec and Others v. Russia, which dealt with much older violations related to the notorious Katyń massacre during WWII, the ECtHR held that the time lapse between the deaths (1940) and the ratification date (5 May 1998) was too long in absolute terms for a ‘genuine connection’ to be established between the death of the applicants’ relatives and the entry into force of the Convention in respect of Russia.⁵⁶ In relation to the alternative ‘convention values’ test in Janowiec, the ECtHR set out its understanding by holding ‘reference to the underlying values of the Convention to mean ⁵² See e.g. Cyprus v. Turkey, 25781/94, Judgment (Merits), 10 May 2001, para. 136: ‘... the Court concludes that there has been a continuing violation of Article 2 on account of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to conduct an effective investigation aimed at clarifying the whereabouts and fate of Greek-Cypriot missing persons who disappeared in life-threatening circumstances’.

⁵³ See also Papamichalopoulos and Others v. Greece, Judgment, 24 June 1993, paras. 40–46, and Loizidou v. Turkey, Judgment (Merits), 18 December 1996, para. 41.

⁵⁴ Šilih v. Slovenia, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), 9 April 2009, para. 159: ‘the procedural obligation to carry out an effective investigation under Article 2 has evolved into a separate and autonomous duty ... In this sense it can be considered to be a detachable obligation arising out of Article 2 capable of binding the State even when the death took place before the critical date’.

⁵⁵ Janowiec and Others v. Russia, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), 21 October 2013, para. 141. See also Šilih v. Slovenia, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), 9 April 2009, para. 162–163. In Varnava and Others v. Turkey, the Court further clarified the distinction between the obligation to investigate a suspicious death and the obligation to investigate a suspicious disappearance: ‘A disappearance is a distinct phenomenon, characterised by an ongoing situation of uncertainty and unaccountability in which there is a lack of information or even a deliberate concealment and obfuscation of what has occurred... This situation is very often drawn out over time, prolonging the torment of the victim’s relatives. It cannot therefore be said that a disappearance is, simply, an “instantaneous” act or event; the additional distinctive element of subsequent failure to account for the whereabouts and fate of the missing person gives rise to a continuing situation. Thus, the procedural obligation will, potentially, persist as long as the fate of the person is unaccounted for; the ongoing failure to provide the requisite investigation will be regarded as a continuing violation... This is so, even where death may, eventually, be presumed.’

⁵⁶ Janowiec and Others v. Russia, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), 21 October 2013, paras. 157. Recalling its findings in Šilih, the Court also stated: ‘for a “genuine connection” to be established, both criteria must be satisfied: the period of time between the death as the triggering event and the entry into force of the Convention must have been reasonably short, and a major part of the investigation must have been carried out, or ought to have been carried out, after the entry into force’; ibid., paras. 147–148.

that the required connection may be found to exist if the triggering event was of a larger dimension than an ordinary criminal offence and amounted to the negation of the very foundations of the Convention. This would be the case with serious crimes under international law, such as war crimes, genocide or crimes against humanity, in accordance with the definitions given to them in the relevant international instruments.⁵⁷ It nonetheless held in the case at hand that although the ‘Convention values’ clause could apply to events that predated Russia’s adherence to the Convention, it should not be applied to events which occurred prior to the adoption of the Convention itself, on 4 November 1950.⁵⁸

3. Continuing crimes under the Rome Statute

Although the question of continuing crimes was left unresolved in Rome, it was expressly addressed by the Preparatory Commission in footnote 24 of the elements of crimes for the crime of enforced disappearance. The footnote states that both stages of the material elements of the crime need to occur after the entry into force of the Statute, as part of an attack that is within the temporal jurisdiction of the Court.⁵⁹ This clarification removes the scope for the Court to interpret article 7(1)(i) as permitting the type of continuing crimes approach sustained in other fora when examining the persisting responsibility of States to provide redress for disappearance that commenced prior to the relevant statutory temporal limitation clause. It might be argued that footnote 24 is highly specific to the crime of enforced disappearance and as such does not provide guidance for other crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. The more reasonable position, in the light of the debates surrounding the adoption of footnote 24 and the matters of principle it addresses, is that it provides guidance also for how other crimes should be addressed where only one part of the material elements carries over into the temporal jurisdiction of the Court and the other part remains completed in the past.

Distinguishable from the above are cases that constitute ‘continuing crimes’ in the sense of an ongoing course of criminal activity. In these cases, the conduct repeats itself, meaning all of the material elements of the crime recur each day and may therefore be properly described as a series of discrete acts that are completed each time they are committed. Since the acts concerned can be distinguished between those that occur prior to and those that occur after the relevant entry into force date, issues related to temporal limitations or the principle of non-retroactivity do not arise in the same way. Even if the conduct has identical parameters in terms of location, subject-matter, and participants (such as repeat acts of torture in detention committed by the same perpetrator against the same victim), those acts that occur after the relevant entry into force date will fall within the applicable temporal scope, even if it formed part of a course of conduct or ongoing criminal activity that began at an earlier date.

By way of example, Trial Chamber I in its Judgment in the Lubanga case observed that the crime of the conscription or enlistment of children under the age of fifteen years occurred every day that the underage children continued to be illegally recruited. As the Trial Chamber stated: ‘These offences are continuous in nature. They end only when the child

⁵⁷ Ibid., para. 150. As the Court further observed: ‘The heinous nature and gravity of such crimes prompted the contracting parties to the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity to agree that they must be imprescriptible and not subject to any statutory limitation in the domestic legal order.’

⁵⁸ See Janowiec and Others v. Russia, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction), 21 October 2013, Joint Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Spielmann, Villiger and Nussberger and Partly Dissenting and Partly Concurring Opinion of Judge Wotjyczek. See discussion in Heri, ‘Enforced Disappearance and the European Court of Human Rights’ ratione temporis Jurisdiction: A Discussion of Temporal Elements in Janowiec and Others v. Russia, (2014) 12 JICJ 751-768.

⁵⁹ Elements of Crimes, article 7(1)(i). As Ambos observes, this means that the Statute excludes individual acts of enforced disappearance committed after the entry into force of the Statute, but before the collective attack; Treatise on International Criminal Law, Volume II (2014), p. 112. Nonetheless, since the relevant conduct must always have a nexus with the chapeau of article 7 any individual act would perforce need to occur within the context of the attack in question.

reaches 15 years of age or leaves the force or group'.⁶⁰ In its confirmation decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber had similarly held: 'the crime of enlisting and conscripting is an offence of a continuing nature – referred to by some courts as a "continuous crime" and by others as a "permanent crime". The crime of enlisting or conscripting children under the age of fifteen years continues to be committed as long as the children remain in the armed groups or forces and consequently ceases to be committed when these children leave the groups or reach age fifteen'.⁶¹

- 24 These observations appear to lend support to the proposition that for the crime of conscription or enlistment of children the moment of first recruitment may not be the decisive factor. Although the initial act of recruitment will constitute a discrete event, arguably the essence of the probation is not merely the original moment of conscription or enlistment, but rather the child's continuing membership in the armed group or force, for the duration of such membership while under the age of fifteen years.⁶² In line with the reasoning in Lubanga, because the act of underage membership occurs every day that the child remains enlisted or conscripted, it may be said to commence and be completed on each successive day it continues to occur. In contrast to the bifurcated actus reus for the crime of enforced disappearance which may be separated over time, with possibly only the denial part occurring within the temporal jurisdiction of the ICC, all of material elements of the crime of conscription or enlistment of children (continuing membership of an armed group or force for the duration of such membership while under the age of fifteen years) occur each successive day.⁶³ The ICC could thus exercise jurisdiction where an underage child was recruited prior to the entry into force of the Statute⁶⁴ and continued, post entry into force date, to be a member of such armed group or force while under the age of fifteen.⁶⁵ The same considerations would apply to the use of children under the age of fifteen to participate actively in hostilities where, again, this straddled the applicable temporal threshold.

The above reasoning appears to be supported by footnote 25 of the Elements, which deals with the material elements for the first stage of the crime of enforced disappearance, namely: arrest, detention and abduction. The footnote clarifies that 'detention' for the purpose of article 7(1)(i) includes 'a perpetrator who maintained an existing detention'. This means that ⁶⁰ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Trial Chamber I, 14 March 2012, para. 618 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/677866/>>. The term 'continuing crimes' is also referred to by Pre-Trial Chamber III in its article 15 authorisation decision: 'Bearing in mind the volatile environment in Côte d'Ivoire, the Chamber finds it necessary to ensure that any grant of authorisation covers investigations into "continuing crimes" – those whose commission extends past the date of the application. Thus, crimes that may be committed after the date of the Prosecutor's application will be covered by any authorisation, insofar as the contextual elements of the continuing crimes are the same as for those committed prior to 23 June 2011. They must, at least in a broad sense, involve the same actors and have been committed within the context of either the same attacks (crimes against humanity) or the same conflict (war crimes). Therefore if the authorisation is granted, it will include the investigation of any ongoing and continuing crimes that may be committed after the 23 June 2011 as part of the ongoing situation'. However this appears to be a misnomer, since the Chamber here appears to be referring to the continuing nature not of specific acts, but of related crimes in general; Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Situation No. ICC-02/11, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, 15 November 2011, para. 179 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>>; on this point see Judge Fernández de Gurmendi's separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-15, paras. 64–70 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ea2793/>>.

⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Lubanga, No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 29 January 2007, para. 248 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b7ac4f/>>.

⁶² Rastan, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (2015), p. 173.

⁶³ The elements provide in relevant part that: (i) 'The perpetrator conscripted or enlisted one or more persons into [the national armed forces][an armed force or group]...'; and (ii) 'Such person or persons were under the age of 15 years'; Elements of Crimes, article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) and article 8(2)(e)(vii).

⁶⁴ I.e. entry into force of the Statute within the meaning of article 11(1) or entry into force of the Statute for the State concerned within the meaning of article 11(2).

⁶⁵ See similarly El Zeidy (2005) 5 ICLRev 90–99.

a case of enforced disappearance may fall within the temporal jurisdiction of the Court without impacting on article 11 or footnote 24, where a perpetrator detains a person prior to July 2002, continues to hold that person in detention after that date, and thereafter refuses to give information on the fate or whereabouts of the person (i. e. disappearance in custody) – since in this scenario all of the material elements of the crime (i. e. both stages of the crime of enforced disappearance) would occur after the entry into force of the Statute.

These same considerations would hold for any other crimes all of whose material parameters continue to occur after the temporal threshold of the Court jurisdiction, even if they formed part of a course of conduct that commenced at an earlier date, without offending articles 11, 22 and 24 of the Statute. 25

The above reasoning could also apply to modes of participation with regard to acts committed after the entry into force of the Statute that were in furtherance of, to take one mode of liability as an example, an order given prior thereto. If such an order remained in effect and crimes continued to be committed as a consequence thereof, assuming the evidentiary nexus for this proposition could be satisfied, it appears reasonable to argue that an accused who gave the standing order could be held criminally responsible under the Statute for ongoing acts committed in pursuance thereof. The same logic could be applied with respect to other modes of liability under the Statute.

The above distinction between ongoing crimes that repeat themselves and crimes that were partially completed in the past also finds support in the approach taken by the ICTR Appeals Chamber in the Nahimana et al. case. In particular, in that case the Trial Chamber had found that the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide ‘is an inchoate offence that continues in time until the completion of the acts contemplated’, thereby justifying its extension beyond the express temporal restriction contained in the ICTR Statute, which limits the Tribunal’s jurisdiction to events occurring during 1994. In so doing, the Trial Chamber found that articles in the local publication Kangura and RTLM radio broadcasts, including those occurring prior to 1994, constituted one continuing incitement to commit genocide such that the Tribunal could convict the appellants on the basis of the totality of the articles and broadcasts (i. e. including those occurring in 1993).⁶⁶ The Appeals Chamber reversed this finding holding that the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is completed as soon as the discourse in question is uttered or published, even though the effects of incitement may extend in time.⁶⁷ It found that even if it could be concluded that the totality of the articles and broadcasts constituted one continuing incitement to commit genocide, the appellants could only be convicted for acts of direct and public incitement to commit genocide carried out during 1994.⁶⁸ As such, alleged crimes occurring in before the temporal start-date of 1 January 1994 fell outside of the Tribunal’s competence, even if they were connected to or formed part of a broader ongoing crime.⁶⁹ 26

Finally, setting aside the question of continuing crimes, international courts and tribunals have accepted the admission of evidence which pre-dates the applicable temporal jurisdiction for contextual purposes. In the above Nahimana case, for example, the Appeals Chamber held that a Trial Chamber may validly admit evidence relating to pre-1994 acts and rely on it where such evidence is aimed at clarifying a given context; establishing by inference the elements (in particular, criminal intent) of criminal conduct occurring in 1994; or demonstrating a deliberate pattern of conduct.⁷⁰ Thus, in relation to the case at hand, the Appeals 27

⁶⁶ Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, No. ICTR-99-52-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 3 December 2003, para. 1017.

⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgment, Appeals Chamber, 28 November 2007, para. 723.

⁶⁸ Ibid., paras. 724–725.

⁶⁹ Ibid., para. 723.

⁷⁰ Nahimana et al. (Appeals Chamber Judgment), note 67, paras. 310, 315, citing inter alia to Prosecutor v. Aloys Simba, No. ICTR-01-76-AR72.2, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Regarding Temporal Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 29 July 2004, p. 4; Prosecutor v. Aloys Ntabakuze, No. ICTR-97-34-A, Decision on the Interlocutory Appeal against the Decision of 13 April 2000 of Trial Chamber III, Appeals Chamber, 13 November 2000, p. 5; Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, No. ICTR-99-52-A, Decision on the Inter-

Chamber opined that ‘the 1993 broadcasts could explain how the RTLM listeners perceived the 1994 broadcasts and the impact these broadcasts may have had. Similarly, the pre-1994 Kangura issues were not necessarily inadmissible, since they could be relevant and have probative value in certain respects’.⁷¹ A similar approach was taken by Pre-Trial Chamber II in its confirmation decision in the Bemba case in relation to Prosecution submissions that the Court could infer the accused’s mens rea by referring to prior behaviour of his troops in the Central African Republic (CAR) in 2001 and in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) in 2002, prior to the 2002 intervention in the CAR which formed the subject matter of the case.⁷² Both events fell outside of the temporal scope of the case, while the former fell outside of the temporal scope of the Statute altogether.⁷³

II. Paragraph 2: Entry into force for particular States

- 28 For States that become Parties after 1 July 2002, paragraph 2 of article 11 stipulates that the temporal jurisdiction of the Court will apply from the entry into force of the Statute for that State. As provided in article 126, this will occur on the first day of the month after the 60th day following the deposit of by that State of its instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Nonetheless, the State concerned may have already expressed its consent to the exercise of the Court’s jurisdiction by lodging a declaration pursuant to article 12(3) of the Statute. In such case, the temporal jurisdiction of the Court may have already been activated, possibly with open-ended formulation, meaning that there will be a seamless transition from the temporal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with article 12(3), while the State remained a non-Party State, and that exercised pursuant to the treaty accession provisions of article 126.⁷⁴ It is also possible that the transition between temporal jurisdiction exercised pursuant to a declaration and as a State Party is not seamless, meaning a declaration may have been lodged for a confined time period in the past, resulting in a gap. Although temporal jurisdiction will not be contiguous in this instance, it will still represent an exception to the rule set out in article 126(2) insofar as the Court will have the possibility to exercise jurisdiction with respect to an earlier period. Finally, where a new State Party has not previously lodged a declaration it may do so at the time of accession to the Statute or locutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 5 September 2000, p. 6, and Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, paras. 21, 26 and 32.

⁷¹ Nahimana et al. (Appeals Chamber Judgment), note 67, para. 725. See also Bourgon, in Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 550–551, who observes that evidence of preparatory and planning for genocide that pre-dates the Court’s temporal jurisdiction may be relevant to establishing the mens rea of the accused, citing in support the Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen in Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, No. ICTR-99-52-A, Decision on the Interlocutory Appeal, Appeals Chamber, 5 September 2000, para. 11. See a contrario Joint Separate Opinion of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah and Judge Rafael Nieto-Navia, ibid.

⁷² Prosecutor v. Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, Situation No. ICC-01/05-01/08, Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, 15 June 2009, para. 373 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/07965c/>>.

⁷³ Although the Chamber ultimately disagreed both with the Prosecutor’s assertion that Bemba’s mens rea under article 30 could be generally inferred from alleged past behaviour of his troops as well as the correspondence of the facts at hand, it did nonetheless consider itself competent to examine the earlier incidents for the purpose of its determination in the case at hand; ibid., para. 377.

⁷⁴ See e.g. the open-ended article 12(3) declaration lodged on 18 April 2003 by Côte d’Ivoire accepting the exercise of jurisdiction for crimes committed in its territory since 19 September 2002; Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, Situation No. ICC-02/11, Corrigendum to ‘Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, Pre-Trial Chamber III, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, 15 November 2011, para. 10 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>>. By letter of 3 May 2011 Côte d’Ivoire re-affirmed the continuing validity of 18 April 2003 declaration; ibid., para. 11. Côte d’Ivoire subsequently deposited its instrument of ratification on 15 February 2013.

anytime thereafter.⁷⁵ It is also possible that a State on becoming a Party to the Statute or at any time thereafter lodges a declaration pursuant to article 12(3). Thus, article 11(2) provides that the conditions on the start of the Court's temporal jurisdiction, which are linked to entry into force of the Statute for that State, apply 'unless that State has made a declaration under article 12, paragraph 3.'

Article 11, paragraph 2, uses the same restraining formulation as article 11, paragraph 1, when regulating that the Court may exercise its jurisdiction 'only with respect to' crimes committed after the relevant start date. Nonetheless, the logic contained in the phrase 'the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute for that State' does not mean that the Court is barred from exercising jurisdiction over that State's nationals who commit crimes on the territory of another State Party (or a State that has lodged a declaration). Pursuant to articles 12(2) and 12(3), the ordinary regime for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction on the basis of the territoriality principle will apply: the phrase '[i]f a State becomes a Party to this Statute' does not endow new States Parties with the right of an opt-out over the earlier exercise of ICC jurisdiction with respect to its nationals. For the same reason, the phrase does not mean that the Security Council cannot provide jurisdiction with respect to the territory or nationals of that State for the time period before it became a State Party. It merely serves to describe, without prejudice to either articles 12 or 13, the relevant start date of the Court's temporal jurisdiction for that State.⁷⁶

Where the ICC exercises jurisdiction on the basis of active personality in relation to alleged crimes committed on the territory of a non-Party State by the nationals of several States Parties, the temporal start date for the exercise of jurisdiction may create uneven results. For example, assuming such nationals are deployed as part of a multinational coalition, the entry into force provisions might result in temporal jurisdiction applying for the nationals of some States Parties from 1 July 2002 in accordance with article 11(1), while for other States Parties temporal jurisdiction might apply from a later date in accordance with article 11(2).⁷⁷ To reduce the impact of any such discrepancy on the distribution of alleged crimes attributed within the situation, the Court could prompt the State Party concerned to consider remedying any temporal limitation in line with the process envisaged in Rule 44(1), whereby '[t]he Registrar, at the request of the Prosecutor, may inquire of a State that is not a Party to the Statute or that has become a Party to the Statute after its entry into force, on a confidential basis, whether it intends to make the declaration provided for in article 12, paragraph 3'.

Finally, it should be noted that article 11 governs the exercise of temporal jurisdiction for the Statute as a whole; it does not regulate the exercise of temporal jurisdiction with respect to amendments to the Statute for new crimes, which are treated in article 121. Thus, for example, an entirely separate jurisdictional regime has been created thereunder for the crime of aggression, including both for the entry into force of the amendment as well as for its exercise with respect to particular States.⁷⁸

⁷⁵ See e.g. declaration lodged in February 2004 by Uganda extending the exercise of the temporal jurisdiction by the Court back to 1 July 2002; Prosecutor v. Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, Situation No. ICC-02/04-01/05, Decision on victims' applications for participation a/0010/06, a/0064/06 to a/0070/06, a/0081/06, a/0082/06, a/0084/06 to a/0089/06, a/0091/06 to a/0097/06, a/0099/06, a/0100/06, a/0102/06 to a/0104/06, a/0111/06, a/0113/06 to a/0117/06, a/0120/06, a/0121/06 and a/0123/06 to a/0127/06, Pre-Trial Chamber II, ICC-02/04-01/05-282, 14 March 2008, para. 78 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/12ef1e/>>. As Uganda deposited its instrument of ratification on 14 June 2002, the Statute entered into force for Uganda on 1 September 2002.

⁷⁶ In this sense, article 11(2) operates differently to article 124, which does provide an express right for State Parties to opt-out of the Court's jurisdictional regime over war crimes, even if committed by that State Party's nationals on the territory of another State, since the provision articulates an express exception to the operation of article 12, stating: 'Notwithstanding article 12, paragraph 1 and 2 ...'. Although the provision refers only to the first two paragraphs of article 12, its application must logically extend also to jurisdiction exercised pursuant to article 12(3), since the latter refers itself back to article 12(2). For discussion see Zimmerman, in: Triffterer (ed.), Commentary (2008) art.124, mn 5–7, who notes that two possible readings on the restrictive scope of such a notification.

⁷⁷ See Rastan, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (2015), p. 170.

⁷⁸ See Zimmerman 'Article 15bis' and 'Article 15ter'. See also [Zimmerman/Geiß], Article 8(2)(e)(xiii)-(xv).

Article 12

Preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction

1. A State which becomes a Party to this Statute thereby accepts the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to the crimes referred to in article 5.

2. In the case of article 13, paragraph (a) or (c), the Court may exercise its jurisdiction if one or more of the following States are Parties to this Statute or have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with paragraph 3:

- (a) The State on the territory of which the conduct in question occurred or, if the crime was committed on board a vessel or aircraft, the State of registration of that vessel or aircraft;
- (b) The State of which the person accused of the crime is a national.

3. If the acceptance of a State which is not a Party to this Statute is required under paragraph 2, that State may, by declaration lodged with the Registrar, accept the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question. The accepting State shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'International Core Crimes, Universal Jurisdiction And § 153 et seq. of The German Criminal Procedure Code: A Commentary On The Decisions Of The Federal Prosecutor General And The Stuttgart Higher Regional Court In The Abu Ghraib/Rumsfeld Case', (2007) 18 CLF 43; id., 'Prosecuting Guantánamo in Europe: Can and Shall the Masterminds of the "Torture Memos" be Held Criminally Responsible on the Basis of Universal Jurisdiction?' (2009) 42 CaseWResJIL 405; Buchan, R., 'The Mavi Marmara Incident And the International Criminal Court', (2014) 25 CLF 465; Lauterpacht, H., 'Law of nations and the punishment of war crimes', (1944) 21 BYbIL 58; Joyner, C.C., 'Arresting Impunity: The Case for Universal Jurisdiction in Bringing War Criminals to Accountability', (1996) 59 LAPE 153; Kaul, H.P., 'Preconditions to the Exercise of Jurisdiction', in: Cassese A. et al., The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford University Press 2002) 583; Kirsch, P. and Holmes, J.T., The Rome Conference on an International Criminal Court: The Negotiating Process, (1999) 93 AJIL 1; Kress, C. and von Holtendorff, L., 'The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression' (2010) 8 JICJ 1179; Politi, M., 'The Establishment of an International Criminal Court at a Crossroads: Issues and Prospects After the First Session of the Preparatory Committee', (1997) 13 Nouvelles Etudes Pénales 115; id., 'The ICC and the Crime of Aggression: A Dream that Came Through and the Reality Ahead', (2012) 10 JICJ 267; Scheffer, D. J., 'The United States and the International Criminal Court', (1999) 93 AJIL 17; id., 'Fourteenth Waldemar A. Solf Lecture in International Law: A Negotiator's Perspective on the International Criminal Court', (2001) 167 MillRev 1; id., 'How to turn the tide using the Rome Statute's temporal jurisdiction', (2004) 2 JICJ 26; Stahn, C., 'The "End", the "Beginning" off the End" or the "End of the Beginning"? Introducing Debates and Voices on the Crime of "Aggression"', (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 875; Zimmermann, A., 'Palestine and the International Criminal Court: Quo Vadis? Reach and Limits of Declarations under Article 12(3)', (2013) 11 JICJ 303.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks	1
I. The ILC Draft	3
II. The Preparatory Committee's Draft	4
III. Rome 1998 – the options	5
1. The German proposal	6
2. The Korean proposal	8
3. The United Kingdom proposal	9
4. The United States proposal	10
5. State 'opt-in' and case-by-case proposals	11
6. The Bureau Compromise	12
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	13
I. Paragraph 1: Jurisdiction over crimes	13
II. Paragraph 2	14
1. Acceptance by States Parties	14
2. The different subparagraphs	15
a) Territorial jurisdiction	15
b) Nationality of the accused	18
III. Paragraph 3: Acceptance by non-States Parties	19
C. Conclusions	22

A. Introduction/General remarks

Article 12 on preconditions for the actual exercise of jurisdiction is fundamental to an effective ICC. The views of States were wide ranging and until the proverbial eleventh hour on 17 July 1998, in Rome, where under the Rules of Procedure of the Conference the text had to be adopted by midnight, article 12 was still a make or break provision. Even after the Conference it retains its notoriety as one of the most controversial, if not the most controversial issues.¹ Article 12 is intimately related to article 5 on crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC², article 13 on exercise of jurisdiction³ article 17 on complementarity⁴ and article 124 (the transitional provision)⁵. In effect these provisions dealing with the intertwined aspects of jurisdiction 'were the most complex and most sensitive, and for that reason remained subject to many options as long as possible'⁶. They were, beyond doubt, indicative of the necessity to adopt a package deal. The approach taken is firstly that the offence ratione materiae is found in the list of core crimes contained in article 5 and defined in articles 6, 7 and 8. Secondly, the preconditions for the ICC exercising jurisdiction in the specific case must be met. Thirdly, the case must be initiated in accordance with the provisions of article 13.

From the ILC Draft Statute⁷, to the Draft Statute prepared by the Preparatory Committee⁸ and finally to the negotiations at the Rome Conference⁹, a fundamental issue in all stages of the debate was whether in cases other than where the situation was referred to the Prosecutor by the UN Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter¹⁰, the ICC would have vested in it inherent jurisdiction to prosecute the crimes listed in article 5 on account of ratification or acceptance of the Statute. Alternatively, would State consent be a precondition and if so for which crimes, on what basis and by which State or States.

I. The ILC Draft

The 1994 Draft Statute¹¹ was complicated and geared towards producing a Court that would operate on a restrictive consent basis and with strict Security Council control under article 23. The crimes listed were broader than article 5 of the Rome Statute. Article 21 para. 1 (a) provided for inherent jurisdiction in a case of genocide, with no additional requirement of acceptance¹². However, article 21 para. 1 (b) stipulated that the Court could exercise its jurisdiction for the other crimes referred to in article 20, namely aggression, war crimes, crimes against humanity and certain treaty crimes¹³, where the complaint was brought in accordance with article 25 para. 2 and the jurisdiction of the Court over the particular crime was accepted, under article 22, by the custodial State and by the State on the

¹ Scheffer (1999) 93 AJIL 17, 21.

² See A. Zimmermann, article 5, mn 10 second edition.

³ See S. A. Williams/W. A. Schabas, article 13, mn 1 second edition.

⁴ See S. A. Williams/W. A. Schabas, article 17, mn 2 second edition.

⁵ See A. Zimmermann, article 124, mn 4-7 second edition.

⁶ Kirsch and Holmes (1999) 93 AJIL 1, 2.

⁷ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 29.

⁸ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 (3 Apr. 1998).

⁹ See Bureau Discussion Paper, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (6 July 1998) 11-12 [then article 7] and Bureau Proposal, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 July 1998) 10-12 [then articles 7*bis* and 7*ter*].

¹⁰ See article 13 (b).

¹¹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

¹² The complaint was to be brought under article 25 para. 1, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, by a State Party which was also a contracting party to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 78 UNTS 277(1951), as envisaged by article VI.

¹³ Article 20 (e) and Annex. Examples included the anti-terror violence conventions such as the 1970 Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 860 UNTS 105 and the 1988 UN Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, UN Doc.E/CONF.82/15(19 Dec. 1988), reprinted in (1989) 28 ILM 497.

territory of which the act or omission in question occurred, a type of ‘ceded jurisdiction’¹⁴. As well, in a case where the custodial State had received a request¹⁵ under an international agreement from another State to surrender a person for prosecution, unless the request was rejected, the acceptance by the requesting State was required. Under article 22 the ILC Draft detailed the modalities of acceptance by States Parties. It can be classified as an ‘opting in’ system with States specifying the crimes for which jurisdiction was accepted¹⁶. The Court did not have inherent jurisdiction, therefore, based on a State ratifying or acceding but needed a special declaration whether at the time of becoming a Party or at a later time. The ILC was of the view that this approach best reflected its general approach to the Court’s jurisdiction¹⁷, that it is based on State consent with the ‘Court intervening upon the will of the States concerned, rather than whenever required for protecting the interests of the international community’¹⁸. Article 23 para. 1 provided for referral by the UN Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter for crimes referred to in article 20. With respect to aggression article 23 para. 2 detailed the prerequisite that the Security Council first determine that a State had committed aggression before a complaint of or directly related to an act of aggression could be brought. The consent regime in the ILC Draft was criticized as being ‘complicated and cumbersome at best’¹⁹, and likely ‘to cripple the proposed Court at worst’²⁰.

II. The Preparatory Committee’s Draft

- 4 In both the Ad Hoc Committee²¹ set up by the General Assembly to review the ILC 1994 Draft Statute and in the Preparatory Committee established in 1996²², the same fundamental questions were raised. In the Preparatory Committee there was widespread, albeit not uniform, agreement that there should be inherent jurisdiction over genocide²³. However, as in the Ad Hoc Committee, there were different views on whether war crimes and crimes against humanity should be so treated²⁴.

States supporting inherent jurisdiction for all core crimes underscored the need for it because of the gravity of the crimes. Those opposing stressed State sovereignty, the consensual nature of the Court and the necessity of such to obtain maximum State support. In fact, some States argued that the preconditions of State consent set out in article 21 para. 1 (b) of the ILC Draft should have been more expansive including also the mandatory consent of the States of nationality of the accused and the victim. In the Zutphen Draft Report²⁵ which was produced to facilitate the last Preparatory Committee session the options on jurisdictional preconditions were contained in articles 6 [21] and 7 [21*bis*] as produced by the Working Groups of the Preparatory Committee²⁶. The articles had square brackets indicating again various alternatives and diverse positions of States.

¹⁴ It must, however, be recalled that the ILC Draft reduced the conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction set out in its earlier 1993 Draft. See Report of the ILC on the Work of its Forty-Fifth Session, 3 May-23 July 1993, UN GAOR, 48th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/48/10. See Crawford (1994) 88 AJIL 140; Warbrick (1995) 44 I&CompLQ 466, and Blakesley (1997) 13 NEP 177, 204.

¹⁵ Article 21 para. 2.

¹⁶ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, commentary to article 22, 82. Note that in its 1993 Draft, the ILC Working Group had proposed two alternatives to this article, which were based on ‘opting out’. 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 83. Under the ‘opting out’ approach, the Court’s jurisdiction would have been accepted by all States Parties except for those crimes expressly designated.

¹⁷ Ibid., 83.

¹⁸ Politi (1997) 13 NEP 149. See the Ad Hoc Committee Report.

¹⁹ Sadat and Wexler (1997) 13 NEP 163, 173.

²⁰ Ibid.

²¹ UN Doc.A/RES/49/53 (9 Dec. 1994).

²² UN Doc.A/RES/50/46.

²³ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, 29.

²⁴ Politi, (1997) 13 NEP 149–150.

²⁵ Zutphen Draft.

²⁶ Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, 3.

III. Rome 1998 – the options

The several options contained in the Draft Statute²⁷ of the Preparatory Committee as well as other proposals were put before delegations in the Committee of the Whole. These ranged from the proposals on universal jurisdiction by Germany and automatic jurisdiction using broad bases of jurisdiction by South Korea at one end of the spectrum to the restrictive mandatory consent of all interested States proposed by some delegations. The Bureau discussion paper tried to narrow the options and its subsequent proposal likewise did so, while still retaining alternatives²⁸. The final package struck a compromise. Nevertheless, the then entrenched positions of some delegations proved to be irreconcilable. The result was that the consensus approach to adoption was thwarted and an unrecorded vote was called for late in plenary on 17 July 1998, the Statute being adopted by 120 votes in favour to 7 against with 21 abstentions. Article 12 as adopted is not as restrictive as it could have been.

1. The German proposal

The German proposal contained in article 9 para. 1, further option of the Draft Statute was based on the rationale that States individually have a legitimate basis at international law to prosecute the crimes listed in article 5 based on universal jurisdiction. It was submitted that the ICC should have the same capacity that contracting States have.

It has been well established in customary and conventional international law that certain crimes are against the universal interest, offend against universal public policy and are universally condemned. Thus, the perpetrators are considered hostis humanis generis, enemies of humankind and any State that obtains custody over them has a legitimate ground to prosecute in the interest of all States based on universal jurisdiction over the offence. The State needs no direct connection with the crime²⁹. It merges jurisdiction over the person with jurisdiction over the offence³⁰. In this way such serious and heinous crimes will not escape justice by falling into a jurisdictional vacuum. There is no requirement that any other States involved through territorial locus of the crime, nationality of the accused or victims must consent. The origins of universal jurisdiction can arguably be traced to international piracy on the high seas³¹, the slave trade³² and more latterly to war crimes³³, crimes against ²⁷ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/2/Add.1, articles 6 (b), 7, 9 (further option) and further option for article 7.

²⁸ Kirsch and Holmes (1999) 93 AJIL 1, 9.

²⁹ Ambos (2007) 18 CLF 43, 54–46; Ambos (2009) 42 CaseWResJIL 405, 421 and 443–444; Joyner (1996) 59 LAPE 167; Randall (1988) 66 TexasLRev 785 and American Law Institute, Restatement (Third) (1987) The Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 404.

³⁰ Lauterpacht (1944) 21 BYBIL 58, 61.

³¹ As to the right of every State to seize a pirate ship or aircraft on the high seas or otherwise outside the jurisdiction of any State and arrest the persons on board see article 19 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, UN GAOR, Vol. XVII, 139; (1982) 21 ILM 1245, The SS Lotus Case (France v. Turkey) (1927), PCIJ Series A, No 10, 70 per Justice Moore and In re Piracy Jure Gentium, (1924) A.C. 586 (Sp. Ref. J.C.P.C.).

³² See Green (1984) International Law 179. The assimilation of slave-trader to pirate probably stems from the fact that slave trading was declared by the British Parliament to be piracy (1824), 5 Geo. IV, c. 113, ss. 9–10. See R. v. Zulueta, 1 Cat. & K. 215, 1 Cox C.C. 20 and LeLouis (1817), 2 Dods. 210. There is no indication that the 1926 Slavery Convention, 60 LNTS 253, as amended by the Protocol of 1953, 182 UNTS 51, or the Supplementary Convention of 1956, Canada Treaty Series No. 7 subjected alleged perpetrators to universal jurisdiction. But for rights of visit on the high seas of suspected slave-trading steps see article 110 para. 1 (b) of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea 1982. Note Bassiouni and Nanda (1972) 12 Santa ClaraLRev 424.

³³ The International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was established under the London Charter of 8 Aug. 1945 8 UNTS 279. The IMT held that the allied powers in signing the Charter had ‘done together what any one of them might have done singly; for it is not to be doubted that any nation has the right thus to set up special courts to administer law’: (1948) Trials Of The Major War Criminals 22 461. See article 6 (b) of the Charter. See also e.g., under Control Council Order No. 10, Trial of Otto Sandrock and Three Others (“The Almelo Trial”) 1 LRTWC 35, 42 (1945); the ‘Hostages Case’ 8 LRTWC, Case No. 47, 43 (1947) and the Remmele trial, 15 LRTWC 44 (1947). Note also the application of the principle for grave breaches of the four 1949 Geneva Conventions:

humanity³⁴ and genocide³⁵. The International Court of Justice has yet to make a definitive pronouncement on the subject, although the views of several of its judges, which vary considerably, were set out in individual opinions in the Arrest Warrant case³⁶. The ad hoc international criminal tribunals have recognised universal jurisdiction by authorising the transfer of cases to States under this principle³⁷. The transfer of cases by the two Tribunals on the basis of universal jurisdiction has been frequently described to the Security Council in the bi-annual reports of the Presidents and Prosecutors, without any objection from members of the Council³⁸.

The German proposal attracted strong support from some delegations³⁹ and from many of the NGOs⁴⁰. The view central to this proposal was that to limit the potential of the ICC by requiring some form of State consent beyond ratification would detract from the effectiveness of the Court and even the rationale and philosophical underpinnings of it. Thus, the impact of the German proposal would have been to give the ICC universal jurisdiction⁴¹ over the Article 49 Geneva Convention (I) for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, 75 UNTS 31; article 50 Geneva Convention (II) for the Amelioration of the Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Armed Forces at Sea, 75 UNTS 85; article 129 Geneva Convention (III) Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War 75 UNTS 135 and article 146 Geneva Convention (IV) Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War 75 UNTS 287; First Add. Prot. of 1977, 1999 Canada Treaty Series No. 2 and article 28 of the 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict 249 UNTS 240. There is also national legislation to support universal jurisdiction, as detailed by the ICRC, Universal Jurisdiction v. State Consent, Doc. ICRC/NYC (12 Oct. 1997), 2. Domestic prosecutions also evidence the use of universal jurisdiction: see Polyukhovich v. Commonwealth of Australia (1991), 172 CLR 501, 562–3, 565 (Aust.H.C.); Note also in a civil claim context the discussion of universal jurisdiction in Kadić v. Karadžić, 70 F.3 d 232, 243 (2nd cir. 1995).

³⁴ On account of the grammatical construction of article 6 (c) the Charter the IMT was restricted in its jurisdiction to crimes against humanity connected to the conduct of the war: 1 Trials Of The Major War criminals 17 (1947); Secretary General of the United Nations, Memorandum, The Charter And Judgment Of The Nuremberg Tribunal 66 (1949). Prosecutions by the Allied Military Tribunals acting under Control Council Order No. 10 were not so restricted. See Alstoetter et al., The Justices Trial VI LRTWC 1, 45–46 (1947). Domestic consideration includes Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, 36 I.L.R. 26 (1961–1962); Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F. 2 d 571, 582 (1985, U.S. CA. Sixth Cir.) Fédération nationale des déportés et internés résistants et patriotes et al. v. Barbie 78 I.L.R. 125, 130 (1983) (Cass.Crim.) and R. v. Finta 1 S.C.R. 701 (1994). Note also article 5 para. 2 of the 1984 Torture Convention, 1465 UNTS 85.

³⁵ The 1948 Genocide Convention 78 UNTS 277 does not provide for universal jurisdiction, but for jurisdiction by the State where the offence was committed and by an international penal tribunal (article VI). However, the Convention does not prohibit States using other bases of jurisdiction and it has been argued that universal jurisdiction may be exercised on the basis of customary international law. As to what is not prohibited is permitted see the SS Lotus Case (France v. Turkey) (1927), PCIJ Series A, No 10, 70. Concerning genocide as a crime under customary international law see Reservations to the Convention on Genocide (Ad. Op.) (1951) ICJ Rep. 23; Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann (1961), 36 ILR 18, 39 (Dist. Ct.); (1962), 36 ILR 277, 304 (Supreme Ct.) and Restatement, (Third) (1987) The Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 404, Reporter's Note on § 404, 256. Note Beresin: Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law: Crimes (1986) 271, 275. Further, it is submitted that the interest in the prevention of genocide is an erga omnes obligation. See Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company Ltd. Case (Prelim. Obj.) (Belgium v. Spain), (1970) ICJ Rep. 32; GA Res. 96 I and Joyner (1996) 59 LAPE 167, 168.

³⁶ Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, [2002] ICJ Reports 3.

³⁷ Rules of Procedure and Evidence [of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia], Rule 11bis, paras. (A)(ii) and (iii), as amended 10 June 2004; Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, Rule ii bis, paras. (A)(ii) and (iii), as amended 15 May 2004; Prosecutor v. Bagaragaza, No. ICTR-2005-86-11bis, Decision on Prosecutor's Request for Referral of the Indictment to the Kingdom of the Netherlands, Trial Chamber, 13 Apr. 2007.

³⁸ E.g., UN Doc.S/PV. S/PV.4999, 5, 18–19.

³⁹ E.g., UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.3, para. 21 (Czech Republic), para. 42 (Latvia), para. 76 (Costa Rica); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.4, para. 12 (Albania), paras. 20–21 (Germany); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.6, para. 4 (Belgium), para. 69 (Luxembourg); UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.8, para. 18 (Bosnia and Herzegovina), para. 62 (Ecuador).

⁴⁰ E.g., ICRC (UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.4, para. 70), I Commission of Jurists, Lawyers Committee for Hum. Rts., AI and Hum. Rts. Watch. Also: UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.2, para. 119; UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.3, para. 123; UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.4, para. 70.

⁴¹ Note that Germany also called this 'the German version of automatic jurisdiction'. See statement by H.-P. Kaul, Acting Head of the German Delegation in the Committee of the Whole, 9 July 1998, 1. Thus, Germany listed crimes with no need for a separate consent of interested States. As Germany indicated⁴² the universal principle's application would have eliminated loopholes. For example, if consent of at least the territorial State was necessary and if genocide was committed in State X against nationals of State X and X is not a Party to the Statute and the Security Council does not refer the matter to the ICC⁴³ the crime would not be cognizable by the Court. Similarly, it is true in the case of internal armed conflicts that the territorial State and State of nationality will often be one and the same. The ICC would only have jurisdiction if that State had long before the conflict become a State Party or if not through political domestic pressures agreed ad hoc or again if the Security Council acted under Chapter VII⁴⁴. As well, the restrictions of State consent would mean that even where the custodial State was a Party to the Rome Statute and wanted to surrender the accused to the ICC, the Court would not be able to exercise jurisdiction without the consent of the other involved States.

If the German proposal had been marketable in Rome, the end result would have been the deletion of article 12 [article 7 in the Draft Statute] on preconditions. Related to this issue, it must be emphasized, is the safeguard contained in article 17 on complementarity. The ICC would have only exercised such universal jurisdiction where a national system was unwilling or unable to investigate and/or prosecute effectively. Therefore, the universal principle would not have divested national criminal courts of their primary role in prosecutions of listed crimes.

Clearly, the universal principle would have given the ICC jurisdiction if the core crimes were committed in the territory of any State, Party or non-Party to the Statute. However, non-States Parties would have been under no international legal obligation to cooperate with the Court. Therefore, the second ground of the German proposal contained in article 9 para. 2 further option, was that non-States Parties could accept the obligation to cooperate on an ad hoc basis, with respect to any listed crime⁴⁵.

2. The Korean proposal

Sensing opposition to the German concept of universal jurisdiction, the Republic of Korea's proposal⁴⁶, that appeared two days into the Conference on 17 June 1998, provided for so-called automatic jurisdiction. The Korean view was that by becoming a Party a State would be considered to have accepted the jurisdiction of the ICC. The jurisdictional nexus was that any one or more of four involved States Parties have consented to the ICC exercising jurisdiction over a case; either the territorial State, the states of nationality of the accused and the victim or the custodial State. This proposal differed from those below in that it allowed for the selective consent by ratification of one of the four States including the custodial State. In reality there was no difference in philosophy between the German and Korean proposals, as the universal principle is based solely upon the person accused being in the custody of the prosecuting State. The Korean proposal enjoyed wide support⁴⁷ but was not acceptable to many States who wanted a second layer of State consent⁴⁸.

used 'inherent' and 'automatic' in the same way to mean that the ICC should be vested with universal jurisdiction upon ratification by States. This must be contrasted with the term 'automatic' as used in the Korean Proposal, the United Kingdom Proposal, the Bureau Proposal and in the final text of the Statute where although acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction is automatic there are preconditions. However, they did not require a second State consent as did the opt-in and State consent regimes.

⁴² Statement by H.-P. Kaul, Acting Head of the German Delegation, Rome Conference, 19 June 1998.

⁴³ See article 13 (b).

⁴⁴ Bertram-Nothnagel, Report to the Union Internationale des Avocats 10 (12 Aug. 1998).

⁴⁵ Contrast the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR set up by UN Security Resolutions 827 (25 May 1993) and 955 (8 Nov. 1994), acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, which obligate all States to cooperate.

⁴⁶ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.6 (18 June 1998). A similar proposal had been made earlier by Sweden: ICRC (UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.4, para. 70), I Commission of Jurists, Lawyers Committee for Hum. Rts., AI and Hum. Rts. Watch, 4.

⁴⁷ Terra Viva, Seoul Floats a Compromise on Jurisdiction, No. 6, 7 (22 June 1998) and The International Criminal Court Monitor, 1 (10 July 1998): 79 % of the States present supported the Korean Proposal.

⁴⁸ Ibid.

3. The United Kingdom proposal

- 9 The United Kingdom⁴⁹, in further option for article 7 para. 1, provided for jurisdiction by States Parties of the ICC for crimes listed in article 5, with necessarily the same in built safeguard of complementarity. However, in article 7 para. 2 the further requirement was that both the custodial State and the State where the crime occurred consented to the jurisdiction of the ICC by being States Parties. Concern was expressed that to get the cumulative consents would be difficult⁵⁰. On 19 June 1998, the proposal was amended to delete the custodial State⁵¹.

4. The United States proposal

- 10 In cases where the Security Council does not trigger the Court's jurisdiction, the United States supported⁵² as fundamental the consent of the territorial State and the State of nationality of the accused person, or at a minimum only the consent of the State of nationality⁵³. The United States insisted that the ICC have no jurisdiction over the nationals of non-States Parties to the Statute. It was argued that to do so would violate article 34 the 1969 *Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties*⁵⁴, as treaties cannot be binding on non-Party third States. The position was that it would not be acceptable for United States citizens to be accountable in a Court not accepted by the United States. The United States made it clear that it could not adhere to a text that allowed for United States forces operating abroad to be brought even conceivably before the ICC, even where the United States had not become a Party to the Statute. The United States position was that this would derogate from the ability of the United States to act as a major player in multinational humanitarian and peacekeeping operations. Protection against frivolous and arbitrary charges and other forms of inappropriate investigations and prosecution was called for⁵⁵. Of course, the United States position still left open referral of a situation by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter as provided for in article 13 (b) of the Statute, subject of course to the veto of one of the P5. This in the United States view was the only way 'to impose the court's jurisdiction on a non-party state'⁵⁶. In effect this proposal would have resulted in an ICC controlled by the Security Council, a type of permanent ad hoc criminal tribunal⁵⁷.

The indispensable requirement of the acceptance of the State of nationality of the accused was not acceptable to the overwhelming majority of States as it was seen as causing a probable paralysis of the ICC. Other States had tried to assuage the United States concerns by stressing the provisions on complementarity contained in article 17 of the Statute and judicial cooperation in article 98 para. 2, that requires consent of the sending State as a precondition for the surrender to the ICC by the 'host' State of persons present in that State pursuant to international agreements. This would have meant that U.S. forces on for example peace-keeping missions or elsewhere abroad under Status of Forces Agreements would not have been amenable to prosecution before the ICC unless the U.S. consented.

⁴⁹ UN Doc.A/AC.249/WG.3/DP.1.

⁵⁰ See e.g., Lawyers Committee for Hum. Rts., Exercise of ICC Jurisdiction: The Case for Universal Jurisdiction 1 ICC Briefing Series 8 (May 1998)5.

⁵¹ ICRC (UN Doc.A/CONF.183/SR.4, para. 70), ICJ Brief, 3.

⁵² UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.70 (14 July 1998).

⁵³ See testimony of Ambassador D. Scheffer, Head of the United States Delegation in Rome, before the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 23 July 1998.

⁵⁴ 1155 UNTS 331 (1969).

⁵⁵ The passive personality basis of jurisdiction in the Korean proposal would have been a protective deterrent for such forces, giving jurisdictional acceptance to the State of nationality of victims.

⁵⁶ Testimony of Ambassador D. Scheffer, Head of the United States Delegation in Rome, before the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 23 July 1998.

⁵⁷ Podgers (1998) ABAJ Sept 64, 67.

5. State 'opt-in' and case-by-case proposals

The State 'opt-in' proposal in article 6 para. 2, article 7, option 1 and article 9, option 1 of the Draft Statute was markedly different from the previous proposals as it required an actual second consent other than being a Party to the Statute. This declaration of consent over specified crimes could have been placed at the time of ratification or at a later stage. The thrust of the proposal was that before the ICC could assume jurisdiction as many as five States potentially would have had to have consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court over the crime in question: that is the custodial State, the territorial State, the State that had requested extradition of the person from the custodial State, unless the request was rejected, the State of nationality of the accused and the State of nationality of the victim. The ICC would have been less competent under this proposal than States are currently under international law to prosecute domestically, where the consent of other involved States is not necessary⁵⁸.

The case-by-case approach contained in article 7, option 2 of the Draft Statute would have needed the specific consent of the States outlined above in the 'opt-in' Proposal. Ratification would, therefore have had little meaning in practical reality and States would have been able to render immune from consideration of the Court any individual when it seemed politically desirable. This proposal would have rendered the ICC ineffective in many cases.

In effect, both the opt-in and case-by-case consent proposals would have been jurisdiction 'à la carte'. This would have resulted in practical terms in a significantly weakened Court with most often the ICC only having jurisdiction when the Security Council referred a situation to it, with the built in Charter problem of the veto power. This would have been particularly so should both proposals have been adopted and States had preferred to follow the case-by-case approach. States as a result could have ratified with no intention of ever allowing cases to go before the Court. This would have resulted in an ineffectual Court in the majority of cases and as well have 'foment[ed] selectivity and arbitrariness'⁵⁹.

6. The Bureau Compromise

The Bureau discussion paper⁶⁰ 'had narrowed the range of options but had deliberately taken a cautious approach'⁶¹. The Proposal⁶² had likewise retained several options. Both of these had dropped the German Proposal⁶³. The Bureau Proposal in article 7 para. 1 adopted the Korean Proposal for genocide alone. For war crimes and crimes against humanity, three options were presented in article 7 para. 2: (1) the Korean Proposal, (2) the acceptance by the territorial and custodial States and in (3) the acceptance by the State of nationality of the accused alone. Some States voiced strong objections against the Korean Proposal stating that it was quasi-universal jurisdiction. However, other States pointed out that it would have been in keeping with the ability at international law of the custodial State to prosecute itself for international crimes, stricto sensu. They viewed the other options as too restrictive, in particular option 3 based on nationality of the accused. As well, article 7*bis* on acceptance of jurisdiction in both the discussion paper for treaty crimes and possibly for one or more of the core crimes and in Option 2 of the Proposal for crimes against humanity and war crimes was controversial as it replicated the opt-in regime. Article 7*bis* Option 1 reproduced the ⁵⁸ Lawyers Committee for Hum. Rts., Exercise of ICC Jurisdiction: The Case for Universal Jurisdiction 1 ICC Briefing Series 8 (May 1998)5.

⁵⁹ Hum. Rts. Watch, Justice in the Balance: Recommendations for an Effective International Criminal Court 46 (1998).

⁶⁰ UN Doc.A/CONF.183/c.1/L.53 (6 July 1998) 11-13.

⁶¹ Kirsch and Holmes (1999) 93 *AJIL*1, 9.

⁶² UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 (10 July 1998) 10-12.

⁶³ According to The Rome Treaty Conference Monitor, 10 July 1998, 2 '23 states displayed their dismay that universal jurisdiction was not reflected'. Note also the reaction of the German Delegation, as expressed in Statement by H.-P. Kaul, Acting Head of the German Delegation, Rome Conference, 19 June 1998.

automatic jurisdiction over all core crimes by States Parties. Thus, as late as 10 July 1998, with only one week left there was no consensus. The United States and other States emphasized that ‘universal jurisdiction or any variant of it’ was unacceptable⁶⁴.

The result was the introduction into the final package by the Bureau of a new article on preconditions on 17 July 1998, the present article 12 in the Statute. This article combines State acceptance of jurisdiction with preconditions for the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC. It allows disjunctively for the acceptance, by being States Parties, of one or more of the territorial State or the State of nationality of the accused. The transitional provision contained in article 12⁶⁵ was also part of the compromise to gain the agreement of France to the Statute⁶⁶. It provides that States Parties may opt out of the ICC’s war crimes jurisdiction for a period of seven years when the alleged crimes were committed in its territory or by its nationals. States that had lobbied for the opt-in acceptance and the preconditional conjunctive approach or the State of nationality of the accused alone remained opposed. From the outset issues of jurisdiction had been a key concern for the United States⁶⁷. For the United States it was the four words ‘one or more of’ that caused the ultimate dissent. On this issue the United States proposed an amendment during the last hours of the Conference in the Committee of the Whole⁶⁸. It reads:

‘With respect to States not party to the Statute the Court shall have jurisdiction over acts committed in the territory of a State not party, or committed by officials or agents of a State not party in the course of official duties and acknowledged by the State as such, only if the State has accepted jurisdiction in accordance with this article.’

The amendment was resoundingly defeated by a no-action motion⁶⁹, adopted by 113 in favour to 17 against with 25 abstentions.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1: Jurisdiction over crimes

- 13 States by becoming parties to the Statute accept the jurisdiction of the ICC for the crimes provided in article 5 of the Statute, namely, genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and aggression⁷⁰. It follows option 1 of the Bureau Proposal in article 7*bis*. Article 12 para. 1 therefore assumes the position of automatic jurisdiction over the listed crimes, with no possibility to opt out. However, as far as the crime of aggression is concerned, it seems that in 2010 States Parties have established a different jurisdictional regime. On the one hand, should the amendment come into force, the Court would exercise its jurisdiction in accordance with article 12⁷¹; on the other hand, prior to ratification or acceptance of the Kampala amendment, a State Party might lodge a declaration with the Registrar whereby it would exclude the Court’s jurisdiction over any act of aggression it would commit⁷². Nevertheless, by ratifying or accepting the amendment, it would allow the Court to exercise

⁶⁴ Kirsch (Nov.-Dec. 1998) ASIL Newsletter 1, 8.

⁶⁵ See A. Zimmermann, article 124, mn 1 second edition.

⁶⁶ The United States had earlier argued for a ten year transitional period for war crimes and crimes against humanity. Statement by David Scheffer, US Ambassador at Large for War Crimes Issues, American University, Washington, DC, September 2000.

⁶⁷ The Rome Treaty Conference Monitor, 18 July 1998, No. 26, 2.

⁶⁸ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.90 (16 July 1998).

⁶⁹ Proposed by Norway. Sweden and Denmark spoke for and China and Qatar against. UN Doc.A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.42, paras. 20–31.

⁷⁰ RC/Res.6, Annex I.

⁷¹ According to article 15*bis* (4).

⁷² As for the uncertainties and possible contrasts with article 121(5) see Cryer et al., Introduction ICL (2014) 324.

its jurisdiction in relation to any act of aggression which might occur on its territory, every time such an act is committed by another Party who has ratified the amendment, or, alternatively, by any accepting State under paragraph 3 of article 12, which has not lodged a similar declaration⁷³.

II. Paragraph 2

1. Acceptance by States Parties

In cases where pursuant to article 13 (a) or (c), a situation is referred to the Prosecutor by a State Party⁷⁴ or where the Prosecutor has initiated an investigation *proprio motu*⁷⁵, State acceptance is necessary⁷⁶. As discussed above, this complex and controversial issue resulted in a compromise put to the Committee of the Whole in the final package. It was an attempt by the Bureau to find a middle ground between the opposite positions of States: between those who had for the most part a preference for universal jurisdiction or a list of alternative States (territorial State, State of nationality of the accused or the victim and the custodial State) where it was sufficient that one had accepted the jurisdiction of the Court by ratifying and those that insisted on either State Party acceptance by the State of nationality of the accused or even the stricter requirement that there be acceptance conjunctively from a list of States as had been proposed in the ILC Draft⁷⁷. Article 12 as adopted by the Conference is the accommodation that was struck. It reduced the preconditions. The jurisdictional nexus is that the territorial State or the State of nationality of the accused are States Parties. These are the two primary bases of jurisdiction over the offence in international criminal law⁷⁸ and are universally accepted.

2. The different subparagraphs

a) Territorial jurisdiction. Territorial jurisdiction is a manifestation of State sovereignty⁷⁹. A State has plenary jurisdiction over persons, property and conduct occurring in its territory, ⁷³ In accordance with article 121 para. 5. See Kress and von Holtendorff (2010) 8 JICJ 1179, 1214. See also Politi (2012) 10 JICJ 267, 279.

⁷⁴ In accordance with article 14.

⁷⁵ In accordance with article 15.

⁷⁶ As for the inapplicability of article 12, paragraph 2, to article 13 (b), namely in case of a referral by the UN Security Council, see: Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ('Ahmad Harun') and Ali Muhammad Al Abd-Al-Rahman ('Aukushayb'), No. ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58 (7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 April 2007, para. 16; Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, No. ICC-01/05-01/08-320, Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 12 December 2008, para. 59; Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ('Omar Al Bashir'), No. ICC-02/05-01/09-3, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, para. 36; Situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-1, Decision on the 'Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi And Abdullah Al Senussi', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 June 2011, para. 9. In line with this interpretation of the Statute, according to the Kampala amendment State consent is irrelevant in the case of a UN Security Council's referral pertaining to an alleged crime of aggression. See RC/Res.6, Annex III, Understanding 2.

⁷⁷ At the outset of the Conference many delegations including China, France, India, Mexico and several non-aligned States had supported the 'state consent' proposal, requiring consent even from States Parties for each prosecution.

⁷⁸ The various UN Conventions dealing with international terrorism use these bases of jurisdiction along with passive personality and the presence of the accused (custodial State) to allow for extradition or prosecution by domestic criminal courts. See e.g., article 6 of the 1979 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, 1316 UNTS 205 and article 6 of the 1997 International Convention on the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, UN Doc. A/RES/52/164.

⁷⁹ Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Steamship Cristina, (1938) A.C. 485, 496. The territorial principle has been interpreted in some domestic courts to allow for criminal prosecution when a significant portion of the elements of the crime occur in the State. See, the Canadian case of Libman v. The Queen, (1985) 2 Supreme Court Reports 178. The territory of a State includes its land mass, internal waters, the twelve nautical mile territorial sea and the airspace above all of the former. Jurisdiction is recognised at international law as extending to conduct subject only to obligations or limitations imposed by international law⁸⁰. This is the universally accepted working rule in international criminal law and can be found in bilateral extradition treaties and multilateral conventions⁸¹. Thus if a listed crime is committed in State A, a State Party to the ICC Statute, by a national of State B, whether or not State B is a State Party, State A will have enabled the ICC to take jurisdiction, whether the alleged offender is present in State A or in another custodial State Party⁸². The ICC is not, as has been argued by the United States, taking jurisdiction over non-States Parties, in violation of article 34 of the *Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties*⁸³. When an alien commits a crime, whether a domestic common crime or an international crime such as hostage taking, on the territory of another State, a prosecution in the latter State is not dependent on the State of nationality being a Party to the pertinent treaty or otherwise consenting⁸⁴. It is not a case of a non-State Party being bound and the ICC overreaching its jurisdiction, but rather the individual being amenable to the jurisdiction of the ICC where crimes are committed in the territory of a State Party. There is no rule of international law prohibiting the territorial State from voluntarily delegating to the ICC its sovereign ability to prosecute⁸⁵.

At the time of ratification a few States made declarations concerning the territorial scope of the Rome Statute. In contrast with many other multilateral international instruments, there is no specific provision for this in the Statute. The Netherlands made a harmless but reassuring statement to the effect that the Statute applies not only to its European territory but also to the Netherlands Antilles and Aruba. More troublesome was Denmark's declaration that it does not intend the Statute to apply to the Faroe Islands and Greenland⁸⁶. While this was no doubt motivated by admirable sentiments of respect for local autonomy, it had the effect of excluding the reach of the Court from a territory which, on its own, has no right to correct the situation, because neither the Faroe Islands nor Greenland are sovereign States and as a result they cannot accede to the Statute. Were a case to arise, the Court might well take the lead from analogous cases before the European Court of Human Rights⁸⁷ and rule the Danish declaration to be an illegal reservation without any effect, in accordance with article 120 of the Statute, thereby recognising jurisdiction over the disputed territories. The ILC Special Rapporteur on the question of reservations has written that committed on board maritime vessels and aircraft registered in a State. See e.g., article 6 para. 1 (a) of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation (1988), 27 ILM 672. Note Sadat Wexler (1998) 13 NEP 25 includes also the State of registration of spacecraft or space stations.

‘a statement by which a State purported to exclude the application of a treaty to a territory meant that it sought “to exclude or to modify” the legal effect which the treaty would normally have, and such a statement therefore constituted, according to the Special Rapporteur, a “true” reservation, rationae loci’⁸⁸.

⁸⁰ See e.g., North Atlantic Status of Forces Agreement, 1951, 1953 Canada Treaty Series No. 13, and the Agreement Concerning the Jurisdictional Immunities of U.N. Forces Between the United Nations and Cyprus, 1964, 492 UNTS 57.

⁸¹ Furthermore, international terrorism conventions oblige States parties to amend their domestic law to provide for wide bases of jurisdiction including universality and also utilize the principle of aut dedere, aut judicare, obliging States to extradite or prosecute.

⁸² Once the preconditions of article 12 para. 2 have been met, other States Parties are obliged to cooperate with the ICC. See Krefß and Prost, article 86, mn 2–7 second edition. on the general obligation to cooperate, and Krefß and Prost, article 89 mn 5–13 on the surrender of persons to the Court.

⁸³ 1155 UNTS 331 (1969).

⁸⁴ Note United States v. Fawaz Yunis, 924 F. 2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991). Prosecution was based on the passive-personality principle for hijacking and hostage taking. Lebanon, the State of nationality was not a Party to the 1979 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, 1316 UNTS 205, or the 1970 Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 860 UNTS 105.

⁸⁵ The argument that such delegation is either illegal or unprecedented has been put forward since the adoption of the Statute, by Scheffer (1999) 32 CornellLLJ 529.

⁸⁶ See also the declaration by New Zealand concerning Tokelau.

⁸⁷ Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), Series A, No. 310.

⁸⁸ Report of the ILC on the Work of its Fiftieth Session, 20 Apr.–12 June 1998, 27 July–14 Aug. 1998, UN Doc.A/53/10 and Corr.1, para. 498.

The problem has become largely hypothetical, because Denmark withdrew the declaration in 2006.

According to article 12 para. 2(a) the Court may also exercise its jurisdiction with respect to crimes committed on board a vessel or aircraft, if the State of registration is a State Party to the Statute. It is on the basis of this provision that on 14 May 2013 the Union of the Comoros referred to the Court the situation regarding the 31 May 2010 Israeli interception of a humanitarian aid flotilla bound for the Gaza Strip. While the flotilla was comprised of eight vessels, the Court could have exercised its jurisdiction only over those acts which occurred on board of the Mavi Marmara, the Rachel Corrie, and Eleftheri Mesogios/Sofia, which were registered in the States Parties of Comoros, Cambodia, and Greece, respectively. In this respect, the Court could have acted regardless of the nationality of those allegedly responsible for the commission of the crimes at issue. In November 2014, Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda decided not to proceed to open an investigation as she considered that the situation did not meet the requirement of ‘gravity’⁸⁹.

Moreover, as far as the crime of aggression is concerned, when the Kampala amendments enter into force, the Court will not be able to exercise its jurisdiction over nationals of States not Parties, no matter where these acts might occur⁹⁰. This is an evident departure from the spirit of article 12, whose explicit reference in article 15*bis* para. 4 might find an explanation only if interpreted as aiming to regulate the preconditions to the Court’s exercise of its jurisdiction over aggression committed by nationals of a State Party within the territory of another State Party, or in all cases that might arise after a non-party State’s acceptance of the Court’s jurisdiction under article 12 para. 3.

b) Nationality of the accused. The nationality basis of jurisdiction is well entrenched in the domestic law of the majority of States. By virtue of such State practice and opinio juris it is a permissive rule derived from international custom that establishes extraterritorial jurisdiction⁹¹. Civil law jurisdictions provide for its use extensively and relate it to domestic common crimes as well as to crimes against the common interests of States. It is a corollary to their rules concerning the non-extradition of nationals. Common law States, on the other hand, use it for the most part only with regard to crimes prescribed by international law as envisaged in article 5 of the Rome Statute and international treaty crimes such as are contained in the international terrorism conventions⁹². In this context it is universally accepted.

None of the initial prosecutions appear to have been based on nationality of the accused. In the prosecutions concerning the situations in Uganda, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan (Darfur), Kenya, Central African Republic, Côte d’Ivoire, and Libya there are no allegations that the accused persons are nationals of a State Party. Nor did the Security Council give the Court jurisdiction over acts of Sudanese or Libyan nationals committed outside of their own States. It adopted such an approach when the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda was established, authorising the international tribunal to prosecute crimes on Rwandan territory and crimes committed by Rwandan nationals in neighbouring States⁹³.

The Prosecutor has examined the possibility of cases based on nationality rather than territory. In his first report on communications submitted in accordance with article 15, the Prosecutor noted that there had been several allegations of acts perpetrated by nationals of ⁸⁹ Referral under Articles 14 and 12(2)(a) of the Rome Statute arising from the 31 May 2010, Gaza Freedom Flotilla situation 14 May 2013 from Comoros, 14 May 2013; OTP, Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia. Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014. See also OTP, Situation in the Republic of Korea Article 5 Report, 23 June 2014, paras. 38–40. Cf. Buchan (2014) 25 CLF 465, 498.

⁹⁰ In accordance with article 15*bis* para. 5.

⁹¹ The Steamship Lotus (France v. Turkey) (1927), PCIJ Ser. No. 10.

⁹² See e.g., the 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Internationally Protected Persons Including Diplomatic Agents, 1977 Canada Treaty Ser. No. 43, article 3 para. 1 (b).

⁹³ UN Doc.S/RES/955 (1994).

coalition forces during the invasion of Iraq, in 2003⁹⁴. Iraq is not at present a State Party to the Rome Statute. He pursued this in more depth in his second report, in February 2006, and especially in the statement concerning Iraq-related prosecutions. There he indicated that inquiries had been made concerning nationals of States Parties with respect to acts perpetrated on the territory of Iraq⁹⁵. However, on the same occasion the then Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo announced his decision not to seek an authorization to initiate an investigation in relation to the Iraqi situation as the ‘gravity’ requirement appeared not to be met. On 13 May 2014, Prosecutor Bensouda decided to re-open a preliminary examination of the situation in Iraq. In particular, her office will analyse alleged crimes attributed to the armed forces of the United Kingdom deployed in Iraq between 2003 and 2008⁹⁶. Should the Prosecutor decide to open an investigation, the Court’s jurisdiction would then be based on article 12 para. 2(b)⁹⁷. With respect to the crime of aggression, according to article 15*bis* para. 5 the Court cannot exercise its jurisdiction over those acts committed by nationals of States Parties within the territory of a State not Party to the Statute. Therefore, the jurisdictional regime envisaged for the crime of aggression significantly departs from that of article 12 para. 2(b).

An exception to the general principle of jurisdiction over nationals is explicitly set out in the Rome Statute with respect to persons under the age of eighteen at the time of the offence⁹⁸.

III. Paragraph 3: Acceptance by non-States Parties

- 19 In addition to the territorial and personal jurisdiction that results from ratification of the Statute with respect to a State Party, article 12 para. 3 also contemplates the possibility of a non-party State accepting the jurisdiction of the Court on an ad hoc basis. The provision requires such a State to lodge a declaration with the Registrar by which it accepts the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court ‘with respect to the crime in question’. The Statute describes such a State as an ‘accepting State’. The final sentence in article 12 para. 3 says that ‘[t]he accepting State shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9’. However, there does not seem to be any consequence should an accepting State fail to cooperate as required⁹⁹.
- 20 Article 12 para. 3 is the residue of a provision in the 1994 ICL Draft Statute by which State consent was contemplated on a case-by-case basis. Article 12 para. 3 allows the Court to exercise jurisdiction if a non-party State makes a declaration ‘with respect to the crime in question’ committed on its territory or by one of its nationals. The reference to ‘crime’ rather than ‘situation’ might have implied that this is not analogous to a referral by a State Party or by the Security Council.¹⁰⁰ The text of article 12 para. 3 could indeed seem ambiguous in this respect. Does this refer to one of the crimes listed in article 5? In other words, are non-party States to make declarations accepting the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to one or more of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and aggression? Or is the provision to mean the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to a specific incident or situation¹⁰¹?

⁹⁴ ‘Communications Received by the office of the Prosecutor of the ICC’, 16 July 2003, 2.

⁹⁵ ‘Letter of Prosecutor dated 9 February 2006’ (Iraq).

⁹⁶ OTP, Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, re-opens the preliminary examination of the situation in Iraq, 13 May 2014.

⁹⁷ See OTP, Report on Preliminary Examination Activities 2014, 6 December 2014, paras. 44–45.

⁹⁸ Article 26.

⁹⁹ On article 12 para. 3, see: Stahn at al. (2005) 99 AJIL 421; Freeland (2006) 75 NordicJIL 211; Stahn (2006) 75 JIL 243. See also, e.g., Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte d’Ivoire’s challenge to the admissibility of the case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014, on the occasion of which Pre-Trial Chamber I merely reminded Côte d’Ivoire of its obligation to surrender Simone Gbagbo to the Court.

¹⁰⁰ Scheffer (2004) 2 JICJ 26.

¹⁰¹ Kaul, in: Cassese at al. (eds), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 583, 616. Also: Bassiouni, (1999) 32 CornellILJ 443, 453–454; Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis and Integrated Text (2005) 84–85.

To prevent abusive and one-sided use of article 12 para. 3 the ASP has modified its application somewhat. Rule 44 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence states:

Declaration provided for in article 12 para. 3

1. 'The Registrar, at the request of the Prosecutor, may inquire of a State that is not a Party to the Statute or that has become a Party to the Statute after its entry into force, on a confidential basis, whether it intends to make the declaration provided for in article 12, paragraph 3.
2. When a State lodges, or declares to the Registrar its intent to lodge, a declaration with the Registrar pursuant to article 12, paragraph 3, or when the Registrar acts pursuant to sub-rule 1, the Registrar shall inform the State concerned that the declaration under article 12, paragraph 3, has as a consequence the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to the crimes referred to in article 5 of relevance to the situation and the provisions of Part 9, and any rules thereunder concerning States Parties, shall apply.'

The provision in the Rules was promoted by the Americans in an attempt to 'fix' what they considered to be perverse consequences of article 12 para. 3¹⁰². The United States argued that article 12 para. 3 would allow a Saddam Hussein to invoke the jurisdiction of the Court for crimes committed by the United States in Iraq, and yet prevent it from doing the same with atrocities committed by the regime against the people of the country¹⁰³. The Rule means such a one-sided manipulation of the jurisdiction is impossible. Some supporters of the American position have taken the view that reciprocity flows automatically from the logic of a 'sensible reading' of article 12 para. 3 in any event, and that there is no need for a rule to clarify things¹⁰⁴. Others have claimed that even with the rule 44, the problem persists. According to Jack Goldsmith, [t]his vague provision does not, as many have stated, guarantee that Article 12(3) parties will consent to jurisdiction for all crimes related to the consent. But even if it did, the Iraqs of the world could consent under Article 12(3) and simply not show up. Rule 44(3) improves the anomaly of Article 12(3), but does not fix it¹⁰⁵.

In any case, the Trial Chamber has noted that 'while States may choose to consent or not to the jurisdiction of the Court through declarations provided for in article 12(3) of the Statute, the scope of such declarations is predetermined by the ICC legal framework. Most notably rule 44 of the Rules explicitly limits the discretion of States in framing the situation that may be investigated by the Court. This rule mandates the Registrar to remind accepting States that "the declaration under article 12, paragraph 3, has as a consequence the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to the crimes referred to in article 5 of relevance to the situation and the provisions of Part 9, and any rules thereunder concerning States Parties, shall apply" (emphasis added). Rule 44 of the Rules was adopted in order to ensure that States that chose to stay out of the treaty could not use the Court "opportunistically". Indeed, there were concerns that the wording of article 12(3) of the Statute, and specifically the reference to the acceptance of jurisdiction "with respect to the crime in question", would allow the Court to be used as a political tool by States not party to the Statute who could selectively accept the exercise of jurisdiction in respect of certain crimes or certain parties to a conflict'¹⁰⁶.

Therefore, the Court has made it clear that when States lodge a declaration under para. 3 they cannot give the Court jurisdiction over certain crimes only¹⁰⁷; rather, with regard to a precise 'situation', they may expressly stipulate in this sense, but always acting in compliance

¹⁰² Scheffer (1999) 93 AJIL 17, 18–20.

¹⁰³ Scheffer (2001) MillRev 167 1, 8.

¹⁰⁴ Wedgwood (1999) 32 CornellLLJ 535, 541 (1999).

¹⁰⁵ Goldsmith (2003) 70 UChicagoLRev 89, fn. 11.

¹⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-212, Decision on the 'Corrigendum of the challenge to the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court on the basis of articles 12(3), 19(2), 21(3), 55 and 59 of the Rome Statute filed by the Defence for President Gbagbo (ICC-02/11-01/11-129)', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 15 August 2012, para. 59. See: Kaul, in: Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 583, 616. Also: Bassiouni, (1999) 32 CornellLLJ 443, 453–454; Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis and Integrated Text (2005) 84–85.

¹⁰⁷ As for the crime of aggression, it is still unclear how article 12 para. 3 could reconcile with article 15bis para. 4 and the possibility of opting out. See Stahn (2010) 23 LeidenJIL 875, 880.

with the legal framework provided by the ICC Statute¹⁰⁸. Importantly, the Court still needs to investigate the exact content of such a framework¹⁰⁹. In this respect, it seems that States' discretion might be limited to the sphere of the jurisdiction *ratione temporis*¹¹⁰. In particular, States might indicate a starting date or a specific situation for the entire duration of which the Court would have jurisdiction. Even in such cases, however, '[t]he relevant timeframe of the investigation, if authorised, will be determined by the Chamber on the basis of the Prosecutor's Request and the supporting materials, as well as the victims' representations under Article 15 of the Statute¹¹¹.'

Moreover, it should be recalled that a declaration under article 12 para. 3 does not trigger the exercise of jurisdiction, and the Prosecutor is under no obligation with respect to article 53 of the Statute should he or she decide not to proceed¹¹². Indeed, '[u]pon receipt of a referral or a declaration pursuant to article 12 para. 3, the Office will open a preliminary examination of the situation at hand. However, it should not be assumed that a referral or an article 12 para. 3 declaration will automatically lead to the opening of an investigation'¹¹³.

- 21 Declarations under article 12 para. 3 have been lodged on behalf of Côte d'Ivoire, Uganda, Palestine, Egypt, and Ukraine. Côte d'Ivoire signed the Rome Statute on 30 November 1998, but it only ratified it in February 2013. However, on 11 October 2011 Pre-Trial Chamber III authorised the Prosecutor to initiate an investigation with regard to the crimes allegedly committed in conjunction with the elections that took place in November 2010. The jurisdictional basis for such an investigation is a declaration that Côte d'Ivoire lodged on 18 April 2003¹¹⁴. Subsequently, Pre-Trial Chamber III broadened the period covered by the investigation, which at first had 28 November 2010 as its starting date, and extended it to those facts that have been unfolding since 19 September 2002, that is, the date indicated in the 2003 declaration¹¹⁵. This suggests that declarations lodged under article 12 para. 3 may have both a retroactive and a prospective application¹¹⁶. The possibility for a declaration to backdate the Court's jurisdiction with respect to the accepting State seems to find confirma-

¹⁰⁸ See Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-321, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on jurisdiction and stay of the proceedings, Appeals Chamber II, 12 December 2012, para. 84.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., fn 152.

¹¹⁰ As for the jurisdiction ratione materiae, see Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, note 108, para. 59. Moreover, it is likely that the Court will deem contrary to the spirit of rule 44 any limitations to both the jurisdictions ratione personae and ratione loci. Compare with Williams and Schabas in the Second edition of this Commentary (2007) 559.

¹¹¹ Situation in the Republic of Cote D'Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011, para. 15.

¹¹² Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, note 108, para. 57. See also OTP, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, fn. 25; Müller (2010) 8 JICJ 1267, 1278.

¹¹³ OTP, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, para. 76.

¹¹⁴ Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 18 April 2003. See Situation in the Republic of Côte D'Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-14, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 3 October 2011, para. 15. Note that subsequent to the 2003 declaration, Côte d'Ivoire submitted two letters, in 2010 and 2011. However, both Pre-Trial Chamber I and Appeals Chamber II have made it clear that the Court's jurisdiction is only determined by the first document. See Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, note 108, para. 66; Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-321, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on jurisdiction and stay of the proceedings, Appeals Chamber II, 12 December 2012, para. 92. Compare with e.g. Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, No. ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, Public redacted version of 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a warrant of arrest against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 30 November 2011, para. 12.

¹¹⁵ Situation in the Republic of Côte D'Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-36, Decision on the 'Prosecution's provision of further information regarding potentially relevant crimes committed between 2002 and 2010', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 22 February 2012, para. 37. See Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 18 April 2003. Compare with Situation in the Republic of Côte D'Ivoire, note 111, para. 212.

¹¹⁶ See Zimmermann (2013)11 JICJ 303, 311.

tion in the travaux préparatoires and in the declaration lodged with the Registrar by Uganda¹¹⁷. In support of his application for arrest warrants of leaders of the Lord's Resistance Army, the Prosecutor included a 'Declaration on Temporal Jurisdiction', dated 27 February 2004, whereby the Republic of Uganda accepted the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction for crimes committed following the entry into force of the Statute on 1 July 2002. Because Uganda ratified the Rome Statute on 14 June 2002, it only entered into force with respect to Uganda on 1 September 2002, two months after the entry into force of the Statute itself. As indicated by the Prosecutor in a letter to the President of the Court, article 12 para. 3 was indeed the authority for Uganda's 'Declaration of Temporal Jurisdiction'¹¹⁸. Thus, both a State Party and a non-party State can, no matter when a declaration under article 12 para. 3 is lodged, backdate the Court's jurisdiction in its regard to any date after 1 July 2002. Then, it would be up to the Court to judge whether such an extension would be compatible with 'the ICC legal framework'¹¹⁹. In this respect, it seems that the Court is likely to uphold a backdated jurisdiction regarding a single, ongoing situation of crisis¹²⁰. These considerations maybe relevant to the debate related to the declaration lodged on 23 January 2009 by Ali Khashan, acting as Minister of Justice of the Government of Palestine. Through such a declaration the Palestinian Authority accepted the Court's jurisdiction for 'acts committed on the territory of Palestine since 1 July 2002'. Following a preliminary examination, on 3 April 2012 the Office of the Prosecutor issued a decision according to which:

'The Office could in the future consider allegations of crimes committed in Palestine, should competent organs of the United Nations or eventually the Assembly of States Parties resolve the legal issue relevant to an assessment of article 12 or should the Security Council, in accordance with article 13(b), make a referral providing jurisdiction'¹²¹.

Indeed,

'In interpreting and applying article 12 of the Rome Statute, the Office has assessed that it is for the relevant bodies at the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties to make the legal determination whether Palestine qualifies as a State for the purpose of acceding to the Rome Statute and thereby enabling the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court under article 12(1). The Rome Statute provides no authority for the Office of the Prosecutor to adopt a method to define the term "State" under article 12(3) which would be at variance with that established for the purpose of article 12(1)'¹²².

Subsequently, on 29 November 2012 the General Assembly of the United Nations accorded Palestine the status of 'non-member observer State'¹²³. Also, on 8 December 2014 for the very first time, Palestine was invited to participate in the ASP as an observer State¹²⁴. On 1 January 2015 Mahmoud Abbas, President of the State of Palestine, lodged a declaration under article 12 para. 3 with the Registrar, whereby accepting the Court's jurisdiction over the crimes allegedly committed within the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem, since 13 June 2014¹²⁵. According to such a declaration, this is 'without prejudice to any other declaration the State of Palestine may decide to lodge in the future'. The following day, Palestine also transmitted to the United Nations documents relating to its ¹¹⁷ Wills (2014)12 JICJ 407, 415.

¹¹⁸ The Prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, Letter to the President of the International Criminal Court, 17 June 2004, ICC-01/04-1.

¹¹⁹ See Prosecutor v. Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, note 108, para. 59.

¹²⁰ Ibid., para. 63.

¹²¹ OTP, Decision on the Situation in Palestine, 3 April 2012, para. 8.

¹²² OTP, Decision on the Situation in Palestine, 3 April 2012, para. 6.

¹²³ UN Doc. A/RES/67/19 (29 November 2012).

¹²⁴ See e.g. Sengupta (8 December 2014) NYTimes <<http://www.nytimes.com/2014/12/09/world/middleeast/palestinians-become-observers-at-meeting-on-international-criminal-court.html>> accessed 13 December 2014.

¹²⁵ Palestine, Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 31 December 2014; ICC, ICC-CPI-20150105-PR1080, Palestine declares acceptance of ICC jurisdiction since 13 June 2014, 5 January 2015; ASP, ICC-ASP-20150107-PR1082, The State of Palestine accedes to the Rome Statute, 7 January 2015.

accession to the Statute¹²⁶. A few days after the UN Secretary General's acceptance of Palestine's accession to the Statute, on 16 January 2015, the Office of the Prosecutor opened a preliminary examination of the situation in Palestine. Since, in relation to such a state, the Statute was supposed to enter into force only in April 2015, this decision must rely on the declaration lodged pursuant to article 12 para. 3.¹²⁷

On 13 December 2013, lawyers acting on behalf of the Egyptian Freedom and Justice Party sought to accept the Court's jurisdiction pursuant to article 12 para. 3 with respect to alleged crimes committed on the territory of the State of Egypt from 1 June 2013. However, the Office of the Prosecutor concluded that as a matter of international law the applicants lacked the locus standi to accept the Court's jurisdiction on behalf of Egypt as they were not in possession of 'full powers'. By applying the legal test of 'effective control,' the Office of the Prosecutor concluded that the head of the Freedom and Justice Party, Dr Morsi, had no longer the legal capacity to incur new international legal obligations on behalf of the State of Egypt. Therefore, on 25 April 2014 the Registrar communicated to the applicants the Prosecutor's decision to disregard the declaration¹²⁸.

Following a declaration lodged with the Registrar on 9 April 2014 by the then acting President of Ukraine, Oleksandr Turchynov¹²⁹, the Office of the Prosecutor announced the initiation of a preliminary examination concerning Ukraine. The declaration in question, which refers expressis verbis to a Parliamentary act (i. e., the Declaration of Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine), accepts the Court's jurisdiction over alleged crimes committed within Ukraine's territory from 21 November 2013 to 22 February 2014. As for the compatibility of the Declaration of Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine with the 'legal framework of the Statute', a number of issues might need to be taken into consideration. In particular, such an act makes reference to a specific category of crimes (crimes against humanity), limits the Court's jurisdiction over those senior officials who were at office at the relevant time and, most importantly, indicates the names of Yanukovych Viktor Fedorovych, ex President of Ukraine, Pshonka Viktor Pavlovych, ex Prosecutor-General of Ukraine, and Zakharchenko Vitalii Yuriovych, ex Minister of Internal Affairs of Ukraine. Thus, apart from providing a limited temporal jurisdiction, it seems that Ukraine has attempted to restrict the Court's ratione materiae and ratione personae jurisdiction. In this respect, should the Prosecutor decide to ask for an authorization to initiate an investigation, he or she might consider that by lodging such a declaration Ukraine has agreed to comply with the relevant provisions of the Statute, such as article 5. Indeed, the Prosecutor has already deemed that he is not bound by the wording of a State referral when it is contrary to the principles of the Statute¹³⁰; therefore, there is no reason to believe that he or she would act in a different way in case of a proprio motu investigation following a declaration under article 12 para. 3. Rather, it is likely that the Prosecutor will treat this as a mere tool through which a State not Party has conferred jurisdiction to the Court over a 'situation'.

¹²⁶ ICC, ICC-CPI-20150105-PR1080, Palestine declares acceptance of ICC jurisdiction since 13 June 2014, 5 January 2015.

¹²⁷ ICC, ICC-OTP-20150116-PR1083, The Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, opens a preliminary examination of the situation in Palestine, 16 January 2015.

¹²⁸ OTP, ICC-OTP-20140508-PR1003, The determination of the Office of the Prosecutor on the communication received in relation to Egypt, 8 May 2014. See also Request Under Regulation 46(3) of the Regulations of the Court, No. ICC-RoC46(3)-01/14-3, Decision on the 'Request for review of the Prosecutor's decision of 23 April 2014 not to open a Preliminary Examination concerning alleged crimes committed in the Arab Republic of Egypt, and the Registrar's Decision of 25 April 2014', Pre-Trial Chamber II, 12 September 2014.

¹²⁹ Ukraine, Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 9 April 2014.

¹³⁰ The Prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, Letter to the President of the International Criminal Court, 17 June 2004, ICC-01/04-1. Note: Prosecutor v. Calliste Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the 'Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 October 2011, ft 41.

C. Conclusions

Article 12 is a product of compromise supported by the overwhelming majority of States. 22 It endeavours to satisfy the many interests that were evidenced at the Rome Conference and before. It is far from perfect but was all that was possible at the time. At the time of its adoption, it looked like a serious gap, to the extent that the acceptance of the Statute by the custodial State does not act as a precondition for the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC¹³¹. Many believed that it would result in atrocities going unpunished because the territorial State or State of nationality would not be parties or would not consent ad hoc, and the UN Security Council would fail to act. The First Edition of this Commentary, published in 1999, said that ‘in all probability it may be assumed that the States likely to be the locus of such crimes or whose nationals are suspect will not be among the first to ratify or otherwise agree to be bound by the Statute. Initially at least once the ICC is operative, reliance will have to be on the Security Council’¹³². Many other writers were sharply critical¹³³.

That projection was probably too conservative. Many of the first countries to ratify the Statute were themselves the scene of armed conflict, with the attendant atrocities, war crimes and other acts falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. They include, for example, Fiji, Sierra Leone, Colombia, Uganda, Democratic Republic of Congo, Afghanistan, Cambodia, Macedonia and Burundi. These ratifications were unexpected, particularly by those who insisted that the Court should be premised on universal jurisdiction because conflict-afflicted States, primarily in the South, would never join. Obviously, they tend to disprove the arguments that were advanced at Rome by those who were critical of the compromise on jurisdiction in article 12. They suggest that States are ratifying the Statute precisely because they view the Court as a promising and realistic mechanism capable of addressing civil conflict, human rights abuses and war. This is entirely consistent, of course, with the logic of those who have argued over the years that international justice contributes to peace and security.

Indeed, we might ask, in hindsight, whether sixty ratifications would have been achieved so quickly had the broad universal jurisdiction proposal actually been adopted. The problem with the universal jurisdiction approach is that it leaves little incentive for States to join the Court. One way or another, whether or not States ratify the Statute, if the Court is based on universal jurisdiction, crimes committed on their territory are subject to its jurisdiction in any case. On the other hand, under the current regime as set out in article 12, States must ratify the Statute if they wish to send a message of deterrence that war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide, and possibly aggression in the near future will not go unpunished on their territories. This they seem to be doing, in ever-increasing numbers. In other words, far from dooming the Court to inactivity, the limited jurisdictional scheme of article 12 would appear to have contributed to the rate of ratification.

¹³¹ Lawyers Committee for Hum. Rts., The Rome Treaty for an ICC: A Brief Summary of the Main Issues, 2 ICC Briefing Series, 1.

¹³² See Williams on Article 12 in the first edition of this Commentary (1999) 341.

¹³³ Kaul, in: Cassese at al. (eds), The Rome Statute of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 583, 616. Also, Glasius, The International Criminal Court (2006) 61–76.

Article 13

Exercise of jurisdiction

The Court may exercise its jurisdiction with respect to a crime referred to in article 5 in accordance with the provisions of this Statute if:

- (a) A situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed is referred to the Prosecutor by a State Party in accordance with article 14;
- (b) A situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed is referred to the Prosecutor by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations; or
- (c) The Prosecutor has initiated an investigation in respect of such a crime in accordance with article 15.

Literature: Akande, D., 'The Effects of Security Council Resolutions and Domestic Proceedings on State Obligations to Cooperate with the ICC', (2012) 10 JICJ 299; Condorelli, L. and Ciampi A., 'Comments on the Security Council Referral of the Situation in Darfur to the ICC', (2005) 3 JICJ 590; Fernandez de Gurmendi, S.A., 'The Role of the Prosecutor', in: Lee, R.S. (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of The Rome Statute (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1999) 175; Politi, M., 'The Establishment of an International Criminal Court at a Crossroads: Issues and Prospects After the First Session of the Preparatory Committee', (1997) 13 NEP 115; Stahn, C., 'Libya, the International Criminal Court and Complementarity A Test for "Shared Responsibility"', (2012) 10 JICJ 325; Wilmshurst, E., 'Jurisdiction of the Court', in: Lee, R.S. (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of The Rome Statute (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1999) 140; Yee, L., 'The ICC and the Security Council', in: Lee, R.S. (ed.), The International Criminal Court (1999) 143.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks	1
1. The ILC Draft	2
2. The Ad Hoc Committee	6
3. The Preparatory Committee	9
4. The Rome Conference	11
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	14
I. Paragraph 1: State Party referral	15
II. Paragraph 2: Referral by the Security Council	16
III. Paragraph 3: Independent prosecutor.....	20
C. Conclusion	21

A. Introduction/General remarks

1 The issue of how a case would be initiated, the so-called 'trigger mechanisms' for the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC was, along with the other jurisdictional issues, of 'the most complex and most sensitive'¹ nature. The views expressed by States at all stages were wide-ranging and often immovable. The debate may be summed up as revolving around the following questions: (1) What was the role that the Security Council would play? (2) Should States Parties, and if so which, have to refer situations to the Prosecutor? (3) Should the Prosecutor, independently of the Security Council and States Parties, be able to initiate an investigation?

In the Rome Statute² a number of provisions relate to article 13. These are article 12 on preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction, article 14 on referral by a State Party, article 15 on the role of the Prosecutor and the checks and balances on that role and article 16 on the deferral of investigation or prosecution following a Security Council resolution under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. To avoid overlap with the discussion in this commentary of these articles, the background and analysis of article 13 will not delve into the complexities of their interrelationship in the course of the negotiations. In order to comprehend the inextricably intertwined nature of these provisions they should be read together.

¹ Kirsch and Holmes, (1999) 93 AJIL 2.

² 2187 UNTS 90 (2002) (hereinafter: 'Rome Statute').

1. The ILC Draft

In the commentary to article 12 on preconditions it is highlighted that jurisdictional issues as a whole were complicated and the thrust of the International Law Commission's 1994 Draft Statute³ was geared towards State consent and Security Council control. In contrast to the Statutes of the ICTY⁴ and the ICTR⁵, the ILC Draft Statute did not give the Prosecutor any independent powers to begin an investigation *ex officio*⁶.

The trigger mechanisms for the crime of genocide were distinguished from the other crimes covered. Article 21 para. 1 (a) and article 25 para. 1 provided for inherent jurisdiction of the ICC over the crime of genocide, in other words no additional requirement of acceptance by States Parties was necessary. The complaint initiating the preliminary phase of the criminal procedure was to be lodged by a State Party to the Statute that was also a Contracting Party to the *Genocide Convention*⁷ and consequently entitled to rely on article VI of that agreement. For all the other listed crimes article 25 para. 2 of the ILC Draft provided that a State Party that had accepted the jurisdiction of the ICC with respect to the particular crime or crimes under the 'opting-in' scheme set out in article 22 of that Draft, which necessitated a special declaration, could lodge a complaint with the Prosecutor alleging that such a crime appeared to have been committed. The ILC believed that resort to the ICC should be restricted to States Parties and that this might encourage ratification and in practical terms ensure cooperation with the Court in matters such as the provision of evidence⁸.

Article 25 para. 4 of the ILC Draft stipulated that where the Security Council under article 23 para. 1 had referred a matter to the ICC acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, then State Party acceptance under article 21 and the lodging of a State complaint would not be necessary⁹. The type of situation envisaged was, for example, where in similar circumstances the Security Council had the authority to establish ad hoc tribunals under Chapter VII. It would have allowed the Security Council to use the ICC as an alternative to setting up future ad hoc tribunals. Some ILC members had wanted to extend this power also to the UN General Assembly, particularly because of the veto power potentially being exercised by one or more of the P5. However, it was decided on further consideration that this would not be in keeping with the Charter, as the General Assembly does not have powers therein to affect directly the rights of States against their will¹⁰. Article 23 para. 2, dealing specifically with acts of aggression laid down the stricture that the trigger for the ICC to take jurisdiction would only be where the Security Council had determined that a State had committed the act of aggression which was the subject of the complaint.

A difficult issue was present in draft article 23 para. 3. There it was provided that no prosecution could be commenced under the Statute arising from a 'situation' which was

³ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 29.

⁴ UN Doc. SC/RES. 827 (25 May 1993), Annex, article 18.

⁵ UN Doc. SC/RES. 955 (8 Nov. 1994), Annex, article 17.

⁶ In the Rome Statute the term proprio motu is used but the meaning of an investigation by the Prosecutor on an independent initiative is the same. According to the commentary to article 25 of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 90, one member of the Commission had suggested such an independent role where it appeared that otherwise a crime within the ICC's jurisdiction would not be investigated. However, other members stressed the need for State Party or Security Council support, at least at the initial stage of development.

⁷ Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide, 78 UNTS 277 (1948).

⁸ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 89.

⁹ The ILC understood that the UN Security Council would not normally refer actual cases against individuals but 'matters' in the sense of situations to which Chapter VII of the UN Charter applied. The Prosecutor would then have had the responsibility of determining which individuals should be charged.

¹⁰ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, 86.

‘being dealt with’ by the Security Council under Chapter VII, unless the Security Council decided otherwise. The Security Council could, therefore, have obstructed the ICC from acting. Several members of the ILC, as well as States, had grave reservations with respect to this provision, as the Security Council would have been able to block prosecutions by having a situation placed on its agenda. Thus, ‘the processes of the Statute [could have been] prevented from operating through political decisions’¹¹ taken by the Security Council. Of concern too was that article 23 para 3 would introduce into the Statute substantial inequality between States members of the Security Council and non-State members and between the P5 and other States. The compromise suggested in the ILC was to delete draft article 23 para. 3 and to include in the preamble a provision that would provide for the paramouncy of the UN Charter¹².

2. The Ad Hoc Committee

- 6 In 1995 the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an ICC was set up by the General Assembly. With respect to trigger mechanisms a number of questions were raised arising out of the work of the ILC¹³. Diverse views were presented by delegations. Amongst the suggestions were that complaints concerning genocide should not be limited to States Parties to the *Genocide Convention*¹⁴. Others took the view that only States with a direct interest in the case, such as the custodial State, the territorial State or the State of nationality of the victim or suspect and which were able to furnish documents and other evidence should be entitled to lodge complaints. The argument for this was that it would avoid substantial costs that would be involved in lengthy investigations relating to frivolous or otherwise politically motivated or unsubstantiated complaints¹⁵. Further suggestions were made that complainant States should pay some portion of the costs of proceedings but this was opposed by other delegations¹⁶. As well, it was put forward that victims of crimes or their relatives be authorized to trigger the jurisdiction of the Court and that a special commission be set up within the structure of the Court to review such and determine whether the necessary criteria were present to support the initiation of further action¹⁷.
- 7 It was here in the Ad Hoc Committee that some delegations proposed that the role of the Prosecutor should be more fully elaborated and expanded to include the right to initiate proprio motu an investigation without State complaint or referral by the Security Council¹⁸. However, different views were expressed on this fundamental issue.
- 8 Several delegations agreed with the ILC’s provisions concerning the ability of the Security Council to refer matters to the Court as it would obviate the need for further ad hoc tribunals and also that such referrals under Chapter VII of the UN Charter would it was stated enhance the Court’s effectiveness¹⁹. Emphasis was laid on the fact that it would be a referral of a matter or situation and not a specific case against an individual. Different views were expressed as to whether such referral obviated the need for State consent²⁰. Several other delegations, to the contrary, expressed serious reservations, even opposition to such a role for the Security Council, stating that it would reduce ‘the credibility and moral authority of the court, excessively limit its role and undermine its independence, impartiality and autonomy’²¹ as well as politicize the new institution.

¹¹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, Commentary, 87 para. 13.

¹² Ibid., 88 para. 15.

¹³ Ad Hoc Committee Report, paras. 112–118.

¹⁴ Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide, 78 UNTS 277 (1948).

¹⁵ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, para. 112.

¹⁶ Ibid.

¹⁷ Ibid., para. 117.

¹⁸ Ibid., para. 113.

¹⁹ Ibid., para. 120.

²⁰ Ibid., para. 120.

²¹ Ibid., para. 121.

3. The Preparatory Committee

These issues necessarily re-emerged at the first session of the Preparatory Committee in 1996. There was, however, 'little significant movement'²². The divergent views on the role of the Security Council remained²³. Concerning State complaints, whilst some delegations were satisfied with the ability to do so for crimes, others felt that substantial modification was needed. They were uneasy with complaints against specific individuals or crimes but argued that 'situations be referred to the Prosecutor'²⁴.

It was evident that there was growing support among delegations for empowering the Prosecutor with independent power to initiate investigations and thus to trigger the ICC's jurisdiction proprio motu on the basis of information from any source²⁵. However, even in the so-called like-minded group of States, that supported an effective and impartial ICC, there were differences on the precise parameters of such a role²⁶. On the other hand some delegations were of the view that widespread acceptance of the Statute would not be achieved if the Prosecutor was to have such a role²⁷.

In the 1997 session of the Preparatory Commission these remained contentious issues and the debate was 'long and difficult'²⁸. Draft article 21 contained the trigger mechanisms. Clearly, there was strong support for State Party referral but there remained the divergence of opinion on the issues of inherent jurisdiction versus 'opt-in', referrals of 'matters', 'situations' or 'crimes'²⁹ or whether referral should be limited to States Parties with a 'direct interest'³⁰. The ability of the Prosecutor to initiate prosecutions³¹ and the role of the Security Council³² were potential deal-breakers. These divergent views presented in alternative format in square brackets rendered it questionable whether at that stage consensus could be reached as the hard-line taken by some delegations did not reflect conciliatory action. If such a text had gone to Rome, it would have made the 'process of decision making ... very difficult indeed'³³.

The Inter-Sessional meeting in Zutphen followed the same approach in article 6[21] as to trigger mechanisms and the substance of complaints by States, referral by the Security Council and the proprio motu investigatory powers of the Prosecutor in articles 10[25], 45[23] and 46[25]bis respectively. The potential titles in article 6[21] both in square brackets indicated options: 'exercise of jurisdiction' and 'preconditions to exercise of jurisdiction'. As these suggest this article sought to present together trigger mechanisms and also preconditions to the ICC exercising jurisdiction³⁴.

The last session of the Preparatory Committee took place in March-April 1998. All of the jurisdictional issues were on the table 'without any expectation that ... [they] would be resolved'³⁵. The hope was that they would be clarified for the Rome Conference. A number ²² Wilmschurst in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making Of The Rome Statute (1999) 131.

²³ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, paras. 129-144. Volume I contains the Proceedings of the Committee in March-April and August 1996. Volume II contains the Proposals.

²⁴ Ibid., paras. 145-148.

²⁵ Ibid., paras. 149-151. See article 25 para. 2*quat.* in square brackets 1996 Preparatory Committee II and Fernandez de Gurmendi, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of The Rome Statute (1999) 177.

²⁶ Fernandez de Gurmendi, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of The Rome Statute (1999) 177.

²⁷ Ibid. See also 1996 Preparatory Committee I, paras. 149-151.

²⁸ Wilmschurst in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making Of The Rome Statute (1999) 131.

²⁹ Preparatory Committee Decisions Dec. 1997, article 25, Option 1.

³⁰ Ibid., Option 2.

³¹ Ibid., article 25*bis* contained the substance of the role of the Prosecutor.

³² Ibid., article 23 with several options for the various paragraphs detailed the role of the Security Council.

³³ Wilmschurst in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making Of The Rome Statute (1999) 131, 132.

³⁴ See Zutphen Draft. Note that articles 10[23] dealt with the role of the Security Council, article 45[25] with complaints by States and article 46[25*bis*] with the Prosecutor.

³⁵ Ibid.

of proposals were put forward by States including the United Kingdom³⁶ and Germany covering jurisdictional issues³⁷. As well, specifically on the role of the Prosecutor proposals by Argentina and Switzerland³⁸ that had been put forward in the August 1997 session and had been included in the Zutphen draft appeared in article 12 of the 1998 Preparatory Committee Draft Statute, providing for proprio motu powers with certain checks and balances³⁹.

4. The Rome Conference

- 11 Trigger mechanisms were discussed in the Committee of the Whole during the first and second weeks of the Rome Conference⁴⁰. With a few exceptions it appeared to be acceptable to delegations that States Parties could refer ‘situations’ to the ICC. The roles of the Prosecutor and the Security Council were the key issues remaining there.

The relevant articles in the Draft Statute on the role of the Prosecutor were article 6 para. 1 (c) and para. 2, articles 7, 9, 12 and 13 and article 6 lit. (b) of further option. The Conference was still divided on giving independent powers to the Prosecutor to investigate and prosecute. However, the majority of delegations were in favour of the proprio motu role for the Prosecutor subject to the safeguards against abuse provided in article 13. The NGOs also were pressing for an independent Prosecutor as essential for an effective and credible ICC. The thrust of the argument was that State complaints and Security Council referral were insufficient in that the ICC would operate on behalf of the international community as a whole and the ICC Prosecutor should have the same investigatory and prosecutorial powers, including the ability to receive information from any source, as in the cases of the ICTY and the ICTR⁴¹. Without this it would have been difficult to see what cases would go before the ICC, other than ‘nationals from States that have “fallen out of favour”’⁴². The track record in international human rights has illustrated the unwillingness of States to lay complaints⁴³. The same concerns surfaced in Rome that had been expressed in the Preparatory Committee, in essence that to give the Prosecutor such power would overwhelm the Prosecutor and overburden the ICC and would lead to an abuse of prosecutorial power. Some States feared ‘an overzealous or politically motivated Prosecutor targeting unfairly or in bad faith, highly sensitive political situations’⁴⁴. As before, these concerns were met by the various checks and balances contained in draft article 13, which was to become article 15 in the final Statute as well as final articles 19 on challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court and article 42 on the rigorous qualifications necessary for the Prosecutor and the method of election by the Assembly of States Parties.

- 12 The Bureau Discussion Paper presented to the Committee of the Whole on 6 July 1998⁴⁵, contained in article 6 the trigger mechanisms. With respect to the Prosecutor article 6 (c) presented two options. Option 1 provided for the Prosecutor to initiate an investigation in accordance with article 12 containing the checks and balances and Option 2 provided for no such prosecutorial role. During the discussions that followed many delegations spoke in favour of Option 1. However, some States indicated that more safeguards were needed. The ³⁶ UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.3/DP.1 (1998).

³⁷ UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/DP.2 (1998).

³⁸ Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997.

³⁹ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, 2–167. As to the checks and balances on the Prosecutor note the proposal submitted by Argentina and Germany at the last session of the Preparatory Committee in Apr. 1998 contained in UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.4/DP.35 (25 Mar. 1998). This appeared as article 13 in the Preparatory Committee Draft Statute.

⁴⁰ Wilmshurst in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making Of The Rome Statute (1999) 131, 133.

⁴¹ See article 18 para. 1 of the Statute of the ICTY and article 17 para. 1 of the ICTR.

⁴² I Commission of Jurists, Exercise of Jurisdiction and Complementarity, ICJ Brief No. 2 (June 1998) 2.

⁴³ Human Rights Watch, Justice In The Balance (1998) 65.

⁴⁴ Fernandez de Gurmendi in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court (1999) 181.

⁴⁵ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53.

Bureau Proposal that followed on 10 July 1998⁴⁶, replicated article 6 Option 1 with no alternative Option. It indicated as a note that additional safeguards might be added and consequently the drafting of article 6 changed. However, even though informal consultations were held on additional safeguards, new proposals were not submitted⁴⁷. In the remaining days of the Conference, there was still no consensus on the proprio motu role of the Prosecutor. The final package that emerged on 16 July 1998 included as article 13 the Bureau Proposal on the proprio motu role of the Prosecutor in conjunction with article 15.

The triggering of the Court's jurisdiction by the Security Council remained until the end a matter of controversy with 'a small but vocal minority opposing any role' for it. The provisions of the Preparatory Committee's Draft Statute concerning the Security Council were contained in article 6 para. 1 (a), article 10, and articles 6 [second] (b) and 10 of Further Option. Both article 6 and the further option for article 6 had several square brackets as to 'matters' or 'situations' being the subject of the referral and whether or not reference should be made to Chapter VII of the Charter. The majority of delegations supported the need to give the Security Council such a role as had been discussed in the negotiations leading to Rome. It 'acknowledge[d] the enforcement powers of the Council' under the Charter⁴⁸. In the Preparatory Committee the possibility of the Security Council referring specific cases to the ICC for prosecution had been rejected and the issue was whether the term 'situation' or 'matter' be inserted. Those delegations that preferred 'situation' did so because of its more general nature, rejecting 'matter' as being 'too specific for the independent functioning of the Court'⁴⁹. Both the Bureau Discussion Paper and Proposal as well as the final package used 'situation' as does article 13 (b) of the Statute as adopted. 'Situation' is also found in article 13 (a) on State Party referrals. Necessarily, once the Security Council refers a situation to the Prosecutor, the Prosecutor is independent and the Security Council cannot influence the conduct of the individual criminal prosecutions that may result.

Those delegations that had opposed any Security Council involvement had argued that it would politicize the ICC and undermine its credibility. As before Rome the arguments of inequality based on the role of the P5 was presented and that the veto would be used to stop referrals involving these States or their more indirect interests. Some objections were also presented that the Security Council lacked the capacity to refer to the ICC under the Charter. However, that argument was rejected in the context of the ability of the Security Council to create the ICTY acting under Charter VII in the case of *Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadić*⁵⁰. A similar reply was applicable to the prospective ICC. 13

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

The ICC has jurisdiction over the criminal offences listed in article 5, namely, genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression. These crimes are defined in articles 6, 7, 8 and *8bis*⁵¹. As far as the crime of aggression is concerned, however, the application of article 13 lit. (a) and (c) and article 13 (b) will be subject to the conditions set out in articles 15bis and *15ter*⁵². 14

⁴⁶ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59.

⁴⁷ Fernandez de Gurmendi in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court (1999) 186-187.

⁴⁸ Yee, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court (1999) 147.

⁴⁹ Yee, in: Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court (1999) 148.

⁵⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-T, Decision on the Defence Motion on Jurisdiction, Trial Chamber 10 Aug. 1995. Also: Prosecutor v. Milošević, No. IT-02-54-T, Decision on Preliminary Motions, Trial Chamber, 8 Nov. 2001; Prosecutor v. Kanyabashi, No. ICTR-96-15-T, Decision on the Defence Motion on Jurisdiction, Trial Chamber II, 18 June 1997, para. 27.

⁵¹ RC/Res. 6, Annex I.

⁵² Ibid., paras 3 and 4. See also Annex III to the same Resolution, Understandings 1 and 3.

I. Paragraph 1: State Party referral

- 15 States Parties can trigger the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crimes contained in article 5. There can be no ad hoc referrals by non-party States, even those that have made declarations pursuant to article 12 para. 3. Any State Party may refer a situation to the Court. This power is not restricted to States with a direct interest or involvement in the situation. Referral by a State Party must be done in accordance with article 14. It is worth noting that Pre-Trial Chamber I has held that

‘pursuant to articles 13 and 14 of the Statute, a State Party may only refer to the Prosecutor an entire “situation in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed”. Accordingly, a referral cannot limit the Prosecutor to investigate only certain crimes, e.g. crimes committed by certain persons or crimes committed before or after a given date; as long as crimes are committed within the context of the situation of crisis that triggered the jurisdiction of the Court, investigations and prosecutions can be initiated. In the case at hand, as the situation of crisis referred was ongoing at the time of the Referral (“situation qui se déroule dans mon pays”), the boundaries of the Court’s jurisdiction can only be delimited by the situation of crisis itself.’⁵³

II. Paragraph 2: Referral by the Security Council

- 16 Article 13 lit. b triggers the jurisdiction of the Court, but it also may create jurisdiction in the case of crimes committed on the territory of a State that has not yet joined the Court⁵⁴. Moreover, in referring the situation to the Court the Security Council can backdate the jurisdiction ratione temporis to any time after the entry into force of the Statute (i.e., 1 July 2002)⁵⁵. The Security Council may also, acting pursuant to article 13 lit. b, trigger the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to a State that has already ratified or acceded to the Statute.

The Relationship Agreement between the United Nations and the Court makes specific provision for cooperation in the event of a Security Council referral.

- ‘1. When the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, decides to refer to the Prosecutor pursuant to article 13, paragraph (b), of the Statute, a situation in which one or more of the crimes referred to in article 5 of the Statute appears to have been committed, the Secretary-General shall immediately transmit the written decision of the Security Council to the Prosecutor together with documents and other materials that may be pertinent to the decision of the Council. The Court undertakes to keep the Security Council informed in this regard in accordance with the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Such information shall be transmitted through the Secretary-General.
[...]
3. Where a matter has been referred to the Court by the Security Council and the Court makes a finding, pursuant to article 87, paragraph 5 (b) or paragraph 7, of the Statute, of a failure by a State to cooperate with the Court, the Court shall inform the Security Council or refer the matter to it, as the case may be, and the Registrar shall convey to the Security Council through the Secretary-General the decision of the Court, together with relevant information in the case. The Security Council, through the Secretary-General, shall inform the Court through the Registrar of action, if any, taken by it under the circumstances’.⁵⁶

⁵³ Prosecutor v. Calliste Mbarushimana, No. ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the ‘Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court’, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 26 October 2011, para. 27.

⁵⁴ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (‘Omar Al Bashir’), No. ICC-02/05-01/09-3, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 4 March 2009, para. 40.

⁵⁵ See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Bahr Idriss Abu Garda, No. ICC-02/05-02/09-1, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 May 2009, para. 2.

⁵⁶ Negotiated Relationship Agreement Between the International Criminal Court and the United Nations, article 17.

If it triggers the Court's jurisdiction, the Council must live within the parameters of the Statute with respect to such matters as jurisdiction. For example, it could not request that the Court consider the atrocities committed by the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia during the late 1970s because article 11 of the Statute clearly declares that the Court cannot judge crimes committed prior to the entry into force of the Statute. In such cases, the Council would be required to set up an additional ad hoc tribunal. For the same reason, the Council could not transfer the powers of the existing ad hoc tribunals to the International Criminal Court.

Whether the Security Council must also meet the other admissibility criteria and respect the principle of complementarity when it refers a situation is a matter that seems to have been intentionally left unresolved at the Rome Conference⁵⁷. Article 18 seems to imply that a Security Council referral need not meet the admissibility criteria of article 17 because it contemplates challenges based on admissibility only in the case of a State Party referral or a case based upon the Prosecutor's proprio motu authority. However, the Prosecutor has made it abundantly clear, in reports to the Security Council, that even a situation referred by the Council must be admissible pursuant to the provisions of article 17⁵⁸. There have been no objections from members of the Council. Most importantly, the Court has held that 'the entire legal framework of the Statute, including its complementarity and cooperation regimes, applies also in the situations following a referral by the Security Council under article 13(b) of the Statute'⁵⁹. The Court has indeed considered the admissibility of the cases arising both from Darfur, Sudan and Libya⁶⁰. In respect of the latter situation, the Appeals Chamber has confirmed a decision by Pre-Trial Chamber I according to which, pursuant to article 17 para. 1(a), the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi was declared inadmissible before the Court⁶¹.

Referral to the International Criminal Court by the Security Council of the situation in Darfur, in western Sudan, was proposed by the International Commission of Inquiry in its January 2005 report. The Commission said that resort to the International Criminal Court would have at least six major merits. First, it said that the Court was established 'with an eye to crimes likely to threaten peace and security', and that this was 'the main reason why the Security Council may trigger the Court's jurisdiction under article 13 para. b'. Second, the Commission said that investigation and prosecution of crimes perpetrated in Darfur would 'be conducive, or contribute to, peace and stability in Darfur, by removing serious obstacles to national reconciliation and the restoration of peaceful relations'. The Commission said investigation and prosecution in the Sudan of persons with authority and prestige, who wielded control over the State apparatus, was difficult or even impossible. It said that holding trials in The Hague, 'far away from the community over which those persons still wield authority and where their followers live, might ensure a neutral atmosphere and prevent the trials from stirring up political, ideological or other passions'. Third, it argued that only the authority of the Court, reinforced by that of the United Nations Security Council, 'might compel both leading personalities in the Sudanese Government and the heads of rebels to submit to investigation and possibly criminal proceedings'. Fourth, the Commission said the ⁶⁰ See e.g. Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-163, Decision on the postponement of the execution of the request for surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi pursuant to article 95 of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 1 June 2012, para. 28 and fn 34.

⁵⁷ Philips (1999) 10 CLF 61, 73.

⁵⁸ See, e.g., UN Doc. S/PV.5216, 2; UN Doc. S/PV.5321, 3; UN Doc. S/PV.5459, 4; UN Doc. S/PV.5589, 2.

⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-354, Decision on Libya's postponement of the execution of the request for arrest and surrender of Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to article 95 of the Rome Statute and related Defence request to refer Libya to the UN Security Council, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 14 June 2013, para. 20. See also e.g.: Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-254, Decision requesting Libya to provide observations concerning the Court's request for arrest and surrender of Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 18 January 2013, para. 10.

⁶¹ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 July 2014. See also: Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013.

Court was best suited to ensure a 'veritably fair trial'. Fifth, the International Criminal Court could be activated immediately, as opposed to alternative mechanisms such as mixed or internationalised courts. Finally, proceedings before the Court 'would not necessarily involve a significant financial burden for the international community'⁶². The Commission said that the Sudanese justice system was unable and unwilling to address the situation in Darfur⁶³.

In March 2005, after several weeks of backroom discussions during which the United States proposed several other options in order to address impunity in Darfur, before ultimately conceding the referral, the Security Council sent the 'Situation in Darfur' to the Court. The representative of Argentina to the Security Council noted this was 'the first time that the Security Council, making use of article 13 of the Rome Statute, has referred to the Prosecutor a situation in which – according to the report, whose veracity we do not doubt – it appears that one or more types of crimes over which the Court has jurisdiction have been committed. We believe that this is undoubtedly a crucial precedent'⁶⁴. Resolution 1593 reads as follows:

'The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the International Commission of Inquiry on violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law in Darfur (S/2005/60),

Recalling article 16 of the Rome Statute under which no investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with by the International Criminal Court for a period of 12 months after a Security Council request to that effect,

Also recalling articles 75 and 79 of the Rome Statute and encouraging States to contribute to the ICC Trust Fund for Victims,

Taking note of the existence of agreements referred to in Article 98–2 of the Rome Statute,

Determining that the situation in Sudan continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to refer the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002 to the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court;
2. Decides that the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur, shall cooperate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution and, while recognizing that States not party to the Rome Statute have no obligation under the Statute, urges all States and concerned regional and other international organizations to cooperate fully;
3. Invites the Court and the African Union to discuss practical arrangements that will facilitate the work of the Prosecutor and of the Court, including the possibility of conducting proceedings in the region, which would contribute to regional efforts in the fight against impunity;
4. Also encourages the Court, as appropriate and in accordance with the Rome Statute, to support international cooperation with domestic efforts to promote the rule of law, protect human rights and combat impunity in Darfur;
5. Also emphasizes the need to promote healing and reconciliation and encourages in this respect the creation of institutions, involving all sectors of Sudanese society, such as truth and/or reconciliation commissions, in order to complement judicial processes and thereby reinforce the efforts to restore long-lasting peace, with African Union and international support as necessary;
6. Decides that nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that contributing State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in Sudan established or authorized by the Council or the African Union, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by that contributing State;
7. Recognizes that none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral including expenses related to investigations or prosecutions in connection with that referral, shall be borne by the United Nations and that such costs shall be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those States that wish to contribute voluntarily;
8. Invites the Prosecutor to address the Council within three months of the date of adoption of this resolution and every six months thereafter on actions taken pursuant to this resolution;
9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.'

⁶² Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the United Nations Secretary-General, Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 1564 of 18 September 2004', Geneva, 25 Jan. 2005, paras. 571–572.

⁶³ Ibid., para. 586.

⁶⁴ UN Doc. S/PV.5158, 7.

Although Resolution 1593 purports to exclude jurisdiction over ‘nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court’⁶⁵, it also does so with respect to all other jurisdictions, except those of the State of nationality of the suspect. This is quite plainly contrary to treaty provisions binding upon virtually all United Nations Member States, including the United States. It is well known that the four Geneva Conventions oblige a State Party ‘to search for persons alleged to have committed, or to have ordered to be committed, such grave breaches, and [to] bring such persons, regardless of their nationality, before its own courts’⁶⁶. Similar duties are imposed by the Convention Against Torture⁶⁷.

In its statement at the time Resolution 1593 was adopted, the French representative appeared to refer to this difficulty, noting ‘that the jurisdictional immunity provided for in the text we have just adopted obviously cannot run counter to other international obligations of States and will be subject, where appropriate, to the interpretation of the courts of my country’⁶⁸. The representative of Brazil described operative paragraph 6 as ‘a legal exception that is inconsistent in international law’⁶⁹. Moreover, Denmark said:

‘We also believe that the International Criminal Court (ICC) may be a casualty of resolution 1593 (2005). Operative paragraph 6 of the resolution is killing its credibility – softly, perhaps, but killing it nevertheless. We may ask whether the Security Council has the prerogative to mandate the limitation of the jurisdiction of the ICC under the Rome Statute once the exercise of its jurisdiction has advanced. Operative paragraph 6 subtly subsumed the independence of the ICC into the political and diplomatic vagaries of the Security Council. Nevertheless, that eventuality may well be worth the sacrifice if impunity is, indeed, ended in Darfur; if human rights are, indeed, finally *protected and promoted; and if, indeed, the rule of law there is upheld*⁷⁰.

On 26 February 2011, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1970, whereby it referred to the Court the situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya since 15 February 2011⁷¹. This second Security Council referral adopted almost the same language of the one concerning the situation in Darfur, Sudan. As a consequence, it maintained the same flaws observed as for the former one⁷². In this respect, it should however be recalled that the Court has constantly considered that such Security Council Resolutions impose obligations only on Sudan and Libya⁷³. This means that all the other States which are not Parties to the Statute are by no means prevented from complying with their international obligations. Yet, had ⁶⁵ The provision is also similar to one included in a 2003 Security Council resolution concerning Liberia. See: UN Doc. S/RES/1497 (2003), para. 7.

⁶⁶ Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, 75 UNTS 31 (1949), article 49; Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, 75 UNTS 85 (1950), article 50; Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, 75 UNTS 135 (1950), article 129; Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, 75 UNTS 287 (1950), article 146.

⁶⁷ Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, (1987) 1465 UNTS 85, article 5.

⁶⁸ UN Doc. S/PV.5158, 8.

⁶⁹ Ibid., 11.

⁷⁰ Ibid., 6.

⁷¹ UN Doc. S/RES/1970 (2011).

⁷² See Stahn (2012) 10 JICJ 325, 328.

⁷³ Prosecutor v. Saif-Al-Islam Gaddafi And Abdullah Al-Senussi No. ICC-01/11-01/11-420, Decision on the request of the Defence of Abdullah Al-Senussi to make a finding of non-cooperation by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and refer the matter to the Security Council, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 28 August 2013, paras. 14–15. See also Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-162, Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir’s Potential Travel to the United States of America, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 18 September 2013, paras. 10–11; Prosecutor v. Saif-Al-Islam Gaddafi And Abdullah Al-Senussi No. ICC-01/11-01/11-477, Decision on the ‘Defence Application on behalf of Mr. Abdullah Al Senussi for Leave to Appeal against the ‘Decision on the request of the Defence of Abdullah Al-Senussi to make a finding of non-cooperation by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and Refer the matter to the Security Council’”, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 13 November 2013, para. 10; Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, No. ICC-02/05-01/09-199, Decision Regarding the Visit of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 29 April 2014, paras.12–13.

such Resolutions been also addressed to other non-party States to the Statute, they might have imposed conflicting obligations upon them.

The answer to such incompatibility may lie in article 103 of the Charter of the United Nations, according to which: '[i]n the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail'. The Court has indeed relied on this provision, together with article 25 of the UN Charter, when it has assessed the obligations upon States Parties and both Sudan and Libya to 'cooperate fully' with the Court⁷⁴.

Whatever the legality of paragraphs 6 of both Resolutions, they are most certainly incompatible with the Rome Statute⁷⁵. It should be recalled that when Uganda referred its conflict to the Court in such a way as to exclude jurisdiction over certain individuals, the Prosecutor responded with his own interpretation by which no such exception ratione personae could be effective⁷⁶. This is why the concept of referral in the Rome Statute relates to 'situations' rather than 'cases'. The language was adopted specifically to avoid the danger of one-sided referrals, which could undermine the legitimacy of the institution. In this respect, Pre-Trial Chamber I has affirmed that the Security Council, when referring a situation to the Court, 'has also accepted that the investigation into the said situation, as well as any prosecution arising therefrom, will take place in accordance with the statutory framework provided for in the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the rules as a whole'⁷⁷. When the Security Council performed a similar manoeuvre, however, both Prosecutors were silent. They might have sent the Resolutions back telling the Security Council that it was impossible to proceed on such bases, and to reprise the adoptions without paragraphs 6.

Assuming that paragraphs 6 of both Resolutions 1593 and 1970 are illegal, the question of severability arises. If the impugned paragraphs cannot be excised from the Resolutions, then the entire referrals might be invalid. Certainly a future scenario cannot be automatically excluded whereby the Prosecutor seeks authorization to proceed with a case against an individual in a peacekeeping force who is not a national of a State Party for acts committed e.g. in Sudan. How could the Prosecutor rule this out at the present time? Even if the current Prosecutor were to undertake not to take such an initiative, she could not bind his successor. And this leads to the possibility that the Court might rule on the legality of paragraphs 6 – and the Resolutions as a whole – after a prosecution had already been undertaken and perhaps, even, after one had been completed. Would the Court then declare the Resolutions and the referrals to be valid, notwithstanding the offending paragraph, which it would deem inoperative? Or would it refuse to sever paragraphs 6 and conclude that the referrals as a whole were fatally flawed?

- 18 The important question of funding arises with respect to both referrals by the Security Council. In the case of tribunals formally created by the Council, it is normal that they be financed out of United Nations resources. The International Criminal Court is not a United Nations organ, and it seems unreasonable that its facilities be offered to the United Nations free of charge, so to speak. Article 115 of the Rome Statute contemplates two sources of funds for the Court, assessed contributions made by States Parties and '[f]unds provided by the United Nations, subject to the approval of the General Assembly, in particular in relation to ⁷⁴ See e.g., Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ('Omar Al Bashir'), note 54, paras. 245–247; Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, No. ICC-01/11-01/11-72, Decision on Libya's Submissions Regarding the Arrest of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 March 2012, para. 12; Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ('Omar Al Bashir'), No. ICC-02/05-01/09-195, Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 9 April 2014, paras 30–31.

⁷⁵ Compare with Akande (2012) 10 JICJ 299, 309.

⁷⁶ Situation in Uganda, No. ICC-02/04-01/05, Decision to Convene a Status Conference on the Investigation in the Situation in Uganda in Relation to the Application of Article 53, 2 Dec. 2005, paras. 3–4.

⁷⁷ Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ('Omar Al Bashir'), note 54, para. 45; Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, note 59, para. 20.

the expenses incurred due to referrals by the Security Council'. But paragraph 7 of Resolution 1593 and paragraph 8 of Resolution 1970 state that 'none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral including expenses related to investigations and prosecutions in connection with that referral, shall be borne by the United Nations'; rather, 'such costs shall be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those states that wish to contribute voluntarily'. When Resolution 1593 was adopted, the United States delegate said:

We are pleased that the resolution recognizes that none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral will be borne by the United Nations and that, instead, such costs will be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those that contribute voluntarily. That principle is extremely important and we want to be perfectly clear that any effort to retrench on that principle by this or other organizations to which we contribute could result in our withholding funding or taking other action in response. That is a situation that we must avoid⁷⁸.

According to Professor Condorelli, '[t]he Security Council's unilateral ruling out of the provision of funds by the United Nations to the Court in connection with Darfur is thus at odds not only with the decision to refer, but also with the duty of good faith negotiations, which flows from the obligation mutually agreed upon between the ICC and the United Nations. The position of the United Nations is unlikely to be flexible on this point'⁷⁹. However, during the debate on Resolution 1593 none of the members of the Security Council took exception to the provision in question. Like most initiatives in the Security Council, the Resolution was a diplomatic conference. Those States favouring referral to the Court must have felt they had the better of the Americans, and that the poisonous paragraphs injected by the latter did not fatally compromise the referral itself.

Article 13 para. b requires that the Security Council act under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. Resolutions 1593 and 1970 specifically declare that the Council is acting under Chapter VII. There can be little doubt that the application of Chapter VII in the context of both the Darfur and the Libyan conflicts was consistent with the Charter. As the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has noted, 'there is a common understanding, manifested by the "subsequent practice" of the membership of the United Nations at large, that the "threat to the peace" of article 39 [of the Charter of the United Nations] may include, as one of its species, internal armed conflicts'⁸⁰. The Court is likely to show great deference for a determination by the Security Council that it is exercising its authority under article 39, although a challenge based upon the claim that the Council might be acting irregularly or ultra vires (that is, outside of its powers) cannot be excluded. As the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has noted, '[t]he Security Council is thus subjected to certain constitutional limitations, however broad its powers under the constitution may be'⁸¹. In other words, the Security Council cannot refer any situation to the Court.

Both Prosecutors have made bi-annual reports to the Security Council on the progress, or lack of it, in implementing Resolutions 1593 and 1970⁸². This notwithstanding, the Prosecutor is under no obligation to do so pursuant to the Statute and the Security Council

⁷⁸ UN Doc. S/PV.5158, 3–4.

⁷⁹ Condorelli and Ciampi (2005) 3 JICJ 590, 594. See also: Fletcher and Ohlin (2006) 4 JICJ 428, 429–430.

⁸⁰ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995, (1997) 105 I.L.R. 453, 35 ILM 32, para. 30.

⁸¹ Prosecutor v. Tadić, No. IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995, (1997) 105 I.L.R. 453, 35 ILM 32, para. 28.

⁸² As for the situation in Darfur, Sudan see: UN Doc. S/PV.5216; UN Doc. S/PV.5321; UN Doc. S/PV.5459; UN Doc. S/PV.5589; UN Doc. S/PV.5687; UN Doc. S/PV.5789; UN Doc. S/PV.5905; UN Doc. S/PV.6028; UN Doc. S/PV.6135; UN Doc. S/PV.6230; UN Doc. S/PV.6336; UN Doc. S/PV.6440; UN Doc. S/PV.6548; UN Doc. S/PV.6688; UN Doc. S/PV.6778; UN Doc. S/PV.6887; UN Doc. S/PV.6974; UN Doc. 7080; UN Doc. S/PV.7199; UN Doc. S/PV. 7337. As for the situation in Libya, see: UN Doc. S/PV.6528; UN Doc. S/PV. 6647; UN Doc. S/PV. 6772; UN Doc. S/PV.6855; UN Doc. S/PV.6962; UN Doc. S/PV.7059; UN Doc. S/PV.7173; UN Doc. S/PV.7306.

‘invites’ rather than ‘orders’ the Prosecutor to present such reports. In December 2014, in her report concerning the situation in Darfur, Sudan, Prosecutor Bensouda claimed that ‘[i]t is becoming increasingly difficult for me to appear before the Council to update it when all I am doing is repeating the same things I have said over and over again, most of which are well known to the Council’⁸³. Indeed,

‘[i]n the almost 10 years that my Office has been reporting to the Council, no strategic recommendation has ever been provided to my Office, and neither have there been any discussions resulting in concrete solutions to the problems we face in the Darfur situation. We find ourselves in a stalemate that can only embolden perpetrators to continue with their brutality. As I have stated previously on many occasions, we must engage to define a new approach to the Darfur situation. That requires strategic thinking and changes from all sides. Faced with an environment where my Office’s limited resources for investigations are already overstretched, and given the Council’s lack of foresight on what should happen in Darfur, I am left with no choice but to put investigative activities in Darfur on hold as I shift resources to other urgent cases, especially those where trial is approaching. It should thus be clear to the Council that unless there is a change of attitude and approach to Darfur in the near future, there will continue to be little or nothing to report to it for the foreseeable future. The question for the Council to answer is what meaningful purpose my reporting was intended to serve and whether that purpose is being achieved’⁸⁴.

III. Paragraph 3: Independent prosecutor

- 20 The Prosecutor has the power to initiate an investigation with respect to crimes listed in article 5. The proprio motu power is essential to the effective functioning and independence of the ICC. Article 15 must be complied with. It is this article that provides the necessary safeguards against abuse of the prosecutorial function.

C. Conclusion

- 21 Article 13 is a vital part of the complex and interwoven jurisdictional provisions in the Rome Statute. Together with articles 11, 12, 14–19, it demonstrates the package deal nature of the negotiating process and the final product. Article 13 strikes the right balance and is of crucial importance in the establishment of an effective ICC. However, as far as the situations triggered by the UN Security Council are concerned, they relate to States not Party to the Statute, which do not ‘cooperate fully’ with the Court, in disregard of the mandatory nature of the Security Council’s decisions. At the same time, the Council does not provide for any help in terms of financial or strategic support for the purposes of implementing such Resolutions. This jeopardizes the effectiveness of the Court, whose relationship with the Security Council is in fact put at risk. In this respect, the report submitted in December 2014 by Prosecutor Bensouda is emblematic of such a contradictory relationship⁸⁵.

⁸³ UN Doc. S/PV.7337.

⁸⁴ UN Doc. S/PV.7337.

⁸⁵ UN Doc. S/PV.7337.

Article 14 Referral of a situation by a State Party*

1. A State Party may refer to the Prosecutor a situation in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed requesting the Prosecutor to investigate the situation for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with the commission of such crimes.

2. As far as possible, a referral shall specify the relevant circumstances and be accompanied by such supporting documentation as is available to the State referring the situation.

Other relevant provisions: Rule 45, see Annex I. Regulations 45 and 46 of the Regulations of the Court.

Literature: Akhavan, P., 'The Lord's Resistance Army Case: Uganda's Submission of the First State Referral to the International Criminal Court', (2005) 99 AJIL 403; Akhavan, P., 'Self-Referrals Before the International Criminal Court: Are States the Villains or the Victims of Atrocities?', (2010) 21 CLF 03; Amnesty International, 'The International Criminal Court. Making the Right Choices – Part I: Defining the crimes and permissible defences and initiating a prosecution', (1997) AI Index IOR 40/001/97 and 'Part V: Recommendations to the diplomatic conference', (1998) AI Index IOR 40/010/98; Arsanjani, M.H. and Reisman, M., 'The Law-In-Action of the International Criminal Court', (2005) 99 AJIL 385; Bakker, C.A.E., 'Le principe de complémentarité et les "auto-saisines": un regard critique sur la pratique de la Cour pénale internationale', (2008) RGDIP 361; Bergsmo, M., 'The Jurisdictional Régime of the International Criminal Court' (Part II, Article 11–19), (1998) 6 EJCLCJ 29; Bitti, G., 'Article 53', in: Fernandez, J. and Pacreau, X. (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale. Commentaire article par article, ii (Pedone 2012) 1173; Bitti, G., 'Chronique Internationale: Chronique de jurisprudence de la Cour pénale internationale', (2010) 4 RSC 959; Buchan, R., 'The Mavi Marmara Incident and the International Criminal Court', (2014) 25 CLF 465; de Frouville, O., 'Article 14, Renvoi d'une situation par un État partie', in: Fernandez, J. and Pacreau, X. (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale. Commentaire article par article i (Pedone 2012) 619; El Zeidy, M.M., 'Ad Hoc Declarations of Acceptance of Jurisdiction: The Palestinian Situation under Scrutiny', in: Stahn, C. (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP 2015, 179); El Zeidy, M.M., 'The Ugandan Government Triggers the First Test of the Complementarity Principle: An Assessment of the First State's Party Referral to the ICC', (2005) 5 ICLRev 83; El Zeidy, M.M., 'The legitimacy of withdrawing State Party referrals and ad hoc declarations under the Statute of the International Criminal Court', in: Stahn, C. and Sluiter, G. (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 55; El Zeidy, M.M., The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 211 et seq. and 274 et seq.; European Law Students' Association and No Peace Without Justice, Handbook on the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court (ELSA, the European Law Students' Association 2nd edition 1998); Gaeta, P., 'Is the Practice of "Self-Referrals" a Sound Start for the ICC?', (2004) 2 JICJ 949; Gaja, G., 'Issues of Admissibility in Case of Self-referrals', in: Politi, M. and Gioia, F. (eds.), The International Criminal Court and National Jurisdictions (Ashgate 2008) 49; Human Rights Watch, Justice in the Balance. Recommendations for an Independent and Effective International Criminal Court (Human Rights Watch 1998); Kirsch, P. and Robinson, D., 'Referral by States Parties', in: Cassese, A., Gaeta, P. and Jones, J.R.W.D. (eds.), The Rome Statute Of The International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 619; Kleffner, J., 'Auto-referrals and the complementarity nature of the ICC', in: Stahn, C. and Sluiter, G. (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 41; Kress, C., '"Self-Referrals" and "Waivers of Complementarity", Some Considerations in Law and Policy', (2004) 2 JICJ 944; Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, The International Criminal Court Trigger Mechanism and the Need for an Independent Prosecutor, International Criminal Court Briefing Series 1, Vol. IV (July 1997); Maged, A., 'Withdrawal of Referrals – A Serious Challenge to the Function of the ICC', (2006) 6 ICLRev 419; Marchesi, A., 'Initiation of Proceedings Before the International Criminal Court', in: Lattanzi, F. (ed.), The International Criminal Court. Comments on the Draft Statute (Napoli: Editoriale scientifica 1998) 127; Müller, A.Th. and Stegmüller, I., 'Self-Referrals on Trial, From Panacea to Patient', (2010) 8 JICJ 1267; Olàsoló, H., The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2005); Rastan, R., 'Situation and case: defining the parameters', in: Stahn, C. and El Zeidy, M.M. (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity. From Theory to Practice, Vol. I (CUP 2012) 421; Rastan, R., 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations Before the International Court', (2012) 23 CLF 1; Robinson, D., 'The Controversy over Territorial State Referrals and Reflections on ICL Discourse', (2011) 9 JICJ 355; Schabas, W., '"Complementarity in Practice": Some Uncomplimentary Thoughts', (2008) 19 CLF 5; Schabas W., 'Prosecutorial Discretion and gravity', in: Stahn, C. and Sluiter, G. (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 229;

* The views expressed herein are those of the authors alone and do not reflect the views of the International Criminal Court.

Schabas, W., 'Article 14', in: Schabas, W. (ed.), The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on The Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 305; Scharf, M. and Dowd, P., 'No Way Out? The Question of Unilateral Withdrawals or Referral to the ICC and Other Human Rights Courts', (2009) 9 ChicJIL 573; Stegmiller, I., 'The International Criminal Court and Mali: Towards More Transparency in International Criminal Law Investigations?', (2013) 24 CLF 475.

Content

A. Drafting history/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	9
I. Paragraph 1.....	9
1. 'A State Party'.....	9
2. 'may refer...a situation...'	21
3. 'for the purpose of determining...'	36
II. Paragraph 2.....	38

A. Drafting history/General remarks

1 The right of States to initiate proceedings before the ICC by lodging a complaint was never questioned during the preparatory process. In fact, the first proposal on the subject introduced by the Special Rapporteur on a draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind limited the right of initiating proceedings to States.¹ One year later, the Special Rapporteur suggested that both States and international organizations should have the right to bring complaints before the Court.²

While the Special Rapporteur's proposals do not specify which States should be entitled to lodge complaints, the first report of the 'Working Group on the question of an international criminal jurisdiction', set up by the ILC in 1992, limits the right of complaint to 'any State party which has accepted the court's jurisdiction with respect to the offence in question' and to any 'State which has custody of the suspect and which would have jurisdiction under the relevant treaty to try the accused for the offence in its own court'.³ In article 29 of its 1993 Draft Statute, the Working Group refers to '[a]ny State Party with jurisdiction over a particular crime under the terms of an international convention and which has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 23 of the Statute with respect to the crime or other State with such jurisdiction and which has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 23; or any State which has accepted to the Court's jurisdiction under article 26...'.⁴

2 Article 25 of the Draft Statute that was adopted by the ILC in 1994, after having reconsidered the articles elaborated by the Working Group, reads as follows:

1. A State party which is also a Contracting party to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948 may lodge a complaint with the Prosecutor alleging that a crime of genocide appears to have been committed.
2. A State party which accepts the jurisdiction of the Court under article 22 with respect to a crime may lodge a complaint with the Prosecutor alleging that such a crime appears to have been committed.

¹ The Special Rapporteur submitted, as a test of opinion, the following draft provision: 'Criminal proceedings in respect of crimes against peace and security of mankind shall be instituted by States' (Ninth Report of the Special Rapporteur on a draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, UN Doc. A/CN.4/435, (1991) 2 YbILC, Part 1).

² According to the Special Rapporteur's revised proposal, '[o]nly States and international organizations shall have the right to bring complaints before the Court' (Tenth Report of the Special Rapporteur on a draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, UN Doc. A/CN.4/442, (1992) 2 YbILC, Part 1).

³ Report of the ILC on the Work of its Forty-Fourth Session, UN GAOR, 47th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/47/10 (1992), Annex, paras. 514–516.

⁴ Report of the ILC on the Work of its Forty-Fifth Session, UN GAOR, 48th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/48/10 (1993), 111–12. In 1993 the Working Group was reconvened with the specific task of elaborating a draft statute for an international criminal court.

3. As far as possible a complaint shall specify the circumstances of the alleged crime and the identity and whereabouts of any suspect, and be accompanied by such supporting documentation as is available to the complainant State.
4. In a case in which article 23(1) applies, a complaint is not required for the initiation of an investigation.⁵

Thus, unlike the Working Group's Draft, the ILC's Draft limited the right of complaint to States Parties to the Statute. The main argument in favour of this option was that the necessary cooperation of States with the Court can be legally imposed only on States Parties.⁶ Also, such a limitation could, according to the Commission, have the effect of encouraging ratifications.⁷ However, insofar as it assigned the right of complaint only to States Parties having accepted the Court's jurisdiction over the crime referred to in the complaint, it assumed a mechanism of ad hoc acceptance of jurisdiction. Since the Diplomatic Conference adopted a system of 'automatic' jurisdiction, the ILC's provision on State complaints was no longer viable.⁸

Being a State Party, however, is not sufficient for a State to be entitled to lodge a 3 complaint. Draft article 25 lays down the further requirement that the complainant State be a party to the 1948 Genocide Convention if the complaint concerns an alleged case of genocide; or that the complainant State has accepted the Court's jurisdiction over the crime that is the object of the complaint, if the complaint concerns any of the other crimes falling within the Court's jurisdiction. The limitation of the right to lodge complaints of genocide to States Parties to the 1948 Genocide Convention (as well as to the Statute of the Court) was the object of strong criticism ever since it was proposed. Its opponents pointed out that customary law allowed any State to try persons allegedly responsible of acts of genocide, on the basis of universal jurisdiction, and that it would therefore be inconsistent to prevent States entitled to try a person 'directly' from lodging a complaint before the ICC.⁹

Draft article 25 was discussed in the sessions of the Ad hoc Committee in 1995 and of the 4 Preparatory Committee in 1996, during which both extension and restriction of the categories of States entitled to lodge complaints were proposed. During the sessions of the Ad hoc Committee, proposals aimed at extending the possibility of lodging complaints included that States entitled to lodge a complaint concerning genocide should not be limited to States Parties to the 1948 Genocide Convention and the more far-reaching proposal that any State Party be entitled to lodge a complaint in relation to any crime falling within the Court's jurisdiction; conversely, restrictive proposals were aimed at limiting complainant States to the territorial, custodial or the national State of the victim or of the alleged perpetrator, i. e. to the States with a 'direct interest' in the case.¹⁰ This restrictive approach was reiterated during the 1996 sessions of the Preparatory Committee, but was strongly

⁵ 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

⁶ In 1993 'the Working Group felt that the interests of the international community in providing a universal mechanism for prosecuting, punishing and deterring international crimes wherever they occur weighed in favour of making this particular treaty institution available to all States', Report of the ILC, note 4.

⁷ Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN Doc.A/CN.4/L.491/Rev.2/Add.2.

⁸ Acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction over the crimes listed in the Statute is in principle implicit in the ratification of the Statute. Article 124, however, allows States which ratify the Statute to opt-out from the Court's jurisdiction over war crimes for a period of seven years.

⁹ This reasoning was extended from genocide to crimes against humanity and war crimes also in a paper submitted by the delegation of Germany to the last session of the Preparatory Committee, according to which 'Under current international law, all States may exercise universal criminal jurisdiction concerning acts of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, regardless of the nationality of the offender, the nationality of the victims and the place where the crime was committed. [...] Given this background, there is no reason why the ICC [...] should not be in the very same position to exercise universal jurisdiction for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes in the same manner as the Contracting States themselves [...]' (The jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court. An informal discussion paper submitted by Germany, 23 March 1998, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/DP.2).

¹⁰ Ad hoc Committee Report, 25.

opposed by those who believed that the crimes under the Statute, such as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, are, in their nature, of concern to the international community as a whole.¹¹ Some delegations that spoke during the Preparatory Committee sessions favoured specific acceptance of jurisdiction for each crime falling within the Court's jurisdiction as a condition, in addition to ratification, for lodging complaints.¹²

5 At this point in the negotiations, there was also a change in terminology. During the 1996 sessions of the Preparatory Committee it was proposed, for the first time, that State complaints should in fact be understood as a State entitlement to refer 'situations', leaving to the Prosecutor the task of prosecuting individual persons suspected of having committed a crime in the context of the 'situation' concerned.¹³ This division of roles, aimed to avoid the awkwardness of States, as such, selecting individual suspected perpetrators for prosecution by the ICC, gained grounds as the negotiations progressed and ultimately found its way into the Statute.¹⁴

6 The different positions expressed during the discussions which took place in 1996 are reflected in a rather lengthy draft text which includes all the possible alternatives.¹⁵ The different options are also reflected in a later, shorter version of the draft provision, included as article 25 in the report of the August 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee. This text, which was accepted without changes as article 45 of the 'Zutphen Draft', became article 11 of the Final Draft Statute adopted by the Preparatory Committee in its April 1998 session and presented to the Rome Diplomatic Conference. The text reads as follows:

Paragraph 1

Option 1

[[A State which is also a Contracting Party to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948][A State Party [which accepts the jurisdiction of the Court under article 9 with respect to a crime]] may lodge a complaint [referring a [matter] [situation] in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed to][with] the Prosecutor [alleging that [a crime of genocide][such a crime][a crime under article 5, subparagraphs [(a) to (d) or any combination thereof]] appears to have been committed][and requesting that the Prosecutor investigate the situation for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with the commission of such crimes.]]

Option 2

[A State Party [which accepts the jurisdiction of the Court under article 9 with respect to a crime][that has direct interest] listed under (a) to (d) below may lodge a complaint with the Prosecutor alleging that [such a crime] [a crime under article 5 [(a) to (d) or any combination thereof]] appears to have been committed:

- (a) a State on the territory of which the act [or omission] in question occurred;
- (b) a State of the custody;
- (c) a State of the nationality of the suspect;
- (d) a State of the nationality of the victims.]

¹¹ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, 34, para. 147.

¹² Id., para. 148. The author of the previous commentary added that 'also, as a result of the 'complementary' nature of the ICC, any State with a specific connection with the alleged facts is in a position to fulfil its obligation to punish before any proceedings before the Court are initiated. If it does not do so, then, the international community and each of its members have an additional interest in prosecuting the crime in question', see the section on restriction of State complaints in Marchesi, in: Lattanzi (ed.), The International Criminal Court. Comments on the Draft Statute (1998) 127.

¹³ According to the Report 'Some delegations were uneasy with a regime that allowed any State party to select individual suspects and lodge complaints with the Prosecutor with respect to them, for this could encourage politicisation of the complaint procedure. Instead, according to these delegations, States Parties should be empowered to refer 'situations' to the Prosecutor in a manner similar to the way provided for the Security Council in article 23 para. 1. Once a situation was referred to the Prosecutor, it was noted, he or she could initiate a case against an individual. It was suggested, however, that in certain circumstances a referral of a situation to the Prosecutor might point to particular individuals as likely targets for investigation' (1996 Preparatory Committee I, 34, para. 146).

¹⁴ 'As the PrepCom negotiations continued over the years, this view gathered support, and in fact became the clearly predominant view. By the time of the Rome Conference, support for referral of situations rather than cases was sufficiently clear that the issue was hardly controversial', Kirsch and Robinson, in: Cassese et al (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 621.

¹⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee II, 108–109.

[2. A State Party, which, for a crime under article 5 subparagraph (e), has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 9 and is a party to the treaty concerned may lodge a complaint with the Prosecutor alleging that such a crime appears to have been committed.]

[3. As far as possible, a complaint shall specify the relevant circumstances and be accompanied by such supporting documentation as is available to the complainant State.]

[4. The Prosecutor shall notify the Security Council of all complaints lodged under article 11].⁷

During the Diplomatic Conference, trigger mechanisms were the object of considerable debate, both formal and informal. The discussion concentrated, however, mainly on the role of the SC and the powers of the Prosecutor, rather than on the referral mechanism of States. The issue of jurisdiction, which is closely connected to the initiation of proceedings by States, was also the object of difficult negotiations that lasted until the final moments of the Conference. As for State referrals as such, a provision which extends the right of referral to all States Parties to the Statute with respect to all the crimes falling within the Court's jurisdiction was adopted without much opposition in the overall context of the numerous interrelated issues being negotiated at the Diplomatic Conference.¹⁶

At the time, commentators observed that State referrals, a typical interstate trigger mechanism, may not be particularly suitable for the purpose of individual criminal justice, even when the proceedings are to take place before an international body such as the ICC. Furthermore, State referrals, according to several commentators, at most provide an additional means of initiation of proceedings. Certain precedents, including the failure of the interstate complaint procedure provided for by the ICCPR, indicated that Governments are not generally inclined to set off independent international inquiries into human rights violations by other Governments: consideration of human rights issues in international fora is tendentially limited to political bodies, such as the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, where it is frequently selective and instrumental to other aims.¹⁷ Skepticism over State complaints as a means of initiating proceedings before the Court did not however translate, during the drafting process, into any concrete proposal of eliminating State complaints.¹⁸ Rather, the main aim of those who did not believe that the system should rely entirely on a possibly ineffective and politically biased method of initiating an investigation was to ensure that the Prosecutor also be assigned ex officio powers of initiation of proceedings.¹⁹ As mentioned, a number of proposals were made with the aim either of extending or of further restricting the categories of States entitled to lodge complaints according to the ILC's Draft.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. 'A State Party'

As shown by the travaux préparatoires, the only requirement provided for in article 14 for States to enjoy a right of referral before the Court is that they be Parties to the Statute. None of the other additional requirements provided for either in the ILC's Draft or in the ¹⁶ One aspect concerning State complaints which was debated during the Conference was whether to maintain or delete the provision in No. 4 of Draft article 11 (article 25 of the August 1997 Draft; article 45 of the Zutphen Draft) according to which '[t]he Prosecutor shall notify the Security Council of all complaints lodged under article 11'. Conference document A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 of 6 July 1998 maintains both options, while Conference document A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 of 10 July 1998 no longer mentions notification to the SC.

¹⁷ See, inter alia, Amnesty International (1997) AI Index IOR 40/001/97 95 et seq. and European Law Students' Association (ed.), Handbook on the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court (1998) 46.

¹⁸ It is worth pointing out that deletion of Draft article 11, but not elimination of State complaints, was proposed by a group of experts convened in Chicago in mid-1998, who suggested that 'the detailed provisions of this article unnecessarily encumber the Statute and [should] be moved to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (but not of state complaints) (Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court Based on the Preparatory Committee's Text to the Diplomatic Conference, Rome, June 15 - July 17, 1998, 13ter NEP (1998) 28).

¹⁹ See, in particular, Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, Court.

restrictive proposals made during the Preparatory Committee sessions have been retained as a condition. Most importantly, no direct ‘interest’ must be demonstrated by the State referring a situation to the ICC.

- 10 Whether or not a State can be considered a State Party is to be assessed in light of the statutory provisions, in particular articles 125 and 126. The State must have ratified, accepted, approved or acceded to the Statute and the relevant instrument must have been deposited with the Secretary-General of the UN. Following the deposit of the 60th instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, the Statute entered into force on 1 July 2002. For any other State ratifying, accepting, approving or acceding to the Statute after the deposit of the 60th instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, the Statute enters into force ‘on the first day of the month after the 60th day following the deposit by such State’, in accordance with article 126(2). As a result, the referral will trigger the Court’s intervention for crimes which have taken place after the date the Statute entered into force for the State (article 11(2)). Should the Prosecutor intend to intervene in relation to crimes committed before that date, then the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction can only be triggered through another mechanism.
- 11 The Statute does not determine who on behalf of the State can submit the referral. To respond to this question, one may draw upon rules of international law in the context of treaty-making, as laid down in the VCLT, in particular articles 7 and 8. Article 7(1)(a) VCLT encapsulates the basic principle that a person is only considered to be representing a State or to express the consent of the State to be bound if he or she produces appropriate ‘full powers’.²⁰ The production of such powers is a ‘fundamental safeguard’ for other States (or, in our case, the Court) that this person is acting ‘with the necessary authority’.²¹ Article 7(2)(a) VCLT deviates from this principle insofar as heads of State or government or ministers of foreign affairs (ex officio representatives) are exempted from producing full powers as they are considered to have such powers by virtue of their official functions.²² That means that, as a matter of international law, referrals signed by any of these office-holders will be presumed having been submitted with the requisite authority on behalf of the State. Conversely, referrals signed by other persons will only be considered to bind the State if full powers have been presented.²³ Article 8 VCLT sets out the consequence of the lack of authorization and clarifies that any ‘act [...] performed by a person who cannot be considered under article 7 [VCLT] as authorized to represent a State for that purpose is without legal effect unless afterwards confirmed by that State’. Finally, domestic law may impact the validity of

²⁰ For the purpose of the present Convention: [...] (c) ‘full powers’ means a document emanating from the competent authority of a State designating a person or persons to represent the State for negotiating, adopting or authenticating the text of a treaty, for expressing the consent of the State to be bound by a treaty, or for accomplishing any other act with respect to a treaty’ (article 2(c) VCLT).

²¹ Aust, A., Modern Treaty Law and Practice (CUP 2000) 57. Alternatively, article 7(1)(b) VCLT provides that a person may act without producing full powers if ‘it appears from the practice of the States concerned or from other circumstances that their intention was to consider that person as representing the State for such purposes and to dispense with full powers’.

²² These three office-holders are also referred to as the ‘Big Three’, see Aust, Modern Treaty Law and Practice (2000) 60. This well-established rule in international law has been confirmed repeatedly by the ICJ: ‘In this connection, the Court observes that, in accordance with its consistent jurisprudence, it is a well-established rule of international law that the Head of State, the Head of Government and the Minister for Foreign Affairs are deemed to represent the State merely by virtue of exercising their functions, including for the performance, on behalf of the said State, of unilateral acts having the force of international commitments’, see Case Concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (New Application: 2002), ICJ, Judgment of 3 February 2006, ICJ Reports 2006, para 46 (with further references to previous case law); see also Legal Status of Eastern Greenland (Denmark v. Norway), PCIJ, 1933, PCIJ Ser A/B No. 53, 71.

²³ As has been acknowledged by the ICJ, other officials may act on behalf of the State if the issue upon which they are acting falls under the purview of their official responsibilities and field of competence. Nevertheless, the ICJ paid due regard to the circumstances of the case before accepting the submission that the person represented the State, see Case Concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (New Application: 2002), ICJ, Judgment of 3 February 2006, ICJ Reports 2006, paras 47–48 (addressing the question whether the Minister of Justice could bind Rwanda).

the act only under very narrowly defined circumstances, namely in case the ‘violation was manifest and concerned a rule of [the State’s] internal law of fundamental importance’ (article 46(1) VCLT).²⁴ This approach, however, does not apply when the act is performed by ex officio representatives who are presumed beyond all dispute under international law to have authority to represent and bind the State they represent. Doubts as to the authority of the representative to lodge a referral should be clarified as soon as possible. The Prosecutor of the Court, as the receiving body of the referral instrument, will regularly have to pay heed to this point and, if need be, request verification of the power to make a referral on behalf of the State.

State Party referrals play a significant role in the Court’s operation. At the time of writing, 12 out of the ten situations referred to the ICC Prosecutor, six have been referred by States Parties pursuant to article 14 thus triggering the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction. Only two have been referred by the SC (Darfur, Sudan; Libya) and two situations have been triggered by the Prosecutor’s activation of his proprio motu powers (Kenya; Côte d’Ivoire). Yet, these developments were not predictable at the time when Luis Moreno Ocampo assumed his responsibilities as the Court’s first Prosecutor. In his report to the Second ASP on 8 September 2003 he alluded to his proprio motu powers under article 15 but expressed a clear preference for State referrals.²⁵ The referrals of the Republic of Uganda (2003) and the DRC (2004) are the result of the Prosecutor’s persistent and active efforts to receive State Party referrals.²⁶

The first referral to be received by Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo emanated from the Republic of Uganda and made reference to the “situation concerning the Lord’s Resistance Army” in northern and western Uganda.²⁷ The referral letter was dated 16 December 2003 and submitted confidentially;²⁸ receipt of the referral was publicly announced on 29 January 2004.²⁹ As to the 13

²⁴ Kovacs, P., ‘Article 7 Convention of 1969’, in: Corten, O. and Klein, P. (eds.), The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Vol. I (OUP 2011), para. 46.

²⁵ ‘Our role could be facilitated by a referral or active support from the DRC. The Court and the territorial State may agree that a consensual division of labour could be an effective approach. Groups bitterly divided by conflict may oppose prosecutions at each others’ hands and yet agree to a prosecution by a Court perceived as neutral and impartial. The Office could cooperate with the national authorities by prosecuting the leaders who bear most responsibility for the crimes. National authorities with the assistance of the international community could implement appropriate mechanisms to deal with other individuals responsible. A referral or active support from African and Western countries that have taken a role in the peace process as well as other States Parties would show their commitment to the goal of putting an end to the atrocities in the region’; see Second ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, Report of the Prosecutor of the ICC, Mr Luis Moreno Ocampo, 8 September 2003 (available at <http://legal.un.org/icc/asp/aspfra.htm>).

²⁶ See the Prosecutor’s statement in the ‘Report on the Activities performed during the first three years (June 2003–June 2006)’, 7: ‘While proprio motu power is a critical aspect of the Office’s independence, the Prosecutor adopted the policy of inviting and welcoming voluntary referrals by territorial states as a first step in triggering the jurisdiction of the Court. This policy resulted in referrals for what would become the Court’s first two situations: Northern Uganda and the DRC. The method of initiating investigations by voluntary referral has increased the likelihood of important cooperation and on-the-ground support’. Questioning the legal basis for the Prosecutor to actively seek such referrals, see El Zeidy, Principle of Complementarity (2008) 215–216; and Kress (2004) 2 JICJ 947.

²⁷ See Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, Decision to convene a status conference on the investigation in the situation in Uganda in relation to the application of article 53, PTC II, 2 December 2005, para. 4 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1adaf1/>). However, the Prosecutor, in the press release ‘President of Uganda refers situation concerning the Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC’, 2004, ICC-20040129-44 (available on the website of the Court), made reference to crimes allegedly committed (only) in Northern Uganda.

²⁸ See, Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, Decision to convene a status conference on the investigation in the situation in Uganda in relation to the application of article 53, PTC II, 2 December 2005, para. 4 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1adaf1/>). The Chamber confirmed that the actual referral letter is attached as annex A to the Prosecutor’s request for a warrant of arrest against Joseph Kony and four Lord’s Resistance Army commanders, which is, however, to date not publicly accessible.

²⁹ See Press Release ‘President of Uganda refers situation concerning the Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC’, 2004, ICC-20040129-44 (available on the website of the Court) and Prosecutor’s Information to the authority submitting the referral, it is noted that the information publicly available is unclear. According to PTC II, the referral letter was signed by the Attorney-General of the Republic of Uganda.³⁰ The Prosecutor, in turn, stated, in a press release dated 29 January 2004, that ‘President Yoweri Museveni took the decision to refer the situation’ to the Court.³¹ A few months later, he informed the Presidency that his office had ‘received a referral from the government of Uganda’.³² Despite these inconsistencies, it seems that the Prosecutor at the time was satisfied that the referral letter was lodged by an authority having full powers to do so.

At the time of the referral, the Republic of Uganda was a State Party. It had signed the Statute on 17 March 1999 and had deposited its instrument of ratification on 14 June 2002. Accordingly, for Uganda, the Statute entered into force on 1 September 2002, pursuant to article 126(2). This means that the referral could only trigger the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction in relation to crimes committed after the Statute entered into force for Uganda, i. e. as of 1 September 2002. Uganda, however, sought the Court’s intervention in response to crimes allegedly committed as of 1 July 2002. With a view to closing the two-month gap, Uganda lodged, at the same time, an ad hoc declaration under article 12(3), as provided for under article 11(2), thus extending the temporal jurisdiction back to 1 July 2002.³³ After having concluded the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor decided, on 29 July 2004, to open an investigation into the situation.³⁴

- 14 The second referral was submitted by the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), a State Party to the Statute since 1 July 2002. The referral letter was dated 3 March 2004 and submitted confidentially³⁵; receipt of the referral was publicly announced on 19 April 2004.³⁶ The referral letter was signed by the President of the DRC, Joseph Kabila, who outlined the situation as ‘qui se déroule dans mon pays depuis le 1^{er} juillet 2002, dans laquelle il apparaît que des crimes relevant de la compétence de la Cour Pénale Internationale ont été commis’.

Presidency dated 17 June 2004 as annexed to Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-1, Decision Assigning the Situation in Uganda to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 5 July 2004 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b904bb/>). On 29 January 2004, the Prosecutor held a press conference with the President of the Republic of Uganda in London.

³⁰ Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, Decision to convene a status conference on the investigation in the situation in Uganda in relation to the application of article 53, PTC II, 2 December 2005, para. 4 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1ada1f/>).

³¹ See Press Release ‘President of Uganda refers situation concerning the Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC’, 2004, ICC-20040129-44 (available on the website of the Court).

³² Prosecutor’s Information to the Presidency dated 17 June 2004 as annexed to Situation in Uganda, No. ICC-02/04-1, Decision Assigning the Situation in Uganda to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 5 July 2004 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b904bb/>). As soon as the Prosecutor receives a referral by a State Party, he or she shall inform the Presidency in writing, pursuant to regulation 45 of the Regulations of the Court. Subsequently, the Presidency assigns the situation to an existing PTC or constitutes a PTC to which it assigns the situation pursuant to regulation 46 of the Regulations of the Court. The assignment of the situation number is effectuated by the Registry according to regulation 27 of the Regulations of the Registry. The situation carries the number ICC-02/04 (being the second referral accepted in 2004) and is currently assigned to PTC II.

³³ Prosecutor’s Information to the Presidency dated 17 June 2004 as annexed to Situation in Uganda, No. ICC-02/04-1, Decision Assigning the Situation in Uganda to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 5 July 2004 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b904bb/>) (‘In addition to the referral, the government of Uganda has made a declaration under article 12, paragraph 3, of the Rome Statute, accepting the jurisdiction of the Court as of the entry into force of the Rome Statute, and hence, temporal jurisdiction extends back to 1 July 2002’). See also Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as amended on 27 September 2005, PTC II, 27 September 2005, para. 32 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b1010a/>).

³⁴ See OTP Press Release ‘Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court opens an investigation into Northern Uganda’, 2004, ICC-OTP-20040729-65 (available on the website of the Court).

³⁵ The referral letter of the DRC is contained in annex A1 to Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-32-AnxA1, Submission of Formatted and Redacted Documents, Office of the Prosecutor, 12 March 2006 (notification date) (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d22114/>).

³⁶ See OTP Press Release ‘Prosecutor receives referral of the situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo’, 2004, ICC-OTP-20040419-50 (available on the website of the Court); Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-1, Decision Assigning the Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Presidency, 5 July 2004 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/218294/>).

After having concluded the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor decided, on 23 June 2004, to open an investigation into the situation.³⁷ It was the Court's first investigation.

The third referral stems from the Central African Republic (CAR), a State Party to the Statute since 1 July 2002. The CAR referral letter was dated 18 December 2004³⁸ and was signed by a duly authorised representative of then CAR President François Bozizé.³⁹ It is reported that the referral involves crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court 'committed anywhere on the territory of the Central African Republic since 1 July 2002'.⁴⁰ Upon concluding the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor decided to open an investigation into the situation on 22 May 2007.⁴¹

The fourth referral was submitted by the Republic of Mali, a State Party since 1 July 2002. The referral letter is dated 18 July 2012 and signed by the State's Minister of Justice.⁴² It is noted that the Prosecutor appears to have accepted that the referral was made on behalf of the Malian government.⁴³ In the referral, the Republic of Mali makes reference to the commission of crimes against humanity and war crimes which have been committed 'depuis le mois de Janvier 2012 sur son territoire', asking the Prosecutor to 'déterminer si une ou plusieurs personnes identifiées devraient être accusées des crimes'. Upon conclusion of the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor decided to open the investigation into the situation on 16 January 2013.⁴⁴

The fifth referral was submitted by the Union of the Comoros, a State for which the Statute had entered into force on 1 November 2006.⁴⁵ The letter of referral, dated 14 May 2013, was signed by two Turkish lawyers.⁴⁶ They presented a power of attorney given by the State's Minister of Justice who authorized them to represent the Union of the Comoros before the ICC.⁴⁷ In her notification to the Presidency, the Prosecutor expressed her acceptance inasmuch as she referred to the lawyers as 'legal representatives of the Government of the Union of the Comoros'.⁴⁸ The 14 May 2013 referral letter made reference to crimes allegedly ³⁷ See OTP Press Release 'The Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court opens its first investigation', 23 June 2004, ICC-OTP-20040623-59 (available on the website of the Court). The situation carries the number ICC-01/04 (being the first referral accepted in 2004) and is currently assigned to PTC I.

³⁸ The actual referral letter is attached as annex 1A to the Prosecutor's further submission of information to the request for a warrant of arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, see The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-739, Prosecution's Response to Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case by the Defence for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo pursuant to Articles 17 and 19(2)(a) of the Rome Statute, OTP, 29 March 2010, paras 6 et seq. (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/a5e670/>). The referral letter is to date not publically accessible.

³⁹ Prosecutor's Information to the Presidency dated 22 December 2004 as annexed to Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-1, Decision assigning the situation in the Central African Republic to Pre-Trial Chamber III, Presidency, 19 January 2005 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/5532e5/>).

⁴⁰ Ibid. See also OTP Press Release 'ICC – Prosecutor receives referral concerning Central African Republic', 7 January 2005, ICC-OTP-20050107-86 (available on the website of the Court).

⁴¹ See OTP Press Release 'Prosecutor opens investigation in the Central African Republic', 22 May 2007, ICC-OTP-20070522-220 (available on the website of the Court). The situation carries the number ICC-01/05 (being the first referral submitted in 2005) and is currently assigned to PTC II (previously PTC III).

⁴² See Situation in the Republic of Mali, ICC-01/12-1-Anx, Decision Assigning the Situation in the Republic of Mali to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 19 July 2012 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/793de5/>).

⁴³ OTP, Situation in Mali. Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013, para. 2 ('On 18 July 2012, the Malian Government referred "the Situation in Mali since January 2012" to the ICC').

⁴⁴ OTP, Situation in Mali. Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013; OTP Press Release 'ICC Prosecutor opens investigation into war crimes in Mali: "The legal requirements have been met. We will investigate"', 16 January 2013, ICC-OTP-20130116-PR869 (available on the website of the Court). The situation carries the number ICC-01/12 (being the first referral submitted in 2012) and is currently assigned to PTC I (previously PCT II).

⁴⁵ The Union of the Comoros had signed the Statute on 22 September 2000 and subsequently deposited its ratification instrument of the Statute on 18 August 2006.

⁴⁶ Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, ICC-01/13-1-Anx1, Decision assigning the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Presidency, 5 July 2013, p. 2 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d5e455/>).

⁴⁷ Ibid., 20.

⁴⁸ Prosecutor's Information to the Presidency dated 26 June 2004 contained in Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, ICC-01/13-1-Anx2, Decision Assigning committed in international waters during the raid by the Israeli Defense Forces on the Humanitarian Aid Flotilla ('Gaza Freedom Flotilla'), bound to Gaza. The Gaza Freedom Flotilla, which had departed from the Republic of Turkey, consisted of eight vessels in total, six of which were purportedly attacked on 31 May 2010; a seventh vessel was attacked on 6 June 2010. It was submitted that the majority of the crimes ('nine victims were killed on board and more than dozens were seriously injured')⁴⁹ had taken place on the vessel MV Mavi Marmara, registered in the Union of the Comoros. Two other vessels were registered to the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia. Bearing in mind the jurisdictional parameters to be assessed under article 53(1)(a), the Prosecutor deemed it necessary to receive further clarifications regarding the scope of the referral. As regards the territorial jurisdiction, the Prosecutor enquired whether the referral concerned only the MV Mavi Marmara vessel carrying the Comoros flag or also other flotilla vessels bearing State Party flags. As regards the temporal jurisdiction, the Prosecutor sought information as to whether the referral also encompassed the 6 June 2010 incident. In relation to the temporal scope of the referral, the Union of the Comoros responded that its referral encompasses 'all other crimes flowing from this initial incident [i.e. the Flotilla raid on 31 May 2010] including crimes committed on 6 June 2010 and onwards'.⁵⁰ In terms of territorial scope, the Union of the Comoros clarified that the referral also 'encompasses other flotilla vessels bearing State Party flags in addition to the Mavi Marmara'.⁵¹

The latter clarification puts a spotlight on a noteworthy detail: a State Party, for the first time in the history of the ICC, referred a situation to the Court involving potential crimes that have occurred not only on its territory or, as in the present case, on board of a vessel registered to that State (commonly referred to as 'self-referral'); but also the alleged crimes that occurred on board of vessels registered to other State Parties, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, which did not lodge a referral nor officially joined the Union of the Comoros in their referral initiative. Given the fact that the Court's activities hitherto had been triggered by 'self-referrals' (i.e. referrals of the territorial State), this type of referral to date is an exceptional novelty. Upon conclusion of the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor decided not to open an investigation into the situation.⁵²

the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Presidency, 5 July 2013 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d23b51/>). The situation carries the number ICC-01/13 (being the first referral submitted in 2013) and is currently assigned to PTC I.

⁴⁹ Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, ICC-01/13-1-Anx1, Decision assigning the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Presidency, 5 July 2013, 3 and 5 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d5e455/>). The Union of the Comoros also submitted that, in addition to the nine victims killed, 'more than 600 civilians from more than thirty countries on board of the Gaza flotilla were victimized by the conduct of the [Israeli Defense Forces]', ibid., 9.

⁵⁰ Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, ICC-01/13-1-Anx2, Decision assigning the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Presidency, 5 July 2013, 2 (First letter dated 29 May 2013) (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/d23b51/>).

⁵¹ Ibid., 3 (Second letter dated 21 June 2013).

⁵² OTP, Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia. Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014, filed in the situation record under No. ICC-01/13-6-AnxA (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6b833a/>); OTP Press Release 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, on concluding the preliminary examination of the situation referred by the Union of Comoros: "Rome Statute legal requirements have not been met"', 6 November 2014. Even though the Prosecutor concluded that there was a reasonable basis to believe that war crimes (but not crimes against humanity) had been committed, at least in the context of the interception and takeover of the Mavi Marmara vessel by the Israeli Defense Forces, she considered that the potential cases arising from an investigation into the situation 'would not be of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court and would therefore be inadmissible pursuant to articles 17(1)(d) and 53(1)(b) of the Statute', see OTP, Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia. Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014, 59-60. Upon notification of the Prosecutor's decision (rule 105(1)), the referring State submitted a request to PTC I with a view to reviewing the Prosecutor's decision not to initiate an investigation (article 53(3)(a), rule 107). Upon review, PTC I, by majority, requested the Prosecutor to reconsider her decision, Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, Another point worthy of attention in the fifth referral letter was Comoros' mentioning that the ICC 'will also have jurisdiction over this matter if it decides to accept the declaration made by the Palestinian Authority under Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute in January 2009', as the Flotilla raid is 'directly linked to the Gaza situation'.⁵³ It is recalled that prior to receiving the Comoros referral, on 3 April 2012, former Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo had declined to make a legal determination as to the qualification of Palestine as a State for the purpose of lodging a declaration under article 12(3).⁵⁴ Consequently, the Prosecutor did not proceed upon the ad hoc declaration by the Palestinian Authority.⁵⁵ The scenario raised by the Comoros referral begs the question as to what are the effects of a referral if the Court's jurisdiction for the events in question was already triggered previously by another mechanism. Should the events for which the Court's intervention is sought coincide or be linked, then the Prosecutor may proceed on the basis which first triggered the Court's jurisdiction.

The sixth referral emanates from the CAR which already had referred a situation to the Court in 2004. Violence erupted again on CAR territory in late 2012 prompting the ICC Prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, to make three statements in relation to the events at the time.⁵⁶ Eventually, on 7 February 2014, the Prosecutor announced the opening of a new preliminary examination of the allegations of crimes on CAR territory since 1 September 2012, which appeared to fall under the jurisdiction of the Court.⁵⁷ The Prosecutor's proprio motu initiative was based on her analysis of reports available to her and she indicated that she

No. ICC-01/13-34, Decision on request of the Union of the Comoros to review the Prosecutor's decision not to initiate an investigation, PTC I, 16 July 2015 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2f876c/>); the partly dissenting opinion is registered under No. ICC-01/13-34-Anx-Corr (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0fceb2/>). The Prosecutor appealed the PTC I decision. Prior to the Prosecutor's decision in November 2014, one commentator had argued that all article 53(1) requirements, including the gravity test, were met, see Buchanan (2014) 25 CLF 465.

⁵³ Ibid., 6–7.

⁵⁴ On 22 January 2009, the Palestinian Authority had lodged a declaration under article 12(3) accepting the exercise of jurisdiction of the Court for 'acts committed on the territory of Palestine since 1 July 2002'. On 3 April 2012, the former ICC Prosecutor rendered his decision, stating that for the purpose of interpreting article 12, 'it is for the relevant bodies at the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties to make the legal determinations whether Palestine qualifies as a State for the purpose of acceding to the Rome Statute and thereby enabling the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court under article 12(1). The Rome Statute provides no authority for the Office of the Prosecutor to adopt a method to define the term "State" under article 12(3) which would be at variance with that established for the purpose of article 12(1)'; see OTP, 'Update on Situation in Palestine', 3 April 2012 (available on the website of the Court). In a later statement, Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda added that the 'Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC has never been in a position to open an investigation for lack of jurisdiction (...)'. Indeed, she confirmed that the jurisdiction over the situation in Palestine had not been triggered yet ('The Office's approach to Palestine will be no different if the Court's jurisdiction is ever triggered over the situation.'). See OTP Press Release 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda: "The Public Deserves to know the Truth about the ICC's Jurisdiction over Palestine"', 2 September 2014 (available on the website of the Court). For a critical analysis of Palestine's ad hoc declarations, see El Zeidy, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (2015).

⁵⁵ In light of the 2012 decision of the Prosecutor, it can only be speculated why the Union of the Comoros took this position. Perhaps the referring State was of the view that the 2009 ad hoc declaration had not lost its validity but was considered to become 'operative' at a later stage. Indeed, this moment arrived with the adoption of GA Res. 67/19 of 29 November 2012 (UN Doc A/RES/67/19), granting Palestine the status of a 'non-member observer State' in the UN. The question of whether the 2009 ad hoc declaration was still valid became moot with Palestine's accession to the Rome Statute and the lodging of a new ad hoc declaration under article 12(3) which backdated the Court's potential intervention to events having taken place 'in the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem' as of 13 June 2013 without making any reference any longer to the first ad hoc declaration, see 'Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court', dated 31 December 2014 and signed by President of the State of Palestine, Mahmoud Abbas (declaration available on the website of the Court).

⁵⁶ See OTP Press Releases 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, in relation to situation in Central African Republic', 22 April 2013; 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, in relation to situation in Central African Republic', 7 August 2013; 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, in relation to the escalating violence in the Central African Republic', 9 December 2013 (all statements available on the website of the Court).

⁵⁷ See OTP Press Release, 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, on opening a new Preliminary Examination in Central African Republic', 7 February 2014 (available on the website of the Court).

would ‘[engage] with the CAR authorities with a view to discussing ways and means to bring perpetrators to account, including at the national level’. Perhaps as a result of those discussions, the CAR presented its second referral to the Court on 30 May 2014, requesting the Court’s intervention for the events that have taken place on its territory since 1 August 2012.⁵⁸ The referral letter was signed by incumbent CAR President Catherine Samba Panza who defined the situation in general terms as follows:

‘Depuis au minimum le mois d’août 2012, avec l’apparition et le développement de différents groupes armés sur le territoire national, des crimes parmi les plus graves ont été commis à Bangui et dans le reste du pays tels que des meurtres, des viols et autres violences sexuelles, des actes de pillages, des déplacements, forces de populations et autres’.

Upon conclusion of the preliminary examination already underway at the time of the referral, the Prosecutor decided to open an investigation into the situation CAR II on 24 September 2014.⁵⁹

- 19 All of the above referrals are examples of what is commonly referred to as ‘self-referrals’.⁶⁰ Their permissibility under articles 13(a) and 14 is discussed controversially in academic writings. The arguments advanced pertain, inter alia, to the drafters’ intention at the time,⁶¹ the compatibility of such practice with the States’ obligation to prosecute domestically international crimes (para. 6 of the Preamble of the Statute),⁶² and other practical consequences and policy considerations.⁶³
- 20 Not only the Prosecutor, but also the Judges of the Court seem to have accepted the practice of ‘self-referrals’ as such without raising any critical questions. Indeed, PTC I in the Lubanga case, albeit in the context of admissibility, embraced the concept of ‘self-referrals’ and declared it to be ‘consistent with the ultimate purpose of the complementarity regime’.⁶⁴ In its decision on admissibility of 10 March 2009, PTC II in the Kony et al case did not address this matter.⁶⁵ Equally, the AC in the admissibility proceedings in the Katanga/Ngudjolo case did not cast a critical eye on the practice of ‘self-referrals’. But with the following sentence it may have implied to open the discussion at an appropriate later stage:

⁵⁸ Situation in the Central African Republic II, No. ICC-01/14-1-Anx1, Decision assigning the situation in the Central African Republic II to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 18 June 2014 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9304eb/>).

⁵⁹ OTP, Situation in the Central African Republic II. Article 53(1) Report, 24 September 2014; OTP Press Release, ‘Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, on opening a second investigation in the Central African Republic’, 24 September 2014, ICC-OTP-20140924-PR1043 (available on the website of the Court). The situation carries the number ICC-01/14 (being the first referral rebutted in 2014) and is currently assigned to PTC II.

⁶⁰ In relation to the referral of the Union of the Comoros, the referral captures also the vessel of other States Parties which had not joined the referral or otherwise referred the (same) situation to the Court, see mn 17.

⁶¹ See, for example, Schabas, in: Schabas (ed.), The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (2012) 311; Arsanjani and Reisman (2005) 99 AJIL 386–387; arguing against such an interpretation of the drafting history, Robinson (2011) 9 JICJ 355.

⁶² See a discussion in El Zeidy, Principle of Complementarity (2008) 220–221; Kress (2004) 2 JICJ 945–946. Both authors propose, having regard to the ultimate goal of preventing impunity, that the States be accorded the choice to seize the Court with a referral. Referring in agreement to the interpretation put forth by those two authors, the AC in the Katanga/Ngudjolo case confirmed: ‘Moreover, there may be merit in the argument that the sovereign decision of a State to relinquish its jurisdiction in favour of the Court may well be seen as complying with the “duty to exercise [its] criminal jurisdiction”, as envisaged in the sixth paragraph of the Preamble’, see The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, No. ICC-01/04-01/07-1497 (OA 8), Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, AC, 25 September 2009, para. 85 and footnote 179 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>).

⁶³ See, for example, Gaeta (2004) 2 JICJ 949; Arsanjani and Reisman (2005) 99 AJIL 385; El Zeidy, Principle of Complementarity (2008) 222; Kress (2004) 2 JICJ 948; de Frouville, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale. Commentaire article par article (2012) 628–629.

⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-8-Corr, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a warrant of arrest, Article 58, PTC I, 10 February 2006, para. 35 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c60aaa/>).

⁶⁵ Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen, ICC-02/04-01/05-377, Decision on admissibility of the case under article 19(1) of the Statute, PTC II, 10 March 2009 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/44f5b3/>).

‘[T]he Appeals Chamber is mindful that the Court, acting under the relevant provisions of the Statute [i. e. article 17(1)(c) and (d), article 19(1), and article 53] and depending on the circumstances of each case, may decide not to act upon a State’s relinquishment of jurisdiction in favour of the Court’ (emphasis added).⁶⁶

2. ‘may refer... a situation...’

Any State Party is free to refer a situation to the Court; the entitlement to refer a situation is not reserved for a particular category of States (‘a’ State Party).⁶⁷ The Statute also does not establish an obligation on the State Party to justify its motives for doing so. Under the Statute, State Party referrals are on a par with SC referrals⁶⁸ but differ on one important point: while the SC is called upon to refer situations to the Prosecutor ‘acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations’ (i. e. only situations involving a threat to international peace and security), States Parties may refer any situation ‘in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed’, without there being a threat to international peace and security.

The referral is a written declaration⁶⁹ by way of a unilateral act that has binding effects.⁷⁰ As a consequence, it requires the Prosecutor to consider its content in the framework of a preliminary examination without, however, obligating him or her to actually opening an investigation.⁷¹ During the preliminary examination, the Prosecutor evaluates the information made available and assesses whether the criteria under article 53(1)(a)-(c) are met. At the end of this process, the Prosecutor makes a determination as to whether an investigation should be initiated. Should the determination be in the negative, the Prosecutor will inform the referring State⁷² which, in turn, may request a review of the Prosecutor’s determination.⁷³ In case the Prosecutor makes an affirmative determination, he or she will initiate the investigation.⁷⁴ As can be seen, the referral itself only prompts the Prosecutor to look into a ⁶⁶ The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497 (OA 8), Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009, para. 85 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>).

⁶⁷ See also Kirsch and Robinson, in: Cassese et al (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol I (2002) 622–623.

⁶⁸ The activation of the Prosecutor’s proprio motu investigative powers requires that authorization be given first by the PTC, in accordance with article 15(4). No such judicial intervention is required following a State or SC referral. In relation to the crime of aggression, the Prosecutor may only open an investigation into that crime, following a State party referral, if the Pre-Trial Division has authorised such investigation, unless the SC has previously made a determination of an act of aggression (article 15*bis*). In this regard, the State Party referral is treated similar to the Prosecutor’s proprio motu initiative in respect to other article 5 crimes.

⁶⁹ Rule 45 imposes the written form (‘A referral of a situation to the Prosecutor shall be in writing’) but does not ask for a particular type of document. Thus, given the clear wording of rule 45, a situation cannot be referred orally to the Prosecutor.

⁷⁰ ‘When it is the intention of the State making the declaration that it should become bound according to its terms, that intention confers on the declaration the character of a legal undertaking, the State being thenceforth legally required to follow a course of conduct consistent with the declaration. An undertaking of this kind, if given publicly, and with an intent to be bound, even though not made within the context of international negotiations, is binding’, see Nuclear Tests Case (Australia v. France), ICJ Reports 1974, Judgment of 20 December 1974, ICJ, para. 43. In the case of article 14, the binding nature of the referral is to activate the Court’s operation in relation to the situation at hand.

⁷¹ See also regulation 25 of the Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor (‘The preliminary examination and evaluation of a situation by the Office [of the Prosecutor] may be initiated on the basis of: [...] (b) a referral from a State Party or the Security Council’ (emphasis added)). Given the clear language employed in article 53(1) and rule 104 (‘shall’), the use of the word ‘may’ in regulation 25 of the Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor must be understood as permissive in nature. It does not grant the Prosecutor discretion. The Statute, which must be applied in the first place (article 21(1)(a)), is determinative on this question.

⁷² Rule 105(1) and (3).

⁷³ Article 53(3)(a). See the request for review submitted by the Union of the Comoros on 29 January 2015.

⁷⁴ The initiation of the investigation is publicly announced by way of a press release. In recent years, the Court’s second Prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, publishes an Article 53(1) Report in which she details her assessment of the preliminary examination under article 53(1)(a)-(c) and informs the general public of her conclusion.

particular set of events; it aims at activating international investigative and prosecutorial activities of the Prosecutor's Office but does not anticipate the Prosecutor's final determination under article 53(1). Whether or not (or to what extent) the Prosecutor will investigate, is a question to be determined by the ICC Prosecutor, subject to the PTC's article 53(3) review powers.⁷⁵

- 23 The referral, once submitted to the Prosecutor, is binding insofar as it definitely requires the Prosecutor to act. To what extent, if any, the referral can be unilaterally withdrawn by the referring State is nowhere regulated in the statutory documents. As the Court was never confronted with such a scenario, it is of no surprise that to date no case law exists addressing this question. Whether or not this avenue is open to referring States has been discussed in scholarly writings. Those arguing against such a possibility emphasize that it would be incompatible with the procedural regime established in the Statute and contravene the object and purpose of the Statute.⁷⁶ Indeed, the referral produces legal consequences in that it activates the Court's operation in a particular situation. Once the referral is unilaterally pronounced, the State Party has no means to stop the process it set off. By the same token, any later amendment of a referral by the State (e.g. imposing an end-date for the referral) may prove to be inadmissible if it is aimed at influencing the Prosecutor's prosecutorial choices and excluding certain individuals from the Court's reach.⁷⁷
- 24 The referral is addressed to the Prosecutor who acknowledges receipt. Subsequently, the Prosecutor may seek further clarifications and, for example, enquire into the requisite authority of the submitting person or the scope of the referral.⁷⁸ As soon as the situation has been referred to the Prosecutor, he or she shall inform the Presidency about it.⁷⁹ Thereafter, the Presidency shall assign the situation to a newly constituted or existing PTC.⁸⁰ The assignment of the situation to a PTC does not signify the initiation of judicial proceedings. Rather, it ensures that questions, for which judicial intervention may be required at this stage, can be brought before a Chamber.⁸¹
- 25 The subject-matter of a referral is a 'situation in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed'. The term 'situation' is nowhere defined in the Statute. As mentioned before, the drafters of article 14 clearly preferred the notion 'situation' so as to prevent States from referring specific crimes or cases against specific suspects and thus use the Court for political agendas.⁸² Hence, the 'situation' set out ⁷⁵ By the same token, the chapeau of article 13 is cautiously phrased ('The Court may exercise its jurisdiction (...)')(emphasis added)).

⁷⁶ Arguing against a possibility of withdrawal, see, for example, El Zeidy, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2009), 55; Müller and Stegmüller (2010) 8 JICJ 1290 et seq; de Frouville, in: Fernandez and Pacreau (eds.), Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale. Commentaire article par article (2012), 640–642; Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht (2014) § 8 mn 17 (case 1); arguing in favour of allowing the State to withdraw its referral, at least within a very narrow temporal window, see Scharf and Dowd (2009) 9 ChicJIL 573; and Maged, (2006) 6 ICLRev 419, who advocates for an amendment of the Rules.

⁷⁷ One may argue, however, that any negative consequences of amendments by the State may be circumvented by the Prosecutor by invoking his or her article 15 powers.

⁷⁸ See, for example, the clarifications sought by the Prosecutor from the Union of the Comoros, mn 17.

⁷⁹ Regulation 45 of the Regulations of the Court; regulation 25(2) of the Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor.

⁸⁰ Regulation 46 of the Regulations of the Court.

⁸¹ For example, the taking of statements at the seat of the Court during the preliminary examination phase pursuant to rule 104(2) in conjunction with rule 47. The PTC assigned with the situation remains the competent Chamber for all (pre-trial) cases emanating therefrom. Regulation 46(2) of the Regulations of the Court foresees that upon request of a presiding judge of a pre-trial chamber, 'the President of the Pre-Trial Division may decide to assign a matter, request or information arising out of that situation to another Pre-Trial Chamber in the interests of the administration of justice'.

⁸² Concerns had been expressed at the time that the referring State should not be able to 'limit the referral to include crimes committed by one side to a conflict in a situation (...) or restrict the nationality of those who can be investigated and prosecuted. (...) [R]ather, [t]he prosecutor must be free to investigate all persons who may be responsible for crimes within the court's jurisdiction in a situation', note 17, Amnesty International (1997) AI Index IOR 40/001/97 34.

in the referral may not be so specific so as to pinpoint to a specific person or group of persons or indicate specific crimes.⁸³ What can be inferred from the above is that the concept of a 'situation' must be understood in a generic and broad fashion: a description of facts, defined by space and time, which circumscribe the prevailing circumstances at the time ('conflict scenario').⁸⁴ The prevailing circumstances or conflict scenario establish the broader context in which 'one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed'. A 'crime' refers to the legal definition of a criminal behavior; the crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC are listed in article 5 (jurisdiction ratione materiae). Accordingly, the State Party in the referral will regularly set out its own assessment as to whether one or more crimes pursuant to article 5 appear to have been committed.⁸⁵ Considering that the referral does not bind the Prosecutor in the article 53(1) determination, it is not necessary that the State Party present a comprehensive and in-depth legal analysis covering all crimes.⁸⁶ As the requirement 'within the jurisdiction of the Court' suggests, this assessment may also encompass all other jurisdictional facets.⁸⁷ To what extent the situation fits in the jurisdictional regime of the Statute will be determined by the Prosecutor (article 53(1)) and, ultimately, by the Judges (article 19(1)). The State Party is free to analyse the jurisdictional prerequisites and present its own conclusions. In fact, it is most likely that the referring State will have conducted a first analysis prior to referring the situation. Yet, the assessment of those prerequisites, even less their correct determination, is not a conditio sine qua non ingredient for lodging the referral.⁸⁸

The referring State's own assessment at this stage must not meet exacting standards. The Statute stipulates that the crimes only 'appear to have been committed'. While the term 'appear' lacks statutory definition, guidance may be found in jurisprudence of the Court

⁸³ Depending on the circumstances, the mentioning of specific crimes or specific perpetrators may be unavoidable. Such information assists the Prosecutor in identifying potential targets of the investigation. But this information will not restrict the Prosecutor in his or her prosecutorial choices targeting one or more individuals.

⁸⁴ The information could also refer to the State's own nationals who appear to have committed crimes. Should the Prosecutor intend to go beyond the factual boundaries of the scenario encompassed in the referral, he or she must invoke the proprio motu powers under article 15.

⁸⁵ In the jurisprudence of the Court, the component 'one or more crimes (...) have been committed' has been interpreted broadly so as to encompass also future crimes (i. e. crimes which had not occurred at the time of the State referral), as long as a nexus is established between the future crime(s) and the situational scope underlying the State referral at the time, see infra mn 33.

⁸⁶ Referring States have treated this aspect of the referral quite differently. Examples range from setting out a catalogue of specific crimes which, in the view of the State concerned, appear to have been committed, such as murder, rape, pillaging, etc. (see referrals of the Republic of Mali or CAR [in relation to CAR II]) to making reference only to the Statute without any further specification (see the DRC referral in which reference is made merely to the 'crimes relevant de la compétence de la Cour Pénale Internationale'). As can be seen, the minimalist approach adopted by the DRC (which essentially repeated the text of article 14) was not considered by the Court to impact the validity of the referral.

⁸⁷ In its judgment of 14 December 2006, the AC held: '[t]he notion of jurisdiction has four different facets: subject-matter jurisdiction also identified by the Latin maxim jurisdiction ratione materiae, jurisdiction over persons, symbolized by the Latin maxim jurisdiction ratione personae, territorial jurisdiction – jurisdiction ratione loci – and lastly jurisdiction ratione temporis. These facets find expression in the Statute. The jurisdiction of the Court is laid down in the Statute: Article 5 specifies the subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the Court, namely the crimes over which the Court has jurisdiction, sequentially defined in articles 6, 7, and 8. Jurisdiction over persons is dealt with in articles 12 and 26, while territorial jurisdiction is specified by articles 12 and 13(b), depending on the origin of the proceedings. Lastly, jurisdiction ratione temporis is defined by article 11; see Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772 (OA 4), Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, AC, 14 December 2006, paras 21–22 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1505f7/>).

⁸⁸ Another commentator, however, interprets article 14(2) to impose a stricter verification exercise as to the jurisdictional prerequisites. He proposes that 'if a State Party's referral fails to comply with the formal and material requirements provided for in [articles 13(a) and 14], it should be treated as an [article 15(1) communication] of the notitia criminis', see Olásolo, The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court (2005) 105.

which interprets the term (albeit in different procedural context), such as PTC III's interpretation of the term in the context of adjourning the confirmation of charges hearing.⁸⁹ Applying the rationale of PTC III to our discussion, it follows that the threshold of 'appear' within the meaning of article 14 is not high; it involves a prima facie assessment and does not require to be premised on a comprehensive evidentiary discussion. Simply put: the possibility that crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court have been committed suffices. Again, this approach complies with the procedural regime established in the Statute: the referral is only meant to call upon the Court to act.

- 27 As seen above, while the State Party chiefly marks out the scope of the situation by reference to acts defined by time and space, and/or perpetrators, it is at first the Prosecutor who will determine whether the 'situation' complies with the procedural regime of the Statute, in particular its jurisdictional parameters. For the investigation (and selection of 'cases') will only take place within the boundaries of a 'situation' over which the Court is empowered to exercise jurisdiction. In the case law of the Court, a 'situation' has been defined by reference to the 'territorial, temporal and possibly personal parameters'.⁹⁰ The temporal parameter gives clarity as to whether the alleged crime falls within the period set out in article 11. The territorial and personal parameters are in the alternative. The territorial parameter enquires whether the crime occurred on the territory of a State Party pursuant to article 12(2)(a) (extending to vessels registered to States Parties) or of a State which lodged an ad hoc declaration under article 12(3). The personal parameter pertains to the perpetrator of the crime(s) who is a national of a State Party (article 12(2)(b)) or a non-State Party which lodged an article 12(3) declaration.
- 28 The drafters' preference for non-specific referrals (in relation to suspects or crimes) has also been adopted and promoted in the practice of the Court. Indeed, in the context of the first referral from Uganda, this was a live issue as the referring State made reference to the 'situation concerning the Lord's Resistance Army in northern and western Uganda', directing the Prosecutor's attention to one side of the conflict. In response, former Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo clarified that he would not restrict his investigation to crimes committed by the LRA only but, as a matter of law, consider all groups committing crimes in Northern Uganda, including the Ugandan Army.⁹¹ When assigning the situation to PTC II, the ⁸⁹ In the Bemba case, PTC III, in the context of adjourning the confirmation of charges hearing pursuant to article 61(7)(c)(ii), explained, for example: 'In the English language, the word "appear" means to "give a specified impression". (...) At this stage the Chamber is not called upon to prove that the requirements of the "different crime" are definitely satisfied. To make its determination under article 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Statute, the Chamber deems it sufficient to rather make a prima facie finding that it has doubts as to the legal characterization of the facts as reflected in the document containing the charges', Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, Decision Adjourning the Hearing pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, PTC III, 3 March 2009, para. 25 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/81d7a9/>).

⁹⁰ Situation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-101-tEN-Corr, Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, PTC I, 17 January 2006, para. 65 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2fe2fc/>). This decision was reversed on appeal but on other grounds. The AC did not find fault with the definition of 'situation' as such and PTC I's approach was endorsed by other PTCs. For the definition of the jurisdictional parameters, see the AC Judgment of 14 December 2006, note 87. For a comprehensive analysis of the jurisdictional confines of a situation, see Rastan, in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity, Vol. I (2011) 421.

⁹¹ 'We notified Uganda that we would interpret the referral as concerning all crimes under the Statute committed in Northern Uganda and that our investigation would be impartial. In a July 2004 report to the Parliament the Government of Uganda confirmed their understanding of this interpretation. [...] We analyzed the gravity of all crimes in Northern Uganda committed by the LRA and Uganda forces. Crimes committed by the LRA were much more numerous and of much higher gravity than alleged crimes committed by the [Uganda army]. We therefore started with an investigation of the LRA. At the same time, we also collected information on other groups from a variety of sources' (emphasis added), see 'Statement by the Chief Prosecutor on the Ugandan Arrest Warrants', 14 October 2005, 2–3 (available on the website of the Court). In a statement to the diplomatic corps in 2004, the Prosecutor stated: 'I am unable to share the referral itself, as it contains detailed information provided in confidence. (...) However, I can confirm that the scope of the referral will be interpreted in accordance with principles underlying the Statute' (emphasis added), see OTP, 'Statement of the Prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo to Diplomatic Corps', 12 February 2004, 5 (available on the website of the Presidency went even further and decided to assign to the Chamber the ‘situation in Uganda’, without restricting the situation to Northern Uganda, as referred to by the Prosecutor.⁹² The same even-handed approach was also taken, for example, in the situation CAR II insofar as Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda announced extending her investigation into crimes allegedly committed by all groups involved in the armed conflict.⁹³

Conversely, the State’s prima facie findings as regards the qualification of the crimes did not have a binding effect on the Prosecutor’s article 53(1) determination following a referral. The Republic of Mali, for example, referred the situation to the Prosecutor indicating that ‘[ces] faits sont constitutifs de crimes contre l’Humanité et Crimes de Guerre qui relèvent de la Compétence de la Cour Pénale Internationale (CPI) en vertu des articles 7 et 8 de son Statut’.⁹⁴ Nonetheless, following her preliminary examination, the Prosecutor found that ‘[at] this stage, the information available does not provide a reasonable basis to believe that crimes against humanity under Article 7 have been committed in the Situation in Mali’.⁹⁵ Consequently, she determined that there was ‘only’ a reasonable basis to believe that war crimes had been committed.⁹⁶ Finally, the Prosecutor’s decision not to open an investigation into the events surrounding the Gaza Freedom Flotilla, following a referral by the Union of the Comoros, is another example that the examination of the jurisdictional parameters of the ‘situation’ of the referring State is not binding upon the Prosecutor. Contrary to what the referring State suggested,⁹⁷ the Prosecutor initially opined that the potential cases arising from the investigation would not be of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the ICC (article 53(3)(b)) and consequently declined to open an investigation in 2014.

As regards the description of the factual scope of the ‘situation’, the practice has been rather flexible. Following a minimalist approach, the DRC referred generally to ‘la situation Court). Nevertheless, fact is that the OTP, during the time this situation is before the Court, initiated proceedings only against LRA commanders and did not expand its investigation to other armed groups nor to the Ugandan forces. The fact that over 11 years have passed since the referral reached the Prosecutor begs the question whether the OTP will enquire into the criminal conduct of other actors, including the Ugandan Army, at all or whether the Prosecutor has taken an implicit decision not to prosecute other perpetrators (article 53(2)).

⁹² It is questionable, however, whether an administrative act, such as the assignment of a situation to a Chamber, which goes beyond the wording of the referral, can expand the geographical scope of the referral. In this respect, the Statute does not bestow any authority on the Presidency.

⁹³ The Prosecutor determined that the alleged crimes committed in the situation ‘are mostly attributable to armed groups such as Séléka and anti-balaka’ groups. She also included in her assessment the purported criminal conduct of CAR armed forces and the Presidential Guard of former CAR President Bozizé; however, she stated that more information was needed to make a determination as to whether they qualify as crimes falling under the jurisdiction of the Court, see OTP, Situation in the Central African Republic II. Article 53(1) Report, 24 September 2014, 27–28, paras 9 and 10 (available on the website of the Court).

⁹⁴ See Mali’s referral letter contained in Situation in the Republic of Mali, ICC-01/12-1-Anx, Decision Assigning the Situation in the Republic of Mali to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Presidency, 19 July 2012, 2 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/94d977/>).

⁹⁵ OTP, Situation in Mali. Article 53(1) Report, 16 January 2013, 27, para. 128.

⁹⁶ This independence and objectivity in assessing the facts of the situation during the preliminary analysis, including all parties to a conflict, is not the domaine réservé of the Prosecutor. One may argue that this approach is equally applicable to the judicial assessment of proprio motu authorization requests for the commencement of an investigation under article 15(4). This seems to have been the rationale followed by the Majority Judges of PTC III in the article 15 authorization process regarding the situation of Côte d’Ivoire, when they, in deviation of the conclusions presented by the Prosecutor, expanded their analysis of the Prosecutor’s article 15(3) request and supporting material, inter alia, to both parties of the conflict with regard to, in particular, crimes against humanity allegations, see Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to ‘Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, 15 November 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>). Critically seen by dissenting judge, see Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-15-Corr, Corrigendum to ‘Judge Fernández de Gurmendi separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, PTC III, 5 October 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/eb8724-1/>); Rastan (2012) CLF 1.

⁹⁷ See for the State’s assessment of gravity in the referral of the Union of the Comoros, as annexed to the Presidency’s decision assigning the situation to PTC I, note 46, paras 25–28 (‘The crimes committed meet the test of gravity provided for under Articles 17(1)(d) and 53 of the Rome Statute’).

qui se déroule dans mon pays depuis le 1^{er} juillet 2002 dans laquelle il apparaît que des crimes relevant de la compétence de la Cour Pénale Internationale ont été commis’ and did not single out any particular conflict nor specify the prevailing circumstances on its territory at the time. The Republic of Mali extended the scope of the referral to the entire territory (‘la situation au Mali depuis le mois de Janvier 2012’) but specified further in the referral the geographical area (‘Nord du territoire’) and the nature of the crimes which appeared to have been committed, thus allowing to identify or narrow down the pertinent factual contours of the ‘situation’. And on the other end of the spectrum, the Union of the Comoros described in a detailed manner the incidents involving the Gaza Freedom Flotilla for which it sought the Court’s intervention. Interestingly, it was in relation to the most detailed referral of the Union of the Comoros that the Prosecutor requested clarifications. One may argue, however, that this became necessary because of the way in which the Union of the Comoros had presented its referral and not because the incidents had been described specifically.

- 31 To date, the former and present Prosecutors have not dismissed any referral instrument outright. Rather, any shortcomings or ambiguities were cured by way of interpretation⁹⁸ or the seeking of further clarifications from the referring State.⁹⁹ Limitations to the States’ freedom in framing the ‘situation’ is given by PTC I in the context of the Mbarushimana case:

‘The Statute cannot be interpreted as permitting a State to permanently abdicate its responsibilities by referring a wholesale of present and future criminal activities comprising the whole of its territory, without any limitation whether in context or duration. Such an interpretation would be inconsistent with the proper functioning of the principle of complementarity.’¹⁰⁰

- 32 The scope of the situation is also important in the context of case selection. As highlighted by PTC I, ‘it is only within the boundaries of the situation (...) for which the jurisdiction of the Court was activated that subsequent prosecutions can be initiated’.¹⁰¹ In other words, a case cannot exceed the parameters of a referred situation under investigation. This question became a live issue for the first time in the Mbarushimana case. More specifically, it was, inter alia, the temporal occurrence of the crimes for which Callixte Mbarushimana was prosecuted that intrigued the Chamber to enquire whether or not they were covered by the referred situation (‘situation qui se déroule dans mon pays depuis le 1^{er} juillet 2002’).
- 33 In August 2010, the Prosecutor requested the issuance of a warrant of arrest for Callixte Mbarushimana (article 58) who was believed to bear criminal responsibility for the commission of crimes against humanity and war crimes committed by a particular armed group in the Kivu provinces of the DRC since early 2009. Before issuing the warrant of arrest, the Chamber requested further clarifications: leaving behind a literal reading of articles 13(a) and 14, the Judges accepted that the ‘the subject-matter of the referral consists of events that either occurred before or are still ongoing at the time of its submission to the Prosecutor’ (emphasis added).¹⁰² Considering however the time lapse between the submission of the DRC referral and the events described in the article 58 application, the Prosecutor was requested to explain ‘in what manner and to what extent such events [i.e. those presented in the article 58 application] are linked to the situation of crisis that triggered the DRC investigation’ (emphasis added).¹⁰³

⁹⁸ See the referral of the Republic of Uganda.

⁹⁹ See the referral of the Union of the Comoros.

¹⁰⁰ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the ‘Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court’, PTC I, 26 October 2011, para. 21 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/864f9b/>).

¹⁰¹ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Callixte Mbarushimana, PTC I, 28 September 2010, para. 6 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/04d4fa/>).

¹⁰² Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-575, Decision requesting clarification on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, PTC I, 6 September 2010, para. 6 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b63d59/>). In interpreting the component ‘one or more crimes (...) appear to have been committed’ in article 14, the Chamber read the provision in context with article 53(1)(a) which requires that there is a ‘reasonable basis to believe that a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been or is being committed’ (emphasis added).

¹⁰³ Ibid., para. 11.

Following the observations of the Prosecutor, the Chamber rendered its decision on the warrant of arrest on 28 September 2010 in which it first addressed, as a matter of jurisdiction, whether the case fell within the DRC situation as encompassed by the referral. The Judges commenced their enquiry by noting the wide geographical ('dans mon pays') and temporal ('qui se déroule... depuis le 1^{er} juillet 2002') parameters set out in the DRC referral letter. They then proceeded to analyze the temporal limits of the 'situation' by using the test they previously had developed with a view to ascertaining the nexus between the events for which Mbarushimana was prosecuted and the events which prompted the DRC to refer the 'situation' to the Court:

'The Prosecutor's Application refers to crimes allegedly committed between January 2009 and the date of the application, within the context of an armed conflict in the Kivu Provinces, DRC. In the view of the Chamber, for the case at hand not to exceed the parameters defining the DRC situation under investigation, the crimes referred to in the Prosecutor's Application must have occurred in the context of the ongoing situation of crisis that triggered the jurisdiction of the Court through the above mentioned referral. In the view of the Chamber, it is only within the boundaries of the situation of crisis for which the jurisdiction of the Court was activated that subsequent prosecutions can be initiated. Such a situation can include not only crimes that had already been or were being committed at the time of the referral, but also crimes committed after that time, in so far as they are sufficiently linked to the situation of crisis referred to the Court as ongoing at the time of the referral (emphasis added).'¹⁰⁴

Having analysed the information provided by the Prosecutor, the Chamber found that the relevant armed group associated with Mbarushimana was involved in the commission of crimes in the East of the DRC, in particular the South Kivu province, already around the time of the referral. As a result, the Judges accepted 'on a prima facie basis' that the case fell 'within the context of the DRC situation of crisis encompassed by the referral' and issued a warrant of arrest for Mbarushimana.¹⁰⁵

Subsequently, the Defense lodged a challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court which was rejected by the Chamber.¹⁰⁶ In response to the Defense argument that the Prosecutor had not proven that the armed group associated with Mbarushimana had committed crimes prior to the lodging of the DRC referral, the Chamber reiterated that crimes committed after the lodging of the referral would fall within the jurisdiction of the Court provided they were linked to the situation of crisis: 'It is the existence, or non-existence, of such link, and not the particular timing of the events underlying an alleged crime, that is critical in determining whether that crime may or may not fall within the scope of the referral'.¹⁰⁷

The 'situational linkage' jurisprudence, as proposed in the Mbarushimana case, was later noted by PTC III in the context of its authorization of the commencement of the Prosecutor's proprio motu investigation into the situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire.¹⁰⁸ In a decision dated 3 November 2011, the Majority of PTC III authorized the commencement of the investigation in relation to crimes committed as of 28 November 2010, extending it to any 'continuing crimes' past the date of the Prosecutor's article 15 application.¹⁰⁹ In a ¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Callixte Mbarushimana, PTC I, 28 September 2010, para. 6 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/04d4fa/>).

¹⁰⁵ Ibid., para. 7.

¹⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, Decision on the 'Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court', PTC I, 26 October 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/864f9b/>).

¹⁰⁷ Ibid., para. 41. For an analysis of the Chamber's jurisprudence on this point, see Rastan (2012) CLF 1; Bitti (2010) 4 RSC 959.

¹⁰⁸ The Republic of Côte d'Ivoire had lodged ad hoc declarations under article 12(3) and former Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo decided to trigger the Court's jurisdiction by activating his proprio motu powers under article 15.

¹⁰⁹ A corrigendum of this decision was filed on 15 November 2011, see Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', PCT III, 15 November 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>); the dissenting opinion is registered under ICC-02/11-15-Corr, Corrisecond decision, the Chamber extended the temporal scope of its authorization to crimes committed as of 19 September 2002 until 28 November 2010.¹¹⁰ The procedural framework is, of course, different; but one point may be useful for the purpose of our discussion: unlike PTC I, the Majority Judges of PTC III in their first authorization decision do not adopt the ‘situation of crisis’ term as their own but rather offer some objective criteria according to which the nexus between the crimes and the overall ‘situation’ is established.

‘Thus, the crimes that may be committed after the date of the Prosecutor’s application will be covered by any authorization, insofar as the contextual elements of the continuing crimes are the same as for those committed prior to [the lodging of the Prosecutor’s article 15 application]. They must, at least in a broad sense, involve the same actors and have been committed within the context of either the same attacks (crimes against humanity) or the same conflict (war crimes). Therefore, if the authorization is granted, it will include the investigation of any ongoing and continuing crimes that may be committed after [the lodging of the Prosecutor’s article 15 application] as part of the ongoing situation’. (emphasis added)¹¹¹

- 35 The Prosecutor seems to have accepted the Mbarushimana formula and applied it in the context of the CAR II referral. It is recalled that the first referral of the CAR encompassed crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court ‘committed anywhere on the territory of the CAR since 1 July 2002’.¹¹² Hence, one could have argued that this referral gave the Prosecutor the basis to investigate also the events since September 2012. Yet, in her Article 53(1) Report, following the second referral of the CAR, Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda explained that the second referral constituted

‘a new situation unrelated to the “situation of crisis” previously referred to the ICC by the CAR authorities in December 2004.

Although certain individuals may have played roles in both of these differing situations, a distinction between the two periods is apparent both with regard to the armed groups involved, and the political context of the events. The previous situation in the CAR, which began in 2002, involved armed groups which originated from the north-western region of the country and at least one armed group from the Democratic Republic of the Congo (“DRC”). In contrast, the roots of the recent situation can be traced to the armed groups which emerged in the north-east of the country in 2007, notably the Union des forces démocratiques pour le rassemblement (Union of Democratic Forces for Unity, “UFDR”). The emergence of these armed groups can be linked in particular to the weakness of state authority in the north-east. The group included fighters from that region and from the neighbouring states of Chad and Sudan. These groups evolved into the Séléka coalition which from 2012 onwards progressively gained control of territory and eventually overthrew the Government.

The above-mentioned factors contributed to the Office’s conclusion that the serious allegations of crimes potentially falling within the jurisdiction of the ICC and committed since August 2012 constituted a new situation.’¹¹³ gendum to Judge Fernández de Gurmendi’s separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, 5 October 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/eb8724/>).

¹¹⁰ Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-36, Decision on the ‘Prosecution’s provision of further information regarding potentially relevant crimes committed between 2002 and 2010’, PTC III, 22 February 2012 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/de6177/>).

¹¹¹ Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to ‘Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire’, PTC III, 15 November 2011, para. 179 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>). In the Chamber’s second authorization decision delivered on 22 February 2012, however, these criteria were not stipulated again. For an analysis of the Chamber’s authorization decisions, see Rastan (2012) CLF 1. Likewise, PTC II, in the Mudacumura case (which shares great similarities with the Mbarushimana case) did not make explicit reference to the concept of ‘situation of crisis’ but offers the formula that the crimes ‘are sufficiently linked to the situation which initially triggered the referral to the Court’, see Prosecutor v. Sylvestre Mudacumura, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application under Article 58, PTC II, 13 July 2012, para. 14 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ecfae0/>).

¹¹² See, mn 15.

¹¹³ OTP, Situation in the Central African Republic II. Article 53(1) Report, 24 September 2014, 15–16, paras 9 and 10.

3. ‘for the purpose of determining...’

As noted earlier, by means of the referral the State Party neither instructs the Prosecutor to 36 open an investigation nor limits the Prosecutor’s future prosecutorial choices; rather, the State requests the Prosecutor to investigate the ‘situation’, i. e. the conflict scenario ‘in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed’, ‘for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with the commission of such crimes’. Upon taking an affirmative decision under article 53(1), the Prosecutor opens an investigation into the ‘situation’ with a view to identifying, amidst a plurality of individuals and events, specific perpetrators and specific incidents during which one or more article 5 crimes seem to have been committed.¹¹⁴

‘At any time after the initiation of the investigation’,¹¹⁵ the Prosecutor shall approach the 37
PTC with an application for the issuance of a warrant of arrest or summons to appear if there are ‘reasonable grounds to believe’ that the person identified has committed one or more crimes falling under the jurisdiction of the Court (article 58(1) and (7)). As of the moment the warrant of arrest or summons to appear has been issued by the competent PTC, proceedings in relation to a particular ‘case’ commence, which run in parallel to those related to the ‘situation’; both proceedings are conducted before the same PTC. As PTC I explained on 17 January 2006:

‘The Chamber considers that the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Regulations of the Court draw a distinction between situations and cases in terms of the different kinds of proceedings, initiated by any organ of the Court, that they entail. (...) Situations, which are generally defined in terms of temporal, territorial and in some cases personal parameters, such as the situation in the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo since 1 July 2002, entail the proceedings envisaged in the Statute to determine whether a particular situation should give rise to a criminal investigation (...) as well as the investigation as such. Cases, which comprise specific incidents during which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court seem to have been committed by one or more identified suspects, entail proceedings that take place after the issuance of a warrant of arrest or summons to appear.’¹¹⁶

II. Paragraph 2

As far as possible, a referral shall specify the relevant circumstances and be accompanied by 38 such supporting documentation as is available to the State referring the situation’. A similar provision is included throughout the preparatory process in the draft article dealing with State complaints.¹¹⁷ The only change made during the Diplomatic Conference was to adjust the language to referral of situations as opposed to complaints relating to specific crimes.

The provision has, in general, attracted little attention. The only comment we wish to recall, which was made shortly before the Rome Conference, is that it should not ‘become the basis for declaring that the court lacks jurisdiction or that cases investigated are inadmissible because the referral did not submit all the information the state could have with more diligence’.¹¹⁸

¹¹⁴ ‘L’enquête ouverte dans la situation que l’on peut qualifier “d’enquête-mère” va donc donner naissance à des enquêtes dans des affaires, que l’on peut qualifier “d’enquêtes-filles”, enquêtes à géométrie variable qui peuvent coexister pendant de nombreuses années’, Biti, in: Statut de Rome de la Cour pénale internationale. Commentaire article par article (2012) 1183.

¹¹⁵ Article 58(1).

¹¹⁶ See, for example, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, No. ICC-01/04-101-tEN-Corr, Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, PTC I, 17 January 2006, para. 65 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2fe2fc/>). The definitions of ‘situation’ and ‘case’ have been embraced and referred to by all PTCs ever since. For a vivid description, see Olásolo, The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court (2005).

¹¹⁷ See article 25 para. 3 of the ILC’s Draft and article 25 of the Preparatory Committee’s 1997 Draft (which became article 45 in the Zutphen Draft and article 11 of the Draft presented to the Diplomatic Conference).

¹¹⁸ Amnesty International (1997) AI Index IOR 40/001/97 34, note 17.

- 39 Together with or following the submission of the referral instrument, States Parties regularly provided the Prosecutor with a report/memorandum and other supporting material on the crimes for which the State sought the Court's intervention.¹¹⁹

¹¹⁹ For more information, see the referral letters of, for example, the Republic of Mali, the Union of the Comoros and the Central African Republic (CAR II).

Article 15 Prosecutor

1. The Prosecutor may initiate investigations proprio motu on the basis of information on crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court.

2. The Prosecutor shall analyse the seriousness of the information received. For this purpose, he or she may seek additional information from States, organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental or non- governmental organizations, or other reliable sources that he or she deems appropriate, and may receive written or oral testimony at the seat of the Court.

3. If the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation, he or she shall submit to the Pre-Trial Chamber a request for authorization of an investigation, together with any supporting material collected. Victims may make representations to the Pre-Trial Chamber, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

4. If the Pre-Trial Chamber, upon examination of the request and the supporting material, considers that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation, and that the case appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court, it shall authorize the commencement of the investigation, without prejudice to subsequent determinations by the Court with regard to the jurisdiction and admissibility of a case.

5. The refusal of the Pre-Trial Chamber to authorize the investigation shall not preclude the presentation of a subsequent request by the Prosecutor based on new facts or evidence regarding the same situation.

6. If, after the preliminary examination referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2, the Prosecutor concludes that the information provided does not constitute a reasonable basis for an investigation, he or she shall inform those who provided the information. This shall not preclude the Prosecutor from considering further information submitted to him or her regarding the same situation in the light of new facts or evidence.

Literature: Jones, J.R.W.D., 'The Office of the Prosecutor', in: A. Cassese et al., The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (2002) 269.

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements.....	8
I. Paragraph 1.....	8
1. 'may initiate'.....	9
2. 'investigations'.....	10
3. 'proprio motu'.....	11
4. 'on the basis of information'.....	12
II. Paragraph 2.....	13
1. First sentence.....	13
2. Second sentence.....	14
III. Paragraph 3.....	20
1. 'reasonable basis'.....	21
2. 'proceed with an investigation'.....	23
3. 'shall'.....	24
4. 'supporting material'.....	25
5. Victim representations.....	27
IV. Paragraph 4.....	29
V. Paragraph 5.....	33
VI. Paragraph 6.....	34
1. First sentence.....	34
2. Second sentence.....	37

A. Introduction/General remarks

- 1 Article 15 of the Statute lays down the procedure for initiating investigations by the Prosecutor acting on his or her own motion (proprio motu). It should be read in conjunction with article 13 para. c which provides for three ways of ‘triggering’ the Court’s jurisdiction: by State Party referral, by Security Council referral or by the Prosecutor’s initiation of an investigation ‘in accordance with article 15’. The ability of the ICC Prosecutor to initiate investigations proprio motu was the most controversial aspect of the Court’s trigger mechanism and was one of the main political/legal issues that had to be resolved before the Statute could be assured of adoption. Both opponents and proponents of the Prosecutor’s proprio motu power – and the chasm was very wide – agreed that its inclusion or absence would fundamentally affect the Court’s structure and functioning. The idea was considered so radical at the start of the ICC process that the ILC had not even provided for it in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute¹. In fact, the commentary to the ILC Draft Statute mentions that only one member of the Commission suggested that the Prosecutor should be able to initiate an investigation in the absence of a complaint. Other members felt that investigations and prosecutions should not be undertaken without State Party or Security Council support, ‘at least not at the present stage of development of the international legal system’².
- 2 Debates within the Ad Hoc Committee held in 1995 disproved the ILC’s view. Many delegations supported an enhanced role for the Prosecutor who, it was said, should be able to work on behalf of the international community rather than just on behalf of a State Party or the Security Council³. The poor record of the state complaint mechanism within the human rights treaty system and the fortunate competence of the Prosecutor of the ICTY/R were also used to buttress the cause of expanded prosecutorial powers⁴. The opposing view was that the lack of a State Party or Security Council referral should be taken to mean that a crime was not of international concern. There should, therefore, be no reason for the Prosecutor to act on his or her own motion⁵.
- 3 The 1996 Preparatory Committee debates continued to mirror, and further elaborate, the two basically different positions with respect to proprio motu power⁶. The March–April 1996 Preparatory Committee session was, however, important, because it was at this meeting that the idea of judicial review of proprio motu proceedings was introduced⁷. It was suggested that a case initiated by the Prosecutor be submitted to a chamber of the Court which would, upon a hearing, decide whether it should be pursued or discontinued. The proceedings would be in camera and confidential in order to prevent publicity and to protect the ‘interest of the States’⁸. Interestingly enough, the proposal on judicial review as a mechanism that would prevent abuse of prosecutorial discretion was not inserted in the compilation of specific drafting proposals issued after the completion of the Preparatory Committee’s work. The text adopted⁹ simply reproduced the corresponding articles of the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR, which read:

¹ 1994 ILC Draft Statute (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/17ad09/>).

² Id., p. 90.

³ See Ad Hoc Committee Report, p. 26 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b50da8/>).

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 35 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e75432/>).

⁷ See ibid., Draft Summary, Trigger Mechanism, UN Doc. A/AC.249/CRP.5, pp. 8–9 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bee01c/>). Pursuant to the Draft Summary, judicial review was to be applied not only when proceedings were initiated by the Prosecutor, but also when a complaint was ‘lodged by a state or an individual’. The notion that State Party initiated proceedings needed pre-investigation judicial review was abandoned and the idea that individuals could be a separate trigger mechanism never had any serious support.

⁸ Ibid., p. 9.

⁹ See 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 109 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/03b284/>).

The Prosecutor shall initiate investigations ex-officio or on the basis of information obtained from any source, particularly from Governments, United Nations organs, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations. The Prosecutor shall assess the information received or obtained and decide whether there is sufficient basis to proceed¹⁰.

The August 1997 Preparatory Committee session did not add very much to the proposal already on the table with respect to proprio motu power¹¹. The provisions included in the Committee's report reflected attempts to either narrow the sources of information which could serve as a basis for prosecutorial action or to expand them¹². It should be understood that the idea of proprio motu powers as such was still contested and not assured of majority support¹³.

By the time the last Preparatory Committee session was held in March-April 1998, it was clear that there were still two solid positions on the issue of proprio motu power to initiate investigations. The first group of states – primarily the so-called 'like-minded' ones – were of the view that the Court must have an independent Prosecutor if it was to be effective in punishing and deterring serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. Their rationale was that without a proprio motu power, the Court would be prevented from acting in situations where, for political or other reasons, neither a State Party nor the Security Council were able or willing to initiate proceedings. These delegations believed that the Prosecutor should have independent authority to trigger the Court's jurisdiction, which means that the first judicial check on prosecutorial action would coincide with the confirmation of an indictment¹⁴. The second group of delegations based their opposition to prosecutorial independence on concerns about the risks of politically motivated or frivolous proprio motu proceedings. They interpreted prosecutorial independence to mean that the Prosecutor should have full freedom to decide whom to investigate once the Court's jurisdiction was triggered by a State Party or the Security Council, but that the Prosecutor should not be granted a separate, proprio motu, triggering power¹⁵.

Given the depth of opposition to an independent Prosecutor it became clear that the fears of States belonging to the second group would have to be addressed by means of additional checks on prosecutorial power if the proposition of a proprio motu Prosecutor was to stand any chance of success. A compromise solution, that provided the basis for what eventually became article 15 of the Rome Statute, was introduced, interestingly in retrospect, by Argentina and Germany in March 1998¹⁶. The proposal laid out some sources that could submit information on the alleged commission of a crime to the Prosecutor and the Prosecutor's right to seek additional information from other sources. Most importantly, it obliged the Prosecutor to seek authorisation from the Pre-Trial Chamber before proceeding with an investigation on his or her initiative, thus introducing early judicial review of ¹⁰ Ibid., article 25 (2*quat*); ICTY Statute, article 18 para. 1; and ICTR Statute, article 17 para. 1.

¹¹ See Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 9, article 25*bis* (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/11411b/>). It was at this session that the term proprio motu, which eventually prevailed, was introduced into the Draft Statute.

¹² The relevant text reads:

'[Article 25*bis* Prosecutor
The Prosecutor [may] [shall] initiate investigations [ex officio] [proprio motu] [or] on the basis of information [obtained] [he may seek] from any source, in particular from Governments, United Nations organs [and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations]. The Prosecutor shall assess the information received or obtained and decide whether there is sufficient basis to proceed. [The Prosecutor may, for the purpose of initiating an investigation, receive information on alleged crimes under article 20 (a) to (d) from Governments, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, victims and associations representing them, or other reliable sources]. The entire article was in brackets, signifying lack of agreement about its inclusion in the Draft Statute.'

¹³ Article 25*bis* was reproduced without change, although renumbered article 46, in the Zutphen Draft, p. 86.

¹⁴ The term indictment was abandoned in later drafting work, so the Statute, as finally adopted, refers to the confirmation of 'charges'. See, e.g., article 61.

¹⁵ See CICC Report on the March-April 1998 session of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, NGO Coalition for an International Criminal Court (1998), pp. 23–24 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef5a84/>).

¹⁶ See Proposal submitted by Argentina and Germany, article 46, Information submitted to the Prosecutor, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.4/DP.35 (25 March 1998) (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/896cf4/>).

proceedings initiated on the Prosecutor's own motion. That proved decisive. The text also specified the criteria which would guide the Pre-Trial Chamber in authorising the commencement of an investigation: First, the Pre-Trial Chamber would have to conclude, based on the Prosecutor's request and on the accompanying material, that there is 'a reasonable basis to proceed'. Second, the Chamber would have to assess that the case 'appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court'. Third, the Pre-Trial Chamber would have to have 'regard' for the Draft Statute's provisions on admissibility.

The major part of article 15 of the Statute is identical to the Argentine-German proposal, except that it leaves out the Pre-Trial Chamber's duty to take issues of admissibility into account when authorising the start of an investigation. Both the initial proposal and article 15 do, however, provide that authorisation shall be without prejudice to subsequent determinations by the Court as to the jurisdiction and admissibility of a case.

The joint proposal was well received at the March-April 1998 Preparatory Committee session and proved important to the acceptance of a Prosecutor with proprio motu power. It was reproduced, with no changes, in the Draft ICC Statute that was submitted to the Diplomatic Conference¹⁷.

- 6 While opening statements in the plenary session of the Conference showed majority support for the proposition that the Prosecutor should be able to trigger the Court's jurisdiction¹⁸, it was uncertain until the very end whether proprio motu power – even with the additional safeguard of the Pre-Trial Chamber – would survive. Of the several key issues that were at the heart of the compromise on which the Statute rests, the retention of an independent role for the Prosecutor seemed the most tenuous¹⁹. The uncertain outcome of the debate on prosecutorial independence²⁰ was reflected in the first of two Bureau papers, issued on 6 July 1998, the aim of which was to narrow down drafting options on the major issues of the Statute. The paper provided for two possibilities: the inclusion of a proprio motu power along with Pre-Trial Chamber supervision or the omission of the corresponding article from the Draft Statute²¹. Numerically, at least, the tide seemed to turn after a Committee of the Whole debate showed that the majority of delegations favoured the retention of a proprio motu power²². The second Bureau paper provided for only two options: keeping a proprio motu triggering role for the Prosecutor as already described or keeping it and adding further safeguards before the Prosecutor can act²³. As evidenced by article 15, the first option prevailed.

¹⁷ See Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, article 13 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/66f2fb/>). The Draft Statute still contained article 12 as well (formerly numbered 46 and 25bis). Articles 12 and 13 obviously overlapped in content and contained different terms ['sufficient basis' (article 12) and 'reasonable basis' (article 13)] to describe the point at which the Prosecutor would determine that he or she should proceed with an investigation.

¹⁸ See NGO Coalition Trigger Mechanisms and Admissibility Team, Draft Summary of Country Positions on articles 10–20 based on Opening Statements, 22 June 1998 (on file with authors).

¹⁹ Certain delegates told the authors privately in Rome that proprio motu powers were being used as a bargaining chip in finalising the 'package' and that an independent role for the Prosecutor might be entirely omitted from the Statute.

²⁰ An especially strong stand against proprio motu powers was enunciated in a speech delivered on behalf of the US delegation. See 'The Concerns of the United States Regarding the Proposal for a Proprio Motu Prosecutor', 22 June 1998 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6dae4d/>). For an NGO rebuttal of US claims, see Lawyers Committee for Human Rights: 'Response to US Concerns Regarding the Proposal for a Proprio Motu Prosecutor', 24 June 1998 (on file with authors).

²¹ See Bureau Discussion Paper, Part 2, Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (1998), pp. 16–17 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/30dcec/>). This document merged what were previously articles 12 and 13 into a single article – 12 – entitled 'Prosecutor', thus eliminating the already mentioned textual overlap. It also introduced the breakdown of paragraphs that was adopted for article 15. The final text of article 15 further streamlined the wording, particularly of article 12 para. 1.

²² See The Numbers: NGO Coalition Special Report on Country Positions, CICC Monitor, 10 July 1998. According to the Report, 76 percent of delegations that participated in the Committee of the Whole debate supported proprio motu powers (61 states in favour, 19 against) (on file with authors).

²³ See Bureau Proposal, Part 2, Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law, UN Doc. A/CONF. 183/C.1/L.59 (1998), pp. 14–15 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3a3c70/>).

It is a sign of the developing nature of international law that a proprio motu power was included in the Statute despite the ILC's initial rejection of the idea. On the other hand, it is clear that the international community was unwilling, at this stage of the evolution of international law, to model the ICC Prosecutor after prosecutors in national criminal justice systems. The insertion of Pre-Trial Chamber authorisation for the commencement of proprio motu investigations is proof of that reluctance. This comes as no surprise. It is true that Pre-Trial Chamber review is not the only check on prosecutorial discretion provided for in the Statute. Other safeguards against potential abuse of power may be found, for example, in the admissibility provisions, in the thresholds on definitions of crimes within the Court's jurisdiction and in the criteria laid down for election of the Prosecutor. An additional obstacle to unwarranted prosecutorial activism is judicial confirmation of charges against persons suspected of crimes within the Court's jurisdiction. Finally, the restrictions on the Court's exercise of jurisdiction and possible Security Council deferral of an investigation or prosecution also provide checks on proceedings initiated proprio motu.

Nevertheless, it came as a surprise to many that States were willing to accept an independent international prosecutor who can freely conduct preliminary examination of allegations of core international crimes and make public statements about such activities. An international prosecutor is not a part of an executive in the way national prosecutors are, nor does he or she relate to public interest in the same manner. It is clear that the role given to the Pre-Trial Chamber as the authoriser of Prosecutor-initiated investigations was the decisive factor for many States. The Pre-Trial Chamber represents the inherent constitutional check on the Prosecutor which some States required in order to accept a proprio motu power to initiate investigations. This makes the practice of the Prosecutor pursuant to articles 13 para. c and 15 and his or her general approach towards the Pre-Trial Chamber vital for the way some States perceive the Court.

The Prosecutor did not actually invoke article 15 until November 2009, in an application to initiate an investigation with respect to the post-election violence in Kenya.²⁴ On 23 June 2011, the Prosecutor filed his request for authorization from the Pre-Trial Chamber to commence an investigation into crimes allegedly committed during the post election violence in Côte d'Ivoire since November 2010.²⁵ Authorizations were made by the Pre-Trial Chamber in both situations.²⁶

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

Article 15 para. 1 states the basic principle that the Prosecutor may initiate investigations on his or her own motion on the basis of information on crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. The inclusion of this principle in the Statute facilitated the adoption of article 13 para. c, which provides that the Court's jurisdiction may be exercised over relevant crimes if the Prosecutor has initiated an investigation in respect of such crimes in accordance with article 15. Adequate familiarity with article 15 is, therefore, necessary for a proper understanding of the mechanisms for the activation of the Court’s jurisdiction contained in article 13. Moreover, article 15 has been referred to as the ultimate expression of prosecutorial independence in the Statute and hailed as one of its great achievements. At the same time it has been invoked in criticism of the Statute as an example of its alleged jurisdictional overreach. Both approaches amount to erroneous representations of the reality of the Statute’s jurisdictional regime.

²⁴ Situation in Kenya, No. ICC-01/09-3, Request for Authorization of an Investigation pursuant to Article 15, 26 November 2009 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c63dcc/>).

²⁵ Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-3, Request for authorization for an investigation pursuant to article 15, 23 June 2011 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1b1939/>).

²⁶ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, No. ICC-01/09-19, Decision pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>); Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-14, Decision pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 3 October 2011 (<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7a6c19/>).

1. ‘may initiate’

- 9 It is no coincidence that article 15 uses both the term ‘may’ and the term ‘initiate’. The Prosecutor’s initiation right is unconditional and discretionary, but carefully balanced by the need for authorisation by a Pre-Trial Chamber. It is activated through the Prosecutor’s own motion, and not through other parties such as States or the Security Council. Article 15 para. 1 refers to ‘initiate’, not start. This is an important distinction which critics of the Court sometimes fail to point out. The Prosecutor can not start investigations on his own motion.

States were not prepared to accept such a power for the Prosecutor.

The Prosecutor is empowered to take certain initial steps to obtain and analyse information with a view to determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an actual investigation, as elaborated by article 15 paras. 2 and 3. Article 15 does not itself provide guidance for the exercise of the Prosecutor’s discretion in the same way as, for example, article 53 para. 1 does. The link between articles 15 and 53 has been established by Rule 48 of Rules of Procedure and Evidence, which provides that in determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation under article 15 para. 3, the Prosecutor shall consider the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1(a) to (c). The power to initiate investigations under article 15 para. 1 would seem to reflect a notion of prosecutorial independence, which again seeks support in the fundamental interest of impartial justice. There is no unequivocal notion of prosecutorial independence in international criminal law and justice. Actors in international criminal justice will have different views on the scope of the notion. But it is clear that the exercise of the discretion to initiate an investigation may not be arbitrary. Not only is the discretion carefully framed by narrow jurisdictional parameters. Its actual exercise must be guided by the principle reflected in article 1’s emphasis on ‘the most serious crimes of international concern’. It is the seriousness of the alleged crimes that must lead the Prosecutor’s exercise of discretion under article 15 para. 1. Herein lies some protection against the application of double standards in the Prosecutor’s selection of crimes to target, as well as a part of the defence against frivolous or politically motivated charges built into the Statute.

2. ‘investigations’

- 10 Paragraph 1 uses the word ‘investigations’. This should not be misconstrued. Paragraph 6 of article 15 refers to ‘the preliminary examination referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2’ (emphasis added), an expression which more adequately captures the nature of the activities which the Prosecutor may undertake during the initiation phase. That is a helpful term. When initiating an investigation, the Prosecutor may take investigative steps such as those outlined in article 15 para. 2, but not conduct an actual investigation. The Prosecutor may conduct a preliminary examination to determine whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation. Only when the Pre-Trial Chamber has judicially approved a prosecutorial request to proceed may a full investigation be launched.

3. ‘proprio motu’

- 11 The expression ‘proprio motu’ should be understood as in one’s own motion. The point is that the Prosecutor may act on his or her own initiative, without any formal referral act or formal duty to initiate. This language goes to the core of articles 13 para. c and 15 insofar as it encapsulates the principle of prosecutorial independence, widely considered as one of the components of impartial justice. The decision to initiate an investigation would fall squarely within prosecutorial discretion or the equivalent in most national jurisdictions. It should be the norm, not the exception. The version of article 15 that emerged from the negotiation process was, however, reduced in scope and judicially curtailed in a way which may help to reduce State concerns – some of which are entirely legitimate – that the Prosecutor is not appropriately accountable. At the time this third edition was completed, such State concerns still persisted.

4. ‘on the basis of information’

The Prosecutor may not initiate an investigation without any basis in alleged facts. The Prosecutor must respond to information on crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court that has come into the possession of his or her Office. There is no requirement, however, that the information has come from a specific source. The source is irrelevant according to article 15 para. 1, as long as information is in the possession of the Office of the Prosecutor and the decision to initiate an investigation is based on such information. The Prosecutor is obliged to protect the confidentiality of all information submitted under article 15 paras. 1 and 2.²⁷

II. Paragraph 2

1. First sentence

The first sentence of paragraph 2 provides that the Prosecutor ‘shall analyse the seriousness of the information received’. Although ‘information received’ would primarily seem to refer to the information on which the decision to initiate investigations was made pursuant to paragraph 1, the term would also apply to information which the Office of the Prosecutor receives after the decision has been made to start a preliminary examination. It would seem that all incoming information is covered by ‘information received’. In its early practice the Office of the Prosecutor has chosen to use the term ‘communication’ to describe the initial material received.

The use of the word ‘shall’ makes it clear that this is a binding obligation on the Prosecutor. It is essential that information submitted to the Prosecutor be properly considered, both as a matter of basic prosecutorial professionalism and in order to maintain confidence in the Office of the Prosecutor, without which it will gradually become difficult to prepare and prosecute cases, especially all those that depend on witness testimony.

The extent of consideration required is described as ‘analyse’, which would seem to point to sufficient attention by a qualified member of the Office of the Prosecutor with a view to assessing the seriousness of the information at hand.

The theme of the analysis is ‘seriousness’, a purely evidentiary test, as opposed to one of appropriateness. The seriousness of the information may both concern the nature of the alleged crimes and the strength of the incrimination contained in the information.

2. Second sentence

The second sentence of paragraph 2 refers to the preceding sentence and depends to a certain extent on it for its correct interpretation. The Prosecutor may, for the purpose of analysing the seriousness of the information received, ‘seek additional information from States, organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental or non-governmental organizations, or other reliable sources that he or she deems appropriate, and may receive written or oral testimony at the seat of the Court’ (emphasis added). This provision authorises the Prosecutor to take investigative steps in the course of the preliminary examination, thus seeking information additional to that on which the decision to initiate an investigation was based. The investigative steps must be taken for the purpose of analysing the seriousness of the information received. The object must be to obtain additional information which will shed more light on the alleged criminal conduct and the responsibility for it. An initial allegation will normally be insufficient for the Prosecutor to make a balanced, professional judgement of whether to proceed to the Pre-Trial Chamber with a request for a full investigation. Many negotiating States were clearly concerned that it should not be possible for the Prosecutor to act prematurely, on an inadequate basis. Paragraph 2 places the obligation on the Prosecutor to properly consider the material received and grants the power to seek further information when necessary.

²⁷ Rule 46 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

- 15 The sources which the Prosecutor may turn to for further information must be 'reliable'. Paragraph 2 mentions the examples of States, organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental and non-governmental organisations, but the use of the broad formulation 'other reliable sources' make it unnecessary to establish which sources would more specifically fall within the listed categories. Only the Prosecutor can determine whether or not a source is sufficiently reliable to be approached with a request to provide information on alleged criminal conduct to his or her Office. The provision does not provide guidance for the interpretation of the reliability standard, but simply refers to 'reliable sources that he or she deems appropriate'. Facing judicial scrutiny by the Pre-Trial Chamber of both his or her request to proceed to a full investigation and the supporting material, the Prosecutor will necessarily be concerned with the reliability of the information on the alleged criminal conduct. This will normally be the main concern of the Prosecutor when considering what is an appropriate source.
- 16 Receiving 'written or oral testimony at the seat of the Court' is a further investigative step that paragraph 2 provides for the Prosecutor's preliminary examination. Both written and oral testimony of the nature referred to here would be investigative steps that can be taken without any compulsory measures and will not necessarily require the consent of one or more States in order to be executed. The information may be an oral statement, a written account or documentary evidence. These are generally speaking practical sources of evidence in war crimes prosecutions, that can be very significant in specific cases, but at the same time the work of the ad hoc Tribunals shows that it is only in exceptional cases that a potential witness will find his or her own way to the seat of the Court. Paragraph 2 in fine does, however, empower the Prosecutor to facilitate such gathering of information more actively. The term 'seat of the Court' should include possible field offices and temporary arrangements which the Office of the Prosecutor of the permanent Court may establish and which may prove to be more accessible to witnesses relevant to the new situation which the Prosecutor is preliminarily examining. Rule 47 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence gives further guidance to the taking of testimony under article 15 para. 2.
- 17 The purpose of article 15 para. 2 would be defeated if one adopted an unnecessarily restrictive interpretation of the paragraph, suggesting that it is exhaustive in its listing of investigative steps which the Prosecutor may take during the preliminary examination. The Prosecutor's decision to request the Pre-Trial Chamber to authorise a full investigation must be well-founded and sound. States negotiating article 15 shared the concern that a prosecutorial power to initiate investigations proprio motu must not be allowed to lead to frivolous or politically motivated charges being advanced. Delegates were not only concerned with the rights of individuals who may be considered suspects at the preliminary stage. The mere fact that the Prosecutor requests authorisation from the Pre-Trial Chamber to fully investigate a situation contains the potential of what may be experienced as embarrassment by the Governments of the territorial State(s) and State(s) of nationality. In other words, there were obvious interests behind the current structure of article 15 para. 2 which allows for necessary investigative steps to be taken to ensure that the Prosecutor's conclusion on reasonable basis pursuant to paragraph 3 is well-founded.

In order to obtain further information, the Prosecutor in practice did not limit preliminary examination activities to his or her office in The Hague. Field missions were carried out by the Prosecutor, inter alia, in Colombia, Georgia, and Guinea.²⁸ The ability of the Prosecutor to seek out relevant information in places where the alleged crimes have taken place during the preliminary examination phase has also been explicitly spelled out in the OTP's policy paper.²⁹

If the Prosecutor were to be in doubt how far paragraph 2 goes, he or she could turn to the Pre-Trial Chamber for further guidance.

III. Paragraph 3

The situation where the Prosecutor concludes his or her preliminary examination pursuant to paragraphs 1 and 2 is the subject of paragraph 3. If the Prosecutor's conclusion is that 'there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation, he or she shall submit to the Pre-Trial Chamber a request for authorization of an investigation, together with any supporting material collected'. In other words, to continue the inquiry into alleged criminal conduct by means of a full investigation, the Prosecutor must submit an application for authorisation to the Pre-Trial Chamber with supporting material. In cases where the Court's jurisdiction is triggered through article 13 (c), this is the only way the Prosecutor can get from a preliminary examination to the stage of an actual investigation with the associated powers under article 54. When triggering is done pursuant to article 13 (a) or (b), article 15 does not apply and the Prosecutor proceeds directly to the article 53 stage. Rule 50 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence contains further guidance on the procedure for authorizations by the Pre-Trial Chamber.

1. 'reasonable basis'

The test against which the Prosecutor must make his or her determination is one of 'reasonable basis'. This is an evidentiary test, not one of appropriateness. Rule 48 provides that the Prosecutor 'shall consider the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1(a) to (c)' when determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed. It is clear that the phrase 'reasonable basis to proceed' is identical in both paragraphs 3 and 4 and in the chapeau of article 53, paragraph 1. These provisions, as noted by the pre-trial judges in the Kenya decision, 'prescribe the same standard to be considered both by the Prosecutor and the Pre-Trial Chamber'.³⁰ Although it is for the Prosecutor to determine what 'reasonable basis' means for the consideration of the information at hand, he or she knows that the Pre-Trial Chamber will apply the same test when it considers the Prosecutor's request pursuant to paragraph 4. The Prosecutor's conclusion cannot be arbitrary, but must be reasoned. He or she may not engage in a mere prediction of what the Pre-Trial Chamber will accept, but, rather, must exercise prosecutorial discretion independently by critically assessing the reliability of the information. In the situations of both Kenya and Côte d'Ivoire, the Prosecutor in reaching his conclusion examined each of the factors set out in article 53(1)(a)-(c), namely, jurisdiction, admissibility (including gravity), and interests of justice. A policy paper on preliminary examinations further spells out the Prosecutor's understanding of the requirements of a 'reasonable basis' test.³¹ Needless to say, the practice of the Pre-Trial Chamber is the key source for the determination of the more precise content of 'reasonable basis'.³²

²⁸ ASP, 'Report on the activities of the Court', ICC-ASP/12/28, 21 October 2013, paras. 72–74 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b22709/>).

²⁹ Office of the Prosecutor, 'Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations', November 2013, para. 85 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/acb906/>).

³⁰ Kenya (Pre-Trial Chamber II Decision), para 21.

³¹ Office of the Prosecutor (Policy Paper), p. 8–17.

³² Rule 48 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

- 22 The Prosecutor must also consider the reference to ‘the most serious crimes of international Concern’ in article 1. This language provides general guidance as to the nature of the conduct that may be subjected to investigation and prosecution by the Office of the Prosecutor. Paragraph 3, just as paragraph 4, aims in part at protecting the Court from frivolous or politically motivated charges. At the same time it is necessary to keep in mind that the ‘reasonable basis’ test is not one of beyond reasonable doubt, and all that is at stake in paragraphs 3 and 4 is whether the Prosecutor should be allowed to investigate a situation, not if one or more specific individuals should be liable to criminal responsibility and punishment. The test of a ‘reasonable basis’ does not rise to the level of ‘reasonable grounds’ in article 58 or ‘substantial grounds’ in article 61.

2. ‘proceed with an investigation’

- 23 Proceeding with an investigation is the natural step for the Prosecutor once the preliminary examination has reached the point where he or she concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed. By ‘investigation’ is meant a full investigation pursuant to articles 53 and 54, with the possibilities and limitations which those provisions entail. To ‘proceed’ with an investigation is to move from article 15 into the realm of article 53 and other provisions in Part 5 of the Statute. The Prosecutor is not requesting the Pre-Trial Chamber to start proper investigations immediately upon authorisation pursuant to paragraph 4. Article 53 applies regardless of how the Court’s jurisdiction has been triggered under article 13, also in the cases of prosecutorial initiation of investigations pursuant to articles 13 (c) and 15.

3. ‘shall’

- 24 The Prosecutor ‘shall’ submit a request for authorisation with supporting material to the Pre-Trial Chamber when he or she has concluded that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation. This is a binding obligation on the Prosecutor. He or she is not at liberty to exercise discretion in applying to the Chamber to proceed when he or she considers that there is a sufficient basis. One could take the position that Article 53, on the other hand, provides a further opening for prosecutorial discretion in this regard, by incorporating a consideration of interests of justice in the Prosecutor’s final determination of whether to actually proceed with an investigation following authorisation by the Pre-Trial Chamber. Although the precise relationship between articles 15 and 53 was far from clear to the negotiating delegations, it would be erroneous to suggest that the burden on the Prosecutor is lighter under article 15 than in the article 13 (a) and (b) situations. After the Rome Conference, Rule 48 of the Rules clarified that, in reaching a conclusion that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation, the Prosecutor must consider the same factors he or she assesses upon reception of a referral by a State or the Security Council, which are contained in Article 53, paragraph 1 (a) to (c). Article 53 ensures an equal prosecutorial burden in all triggering modes outlined in article 13. New circumstances may arise after the Pre-Trial Chamber has given its authorisation under article 15 para. 4 which further justifies the applicability of article 53 on articles 13 (c) and 15 situations.

4. ‘supporting material’

- 25 The ‘supporting material collected’ will primarily be material which the Office of the Prosecutor has gathered pursuant to article 15 para. 2. The use of the word ‘collected’ does not exclude the initial information which the Prosecutor received and on which the decision to initiate an investigation pursuant to paragraph 1 was made. The reference to ‘any’ material should not be misconstrued to mean any and all. That would defeat the purpose of the provision, which is to ensure that the Prosecutor’s request is sufficiently substantiated for the Pre-Trial Chamber to be able to apply the ‘reasonable basis’ test. The Prosecutor is obliged to forward as much supporting material as is required to show to the Chamber that his or her conclusion under paragraph 3 is well-founded and that the preliminary examination should proceed to a proper investigation.

Pre-Trial Chamber II noted in its decision on Kenya that, due to the limited powers the Prosecutor has during this preliminary phase, the information available to the Prosecutor is not expected to be ‘comprehensive’ or ‘conclusive’, compared to evidence gathered during the investigation.³³

5. Victim representations

It is clear from the discussion of paragraphs 1 and 2 above that the Prosecutor may receive information from victims. This is likely to be an important source for the Prosecutor also at the stage of preliminary examination, prior to the actual investigation, which will normally rely heavily on witness testimony. The value of the second sentence of paragraph 3 is that victims are entitled to make representations to the Pre-Trial Chamber as well, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Rules (see Rule 50). It is, of course, for the Prosecutor and Pre-Trial Chamber to determine the relevancy and weight of any information coming from victims.

In both situations of Kenya and Côte d’Ivoire, as soon as the Prosecutor informed the Presidency of his intention to make a request under article 15, paragraph 3 of the Statute to open an investigation proprio motu, the OTP published a notice on the ICC website informing the victims of those crimes to make representations to the ICC. Following the Prosecutor’s requests, the Pre-Trial Chamber directed the Victims Participation and Reparations Section (VPRS) to receive victims’ representations on the subject and summarize these representations into one consolidated report.³⁴ The reports produced by the VPRS played an important role in the Pre-Trial Chamber’s assessment of the Prosecutor’s requests. This can be seen from the Chamber’s extensive reference to these two reports in its decisions on both situations. Some information contained in the reports has been considered by the judges as being able to ‘corroborate the Prosecutor’s submissions.’³⁵

IV. Paragraph 4

Paragraph 4 regulates the Pre-Trial Chamber’s exercise of discretion in response to a request by the Prosecutor pursuant to paragraph 3. The power to authorise a full investigation rests with the Pre-Trial Chamber alone. Whilst the Prosecutor may decide to initiate an investigation, the authority to start a full investigation is the Pre-Trial Chamber’s prerogative. This is the sobering reality of the Statute, in contrast to the picture which some have tried to paint of an ICC Prosecutor with powers so far-reaching as to constitute a liability to the efficacy of the Court. The Prosecutor’s investigative autonomy pursuant to articles 13 (c) and 15 is clearly judicially curtailed.

More specifically, paragraph 4 empowers the judges to consider the Prosecutor’s request with supporting material against a reasonable basis standard and the jurisdictional threshold of the Statute, with a view to authorising the commencement of the investigation. On first appearance, by including a cumulative two-fold test, paragraph 4 goes beyond paragraph 3 which only includes the same test of ‘reasonable basis’. This, however, does not necessarily ³³ Kenya (Pre-Trial Chamber II Decision), note 26, para. 27.

³⁴ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, No. ICC-01/09-4, Order to the Victims Participation and Reparations Section Concerning Victims’ Representations Pursuant to Article 15(3) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 10 December 2009, para. 9 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/908205/>); Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-6, Order to the Victims Participation and Reparations Section Concerning Victims’ Representations Pursuant to Article 15(3) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber III, 6 July 2011, para. 9 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/45f4fd/>).

³⁵ See for example Kenya (Pre-Trial Chamber II Decision), note 26, para. 196.

suggest a double standard between these two paragraphs. The Pre-Trial Chamber in its decision on Kenya noted that ‘there is a degree of redundancy in article 15(4) of the Statute insofar as the first requirement necessitates assessment of a ‘reasonable basis to proceed’ under article 53(1)(a) of the Statute and the second requirement equally prescribed assessment of whether ‘the case appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court’’.³⁶ As such, in the view of the pre-trial judges, a review of article 53 paragraphs (1)(a)-(1)(c) would make it unnecessary for the Chamber to duplicate its assessment of jurisdiction under article 15(4) of the Statute.³⁷ In any event, the reach of the expression ‘the jurisdiction of the Court’ under either this paragraph or article 53 paragraph (1)(a) is wide, insofar as it includes all of the Court’s jurisdictional requirements, not only the subject-matter jurisdiction. The requirement of article 12 that either the territorial State or a State of nationality of an alleged perpetrator has accepted the Court’s jurisdiction is an important distinguishing feature of the jurisdictional regime of the Court. Likewise, the Pre-Trial Chamber must not find that the Court’s jurisdiction is excluded because article 124 on temporary opt-out for the war crimes category applies, if the situation is to proceed to investigation. The pre-trial judges indeed held in practice that ‘an examination of the necessary jurisdiction prerequisites under the Statute must be undertaken’, which includes jurisdiction ratione materiae referred to by article 5, jurisdiction ratione temporis specified under article 11, and jurisdiction ratione personae embodied in article 12 of the Statute.³⁸

30 The Pre-Trial Chamber must not necessarily find that all jurisdictional requirements of the Statute are clearly satisfied. Paragraph 4 only requires that ‘the case appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court’ (emphasis added). The Chamber has full discretion in its determination of this appearance. It would seem that the purpose of paragraph 4 is not to require a thorough examination of this question at the preliminary stage of the process. The paragraph places an obligation on the Chamber to conduct an ‘examination of the request and the supporting material’. If there is no indication during this examination that the Court does not have jurisdiction over the case, the Pre-Trial Chamber should be able to conclude that ‘the case appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court’. Article 19 provides for further judicial consideration of the jurisdictional requirements. Article 15 para. 4 in fine points to this article when it states that the Pre-Trial Chamber’s jurisdictional finding pursuant to paragraph 4 will be ‘without prejudice to subsequent determinations by the Court with regard to the jurisdiction and admissibility of a case’.

31 Like in paragraph 3, the ‘reasonable basis’ standard in paragraph 4 is purely evidentiary and 27 not one of appropriateness. As confirmed by the pre-trial judges in the Kenya case, it is identical with the standard that paragraph 3 sets for the Prosecutor prior to the submission of the request to the Pre-Trial Chamber. In other words, when making a judicial determination as to the authorization of an investigation, the pre-trial judges must embark on the same analysis of whether the requirements set out in article 53, paragraphs (1)(a)-(c) are satisfied. The more precise content of the ‘reasonable basis’ test has gradually emerged through the practice of the Pre-Trial Chamber. In the Kenya decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber pointed out that the ‘reasonable basis to believe’ test set out in article 53(1)(a), which is one constitutive element of article 53(1), is the lowest evidentiary standard provided for in the Statute.³⁹ The Chamber then noted that the Statute contains three higher evidentiary standards in the course of the different stages of the proceedings, including ‘reasonable ground to believe’ under article 58 (for the issuance of an arrest warrant or summons for appear), ‘substantial grounds to believe’ pursuant to article 61, paragraph 7 (for the confirmation of charges), and ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ envisaged by article 66, paragraph 3 (for the finding of guilt).⁴⁰

³⁶ Ibid., para. 66.

³⁷ Ibid., para. 68.

³⁸ Ibid., paras. 37–39.

³⁹ Ibid., para. 27.

⁴⁰ Ibid., para. 28.

According to the Chamber, among all three thresholds, the one required for the issuance of an arrest warrant pursuant to article 58 of the Statute is closest to the ‘reasonable basis to believe’ standard in article 53(1)(a).⁴¹ As such, the majority judges agreed that the threshold in article 53(1)(a) requires ‘the Chamber be satisfied that there exists a sensible or reasonable justification for a belief that a crime falling within the jurisdiction of the Court ‘have been or is being committed’’.⁴² This approach was subsequently endorsed by the majority pre-trial judges in the Côte d’Ivoire decision.⁴³ It is however not yet settled in the present ICC jurisprudence as to how low this standard is, a question asked by Judge Kaul in his dissent opinion to the Kenya decision.⁴⁴ In fact, the applicable standard is inseparable from the methodology the Chamber employs in examining the Prosecutor’s requests. Judge Kaul pointed out that ‘the Pre-Trial Chamber’s decision pursuant to article 15(4) of the statute is not of a mere administrative or procedural nature, and should by no means be a “rubber-stamping instance”’.⁴⁵ It instead requires a ‘substantial and genuine examination’ by the judges of the Prosecutor’s requests following a ‘serious, thorough and well-considered approach’.⁴⁶ On the other hand, a relatively generous approach than the one applied by the majority in both situations was suggested by Judge Fernández in her separate opinion to the Côte d’Ivoire decision. In her view, the examination to be conducted by the Pre-Trial Chamber should be of ‘a limited nature’ and confined to ‘ascertain the accuracy of the statement of facts and reasons of law advanced by the Prosecutor’, which seems to suggest an even lower threshold.⁴⁷

The pre-trial judges must keep in mind the reference to ‘the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole’ in preambular paragraph 9 and ‘the most serious crimes of international concern’ in article 1. This language provides general guidance to the Pre-Trial Chamber. However, the Chamber’s application of the ‘reasonable basis’ standard should primarily be steered by the underlying purpose of paragraph 4, that of providing a judicial filter which will protect the Court from the damaging effects of frivolous or politically motivated charges. While the Pre-Trial Chamber judges⁴⁸ in both situations of Kenya and Côte d’Ivoire – majority as well as dissenting⁴⁹ – have all acknowledged that the ‘reasonable basis’ standard should be construed and applied against the above underlying purpose of paragraph 4, they obviously cannot agree on how to implement it in practice. It is important for the judges, in implementing the Pre-Trial Chamber’s supervisory role over the Prosecutor’s proprio motu power in the future, to fully take into account the implications of the limited purpose of this paragraph 4. Provided the Prosecutor observes basic standards of prosecutorial professionalism and demonstrates that an investigation strategy has been adopted by his or her Office – the latter remained questionable at the time this third edition was being completed – there should be a presumption that, when the Prosecutor has made a request pursuant to paragraph 3 and has submitted material in support of the application, there is a reasonable basis to proceed to a regular investigation.

⁴¹ Ibid., para. 29.

⁴² Ibid., para. 35.

⁴³ Côte d’Ivoire (Pre-Trial Chamber III Decision), note 26, para. 24.

⁴⁴ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, No. ICC-01/09-19-Corr, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul to the Decision pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, para. 15 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f0caaf/>).

⁴⁵ Ibid., para. 19.

⁴⁶ Ibid., paras. 15, 19.

⁴⁷ Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, No. ICC-02/11-15, Judge Fernández de Gurmendi’s separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d’Ivoire, 3 October 2011, para. 28 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ea2793/>).

⁴⁸ Kenya (Pre-Trial Chamber II Decision), para. 16; Supra note 3, Côte d’Ivoire (Pre-Trial Chamber III Decision), note 26, para. 21.

⁴⁹ Kenya (Dissenting Opinion of Judge Kaul), note 44, para. 15; Côte d’Ivoire (Judge Fernández’s separate and partially dissenting opinion), note 26, para. 17.

32 The power that the Pre-Trial Chamber possesses under paragraph 4 is to ‘authorize the commencement of the investigation’. With such an authorisation the Prosecutor may proceed to the consideration of launching a full investigation. Article 53 para. 1 provides guidance to the Prosecutor for this independent consideration which the Prosecutor is obliged to undertake. If the Court’s jurisdiction has been triggered by a referral by a State Party or the Security Council pursuant to article 13 (a) and (b) respectively, article 15 does not apply and thus, the question of a Pre-Trial Chamber authorisation of the commencement of the full investigation becomes moot. In those situations the Prosecutor proceeds to the consideration under article 53 para. 1 directly.

The Pre-Trial Chamber may ‘request additional information from the Prosecutor and from any of the victims who have made representations, and, if it considers it appropriate, may hold a hearing’.⁵⁰ The Chamber shall issue its decisions with reasons and give notice to victims who have made representations.⁵¹

V. Paragraph 5

33 Paragraph 5 concerns the situation where the Pre-Trial Chamber refuses to accept the Prosecutor’s request to authorise a full investigation pursuant to paragraph 4, whether because it does not find that there is a reasonable basis to proceed or that the case does not appear to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court. The paragraph provides that such refusal ‘shall not preclude the presentation of a subsequent request by the Prosecutor based on new facts or evidence regarding the same situation’. The term ‘shall not preclude’ does not mean that the Prosecutor can present his or her second request to the Pre-Trial Chamber as soon as new facts or evidence have been uncovered. The obligation to ‘analyse the seriousness of the information received’ in paragraph 2 applies to the Prosecutor with regard to the new facts or evidence as well. If the Prosecutor upon consideration of the new material concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with a full investigation, he or she may submit a new request pursuant to paragraph 5.

VI. Paragraph 6

1. First sentence

34 The final paragraph of article 15 regulates the situation where the Prosecutor has determined that there is no reasonable basis for an investigation. Article 15 para. 3 makes it clear that the Prosecutor has full discretion in the determination of whether the information he or she has obtained and analysed amounts to a reasonable basis. If the conclusion is negative, paragraph 6, first sentence, places an obligation upon the Prosecutor to ‘inform those who provided the information’ promptly and responsibly.⁵² The discussion of paragraph 1 and 2 above shows that the Prosecutor may receive information from any source and can seek additional information from States, organs of the UN, intergovernmental or non-governmental organisations, or ‘other reliable sources that he or she deems appropriate’. The overall number of sources made available to the Prosecutor at the stage of his or her preliminary examination can in other words be very high and the range broad. The intention of the drafters of article 15 para. 6 was not, however, to add another burden to the responsibilities of the Prosecutor.

Rather, by using the expression ‘those who provided the information’, the drafters would seem to have singled out those that bring a situation to the Prosecutor’s attention and on whose information the Prosecutor will base his or her decision to initiate a preliminary examination pursuant to article 15 para. 1. These sources should stand out as the original providers of information to the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor is obliged under article 15 para. 6 to inform such sources of his or her conclusion that there is no reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation upon the conclusion of the preliminary examination. It may be necessary for the Prosecutor to develop guidelines on how to fulfil the requirements of this paragraph.

⁵⁰ Rule 50 para. 4 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

⁵¹ Rule 50 para. 5 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

⁵² Rule 49 para. 1 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

By ‘preliminary examination’ in paragraph 6 is meant the investigative steps which the Prosecutor may take after he or she is seized of a situation but prior to his or her determination of whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation pursuant to paragraph 3. These steps include, but are not limited to, analysing information received from any source, seeking information from a broad range of reliable sources indicated in the text, and receiving written or oral testimony at the seat of the Court. The Prosecutor also has an evidence preservation capacity pursuant to article 54 para. 3 (f) i.f. which may be relevant in this context. The use of the term ‘preliminary examination’ with reference to article 15 paras. 1 and 2 is helpful in the sense that it gives the investigative activities in question a name, in distinction from investigation proper pursuant to article 53.

It worth noting that the OTP has, in its policy paper, defined the scope of preliminary examination narrower than that envisaged by this paragraph. According to the policy paper, different from the information arising from referrals by a State Party or the Security Council, the information on alleged crimes received under article 15 does not automatically lead to the start of a preliminary examination of a specific situation.⁵³ An initial phase of assessment, which aims to filter out information on crimes that are manifestly outside the jurisdiction of the Court, is a precondition for the Prosecutor to open an a preliminary examination on the basis of article 15 communications.⁵⁴ In other words, preliminary examination only applies to article 15 communications that were not rejected by the initial assessment. This approach seems to have distinguished initial assessment from preliminary examination. No matter how to make the delimitation, these investigative activities as a whole may only be ‘preliminary’, that is, at one point in time the Prosecutor must pause to make the determination of whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with a full investigation. The preliminary examination should not be used as a pretext for conducting the actual investigation. It is, however, the Prosecutor who decides when the determination pursuant to article 15 para. 3 will be made. The way this discretionary power has been exercised by the Prosecutor has been subjected to serious criticism.⁵⁵ The term ‘reasonable basis’ in paragraph 6 is to be interpreted in the same way as in paragraphs 3 and 4 which have been discussed above. Paragraph 6 does not prescribe any mode to be used by the Prosecutor when informing those who provided the information. Insofar as the text simply refers to ‘inform’, it is up to the Prosecutor to choose how to inform the relevant sources of information, pursuant to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

2. Second sentence

Article 15 para. 6 in fine provides that a negative determination pursuant to article 15 para. 3, which has been communicated to those who initially provided information to the Prosecutor in accordance with the first sentence of paragraph 6, does not ‘preclude the Prosecutor from considering further information submitted to him or her regarding the same situation in the light of new facts or evidence’. Based on the experience of the two ad hoc Tribunals it is to be expected that there will be a steady flow of information coming in to the Office of the Prosecutor as soon as the Prosecutor embarks upon a preliminary examination of a situation. The mode of initial inquiry provided for in article 15 paras. 1 and 2 remains open to the Prosecutor even after his or her determination that there is no reasonable basis to proceed with a full investigation provided new facts or evidence is available. The Prosecutor is the arbiter of whether the requirement that there be new facts or evidence is satisfied. Normally the promise of new facts or evidence will lie precisely in the further information that has been submitted to the Office of the Prosecutor.

⁵³ Office of the Prosecutor (Policy Paper), note 29, paras. 75, 80.

⁵⁴ Ibid., paras. 75, 78.

⁵⁵ See Chan, Judicial Oversight over Article 12(3) of the ICC Statute (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2013, <https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bc46c4/>), and Xiao and Zhang, A Realist Perspective on China and the International Criminal Court (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2013, <https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/9ff2b7/>).

Article 15bis
Exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression
(State referral, proprio motu)

1. The Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c), subject to the provisions of this article.
2. The Court may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.
3. The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with this article, subject to a decision to be taken after 1 January 2017 by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute.
4. The Court may, in accordance with article 12, exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression, arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party, unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by lodging a declaration with the Registrar. The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time and shall be considered by the State Party within three years.
5. In respect of a State that is not a party to this Statute, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression when committed by that State's nationals or on its territory.
6. Where the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, he or she shall first ascertain whether the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression committed by the State concerned. The Prosecutor shall notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the situation before the Court, including any relevant information and documents.
7. Where the Security Council has made such a determination, the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression.
8. Where no such determination is made within six months after the date of notification, the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, provided that the Pre-Trial Division has authorized the commencement of the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression in accordance with the procedure contained in article 15, and the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with article 16.
9. A determination of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall be without prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute.
10. This article is without prejudice to the provisions relating to the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to other crimes referred to in article 5.

Literature: Ambos, K., 'The Crime of Aggression after Kampala', (2010) 53 GYbIL 463; Clark, R. S., 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Considered at the First Review Conference on the Court, Kampala, 31 May-11 June 2010', (2010) 2 GoJIL 689; Heller, K. J., 'The Uncertain Legal Status of the Aggression Understandings', (2012) 10 JICJ 229; Krefß, C. and von Holtzendorff, L., 'The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression', (2010) 8 JICJ 1179; McDougall, C., The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2013); Reisinger Coracini, A., 'The International Criminal Court's Exercise of Jurisdiction over the Crime of Aggression – at Last ... in Reach ... over Some', (2010) 2 GoJIL 745; Schmalenbach, K., 'Das Verbrechen der Aggression vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof: Ein politischer Erfolg mit rechtlichen Untiefen', (2010) JZ 745; Zimmermann, A., 'The Creation of a Permanent International Criminal Court', (1998) MPYbUNL 169; Zimmermann, A., 'Amending the Amendment Provisions of the Rome Statute: The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression and the Law of Treaties', (2012) 10 JICJ 209.

See also the further references supra at article 5 and article 8bis, as well as those infra at article 15ter.

Content

A. Article 15bis within the Statute's overall jurisdictional scheme.....	1
B. Drafting history of article 15bis.....	2
C. Article 15bis para. 1: exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13 paras. (a) and (c).....	3
I. 'The Court (...)'.....	3
II. '(...) may exercise jurisdiction (...)'.....	4
III. '(...) over the crime of aggression (...)'.....	5
IV. '(...) in accordance with article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c) (...)'.....	6
V. '(...) subject to the provisions of this article.'.....	7
D. Article 15bis, para. 2.....	8
I. General nature and effect of article 15bis para. 2.....	8
II. 'The Court may exercise jurisdiction (...)'.....	9
III. '(...) with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.'.....	10
1. 'with respect to crimes of aggression (...)'.....	10
2. 'with respect to crimes of aggression (...)'.....	11
3. '(...) committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.'.....	12
a) Continuous crimes of aggression.....	12
b) '(...) ratification or acceptance of the amendments (...)'.....	13
c) '(...) ratification or acceptance of the amendments (...)'.....	14
E. Article 15bis, para. 3: Activation of the Court's treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction.....	15
I. General nature and effect of article 15bis para. 3.....	15
II. 'The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression (...)'.....	16
III. '(...) in accordance with this article (...)'.....	17
IV. '(...) subject to a decision to be taken after 1 January 2017 (...)'.....	18
V. '(...) by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute.'.....	19
F. Jurisdiction ratione temporis , activation of the Court's jurisdiction and Understanding no. 3.....	20
G. Article 15bis para. 4.....	21
I. Jurisdiction ratione personae and opting-out option (Article 15bis para. 4, 1 st sentence).....	21
1. 'The Court may (...)'.....	21
2. '(...) in accordance with article 12 (...)'.....	22
a) Article 12 para. 1.....	22
b) Article 12 para. 2.....	23
c) Article 12 para. 3.....	24
3. '(...) exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression (...)'.....	25
4. '(...) arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party (...)'.....	26
5. '(...) unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by lodging a declaration with the Registrar.'.....	27
a) General questions.....	27
b) Scope ratione personae of opt-out declarations.....	28
c) Timing and effects ratione temporis of opt-out declarations.....	29
d) Breadth of declarations to be made under article 15bis para. 4.....	30
e) Addressee of opt-out declarations.....	31
II. Withdrawal of opt-out declarations (Article 15 para. 4 2 nd sentence).....	32
1. 'The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time (...)'.....	32
2. '(...) and shall be considered by the State Party within three years.'.....	33
H. Article 15bis, para. 5: Exclusion of jurisdiction concerning non-parties.....	34
I. General questions.....	34
II. 'In respect of a State that is not a party to this Statute (...)'.....	35
III. '(...) the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression when committed by that State's nationals or on its territory.'.....	36
I. Article 15bis, para. 6.....	37
I. General questions.....	37
II. 'Where the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression (...)'.....	38
III. '(...) he or she shall first ascertain whether the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression committed by the State concerned.' ..	39
J. Information of the United Nations (Article 15bis para. 6 2 nd sentence).....	40

K. Article 15bis para. 7: Determination by the Security Council of an act of aggression and start of investigations	41
L. Article 15bis para. 8: Lack of determination by the Security Council of an act of aggression and authorization of investigations by the Pre-Trial Division.....	42
I. ‘Where no such determination is made within six months after the date of notification (...)’	42
II. ‘(...) the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, provided that the Pre-Trial Division has authorized the commencement of the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression in accordance with the procedure contained in article 15 (...)’	43
III. ‘(...) and the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with article 16.’	44
M. Article 15bis para. 9: Independence of the Court.....	45
N. Article 15bis para. 10: Relationship with Article 5.....	46
O. Understanding no. 5: domestic jurisdiction over the crime of aggression	47

A. Article 15bis within the Statute’s overall jurisdictional scheme

Of the three different ways of triggering the Court’s jurisdiction established under article 13, article 15bis, as introduced into the Statute as part of the Kampala compromise on the crime of aggression, relates to article 13 paras. a) and c) only. Accordingly, article 15bis deals with referrals by a State party and with proprio motu investigations by the Prosecutor. Specific questions related to Security Council referrals in turn are addressed in article 15ter, as far as the crime of aggression is concerned.

While the enabling Resolution RC/Res. 6, adopted at the Diplomatic Conference in Kampala, ‘[r]ecall[s] paragraph 1 of article 12 of the Rome Statute’, it is worth noting that article 15bis contains significant deviations from the regular jurisdictional scheme underlying article 12 of the Statute. This is a result of the long and difficult process of finding an agreement on both, the definition of the crime of aggression as such and the parameters, under which the court should eventually be in a position to exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression.

Article 15bis also deviates from article 5 para. 2 (ante Kampala), which stated that the Court shall exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once a provision is adopted in accordance with articles 121 and 123 defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction. While it would not have been in accordance with the very wording of article 5 to interpret it in the sense that a mere adoption could have sufficed for the Court to be able to exercise its aggression-related jurisdiction,¹ Resolution RC/Res.6 clarified, while being adopted under article 5 para. 2 ICC Statute, that the amendment and its entry into force is governed by article 121 para. 5.²

B. Drafting history of article 15bis

While the SWGCA, in preparation for the Kampala conference, had formulated only one draft for what was to become the current article 8bis, there were various alternatives for what is now article 15bis. The most controversial question was whether proceedings should possibly also be initiated by actors other than the United Nations Security Council. The permanent members of the Security Council, as well as some other States, had proposed that a determination by the Security Council under article 39 United Nations Charter should be required for the exercise of the Court’s jurisdiction³. This position was opposed particularly by States that are members of the Non-Aligned Movement. During the Kampala Conference, it became clear that the insistence on a monopoly for the Security Council to trigger the Court's jurisdiction concerning the crime of aggression would hinder any consensus to eventually be reached. The final compromise, reached on the very last day of the Kampala Conference⁴, as now reflected in article 15bis, therefore provides that it is not only the Security Council, but also State Parties to the Statute and the Prosecutor that can initiate proceedings even with respect to an alleged crime of aggression.

¹ For a more detailed discussion of the matter see Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209, 212 et seq., as well as Clark, article 121, mn 11 et seq.

² RC/Res. 6, para. 6, no. 1.

³ For a significant more detailed discussion as to the drafting history of current article 15bis prior to the Kampala Conference see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 30 et seq. Werle and Jessberger, Principles of International

Given its principled position on the matter, France, despite the fact of not having formally opposed the consensus leading to the adoption of article 15bis, still took the position in an explanatory declaration that 'it cannot associate itself with [the] text as it disregards the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations enshrined in article 5 of the Rome Statute'. According to France, article 15bis, as adopted, 'restricts the role of the United Nations Security Council and contravenes the Charter of the United Nations under the terms of which the Security Council alone shall determine the existence of an act of aggression'⁵.

In order to differentiate between proceedings triggered by State Parties or proprio motu by the Prosecutor on the one hand and the Security Council on the other hand, as well as for the sake of clarity, it was decided to include, apart from article 8bis containing the substance of the crime of aggression, two separate additional articles into the Rome Statute by way of an amendment: article 15bis dealing with State referrals and proceedings initiated by the Prosecutor proprio motu, and article 15ter covering Security Council referrals.

C. Article 15bis para. 1: exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13 paras. (a) and (c)

I. 'The Court (...)'

- 3 Since article 34 defines what is to be understood by 'the Court', the introductory words of article 15bis para 1 confirm, if there was any need, that accordingly all organs of the Court are subject to the jurisdictional limitations provided for by article 15bis.

II. '(...) may exercise jurisdiction (...)'

- 4 Somewhat in contrast to article 15bis para. 3, the English version of article 15bis para. 1 specifies that the Court may (rather than shall) exercise its jurisdiction if the respective requirements set out in article 15bis are fulfilled. It must be noted, however, that both the equally authentic French and Spanish texts refer in paras. 1 and 2 to the fact that the Court can exercise ('peut exercer'/'podrá ejercer') its jurisdiction in accordance with article 13 para. a) and c). Thus the English 'may' ought to be better understood as circumscribing the Court's ability ('can'/'peut'/'podrá') to exercise jurisdiction rather than providing some specific form of discretion beyond any discretion otherwise provided for in the Statute.

III. '(...) over the crime of aggression (...)'

- 5 By referring to the exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression, article 15bis para. 1 also confirms that the underlying act of aggression, while in most, if not all, cases triggering State responsibility as a matter of general international law, is not the object of the Criminal Law (3rd ed. 2014) 546 et seq.; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Volume II: The Crimes and Sentencing (2014) 190 et seq.

⁴ Barriga, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 3, 32.

⁵ Statement of France (with which the United States of America associated themselves) in explanation of position before the adoption of resolution RC/Res.6 on the crime of aggression, Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Off. Rec., Annex VII, p. 122.

proceedings before the Court as such. Nevertheless, the Court will obviously have to consider it and possible grounds excluding the alleged illegality of any such underlying acts of aggression. It is indeed this interconnection that gave rise to the concerns as to the role of the Security Council. It stands to reason, however, that any determination by the Court that an act of aggression has been committed by organs of a State (eventually evoking those organs' individual criminal responsibility) cannot provide for any form of de jure binding effect as to the legal relations between the States involved in the use of armed force, even if, de facto and politically, such a determination might be of relevance. This holds true despite the fact that there is no provision similar to article 15bis para. 9, which would expressis verbis exclude any such external effect of the Court's decisions for purposes of State responsibility.

IV. '(...) in accordance with article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c) (...)'

In line with the compromise reached in Kampala, Article 15bis para. 1 provides first that 6
 '[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c)'.⁶ Article 15bis therefore does not cover or regulate Security Council referrals, which are governed exclusively by article 15ter read in conjunction with, and subject to, article 13 para. (b).

Yet, and to state the obvious, article 16, enabling the Security Council to request the Court not to commence respectively or to proceed with an investigation or prosecution, also applies to the crime of aggression when such an investigation or prosecution has been triggered by either a State party or proprio motu by the Prosecutor, as confirmed by article 15bis para. 8.⁷

V. '(...) subject to the provisions of this article.'

Para. 1 of article 15bis further clarifies that, while acknowledging the possibility of State 7 referrals and investigations by the prosecutor under article 13 paras. (a) and (c) respectively even when it comes to the crime of aggression, any such proceedings are subject to the specific requirements and conditions, as contained in article 15bis paras. 2–10.

D. Article 15bis para. 2

I. General nature and effect of article 15bis para. 2

During the negotiation process, the issues related to the entry into force of the amend- 8
 ment on the crime of aggression and the extent of the Court's jurisdiction *ratione temporis concerning this crime proved to be among the most intricate and disputed ones. This led to the solution now contained in article 15bis paras. 2 and 3 (and further set out in Understanding no. 3), the compatibility of which with the amendment provisions of the Rome Statute remains, to say the least, doubtful⁸. Likewise, the inter-relationship between article 15bis para. 2, article 15bis para. 3 and Understanding no. 3 is complex and bears significant legal difficulties.

As far as the Court's treaty-based jurisdiction with regard to the crime of aggression is concerned, those issues are governed by article 15bis paras. 2 and 3 while article 15ter paras. 2 and 3 regulate the same questions when it comes to the Court's aggression-related jurisdiction triggered by a Security Council referral under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

⁶ As to the specific content of article 13, paras. (a) and (c) see Schabas and Pecorella, article 13, mn 15 and 20 respectively.

⁷ As to details on article 16, see Bergsmo, Pejic and Zhu, article 16, passim.

⁸ See generally Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209, passim.

While article 15bis paras. 2 and 3 are inter-related (just as mutatis mutandis article 15ter para. 2 and 3 concerning Security Council referrals), they still deal with different issues. It is to be noted at the outset, however, that neither of the two provisions (nor indeed the parallel provisions in article 15ter) regulate the entry into force of the Kampala amendment as such. Rather, para. 1 of Resolution RC/Res.6 adopted at the Kampala Diplomatic Conference provides that the entry into force takes place in accordance with article 121 para. 5, any doubts regarding the applicability of said provision notwithstanding⁹.

In contrast thereto, article 15bis para. 2 regulates for which crimes of aggression the Court has jurisdiction ratione temporis, while article 15bis para. 3 regulates the ‘activation’ of the Court’s aggression-related substance-matter jurisdiction.

Under article 15bis para. 2 (just like under article 15ter para. 2) the Court will thus only be able to exercise its jurisdiction with respect to crimes of aggression ‘committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties’. Put otherwise, article 15bis para. 2 circumscribes the Court’s temporal jurisdiction rather than providing for the entry into force of the amendment or providing for the ‘activation’ of the Court’s jurisdiction concerning the crime of aggression. Article 15bis para. 2 therefore constitutes a lex specialis to article 11 para. 2 to the extent to which the issue is specifically governed by article 15bis para. 2. Thus, under article 15bis para. 2, even with regard to a State ratifying the Rome Statute after the amendment as such has entered into force pursuant to article 121 para. 5, the Court may not exercise its jurisdiction with respect to a crime of aggression committed by that State’s nationals, unless 30 States have by then already ratified or accepted the amendment, additionally one year has lapsed since that 30th ratification or acceptance, and the condition provided for in article 15bis para. 3 has also been fulfilled.¹⁰

II. ‘The Court may exercise jurisdiction (...)’

- 9 This part of article 15bis para. 2 is identical to the introductory words of article 15bis para. 1 without raising any additional or separate issues of interpretation.¹¹

It is worth noting, however, that unlike article 24 para. 1 in relation to which article 15bis para. 2 (respectively article 15ter para. 2) constitutes lex specialis which stipulates that ‘[n]o person shall be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute’, article 15bis para. 2 (respectively article 15ter para. 2) does not address the (substantive) criminal liability of the offender. Rather it merely limits the Court’s temporal jurisdiction. Notwithstanding this conceptual difference the effect is the same, namely that a person committing a crime of aggression within the meaning of article 8bis prior to the critical date shall not face prosecution by the Court.

III. ‘(...) with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.’

1. ‘with respect to crimes of aggression (...)’

- 10 The phrase ‘(...) with respect to crimes of aggression committed (...)’¹² confirms that it must be the specific crime of aggression, as set out in article 8bis para. 1, that must have taken place after the lapse of the one-year period after the 30th ratification or acceptance, rather than the underlying act of aggression, although in most cases, though not necessarily, both will coincide.

⁹ For details see Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209 et seq., passim; McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 252; Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, Volume II: The Crimes and Sentencing (2014) 216 et seq.

¹⁰ See infra mn 15.

¹¹ See mn 4.

¹² Emphasis added.

2. ‘with respect to crimes of aggression (...)’

The wording of article 15bis para. 2 further confirms that the ratification of the Kampala amendment by thirty States and the additional lapse of a one-year period constitute a condicio sine qua non for the Court’s exercise of its aggression-related temporal jurisdiction. 11

Article 15bis para. 2, by specifically using the words ‘with respect to’ rather than simply stating that the Court may only exercise its jurisdiction ‘one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties’, indicates that the fulfillment of this condition defines the extent of the Court’s temporal jurisdiction concerning the crime of aggression, namely those crimes committed one year after the 30th ratification or acceptance, as defined below¹³. Article 15bis para. 2 therefore does not seem to define the time-frame when such jurisdiction, once established, may be exercised. This latter question is then, under the Statute as such, regulated by article 15bis para. 3. Put otherwise, under the wording of article 15bis para. 2, the Court can accordingly in principle also exercise its jurisdiction with respect to crimes committed prior to the decision provided for in article 15bis para. 3, but can effectively do so only after this decision was made.¹⁴

3. ‘(...) committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.’

a) Continuous crimes of aggression. In order to fall within the Court’s temporal jurisdiction the respective crime of aggression (and thus normally also the underlying act of aggression) must have been committed, as article 15bis para. 2 confirms, at least one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties. Yet, at least certain of the acts of aggression defined in article 8bis para. 2, such as article 8bis para. 2 lit. a) 2nd alternative (‘any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack’) or lit. g) 2nd alternative (‘any extension of their presence [i.e. the presence of troops] in such [foreign] territory beyond the termination of the agreement’), are of a continuous character within the meaning of article 14 para. 2 ILC Articles on State Responsibility, i.e. the breach of the obligation ‘extends over the entire period during which the act continues and remains not in conformity with the international obligation’.¹⁵ 12

While said standard has primarily been developed for purposes of State responsibility, it nevertheless has also been adopted, albeit reluctantly, for purposes of international criminal law¹⁶. Given the nature of the abovementioned acts of aggression, individuals might very well come within the Court’s jurisdiction *ratione temporis with regard to the commission of the crime of aggression provided the commission of the (continuous) act of aggression itself occurred within the jurisdictional reach ratione temporis of the Court.

b) ‘(...) ratification or acceptance of the amendments (...)’. It is noteworthy that article 15bis para. 2 (just like article 15ter para. 2), contrary to the wording of article 121 paras. 4 and 5, refers to the ‘ratification or acceptance’ of the amendments by thirty States parties rather than to the deposit of an instrument of ratification or acceptance. This difference in wording, even if its drafters might eventually have thought to use a formula which was only shorter yet was meant to be identical in content, could also be perceived as implying that any such ‘ratification/acceptance’ refers to the amendment becoming binding for the ratifying/accepting State, rather than referring to the act of depositing the instrument of ratification or acceptance. Under article 121 para. 5, however, any such ratification/acceptance only takes effect one year after the deposit of the instrument of ratification/acceptance. If this prolonged process is applicable, the likelihood of reaching the necessary thirty ratifications before the 13

¹³ See infra mn 12.

¹⁴ As to the impact of Understanding no. 3 on this interpretation of article 15bis para. 2 see infra mn 20.

¹⁵ UN DOC A/56/83 (12 December 2001).

¹⁶ See Pangalangan, article 24, mn 13 et seq.

decision contemplated in article 15bis para. 3 (respectively in article 15ter para. 3) will be taken after 1 January 2017 decreases. In other words, this might postpone the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression becoming effective.

- 14 c) '(...) ratification or acceptance of the amendments (...)'. It is not entirely clear what article 15bis para. 2 means when it refers to the 'acceptance' of the amendments alongside a possible 'ratification'. At the time of writing, 23 States, namely Andorra, Austria, Belgium, Botswana, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Georgia, Germany, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Poland, Samoa, San Marino, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, as well as Uruguay, have so far acceded to the amendment on the crime of aggression by submitting a formal declaration to the depositary.¹⁷ It is thus beyond doubt that those 23 ratifications are to be counted towards the quorum required by article 15bis para. 2 (respectively by article 15ter para. 2).

Besides, twelve more States, including most recently the State of Palestine¹⁸, have acceded to the Rome Statute after the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression had been adopted, i. e. after 11 June 2010,¹⁹ without expressing an intention not to be bound by the treaty, as amended. At the same time, no State having ratified the Rome Statute after the Kampala Diplomatic Conference, has so far also ratified or acceded to the amendment on the crime of aggression. This stands in line with the practice concerning the amendment to article 8²⁰ where similarly none of the States having become parties to the Rome Statute after the Kampala Conference has so far separately acceded to the article 8 amendment.

The wording of article 15bis para 2 (and the parallel wording of article 15ter, para. 2) refers to the fact that '[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties'²¹. This raises two questions: for one, has a State, ratifying the Rome Statute after 11 June 2010, thereby also automatically accepted the Kampala amendment, and, secondly, can such a State then accordingly be also counted towards the necessary quorum of thirty States.

In that regard, it is worth recalling preambular paragraph 3 of Resolution RC/Res.5, also adopted in Kampala, and dealing with the amendments to article 8 of the Rome Statute. The said provision specifically '[c]onfirm[ed] that, in light of the provision of article 40, paragraph 5, of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, States that subsequently become States Parties to the Statute will be allowed to decide whether to accept the amendment contained in this resolution at the time of ratification, acceptance or approval of, or accession to the Statute'. In contrast thereto, Resolution RC/Res.6, dealing with the crime of aggression, contains no such provision. Yet, given that the principle underlying article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties constitutes customary international law²², it still applies, the lack of any specific reference to article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties notwithstanding. As a matter of fact, at least those States that have ratified the Rome Statute after the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression has entered into force for the first State have thus, to use the formula contained in ¹⁷ See https://treaties.un.org/pages/ViewDetails.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg_no=XVIII-10-b&chapter=18&lang=en (accessed September 2015).

¹⁸ See as to the question of Palestinian statehood and the status of Palestine vis-à-vis the Rome Statute generally Zimmermann (2013) 11 JICJ 303 et seq. passim; see also the depositary note concerning Palestine, CN.12.2015.TREATIES-XVIII.13 (2 January 2015), as well as the communications by Canada (23 January 2015), <https://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/CN/2015/CN.62.2015-Eng.pdf>; by the United States of America (23 January 2015), <https://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/CN/2015/CN.64.2015-Eng.pdf>; and by Israel (23 January 2015), <https://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/CN/2015/CN.63.2015-Eng.pdf>.

¹⁹ These States include Cabo Verde, Côte d'Ivoire, Grenada, Guatemala, Maldives, Moldova, Philippines, Seychelles, St. Lucia, Tunisia, Vanuatu and most recently the State of Palestine, see https://treaties.un.org/pages/ViewDetails.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg_no=XVIII-10&chapter=18&lang=en (accessed September 2015).

²⁰ On the content of this amendment see Geiß, article 8, mn 973 et seq.

²¹ Emphasis added.

²² See for such proposition inter alia Villiger, Commentary on the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (2009) article 40, mn 15.

article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 'become parties to the treaty after the entry into force of the amending agreement'.²³ This is due to the fact that, as shown²⁴, the entry into force of the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression is not governed by the jurisdictional clauses contained in article 15bis paras. 2 and 3 (respectively in article 15ter paras. 2 and 3), but rather by article 121 para. 5. It thus seems that at least those States that have (or will have) ratified the Rome Statute after that date ought to be counted towards the quorum laid down in article 15bis para. 2 unless they have expressed a different intention, in line with article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

This understanding is confirmed by the fact that article 15 para. 2 specifically refers to the 'ratification or acceptance of the amendments'²⁵, an ex post ratification of the amendment then being a specific form of acceptance under article 40 para. 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. In fact, none of the States that ratified the Rome Statute after the Kampala review conference has submitted a declaration expressing an intention not to be considered as a party to the amended treaty within the meaning of the said article 40, para. 5. Accordingly, such States will then, just like States that had become parties prior to the entry into force of articles 8bis, 15bis and 15ter, also have the right to opt out from the Court's jurisdiction on the crime of aggression under article 15bis para. 4.

It is true that the wording of article 15bis para. 2 (just like that of article 15ter para. 2) specifically refers to the 'ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States parties' rather than to the acceptance by thirty States tout court. Yet, article 2 para. 1 lit. g) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties defines a '[State] party' as meaning 'a State which has consented to be bound by the treaty and for which the treaty is in force'. This might be understood as also comprising newly acceding States.

On the other hand, it seems that delegations participating in the Kampala Conference, when using the formula '[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties' in article 15bis para. 2, simply meant to replicate the wording of article 121 paras. 4 and 5, which refer to the point in time after instruments of ratification or acceptance have been deposited. It thus seems that the drafters of article 15bis para. 2 (and of article 15ter para. 2) omitted the reference to the deposition of instruments only to be more concise rather than to convey another meaning, as outlined above. Yet, this intention is neither reflected in the travaux préparatoires of the provision, nor in the text itself.

The contrary position, namely that 30 States need to formally ratify or accept the amendments as such, rather than either ratify or accede to the amended treaty in toto, in order for the amendments to become applicable, stands in line, however, with a press communiqué distributed by the ICC on the occasion of San Marino's ratification of the amendment on the crime of aggression, which stated that '[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once thirty States Parties have ratified the amendments'²⁶ instead of using the more precise terminology 'ratified or accepted' formula used in article 15bis (and in article 15ter), para. 2.

This somewhat more restrictive position also seems to be shared by the depositary, the United Nations Secretary General. More specifically, the United Nations Secretary General has taken the position that new parties to the Statute must explicitly ratify the amendments, or are otherwise deemed to be party to the original 1998 version of the Rome Statute as agreed upon in Rome.²⁷

²³ McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 265.

²⁴ Supra mn 1, 8.

²⁵ Emphasis added.

²⁶ Press Release No. ICC-ASP-20141119-PR1065, Assembly of States Parties to the International Criminal Court, 19 November 2013, see http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Pages/PR1065.aspx.

²⁷ Cf. e.g. the depositary notification for Cote d'Ivoire, referring to the Rome Statute as agreed upon in Rome on 17 July 1998: <https://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/CN/2013/CN.150.2013-Eng.pdf>.

In the end, this discussion could turn out to be rather theoretical when it comes to answering the question from what moment onwards the Court will be able to exercise its aggression-related jurisdiction, given the current momentum in the ratification process. As a matter of fact, by mid-2015, 23 ratifications have already been submitted, leaving a considerable amount of time to reach the necessary thirty ratifications before 2017. Nonetheless, the very same issue might still be relevant for yet another purpose.

At least when taken at face value and leaving aside Understanding no. 3 for the time being²⁸, article 15bis para. 2 determines the earliest point in time with regard to which the Court may exercise its aggression-related treaty-based jurisdiction, namely covering all such crimes ‘committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties’. Accordingly, provided one were to share the position that States acceding to the Statute post-Kampala were to be counted towards the quorum of thirty States, the decision to be reached after January 1, 2017 under article 15bis para. 3 might retroactively activate the Court’s jurisdiction ratione temporis for crimes of aggression committed in 2014, i. e. after 30 States had become bound by the Kampala amendment including those States that ratified the Statute after the Kampala amendment had already entered into force.

E. Article 15bis, para. 3: Activation of the Court’s treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction

I. General nature and effect of article 15bis para. 3

- 15 Leaving aside once again the complexities of the amendment process leading to the adoption of the amendment on the crime of aggression at the Kampala Review Conference, which puts into question its compatibility with regular rules of the law of treaties²⁹, article 15bis para. 3 (as well as article 15ter para. 3 regarding the Court’s Security Council-based jurisdiction) provides that the Court may only exercise its aggression-related jurisdiction once a decision has been taken to that effect after 1 January 2017 by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute.

This has rightly been described as an ‘activation’ of the Court’s aggression-related jurisdiction which might thus be considered existing, but still ‘dormant’ pending this very decision. In a way, the current situation is thus somewhat similar to the one prior to the entry into force of the Kampala amendment under article 5 para. 1 lit. d) and para. 2 as it then stood, which provided that while the Court already had jurisdiction over the crime of aggression from the very beginning of its existence, it could not yet exercise it.³⁰

II. ‘The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression (...)’

- 16 The use of the word ‘shall’ in article 15bis para. 3 as compared to the ‘may’ in paras. 1, 2 and 5 of article 15bis (‘ejercerá’/‘podrá ejercer’ in Spanish; ‘peut exercer’/‘exerce’ in French) seems to imply that, once the decision has been made under article 15bis para. 3, the Court is duty-bound to exercise its jurisdiction, obviously subject to those statutory rules governing such an exercise of jurisdiction.

As in paras. 1, 2 and 4 of article 15bis, para. 3 once again reconfirms that the Court will only exercise jurisdiction vis-à-vis natural persons allegedly having committed a crime of aggression (rather than exercising jurisdiction concerning alleged acts of aggression).³¹

²⁸ On the relevance of Understanding no. 3 as to the activation of the Court’s jurisdiction see infra mn 20.

²⁹ Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209.

³⁰ For further details see Zimmermann, article 5, mn 27 et seq.

³¹ See mn 5, 10, 25.

III. ‘(...) in accordance with this article (...)’

The wording of article 15bis para. 3 further clarifies and once more confirms that any exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression shall take place in accordance with article 15bis as constituting lex specialis to the regular jurisdictional rules also contained in the Statute. 17

IV. ‘(...) subject to a decision to be taken after 1 January 2017 (...)’

Article 15bis para. 3 further provides that in order to ‘activate’ the Court’s jurisdiction, a positive decision in that regard has to be taken after 1 January 2017. Under the wording of article 15bis para. 3, the purpose of the provision is not to regulate the Court’s temporal jurisdiction (that question being decided by article 15bis para. 2), but rather to determine only from what point onwards the Court ought to actually exercise its jurisdiction. 18

The formula ‘subject to a decision’ contained in article 15bis para. 3 (as well as in 15ter para. 3) implies, however, that the States Parties might decide otherwise, i.e. might provide that the Court shall not have jurisdiction for acts of aggression eventually committed in the period between the 30th ratification has become effective and the point in time the decision under para. 3 was taken (if ever there was such period at all, i.e. if the decision under article 15bis para. 3 is taken only after the threshold required by article 15bis para. 2 was reached).

V. ‘(...) by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute.’

The last part of article 15bis para. 3, by using the phrase ‘the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute’, makes reference to article 121 para. 3.³² Accordingly, any decision under article 15bis para. 3 to activate the Court’s jurisdiction requires a positive decision by two thirds of the State Parties to the Statute, in accordance with article 121, para. 3 rather than a two-thirds majority of those States present and voting when any such decision is to be taken. The term ‘States Parties’ in this context is referring to the then current number of States Parties rather than to the current number of States Parties. 19

The decision in question, just like the adoption of an amendment, can either be taken at a meeting of the Assembly of States Parties or, should the opportunity arise, at a Review Conference.

F. Jurisdiction ratione temporis, activation of the Court’s jurisdiction and Understanding no. 3

The already complex questions of the Court’s temporal jurisdiction on the one hand and of the ‘activation’ of its aggression-related jurisdiction on the other, as laid out in article 15bis/ter para. 2 (regulating the former) and in article 15bis/ter para. 3 (regulating the latter), is further complicated by the terms of Understanding no. 3, adopted by the negotiating States in Kampala as Annex III of the enabling Resolution RC/Res. 6, whereby the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression was adopted. This understanding provides in quite unequivocal terms: 20

‘It is understood that in case of article 13, paragraph (a) or (c), the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed after a decision in accordance with article 15bis, paragraph 3, is taken, and one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties, whichever is later.’

³² On article 121 para. 3 see Clark, article 121, mn 9; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of ICL (2014) 555.

In that regard, one has to first note that by making reference to article 13, paragraph (a) or (c) only, the understanding was meant to only govern the Court's treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction, a fact further confirmed by the exclusive reference in the text of Understanding no. 3 to article 15bis para. 3 (but not to article 15ter para. 3).³³

What is more is that the Understanding reverses the effect of the quorum provided for in article 15bis para. 2 on the one hand³⁴, and of the decision referred to in article 15bis para. 3 on the other³⁵ as proscribed by the two provisions.

With regard to the former, the text of the Understanding, contrary to the content of article 15bis para. 2, foresees that the Court may only exercise its jurisdiction a year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties. It thus seems that the said Understanding, contrary to the wording of article 15bis para. 2 (which instead uses the phrase 'with respect to') provides for a definite time-frame for the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court, rather than circumscribing the extent of the Court's temporal jurisdiction, regardless of when such jurisdiction would then actually be exercised. This is true notwithstanding the heading of Understanding no. 3, which refers to 'Jurisdiction ratione temporis'.

With regard to the latter, i. e. article 15bis para. 3, it provides that the Court's jurisdiction *ratione temporis is limited in that 'the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed after a decision in accordance with article 15bis, paragraph 3, is taken'. This stands, once again, in contrast to the actual wording of article 15bis para. 3 which, as shown above³⁶, conversely merely regulates the exercise, by the Court of its jurisdiction rather than circumscribing its temporal jurisdiction.

Given that, at best, the said Understanding constitutes an agreement relating to the text of the amendment made in connection with the conclusion of the treaty within the meaning of article 32 para. 2 lit. a) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, it may only serve as an interpretative tool, which may not, however, set aside the clear text of the treaty as such. It is thus submitted that the Understanding's aim was only to further define what was previously agreed upon while not limiting the effect of article 15bis para. 2 and para. 3 respectively. Put otherwise, the temporal limitations as to the reach of the Court's temporal jurisdiction (as laid down in article 15bis para. 2), and as to the exercise of such jurisdiction (as laid down in article 15bis para. 3) would stand unabated while Understanding no. 3 would add further limitations, as set out above.

Thus, on the whole and taking the combined effect of article 15bis para. 2, article 15bis para. 3 and Understanding no. 3 into account,

- the Court will only be able to exercise its jurisdiction one year after the 30th ratification or acceptance has become effective³⁷ and after the decision contemplated in article 15bis para. 3 has been made and
- the Court's jurisdiction may then be only exercised with respect to crimes of aggression committed after the 30th ratification or acceptance has become effective and after the decision provided for in article 15bis para. 3 has been made.

³³ As to the parallel provision in article 15ter see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15ter, mn 6.

³⁴ See mn 8 et seq.

³⁵ See mn 15 et seq.

³⁶ Supra mn 8.

³⁷ See mn 13 et seq.

G. Article 15bis para. 4

I. Jurisdiction ratione personae and opting-out option (Article 15bis para. 4 1st sentence)

1. ‘The Court may (...)’

The introductory words of article 15bis para. 4 are identical to the ones used in article 15bis para. 1; both phrases should thus also be interpreted in the same manner, i.e. as merely circumscribing the extent of the Court’s jurisdiction³⁸, the present provision being concerned with the Court’s jurisdiction ratione personae.

2. ‘(...) in accordance with article 12 (...)’

a) Article 12 para. 1. By using the words ‘in accordance with article 12’ article 15bis provides that, as a matter of principle, the general rules governing the Court’s exercise of jurisdiction as enshrined in article 12³⁹ also apply when it comes to the crime of aggression, subject however to the extent to which article 15bis constitutes a lex specialis.

Subject to a State party’s exercise of the opt-out possibility provided for in article 15bis para. 4, a State that is a contracting party is, under article 12 para. 1, thus deemed to have accepted the Court’s jurisdiction also with regard to the crime of aggression, as contained in article 5 para. 1 lit. d),⁴⁰ regardless of whether it has, in one way or the other, specifically accepted the Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression.

b) Article 12 para. 2. Accordingly, the Court is thus, as a matter of principle and subject to article 15bis para. 5⁴¹, in a position to first exercise its treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction with regard to crimes of aggression committed on either the territory of a State party or committed against vessels or aircraft registered in a State party, provided that in any case the said State party has not opted out from the Court’s aggression-related jurisdiction. In the latter respect, i.e. concerning possible crimes of aggression committed against vessels or aircraft registered in a State party, it is particularly worth noting that under article 8bis para. 2 lit. d) even the attack against the sea or air forces, or the marine and air fleets of another State can amount to the crime of aggression⁴².

Besides, under article 12 para. 2 lit. b), the Court may also, again subject to both article 15bis para. 5 and the opting-out option available to State parties, exercise its treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction provided the accused is a national of a State party.

c) Article 12 para. 3. Article 12 para. 3 enables States, not parties to the Statute, to accept the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question, by way of a declaration lodged with the Registrar. However, in line with Rule 44 of the Court’s Rules of Procedure and Evidence, article 12 para. 3 has to be understood as an acceptance of jurisdiction with regard to an overall situation and with respect to all ‘crimes referred to in article 5 of relevance to the situation’.

In that regard it seems to be in line with the object and purpose of article 15bis para. 5, namely to protect third States, not parties of the Statute to also allow article 12 para. 3 declarations to apply to the crime of aggression, the categorical wording of article 15 para. 5

³⁸ See mn 4.

³⁹ For further details see Schabas and Pecorella, article 12, passim; Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 219.

⁴⁰ McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 254; Krefß and von Holtzendorff (2010) 8 JICJ 1179, 1213.

⁴¹ See infra mn 34 et seq.

⁴² For details see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 8bis, mn 132 et seq.

‘the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction’ notwithstanding. Moreover, given the interpretation of article 12 para. 3, as laid down in Rule 44 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, any such declaration does also entail the acceptance of the Court’s treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction by the State making the declaration.

Given the unequivocal wording of article 12 para. 3, which only refers to States which are not parties to this Statute as eventually making such declarations, it does not apply as such to ‘non-accepting’ State parties which have opted out from the Court’s treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction under article 15bis para. 4. At the same time, there appears to be no reason why a State should not be permitted to partially withdraw its opting-out declaration by means of an ad hoc declaration in accordance with the idea underlying article 12 para. 3.

3. ‘(...) exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression (...)’

- 25 Once again, these introductory words of article 15bis para. 4 are identical to the ones used in article 15bis para. 1, reference to which⁴³ is therefore made.

4. ‘(...) arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party (...)’

- 26 Under article 15bis para. 4, the initiation of proceedings requires the aggressor State’s consent. As a matter of principle, Article 15bis para. 4 therefore provides for the Court’s treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction only if the underlying act of aggression has been, as the provision puts it, ‘committed by a State party’. Accordingly, the said act of aggression, as defined in article 8bis para. 2, must be attributable to a State Party of the Statute under the regular rules of States responsibility as they have been enshrined in the ILC’s Articles on State Responsibility. For the purposes of article 15bis para. 4 it therefore does not matter whether such a State Party has ratified or otherwise accepted⁴⁴ the Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression, unless such a State Party has opted out from the Court’s treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction⁴⁵.

The crime of aggression must furthermore ‘arise from’ (‘résultant d’un acte d’agression’ in the French version of the text and ‘resultante de un acto de agresión’ in the Spanish text) an act of aggression attributable to a State Party that has not made an opting-out declaration. Article 15bis para. 4 does not require, however, that the act of aggression is then necessarily committed by a national of a State Party. Indeed, there might be scenarios in which the act of aggression (rather than the crime of aggression) is committed by nationals of third States, but where the act is nevertheless attributable to a State Party which has not made an opting-out declaration, e.g. under article 8 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility. Provided the crime of aggression was then committed by nationals of a State Party bound by the amendments and occurred on the territory of such a State, the Court is in a position to exercise its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction.

5. ‘(...) unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by lodging a declaration with the Registrar.’

- 27 a) General questions. Article 15bis, para. 4 presupposes the consent of States Parties to the Court’s exercise of its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction. However, a State party has the option to declare that it does not accept the Court’s treaty-based jurisdiction over the crime of aggression by lodging a declaration with the Registrar. This provision is remarkable, given its absence in the likewise newly introduced article 8 para. 2 (e) lit. (xiii), (xiv) and (xv) ICC Statute. The establishment of such an opt-out procedure for the crime of aggression became a necessary negotiation strategy during the Kampala Review Conference, aiming mainly at convincing France and Great Britain to stop insisting on the monopoly of the Security Council when it comes to the crime of aggression.⁴⁶

⁴³ See mn 4.

⁴⁴ For detail as to this question see mn 13 et seq.

⁴⁵ Kreß and von Holtendorff (2010) 8 JICJ 1179, 1213.

Yet, this compromise, as enshrined in the opt-out procedure, is hardly, if at all, compatible with article 121, para. 5, which under the enabling resolution adopted at the Kampala Diplomatic Conference constitutes the treaty provision providing for the entry into force of the Kampala amendments and which states that amendments only apply vis-à-vis those States Parties which have accepted them⁴⁷. As a matter of fact, article 15bis, para. 4 attempts to force States parties which are not willing to accept the Court's treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction to formally opt out of this jurisdiction, instead of simply allowing them to remain silent and rely on their non-acceptance of the amendment. Put otherwise, once the conditions of article 15bis, paras. 2 and 3 are fulfilled, the amendment will enter into force for all States parties except those that have submitted an opting-out declaration, making it thus mutatis mutandis (but for the opting-out option) subject to the amendment procedure provided for in article 124 para. 4.

Given the doubts about the compatibility of the opting-out procedure as laid down in the Kampala amendments with the amendment provisions of the Statute, States might, at any given moment prior to the critical date, make declarations taking just this position. By the same token, they might then indicate that they therefore do not feel the need to formally lodge an opt-out declaration, in order not to be bound by the amendment, given that article 121 para. 5 has to be interpreted just in this manner.

b) Scope ratione personae of opt-out declarations. The opt-out option applies to all State parties to the Rome Statute, irrespective of whether they have previously ratified the amendment, have otherwise accepted it by ratifying the Statute after the amendment had already been adopted⁴⁸, or finally have not accepted the Kampala amendments at all.⁴⁹ 28

There is no hint in the text of article 15bis para. 4 that would prevent even a State that has itself participated in bringing about the 'activation' of the Court's treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction by way of its ratification or acceptance from 'protecting' its own citizens from the Court's jurisdiction by submitting an opting-out declaration to the Registrar in accordance with article 15bis para. 4.

In contrast thereto, the opting-out option under article 15bis para. 4 is not available to non-State parties, them being protected against the Court exercising its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction vis-à-vis their nationals or concerning acts on their territory by article 15bis para. 5.

c) Timing and effects ratione temporis of opt-out declarations. Opt-out declarations under article 15bis para. 4 may be lodged with the Registrar even before the Court's treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction becomes activated under article 15bis paras. 2 and 3⁵⁰, and might also accompany a notification of ratification of the Kampala amendments.⁵¹ 29

It is not, however, beyond doubt whether the term 'previously' refers to a point in time prior to the commission of an act of aggression, or rather to one prior to the exercise, by the Court, of its jurisdiction in a given case. However, the very structure of the text, which links the declaration to the commission of the act of aggression, seems to militate in favor of an interpretation requiring the declaration to be made prior to the act of aggression rather than to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court.⁵² It is also only this interpretation, which is fully ⁴⁶ Krefß and von Holtendorff (2010) 6 Vereinte Nationen 260, 262; Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 193.

⁴⁷ For further details see Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209, 220 et seq.; Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 504; Schmalenbach (2010) JZ 745, 750 et seq.

⁴⁸ See for such possibility mn 14.

⁴⁹ Clark (2010) 2 GoJIL 689, 704; McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the ICC (2013) 253.

⁵⁰ For details see mn 8 et seq.

⁵¹ See also mn 13.

⁵² Ambos (2010) 53 GYbIL 463, 505; Reisinger Coracini (2010) 2 GoJIL 745, 777.

in line with the object and purpose of the provision. Were it otherwise, a State could commit an act of aggression and would, if the Court started an investigation, subsequently still be able to bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction, almost until the very last minute before proceedings are about to begin. Nonetheless, given that article 15bis para. 4 does not contain any precise deadline, no specific period of time has to lapse between the point in time at which the declaration is made and the time during which the act of aggression takes place, in order for the former to be effective.

In order to prevent States from misusing the opt-out option, a certain minimum period of time is required before such a declaration becomes effective, thereby ensuring that the opt-out did not occur with the specific plan in mind to commit an act of aggression within the immediate future. As a matter of fact, to paraphrase the ICJ in its Nicaragua judgment concerning the right of a State to denounce a declaration under article 36 para. 2 ICJ Statute accepting the jurisdiction of the ICJ, it appears from the requirement of good faith that such unilateral declarations should be treated, by analogy, according to the law of treaties, which requires a reasonable time for withdrawal even when it comes to treaties that contain no provision regarding the duration of their validity.⁵³ The necessary time to have lapsed before any such opting out becomes effective would then depend on the circumstances of the specific case.

In the normal course of events lodging such a declaration in the immediate temporal context of an act of aggression with the intent to prevent the Court from exercising jurisdiction in this case, will not, however, fulfill the definition of the crime of aggression's planning and preparation phase.⁵⁴ As a matter of fact, the sole aim of such opting out might simply be to avoid having the use of force by one State, albeit eventually a controversial one, not being exposed to judicial scrutiny rather than pursuing a plan to commit the crime of aggression.

Despite the fact that an opt-out declaration under Article 15 para. 4 2nd sentence concerning the Court's treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction may be made for an unlimited period of time, it could still from the very beginning be made, if a State party wishes, for a limited time period, given that it can also be revoked at any time.⁵⁵

30 d) Breadth of declarations to be made under article 15bis para. 4. Article 15bis, para. 4 further raises the issue of whether an opt-out declaration can also be limited to one of the jurisdictional links provided for in article 12, i. e. the nationality of the perpetrator or the place of the offence. Unlike article 124, the very wording of which refers to declarations, pursuant to which either war crimes committed by a State party's nationals or those committed on its territory (or both) may be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Court, article 15 para. 4 refers generally to the Court's jurisdiction 'over a crime of aggression, arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party' that may be excluded by way of an opting-out declaration. This might at first glance invite an e contrario argument. On the other hand, one has to take into account the fact that an opting-out declaration under article 15bis para. 4 limits the Court's otherwise existing treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction. It thus seems to be appropriate to also allow for a more limited opting-out declaration to be made under article 15bis para. 4⁵⁶, third parties being protected anyhow by virtue of article 15bis para. 5.

31 e) Addressee of opt-out declarations. Article 15 para. 4 expressly states that an opt-out declaration ought to be lodged with the Court's Registrar. This stands in contrast to possible

⁵³ See mutatis mutandis Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Judgment (Jurisdiction of the Court and Admissibility of the Application) ICJ Rep. 1984, 392, 419, para. 63, as well as Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria: Equatorial Guinea intervening), Judgment (Preliminary Objections) ICJ Rep. 1998, 275, 295, para. 33.

⁵⁴ But see for a somewhat different position Reisinger Coracini (2010) 2 GoJIL 745, 777.

⁵⁵ On this issue see infra mn 32.

⁵⁶ See also McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 267.

opting-out declarations to be made under article 124, which is silent on the matter and in reliance on which the only two declarations made so far under article 124 were both addressed to the depositary rather than to the Registrar.⁵⁷

II. Withdrawal of opt-out declarations (Article 15 para. 4, 2nd sentence)

1. ‘The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time (...)’

As the text of article 15 para. 4 2nd sentence unequivocally confirms, and given the character of an opting-out declaration as a unilateral act limiting the obligations of a State party arising under the Statute it may, just like generally reservations to treaties under the law of treaties and declarations made under article 124⁵⁸, be withdrawn at any time.

Given that the opting-out declaration has to be lodged, under article 15bis para. 4 1st sentence with the Court’s Registrar, the actus contrarius of withdrawing such a declaration would then also have to be addressed to the Registrar. This is mutatis mutandis confirmed by the practice under article 124, as France, which had previously made a declaration under article 124, in 2008 notified the depositary (i.e. the addressee of its original article 124 declaration) of its intention to withdraw it.⁵⁹

It is somewhat surprising though, that the drafters of article 15bis para. 4 2nd sentence thought it appropriate to choose a different wording as compared to article 124 (article 15bis: ‘The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time (...)’/‘Le retrait d’une telle déclaration peut être effectué à tout moment (...)’ – article 124: ‘A declaration under this article may be withdrawn at any time.’/‘Il peut à tout moment retirer cette déclaration.’). Yet, it still seems that the content of both provisions is nevertheless identical.

Once the period of time for which an opting-out declaration was made under article 15 para. 4 2nd sentence lapses, the Court may fully exercise its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction even with regard to a crime of aggression arising from an act of aggression committed by the State Party that had previously lodged the opting out-declaration.

The wording of article 15 para. 4 2nd sentence is silent on the question, whether, once an opting out-declaration has been withdrawn, the Court may then retroactively exercise its jurisdiction with regard to a crime of aggression arising from an act of aggression committed by the State Party prior to the said withdrawal. Yet, in order to provide for a full effet utile of the provision, it seems that the Court would still, i.e. even after the opting-out declaration concerning the Court’s treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction has expired, not be able to exercise its jurisdiction with regard to such a crime of aggression arising from an act of aggression committed by the State Party prior to the withdrawal of the declaration.

2. ‘(...) and shall be considered by the State Party within three years.’

The last part of the 2nd sentence of article 15 para. 4 contains an obligation of a State Party having lodged an opt-out declaration with the Registrar to bona fide contemplate (‘envisager’ in the French text) a withdrawal of such a declaration previously made. Obviously, this does not entail an obligation to actually withdraw any such declaration, and, besides, said obligation only becomes applicable three years after any such declaration has been made. Accordingly, not withdrawing such a declaration does not amount to a violation of the Statute.

Unlike article 124, article 15bis para. 4 is not subject to a mandatory reassessment procedure by a review conference.

⁵⁷ For details see Zimmermann, article 124, mn 16.

⁵⁸ On the withdrawal of declarations made under article 124 see Zimmermann, article 124, mn 9 and 15.

⁵⁹ Zimmermann, article 124, mn 9.

H. Article 15bis, para. 5: Exclusion of jurisdiction concerning non-parties

I. General questions

- 34 Article 15bis para. 5, the relevant wording of which is mutatis mutandis identical to article 121 para. 5, provides that in respect of a State that is not a party to the Statute, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction when the crime of aggression was committed by that State's nationals or on its territory. Article 15bis para. 5 thus derogates, when it comes to the crime of aggression, from the Court's general jurisdictional set-up provided for in article 12, under which even crimes committed by nationals of a State that is not a contracting party come within the Court's jurisdiction, provided they are committed on the territory of a contracting State. Put otherwise, given the combined effect of article 15bis para. 5 and para. 4, the Court's treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction is limited to acts of aggression committed between the currently 123 contracting parties of the Rome Statute minus those States that decide to lodge an opt-out declaration with the Registrar under article 15bis para. 4.

II. 'In respect of a State that is not a party to this Statute (...)'

- 35 The first part of article 15bis para. 5 clarifies that it only deals with the legal situation of states that are not parties to the Statute at the relevant time, while the legal situation of states that are parties to the Statute, but have not ratified or accepted the Kampala amendment on the crime of aggression, is governed by article 15bis para. 4.⁶⁰

III. '(...) the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression when committed by that State's nationals or on its territory.'

- 36 Article 15bis para. 5 applies to proceedings both, directed against nationals of a state not a party to the Statute and related to a crime of aggression committed on the territory of such a state, even when committed by a national of a State party and committed against such a non-State party.

One might argue though that properly understood, article 15bis para. 5 was meant to leave the option open for the Court to exercise jurisdiction where either nationals of a State not a party to the Statute commit a crime of aggression on the territory of a state party, or where nationals of a State Party commit the crime of aggression on the territory of a third state not a State Party of the Statute, i. e. where an alternative jurisdictional link exists. In line with the debate surrounding the proper understanding of article 121 para. 5, this is commonly referred to as the so-called 'positive understanding' of article 15bis para. 5.⁶¹ Such an understanding is refuted, however, if there is need, by the equally authentic French texts of both, article 15bis para. 5 and article 121 para. 5, which clarify that the phrase is intended to provide for a full exclusion of jurisdiction vis-à-vis the State Party that does not accept the amendment,⁶² given that the French version of article 15bis, para. 5 provides that '[l]a Cour n'exerce pas sa compétence à l'égard du crime d'agression⁶³ quand celui-ci est commis par des ressortissants de cet État ou sur son territoire.'⁶⁴ This stands in contrast to the wording of ⁶⁰ For details see mn 21.

⁶¹ With respect to article 121 para. 5: Reisinger Coracini (2008) 21 LeidenJIL 699, 707.

⁶² Zimmermann (2012) 10 JICJ 209, 217; see also McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 256.

⁶³ Emphasis added.

⁶⁴ Article 121 para. 5 in turn reads: 'La Cour n'exerce pas sa compétence à l'égard d'un crime faisant l'objet de cet amendement lorsque ce crime a été commis par un ressortissant d'un État Partie qui n'a pas accepté l'amendement ou sur le territoire de cet État'; emphasis added.

article 124, the wording of which foresees that the state making the declaration under article 124 ‘does not accept the jurisdiction of the Court.’⁶⁵ Yet, even this latter formula is understood in light of its object and purpose as barring the Court’s war crime-related jurisdiction in toto vis-à-vis the state that has made a declaration under article 124, even if otherwise a jurisdictional link were to exist (‘negative understanding of article 124’)⁶⁶. A fortiori such a negative understanding must then also apply to article 15bis para. 5. Accordingly, the Court may, under no circumstances (apart from article 15ter), exercise its jurisdiction with regard to a given crime that has been committed by nationals of a non-ratifying State party or on its territory, even if the Court would otherwise enjoy jurisdiction on the basis of the crime being committed on the territory or by the nationals of another contracting party⁶⁷. This leads to the somewhat counter-intuitive result that even where a state, not party to the Statute, is the victim of the underlying act of aggression committed by nationals of a state that has fully accepted the Court’s treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction, the Court cannot exercise such jurisdiction, subject however to a declaration made by the respective third state under article 12 para. 3, accepting the Court’s jurisdiction ad hoc.⁶⁸

I. Article 15bis, para. 6

I. General questions

Under article 15 paras. 6–9, the Court’s exercise of its treaty-based, aggression-related 37 jurisdiction does not depend on a previous determination by the Security Council of an act of aggression committed by the State concerned. This constitutes one of the fundamental results reached during the Kampala Review Conference.

Paras. 6–9 then lay down, in significant further detail, the various aspects of the relationship between the Court (and mainly the Prosecutor) on the one hand, and the Security Council on the other: according to article 15bis, para. 6, when the Prosecutor wishes to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, he or she shall first ascertain whether the Security Council has made such a determination.⁶⁹ If it has, the Prosecutor may proceed (para. 7).⁷⁰ If the Security Council has not made such a determination within six months after the date of notification, further investigations require both an authorization by the Pre-Trial Division in accordance with the procedure contained in article 15 and that the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with article 16 (para. 8).⁷¹ Finally, para. 9 provides that any finding on the existence of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall not bind the Court.⁷²

II. ‘Where the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression (...)’

The introductory words of article 15bis para. 6 are identical to the ones used in article 15 38 para. 3 except that in the English and French texts the word ‘if/’si’ (as used in article 15

⁶⁵ Emphasis added.

⁶⁶ See Zimmermann, article 124, mn 14.

⁶⁷ Werle and Jessberger, Principles of ICL (2014) 554; Schmalenbach (2010) JZ 745, 749; cf. Ambos (2010) 53 GYBIL 463, 506; see also the statement by Japan, RC/11, Annex VII, at 121, criticizing that ‘(...) the new article 15bis 1quarter [now article 15bis para. 5] (...) solidifies a blanket and automatic impunity of nationals of non-State Parties (...)’.

⁶⁸ See mn 24.

⁶⁹ For details see infra mn 39.

⁷⁰ For details see infra mn 41.

⁷¹ For details see infra mn 42.

⁷² For details see infra mn 45.

para. 3) were replaced by the word ‘where’/‘lorsque’ in article 15bis para. 6, while the Spanish text uses the very same terminology ‘si’ (i. e. amounting more to an ‘if’) on both occasions. This leads to the conclusion that there is no difference in meaning. At most, one could say that article 15bis para. 6 employs the term ‘where’, in order to express the idea that situations might arise where the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation generally, without, however, reaching the same conclusion concerning the crime of aggression. It ought to be noted, however, that there might be also cases in which the prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation specifically in respect of a crime of aggression, without at the same time reaching the same conclusion as to the other crimes listed in article 5, and indeed obviously vice versa.

Given the identical standard used in both, article 15bis para. 3 and article 15bis para. 6, namely that there must be a ‘reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation’, the standard developed in the Court’s jurisprudence as to what is meant by ‘reasonable basis to proceed’ under article 15 para. 3⁷³ also applies when it comes to article 15bis para. 6 with the sole difference that said ‘reasonable basis’ refers to a sub-category of crimes listed in article 5 only, namely the crime of aggression.

III. ‘(...) he or she shall first ascertain whether the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression committed by the State concerned.’

- 39 The second part of the first sentence of article 15bis para. 6 constitutes the first element in the close interrelationship that the Statute establishes between the Court on the one hand and the Security Council on the other. In order to avoid any contradictions between the Court and the Security Council to the extent possible and without infringing upon the independence of the Court and its organs, article 15 para. 6 obliges the Prosecutor, before moving ahead with any further steps concerning a possible crime of aggression to first clearly establish, as confirmed by the French term ‘s’ assure’, whether the Council has not already dealt with the matter and made a determination that an act of aggression has indeed been committed.

Under article 15bis para. 6 any such determination can only be made by the Security Council as such by way of a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. This is due to the fact that the language used in article 15bis para. 6, namely the words ‘determine’ and ‘act of aggression’, were taken from article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations. Such a determination cannot thus be made by the President of the Security Council by way of a Presidential Statement and even less so by way of a statement by the Security Council’s President made to the press, the latter being made anyhow not on behalf of the Security Council, but rather on behalf of its individual members.

As a matter of practice, the Security Council would then normally, provided it ever were to make such a determination, integrate it into the preamble of the respective resolution. Any such determination, to state the obvious, would not however, by the same token, also provide for a referral to the Court under article 15ter.⁷⁴

In the past, the Security Council has only used the term ‘act of aggression’ on two occasions, namely in 1985, when it condemned Israeli air raids on PLO targets in Tunisia as an ‘act of aggression’ respectively an ‘act of armed aggression’⁷⁵ and when it demanded that South Africa ceases ‘all acts of aggression’ against Angola⁷⁶.

Under article 15bis para. 9 any such determination, even when made, would however not be binding upon the Court.⁷⁷

⁷³ For details see Bergsmo, Pejić and Zhu article 15, mn 20 et seq.

⁷⁴ For further details see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15ter, mn 4.

⁷⁵ UN Doc S/RES/573 (5 October 1985), operative paras. 1 and 2.

⁷⁶ UN Doc S/RES/577 (6 December 1985), passim.

⁷⁷ For details see infra mn 45.

The ‘State concerned’ referred to in para. 6 is the state the alleged ‘act of aggression’ of which gives rise to the investigation for the possible commission of a crime of aggression.

J. Information of the United Nations (Article 15bis para. 6 2nd sentence)

Under article 15bis para. 6 2nd sentence, the Prosecutor is under an obligation to keep the Secretary-General of the United Nations informed of the situation before the Court and to provide the United Nations with relevant information and documents concerning possible proceedings. This obligation supplements the more general obligations arising under the Relationship Agreement concluded between the Court and the United Nations. The obligation enshrined in article 15bis para. 6 2nd sentence is not contained in article 15 and is thus unique to the crime of aggression, demonstrating the particular relevance of such proceedings for the United Nations, and, in particular, the Security Council. It goes without saying that any such information received by the Secretary General would then, as a matter of course, be forwarded to the Security Council by the Secretary General, given that the main purpose of this information is to trigger the 6-month period provided for in article 15bis para. 8 to commence and, by the same token, to provide the Security Council with a 6-month period to consider whether to make use of its powers under article 16.⁷⁸

K. Article 15bis para. 7: Determination by the Security Council of an act of aggression and start of investigations

Once the Security Council has made a determination within the meaning of article 15bis para. 6⁷⁹, the Prosecutor may then proceed with a full investigation pursuant to articles 53 and 54 in respect of a crime of aggression (rather than a mere preliminary examination), thus moving from the proceedings from article 15 into the realm of article 53 and other provisions in Part 5 of the Statute,⁸⁰ without the need of a formal Security Council or State referral.

It is indeed worth noting that, unlike in the case of possible investigations concerning other crimes listed in article 5, a State referral is of no relevance when it comes to investigating a crime of aggression. In case a situation is referred to the Prosecutor by a State, possibly involving both crimes under article 5 lit. a) – c) and the crime of aggression, the Prosecutor would thus be in a position to immediately start investigations with regard to the former, but would have to wait for six months before doing so with respect to the alleged crime of aggression. Even then, the Prosecutor would eventually have to seek authorization by the Pre-Trial Division under article 15bis para. 8, provided that no relevant determination by the Security Council is forthcoming.⁸¹

L. Article 15bis para. 8: Lack of determination by the Security Council of an act of aggression and authorization of investigations by the Pre-Trial Division

I. ‘Where no such determination is made within six months after the date of notification (...)’

Article 15bis para. 8 addresses the situation in which the Security Council, after having been informed via the Secretary General of a pending preliminary investigation concerning a ⁷⁸ See infra mn 42 et seq.

⁷⁹ See mn 39.

⁸⁰ See mutatis mutandis Bergsmo, Pejić and Zhu, article 15, mn 21.

⁸¹ See infra mn 42 et seq.

possible crime of aggression, does not make a finding of an act of aggression, as outlined above⁸², within the prescribed six month period either because the Security Council simply remains silent on the matter or because a draft resolution that would have made such a determination has failed to garner the necessary majority, as required by article 27 of the Charter of the United Nations.⁸³

The six month period contemplated in article 15bis begins, as the text puts it, with ‘the date of notification’, i.e. at the point in time at which the Secretary General has been informed by the Prosecutor pursuant to article 15bis para. 6 2nd sentence.⁸⁴

II. ‘(...) the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, provided that the Pre-Trial Division has authorized the commencement of the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression in accordance with the procedure contained in article 15 (...)’

- 43 In case the Security Council fails to make a determination within the meaning of article 15bis para. 7⁸⁵ (or indeed even determines that no act of aggression has been committed in a given case), Article 15bis para. 8 provides for an alternative, namely that the Prosecutor, seeking to act proprio motu, must then seek permission by the Pre-Trial Division of the Court.

As the text itself confirms by making reference to the procedure contained in article 15, the procedure is mutatis mutandis identical to the one provided for in the said provision as far as the other crimes listed in article 5 are concerned.⁸⁶ The sole, yet important, difference lies in the fact that while article 15 paras. 3 and 4 provide for an authorization by a Pre-Trial Chamber consisting of three judges (article 39 para. 2 lit. b) (iii)), article 15bis para. 8 requires an authorization by the Pre-Trial Division consisting of no less than six judges (article 39 para. 1 2nd sentence), which confirms the relevance and political sensitivity of the decision to eventually enable such an investigation to go forward.

III. ‘(...) and the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with article 16.’

- 44 This part of article 15bis para. 8 confirms in a declaratory manner the prerogatives of the Security Council provided for in article 16⁸⁷. Accordingly, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, may also request the Court not to commence or proceed with an investigation or prosecution for a (renewable) period of 12 months with respect to an alleged crime of aggression. It seems, however, given the placement and the context of the provision as forming part of article 15bis, article 15bis para. 8 enables the Security Council to ‘tailor’ its request under article 16 to exclusively concern the crime of aggression. Put otherwise, it seems that the Security Council might prevent, for a renewable period of twelve months, the Court from investigating the crime of aggression, while at the same time letting the Court consider the very same facts concerning possible violations of the jus in bello, acts of genocide or crimes against humanity.

⁸² See mn 39.

⁸³ As to the voting requirements under article 27 UN Charter see Zimmermann, article 27, passim, in Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations (3rd ed. 2012).

⁸⁴ For details see mn 40.

⁸⁵ See mn 41.

⁸⁶ For details on article 15 see Bergsmo, Pejić and Zhu, article 15, passim.

⁸⁷ See Bergsmo, Pejić and Zhu, article 16, passim.

M. Article 15bis para. 9: Independence of the Court

Article 15bis para. 9 confirms that the Court, when asked to make a finding on a crime of aggression, which under article 8bis presupposes that an act of aggression has been committed for which a state then incurs state responsibility, is not bound by a finding made by an institution which does not form part of the Court. A literal reading of the wording seems to imply that the Court would not be bound only by a positive determination that an act of aggression has occurred. This is due to the fact that article 15bis para. 9 refers to '[a] determination of an act of aggression'⁸⁸ rather than stating that a determination on an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court would be without prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute. On the other hand, para. 9, in its English version, does not make use of the definite article 'the'⁸⁹, which would have further reinforced this limited understanding of para. 9 as applying to positive determinations only as being not binding for the Court. At the same time, the French text does just this when referring to '[l]e constat d'un acte d'agression'⁹⁰ rather than referring to 'un constat d'un acte d'agression'. This is further confirmed by the Spanish version ('La determinación de que hubo acto de agresión'⁹¹), which by using a past tense defines a determination in terms of article 15bis para. 9 as the positive assertion that an act of aggression has occurred.

It seems, however, that an interpretation in line with the provision's object and purpose, namely to safeguard the judicial integrity and independence of the Court, invites a broader interpretation. It follows that any form of determination relating to an act of aggression, be it a positive or a negative one (for example one stating that a state allegedly having committed an act of aggression had instead acted in the exercise of its right under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations), cannot therefore have an impact on the Court's ability to independently make a determination concerning the act of aggression that has possibly led to the commission of a crime of aggression. As a matter of fact, were it otherwise and would accordingly an argumentum e contrario apply, the reference to article 16 in article 15bis para. 8 would at least be partially redundant, since any negative determination that no act of aggression has occurred would then at least de facto bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction in a meaningful manner, without the need for the Security Council to make use of its article 16 powers.

During the negotiations leading to the adoption of the Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression, it was the independence of the Court vis-à-vis the Security Council that formed the core of the debate. The reference in the text to any 'organ outside the Court', the findings of which shall not prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute, is however broader. Accordingly, article 15bis para. 9 does not apply only to determinations by the Security Council as to the existence or non-existence of an act of aggression, but also to judicial findings made for purposes of State responsibility e.g. by the International Court of Justice, or by arbitral tribunals such as the Ethiopian-Eritrean Claims Commission. In line with the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice⁹², the underlying judicial philosophy of which applies mutatis mutandis, the Court should however, in principle, accept as highly persuasive relevant findings made by other judicial bodies that have dealt with the underlying act of aggression.

⁸⁸ Emphasis added.

⁸⁹ Article 15bis para. 9 would have thus read: 'The determination of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall be without prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute.'

⁹⁰ Emphasis added.

⁹¹ Emphasis added.

⁹² Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Croatia v. Serbia), Judgment (Merits), ICJ Rep. 2015, para. 182; see also Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), Judgment (Merits), ICJ Rep. 2007, 43, 134, para. 223.

Finally, the last words of article 15bis para. 9 ('the Court's own findings under this Statute') are in line with the first sentence of Understanding no. 4, namely that any findings, by the Court, on the commission on a crime of aggression are not supposed to have a bearing on the general concept of the prohibition of the use of force under general international law.⁹³

N. Article 15bis para. 10: Relationship with Article 5

- 46 Setting out the parameters of the exercise, by the Court, of its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction, article 15bis contains manifold deviations from article 12, 13 and 15. In order to avoid these peculiarities to have any impact on the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction with respect to the other crimes referred to in article 5, namely genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, article 15bis para. 10 specifies that the Court's exercise of its jurisdiction remains unaffected. This, however, may lead to practical hurdles, for example, when nationals of various states are suspects in the same proceedings involving both violations of the jus ad bellum, as well as possibly also acts of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. In such a scenario a split jurisdictional regime might apply. This would depend on whether certain suspects might also be prosecuted for having committed the crime of aggression or rather not, because their home state is either not a contracting party of the Statute or because, while being a state party, it has opted out from the Court's aggression-related jurisdiction under article 15bis para. 4.

O. Understanding no. 5: domestic jurisdiction over the crime of aggression

- 47 Understanding no. 5 adopted at the Kampala conference⁹⁴ provides:

'It is understood that the amendments shall not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State.'

It thereby confirms in a declaratory manner that the inclusion of the amendments on the crime of aggression in the Statute have no bearing on the exercise of domestic jurisdiction over the crime of aggression, either by way of obliging a State to do so or by implying a parallel right. It is noteworthy however that the said Understanding refers solely to the exercise of domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State. This might be perceived as implying e contrario that, when it comes to the exercise of domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by the forum State, the amendments might have created such an obligation, while a right to do so exists as a matter of course anyhow. Yet, under the principle of complementarity a State is not obliged to exercise criminal jurisdiction over its own nationals, the sole consequence of a non-exercise of domestic jurisdiction with respect to an alleged crime of aggression being that the Court would then be in a position to do so, provided it has jurisdiction.

⁹³ See also Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 8bis, mn 15.

⁹⁴ As to the normative relevance of those understandings see Heller (2012) 10 JICJ 229.

Article 15ter

Exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression (Security Council referral)

1. The Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b), subject to the provisions of this article.

2. The Court may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.

3. The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with this article, subject to a decision to be taken after 1 January 2017 by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute.

4. A determination of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall be without prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute.

5. This article is without prejudice to the provisions relating to the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to other crimes referred to in article 5.

Literature: See the literature on articles 5, 8bis and 15bis, as well as Ambos, K., 'The Crime of Aggression after Kampala', (2010) 53 GYbIL 463; Blokker, N., 'The crime of aggression and the United Nations Security Council', (2007) 20 LeidenJIL 867; Clark, R. S., 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2010) 2 GoJIL 689; McDougall, C., The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (CUP 2013); Reisinger Coracini, A., 'The International Criminal Court's Exercise of Jurisdiction over the Crime of Aggression – at Last ... in Reach ... over Some', (2010) 2 GoJIL 745; Schmalenbach, K., 'Das Verbrechen der Aggression vor dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof: Ein politischer Erfolg mit rechtlichen Untiefen', (2010) JZ 745; Stein, M. S., 'The Security Council, the International Criminal Court, and the Crime of Aggression', (2005) 16 Indl&ComplRev 1.

Content

A. Article 15ter within the Statute's overall jurisdictional scheme	1
B. Drafting history of Article 15ter	2
C. Article 15ter para. 1: exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13 para. (b)	3
I. General issues	3
II. 'The Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b) (...)'	4
III. '(...) subject to the provisions of this article.'	5
D. Entry into force and jurisdiction ratione temporis over the crime of aggression (article 15ter paras. 2 and 3; Understanding no. 1)	6
E. Article 15ter para. 4: Independence of the Court	7
F. Article 15ter para. 5: Relationship with Article 5	8

A. Article 15ter within the Statute's overall jurisdictional scheme

Of the three different ways of triggering the Court's jurisdiction established under article 13, article 15ter, as introduced into the Statute as part of the Kampala compromise on the crime of aggression along article 15bis and 8bis, relates to article 13 para. (b). Accordingly, article 15ter exclusively deals with referrals by the Security Council, while State referrals, as well as proceedings started proprio motu by the Prosecutor, are addressed in turn, as far as the crime of aggression is concerned, by article 15bis.

While article 15bis contains significant deviations from the regular jurisdictional scheme underlying the Court's Statute, article 15ter is much more in line with the regular jurisdictional scheme otherwise applying in case of Security Council referrals, as provided for in article 13 para. (b). Not the least, this holds true for the fact that in case of a Security Council referral, as opposed to when the Court exercises its treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction¹, the Court might even, as confirmed by Understanding no. 2, be able to exercise its aggression-related jurisdiction, when respective crimes of aggression were committed on the territory of a State not having accepted the Court’s aggression-related jurisdiction, or by nationals of such a State.²

B. Drafting history of Article 15ter

- 2 As shown³, the content of article 15bis, and in particular the question whether the Court should be in a position to exercise its treaty-based jurisdiction concerning the crime of aggression, regardless of whether the Security Council had previously made a determination as to the occurrence of an act of aggression or not, constituted one of the most vividly debated issues prior to and during the Kampala Review Conference. In contrast thereto, during the negotiation process there existed, by and large, a consensus that mutatis mutandis the jurisdictional scheme underlying article 13 para. (b) should also apply when it comes to the crime of aggression alongside the eventual exercise, by the Court, of its treaty-based, aggression-related jurisdiction.

From early on, the Special Working Group agreed in principle that a Security Council referral should not depend on whether the respective States had ratified the amendments,⁴ an assumption not challenged during the Kampala Review Conference. However, during the Conference, the participants discussed (initiated by a proposal by Argentina, Brazil and Switzerland [ABS]) whether Security Council referrals should be possible after a single ratification of the amendments, in accordance with article 121 para. 5. Though this idea has not been adopted eventually, the respective ABS proposal turned out as the momentum triggering the introduction of a separate article 15ter. A further proposal by the ABS States (handed in together with Canada on 9 June 2010) featured a consent-based jurisdiction regime, including an opt-out option, and a non-exclusive Security Council filter,⁵ and constituted the basis for the final drafting process.

C. Article 15ter para. 1: exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13 para. (b)

I. General issues

- 3 Given that article 15ter para. 1 is, mutatis mutandis, identical to article 15bis para. 1, the very same considerations which apply to article 15bis para. 1 as outlined above⁶, also apply with regard to article 15ter para. 1 with the obvious exception that the last part of article 15ter para. 1 makes reference to article 13 para. (b), rather than to paras. (a) and (c).

II. ‘The Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b) (...).’

- 4 In line with the compromise reached in Kampala, Article 15ter para. 1 provides that ‘[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13,

¹ For details see Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 21 et seq.

² For details see infra mn 4.

³ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 2.

⁴ Barriga, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 3, 40.

⁵ Barriga, in: Barriga and Kreß (eds.), The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (2012) 3, 49, 51; also see Ambos, Treatise on ICL II (2014) 192 et seq.

⁶ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 3–7.

paragraph (b)).⁷ Article 15ter thus exclusively covers Security Council referrals, State referrals and proceedings initiated proprio motu by the Prosecutor being regulated by article 15bis para. 1.⁸

Such referrals are then governed by the regular requirements contained in article 13 para. (b), namely that the situation has been referred to the Prosecutor by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.⁹

As already indicated by the very term itself, any such ‘referral’ by the Security Council does not require an explicit previous determination of an act of aggression, nor would such a referral amount to one, even less so since the Council rarely ever makes such specific determinations.¹⁰ What is more, one might even wonder, whether the Security Council even has to formally act under Chapter VII, or whether instead a reference to Chapter VII might be implied in any such referral.¹¹

In contrast to article 15bis para. 4, article 15ter does not provide for the possibility of a State’s opting out of the Court’s aggression-related Security Council-based jurisdiction. The Court may thus exercise its jurisdiction under article 15ter regardless of whether a State Party has opted out from the Court’s treaty-based aggression-related jurisdiction under article 15bis para. 4 or whether it is not a State Party at all. This is confirmed by Understanding no. 2 which provides:

‘It is understood that the Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression on the basis of a Security Council referral in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b), of the Statute irrespective of whether the State concerned has accepted the Court’s jurisdiction in this regard.’

III. ‘(...) subject to the provisions of this article.’

Para. 1 of article 15ter further clarifies that, while acknowledging the possibility of Security Council referrals under article 13 para. (a) even when it comes to the crime of aggression, such proceedings are then subject to the specific requirements and conditions contained in article 15ter paras. 2–5, as constituting lex specialis.

One issue, however, not addressed as such in article 15ter is whether the Security Council may, when referring a situation under article 13 para. (b) in conjunction with article 15ter para. 1, either make a selective referral by only referring the crime of aggression, or, on the contrary, while referring a situation as such, could by the same token refrain from also endorsing the Court with a Security Council-based aggression-related jurisdiction. Yet, given that under article 13 para. (b), the Security Council refers ‘a situation’ rather than a specific crime¹², and further given that article 15ter para. 1 makes reference to the Court, exercising its jurisdiction ‘in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b)’ in case of a Security Council referral potentially involving the commission of the crime of aggression, it seems that the Security Council is faced with an either/or-situation: it can either refer a situation as such (thereby enabling the Court to also exercise substance-matter jurisdiction vis-à-vis the crime of aggression), or not refer such a situation at all (thereby preventing the Court from prosecuting any of the other crimes listed in article 5, unless the Court could exercise its ⁷ As to the specific content of article 13, paras. (a) and (c) see Schabas and Pecorella, article 13, mn 15 and 20 respectively.

⁸ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 6.

⁹ For further details see Schabas and Pecorella, article 13, mn 16 et seq.

¹⁰ See already Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 39.

¹¹ As to the question whether the Security Council may implicitly act under Chapter VII, without formally invoking its Chapter VII powers see generally Zimmermann, ‘Humanitarian Assistance and the Security Council’, Israeli Law Review (forthcoming 2015).

¹² Apart from the wording of article 13, this is also confirmed by article 44 para. 2 Rules of Procedure and Evidence. While this provision relates to article 12 para. 3 of the Statute, it underscores that even where the Statute (mistakenly) refers to the acceptance, by a State, of the Court’s jurisdiction with respect to a ‘crime in question’, any such acceptance relates to an overall situation rather than a specific crime; for further details see Schabas and Pecorella, article 13, mn 15 et seq. with further references.

treaty-based jurisdiction over those crimes, but had no jurisdiction over the crime of aggression, given the jurisdictional limitations contained in article 15bis paras. 4 and 5).¹³

One might also assume, however, that as a third alternative the Security Council could de facto limit the Court's substance-matter jurisdiction by deliberately circumscribing the Court's temporal jurisdiction in a specific manner. The Security Council could thus refer a 'situation' covering only a limited period of time, e.g. 'the situation in State x from date y to date z', thereby enabling investigations only with regard to the alleged crimes having taken place during that specific period, such as the initial crime of aggression, without providing the Court with jurisdiction over e.g. war crimes, which might have taken place only after that date, or indeed vice versa.

With regard to the question of whether the Security Council might circumscribe the individuals who shall face prosecution, States as well as the Court seem to have accepted a division of roles between the Security Council and the Prosecutor¹⁴, given that Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005)¹⁵, as well as Security Council Resolution 1970 (2011)¹⁶, have both specifically excluded certain groups of individuals from the Court's jurisdiction. However, when it comes to limiting a 'situation' not by way of defining the individuals coming within the Court's jurisdiction ratione personae, but by way of referring a certain period of time only, such a limitation would still comply with the Security Council's position towards the Court, as the Council would not try to act as a Prosecutor, who has to select individual defendants when assessing the results of his own investigations. Rather, the Security Council would merely make use of its prerogatives under Chapter VII of the Charter, in order to assess which factual situations (and if so within what limits) constitute a threat to international peace and security in accordance with article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations.

It is also worth noting that where the Court is in a position to exercise its treaty-based jurisdiction over the crimes listed in articles 5 para. 1 lit. (a) to (c), but not its treaty-based jurisdiction related to the crime of aggression due to the jurisdictional aggression-specific limitations contained in article 15bis paras. 4 and 5, a Security Council referral under article 13 para. (b) (in conjunction with article 15ter para. 1) would de facto amount to such a partial referral.

D. Entry into force and jurisdiction ratione temporis over the crime of aggression (article 15ter paras. 2 and 3; Understanding no. 1)

- 6 Article 15ter paras. 2 and 3, as well as Understanding no. 1, are mutatis mutandis identical to article 15bis paras. 2 and 3 respectively except that Understanding no. 1 refers to 'a decision in accordance with article 15ter, paragraph 3', while Understanding no. 3 refers to such a decision taken 'in accordance with article 15bis, paragraph 3'. Accordingly, the same considerations that apply to those latter provisions¹⁷ also apply to the former.

It is worth noting however that these two understandings, as adopted in Kampala, as well as article 15bis para. 3 and article 15ter para. 3 each refer to 'a decision'. This could be taken to imply that there ought not to necessarily be one single decision, identical in content, even if for all practical purposes it is to be expected that there will be only one such decision laying ¹³ See Schmalenbach (2010) JZ 745, 751.

¹⁴ McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 276 et seq.; For the opposing view, see Condorelli and Villalpando, in: Cassese, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Volume ii (2002) 627, 633, who argue that the Security Council may limit the referral of a situation to certain individuals, but that such a limitation does not prevent the Prosecutor from stopping to proceed on these grounds or from initiating further investigations.

¹⁵ UN DOC S/RES/1593 (31 March 2005), Situation in Darfur, para. 6.

¹⁶ UN DOC S/RES/1970 (26 February 2011), Situation in Libya, para. 6.

¹⁷ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 8 et seq.

down identical parameters for the exercise of both, the Court's treaty-based and its Security Council-based aggression-related jurisdiction.

E. Article 15ter para. 4: Independence of the Court

Article 15ter para. 4 is completely identical to article 15bis para. 9. Accordingly, the same 7 considerations applying to this latter provision¹⁸ also apply to the former. It is worth noting, however, that even a referral by the Security Council under Chapter VII in conjunction with article 13 para. (b) and article 15ter para. 1 does not necessarily per se amount to such a determination, given that article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations does not require an act of aggression to have taken place in order to trigger the Security Council's Chapter VII powers. Accordingly, and on the whole, even once the Security Council has referred a situation to the Court, the latter remains independent and may deviate from the findings of the Security Council.¹⁹

F. Article 15ter para. 5: Relationship with Article 5

Once more, Article 15ter para. 5 is completely identical to article 15bis para. 10. 8 Accordingly, the same considerations which apply to this latter provision²⁰ also apply to the former.

¹⁸ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 45.

¹⁹ Clark (2010) 2 GoJIL 689, 703; Reisinger Coracini (2010) 2 GoJIL 745, 749; Werle and Jessberger, Principles of ICL (2014) 553; for a view with a differing emphasis see McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2013) 278, who stresses that 'this paragraph should not be taken to mean that Security Council resolutions determining that an act of aggression has occurred will be of no material effect in the Court reaching its own conclusion as to whether the definition of an act of aggression under Article 8bis (2), or indeed the crime of aggression under Article 8bis (1), has been met'.

²⁰ See Zimmermann and Freiburg, article 15bis, mn 46.

Article 16

Deferral of investigation or prosecution

No investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute for a period of 12 months after the Security Council, in a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has requested the Court to that effect; that request may be renewed by the Council under the same conditions.

Literature: Bourgon, S., 'Jurisdiction ratione temporis', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, i (2002) 554; Cryer, R., 'The Security Council, Article 16 and Darfur', Oxford Transitional Justice Research Working Paper Series, 29 October 2008 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2871fa/>); Frowein, J.A. and Kirsch, N., 'Article 39' in: Simma, B., Khan, D.-E., Nolte, G. and Paulus, A. (eds.) The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (OUP 3rd edition 2012) 1272; Mokhtar, A., 'The Fine Art of Arm-twisting: The US, Resolution 1422 and Security Council Deferral Power under the Rome Statute', (2003) 3 ICLRev 295; Scheffer, D., 'The Security Council's Struggle over Darfur and International Justice', The Jurist, 20 August 2008 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6ca103/>).

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	12
1. 'investigation or prosecution'	12
2. 'commenced or proceeded with'	17
3. 'period of 12 months'	22
4. 'resolution adopted under Chapter VII'	23
5. 'request may be renewed under the same conditions'	26

A. Introduction/General remarks

- 1 Article 16 empowers the Security Council to prevent or stop an ICC investigation or prosecution for a renewable period of 12 months by means of a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. It defines one critical aspect of a three-pronged relationship between the Court and the Security Council provided for in the Statute and its Amendment: apart from the power to defer proceedings, the Council can also trigger the Court's jurisdiction¹, and play a role with respect to the crime of aggression². The drafting of the article was very contentious, reflecting the widely divergent views expressed throughout the negotiating process on what the link should be between the Court as a judicial body and the Security Council as a political organ of the United Nations. Even when it became clear in Preparatory Committee negotiations, that a majority of States supported some form of Security Council deferral power, the modalities of its exercise remained controversial. The present wording of article 16 emerged only in the last stages of the Diplomatic Conference³.
- 2 The initial 1994 ILC Draft Statute had defined the relationship between the ICC and the Security Council very differently⁴. In fact, rather than granting the Council the power to defer

¹ Article 13 (b).

² Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the Crime of Aggression, Resolution RC/Res. 6, 11 June 2010, annex I, art. 15bis(8).

³ See the Bureau's 10 July 1998 Proposal, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 ('Part 2. Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law'), p. 13.

⁴ See 1994 ILC Draft Statute, II, B, I ('Draft Statute for an international criminal court'), article 23 para. 3, p. 85. The totality of the relationship between the ICC and the Security Council was initially provided for in one article of the ILC Draft Statute. Article 23 para. 1 dealt with the Council's power to trigger the Court's jurisdiction, subparagraph 2 specified its role in proceedings related to an act of aggression, and subparagraph 3 defined what eventually evolved into the Council's deferral power in article 16 of the Statute. The ILC Draft did not envisage any enforcement role for the Council. The entire article was renumbered article 10 in the so-called proceedings, article 23 para. 3 provided that '[n]o prosecution may be commenced under this Statute arising from a situation which is being dealt with by the Security Council as a threat to or breach of the peace or an act of aggression under Chapter VII of the Charter, unless the Security Council otherwise decides'. As envisaged by the ILC, the burden would rest on the Court to monitor the Security Council's agenda in order to determine whether a prosecution could be initiated. The Council would not need to request deferral because the ICC would have to exercise self restraint with respect to prosecutions arising from situations being dealt with by the Council under its Chapter VII authority, unless the Council otherwise decided. The ILC commentary to the Draft Statute specified that the relationship between the two bodies was structured analogously to the relationship between the Security Council and the UN General Assembly pursuant to article 12 of the UN Charter⁵. Although the commentary clarified that the Council 'should be acting'⁶ to maintain or restore international peace and security for the Court to be precluded from commencing a prosecution arising out of a Chapter VII situation, the ILC Draft did not require that the Council pass a resolution on deferral. In other words, no permanent member of the Council would be able to prevent the Council from blocking a prosecution by the Court. The commentary also noted the view of some ILC members who thought that article 23 para. 3 of the ILC Draft Statute was 'undesirable', because 'the processes of the Statute should not be prevented from operating through political decisions taken in other forums'⁷. The commentary included the view that article 23 as a whole should possibly be omitted because of the inequality it created between members of the Security Council and non-member States, as well as between the Council's permanent members and other States⁸. It was even suggested that a savings clause referring to 'the paramountcy of the Charter' be inserted in a preambular paragraph to the ICC Statute as a way of resolving the ICC-Security Council relationship⁹.

More elaborate explanations of the different positions with respect to article 23 para. 3 ILC 3 Draft Statute were presented in the discussions held within the Ad Hoc Committee in 1995¹⁰ and later the Preparatory Committee¹¹. Three basic views were enunciated. According to the first, the Security Council's power to approve prosecutions had to be retained as an acknowledgment of the Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security under article 24 para. 1 of the UN Charter. The ICC, it was said, should not be able to act 'in defiance'¹² of the Charter or to insert itself in 'delicate'¹³ matters being dealt with by the Council. Proponents of this position maintained that article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute should be amended to include not only Chapter VII situations, but all situations which were being dealt with by the Council¹⁴. Pursuant to a second view, article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute should be deleted because it infringed on the judicial independence of the Court¹⁵. It was noted that the Council had been seized of a high number of situations – without effectively dealing with them – for decades, and that the ICC would be precluded from taking action in similar situations in the future under the ILC proposal. More importantly, it was emphasized that the International Court of Justice was not subject to Zutphen Draft, pp. 39–41, and only became article 16, devoted solely to the Council's deferral power, at the conclusion of the Rome Conference.

⁵ Article 12 para. 1 of the UN Charter provides: 'While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendations with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests'.

⁶ 1994 ILC Draft Statute, note 4, p. 87.

⁷ Ibid., p. 45.

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ Ibid.

¹⁰ See Ad Hoc Committee Report, pp. 28–29.

¹¹ See 1996 Preparatory Committee I, pp. 33–34.

¹² Ibid., p. 33.

¹³ Ibid.

¹⁴ Ibid. See also the Statement of the United States Delegation 'Trigger Mechanism: The Role of the Security Council and of Complaints by States, articles 23 and 25', Apr. 1996 (on file with the authors).

¹⁵ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 11, p. 33.

similar Security Council control and that the UN Charter allowed concurrent action by the two bodies with respect to the same situation¹⁶. The third view was that some safeguard for the Charter position of the Security Council should be preserved, but that article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute was not adequate in that it was too broad and vague. It lacked criteria for determining when a situation was being ‘dealt with’ by the Council, or an interpretation of what ‘threat to or breach of the peace’ meant. It also failed to limit the amount of time that the Council could be seized of a Chapter VII situation. A suggestion was made to amend the provision so that the ICC would be empowered to proceed with a prosecution if the Council did not take action ‘within a reasonable time’¹⁷. It was also proposed that the paragraph be amended to permit the ICC to initiate a prosecution unless the Security Council formally asked the Court not to do so in accordance with article 27 of the UN Charter¹⁸.

- 4 The breakthrough in ICC negotiations on article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute came at the August 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee when Singapore formally proposed an amendment reversing the structure of the ICC-Security Council relationship as initially provided for in the 1994 ILC Draft Statute. Under the Singapore text, which became the basis of the second option of article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute in further drafting work, ‘[n]o investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute where the Security Council has, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, given a direction to that effect’¹⁹.

The proposal substituted Security Council approval of ICC proceedings with the notion of a deferral power and prepared the ground for what is now article 16 of the ICC Statute. Canada added to the Singapore proposal by suggesting the 12 month renewable deferral period²⁰ and Costa Rica further proposed that deferral be requested by a ‘formal and specific decision’ of the Security Council²¹. Even though the Singapore proposal included both investigation and prosecution within the ambit of the Security Council’s deferral power, it should be noted that the corresponding text of option 2 of article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute as agreed on during the August 1997 Preparatory Committee session still referred only to prosecution²².

- 5 It was UK support, as expressed in the course of the December 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee, that signaled a breakthrough in terms of the political viability of the Singapore proposal. The UK was the first permanent Security Council member to endorse the change of emphasis in ICC-Security Council relations provided for in Singapore’s amendment²³.

Furthermore, it was a British text for article 10 para. 2 (formerly article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute), introduced at the March-April 1998 Preparatory Committee session, that served as a basis for the final wording of what is now article 16²⁴. Pursuant to the UK

¹⁶ Ibid.

¹⁷ 1996 Preparatory Committee I, note 11, p. 34.

¹⁸ Ibid. For the wording of the specific proposals, see 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 75–77.

¹⁹ Proposal by Singapore on article 23, Non-Paper/WG.3/No.16 (8 Aug. 1997) (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8ec1f1/>).

²⁰ Under the Canadian text, ‘[n]o investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute for a period of twelve months where the Security Council has, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, notified the Court to that effect. Notification that the Security Council is continuing to act may be renewed at twelve month intervals’, see Proposal Submitted by Canada for article 23 (11 Aug. 1997) (on file with the authors).

²¹ Under the Costa Rican text, ‘[n]o investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this statute where the Security Council has, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, taken a formal and specific decision, and limited for a certain period of time, to that effect’, see Proposals by Costa Rica on article 23: Paragraph 3 on Singapore’s Proposal, Non-Paper/WG.3/No.23 (11 Aug. 1997) (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2fde08/>).

²² Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 8.

²³ See Legal Experts Agree on an Outline for a Global Criminal Court, New York Times, 14 Dec. 1997, p. A 8.

²⁴ Proposal by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Trigger Mechanism, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/WG.3/DP.1 (25 Mar. 1998).

proposal, which was also included in the Draft ICC Statute which the Preparatory Committee forwarded to the Rome Conference, [n]o investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute [for a period of twelve months] after the Security Council [, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,] has requested the Court to that effect; that request may be renewed by the Council under the same conditions²⁵.

As may be noted, the text includes investigation, as well as prosecution, within the scope of the Council's deferral power.

By the time the first of two Bureau papers narrowing down drafting options on the major 6 issues of the ICC Statute was released at the Rome Conference, the initial 1994 ILC proposal on Security Council approval of ICC proceedings had been omitted²⁶. Debates in the Committee of the Whole had shown that the majority of States supported some variant of the Singapore proposal, while a minority still favoured no role for the Council at all²⁷. As a result, the first Bureau paper provided three options for article 10 para. 2 – its retention in the wording that had been suggested by the UK, a revised version of the UK proposal²⁸, or the deletion of the paragraph as such²⁹. The second Bureau paper essentially contained the same three options, the first of which became article 16 of the ICC Statute. It is essentially the UK wording, amended to provide that a Security Council request for deferral must be made in the form of a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Option 2 contained a modified variant of the deferral process. It limited the Council's power by specifying that deferral could only result in the suspension of ICC proceedings, which implied that the Council could not prevent the opening of an investigation or prosecution as such. It also omitted specific reference to a 12 month deferral period, suggesting that a suspension of an investigation or prosecution could be shorter as well³⁰. Option 3, once again, provided for the deletion of any reference to a Security Council deferral power.

The drafting history of article 16 gives rise to at least three comments. First, political 7 considerations were not surprisingly given more weight than legal arguments in the determination of the appropriate role for the Security Council in ICC proceedings. Secondly, the Security Council's deferral power confirms its decisive role in dealing with situations where the requirements of peace and justice seem to be in conflict. Thirdly, article 16 provides an unprecedented opportunity for the Council to influence the work of a judicial body.

It was clear from the start of the ICC process that the ICC-Security Council relationship 8 was one of the main political problems that had to be resolved if the negotiations were to reach a successful conclusion. Security Council influence over ICC proceedings was a key element of the so-called 'package' of issues – which also included subject-matter jurisdiction, complementarity, exercise of jurisdiction and the trigger mechanism – with a crucial bearing on the Court's independence and efficacy. Striking a widely acceptable balance between these elements was at the heart of the three and half years of preparatory work on the ICC Statute and of the five-week Rome Conference.

²⁵ Preparatory Committee (Consolidated) Draft, p. 39.

²⁶ See Bureau Discussion Paper of 6 July 1998, 'Part 2. Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law', UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 (1998), pp. 15–16.

²⁷ See The Numbers: NGO Coalition Special Report on Country Positions, CICC Monitor, 10 July 1998 (on file with the authors).

²⁸ Bureau Discussion Paper, note 26, did not indicate what those revisions might be. Option 2 of article 10 para. 2, on p. 16. just says 'A revised version of option 1'. The revisions were, however, included in the next Bureau paper, note 3, mentioned below.

²⁹ Bureau Discussion Paper, note 26, pp. 15–16.

³⁰ Article 10, option 2 reads: 'In the event that the Court is requested by the Security Council, acting by resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, to suspend its investigation or prosecution of a situation for a specified period of time, then the Court shall suspend such activity for such a period of time; that request may be renewed by the Security Council under the same conditions', see Bureau's Proposal, note 3, p. 13.

- 9 It was a widely held view among delegates and observers in the negotiating process that the initial article 23 para. 3 ILC Draft Statute subordinated the Court to Security Council control in a way which would have significantly undermined its ability to operate. To have required, in effect, the Council's approval of prosecutions, given the fact that Chapter VII situations are precisely those in which most crimes within the Court's jurisdiction are likely to be committed, could have made the Court ineffective. The veto of one permanent Security Council member would have sufficed to prevent or stop the ICC from acting, thereby rendering the Court politically dependent on the Council. The importance of the Singapore proposal, as incorporated into article 16, is that it allows the Court to proceed if only one permanent Security Council member objects to the issuance of a resolution requesting deferral. Because of the public nature of such a resolution and, most likely, the public nature of the crimes that the Court will be asked to desist from addressing, deferral will be politically more difficult to justify than approval.
- 10 While article 16 requires that the Security Council take positive action to prevent or stop an ICC investigation or prosecution, it is conceivable that some requests for deferral will garner the necessary nine Council votes and no use of the veto power. As deferral can only be requested by a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, it is likely that the ICC will be prevented or stopped from acting exactly in those serious situations where crimes within the Court's jurisdiction have been committed. In practice, article 16 allows the Council to request the Court not to investigate or prosecute when the requisite majority of its members conclude that judicial action – or the threat of it – might harm the Council's efforts to maintain international peace and security pursuant to the Charter. This is not an easy argument to go forward with insofar as the Council has established international criminal jurisdictions with the justification that this would contribute to the maintenance and restoration of peace³¹. Article 16 will be the vehicle for resolving conflicts between the perceived requirements of peace and justice where the Council assesses that the peace efforts need to be given priority over international criminal justice. This might raise problems of selectivity and political control over prosecutorial discretion which one must hope will not affect the Court's long term credibility. The permanent members of the Security Council that are ICC State Parties have a particular responsibility in this regard. Article 16 is also unprecedented in terms of the legal relationship it establishes between the Security Council and a judicial body. Neither the ICJ in its work nor national courts dealing with crimes arising from situations on the Security Council's agenda under Chapter VII are under an express obligation to defer proceedings upon a request by the Council.
- 11 The practice of the UN Security Council since 2002 as regards article 16 has been deeply controversial. In resolution 1422 (2002) of 12 July 2002, the Council requested, 'consistent with the provisions of Article 16 of the Rome Statute, that the ICC, if a case arises involving current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State not a Party to the Rome Statute over acts or omissions relating to a United Nations established or authorized operation, shall for a twelve-month period starting 1 July 2002 not commence or proceed with investigation or prosecution of any such case, unless the Security Council decides otherwise'³². The resolution also expressed 'the intention to renew the request [...] under the same conditions each 1 July for further 12-month periods for as long as may be necessary'³³. The resolution was very controversial, generating broad public debate³⁴. Nevertheless, one ³¹ See the reference to how the establishment of the ICTY 'would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace' in UN Security Council resolution 808 (1993) of 22 Feb. 1993 (preambular paragraph nine) and 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993 (preambular paragraph six). Interestingly, the corresponding resolution 955 (1994) of 8 Nov. 1994 refers to how the establishment of the ICTR 'would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace' (preambular paragraph seven).

³² Operative paragraph 1.

³³ Ibid., operative paragraph 2.

³⁴ See the comprehensive report by Amnesty International: 'The unlawful attempt by the Security Council to give US citizens permanent impunity from international justice', May 2003, AI Index IOR 40/006/2003.

year later, on 12 June 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1487 (2003) which repeated the request to the Court for another 12-month period with the same expression of intention to continue the requests for as long as may be necessary³⁵. Resolutions 1422 and 1487 were criticized by a considerable number of government representatives at the time of adoption³⁶ and generated broad public debate, which questioned the compatibility of these resolutions with article 16 of the Rome Statute³⁷.

In resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, concerning the situation in Liberia, the Council did not refer to article 16, but nonetheless decided 'that current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State, which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that contributing State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to the Multinational Force or United Nations stabilization force in Liberia, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by that contributing State'³⁸. The lack of reference to Article 16 did not immunize resolution 1497 from criticisms of its inconsistency with the Rome Statute. During the passage of this resolution, a number of states similarly claimed that the Security Council did not invoke article 16 in a manner envisaged by its drafters.

In resolution 1593 (2005) of 31 March 2005, whereby the Council referred the situation in Darfur to the Prosecutor of the Court, operative paragraph 6 provided that officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is a non-State Party shall be subjected in the same way to the exclusive criminal jurisdiction of that State in connection with AU or UN operations in Sudan³⁹. It is not clear upon which legal basis this paragraph relies. In the preamble of the resolution, the Council simply recalled 'article 16 of the Rome Statute under which no investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with by the International Criminal Court for a period of 12 months after a Security Council request to that effect'⁴⁰. It is not obvious why a resolution referring a situation to the ICC should contain this deferral provision. An identical operative paragraph 6 and preambular reference to article 16 of the Rome Statute was included in the resolution 1970 (2011) of 26 February 2011, which referred the situation in Libya to the ICC.

Article 16 was also an issue before the Security Council when the African Union called for a deferral of the situation in Darfur following the application by the ICC Prosecutor for an arrest warrant against the Sudanese President in 2008. In the Kenya situation, the Security Council was once again asked to consider a deferral resolution, which would have postponed the ICC proceedings against the Kenyan President and his deputy, who face charges related to 2008 post-election violence. So far the Security Council has not approved any deferral requests in relation to these situations.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

1. 'investigation or prosecution'

The article 16 bar to ICC proceedings pursuant to a Security Council deferral request applies to both 'investigation' and 'prosecution'. The inclusion of 'investigation' within the Council's deferral power was initially proposed in August 1997 by Singapore and reiterated ³⁵ See the first and second operative paragraphs.

³⁶ Statements of the Representatives of Canada, Germany, Argentina, Ukraine, Colombia, Samoa, Malaysia, Fiji, Cuba, UN SCOR, 57th Sess., 4568th mtg., UN Doc.S/PV.4568, 10 July 2002; see also Statements of the Representatives of Netherlands, Switzerland, France, Greece, New Zealand, Argentina, Uruguay, Malawi, South Africa, Brazil, Nigeria, Trinidad and Tobago, UN SCOR, 58th Sess., 4772nd mtg., UN Doc.S/PV.4772, 12 June 2003.

³⁷ E.g., see Mokhtar (2003) 3 ICLRev, 295, 307–317.

³⁸ Operative paragraph 7.

³⁹ Operative paragraph 6.

⁴⁰ Second preambular paragraph.

in the March 1998 UK text that eventually became the basis for article 16. The ICC Statute does not define either an investigation or a prosecution, but indicates that an investigation involves action that may be taken with respect to both a situation and/or an individual⁴¹, whereas a prosecution comprises only actions taken with respect to a specific person. Both investigations and prosecutions are the responsibility of the Office of the Prosecutor, headed by the Prosecutor⁴².

- 13 An investigation comprises the totality of investigative actions undertaken by the Prosecutor under the ICC Statute after an investigation has started in order to ensure the confirmation of charges against an individual suspected of having committed crimes within the Court's jurisdiction. Investigations are initiated by the Prosecutor upon the referral of a situation either by a State Party to the Statute or the Security Council⁴³, or by the Prosecutor acting *proprio motu*⁴⁴. The Prosecutor shall initiate an investigation if he or she finds, after having evaluated the information made available to him or her, that there is a reasonable basis to proceed, considering the factors provided for in article 53 para. 1 (a)-(c). When the Prosecutor initiates an investigation proprio motu, he or she must first obtain the authorization of the Pre-Trial Chamber as specified in article 15 before article 53 comes into play.
- 14 The drafting history of the ICC Statute makes it clear that the term 'situations' that may be referred to the Prosecutor by a State Party or the Security Council was deliberately used to exclude the referral of individual cases for investigation⁴⁵. The Statute is silent on whether the Prosecutor may proprio motu initiate an investigation with a specific individual in mind, but it would be only logical to assume that he or she may do so.
- 15 Since both 'investigation' and 'prosecution' can be prevented or stopped by the Security Council under article 16, it has no practical significance to draw a temporal line or otherwise distinguish between the two phases when interpreting the article. Under one possible reading, prosecution comprises actions taken after the Pre-Trial Chamber has issued a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear pursuant to article 58⁴⁶. The more realistic view, however, is that prosecution comprises actions taken once charges against an individual have been confirmed in accordance with article 61⁴⁷. Based on this reading, it is fair to assume that prosecution under the Rome Statute encompasses the totality of actions undertaken by the Prosecutor to secure the conviction of a person against whom charges have been confirmed in accordance with article 61. Prosecution ends with the rendering of a final judgment, if necessary on appeal.
- 16 It may not be concluded, however, that by referring to both 'investigation' and 'prosecution', article 16 extends the Security Council's deferral power to the totality of activities of the Prosecutor. The Statute clearly states that steps taken by the Prosecutor prior to the Pre-Trial Chamber's authorization of an investigation only constitute a 'preliminary examination', not the beginning of an investigation⁴⁸. Indeed, the purpose of the authorization is to enable the Prosecutor to start an investigation. Among the steps which the Prosecutor can take before an investigation starts are seeking 'information from States, organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental or non-governmental organizations, or other reliable sources that he or ⁴¹ See, e.g., articles 14, 15 and 55.

⁴² See article 42 paras. 1 and 2.

⁴³ See articles 13 (a) and 14, and 13 (b) respectively; and article 53 paras. 1 and 2.

⁴⁴ See articles 13 (c) and 15; and article 53 paras. 1 and 2.

⁴⁵ The commentary to the 1994 ILC Draft Statute already stated that the Security Council 'would not normally refer to the Court a 'case' in the sense of an allegation against named individuals', see 1994 ILC Draft Statute, note 4, p. 85. The initial ILC proposition under article 25 of the 1994 Draft Statute was that States Parties would be able to lodge complaints with the Prosecutor against specific individuals. That position, as evidenced by the wording of article 14 of the Rome Statute, was modified in the ICC negotiating process.

⁴⁶ This reading could also be based on article 53 para. 2 of the Statute which implies that a sufficient basis for prosecution may be a warrant or summons issued under article 58.

⁴⁷ Article 61 also has a higher standard of evidence required ('substantial' as opposed to 'reasonable' grounds to believe that the person committed the crime charged).

⁴⁸ See article 15 para. 6.

she deems appropriate', receiving 'written or oral testimony at the seat of the Court', as well as analysing the information received⁴⁹. The Security Council cannot prevent the Prosecutor from taking these steps on the basis of article 16. The practice of the Office of the Prosecutor of in-depth preliminary examination serves interests of both quality and rational administration of justice. There is a presumption that the Office can undertake the same types of activities in an article 16 situation as it has been doing in its established preliminary examination practice.

2. 'commenced or proceeded with'

Article 16 provides that no investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with after a Security Council deferral request has been issued. Two questions may be posed with respect to this element of article 16. The first is when is an investigation or prosecution 'commenced', and the second is, how is the Council informed that an investigation is about to commence? 17

As regards the first question, the commencement of an investigation does not depend on how the Court's jurisdiction is triggered. The investigation is commenced when the Prosecutor determines that there is a 'reasonable basis to proceed' with an investigation and renders a decision to that effect. The Statute does not specify whether such a decision must be formal, but this may be implied from the text of article 53 para. 3, which explicitly refers to and elaborates the consequences of the Prosecutor's 'decision not to proceed'⁵⁰. Article 53 para. 1 does not, however, entail any formal procedure which the Prosecutor must go through to open an investigation, except (i) the obligation to consider the criteria in litera (a)-(c), and (ii) to inform the Pre-Trial Chamber if a decision not to proceed is only based on an interest of justice consideration. The Prosecutor must consider whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation both under article 15 para. 3 and article 53 para. 1. In the latter case there is only judicial supervision of the Prosecutor's conclusion if he or she decides that an investigation would not serve the interests of justice⁵¹. When peace considerations reach the level of interests of justice, the system of the Rome Statute is that the Prosecutor can decide not to commence an investigation or prosecution on that basis, whereas it is the UN Security Council that can suspend investigations or prosecutions on that basis. 18

As to the second question, the Statute does not oblige the Court to inform the Security Council about the commencement of an investigation. Article 18 para. 1, however, requires the Prosecutor to notify States Parties and other States that 'would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned' that a situation has been referred to the Court by a State Party pursuant to article 13 (a) and that the Prosecutor has determined that there would be a reasonable basis to commence an investigation. The article also obliges the Prosecutor to notify the above-mentioned States if he or she initiates an investigation proprio motu. Even though the Prosecutor has no duty to inform the Security Council as such about the commencement of an investigation initiated upon a State Party referral or on his or her own motion, the Council members will have ample opportunity to learn of it even if the investigation is not based on a referral of a situation by the Council itself. The practice of the 19

⁴⁹ See article 15 para. 2.

⁵⁰ Regulation 12, Section 4, Part 2 of the Draft Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor, prepared at the Court in 2003, addresses the 'Decision to start or not to start investigation'.

⁵¹ The relationship between articles 15 and 53 was not adequately considered by the negotiating delegations. On the one hand, the burden on the Prosecutor cannot be lighter when the Court's jurisdiction is triggered through article 13 (c) rather than article 13 (a) or (b). Article 53 para. 1 (b) requires that the Prosecutor considers whether the case would be admissible under article 17. Article 15 para. 3 does not. On the other hand, it is only when the Prosecutor decides not to proceed with an investigation under article 53 para. 1 that the Pre-Trial Chamber may stand in the Prosecutor's way, which may in some situations serve the object and purpose of the Statute.

Office of the Prosecutor so far suggested that it would announce a decision by the Prosecutor to open an investigation through a press release⁵².

- 20 Article 16 permits the Security Council not only to prevent the start of an investigation or prosecution, but also to stop an investigation or prosecution already underway. It contains no express guidelines for dealing with the many evidentiary and practical problems which are likely to be caused by the issuance of a deferral request once proceedings have begun. Does such a deferral request mean that a person arrested by a custodial state must be set free? What will happen to potential witnesses who are co-operating with the Prosecutor prior to the Council's issuance of a deferral request, whose lives may be in danger absent continued protection by the Court? The drafters of the Statute knew of the implications of a request aimed at deferring ongoing proceedings, but rigid approaches which lead to unreasonable results, such as putting lives at risk or violating international human rights, should be avoided. As the result of a Belgian proposal submitted to the Rome Conference, a nota bene was incorporated in the last draft of article 10, option 1, pointing to the need for 'further discussion' of preservation of evidence⁵³. The discussion did not lead to the inclusion of relevant language in article 16.
- 21 In principle, the Security Council may regulate how measures can be taken by the Court in response to the procedural and evidentiary implications of a deferral request by the Council, in a Chapter VII decision pursuant to article 16⁵⁴. Although the Prosecutor may conduct measures of preliminary examination as described in article 15 para. 2 also after the issuance of a deferral request, those measures are entirely inadequate when faced, for example, with the threat of imminent destruction of evidence. In the face of such problems caused by article 16 deferral, and absent Security Council guidance, the Prosecutor may apply article 54 para. 3 (f) to take steps for the necessary preservation of evidence. He or she may wish to turn to the Pre-Trial Chamber to ensure that measures are taken, which are consistent with the requirements both of a successful resumption of an investigation or prosecution or essential interests of justice.

3. 'period of 12 months'

- 22 Article 16 provides that the Security Council may request the deferral of proceedings for a period of 12 months. The actual wording of the article suggests that the Council's deferral request must pertain to the time period specified, but the Council may of course decide that the period be shorter. If viewed in light of Article 16, the Security Council resolution 1497, which contains no time limit, arguably goes against this period requirement. It should be assumed that the 12 month period starts running not from the day on which the deferral request is adopted by the Security Council, but from the date it is received by the Court.

4. 'resolution adopted under Chapter VII'

- 23 The requirement that a deferral request be issued in the form of a Chapter VII Security Council resolution was the last textual modification of article 16 agreed to at the Rome Conference. As the drafting history suggests, the purpose of this amendment was to ensure that the Council takes a formal vote on deferral in keeping with article 27 of the UN Charter⁵⁵. It was emphasized that, otherwise, the mere discussion of a Chapter VII situation

⁵² See, e.g., the ICC press release 'ICC-OTP-PR-20070522-220_EN' dated 22 May 2007, 'Prosecutor opens investigation in the Central African Republic' (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/7c1d44/>); see also ICC press release 'ICC-OTP-20130116-PR869' dated 16 January 2013, 'ICC Prosecutor opens investigation into war crimes in Mali: The legal requirements have been met. We will investigate' (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f98b58/>).

⁵³ See Bureau's Proposal, note 3, p. 13.

⁵⁴ It is an open, but not very practical question, whether this would apply to Chapter VII decisions pursuant to article 13 (b) as well.

⁵⁵ It is noted that article 13 (b) of the ICC Statute, which confirms the Security Council's referral power, applies the term 'acting under Chapter VII' of the UN Charter, rather than on the basis of 'a resolution adopted under Chapter VII' as specified in article 16.

in consultations could maybe be deemed as Security Council ‘action’ with respect to that situation, providing a ground for barring Court proceedings⁵⁶. The majority of delegations felt that this would unduly harm the independence of the Court.

Obbliging the Council to issue a Chapter VII resolution serves two other purposes as well. First, it ensures that the deferral of an investigation or prosecution is undertaken on the basis of a legally binding Security Council decision, thereby establishing a legal duty on states not to act contrarily to the deferral request. Secondly, given that a Chapter VII resolution pertains to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression, issuing such a resolution may make the Council acknowledge implicitly that ICC proceedings would be detrimental to the maintenance of international peace and security. In political terms, the costs of such an acknowledgment to Security Council credibility might prove high.

It is generally understood that according to Article 39 of the UN Charter, any resolution adopted under Chapter VII should be prefaced by a determination that there exists a ‘threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression’⁵⁷. Curiously, the Security Council resolutions 1422, 1487, and 1497, though adopted under Chapter VII, contain no such determination, which results in a perilous relationship with the UN Charter and article 16 of the Rome Statute.

While it is only logical to conclude that Security Council deferral requests will be directed at investigations or prosecutions triggered by a State Party referral or initiated by the Prosecutor acting proprio motu, an interesting question is whether article 16 also applies to proceedings triggered by the Council itself. The wording of article 16 would permit that interpretation, but there may be reasons why this is not an entirely sound conclusion. It was understood from the beginning of the ICC process after the 1994 ILC Draft Statute that the referral of a situation to the Prosecutor by the Security Council would in reality be analogous to the establishment of an ad hoc criminal tribunal⁵⁸. The ICTY or ICTR Statutes do not recognize any power of the Council to prevent or stop the Tribunals from investigating or prosecuting specific individuals. In addition, the argument that Article 16 can be used as a check on Security Council referrals is not easy to substantiate from the perspective of the drafting history of the Rome Statute⁵⁹. In practice, however, the interpretation that article 16 applies in cases of a Security Council referral has been consistently supported by states. The preambular reference to article 16 in referral resolutions 1593 and 1970 gives the impression that the deferral provision is capable of application in relation to situations that the Security Council itself has referred to the ICC. It can also be demonstrated from the fact that none of the states that addressed the possible deferral in the debates on the Al-Bashir case argued that the Security Council did not have the power to invoke article 16 in that situation⁶⁰.

5. ‘request may be renewed under the same conditions’

Article 16 provides that a request for deferral of ICC proceedings may be renewed under the same conditions as the initial one, which means that renewal must be effected by a ⁵⁶ See, e.g., Role of the Security Council According to article 23 ILC Draft, Statement by H.-P. Kaul, Head of the German Delegation, 8 Aug. 1997, p. 2 (on file with the authors).

⁵⁷ Frowein and Kirsch, in: Simma et al. (eds.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (2012) 1272, 1294.

⁵⁸ This proposition was already acknowledged by the ILC in its commentary to the 1994 Draft Statute, see 1994 Draft Statute, note 4, p. 85. Article 12 para. 2 of the ICC Statute eliminates the need for State consent to the conduct of ICC proceedings when they have been triggered by the Council. The Statute also provides that the Security Council may be called on to serve as an enforcement mechanism when States Parties fail to co-operate in Court proceedings triggered by the Council, see article 87 para. 7.

⁵⁹ One view is that the original intent underpinning article 16 was to block premature state party referrals or proprio motu investigations by the Prosecutor, see Scheffer, The Jurist, 20 August 2008 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/6ca103/>) 2; for an opposite view, see Cryer, Oxford Transitional Justice Research Working Paper Series, 29 October 2008 (<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/2871fa/>) 2.

⁶⁰ See UNSC 5947th Mtg., UN Doc.S/PV. 5947, 31 July 2008; see also UNSC 6028th Mtg., UN Doc.S/PV. 6028, 3 December 2008.

Security Council resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The wording strictly speaking suggests that a new request for deferral would apply for an additional 12 month period, not a shorter or longer one. It must be assumed that non-renewal of a deferral request automatically allows the ICC to take up an investigation or prosecution where it was left off. In other words, any new deferral request further suspends ICC action, but does of course not permanently stop it. At the same time, it must be noted that article 16 contains no express limitation on the number of times a request for deferral may be renewed, which theoretically means that a deferral could be indefinite as a matter of practice. This could lead to a situation which would defeat the balance of interests on which article 16 is based. It is not clear whether, under the terms of article 16, the Council could allow the 12 month period of a deferral request to expire and then resubmit it after a certain period of time, during which the Court has resumed proceedings.

Article 17

Issues of admissibility

1. Having regard to paragraph 10 of the Preamble and article 1, the Court shall determine that a case is inadmissible where:

- (a) The case is being investigated or prosecuted by a State which has jurisdiction over it, unless the State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution;
- (b) The case has been investigated by a State which has jurisdiction over it and the State has decided not to prosecute the person concerned, unless the decision resulted from the unwillingness or inability of the State genuinely to prosecute;
- (c) The person concerned has already been tried for conduct which is the subject of the complaint, and a trial by the Court is not permitted under article 20, paragraph 3;
- (d) The case is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court;

2. In order to determine unwillingness in a particular case, the Court shall consider, having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law, whether one or more of the following exist as applicable:

- (a) The proceedings were or are being undertaken or the national decision was made for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court referred to in article 5;
- (b) There has been an unjustified delay in the proceedings which in the circumstances is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice;
- (c) The proceedings were not or are not being conducted independently or impartially, and they were or are being conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person to justice;

3. In order to determine inability in a particular case, the Court shall consider whether, due to a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of its national judicial system, the State is unable to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence and testimony or otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings.

Literature: Alai, C. and Mue, N., 'Complementarity and the Impact of the Rome Statute and the International Criminal Court in Kenya', in C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, ii (CUP 2011) 1222; Ambos, K., The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court: An Inductive, Situation-based Approach (Springer 2010); Apuuli, K.P., 'The International Criminal Court (ICC) and the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) Insurgency in Northern Uganda', (2005) 15 CLF 408; id., 'The ICC Arrest Warrants for the Lord's Resistance Army Leaders and Peace Prospects for Northern Uganda', (2006) 4 JICJ 179; Arbour, L. and Bergsmo, M., 'Conspicuous Absence of Jurisdictional Overreach', in: H. von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court (T.M.C. Asser Press 1999) 131; Arsanjani, M.N., 'Reflections on the Jurisdiction and Trigger Mechanisms of the International Criminal Court', in: H. von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court (T.M.C. Asser Press 1999) 57; Benzing, M., 'The Complementarity Regime of the International Criminal Court: International Criminal Justice Between State Sovereignty and the Fight Against Impunity', (2004) 7 MPYbUNL 591; Bitti, G., 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources of Law in the Jurisprudence of the ICC', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 281; id., 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Respect for the Hierarchy of Sources of Law before the ICC', in: C. Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP, forthcoming 2015); Bleich, J.L., 'Complementarity', (1997) 13 NEP 231; Bos, A., 'Foreword', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009); Buergenthal, T., 'Truth Commissions Functions and Due Process', in: C. Tomuschat et al. (eds.), Völkerrecht als Wertordnung. Common Values in International Law (N.P. Engel Verlag 2006) 103; Burke-White, W., 'Complementarity in Practice: The International Criminal Court as Part of a System of Multilevel Global Governance in the Democratic Republic of Congo', (2004) 18 LeidenJIL 557; id., 'Implementing a Policy of Positive Complementarity in the Rome System of Justice', (2008) 19 CLF 59; Cassese, A., 'From Nuremberg to Rome: International Military Tribunals to the International Criminal Court', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 7; Clarke, W., Herbst, J., 'Somalia and the Future of Humanitarian Intervention', (1996) 75 Foreign Affairs 70; Crawford, J., The Creation of States in International Law, 2nd ed., (OUP 2006); De Guzman, M. M., 'Gravity and the Legitimacy of the International Criminal Court', (2009) 32 FordhamILJ 1400; id., 'Choosing to Prosecute: Expressive Selection at the International Criminal Court', (2012) 33 MichJIL 265; Dugard, J., 'Possible Conflicts of Jurisdiction with Truth Commissions', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 693; El Zeidy, M.M., 'The Principle of Complementarity: A New Machinery to Implement International Criminal Law', (2002) 23 MichJIL, id., 'The United States Dropped the Atomic Bomb of Article 16 of the ICC Statute: Security Council Power of Deferrals and Resolution 1422', (2002) 35 VandJTransnatL 1503; id., 'The Ugandan Government Triggers the First Test of the Complementarity Principle', (2005) 5 ICLRev 83; id., 'Some Remarks on the Question of the Admissibility of a Case during Arrest Warrant Proceedings before the International Criminal Court', (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 741; id., 'The Gravity Threshold under the Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2008) 19 CLF 35; id., The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2008); id., 'From Primacy to Complementarity and Backwards: (Re) visiting Rule 11 bis of the Ad hoc Tribunals', (2008) 57 I&CompLQ 408; id., 'Admissibility in International Criminal Law', in: W. Schabas and N. Bernaz (eds.), Routledge Handbook of International Criminal Law (Routledge 2010) 211; id., 'Commentary on the "Prosecutor v. Radoslav Brdjanin, Decision on Application for Disqualification"', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, xix (Hart Publisher 2010) 280; id., 'The Genesis of Complementarity', in: C. Stahn and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, Vol. I (CUP 2011) 71; id., 'Ad hoc Declarations of Acceptance of Jurisdiction: The Palestinian Situation under Scrutiny', in Stahn C. (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP 2015) 179; Fairlie, M.A. and Powderly, J., 'Complementarity and Burden Allocation', in: C. Stahn and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (CUP 2011) 642; Gaeta, P., 'Is the Practice of "Self-Referrals" a Sound Start for the ICC?', (2004) 2 JICJ 949; Gioia, F., 'State Sovereignty, Jurisdiction, and "Modern" International Law: The Principle of Complementarity in the International Criminal Court', (2006) 19 LeidenJIL 1095; Gurulé, J., 'United States Opposition to the 1998 Rome Statute Establishing an International Criminal Court: Is the Court's Jurisdiction Truly Complementary to National Criminal Jurisdictions', (2001–2) 35 CornILJ 1; Harris, DJ, O'Boyle, M. and Warbrick, C., Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (Butterworths 1995); Hayner, P.B., Unspeakable Truths: Facing the Challenge of Truth Commissions (Rutledge, 2002); Heller, KJ, 'The Shadow Side of Complementarity: The Effect of Article 17 of the Rome Statute on National Due Process', (2006) 17 CLF 255; Holmes, J.T., 'The Principle of Complementarity', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (Kluwer Law International 1999) 41; id., 'Complementarity: National Courts Versus the ICC', in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 674; Jurdi, N. N., The International Criminal Court and National Courts: A Contentious Relationship (Ashgate 2013); Kirsch, P. and Holmes, J.T., 'The Rome Conference on the International Criminal Court: The Negotiating Process', (1999) 93 AJIL 2; Kleffner, J., Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (OUP 2008); Klip, A., 'Complementarity and Concurrent Jurisdiction', (2004) 19 Nouvelles Etudes Pénales 173; Kress, C., "'Self-Referrals" and "Waivers of Complementarity": Some Considerations in Law and Policy', (2004) 2 JICJ 944; Llewellyn, JJ., 'A Comment on the Complementary Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court: Adding Inlet to Injury in Transitional Contexts?', (2001) 24 DalhousieLJ 192; Meyer, F., 'Complementing Complementarity', (2006) 6 ICLRev 549; Mokhtar, A., 'The Fine Art of Arm-Twisting: The U.S. Resolution 1422 and Security Council Deferral Power under the Rome Statute', (2002) 3 ICLRev 295; Murphy, R., 'Gravity Issues and the International Criminal Court', (2006) 17 CLF 281; Müller A. and Stegmiller, I., 'Self-Referrals on Trial: From Panacea to Patient', (2010) 8 JICJ 1267; Newton, M., 'Comparative Complementarity: Domestic Jurisdiction Consistent with the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', (2001) 167 MillRev 20; Nouwen, S., 'Complementarity in Uganda: Domestic Diversity or International Imposition?', in: C. Stahn and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, Vol. II (CUP 2011) 1120; id., Complementarity in the Line of Fire: The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (CUP 2013); Nseroko, D.D.N., 'The International Criminal Court: Jurisdictional and Related Issues', (1999) 10 CLF 87; Olásolo, H., 'The Triggering Procedure of the International Criminal Court, Procedural Treatment of the Principle of Complementarity, and the Role of the Office of the Prosecutor', (2005) 5 ICLRev 121; Philips, R.B., 'The International Criminal Court Statute: Jurisdiction and Admissibility', (1999) 10 CLF 61; Rastan, R., 'Situation and Case: Defining the Parameters', in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (CUP 2011) 421; Robinson, D., 'Serving the Interests of Justice: Amnesties, Truth Commissions and the International Criminal Court', (2003) 14 EJIL 481; id., 'The inaction controversy: Neglected words and new opportunities', in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, Vol. I (CUP 2011) 460; Rojo, E., 'The Role of Fair Trial Considerations in the Complementarity Regime of the International Criminal Court: From "No Peace Without Justice" to "No Peace with Victor's Justice"', (2005) 18 LeidenJIL 829; Ryngaert, C., Jurisdiction in International Law (OUP 2008); Schabas, W.A., 'The Relationship between Truth Commissions and International Courts: The Case of Sierra Leone', (2003) 25 HRQ 1035; id., 'Prosecutorial Discretion and Gravity', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 229; id., 'Complementarity in Practice: Some Uncomplimentary Thoughts', (2008) 18 CLF 5; Schabas, W. A., 'The rise and fall of complementarity', in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, Vol. I (CUP 2011) 150; Scharf, M., 'The Amnesty Exception to the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court’, (1999) 32 CornILLJ 507; Slade, T. N. and Clark, R. S., ‘Preamble and Final Clauses’, in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (Kluwer Law International 1999) 421; Ssenyonjo, M., ‘Accountability of Non-State Actors in Uganda for War Crimes and Human Rights Violations: Between Amnesty and the International Criminal Court’, (2005) 10 JConflict&SecurityL 405; Stahn, C., ‘The Ambiguities of Security Council Resolution 1422 (2002)’, (2003) 14 EJIL 85; id., ‘Complementarity, Amnesties and Alternative Forms of Justice: Some Interpretative Guidelines for the International Criminal Court’, (2005) 3 JICJ. 695; id., ‘Complementarity: A Tale of Two Notions’, (2008) 19 CLF 87; id., ‘Taking Complementarity Seriously: on the sense and sensibility of “classical”, “positive”, and “negative” complementarity’’, in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (CUP 2011) 233; Stahn, C., and El Zeidy, M.M. (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (CUP 2011); Van der Wilt, H.G. and Lyngdorf, S., ‘Procedural Obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights: Useful Guidelines for the Assessment “Unwillingness” and “Inability” in the Context of the Complementarity Principle’, (2009) 9 ICLRev 39.; Wierda, M. and Otim, M., ‘Courts, Conflict and Complementarity in Uganda’, in: C. Stahn and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, Vol. II (CUP 2011) 1155; Yang, L., ‘On the Principle of Complementarity in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court’, (2005) 4 ChineseJIL 121; Zartman, W. I., ‘Introduction: Posing the Problem of State Collapse’, in Zartman(ed.), Collapsed States: The Disintegration and Restoration of Legitimate Authority (Rienner 1995).

Content

A. Introduction/General remarks.....	1
I. The ILC Draft and the Ad Hoc Committee	5
II. The Preparatory Committee	10
III. The Rome Conference	17
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements	23
I. Paragraph 1	23
1. Inactivity	27
2. ‘same case’	31
3. Burden of proof	36
4. ‘unwilling or unable’	38
5. ‘genuinely’	41
6. Decision not to prosecute by State.....	44
7. Double jeopardy.....	53
8. Insufficient gravity	54
II. Paragraph 2	61
1. ‘shielding the person’	65
2. Unjustified delay	67
3. Lack of impartiality or independence.....	70
III. Paragraph 3: Collapse or unavailability of the national judicial system	74

A. Introduction/General remarks

The concept of admissibility in international criminal procedure concerns the forum 1 allocation of cases between national and international criminal jurisdictions. In the domain of international criminal law, when two judicial systems coexist (whether at the horizontal or vertical level),¹ each empowered to exercise competence over the same case(s), it becomes quite common to establish mechanisms to regulate which jurisdiction proceeds and under what conditions.² Admissibility in international criminal procedure or international criminal ¹ [The views expressed in this chapter are those of the authors and do not necessarily reflect those of the International Criminal Court]. In this context, horizontal refers to the conflict of jurisdiction between inter-state judicial systems while the vertical refers to conflict of jurisdiction between one or more national justice systems and an international judicial organ. This concept should be clearly distinguished from the notion of admissibility of evidence, which lies at the heart of the law of evidence. The latter is beyond the scope of this chapter.

² In the same vein, Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court. (4th ed., CUP 2011) 187. For instance, at the horizontal level, there is a growing tendency to solve possible conflicts of jurisdiction in the context of crimes under international law through the principle of ‘subsidiarity’. According to this principle, the territorial State or the State of nationality enjoys ‘jurisdictional priority’ as far as it proves ability and willingness to prosecute. In other words, any other State which demands to prosecute international crimes, say on the basis of universal jurisdiction, can do so only as far as the State directly affected fails to do so. Thus, there is a sort of an admissibility test, which assists in resolving issues of competing jurisdictional claims. See Ryngaert, Jurisdic- law seeks to solve the potential conflict of jurisdiction that might arise between the two tier legal fora, the national and the international.

This is actually the status quo if one follows the development of international criminal law over the last seventy years and in particular, the last two decades. Starting with the attempts undertaken by official, unofficial and semi-official bodies during the Second World War (1941–1943), these bodies proposed the establishment of an international judicial forum or an inter-Allied court, which was meant to function alongside domestic courts, to prosecute the Nazis for their crimes committed in the course of the war.³ There was a growing tendency to organize the relationship between the proposed court and domestic jurisdictions by creating a procedure which allowed the international machinery to exercise its competence only under exceptional circumstances. The underlying idea was to give preference to the role of domestic courts and solve any possible conflict of jurisdiction at both levels through a sort of admissibility procedure, which aimed at filtering the cases to be dealt with before the international forum.⁴ In essence, this is similar to the existing mechanism under the Rome Statute,⁵ as designed by its drafters.

- 2 The experience of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal (IMT), which finally overruled these initiatives, was notably different. The three main Allied powers (Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union) made a statement in the Moscow Declaration of 30 October 1943,⁶ later referred to in the London Agreement of 8 August 1945 establishing the IMT,⁷ that German war criminals should be judged and punished in the countries in which their crimes were committed. However, this declaration was limited to the case of relatively minor offenders. ‘German criminals whose offenses [had] no particular geographical localization [and who were labelled as major war criminals] [would] be punished by joint decision of the government of the Allies’.⁸ The joint decision resulted in the creation of the IMT, which was called upon to try only the ‘major war criminals’, while the remaining offenders referred to in both the Moscow Declaration and the London Agreement were to be dealt with before national criminal jurisdictions under the confines of Control Council Law No. 10.⁹

tion in International Law (OUP 2008) 211–18. See more recently, Report of the Secretary General: The Scope and Application of the Principle of Universal Jurisdiction, UN Doc. A/68/113, 26 June 2013, para. 25; also Report on the Scope and Principle of Universal Jurisdiction: Information provided by the Kingdom of Spain, No. 094 FP, 29 April 2013, in particular para. 16; Report of the Secretary-General Prepared on the Basis of Comments and Observations of Governments: The Scope and Application of the Principle of Universal Jurisdiction, UN Doc. A/65/181, 29 July 2010, 26 (observations by Chile and Cuba).

³ See for example the work done by the London International Assembly, the International Commission for Penal Reconstruction and Development and the United Nations War Crimes Commission. The London International Assembly was established in 1941 under the auspices of the League of Nations Union, although it was not an official body. Its mandate was mainly to make recommendations in relation to the question of war crimes committed during the course of World War II and to find solutions to ensure effective punishment for those who bear responsibility for these crimes. See on the London International Assembly, Historical Survey of the Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction, UN Doc. A/CN.4/7/Rev.1, 1949, at 18; International Commission for Penal Reconstruction and Development: Proceedings of the Conference held in Cambridge on the 14th November, 1941, Between Representatives of Nine Allied Countries and of the Department of Criminal Science in the University of Cambridge, at 11; United Nations War Crimes Commission Progress Report, Doc C.48, 12 September 1944.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Adopted by the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 17 July 1998, UN Doc.A/CONF.183/9 [hereinafter Rome Statute], article 17.

⁶ The Tripartite Conference at Moscow, October 19–30, 1943, reprinted in: International Conciliation, No. 395, at 599–605 (1943) [hereinafter Moscow Declaration].

⁷ London Agreement of August 8, 1945, reprinted in: (1947) 1 Trial of Major War Criminals Before the International Military Tribunal 8 [hereinafter London Agreement] 8.

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ Allied Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes against Peace and Crimes against Humanity, 20 December 1945, Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany, No. 3, 31 January 1946; also, Cassese, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. I (OUP 2002) 7.

Therefore, this allocation of cases between the IMT and domestic courts, including military tribunals, did not give rise to the need to further establish conditions or criteria to regulate which forum was to proceed with the case under consideration. The Allies' decision to divide the responsibilities between the two tier jurisdictions in this categorical manner, on the basis of the accused's level of responsibility, resolved from the outset any possible conflict of jurisdiction that could have arisen and thus actually served as an admissibility procedure. This filtering process was carried out in accordance with article 14 of the IMT Charter.¹⁰ The situation in the Far East was quite similar. The International Military Tribunal for the Far East (IMTFE) was created 'for the just and prompt trial and punishment of the major war criminals in the Far East'. The remaining Japanese war criminals lacking a 'leadership background' were dealt with in their respective 'occupied or colonized territories'.¹¹

When the ad hoc tribunals were established in the early 1990s the idea that these tribunals would exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the core crimes referred to in their statutes was rejected (retaining instead also the competence of national courts). This led to the inevitable conclusion to set up a system by which to resolve the positive conflict of jurisdiction between the two level fora. The Statutes of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY)¹² and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)¹³ as well as their respective Rules of Procedure and Evidence¹⁴ embody identical provisions which serve this purpose. The Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone thereafter followed the same path.¹⁵ Although the statutory provisions governing these tribunals speak of 'primacy' and do not explicitly rely on the term 'admissibility' or 'complementary jurisdiction', as is the case with the Rome Statute, they manage to remedy the potential conflict of jurisdiction between the tribunals and any domestic court by way of setting out certain defined criteria to that effect in their respective Rules of Procedure and Evidence.¹⁶

Moreover, responding to a settled plan for complementing the mandates of the ad hoc tribunals (particularly the ICTY and ICTR),¹⁷ these tribunals began to develop new methods to reallocate cases by amending their Rules of Procedure and Evidence. These amendments actually created a filtering system more akin to an admissibility mechanism, which guaranteed that not every case that came or was already before the tribunal would be dealt with.¹⁸

The Rome Statute comes with the most complex and developed system of admissibility the field of international criminal law has experienced. This is not surprising. The drafters of the Rome Statute had in mind the creation of a permanent international institution expected to function as a residual jurisdiction: a court which operates under exceptional circumstances, when there are no genuine prospects that domestic courts will respond to certain grave atrocities by way of investigating, prosecuting and trying alleged perpetrators responsible for

¹⁰ Charter of the International Military Tribunal, 8 August 1945, article 14(b) <<http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/imtconst.asp>> accessed 5 March 2015.

¹¹ El Zeidy, in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (CUP 2011) 71, 124–125.

¹² Statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, SC Res. 827/1993, reprinted in: (1993) ILM 1192, article 9.

¹³ Statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in Rwanda, SC Res 955/1994, reprinted in: (1994) ILM 1598, article 8.

¹⁴ See ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence, UN Doc. IT/32/Rev. 49, 22 May 2013, Rule 9 [hereinafter ICTY Rules]; ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence, UN Doc. ITR/3/Rev. 22, 10 April 2013, Rule 9 [hereinafter ICTR RPE].

¹⁵ See Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, signed on 16 January 2002, annex: Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, article 8; Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Rule 9 [hereinafter SCSL RPE].

¹⁶ See for instance, ICTY Rules, Rule 9; ICTR RPE, Rule 9.

¹⁷ See for instance, SC Res. 1503 (2003), UN Doc. S/RES/1503 and SC Res. 1534 (2004), UN Doc. S/RES/1534.

¹⁸ For a detailed discussion see, El Zeidy, in: Schabas and Bernaz (eds.), Routledge Handbook of International Criminal Law (Routledge 2011) 211, 213–217; also El Zeidy (2008) 57 I&CompLQ 408.

one or more of the core crimes referred to in the Rome Statute. The sort of exceptional circumstances which limit the role of the Court's exercise of its jurisdiction is reflected in what is known as article 17,¹⁹ under the heading 'Issues of admissibility'.²⁰

Article 17 dealing with admissibility issues is the cornerstone of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC). Paragraphs 1(a)-(c) embody the principle of complementarity which is one of the 'underlying principles' of the Statute.²¹ That the aim of the Statute is not to negate State sovereignty is also manifested in article 17, which illustrates clearly that the concerns of States with respect to their sovereign interests in criminal justice were at the forefront of the negotiations from the earliest stages. Article 17 provides for inbuilt safeguards that preserve national interests and judicial integrity on the domestic level. This pivotal article was essential for the Statute to be marketable in Rome.

Article 17 also reflects another fundamental principle of international law, that 'it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes',²² as the preamble to the Rome Statute states. Only when they fail to fulfil this duty should the Court operate to ensure there is no impunity gap.

The ICC may not proceed with a case when the concerned States are investigating, prosecuting, or trying in good faith. The prevailing view during the negotiations of the Rome Statute was that the ICC was not to have primacy over national criminal courts, which is the situation with the ad hoc tribunals,²³ but rather would complement them. However, '[d]efining the precise nature of this relationship was both politically sensitive and legally complex'.²⁴ This is apparent if one observes the close connection and interplay between article 17 and other provisions such as preamble paragraph 10, articles 1, 12, 15, 18, 19, 20, 53 and 95. At the outset of the negotiations at the Rome Conference, some States were of the view that the primary obligation to prosecute the crimes under consideration lay with States themselves and that the ICC would only have a role to play when 'the national judicial system was unable to investigate or punish transgressors'.²⁵ Other States and many non-governmental organizations (NGOs) wanted a more effective role for the Court, arguing that the ICC should be able to intervene 'where the proceedings under a national judicial system were ineffective and where a national judicial system was unavailable'.²⁶

The importance of 'complementarity' has been confirmed by the first Prosecutor of the ICC in his public statements. According to Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo, '[a]s a general rule, the policy of the Office of the Prosecutor will be to undertake investigations only where there is a clear case of failure to act by the State or States concerned'.²⁷ He has insisted that:

'The principle of complementarity represents the express will of States Parties to create an institution that is global in scope while recognising the primary responsibility of States themselves to exercise criminal jurisdiction. The principle is also based on considerations of efficiency and effectiveness since States will generally have the best access to evidence and witnesses.'²⁸

¹⁹ Rome Statute, article 17.

²⁰ This provision is complemented by a number of articles which aim at elaborating on the full process of the admissibility proceedings. The core of these provisions are found under the headings 'Preliminary Rulings Regarding Admissibility' (article 18) and 'Challenges to the Jurisdiction of the Court or the Admissibility of a Case', article 19. See, Nsereko, D., 'Article 18', in this volume; id., 'Article 19'. Also of relevance to the operation of admissibility in the course of trial proceedings, see Coracini, R. A., 'Article 20', in this volume.

²¹ See also, Arsanjani, in: von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court (1999) 57, 67.

²² Preamble, para. 6; See also, Slade and Clark, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (Kluwer Law International 1999) 421.

²³ But see margin 5 above.

²⁴ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41. See also as to the complexity and sensitivity of the jurisdictional issues as a whole, Kirsch and Holmes (1999) 93 AJIL 2.

²⁵ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 42.

²⁶ Ibid.

²⁷ Paper on some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor (2003), 2.

²⁸ Ibid.

Moreover, according to the Prosecutor, 'the system of complementarity is principally based on the recognition that the exercise of national criminal jurisdiction is not only a right but also a duty of States'.²⁹

I. The ILC Draft and the Ad Hoc Committee

In the 1994 Draft Statute of the International Law Commission (ILC)³⁰ the third paragraph of the Preamble provided that the ICC was intended to complement national criminal justice systems in those cases where trial procedures 'may not be available or may be ineffective'. The ILC made clear in its commentary that the Court was intended to operate in cases where there was no prospect of trial in national courts. Specifically, it stated that: 'The emphasis is thus on the Court as a body which will complement existing national jurisdictions and existing procedures for international judicial cooperation in criminal matters.'³¹ It would not, therefore, take primacy over national courts and would not effect bilateral inter-State extradition or other forms of international judicial assistance. The purposes set out in the Preamble, including complementarity, were intended to assist in the interpretation and application of the Statute, particularly the exercise of the power conferred by draft article 35 dealing with issues of admissibility. Some members of the ILC believed that the Preamble should be an operative part of the Statute.³²

Article 35 of the draft Statute set out three grounds of inadmissibility. Firstly, when the case had been duly investigated by a State with jurisdiction over the crime and the decision of that State not to proceed to prosecution was apparently well founded. Secondly, where the crime was under investigation by a State which had or may have had jurisdiction over it, and there was no reason for the Court to take any future action with respect to the crime at that time. Thirdly, the crime was not of such gravity to justify any further action by the ICC. The rationale behind this provision was that the ICC should only be dealing with cases outlined in the Preamble, that is where it was really desirable to do so. However, some members were of the view that it was not necessary as the relevant factors could be taken into consideration at the jurisdictional level, notably under draft article 20(e) dealing with crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court and draft article 21 dealing with preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction. To challenge the jurisdiction of the ICC on the basis that there existed an effective or available trial procedure in a State with jurisdiction over the criminal offence, the ILC proposed in draft article 34(a) that the interested State must do so before the commencement of the trial. In addition the accused could challenge under article 34(b) the jurisdiction at that time or at any later stage of the trial.

Further, in article 42, para. 1 the draft Statute affirmed the non bis in idem principle. A person could not be prosecuted before any other court for criminal conduct for which he or she had already been tried by the ICC and conversely not by the ICC where a prosecution had occurred in another court.

The ILC Draft was considered by the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court set up by the General Assembly in 1994.³³ In its 1995 Report³⁴ the Committee stated that many delegations had noted that the commentary to the Preamble clearly indicated that the ILC did not intend that the ICC should replace national criminal courts.³⁵ The Report described the principle of complementarity as 'an essential element in ²⁹ Ibid., 5.

³⁰ Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 49th Sess., Supp. No. 10, UN Doc. A/49/10 (1994) 29.

³¹ Ibid. 44.

³² Ibid.

³³ UN GA Res. 49/53 (9 December 1994).

³⁴ Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995).

³⁵ Ibid., para. 29.

the establishment of an international criminal court'.³⁶ However, it was found that further elaboration of the principle was necessary 'so that its implications for the substantive provisions of the draft statute could be fully understood'.³⁷ There was a divergence of opinion on primacy of jurisdiction in the Committee. Some delegations emphasized that the principle of complementarity should create a strong presumption favouring national criminal court jurisdiction, in that States had a vital interest in prosecuting violations of their laws.³⁸ For example, the United States requested that the Preamble be amended to clarify the primary obligation on States to prosecute the listed crimes and if a State had a judicial system in active operation and entertained a bona fide investigation and/or prosecution then the ICC should not be able to intervene.³⁹ Other delegations, to the contrary did not want to create such a presumption. Rather, while national courts would have concurrent jurisdiction with the ICC, the latter would have primacy of jurisdiction.⁴⁰ A view was also expressed that a balanced approach was necessary, in that the primacy of national courts should be safeguarded, but at the same time the ICC should not be merely residual to national jurisdictions.⁴¹

The ILC Draft provided that the ICC had the capacity to decide that a case before it was inadmissible. Some delegations, for example China,⁴² had expressed concerns about this authority. However, not to have permitted the ICC to examine the effectiveness of domestic processes would have undermined the Court.

- 9 Two views on placement of the concept of complementarity were expressed. One view was that the principle of complementarity could be elaborated in the Preamble. According to article 31 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, a preamble to a treaty is considered an integral part of a treaty for the purposes of interpretation and application.⁴³ The second view was that a reference to this important principle in the Preamble alone was insufficient and it should also be placed in an article in the Statute. There would in this manner be no doubt about the vital nature of complementarity in the interpretation and the application of other articles in the Statute.⁴⁴

As one commentator has noted, the approach put forward by the ILC 'contributed to the eventual resolution of the complementarity question. ... The fact that a pre-eminent international legal body such as the ILC would accept this important principle gave added weight during the negotiations on this point'.⁴⁵

II. The Preparatory Committee

- 10 This issue first came before the Preparatory Committee in March-April 1996. Similarly as in the Ad Hoc Committee there were widely differing views expressed by States as to 'how, where, to what extent and with what emphasis complementarity should be reflected in the ³⁶ Ibid.

³⁷ Ibid.

³⁸ Ibid., para. 31.

³⁹ Bleich (1997) 13 NEP 231, 235–236, referring to a United States statement made to the Ad Hoc Committee on 31 March 1995, UN Doc. A/AC.244/1/Add.2, at 9. The United States position was that a national jurisdiction would only be considered unavailable or ineffective where the alleged crime did not fall within the jurisdiction of the State; where the State declined to exercise its jurisdiction without first having a full and appropriate investigation or in otherwise unreasonable manner or where the judicial process in the State is not bona fide.

⁴⁰ Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995), para. 32.

⁴¹ Ibid., para. 33.

⁴² Bleich (1997) 13 NEP 231, 234, where he notes that China preferred that the decision rest with domestic courts or the Security Council.

⁴³ Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995), para. 37.

⁴⁴ Ibid., para. 36.

⁴⁵ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 44.

statute⁴⁶. The Committee in its 1996 Report⁴⁷ observed that it was crucial that a proper balance be struck between the ICC and national authorities in order to make the Statute acceptable to a large number of States. Some States wanted to add to the no good faith and no credible national justice system grounds for the ICC assuming jurisdiction that of sham trials⁴⁸. Others had made the point that the limited resources of the ICC should not be exhausted by it taking up cases that could more easily as well as effectively be dealt with by national courts. Further, as the exercise of police power and criminal law is a State prerogative, the jurisdiction of the ICC was said to be an exception to that prerogative⁴⁹. The ILC preambular text was criticized at the same time by some as too vague and others as too intrusive⁵⁰. With respect to article 35 of the ILC draft Statute the central article on admissibility, several delegations felt that the three grounds listed seemed too narrow. It was suggested that it include non bis in idem, contained in article 42 and speciality contained in article 55 of that draft. As well, the view was expressed that it should be expanded to encompass cases not only being investigated but which were being prosecuted or had been prosecuted, subject to qualifications in respect of impartiality, diligent prosecution and so on⁵¹. The further observation was made that draft article 35 (b) referred to a crime that was under investigation as a ground for inadmissibility. However, there was no mention of whether the investigation was ineffective, whether certain procedures were unavailable or whether it was part of a sham trial. Several States came forward with proposals containing approaches that differed from the ILC draft Statute and these were included in the Report⁵². These issues were not dealt with again until the August 1997 session when a number of States introduced new proposals and informal consultations were initiated⁵³.

In order to try to get consensus on the topic of complementarity by the end of the August 1997 session, the coordinator of the informal sessions concentrated on the main issue, leaving procedural challenges to admissibility, ne bis in idem and other related matters until later⁵⁴. The negotiating approach was a rolling text and after the preliminary stage no square brackets were used, except for the first paragraph, which had not been discussed at that time⁵⁵. This was to be in contrast to other articles in the draft Statute. Draft article 35 was produced by the coordinator following a week of intense negotiations. This was 'one of the great achievements of the August 1997 Preparatory Committee'⁵⁶. 11

Paragraph 1 provided that the ICC should determine of its own motion that a case was inadmissible. Then in addition other alternatives were presented in four sets of square brackets. Admissibility could be raised on the application of the accused or at the request of an interested State or a State which had jurisdiction over the crime at any time prior to the commencement of proceedings. 12

In order to achieve consensus, a text box introduced the draft article. It provided that the draft that followed was 'intended to facilitate the work towards the elaboration of the Statute ⁴⁶ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, i (Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee During March-April and August 1996), UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), para. 153 [hereinafter 1996 Preparatory Committee I]. Volume II contains the Proposals.

⁴⁷ Ibid., paras. 153-169.

⁴⁸ Ibid., para. 154.

⁴⁹ Ibid., para. 153.

⁵⁰ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 45.

⁵¹ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, i, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), para. 164.

⁵² Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, ii, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), para. 159.

⁵³ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 45. Holmes, Acting Head of the Canadian Delegation was appointed to coordinate these informal consultations and to report back to the Preparatory Committee.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

⁵⁵ Ibid., 46.

⁵⁶ Amnesty International, The International Criminal Court: Making the Right Choices – Part V: Recommendations to the Diplomatic Conference 35 (May 1998).

of the Court'. It represented a 'possible way to address the issue of complementarity and [was] without prejudice to the views of any delegation'. It was stated that the draft text did 'not represent agreement on the eventual content or approach to be included in this article'. In addition, nine footnotes were included to explain the text. Finally, following a last minute argument by Mexico that more time was necessary to look at this article, after the fourth paragraph of the article an alternative approach was presented and the following language suggested: 'The Court has no jurisdiction where the case is being investigated or prosecuted, or has been prosecuted, by a State which has jurisdiction over it.' This disclaimer alternative would have given the ICC no ability to review the genuine nature of the proceedings.

- 13 Although some States including France, the United Kingdom and the United States were of the view that the ICC should not act as an appeals tribunal or engage in judicial review of national decisions, whereas others were committed to giving the ICC a role to take jurisdiction where national proceedings were ineffective, a wide degree of consensus began to emerge. The Court would not take jurisdiction unless the State with criminal jurisdiction over the offence was unable or unwilling to carry out the investigation or prosecution. To obtain this consensus concessions were made on all sides. Inability was not controversial in principle and was added to the draft article. The issue of unwillingness was more difficult to negotiate as some delegations had concerns regarding State sovereignty and also constitutional guarantees in domestic systems against double jeopardy. However, at the end of the day the majority view was that if unwillingness was not a ground for the ICC to assume jurisdiction and refute the presumption that a national system was handling the case in an adequate manner it would be almost a signal to States that they could easily prevent the ICC from taking jurisdiction by initiating an investigation or prosecution. Nevertheless, some States continued to remain opposed and therefore the text box and the alternative approach remained included.
- 14 The majority of the delegations accepted the text 'as an acceptable and welcome compromise ... [and] that view ultimately prevailed in Rome'⁵⁷ with minor re-drafting, changes to numbering of other articles referred to and deletion of the alternatives contained in the square brackets in paragraph 1. The Inter-Sessional Meeting in Zutphen suggested the deletion of the first paragraph as the interests of the accused and interested States were met in then article 12[36] on challenges to jurisdiction⁵⁸. It was also agreed that complementarity should be emphasized in the Preamble. However, the Preamble redrafting did not occur in the Preparatory Committee⁵⁹. Article 15 of the draft Statute contained in the final Report of the Preparatory Committee followed the Zutphen suggestions. There was general agreement that if a crime was not serious enough the case should be inadmissible. Amongst the footnotes that accompanied the text were numbers 42 and 43. Footnote 42 noted that article 15 para. 1 (c) 'should also address, directly or indirectly, cases in which there was a prosecution resulting in conviction or acquittal, as well as discontinuance of prosecutions and possibly also pardons and amnesties'. It was agreed that these issues would be revisited in the light of revisions to article 18 on ne bis in idem. The issue of national amnesty or pardon preventing a prosecution before the ICC was acutely controversial. Footnote 43 stated that some delegations would have preferred the inclusion at the end of para. 1 of a new subparagraph that would have stated that 'the accused is not liable under article 92 (Rule of speciality) to be prosecuted before or punished by the Court'.
- 15 As an adjunct to article 15 was the proposal made by the United States delegation at the March-April 1998 Preparatory Committee to the effect that a new article 16 be included that would provide for complementarity at an earlier stage, prior to an investigation being commenced. This proposal was not acceptable to the like-minded group of States and was ⁵⁷ Ibid., 46–47.

⁵⁸ Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, The Netherlands, UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/L.13. See article 11[35].

⁵⁹ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 47.

‘received with great scepticism’⁶⁰. Its general thrust was that it would have created lengthy procedures that would have affected the Prosecutor’s ability and was not necessary given the other safeguards contained in article 15 but also articles 13 and 17. It was put into the Draft Statute, but entirely in square brackets.

The Preparatory Committee’s text accomplished many things, but two major improvements on the ILC text must be emphasized. Article 15 expanded the grounds where the ICC can assume jurisdiction and introduced the principle of good faith. For a case to be inadmissible a Statute must have acted genuinely in investigating and prosecuting. On account of the inter-twined nature of the various jurisdictional articles it was to be of great importance in the lead-up time to Rome and the actual negotiations there that there was a good conception on the part of States as to how complementarity would work. It was, therefore, to assist in having a more focused debate on the issues of preconditions and trigger mechanisms. 16

III. The Rome Conference

During the negotiations leading up to the adoption of the Statute on 17 July 1998, the complementarity principle was a pivotal issue in the debate. The ICC was not seeking to undermine or detract from national criminal jurisdiction, but would only assume jurisdiction where a State was unwilling or able to do so in good faith. It was an amazing feat to have sent to Rome a text uncluttered with square brackets and this principle was soon seen as, in effect, the cornerstone to the successful adoption of the Statute. It was recognized that despite the disclaimer contained in the text box that the text represented ‘the agreement of an overwhelming number of delegates. [...] Any attempt by a government to [have weakened article 15 would have] endangere[d] agreement on the rest of the consolidated text and [have] caused the diplomatic conference to fail.’⁶¹ 17

In essence the article could not be opened up for substantial change or the package based on compromise would have folded. This was made clear in the general debate in the Committee of the Whole by the coordinator. Not all States were completely satisfied but saw the article as a delicately balanced compromise. However, some delegations including China, Egypt, Mexico, Indonesia, India and Uruguay wanted to reopen the negotiations⁶². Thus, the intention of the coordinator, who had continued with his role at the request of the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole in Rome, was to ‘resist holding informal consultations for as long as possible’⁶³ for two reasons. First, he viewed open-ended consultations as almost an invitation to delegations to suggest new proposals which could have led to the complementarity article being unraveled⁶⁴. Second, he was of the view that bilateral contacts with delegations would afford him a better opportunity of gauging concerns of States opposed to the Draft Statute’s text and their bottom lines⁶⁵. Three problems with the text surfaced as indicated by the coordinator⁶⁶. These were that some States viewed paragraph 2 as giving the ICC too much discretion in deciding whether a State was unwilling, and that no objective criteria were included to guide the Court. ‘Undue delay’ in paragraph 2 (b) was found to be too low a threshold for unwillingness. Lastly, ‘partial collapse’ of a national judicial system as a ground for the ICC to determine inability was viewed as not sufficient. 18

⁶⁰ International Commission of Jurists, Exercise of Jurisdiction and Complementary, ICJ Brief No. 2, 11 (June 1998).

⁶¹ Amnesty International, The International Criminal Court: Making the Right Choices – Part V: Recommendations to the Diplomatic Conference 35 (May 1998).

⁶² Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 52.

⁶³ Ibid.

⁶⁴ Ibid.

⁶⁵ Ibid.

⁶⁶ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 53.

- 19 In the weeks that followed these concerns were addressed. In the Bureau Discussion Paper of 6 July 1998⁶⁷ and the Bureau Proposal of 10 July 1998⁶⁸, both submitted to the Committee of the Whole, the first concern was met by including in the determination of what constitutes unwillingness in paragraph 2 (c) after the phrase ‘The proceedings were not or are not being conducted independently or impartially’ the following language ‘in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law [...]’. At the end of the day following further bilateral consultations the coordinator refined the language to read ‘having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law’ and this was inserted not in paragraph 2 (c) but rather in the chapeau to paragraph 2 in the final package where it thus applied to all parts of the paragraph. The second concern that of ‘undue delay’ in paragraph 2 (b) was resolved by the use of the term ‘unjustified delay’ which addressed the fears of those delegations that did not want the ICC second guessing national decisions. ‘Unjustified’ was viewed as providing for a higher standard than ‘undue’ and that it was implicit that a State would have the right to in fact justify its actions in delaying proceedings domestically before the Court could determine that a case was indeed admissible. It went also into the final package. The issue of ‘partial collapse’ proved to be more difficult to solve. Some delegations argued that there could be a partial collapse in a country of its national judicial system, yet it would not necessarily mean that an investigation and/or prosecution could not take place in good faith. The adjective ‘partial’ which had been present since the 1997 August Preparatory Committee’s Report, remained in the Bureau’s Discussion Paper and Proposal. However, in the final package presented to the Committee of the Whole the Bureau changed the text to read ‘substantial collapse’, in line with a proposal from Mexico.⁶⁹
- 20 Concerning the Preamble, article 15 para. 1 of the Preparatory Commission’s Draft Statute had referred to article 3 of the Preamble and footnote 39 to that reference in the text had noted that suggestions had been made that complementarity should be further clarified either in article 15 itself or elsewhere in the Statute. The draft Preamble had emphasized that ‘such a court is intended to be complementary to national criminal justice systems in cases where such trial procedures may not be available or may be ineffective’. Again a footnote, number 2, had indicated that some delegations had expressed their opposition to this wording and had asked that the wording be made consistent with article 1 and thus read ‘Emphasizing further that such a court shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions’. According to the coordinator although the need for a preambular reference was discussed in Rome delegations decided that it was not necessary as article 15 of the draft, to become article 17 of the final Statute, already had elaborated on it⁷⁰. The Drafting Committee at the Rome Conference, however, suggested that to make the text as clear as possible there should be a reference to complementarity in both article 1 on ‘The Court’ and the Preamble. The final package, thus, contained in the chapeau to article 17, references to paragraph 10 of the Preamble and article 1 where complementarity is mentioned. It was this latter reference that had not been in the draft Statute or the Bureau Discussion Paper or Proposal. The wording was made consistent as had been noted in footnote 2 mentioned above.
- 21 The United States proposal for the bracketed article 16 in the Preparatory Commission’s Draft Statute on preliminary rulings on admissibility was on the table in Rome for the first time for all practical purposes. Admittedly, it had been submitted at the March–April session of the Preparatory Commission in 1998, but there had been no time for discussion. Thus, during the period between April and June, when the Conference began in Rome, the United States was able to submit a revised proposal, which took into account concerns that had been expressed⁷¹. The text that appeared in the Bureau’s Discussion Paper as article 16 was

⁶⁷ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53, 17–19.

⁶⁸ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59, 15–16.

⁶⁹ UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.14/REV.1.

⁷⁰ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 55.

⁷¹ Ibid., 69. See UN Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.25 (29 June 1998) for the revised proposal.

modified from the revised proposal. Concerns were raised by some States and NGOs concerning article 16, but ‘a growing number of delegations [...] stated [...] that bilaterally to the coordinator that [it] [...] was key to their acceptance of the complementarity regime and the proprio motu role of the Prosecutor’⁷². Further consultations produced further improvements in the text and the Bureau included it in the Proposal and finally in the package. It was apparent that article 18, as it was finally to be numbered, had become inextricably linked to article 17 on complementarity.

The complementarity principle strikes a balance between state sovereignty and an effective and credible ICC. Without it there would have been no agreement. As has been analysed here and elsewhere in this Commentary, article 17 is linked to a network of inter-related provisions which indicate the fact that this Statute’s adoption was probably the most complex multilateral negotiation ever undertaken. 22

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

It is clear from the drafting history that the sophisticated admissibility regime created by the Rome Statute seeks to balance the supranational power entrusted to the Court with the power of national jurisdictions in such a way as to ensure States that ‘they would remain master over their own judicial proceedings’ as long as they do not allow perpetrators of serious crimes to go unpunished.⁷³ Article 17, as it stands, is drafted in a manner which aims at achieving this delicate result. However, as Pre-Trial Chamber II has noted, ‘the exercise of national criminal jurisdiction by States [being a right or even more an existing duty] is not without limitations. These limits are encapsulated in the provisions regulating the inadmissibility of a case, namely articles 17–20 of the Statute’,⁷⁴ which govern the exceptions to the exercise of national jurisdiction. 23

Article 17(1) sets out, in sequence, a set of requirements to be examined before the Court can make an inadmissibility determination. The chapeau of article 17 is drafted in the negative. It uses the term ‘inadmissible’ as opposed to ‘admissible’. The 1994 Draft Statute prepared by the ILC, which inspired the Rome Statute, relied on the same term.⁷⁵ The ILC did not tackle the reason behind this formulation. Nor did the 1995 Ad hoc Committee which replaced the ILC in revising said draft directly address this issue.⁷⁶ But it was clear in the course of the negotiations which followed before the Preparatory Committee in 1996 that the drafters intended to place the emphasis in favour of national proceedings, in the sense that the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC is not the rule, but rather the exception.⁷⁷

Article 17(1)(a)-(c) embodies three different scenarios depending on the stage and nature of national proceedings. These sub-paragraphs mainly organize the relationship between ⁷² Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 71.

⁷³ Bos, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff 2009) xvii.

⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbb0ed/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 44.

⁷⁵ Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty – Sixth Session (2 May – 22 July 1994), with Annex Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN Doc. A/49/10, 1994 YILC Vol. II, Part Two, Article 35, 52.

⁷⁶ Report of the Ad hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 50th Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/50/22 (1995), paras 29–51.

⁷⁷ Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN GAOR, 51st Sess., Vol. 1, Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996), para. 154 (noting that complementarity ‘is not a question of the Court having primary jurisdiction or even concurrent jurisdiction. Rather, its jurisdiction should be understood as having an exceptional character’).

national jurisdictions and the ICC by way of checking the existence or absence of domestic efforts with respect to a given situation or case. Accordingly, they are commonly represented by the term ‘complementarity’ and they are treated as the first limb of the admissibility provision. The fourth scenario lies under sub-paragraph (d) and is known as the gravity test. Gravity represents the second limb of the admissibility provision. It follows that article 17(1)(a)-(c) (‘complementarity’) together with sub-paragraph (d) (‘gravity’) form what is commonly known as the ‘admissibility’ or ‘inadmissibility’ determination. The ICC has endorsed this distinction in its case-law.⁷⁸

- 24 Although the Statute does not indicate in technical terms whether the two components are to be studied in any particular order, in one of the early communications received by his Office, the Prosecutor appeared to have opted for assessing the issue of gravity before the issue of complementarity.⁷⁹ Seven years later, the Prosecutor followed the same methodology in responding to a referral received on behalf of the Union of the Comoros concerning the ‘31 May 2010 Israeli interception of a humanitarian aid flotilla bound for the Gaza Strip’.⁸⁰ The Prosecutor’s assessment was confined to the criterion of gravity, and she found no need to proceed with an examination of complementarity.⁸¹ By contrast, in one of the early cases before the Court, Pre-Trial Chamber I, for instance, spoke of complementarity as being ‘the first part of the admissibility test’.⁸² Since then, it has been quite common practice for the Chambers of the Court to start an admissibility determination with an examination of complementarity,⁸³ unless the element of gravity has been particularly challenged.⁸⁴ Yet, following this order in making an admissibility determination does not have, as such, any substantial value rather than merely following the structure of article 17(1) or the circumstances underlying each particular case.⁸⁵ Starting with the regime of complementarity, article 17(1)(a) requires that the ‘case [be at least in the process] of being investigated or prosecuted by a State which has jurisdiction over it’, in order to enter a finding of inadmissibility, ‘unless the State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution’. The reference to the term State in this context should extend to States which are entitled to join ⁷⁸ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29. However, the Appeals Chamber in one of its early decisions divided the admissibility provision into three prongs. It stated that admissibility refers ‘in the first place to complementarity (article 17(1)(a) to (b), in the second place to ne bis in idem (articles 17(1) (c), 20) and thirdly to the gravity of the offence (article 17(1) (d))’, Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Appeals Chamber, 14 December 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1505f7/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 23.

⁷⁹ Letter of Prosecutor dated 9 February 2006 (Iraq) 9.

⁸⁰ Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia: Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014, 3.

⁸¹ Ibid., para. 148.

⁸² Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, No. ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrests, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras. 30 and 41.

⁸³ See, inter alia, Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, No. ICC-01/09-01/11-373, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 January 2012 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/96c3c2/>>, para. 38; Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbb0ed/>>, paras. 48 et seq.

⁸⁴ Prosecutor v. Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta and Mohammed Hussein Ali, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 23 January 2012 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4972c0/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras. 39–40 (noting that the Defence did not challenge the admissibility of the case on the basis of complementarity, but rather on the ground of lack of sufficient gravity. Accordingly, the Chamber begun its examination and confined it to this latter element).

⁸⁵ Ibid.; Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia: Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014.

the treaty in accordance with article 125 of the Statute,⁸⁶ and also those none-State parties with jurisdiction over the situation/case.⁸⁷ Nonetheless, providing an overly narrow interpretation to article 17 could lead to an increase in the impunity gap.

There may, for example, be entities whose status is contested but which enjoy an undisputed control of the territory and have the capacity to exercise jurisdiction. An example is Taiwan which, although unable to become a State Party in accordance with article 125 of the Statute because of the controversy surrounding its status at the United Nations, might otherwise be granted a limited standing before the Court as a State with jurisdiction within the meaning of article 17. Less clear cut examples might concern categories relating to disputed territories, such as Kosovo (which is recognised by many Western Countries, but is disputed by Russia) or South Ossetia (which is recognised by Russia, but disputed by the Western Countries). In these situations the Court might nonetheless be willing to consider arguments as to the entity's standing for the purpose of articles 17 and 19(2)(a), notwithstanding their controversial status under international law. More problematic would be entities which exhibit less State-like competencies. For example, under international humanitarian law and article 28 of the Rome Statute, civilian and military commanders of organized groups bear responsibility for crimes committed by their subordinates, and have a duty to prevent and punish such crimes, including by means of internal disciplinary or court martial procedures.⁸⁸ However, it is less clear that such forms of punishment would equate to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction by 'a State', or that such organised armed groups would have standing for the purpose of articles 17 and 19(2)(a).

The situation might be different in case of the application of article 20(3), where the accused person would have gone through a proper trial for the same conduct shaping the case of the ICC Prosecutor. In a scenario as such, it may be argued that the element of lack of State involvement in the trial proceeding might not be the decisive factor. Rather the decisive factor might rest on the fact that the person should not be tried twice for the same conduct even if his trial was not conducted by a State-like entity.

The requirement in the first sentence of article 17(1)(a) that 'the case is being investigated or prosecuted' opened the door in the early years of the Court's operation for experts to envisage the most practical interpretation of this provision to cover scenarios where a State does not act or decides voluntarily to relinquish the exercise of jurisdiction in favour of the Court due to good cause without necessarily being labelled as an 'unwilling' or 'unable' state.

Before Prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo took office, in July 2003, the Office of the Prosecutor commissioned an expert study on what it termed 'complementarity in practice'. Several prominent authorities on international criminal law, both academics and practitioners, participated in preparing a report.⁸⁹ Using terms like 'partnership', 'dialogue with States' and 'burden-sharing', they argued for the desirability of a benign and constructive relationship between national justice systems and the ICC. The expert report emphasised forms of cooperation and assistance. Amongst other things, it contemplated what was labelled as 'uncontested admissibility'. The document set out a rather novel construction of the scope of the duty of States to bring perpetrators to justice:

'Article 17 specifies the consequences for admissibility where a state is investigating or prosecuting, but does not expressly oblige states to act. However, paragraph 6 of the preamble refers to the "duty" of States to exercise criminal jurisdiction. While the preamble does not as such create legal ⁸⁶ This encompasses the category which fall under the 'all States' formula such as Palestine, Summary of Practice of the Secretary-General As Depositary of Multilateral Treaties, UN Doc ST/LEG/7/Rev.1, paras 81-2; see also in relation to Palestine, El Zeidy, M. M., 'Ad hoc Declarations of Acceptance of Jurisdiction: The Palestinian Situation under Scrutiny', in Stahn C. (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP 2015), 199.

⁸⁷ See for example, Rome Statute, articles 17(1)(a)-(c), 18(1), (2), 19(2)(b).

⁸⁸ Rome Statute, article 28. For a discussion, see Kleffner, J., Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdiction (OUP 2008), 109-110.

⁸⁹ Informal Expert paper: 'The Principle of Complementarity in Practice' (2003) (on file with the author), ICC-01/04-01/07-1008-AnxA.

obligations, the provisions of the Statute may be interpreted in the light of the preamble. The duty to “exercise criminal jurisdiction” should be read in a manner consistent with the customary obligation aut dedere aut judicare, and is therefore satisfied by extradition and surrender, since those are criminal proceedings that result in prosecution. However, as noted above, the reference to a duty also reflects the spirit of the Statute that States are intended to carry the main burden of investigating and prosecuting. This is necessary for the effective operation of the ICC. In the types of situations described here, to decline to exercise jurisdiction in favour of prosecution before the ICC is a step taken to enhance the delivery of effective justice, and is thus consistent with both the letter and the spirit of the Rome Statute and other international obligations with respect to core crimes. This is distinguishable from a failure to prosecute out of apathy or a desire to protect perpetrators, which may properly be criticized as inconsistent with the fight against impunity.⁹⁰

In effect, the experts developed a theory by which a State respected its obligation to prosecute by failing to prosecute. A State would be judged on its compliance with the duty to prosecute by an analysis of its motives rather than its actions.

The Prosecutor himself began to endorse this philosophy, by which the Court’s operations might result from cooperation rather than antipathy:

[T]here may be cases where inaction by States is the appropriate course of action. For example, the Court and a territorial State incapacitated by mass crimes may agree that a consensual division of labour is the most logical and effective approach. Groups bitterly divided by conflict may oppose prosecutions at each others’ hands and yet agree to a prosecution by a Court perceived as neutral and impartial.⁹¹

This philosophy of prosecutorial initiative was intimately linked to the concept of ‘self-referral’, by which States triggered the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to crimes committed on their own territory. Although a self-referral would lead to a scenario of inaction or inactivity, these are two distinct concepts. The former is a question of jurisdiction while the latter is one related to admissibility.⁹²

26 The concept of ‘uncontested admissibility’ was further developed by an expert consultation held under the auspices of the Office of the Prosecutor in late 2003. It concluded that ‘[t]here may also be situations where the Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) and the State concerned agree that a consensual division of labour is in the best interests of justice; for example, where a conflict-torn State is unable to carry out effective proceedings against persons most responsible’.⁹³ Moreover, ‘[t]here may even be situations where the admissibility issue is further simplified, because the State in question is prepared to expressly acknowledge that it is not carrying out an investigation or prosecution’.⁹⁴

Two scenarios were envisaged. In the first, the experts considered the case of a suspect who had fled to a third state: ‘All interested parties may agree that the ICC has developed superior evidence, witnesses and expertise relating to that situation, making the ICC the more effective forum. Where the third State has not investigated, there is simply no obstacle to admissibility under Article 17, and no need to label the State as “unwilling” or “unable” before it can cooperate with the Court by surrendering the suspect.’ Under the second scenario, a State ‘incapacitated by mass crimes’ or alternatively ‘groups bitterly divided by conflict’ who feared prosecution at each other’s hands would ‘agree to leadership prosecution by a Court seen as

⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 19, fn. 24.

⁹¹ ‘Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor’ (2003) 5, <http://www.icc-cpi.int/nr/rdonlyres/1fa7c4c6-de5f-42b7-8b25-60aa962ed8b6/143594/030905_policy_paper.pdf> accessed 7 March 2015.

⁹² For a discussion on self-referrals, their validity and consequences, see Kres (2004) 2 JICJ 944; Gaeta (2004) 2 JICJ 949; El Zeidy (2005) 5 ICLRev 83; id., The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law: Origin, Development and Practice (Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 211–222, 274–283; Müller and Stegmillar (2010) 8 JICJ 1267; Chaitidou, E., ‘Article 14’, this volume.

⁹³ Informal Expert paper: ‘The Principle of Complementarity in Practice’ (2003) 3, ICC-01/04-01/07-1008-AnxA.

⁹⁴ Ibid. 18. Also 20. This was actually the case with the first referrals before the ICC in the situations of Uganda, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Central African Republic. The practice continued in relation to subsequent referrals such as the situations in Mali and Central African Republic II. For a detailed discussion, see Chaitidou, E., ‘Article 14’, this volume.

neutral and impartial. In such cases, declining to exercise primary jurisdiction in order to facilitate international jurisdiction is not a sign of apathy or lack of commitment.⁹⁵

This philosophical approach to complementarity underpins five situations currently before the Court: those in Uganda, the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), Central African Republic I and II (CAR), and Mali. So far this philosophy has been accepted without much question by the Pre-Trial Chambers. For instance, in authorising the issuance of warrants of arrest concerning the Uganda situation, Pre-Trial Chamber II assigned to the situation and the cases related thereto, invoked a letter of 28 May 2004 from the Government of Uganda stating it had been ‘unable to arrest [...] persons who may bear the greatest responsibility’ for the relevant crimes; that ‘the ICC is the most appropriate and effective forum for the investigation and prosecution of those bearing the greatest responsibility’ for those crimes; and that the Government of Uganda ‘has not conducted and does not intend to conduct national proceedings in relation to the persons most responsible’.⁹⁶ Similarly, in the case against Jean-Pierre Bemba emanating from the CAR situation, Pre-Trial Chamber III acknowledged that ‘the CAR judicial authorities abandoned any attempt to prosecute Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba for the crimes referred to in the Prosecutor’s Application’ and still it proceeded with the issuance of a warrant of arrest against him.⁹⁷

1. Inactivity

Pursuant to the ‘uncontested admissibility’ theory developed by the Office of the Prosecutor, the complementarity test is satisfied by inactivity, rather than by an overt manifestation of a State’s unwillingness or inability to proceed. Although the concept of inactivity has been endorsed by the Pre-Trial Chambers in their jurisprudence, the exact scope of article 17(1)(a)-(b) remained controversial and unsettled for several years from the beginning of the Court’s operation. This uncertainty resulted from some conflicting academic writings on the subject, coupled with an admissibility decision issued by Trial Chamber II in June 2009⁹⁸. Also, the absence of any judicial pronouncement at the time on the part of the Appeals Chamber regarding the actual scope of this provision and how it was intended to operate in practice contributed to such uncertainty.

In Lubanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I stated: ‘The first part of the test relates to national investigations, prosecutions and trials concerning the case at hand insofar as such case would be admissible only if those States with jurisdiction over it have remained inactive in relation to that case or are unwilling or unable, within the meaning of article 17(1)(a) to (c), 2 and 3 of the Statute’ (emphasis added).⁹⁹ According to the Pre-Trial Chamber this interpretation rests on ‘a contrario [reading] of article 17, paras. 1(a) to (c) of the Statute’.¹⁰⁰ Having examined the available information, the Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that ‘no State with jurisdiction over the case [...] against Mr [...] Lubanga is acting, or has acted in relation to [such case]. Accordingly, in the absence of any acting State, the Chamber need not make any analysis of unwillingness or inability’.¹⁰¹ Similarly, in Abu Garada, the same

⁹⁵ Ibid. 19.

⁹⁶ Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 27 September 2005 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/b1010a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 37.

⁹⁷ Prosecutor v. Jean Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 10 June 2008 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/fb80c6/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 21.

⁹⁸ Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 June 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e4ca69/>> accessed 5 March 2015.

⁹⁹ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid., fn. 19.

¹⁰¹ Ibid., para. 40.

Chamber, albeit with a different composition, also noted that according to the information provided by the Prosecutor,

‘no State with jurisdiction over the case against Mr Abu Garda is acting, or has acted, in the manner described in article 17 of the Statute in relation to the facts alleged in this case. Accordingly, in the absence of any State action, it is not necessary to address any issues relating to the unwillingness or inability of any given State to investigate or prosecute the case.’¹⁰²

- 28 By contrast, in its decision of 16 June 2009, Trial Chamber II put forward a different interpretation of article 17(1) to the effect that a case shall be determined admissible only if the relevant state was deemed unwilling to carry out the proceedings. According to the Trial Chamber, there are two types of unwillingness envisaged by article 17, one explicit and the other implicit. As to the latter, the Chamber said:

[A] State may not want to protect an individual, but, for a variety of reasons, may not wish to exercise its jurisdiction over him or her. This second form of ‘unwillingness’, which is not expressly provided for in article 17 of the Statute, aims to see the person brought to justice, but not before national courts. The Chamber considers that a State which chooses not to investigate or prosecute a person before its own courts, but has nevertheless every intention of seeing that justice is done, must be considered as lacking the will referred to in article 17.¹⁰³

This interpretation deviated from the prevailing view endorsed by the Pre-Trial Chambers, and together with few scholarly writings, caused some uncertainty about the correct construction of article 17. It was not until 25 September 2009 that this controversial question was settled. On that date, the Appeals Chamber rendered its first judgment on the subject-matter in relation to an appeal lodged against the 16 June 2009 Decision and stated:

‘Such an interpretation is not only irreconcilable with the wording of the provision, but is also in conflict with a purposive interpretation of the Statute. The aim of the Rome Statute is ‘to put an end to impunity’ and to ensure that ‘the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished’. This object and purpose of the Statute would come to naught were the said interpretation of article 17 (1) of the Statute as proposed by the Appellant to prevail. It would result in a situation where, despite the inaction of a State, a case would be inadmissible before the Court, unless that State is unwilling or unable to open investigations. The Court would be unable to exercise its jurisdiction over a case as long as the State is theoretically willing and able to investigate and to prosecute the case, even though that State has no intention of doing so. Thus, a potentially large number of cases would not be prosecuted by domestic jurisdictions or by the International Criminal Court.’¹⁰⁴

- 29 Thus, article 17(1) as a whole requires the Court to initially check the existence or absence of one or more of the following four scenarios before making its determination on the inadmissibility of a given case: (1) the State having jurisdiction is investigating or prosecuting the case (article 17(1)(a)); (2) the State has investigated and concluded that there is no basis on which to prosecute (article 17(1)(b)); (3) the person has already been tried for the conduct which forms the subject of the complaint (article 17(1)(c)); and (4) the case is of insufficient gravity to proceed before the Court (article 17(1)(d)).

If for example, the answer to the first scenario is in the negative, the plain language of article 17(1) will render the case admissible before the Court. Accordingly, there is no need to examine a State’s ‘unwillingness’ or ‘inability’ under article 17(2) and (3) as argued in the ¹⁰² Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garada, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 8 February 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cb3614/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29.

¹⁰³ Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Article 19 of the Statute), Trial Chamber II, 16 June 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e4ca69/>> accessed 3 March 2015, para. 77.

¹⁰⁴ Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 79.

16 June 2009 Decision and rejected by the Appeals Chamber in the 25 September 2009 Judgment. In the latter judgment, the Appeals Chamber proceeded on this point by saying:

‘[I]n considering whether a case is inadmissible under article 17(1)(a) and (b)[...], the initial questions to ask are (1) whether there are ongoing investigations or prosecutions, or (2) whether there have been investigations in the past, and the State having jurisdiction has decided not to prosecute the person concerned. It is only when the answers to these questions are in the affirmative that one has to look to the second halves of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) and to examine the question of unwillingness and inability. To do otherwise would be to put the cart before the horse. It follows that in case of inaction, the question of unwillingness or inability does not arise; inaction on the part of a State having jurisdiction (that is, the fact that a State is not investigating or prosecuting, or has not done so) renders a case admissible before the Court, subject to article 17(1)(d)[...].’¹⁰⁵

The Appeals Chamber also made a similar pronouncement in a more recent judgment rendered on 30 August 2011, where it stated that ‘it should be underlined, however, that determining the existence of an investigation must be distinguished from assessing whether the State is ‘unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution’, which is the second question to consider when determining the admissibility of a case’.¹⁰⁶

It follows that the ‘unwillingness’ or ‘inability’ tests will only come into play if there is an affirmative finding on the part of the Court that national proceedings are underway (i. e., in a scenario of action where there are at least on-going investigations on the part of the State). In this case, the Court needs to test the quality of such proceedings. 30

2. ‘same case’

An affirmative finding on the part of the Court that national proceedings are taking place 31 renders a case inadmissible only in so far as the investigation, prosecution or trial is proven by evidence and targets the same ‘case’ which is the subject of the Court’s consideration. Therefore, not every investigation, prosecution or trial conducted at the national level will satisfy the first three scenarios for the purpose of securing a decision of inadmissibility in favour of the State concerned. There may still be scenarios whereby a State has indeed initiated an investigation but still the Court considers that that State remains inactive. This is due to the fact that the relevant State failed to prove by way of providing the necessary evidence that the ongoing investigations target the same case.¹⁰⁷

Depending on the particular stage of the proceedings, the scope and the level of assessment 32 of a case before the Court varies. At the early stages of the proceedings, namely in the course of investigating an entire situation referred to the Court by either a State Party¹⁰⁸ or the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter,¹⁰⁹ or the Prosecutor acting proprio motu,¹¹⁰ the admissibility assessment will be against the backdrop of a potential case.

¹⁰⁵ Ibid., para. 78; see also Robinson, ‘The inaction controversy: Neglected words and new opportunities’, in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (CUP 2011) 462 et seq.

¹⁰⁶ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 Entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 August 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac5d46/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 41.

¹⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte D’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef697a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 34 and 40; Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, No. ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 37; Prosecutor v. Ahman Harun & Ali Kushayb, ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 27 April 2007 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e2469d/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 21, 24.

¹⁰⁸ Rome Statute, articles 13(a) and 14(1).

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., article 13(b).

¹¹⁰ Ibid., articles 13(c) and 15.

This notion was introduced for the first time by Pre-Trial Chamber II in its decision of 31 March 2010 authorizing the Prosecutor to initiate an investigation in relation to the situation in the Republic of Kenya.¹¹¹ The rationale underlying the assessment of admissibility against the backdrop of a potential case is that at the early stages of the investigation into a situation, it is unlikely that suspects will have been identified or the precise conduct or its legal characterization will be that clear. This does not mean that at the early stages of an investigation, a certain level of precision is not required. To the contrary, it is required that the contours or defining parameters of the potential case are known 'such that the Court is able to compare [what is being investigated by the State] against what is being investigated by the [ICC] Prosecutor'.¹¹²

The idea of a potential case was further clarified in the 31 March 2010 Decision by the same Pre-Trial Chamber II when it stated:

'[T]he reference to a "case" in article 53(l)(b) of the Statute [same as reflected in article 17] does not mean that the text is mistaken but rather that the Chamber is called upon to construe the term "case" in the context in which it is applied. The Chamber considers, therefore, that since it is not possible to have a concrete case involving an identified suspect for the purpose of prosecution, prior to the commencement of an investigation, the admissibility assessment at this stage actually refers to the admissibility of one or more potential cases within the context of a situation.'¹¹³

In the 30 August 2011 Judgment, the Appeals Chamber adopted the same line of reasoning when it said:

'The meaning of the words "case being investigated" in article 17(1)(a) of the Statute must therefore be understood in the context to which it is applied. For the purpose of proceedings relating to the initiation of an investigation into a situation (articles 15 and 53(1) of the Statute), the contours of the likely cases will often be relatively vague because the investigations of the Prosecutor are at their initial stages. The same is true for preliminary admissibility challenges under article 18 of the Statute. Often, no individual suspects will have been identified at this stage, nor will the exact conduct nor its legal classification be clear.'¹¹⁴

- 33 The admissibility assessment should be more precise and rigorous after the Prosecutor has conducted his/her investigation (in the context of articles 15 and 53(1) of the Statute) and is in a position to request the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber to issue a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear pursuant to article 58 of the Statute (and in the context of article 19 of the Statute as explained in the following section). At this stage, admissibility is assessed against a 'concrete case', where there is an actual identified suspect and an exact criminal conduct known to the Court. Therefore, the defining elements of a concrete case have been confirmed by the Appeals Chamber as the 'individual and the alleged conduct'.¹¹⁵

For the purpose of an admissibility determination of a concrete case, the Appeals Chamber noted that domestic investigations 'must cover the same individual and substantially the same conduct as alleged in the proceedings before the Court'.¹¹⁶ Although articles 20(3) together with article 90(1) of the Statute refer to the 'same person' and the 'same conduct', ¹¹¹ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010, <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 48.

¹¹² Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Judgment on the Appeal of Libya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 Entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0499fd/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 84.

¹¹³ Ibid., para. 48. Also for the criteria to be applied in the assessment of a potential case, see paras 49–50.

¹¹⁴ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 Entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 August 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac5d46/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 39.

¹¹⁵ Ibid., para. 40.

¹¹⁶ Ibid., para. 40.

which confirms that this is the correct test,¹¹⁷ the Appeals Chamber surprisingly deviated from the language of the Statute by adding the word ‘substantially’, without providing any explanation regarding the legal basis or the rationale for this addition.¹¹⁸ In clarifying the scope of ‘substantially the same conduct’, the Appeals Chamber stated in its 21 May 2014 Judgment on the appeal against the decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi that this test encompasses the conduct of the suspect and ‘that [conduct] described in the incidents under investigation which is imputed to the suspect’.¹¹⁹ In this case, it was Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’s use of the Security Forces to commit the crimes through the direct perpetrators in the course of the various incidents described in the arrest warrant decision. The Appeals Chamber’s reference to imputation of conduct of the physical perpetrators to the suspect suggests on its face that the Appeals Chamber requires that the domestic authorities investigate and charge on the basis of the same mode of liability. Although it is easier to make an admissibility assessment by the Court if the domestic authorities relied on the same mode of participation, requiring the State to investigate on the basis of the exact mode of liability is far reaching. It should be sufficient that the relevant State charge on the basis of different modes of liability in so far as the investigation captures the core conduct of the suspect as framed by the ICC Prosecutor.¹²⁰ Arguably, the Appeals Chamber made the above pronouncement without further clarification in view of the particular facts of this case which involves a mode of liability of indirect co-perpetration without realizing that it might raise a question as such.

The Appeals Chamber’s wording also suggests that an admissibility determination before the Court is incident-specific and that the question of sameness of cases depends on the degree of overlap between the incidents investigated by the Court and those carried out at the national level. Certainly, the more straight forward test should have been one which involves an examination of whether the State is investigating the same incidents as those before the Court. However, since the Appeals Chamber added the term substantially to the test, it became clear that the question of investigating all the incidents subject of the Prosecutor’s case is no more required. What is required as the Appeals Chamber noted, ‘is a judicial assessment of whether the case that the State is investigating sufficiently mirrors the one the Prosecutor is investigating’.¹²¹ This requires a considerable overlap between the incidents investigated by the national authorities and those which form the Prosecutor’s case. The ¹¹⁷ Rastan, in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (2011) 421, 444.

¹¹⁸ Notably, the Appeals Chamber in its final findings in paragraph 47 stated that the ‘same person/same conduct test applied by the Pre-Trial Chamber was the correct test’. Thus, there is no mention of the term ‘substantial’ in this paragraph. See, Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgement on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 Entitled ‘Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute’, Appeals Chamber, 30 August 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac5d46/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 47; see also in the context of interpreting article 4 of Protocol 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has considered that a determination of the same offence which triggers the ne bis in idem prohibition could either arise from ‘identical facts or facts which were substantially the same’ (emphasis added), ECtHR, Marguš v. Croatia, Application no. 4455/10, Judgment of 27 May 2014, para. 114; Sergey Zolotukhin v. Russia, Application no. 14939/03, Judgment of 10 February 2009, para. 82. It is not clear whether the Appeals Chamber was guided by the language and less restrictive approach of the ECtHR or not, given that the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber lacks any reference to that effect.

¹¹⁹ Prosecutor v. Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, Appeals Chamber, Judgement on the Appeal of Libya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 Entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi’, Appeals Chamber, 21 May 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/0499fd/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 62 and 70.

¹²⁰ But see, Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire: The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (CUP 2013) 106 (arguing that the ‘Court has defined the term ‘case’ so narrowly that domestic proceedings are not considered to have taken place in the same ‘case’ unless they cover the same person, conduct, incidents and, possibly, mode of criminal responsibility as the case before the Court’).

¹²¹ Ibid., para. 73.

present approach leaves the State with some discretion to pick and choose some of the incidents to be investigated, including those which suffer from weak evidence, and which could accordingly lead to an acquittal of the suspect(s).

- 35 Obviously the substantially same conduct test involves not only an objective assessment but also a subjective one because what may appear to sufficiently mirror the Prosecutor's case may vary from one Chamber to the other. The real problem lies in the difficulty to draw the demarcation line between what may and may not constitute substantially the same incidents. If, for instance, the Prosecutor's case focuses on ten incidents and the domestic authorities have investigated only six or seven of ten, would this number meet the test? Or should the test not necessarily rely on the number of incidents investigated, but rather on the significance of the suspect's conduct even in the context of a limited number of incidents? By deviating from the strict test envisaged by the Statute, and introducing an open-ended notion, the Appeals Chamber left the door open for several questions that apparently cannot be answered in the abstract but on the basis of the facts of future cases to be examined. Clearly the Appeals Chamber preferred a more flexible approach and a lower degree of scrutiny in the course of an admissibility determination. The substantially same conduct approach adopted by the Appeals Chamber, initially in the 30 August 2011 Judgment and later developed in the Libya case, led the Defence team in a different case to argue for a very broad interpretation of the same conduct test.¹²²

3. Burden of proof

- 36 With respect to the burden of proof and evidentiary aspects, Pre-Trial Chamber II clarified in the 30 May 2011 Decision, that the relevant State must submit concrete evidence revealing ongoing investigations at the national level.¹²³ This finding has been upheld by the Appeals Chamber in the 30 August 2011 Judgment. The Appeals Chamber expressly ruled that the relevant State challenging the admissibility of a case bears the burden of proof.¹²⁴ In order to discharge its burden, the State 'must support its statement [that it is investigating the relevant case] with tangible proof to demonstrate that it is actually carrying out relevant investigations [...] there must be evidence with probative value',¹²⁵ and of 'a sufficient degree of specificity'.¹²⁶ This may take the form of 'interviewing witnesses or suspects, collecting ¹²² Prosecutor v. Laurent Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/11-436-Red, Decision on the 'Requête relative à la recevabilité de l'affaire en vertu des Articles 19 et 17 du Statut', Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 June 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/8b3a54/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 9 (where the Defence argued in favour of a broad interpretation of conduct thereby allowing a finding of inadmissibility even if the national proceedings covered different crimes (economic crimes) or factual allegations than those captured under the case before the Court). Notably, the Court left the door open and did not respond to the argument whether or not this is a possible interpretation. Instead, the Chamber found that there is a situation of inactivity in relation to Gbagbo 'since November 2011'. Ibid., paras 27–28. But see the most recent judgment rendered by the Appeals Chamber where it confirmed an earlier finding of Pre-Trial Chamber I concerning economic crimes in its decision of 11 December 2014 regarding Simone Gbagbo. Referring to the relevant part of the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision which states that 'the conduct underlying the alleged economic crimes was "clearly of a different nature" from the conduct alleged in the proceedings before the Court', the Appeals Chamber found that 'it was not unreasonable for the Pre-Trial Chamber' to arrive at this conclusion. Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-75-Red, Judgment on the appeal of Côte D'Ivoire against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 December 2014 entitled "Decision on Côte D'Ivoire's challenge to the admissibility of the case against Simone Gbagbo", Appeals Chamber, 27 May 2015, para. 99.

¹²³ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbb0ed/>>, paras 60 and 64–65.

¹²⁴ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 Entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 August 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac5d46/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 61, 83.

¹²⁵ Ibid., para. 61.

¹²⁶ Ibid., paras 61–62.

documentary evidence, or carrying out forensic analysis'.¹²⁷ More recently, Pre-Trial Chamber I clarified that the required evidence for the purposes of article 17 is not confined to 'evidence on the merits of the national case that may have been collected as part of the purported investigation to prove the alleged crimes'.¹²⁸ Rather the required evidence may extend to 'all material capable of proving that an investigation or prosecution is ongoing'.¹²⁹ This includes 'directions, order and decisions issued by authorities in charge [...] as well as internal reports, updates, notifications or submissions contained in the file [related to the domestic proceedings]'.¹³⁰

It follows that Chambers of the Court have imposed a quite demanding admissibility assessment. Not every investigation will satisfy the first limb of the complementarity test, let alone future promises of investigative activities or judicial reform as it was with the Kenya cases four years ago.¹³¹ Finally, although the burden of proof mainly rests on the State, sometimes the burden of proof might be shared with other parties apart from the challenging State. This may be the case, if for instances, the Defence puts forward certain factual allegations in the course of the admissibility proceedings. In this case, it will be for the Defence to sufficiently substantiate these factual allegations.¹³²

4. 'unwilling or unable'

As mentioned earlier, the 'unwilling or 'unable' tests come into play if it has been proven that the same case is at least being investigated by the relevant State with jurisdiction over that case. Only then these criteria become relevant in order to consider the quality or seriousness of the purported investigations. In this regard, it is worth noting that the current practice of the Court in relation to the assessment of admissibility based on the notion of inaction or inactivity makes the demarcation line between this criterion and unwillingness or inability not easy to discern. The level of detail imposed on States for meeting their burden of proof that they are carrying out the required national investigations led to an overlap between the criterion of inaction and that of unwillingness or inability set out in the second half of the provision. This is so because in order to determine whether or not there are indeed investigations on the ground, Chambers have also been testing, inter alia, the quality ¹²⁷ Ibid., paras 1 and 40.

¹²⁸ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-239, Decision Requesting Further Submissions on Issues Related to the Admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 December 2012 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f8a7cf/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras. 10–11; Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte D'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef697a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29.

¹²⁹ Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte D'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef697a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29.

¹³⁰ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-239, Decision Requesting Further Submissions on Issues Related to the Admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 7 December 2012 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/f8a7cf/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 10–11; Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte D'Ivoire's Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef697a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 29.

¹³¹ Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 30 May 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/dbb0ed/>>, para. 64; Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-307, Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 Entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Appeals Chamber, 30 August 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ac5d46/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 41.

¹³² Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 Entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 July 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef20c7/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 167.

of the domestic investigations. The level of detail now required for this in the evidence presented was initially meant for testing the State's unwillingness and inability. Such an overlap has been acknowledged in two of the recent decisions issued by Pre-Trial Chamber I.

In Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I recognized that:

‘[T]he two limbs of the admissibility test [i.e., inactivity and unwillingness or inability], while distinct, are nonetheless, intimately and inextricably linked. Therefore, evidence put forward to substantiate the assertion of ongoing proceedings covering the same case [...] before the Court may also be relevant to demonstrate their genuineness. Indeed, evidence related, inter alia, to the appropriateness of the investigative measures, the amount and type of resources allocated to the investigation, as well as the scope of the investigative powers of the persons in charge of the investigation are relevant for both limbs since such aspects, which are significant to the question of whether there is no situation of “inactivity” at the national level, are also relevant indicators of the State’s willingness and ability genuinely to carry out the concerned proceedings.’¹³³

Similarly, in Simone Gbagbo, the Chamber argued in similar terms that ‘[c]onsiderations with respect to the quantity and quality of the alleged investigative steps may [...] be relevant to the determination of whether an “investigation” is indeed being conducted, like they may be to the assessment of genuineness of the concerned investigation in order to establish [...] whether the State is “unwilling” or “unable” to carry it out’.¹³⁴

39 Nevertheless, despite this apparent overlap, there might be situations in which testing the quality or seriousness of an ongoing investigation will require additional analysis and details. This would be the case if, for example, subsequent to a finding of inadmissibility, the domestic process is experiencing a deliberate prolongation. This would reveal a lack of will to bring the person to justice. Such information will not be available if an admissibility determination is conducted at relatively early stages of the domestic investigations. It will become clear that there was a deliberate delay in the proceedings only after a certain lapse of time from the start of the investigation. Such a scenario fits better the criterion of unwillingness rather than inactivity. This may be identified by way of conducting a proprio motu assessment by the relevant Chamber in accordance with article 19(1) or based on new facts presented by the Prosecutor under article 19(10). At this stage, it becomes clear that despite the existence of an investigation, the State is unwilling genuinely to carry out the proceedings.

40 Hitherto, the notion of ‘unwilling’ has received little attention in the jurisprudence of the Court. This is in part due to the fact that the Prosecutor as well as the Chambers of the Court have heavily relied on the criterion of ‘inaction’ or ‘inactivity’, which made it unnecessary to delve into this criterion. By contrast, recent jurisprudence has tackled some of the elements of inability, especially in the cases emanating from the situation in Libya as it will be discussed in more detail below. Although an assessment of inability, same as in the case of unwillingness, requires first to prove the existence of ongoing investigations, one of the Pre-Trial Chambers surprisingly disregarded this two tier test and examined inability despite its initial finding that there was a situation of inactivity on the part of the State.¹³⁵ By so doing, the Chamber mixed the two limbs of the admissibility test.

5. ‘genuinely’

41 Paragraph (1) of Article 17 conditions the words ‘unwilling or unable’ with the adjective ‘genuinely’. In Lubanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I alluded to this important dimension of the ¹³³ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 210.

¹³⁴ Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo, ICC-02/11-01/12-47-Red, Decision on Côte D’Ivoire’s Challenge to the Admissibility of the Case against Simone Gbagbo, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 December 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef697a/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 30.

¹³⁵ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-344-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 31 May 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/339ee2/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 134–135, 137–138.

complementarity determination.¹³⁶ The term ‘genuinely’ would seem to be an implied reference to the tests set out in paragraph (2) of Article 17. For example, Article 17(2) addresses a situation where some form of trial is underway, but it provides guidelines for assessing whether the trial is in fact ‘genuine’.

During the drafting of the Statute, the matter of inability, at least in principle, was not particularly controversial. However, unwillingness was a different story. The sensitive issue was that the ICC would be passing judgment on the performance of national systems. Many delegations took the position that subjective criteria should be deleted. However, as some subjectivity on the part of the Court was necessary, the term ‘genuinely’ was adopted as being ‘the least objectionable word’, rather than ‘effectively’ or ‘diligently’, for example.¹³⁷

Neither the Statute nor the Rules or the Regulations of the Court define the term ‘genuine’.⁴² Equally, in both Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, the most recent decisions on the subject, which have tackled the second limb of the admissibility test, no reference was made to the meaning of the word ‘genuine’. Instead, the Pre-Trial Chamber entered a purely factual and collective finding on the ability of Libya under article 17(3) without providing any legal interpretation to each and every relevant element of article 17(3) related to the circumstances of the case.¹³⁸

The plain meaning of the word ‘genuine’ is ‘authentic or real – something that has the quality of what it is purported to be or to have’.¹³⁹ The drafting history does not seem to provide clear guidance for the usage of the term.¹⁴⁰ One commentator argued that the concept carrying the most ‘resemblance to genuineness is perhaps the concept of good faith’.¹⁴¹ This interpretation finds support in two decisions of the European Court of Justice where it used the terms ‘good faith’ and ‘genuine’ interchangeably.¹⁴²⁴³

Reading the word ‘genuinely’ in its context (‘unless the State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution’) suggests that the term genuinely applies to the last part of the sentence – namely, to qualify the phrase ‘to carry out the investigation or prosecution’. Based on this interpretation, the Court should be satisfied that the investigation or prosecution carried out by the State in question is ‘genuine’ or is conducted in good faith before deciding to defer to the national jurisdiction. To say otherwise means that any national proceedings, even if insufficient, will act as a stumbling block in the face of the ICC.¹⁴³ For an investigation to be deemed genuine it requires the State to use ‘all the legal means at its disposal’ in the conduct of a serious criminal process that identifies the suspects involved and leads to actual trial and appropriate punishment if necessary.¹⁴⁴

¹³⁶ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Pre-Chamber I, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 32.

¹³⁷ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 49.

¹³⁸ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-344-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 31 May 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/339ee2/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 215 and 218; also, para. 216 refers to the overall finding of unwillingness; Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 294 et seq., and 311.

¹³⁹ Black’s Law Dictionary, (West Group 7th edition 1999) 695.

¹⁴⁰ Holmes, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (OUP 2002) 674.

¹⁴¹ Ibid.

¹⁴² Case C-499/99 Commission v. Kingdom of Spain [2002] ECR I-6031, para. 24; Case C-105/02 Commission v. Federal Republic of Germany [2006], paras 93–94; Case C-275/04 Commission v. Kingdom of Belgium [2006], paras. 82–83.

¹⁴³ ICC, Report on Preliminary Examination Activities 2013, November 2013, para. 138 (noting that [t]he Office will evaluate whether specific national proceedings have been or are being carried out genuinely’); see also, Informal Expert Paper: The Principle of Complementarity in Practice, (2003), at 8, fn 8–9.

¹⁴⁴ Paniagua Morales et al. (‘Panel Blanca’), Judgment of 8 March 1998, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 37 (1998), in particular paras 94, 139, 160, 169, 171 and 178; See also Garrido and Baigorria v. Argentina, Reparations (Art. 63(1) American Convention on Human Rights), Judgment of 27 August 1998, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 39 (1998) para. 73.

Certainly this calls for an *objective*¹⁴⁵ scrutiny in testing the quality of national proceedings as a whole from the moment it starts until the phase it has reached by the time of the admissibility assessment.¹⁴⁶

6. Decision not to prosecute by State

44 According to sub-paragraph (b) of Article 17(1), a case is also inadmissible where the Court determines that it has in fact been investigated by a State that has jurisdiction over it and the State has decided not to prosecute the person concerned. Similar to the situation of article 17(1)(a), sub-paragraph (b) follows a division between two phases. The first phase revolves around the existence or absence of domestic proceedings, while the second phase comes into play to test how genuine the national decision is or was pursuant to article 17(2) and/or (3). The test under the first half of sub-paragraph (b) is cumulative due to the existence of the conjunction ‘and’: ‘[t]he case has been investigated [...] and the State has decided not to prosecute’. Thus, it must be first determined whether the State has carried out investigations which meet the requirements specified under sub-paragraph (a) and developed above. If the answer is in the affirmative there is a need to check whether the State has thereafter decided not to prosecute. If the State has taken such decision not to prosecute, there is also a need to check that the decision not to prosecute did not result from the State’s unwillingness or inability to carry out genuine proceedings.¹⁴⁷

45 The key element under sub-paragraph (b) lies in defining the scope of a decision not to prosecute. Not every decision taken by the State constitutes a decision not to prosecute. Arguably, only final decisions closing an investigation and preventing a prosecution against a suspect/accused before any court may constitute a decision not to prosecute. In Katanga, the Appeals Chamber was confronted with a similar question regarding the scope of a decision not to prosecute. Referring to a decision issued by the DRC’s Auditeur Général on 17 October 2007 to close domestic proceedings against Germain Katanga, the Appeals Chamber stated:

“This decision was not a decision not to prosecute in terms of article 17 (1) (b) of the Statute. It was, rather, a decision to surrender the Appellant to the Court and to close domestic investigations against him as a result of that surrender. The thrust of this decision was not that the Appellant should not be prosecuted, but that he should be prosecuted, albeit before the International Criminal Court.”¹⁴⁸

The Appeals Chamber believed that this interpretation is in line with the purpose of the provision and the overall purpose of the Statute mirrored in its preamble namely, to put an end to impunity. It proceeded by stating the rationale underlying this interpretation:

¹⁴⁵ See by analogy the parallel standard applied by the International Court of Justice in the Nuclear Tests Case (Australia v. France), 1974 ICJ, 20/12/1974, para. 57; Nuclear Tests Case (New Zealand v. France), 1974 ICJ, 20/12/1974, paras 58 and 60; Interpretation of Peace Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary, and Romania (First Phase), Advisory Opinion of 30/03/1950, (1950) ICJ Reports, at 74.

¹⁴⁶ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgement on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 56 (noting that the ‘admissibility of a case must be determined on the basis of facts as they exist at the time of the proceedings concerning the admissibility challenge’); also Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey and Joshua Arap Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-234, Decision on the ‘Filing of Updated Investigation Report by the Government of Kenya in the Appeal against the Pre-Trial Chamber’s Decision on Admissibility’, Appeals Chamber, 28 July 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/3d65de/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 10.

¹⁴⁷ See, Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgement on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 76 (noting that ‘in article 17 (1) (b), unwillingness and inability refer to the decision of a State, after investigation, not to prosecute the person concerned: “unless the decision resulted from the unwillingness or inability of the State genuinely to prosecute”’).

¹⁴⁸ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgement on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 82.

‘If the decision of a State to close an investigation because of the suspect’s surrender to the Court were considered to be a “decision not to prosecute”, the peculiar, if not absurd, result would be that because of the surrender of a suspect to the Court, the case would become inadmissible. In such scenario, neither the State nor the ICC would exercise jurisdiction over the alleged crimes, defeating the purpose of the Rome Statute. Thus, a “decision not to prosecute” in terms of article 17 (1) (b) of the Statute does not cover decisions of a State to close judicial proceedings against a suspect because of his or her surrender to the ICC (footnotes omitted).’¹⁴⁹

A year later, the Appeals Chamber had to rule once more on a similar question concerning the scope of a decision not to prosecute in the context of the case against Jean-Pierre Bemba arising from the CAR situation. In responding to an argument put forward by the accused that the decision of the Public Prosecutor of Bangui Regional Court to dismiss the charges against him on 16 September 2004 was not determinative to terminate the proceedings, the Appeals Chamber stated:

[N]either the Court of Appeal of Bangui [Judgment of 16 December 2004] nor the Court of Cassation [Judgment of 11 April 2006] agreed that the prosecution against Mr Bemba should end; instead, both determined that charges which had been dismissed by the Senior Investigating Judge against Mr Bemba should be upheld, and simultaneously submitted the matter to the competent authority in order for the matter to be referred to the ICC. [...] ¹⁵⁰ In sum, there is nothing to indicate that the Trial Chamber erred in its determination that there was no decision not to prosecute within the meaning of article 17 (1) (b) of the Statute. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber correctly relied on the judgments of the Court of Appeal of Bangui and the Court of Cassation as indicating prima facie the current status of the judicial proceedings in the case of État Centrafricain c. Ange-Félix Patassé, et al. These appellate decisions were also not decisions not to prosecute within the meaning of article 17 (1) (b) of the Statute.¹⁵¹

It follows from the above that decisions not to prosecute do not encompass those national 46
decisions to refer a situation to the ICC, be it a judicial decision and/or a political decision from the executive. Rather a decision not to prosecute for the purpose of rendering a case admissible before the Court must be one which aims at evading justice. Even then the decision should attain finality in order to satisfy sub-paragraph (b).

Also of the relevance to the discussion on decisions not to prosecute, is the debate at the 47
Rome Conference about the attitude that the Court should take to alternative methods of accountability. So far the Court has not taken up these questions in a judicial decision. At the Rome Conference, South Africa was the most insistent on this point, concerned that approaches like its Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which offered amnesty in return for truthful confession, would be treated by the Court as a decision not to prosecute, thereby opening the door to international prosecution. While there was widespread sympathy with the South African model, many delegations recalled the disgraceful amnesties accorded by South American dictators to themselves, the most poignant being that of former Chilean president Augusto Pinochet. But drafting a provision that would legitimise the South African experiment yet condemn the Chilean one proved elusive. It has been suggested that, at the very least, genuine but non-judicial efforts at accountability that fall short of criminal prosecution might have the practical effect of convincing the Prosecutor to set priorities elsewhere.¹⁵²

¹⁴⁹ Prosecutor v. Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, Judgement on the Appeal of Mr. Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Appeals Chamber, 25 September 2009 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ba82b5/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 83.

¹⁵⁰ Prosecutor v. Jean Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-962-Corr, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 24 June 2010 Entitled ‘Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges’, Appeals Chamber, 19 October 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/37e559/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 68; For the Trial Chamber decision, see Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Trial Chamber III, 24 June 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/a5de24/>> accessed 6 March 2015.

¹⁵¹ Ibid., para. 74.

¹⁵² For a comprehensive discussion of these issues, see: Stahn (2005) 3 JICJ 695.

In his early reports to the Security Council on Darfur, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court has acknowledged the significance of such alternative approaches to accountability, suggesting that these are relevant to the exercise of his discretion, but without, however, indicating that they may pose an obstacle to admissibility of a case.¹⁵³ Speaking of traditional reconciliation mechanisms in Darfur, he said: ‘These are not criminal proceedings as such for the purpose of assessing the admissibility of cases before the International Criminal Court, but they are an important part of the fabric of reconciliation for Darfur, as recognized in resolution 1593 (2005).’¹⁵⁴

- 48 Judges of the Court might consider that a sincere truth commission project amounts to a form of investigation that does not suggest ‘inactivity’, ‘unwillingness’ or ‘inability’ on the part of the State to genuinely administer justice, thereby meeting the terms of article 17(1)(a) and (b).¹⁵⁵ However, one of the legal problems of this approach lies in the fact that an investigation carried out by a non-judicial body such as a truth commission is not a criminal investigation stricto sensu, and as such, it would not necessarily lead to a prosecution. When sub-paragraph (a) refers to a ‘prosecution’, which is always a judicial activity, carried out by a purely judicial organ of the relevant State, one gets the sense that article 17(1) is concerned with ‘judicial proceedings’ as opposed to alternative mechanisms of justice. However, perhaps there is some room for accepting a ‘preliminary investigation’ carried out by a truth commission such as, the Israeli Kahan Commission of Inquiry established to investigate the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre, in so far as it is empowered to recommend a criminal prosecution,¹⁵⁶ and is acting on behalf of the State.
- 49 Should that not be enough, the Statute also declares inadmissible a case that is not ‘of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court’.¹⁵⁷ Moreover, the Prosecutor is invited to consider, in determining whether or not to investigate a case, whether ‘[t]aking into account the gravity of the crime and the interests of victims, there are nonetheless substantial reasons to believe that an investigation would not serve the interests of justice’.¹⁵⁸ Yet judicial attitudes are impossible to predict, and judges or prosecutors might well decide that it is precisely in cases like the South African one where a line must be drawn establishing that amnesty for such crimes is unacceptable.¹⁵⁹
- 50 The issue of amnesty initially proved to be a complication in the prosecutions relating to one of the earliest situations before the Court namely, the Situation in Uganda, which was referred to the ICC in December 2003 in accordance with article 14 of the Rome Statute. Arrest warrants for five leaders of the Lord’s Resistance Army were issued in mid-2005, and they appeared to have provoked the rebels to sue for peace. On a visit to the Court, the Ugandan Minister for Security, Amama Mbabazi, noted that the issuance of warrants had

¹⁵³ UN Doc. S/PV.5321, at 3.

¹⁵⁴ UN Doc. S/PV.5459, at 3.

¹⁵⁵ On the different types of truth commissions and their mandates see Buergenthal, in: Tomuschat et al. (eds.), Volkerrecht als Wertordnung. Common Values in International Law (N.P. Engel Verlag 2006) 103; Hayner, Unspeakable Truths: Facing the Challenge of Truth Commissions (Rutledge 2002). On the relationship between truth commissions and international courts see Schabas (2003) 25 HumRtsQ 1035. See also in the context of the ICC, Stahn (2005) 3 JICJ 695; Robinson (2003) 14 EJIL 481.

¹⁵⁶ Ambos, The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court: An Inductive, Situation-based Approach (Springer 2010) 61–62, fn. 121. The Kahan Commission, officially known as ‘Commission of Inquiry into the Events at the Refugee Camps in Beirut’, was established by the Israeli government on 28 September 1982. However this might not be the case with respect to the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission in Kenya which was agreed upon to establish an ‘accurate, complete and historical record of gross human rights violations committed between 12 December 1963 and 28 February 2008’. The Commission was suffering from credibility problems and thus even if it had the ability to ‘unearth evidence’ and recommend prosecutions, this would not have been sufficient to meet the requirements of article 17. See, Alai and Mue, in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, ii (CUP 2011) 1222, 1123–1224, 1230.

¹⁵⁷ Rome Statute, article 17(1)(d).

¹⁵⁸ Ibid., article 53(1)(c).

¹⁵⁹ Nsereko (1999) 10 CLF 87, 119–20; Scharf (1999) 32 CornILJ 507; Dugard, in: Cassese et al. (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (2002) 693.

contributed to driving the Lord's Resistance Army leaders to the negotiating table. In September 2006, Jan Egelund, the United Nations Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief made similar observations in a briefing to the Security Council.¹⁶⁰ Speaking to the Assembly of States Parties in November 2006, Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo said:

'The Court's intervention has galvanized the activities of the states concerned. [...] Thanks to the unity of purpose of these states, the LRA has been forced to flee its safe haven in southern Sudan and has moved its headquarters to the DRC border. As a consequence, crimes allegedly committed by the LRA in Northern Uganda have drastically decreased. People are leaving the camps for displaced persons and the night commuter shelters which protected tens of thousands of children are now in the process of closing. The loss of their safe haven led the LRA commanders to engage in negotiations, resulting in a cessation of hostilities agreement in August 2006.'¹⁶¹

But to the extent that the charges against the Lord's Resistance Army might have helped to provoke peace negotiations, they also soon proved to be a potential obstacle to their successful completion.¹⁶² Jan Egelund reported to the Security Council that in meetings with internally displaced persons, civil society and the parties themselves, the 'International Criminal Court indictments were the number one subject of discussion [...] All expressed a strong concern that if the indictments were not lifted, they could threaten the progress in these most promising talks ever for northern Uganda'.¹⁶³ The rebel leaders quite predictably have insisted that the arrest warrants be withdrawn as a condition for the peace settlement. President Yoveri Museveni of Uganda, who had triggered the prosecutions two years earlier when he referred the situation in northern Uganda to the Court, asked the Prosecutor to withdraw the warrants. He promised those who had been charged that they would have immunity from arrest in Uganda.¹⁶⁴ Richard Goldstone, who was the first operational prosecutor of the ICTY, remarked:

'It would be fatally damaging to the credibility of the international court if Museveni was allowed to get away with granting amnesty. I just don't accept that Museveni has the right to use the International Criminal Court like this.'¹⁶⁵

Opinions have been sharply divided on how to react to the demands from the Lord's Resistance Army, and from President Museveni.¹⁶⁶ Some take the extreme view that under no conditions can there be any compromise with prosecution, whatever the consequences in terms of prolonging the conflict. Others see it more strategically, noting the positive contribution to the peace process of the arrest warrants. They argue that the warrants should be maintained, at least as long as they continue to have this effect, although without lifting this to the level of absolute principle. Actually maintaining these warrants for so many years has proved to be merited. After ten years from their issuance, the ICC has managed to obtain custody of Dominick Ongwen, a member of the Lord's Resistance Army whose arrest has been sought by the Court. Ongwen surrendered to the ICC¹⁶⁷ with the cooperation of a number of States including his home country Uganda, making it even more compelling to wait further for an arrest of the remaining suspects or their voluntary appearance.

¹⁶⁰ UN Doc. S/PV.5525, at 4.

¹⁶¹ Opening Remarks, Luis Moreno Ocampo, Fifth Session of the Assembly of States Parties, 23 November 2006.

¹⁶² This is discussed by Apuuli (2005) 15 CLF 408; Apuuli (2006) 4 JICJ 179; Ssenyonjo (2005) 10 JConflict&SecurityL 405.

¹⁶³ UN Doc. S/PV.5525, 4.

¹⁶⁴ McGreal, (9 January 2007) The Guardian.

¹⁶⁵ Ibid.

¹⁶⁶ See generally, Nouwen in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (2011) 1120, 1130–1131, 1138; Wierda and Otim, in: Stahn and El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (2011) 1155.

¹⁶⁷ Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-424, Decision Severing the Case against Dominic Ongwen, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 6 February 2015 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/16fb19/>> accessed 6 March 2015, 3; also, Transcript of Hearing, 26 January 2015, No. ICC-02/04-01/05-T-10-ENG, <<http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc1908336.pdf#search=ICC-02%2F04-01%2F05-T-10-ENG>> accessed 7 March 2015.

52 There is some authority for the view that so-called ‘blanket amnesties’ are prohibited by customary international law,¹⁶⁸ and there is a growing tendency to that effect.¹⁶⁹ However, this argument is not without its flaws. For example, States seem prepared to respect the amnesty for the crime against humanity of apartheid that has provided the underpinning for the democratic transition in South Africa. Although theoretically many States are in a position to prosecute former South African officials, on the basis of universal jurisdiction, there is simply no political willingness to upset the political compromises made by former President Nelson Mandela and others. To put it differently, some ‘blanket amnesties’ seem to have been endorsed by the international community, and this suggests that the claims of a prohibitive customary norm are overstated¹⁷⁰.

One way of addressing the question of amnesty in conflicts such as that of Uganda or any other conflict of a similar nature might be for the Security Council to invoke article 16 of the Rome Statute and order a deferral of the prosecutions,¹⁷¹ in the interests of promoting international peace and security. When the matter was discussed in September 2006, at a symposium organised by the Office of the Prosecutor, Gareth Evans, who headed the International Crisis Group, remarked:

‘I have no doubt that dealing with impunity and pursuing peace can work in tandem even in an ongoing conflict situation: these are not necessarily incompatible objectives. The prosecutor’s job is to prosecute and he should get on with it with bulldog intensity. If a policy decision needs to be made, in a particular case, to give primacy to peace, it should be made not by those with the justice mandate, but with the political and conflict resolution mandate, and that is the Security Council. The Statute allows for this in Article 16, and this is the way the international community should be thinking about it.’¹⁷²

Deference to the Security Council, acting under article 16, may be the way to resolve the difficulty, assuming the wisdom of staying international justice in the interests of peace-making.

7. Double jeopardy

53 The third ground is one accepted by the majority of States in their domestic practice. A case shall be inadmissible where the person in question has already been tried for the criminal conduct that is the subject of the complaint. In this regard, there is a clear interplay between article 17(1)(c) and article 20(3). The reference to the term ‘conduct’ under subparagraph 1(c) is reiterated in article 20(3): ‘conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7, 8 or 8 bis’. In such a case a trial before the ICC for the ‘same conduct’ proscribed under articles 6, 7, 8 and 8 bis would be impermissible because of the ne bis in idem rule contained in article 20 para. 3.¹⁷³ Defining the term conduct for the purposes of articles 17(1)(c) and 20(3) should be reconciled with the interpretation, given to conduct for the purposes of subparagraph (a). Accordingly, a trial of the accused by a national court for substantially the same conduct should also suffice to block a second trial before the ICC.

¹⁶⁸ Prosecutor v. Kallon, SCSL-04-15AR72(E) and Prosecutor v. Kamara, SCSL-04-16-AR72(E), Decision on Challenge to Jurisdiction: Lomé Accord Amnesty, Appeals Chamber, 13 March 2004. See also, Prosecutor v. Kondewa, SCSL-2004-14-AR72(E), Separate Opinion of Justice Robertson, 25 May 2004.

¹⁶⁹ See more recently, inter alia, Gelman v. Uruguay, Judgment of February 24, 2011 (Merits and Reparations), IACtHR, paras. 195–197, 215–227; Case of Gomes Lund et al. (Guerrilha do Araguaia) v. Brazil. Preliminary Objections, Merits, Reparations and Costs. Judgment of November 24, 2010. IACtHR, Series C No. 219, para. 171.

¹⁷⁰ For a twofold distinction between blanket and conditional amnesties Ambos, Treatise ICL I, 2013, pp. 422 et seq.

¹⁷¹ El Zeidy (2002) 35 VandJTransnatL 1503; Mokhtar (2002) 3 ICLRev 295; Stahn (2003) 14 EJIL 85.

¹⁷² ICC, Newsletter, No. 9, October 2006, 5.

¹⁷³ See the detailed discussion in Coracini, R. C., ‘Article 20’, this volume; also El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008) 283–298; generally, Stahn, ‘Taking Complementarity Seriously’, in: C. Stahn, and M.M. El Zeidy (eds.), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice, i (CUP 2011) 242.

8. Insufficient gravity

The final ground of inadmissibility is where the case is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the ICC. The idea of introducing gravity as a constituent element of the admissibility provision was first advanced by Professor James Crawford in the course of a meeting of the ILC's working group which took place in May 1994.¹⁷⁴ Professor Crawford proposed that the working group 'ought to consider whether an international criminal court should not have the power to stay a prosecution on specified grounds [such as] the fact that the acts alleged were not of sufficient gravity to warrant trial at the international level'.¹⁷⁵ This idea would prevent the proposed court from being 'swamped by peripheral complaints involving minor offenders',¹⁷⁶ he added. Also, the idea was logical since it would help the proposed court to manage the 'case-load [against] the resources available'¹⁷⁷ and respond to the concerns expressed by many States that the 'court might exercise jurisdiction in cases that were not of sufficient international significance', said other members.¹⁷⁸ Accepting gravity as an integral element of the admissibility provision gained support within the Preparatory Committee in 1996,¹⁷⁹ and during the Rome Conference. The draft provision appearing in the Bureau Discussion Paper at the Rome Conference was retained without any change¹⁸⁰ and finally appeared under article 17(1)(d) of the Statute.¹⁸¹

Article 17(1)(d) of the Rome Statute states that a case may be declared inadmissible when it 'is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court'.¹⁸² According to the structure of article 17(1), gravity is an essential component for the Court's admissibility determination. Thus, a State may have been inactive with respect to national proceedings, which prompts the ICC's intervention; yet the Court may still determine that the case is inadmissible because it 'is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court'. Although the core crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court are all serious, the reference to gravity aims at filtering the type of cases to be dealt with before the Court. This view was confirmed in one of the early decisions on the subject-matter in the Lubanga case, in which Pre-Trial Chamber I stated:

[T]he gravity threshold is in addition to the drafters' careful selection of crimes included in articles 6 to 8 of the Statute [...]. Hence, the fact that a case addresses one of the most serious crimes for the international community as a whole is not sufficient for it to be admissible before the Court.¹⁸³

As a result, 'the relevant conduct must present particular features which render it especially grave'.¹⁸⁴ It went on to explain the concept:

The Chamber holds that the following two features must be considered. First, the conduct which is the subject of a case must be either systematic (pattern of incidents) or large-scale. If isolated instances of criminal activity were sufficient, there would be no need to establish an additional gravity threshold beyond the gravity-driven selection of the crimes (which are defined by both ¹⁷⁴ 'Summary Record of the 2330th Meeting' (1994) YbILC, i, 9.

¹⁷⁵ Ibid.

¹⁷⁶ Ibid.

¹⁷⁷ 'Summary Record of the 2333rd Meeting' (1994) YbILC, i, 33.

¹⁷⁸ 'Summary Record of the 2356th Meeting' (1994) YbILC, i, 193.

¹⁷⁹ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 47.

¹⁸⁰ See Bureau Discussion Paper, UN Doc. A/CONF. 183/C.1/L.53, article 15(1)(d), 6 July 1998; Bureau Discussion Paper, UN Doc. A/CONF. 183/C.1/L.59/Corr.1, article 15(1)(d), 11 July 1998.

¹⁸¹ Report of the Committee of the Whole, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/8, article 1715(d), 17 July 1998; Rome Statute, article 17(1)(d).

¹⁸² See, generally, Murphy, (2006) 17 CLF 281.

¹⁸³ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 41; See generally, De Guzman, (2009) 32 Fordham ILJ 1400. For a critical view see also, De Guzman (2012) 33 MichJIL 265, 286–289.

¹⁸⁴ Ibid., para. 45.

contextual and specific elements) included within the material jurisdiction of the Court. Second, in assessing the gravity of the relevant conduct, due consideration must be given to the social alarm such conduct may have caused in the international community.¹⁸⁵

In the specific circumstances of the Lubanga case, the Pre-Trial Chamber said the ‘social alarm’ component of the gravity test was particularly relevant, ‘due to the social alarm in the international community caused by the extent of the practice of enlisting into armed groups, conscripting into armed groups and using to participate actively in hostilities children under the age of fifteen’.¹⁸⁶ In support of this affirmation, the Pre-Trial Chamber cited a United Nations report, and two of the indictments at the Special Court for Sierra Leone charging enlistment of child soldiers.¹⁸⁷

Pre-Trial Chamber I said that the gravity threshold was intended to ensure that the Court pursued cases only against ‘the most senior leaders’ in any given situation under investigation.¹⁸⁸ It said that this factor was comprised of three elements. The first is the position played by the accused person. The second is the role played by that person, ‘when the State entities, organizations or armed groups to which they belong commit systematic or large-scale crimes’. The third is the role played by such State entities, organizations or armed groups in the overall commission of crimes. According to the Chamber, because of the position such individuals play they are also ‘the ones who can most effectively prevent or stop the commission of those crimes’.¹⁸⁹ The Chamber explained that the gravity threshold was ‘a key tool provided by the drafters to maximize the Court’s deterrent effect. As a result, the Chamber must conclude that any retributory effect of the activities of the Court must be subordinate to the higher purpose of prevention’.¹⁹⁰

The Pre-Trial Chamber further justified its emphasis on senior leaders with reference to current practice at the ad hoc United Nations international criminal tribunals. It noted Security Council Resolution 1534, which mandates the ‘completion strategy’ of the ad hoc tribunals. The Resolution calls for them to ‘concentrate on the most senior leaders suspected of being responsible’. Reference was also made to Rule 28(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY, which authorises the Bureau to block the approval of indictments that do not meet the ‘senior leaders’ standard, and to Rule 11 bis, which establishes ‘the gravity of the crimes charged and the level of responsibility of the accused’ as the standard to be imposed in transferring cases from the international to the national courts.¹⁹¹ Rulings by the ad hoc tribunals pursuant to Rule 11*bis* may provide useful guidance to the ICC in applying the concept of gravity to admissibility decisions.¹⁹² The Pre-Trial Chamber compared the ad hoc tribunals, with their limited jurisdiction over one crisis situation, to the ICC, with its broad personal, temporal and territorial jurisdiction. ‘In the Chamber’s view, it is in this context that one realises the key role of the additional gravity threshold set out in article 17(1)(d) of the ¹⁸⁶ Ibid.; also paras 65–66.

¹⁸⁵ Ibid., para. 46.

¹⁸⁷ But see Human Security Centre, Human Security Report 2005: War and Peace in the 21st Century (OUP 2005) 113–116. The Report calls Sub-Saharan Africa the epicentre of the phenomenon of child soldiers, although it also says that ‘the number of armed conflicts has been declining for more than a decade. And when wars end, soldiers—including child soldiers—are usually demobilised. So it is more likely that the number of child soldiers serving around the world has declined rather than increased in recent years’.

¹⁸⁸ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor’s Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 50.

¹⁸⁹ Ibid., paras 51–53.

¹⁹⁰ Ibid., para. 48.

¹⁹¹ Ibid., paras 55–58.

¹⁹² See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Ademi et al., IT-04-78-PT, Decision for Referral to the Authorities of the Republic of Croatia Pursuant to Rule 11*bis*, Referral Bench, 14 September 2005, <<https://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/908808/>> accessed 7 March 2015, para. 28; Prosecutor v. Stankovic, IT-96-23/2-PT, Decision on Referral of Case Under Rule 11*bis*, Referral Bench, 17 May 2005, para. 19; Prosecutor v. Janković, IT-96-23/2-PT, Decision on Referral of Case Under Rule 11*bis*, Referral Bench, 22 July 2005, para. 19.

Statute in ensuring the effectiveness of the Court in carrying out its deterrent function and maximising the deterrent effect of its activities', the Pre-Trial Chamber concluded.¹⁹³

Pre-Trial Chamber I also referred approvingly to the Prosecution's Policy Paper, issued in September 2003, which stated:

'The global character of the ICC, its statutory provisions and logistical constraints support a preliminary recommendation that, as a general rule, the Office of the Prosecutor should focus its investigative and prosecutorial resources on those who bear the greatest responsibility, such as the leaders of the State or organisation allegedly responsible for those crimes.'¹⁹⁴

But the judges also noted that because the gravity threshold was comprised within article 17, it was not an issue to be left to the discretion of the Prosecutor.¹⁹⁵

When applying these criteria to the case sub judice, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that the Lubanga case met this test, while the case brought against his co-perpetrator, Bosco Ntaganda, failed to meet an essential requirement, namely Ntaganda was not among the most senior leaders. Pre-Trial Chamber I found that he was the third in the chain of command of the military wing of the Union des Patriotes Congolais/Forces Patriotiques pour la libération du Congo (UPC/FPLC) movement.¹⁹⁶ In particular, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not believe that during the relevant period, Ntaganda was a key actor in the decision-making process of the UPC/FPLC's policies/practices or had de jure or de facto power to change them or prevent their implementation.¹⁹⁷ Accordingly, the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the Prosecutor's request to issue a warrant of arrest against Ntaganda. Despite its developed explanation referred to above, Pre-Trial Chamber I's decision failed to stand on appeal. In its judgment of 13 July 2006, the Appeals Chamber expressed disagreement with the Pre-Trial Chamber's line of reasoning¹⁹⁸ and in particular, the limitation it imposed on the Court's jurisdiction when it required that the Prosecutor focus only on the most senior leaders. According to the Appeals Chamber, the 'test developed by the Pre-Trial Chamber [was] based on a flawed interpretation of article 17(1)(d) of the Statute¹⁹⁹ [...] and] the imposition of rigid standards primarily based on top seniority may result in neither retribution nor prevention being achieved'.²⁰⁰ The Appeals Chamber proceeded by saying that the Pre-Trial Chamber's pronouncement that 'any perpetrators other than those at the very top [we]re automatically excluded from the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court',²⁰¹ 'could severely hamper the preventive, or deterrent, role of the Court which is the cornerstone of the creation of the [ICC]'.²⁰² The Appeals Chamber considered that making an assessment of the particular role of the suspect varies 'considerably depending on the circumstances of the case' and thus such an assessment should not be carried out 'excessively on formalistic grounds'.²⁰³

¹⁹³ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 60.

¹⁹⁴ Ibid., para. 61, citing Paper on Some Policy Issues Before the Office of the Prosecutor (2003) 7.

¹⁹⁵ Ibid., para. 62. The debate has evolved somewhat differently at the Special Court for Sierra Leone, although this can easily be explained by the applicable legal provisions: Prosecutor v. Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, Judgment, Trial Chamber, 20 June 2007, para. 653.

¹⁹⁶ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 10 February 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/73acb4/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras 86-9.

¹⁹⁷ Ibid., para. 87.

¹⁹⁸ Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-169, Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58', Appeals Chamber, 13 July 2006, paras 68-82.

¹⁹⁹ Ibid., para. 73.

²⁰⁰ Ibid., para. 74.

²⁰¹ Ibid., para. 75.

²⁰² Ibid.

²⁰³ Ibid., para. 76.

57 The Appeals Chamber's finding is not beyond criticism either. Although it rejected the test established by the Pre-Trial Chamber,²⁰⁴ it failed to provide an alternative one, thus, leaving it for the different Chambers to decide. Further, one fails to understand why excluding low-level perpetrators may work against retribution, prevention and deterrence. Cases involving low-level perpetrators may equally be dealt with effectively at the national level be it before the courts of the territorial State or any other State on the basis of universality. The ICC was never meant to deal with all cases in the world involving the commission of crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. To the contrary, it was meant only to address a limited number of cases and particularly those which are of certain degree of seriousness. The seriousness of a particular case certainly involves the role and the position played by the suspect in relation to the commission of the crimes, because based on that position and role the suspect enjoys the power to direct or orchestrate when, how and whether a crime will be committed. This is unlikely to be the case with low-level perpetrators who are not in a position to do so. It may be argued that investigations of low-level perpetrators are warranted because they could lead to the person who is at the top of the hierarchy. However, this is not sufficient per se to justify dealing with 'peripheral cases', which the ILC's working group aimed at preventing by introducing the element of gravity. Certainly the assessment of the level and role of a particular suspect is relative and depends on the facts of each particular case. However, it should be noted that the decision to focus on a low-level perpetrator also falls within the prosecutorial strategy. As such, the assessment should be carried out carefully before seizing the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber. It is for the Prosecutor to conduct a thorough investigation until her office manages to reach the appropriate stage where the necessary evidence regarding those at the top of the hierarchy becomes available. Instead of charging low level perpetrators, the Prosecutor may rely on their testimonies as witnesses. By doing so, a similar goal which aims at reaching those who are at the top of the hierarchy could be achieved. Otherwise, and if one follows the Appeals Chamber's logic on this particular point, the additional gravity threshold under the Rome Statute becomes futile.

58 Similar to the assessment of complementarity, a gravity determination varies depending on the stage of proceedings before the Court. At the preliminary stages of the proceedings (article 53(1)(b)) the gravity assessment is also carried out against the backdrop of a potential case that would arise from investigating a particular situation. In the 31 March 2010 Decision, Pre-Trial Chamber II defined the parameters of a potential case to include: '(i) the groups of persons involved that are likely to be the object of an investigation [...]; and (ii) the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court allegedly committed during the incidents that are likely to be the focus of an investigation [...]'.²⁰⁵ The Chamber proceeded by clarifying that the first element involves an examination of whether 'such groups of persons capture those who may bear the greatest responsibility for the alleged crimes committed'.²⁰⁶

²⁰⁴ This does not suggest that all the findings of the Appeals Chamber were incorrect. Rather, the Appeals Chamber's reasoning on this particular element was not that convincing.

²⁰⁵ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 59; Situation in Côte D'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 204.

²⁰⁶ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 60; Situation in Côte D'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 204. Thus, realizing that the Appeals Chamber's approach in the 13 July 2006 Judgment could be misleading and might result in an abuse of application in future cases in the sense of mainly focusing on less serious situations involving low-level perpetrators, Pre-Trial Chambers II and III re-introduced the idea of concentrating on those who are at the top of the echelon.

With respect to the second element, the Chamber considered that a quantitative assessment of gravity is not sufficient.²⁰⁷ Sometimes the commission of crimes is accompanied by some aggravating or qualitative factors which make them specifically grave.²⁰⁸ For instance, United Kingdom troops were present in Iraq as a result of an act of aggression. The act was committed in violation of the prohibition on the use of force, arguably the most sacred principle of the contemporary legal order. The ICC cannot yet exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression.²⁰⁹ But aggression is nevertheless described in the Rome Statute as a 'grave crime' that 'threaten[s] the peace, security and well-being of the world',²¹⁰ and one of 'the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole'.²¹¹ Logically, there is an additional dimension of gravity when war crimes are committed by troops as a result of an act of aggression. Although much fewer in number,²¹² perhaps the crimes of the United Kingdom troops should be judged as being inherently more serious than those of rebel groups trying to overthrow an authoritarian regime, such as the Government of Uganda, which has itself been condemned by the International Court of Justice for serious violations of international human rights and humanitarian law.²¹³ It follows that assessing the gravity of the crimes whether in the context of a situation (potential case) or a concrete case involves a quantitative as well as qualitative dimension.²¹⁴ What differs is the level of rigor in conducting such assessment which will depend on the stage of the proceedings. In reaching conclusions regarding the qualitative and quantitative dimensions, one may consider the factors referred to in rule 145(1)(c) and (2)(b)(iv) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence regarding sentencing. Both Pre-Trial Chambers and the Prosecutor have unified their approach towards the assessment of gravity and have accepted these factors for carrying out such assessment.

Indeed, in the Kenya situation, Pre-Trial Chamber II concluded that the following factors 'could provide useful guidance' in ruling on gravity:

- (i) the scale of the alleged crimes (including assessment of geographical and temporal intensity);
- (ii) the nature of the unlawful behaviour or of the crimes allegedly committed; (iii) the employed means for the execution of the crimes (i. e., the manner of their commission); and (iv) the impact of the crimes and the harm caused to victims and their families.²¹⁵

²⁰⁷ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 62; Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 203.

²⁰⁸ Ibid.; also Schabas, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (2009) 229, 245–246.

²⁰⁹ Rome Statute, article 15*bis* (2) and (3).

²¹⁰ Ibid., Preamble para. 3.

²¹¹ Ibid., Preamble para. 4.

²¹² It must be noted that the Prosecutor indicated that the crimes of British troops in Iraq appeared to be dealt with adequately by the country's own justice system. Thus, the Iraq investigation would ultimately have stumbled on the complementarity threshold. Clearly, however, the Prosecutor's decision not to proceed against British troops in Iraq was predicated on 'gravity', viewed in a purely quantitative manner, and not on an alleged failure of the United Kingdom to investigate and prosecute the allegations. See also: Report on the Activities of the Court, No. ICC-ASP/5/15, <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/library/asp/ICC-ASP-5-15_English.pdf> accessed 7 March 2015, para. 58.

²¹³ Case Concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, (2005) ICJ Rep. 168.

²¹⁴ Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 8 February 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/cb3614/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 31.

²¹⁵ Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II, 31 March 2010 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/338a6f/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 62.

Similarly, Pre-Trial Chamber I relied on the same factors for assessing gravity in the Côte D'Ivoire situation,²¹⁶ and the Prosecutor has equally followed this path in conducting such an assessment. This is best exemplified in the most recent examination of gravity in the context of the flotilla incident.²¹⁷ In reflecting on the scale of the crimes and number of victims, the Prosecutor considered that the killing of a total of ten passengers out of five-hundred and the injury of fifty to fifty-five passengers was not sufficient to meet the gravity test.²¹⁸ The Prosecutor also did not deem the 'mistreatment and harassment of passengers' by the Israeli Defence Forces as sufficient to satisfy the factor of 'nature' of commission, given that the Israeli Defence Forces' behaviour did not amount to 'torture or inhuman treatment'.²¹⁹ Nor did she consider that the impact of these crimes and the manner of their commission rose to the required level.²²⁰ Having examined these factors, the Prosecutor found that the 'potential case(s) that could be pursued as a result of an investigation into this situation [was] limited to an event encompassing a limited number of victims [...] with limited countervailing qualitative considerations'.²²¹ Accordingly, the 'flotilla incident d[id] not fall within the intended and envisioned scope of the Court's mandate',²²² the Prosecutor concluded.

- 60 The flotilla incident represents the most recent practice before the Court which reveals the core nature of the gravity assessment. This examination can never be purely objective. A high level of subjectivity will always be involved. An application of any of the factors referred to above will be always relative. What the Prosecutor has deemed insufficient to satisfy the factors underlying the gravity test in the flotilla incident may be satisfactory for another organ of the Court empowered to carry out the same examination.²²³ It follows that when it comes to the assessment of gravity, there is no hard rule to follow, particularly if, for instance, the situation/case does not involve an uncontested number of victims, such as hundreds of victims. This renders an examination of gravity more difficult to control than that of complementarity.

II. Paragraph 2

- 61 It is clear from a textual interpretation that the list set out in article 17(2) is exhaustive, and thus, should not be extended beyond what is provided in the text of sub-paragraphs (a)-(c). The chapeau of article 17(2) stipulates that for the purpose of determining 'unwillingness' in a certain case, the 'Court shall consider, whether one or more of the following exist, as applicable'. Some scholars argued that the scenarios referred to under article 17(2) are merely illustrative.²²⁴ This view stands to be corrected. Reading the phrase 'shall consider'

²¹⁶ Situation in Côte D'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Pre-Trial Chamber III, 15 November 2011 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/e0c0eb/>> accessed 6 March 2015, para. 204.

²¹⁷ Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia: Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014; see also Regulation 29(2) of the Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor.

²¹⁸ Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia: Article 53(1) Report, 6 November 2014, para. 138.

²¹⁹ Ibid., para. 139.

²²⁰ Ibid., paras 140-141.

²²¹ Ibid., para. 144.

²²² Ibid., para. 142.

²²³ Situation on Registered Vessels of Comoros, Greece and Cambodia, ICC-01/13-34, Decision on the request of the Union of the Comoros to review the Prosecutor's decision not to initiate an investigation, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 16 July 2015 <<http://www.legaltools.org/doc/2f876c/>> accessed 9 September 2015; see also, Partly dissenting opinion of Judge Péter Kovács, ICC-01/13-34-Anx-Corr, <<http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/c854cf/>> accessed 9 September 2015, paras 14-29, (where the dissenting judge introduced for the first time in the jurisprudence of the Court, the idea of comparative gravity).

²²⁴ Hall, C.K., Suggestions Concerning International Criminal Court Prosecutorial Policy and Strategy and External Relations, 28 March 2003, <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/library/organs/otp/hall.pdf> accessed 7 March 2015, at 16; Robinson (2003) 14 EJIL 481 500.

together with the last phrase ‘whether one or more of the following exist’ suggests that the list is exhaustive rather than ‘illustrative’. Had the drafters intended such an interpretation they could have used the formulations ‘such as’, ‘for example’ or ‘including but not limited to’ which appear under some other provisions of the Statute.²²⁵ Moreover, article 17 is drafted in the negative form indicating a preference to genuine national proceedings. ‘Unwillingness’ is an exception to this rule, and accordingly, the provision should not be broadly construed by treating the list under paragraph (2) as illustrative rather than exhaustive.

The language of the three sub-paragraphs uses the word ‘proceedings’ which demonstrates that testing the willingness of a State comes into play only if at least investigative actions are underway and there is a need to test the quality of these proceedings as mentioned earlier. The quality of national proceedings may be detected by three alternative, yet related tests. The first test aims at determining whether the national proceedings are aimed at ‘shielding the person from criminal responsibility’, while the second and third mainly rely on the duration of the proceedings and/or whether they were carried out independently or impartially. The first test encompasses an element of subjectivity when it comes to the assessment of the quality of proceedings in view of States’ actual intentions.²²⁶ As argued by one commentator, in order to prove that the respective State was ‘shielding the person from criminal responsibility’, the Prosecutor should prove a ‘devious intent on the part of the State, contrary to its apparent actions’.²²⁷ Arguably this is not the case in relation to the second and third criteria given that they lean more towards objectivity of assessment. Inserting key elements such as ‘unjustified delay’ in sub-paragraph 2(b) and the lack of ‘independence or impartiality’ in sub-paragraph (c) certainly enhances objectivity of assessment and reduces the element of subjectivity²²⁸ – a result which the drafters aimed to achieve.

The Court’s assessment regarding sub-paragraphs (a)-(c) should be carried out having regard to principles of ‘due process recognized by international law’.²²⁹ As noted in the procedural history, this phrase was supposed to serve sub-paragraph (c), and it was finally agreed in Rome, after entering bilateral negotiations, that the term serves the entire paragraph on unwillingness. The insertion of this phrase cannot be superfluous. Apparently it requires that the Court’s assessment of the quality of justice, as mirrored in sub-paragraph 2(a)-(c) takes into consideration both procedural and substantive rights (covering the entirety of the domestic process) embodied in human rights instruments and developed in the jurisprudence of regional and international judicial bodies. This reading is also in line with article 21(3), which requires that the ‘application and interpretation’ of the Statute ‘must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights’. The latter requirement has been endorsed in the jurisprudence of the Court.²³⁰ Although due process of law may include the ²²⁵ Rome Statute, articles 90 (6) and 97 (chapeau). See also the chapeau of article 53(1) which stipulates that ‘[i]n deciding whether to initiate an investigation, the Prosecutor shall consider whether [(a)...(c)]’. The list of the three conditions which flow from the chapeau of article 53(1) has always been considered as exhaustive and nowhere in the practice of the Court is there a slightest indication that the usage of the phrase ‘the Prosecutor shall consider whether’ refers to an illustrative list.

²²⁶ In the same vein, Ambos, The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court: An Inductive, Situation-based Approach (Springer 2010) 66–67.

²²⁷ Arbour et al. in: von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court (T.M.C. Asser Press. 1999) 131.

²²⁸ See also rule 51 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence which makes clear that ‘[i]n considering the matters referred to in article 17, paragraph 2, and in the context of the circumstances of the case, the Court may consider, inter alia, information that the State referred to in article 17, paragraph 1, may choose to bring to the attention of the Court showing that its courts meet internationally recognized norms and standards for the independent and impartial prosecution of similar conduct, or that the State has confirmed in writing to the Prosecutor that the case is being investigated or prosecuted’. This does not deny the fact that even in applying international standards to determine the quality of domestic proceedings a subjective element will quite often be involved given that the assessment will vary from one case to another depending on the particular circumstances of each case.

²²⁹ Rome Statute, article 17(2).

²³⁰ Prosecutor v. Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19(2) (a) of the rights of the accused,²³¹ a violation of the person's rights should not in and of itself be the decisive factor in an admissibility determination. Article 17 rests on a core idea, namely the existence or absence of genuine national proceedings. This is the determinative factor in ruling on admissibility. Due process becomes applicable only insofar as it is relevant to the interpretation of sub-paragraphs (a)-(c). This interpretation finds support in the 11 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision.²³² The Defence invoked a number of alleged human rights violations, which included, inter alia, the lack of access to a lawyer, illegal rendition, lack of independence of the national judge and allegations of torture. Having considered these allegations the Chamber correctly concluded that the 'assessment of Libya's [...] willingness to carry out its proceedings against Mr Al-Senussi [...] is limited to those considerations that have the potential to bear upon any of the scenarios envisaged under article 17(2)'.²³³ On appeal, the Appeals Chamber endorsed the stated principle, but it apparently went beyond it when it stated:

'Taking into account the text, context and object and purpose of the provision, this determination is not one that involves an assessment of whether the due process rights of a suspect have been breached per se. In particular, the concept of proceedings "being conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice" should generally be understood as referring to proceedings which will lead to a suspect evading justice, in the sense of not appropriately being tried genuinely to establish his or her criminal responsibility, in the equivalent of sham proceedings that are concerned with that person's protection. However, there may be circumstances, depending on the facts of the individual case, whereby violations of the rights of the suspect are so egregious that the proceedings can no longer be regarded as being capable of providing any genuine form of justice to the suspect so that they should be deemed, in those circumstances, to be "inconsistent with an intent to bring the person to justice"'.²³⁴

- 64 Thus, although the Appeal Chamber upheld the Pre-Trial Chamber's principled interpretation, it went further and apparently accepted that the Court may render a finding of admissibility in case of 'egregious' human rights violations against the suspect and read an additional element in sub-paragraph (c) (respect of the suspect's human rights). Although gross human rights violations or procedural irregularities may taint any judicial process, unfortunately article 17 was not per se designed to operate as a remedy for such irregularities in the sense of other provisions such as articles 59 and 67. Rather the provision was drafted to resolve the positive conflict of jurisdiction between the two tier fora. Surprisingly, the Appeals Chamber seemed to understand this point somehow elsewhere in the judgment, when it clarified that the 'Court was not established to be an international court of human rights [...]. [I]f the interpretation of the Defence were adopted, [...] [a]case could be admissible merely because domestic proceedings do not fully respect the due process rights

Statute of 3 October 2006, Appeals Chamber, 14 December 2006 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/1505f7/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras 36–39; Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1119, Decision on Victims' Participation, Trial Chamber I, 18 January 2008 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/4e503b/>> accessed 6 March 2015, paras 34–35. Also on article 21 and the extensive jurisprudence related thereto, see Bitti, in: Stahn and Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 281; id., in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (OUP, forthcoming 2015).

²³¹ Baena-Ricardo et al. (270 Workers v. Panama), Judgment of February 2, 2001, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 72 (2001), para. 137 (where the Court defined the term 'due process' as consisting of 'the right of all persons to a hearing, with due guarantees and within a reasonable time, by a competent, independent, and impartial judge or tribunal, previously established by law, in the substantiation of any accusation of a criminal nature made against him or her or for the determination of her or his rights').

²³² Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 235.

²³³ Ibid., para. 243.

²³⁴ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 Entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Appeals Chamber, 24 July 2014 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/ef20c7/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 2–3 and 230.

of a suspect'.²³⁵ It is apparent from reading the entire judgment that the Appeals Chamber was struggling to find the right balance, which is certainly not easy to draw.²³⁶ Be that as it may, the Appeals Chamber apparently went beyond the plain meaning and intended purpose of article 17(2), namely to prevent a State from hiding a suspect or an accused from criminal responsibility on the basis of one or more of the scenarios set out in subparagraph (a)-(c), as will be discussed in more detail below. It seemingly did this in order to reconcile articles 17 and 21(3) of the Statute. Yet, it did so in a rather confusing way. In one instance the Appeals Chamber correctly acknowledged that due process rights are not the determinative factor in deciding on the inadmissibility of a case, while in the last sentence of paragraph 230 quoted above, the Appeals Chamber seems to have left room for the contrary. By doing so, the Appeals Chamber opened the door for the ICC to sit as a purely human rights court and provided it with a mandate that was not entrusted to it by the drafters of the Statute.

1. 'shielding the person'

At the outset one should know that drawing an exhaustive list of all scenarios which reflect a State's intention to 'shield a person from criminal responsibility' is not possible. This depends to a great extent on the factual circumstances of each particular case. It is possible, however, to provide some guidelines on the basis of an analysis of the practice of other international judicial bodies. This could be a useful guidance to the Court in making its determination and as stated above in line with article 21(3) which requires that the 'application and interpretation of law [...] be consistent with internationally recognized human rights'.²³⁷

Article 17(2)(a) is a test for discerning the bad faith of a State by way of checking the effectiveness of national proceedings. Thus any intentional deficiency or serious negligence in conducting national proceedings that lead to negative results, through certain acts or omissions, might reflect a State's intention to 'shield [the] person from criminal responsibility'. It follows that the more thorough and serious the domestic investigation is, the more difficult it will be to find proof of an 'intent to shield' and vice versa. In this regard, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) implicitly endorsed this line of reasoning in a number of cases related to a violation of the right to life and the prohibition of torture. The ECtHR made it clear that a criminal investigation must be serious and effective. For an investigation to be considered effective certain conditions have to be met. Failing to meet these conditions without adequate justification creates a presumption that the State is shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility.

In Nachova, the ECtHR Grand Chamber provided the following elements for ruling that national criminal proceedings were effective: 1) The national authorities must take all reasonable steps available to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including eyewitness testimony and forensic evidence; 2) The conclusions of the investigation must be based on thorough, objective and impartial analysis of all the relevant elements; and 3) any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the circumstances of the case or the person responsible is liable to fall foul of the required measure of effectiveness.²³⁸ When the ECtHR applied these elements to the facts and circumstances of the case it concluded that: 1) The investigating authorities disregarded some relevant facts including highly technical ones; 2) There was a lack of strict examination of all the material circumstances; and 3) the national authorities conducted the investigation in an excessively

²³⁵ Ibid., para. 219.

²³⁶ Ibid., paras 219, 230 and fn. 449 (where it is clear that the Appeals Chamber was trying to attain a balance).

²³⁷ See generally Bitti, in: Stahn (ed.), The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court (forthcoming 2015).

²³⁸ Nachova and others v. Bulgaria, Applications Nos. 43577/98 and 43579/98, ECtHR, Judgment of 6 July 2005, para. 113.

narrow legal framework, ignoring indispensable and obvious investigative steps.²³⁹ In view of its examination, the ECtHR concluded that the ‘authorities ignored those significant facts and, without seeking any proper explanation, merely [...] terminated the investigation. The investigator and the Prosecutors thus shielded Major G. from prosecution’ (emphasis added).²⁴⁰ This suggests that the failure of a State to meet these conditions set out by the ECtHR renders national proceedings ineffective. Said deficiencies in the proceedings if accompanied by a lack of ‘proper explanation’ by the State, indicate that the State is acting in bad faith for the purpose of shielding the person concerned. Similarly, in Timurtas, the ECtHR relied on similar conditions to test the quality of national proceedings including the State’s failure to provide convincing explanations. Yet, instead of using the phrase ‘shielding from prosecution’, it said that the national investigations ‘had been perfunctory and superficial’.²⁴¹ Additional factors which reveal the ineffectiveness of national proceedings may also be found in other decisions of the ECtHR. In Kuznetsov, the Court considered that the lack of ‘any contemporaneous records which could demonstrate step by step the nature of the investigation carried out into the allegations’ is a factor which reveals the State’s bad faith in carrying out a serious investigation.²⁴² Moreover, in Tepe, the failure to involve a ‘forensic specialist’ in cases that involved unnatural death and the decision of the prosecutor to refrain from carrying out a ‘full medico-legal autopsy’, which would have provided valuable information, were considered ‘striking omission[s]’,²⁴³ which contributed, inter alia, to the view that the investigation was ineffective, and by implication the State intended to carry out improper proceedings.

- 66 The Inter-American Court on Human Rights (IACtHR) adopted similar standards in testing the quality of domestic investigations and the intention of the relevant State vis-à-vis said proceedings. In Velasquez-Rodriguez, the IACtHR stated that investigations must be carried out in a ‘serious manner and not as mere formality preordained to be ineffective’. These investigations must have an ‘objective and be assumed by the State as its own legal duty’ aiming at an ‘effective search for the truth’ by the government.²⁴⁴ Accordingly, the State must ‘use the means at its disposal [...] to identify those responsible, [and] to impose the appropriate punishment’.²⁴⁵ When the IACtHR applied these standards, it concluded that domestic proceedings were ineffective, in violation of article 1(1) of the Convention.²⁴⁶ Despite the fact that the IACtHR did not explicitly pronounce that the deficiency in conducting effective investigations resulted from the State’s bad faith to ‘shield’ the person from prosecution, this conclusion may be deduced from the Court’s overall reasoning. Differently, in Mack, after identifying further deficiencies in the national proceedings such as ‘altering or hiding’ the report of the police investigations by substituting the original with another, under orders from a State’s authority, and the manipulation of evidence by the ²³⁹ Ibid., paras 114–117.

²⁴⁰ Ibid., para. 116.

²⁴¹ Timurtas v. Turkey, Application 23531/94, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 13 June 2000, paras 88 and 110.

²⁴² Kuznetsov v. Ukraine, Application No. 39042/97, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 29 April 2003, para. 106.

²⁴³ Tepe v. Turkey, Application No. 27244/95, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 9 May 2003, paras 181–182.

²⁴⁴ Velasquez Rodriguez v. Honduras, Judgment of 29 July 1988, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 4 (1988), para. 177; Villagran Morales et al. v. Guatemala (The ‘Street Children’ Case), Judgment of 19 November 1999, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 63 (1999), para. 226.

²⁴⁵ Ibid., para. 211.

²⁴⁶ These reasons may be summarized as follows: 1) Failure of the organs of Executive Branch to carry out a serious investigation, as there was no investigation of public allegations of a series of disappearances; 2) The investigation carried out in accordance with the Commission’s decision was done by the armed forces, the body accused of being involved in the practice; 3) No proceedings were initiated under national law to establish the responsibility of the perpetrators and punish them; and 4) Ignoring the Commission’s request for information; this was interpreted by the Commission as evidence for the accuracy of the allegations against the State. Ibid., paras 179–180.

Ministry of National Defence, the IACtHR concluded that these acts in view of the circumstances of the case 'demonstrate[d] that there was an attempt to cover-up those responsible[...] and this constitute[d] an obstruction of justice and an inducement for those responsible of the facts to remain in situation of impunity'.²⁴⁷

Although these scenarios are by no means exhaustive, they may serve as guidelines for the Court.

2. Unjustified delay

A State will be determined by the Court to be unwilling where there has been an unjustified (unjustifiable) delay in the proceedings which in the circumstances is seen to be inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice. The coordinator of the negotiations at the Rome Conference was of the view that this subparagraph was added to offset the onus of proof that will be on the Prosecutor to establish bad faith in paragraph 2(a). Again, as in subparagraph (a) above, what is being determined is the good faith of the involved State. If it were determined, for instance, that the duration of the proceedings was lengthy, this would not be sufficient per se to render the case admissible before the Court. There is an additional common element which must accompany these findings namely, that the delay was according to the particular circumstances of the case 'inconsistent with an intent to bring the person to justice'.²⁴⁸ This requirement suggests that the drafters intended to set the bar higher before making any negative finding against the will of the relevant State to carry out its proceedings. Also, there is an apparent overlap between this element and the requirement of shielding the person from criminal responsibility. A delay in conducting national proceedings in such a manner which reveals intent not to bring the person to justice is actually a form of shielding that person from criminal responsibility. Certainly any such finding pursuant to article 17(2) cannot be reached in the abstract. Rather the Court must look into the investigative actions carried out by the State in order to assess whether there was an element of bad faith or the State conducted genuine proceedings. Pre-Trial Chamber I has recently addressed this criterion in the 13 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision. However, the Chamber failed to provide proper legal analysis as to the intended scope of this provision, the meaning of terms such as 'unjustified delay' or 'inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice', and the interplay between this sub-paragraph and subparagraph (a). Instead, the Pre-Trial Chamber made a purely factual and subjective analysis without setting out the parameters of the law being guided by the ample jurisprudence developed by international human rights bodies and other international criminal tribunals regarding the ways of assessing delays in criminal proceedings. In making its determination on the length of the proceedings against Al-Senussi, the Chamber correctly considered the dates on which the case moved from one stage to the other, the dates of witnesses' interviews, and the wide scope of factual allegations brought against the suspect. In view of these circumstances, the Chamber concluded that 'a period of less than 18 months between the commencement of the investigation [...] and the referral of the case [...] to the accusation Chamber cannot be considered to constitute an unjustified delay inconsistent with an intent to bring [the suspect] to justice'.²⁴⁹ Although the Chamber's conclusion may be factually justified, the overall assessment remains subjective and quite arbitrary, given that it has not been conducted against a well-defined legal standard as is the case with other human rights bodies or other international criminal tribunals. This does not mean that the ICC must automatically transfer the exact standard. Rather it means that the ICC should have developed its own standard being guided by the rich jurisprudence of these judicial bodies.

²⁴⁷ Myrna Mack Chang v. Guatemala, Judgment of 25 November 2003, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 101 (2003), paras. 166–173.

²⁴⁸ Rome Statute, article 17(2).

²⁴⁹ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 227–229.

68 Turning to the requirements of sub-paragraph (b), in order to make a finding on the basis of this provision, three questions have to be answered. First, whether there has been a delay in the proceedings; secondly, whether such a delay was ‘unjustified’; and, thirdly, whether such an ‘unjustified delay’ was, in the circumstances of the situation or case, accompanied by the intention not ‘to bring the person concerned to justice’. These elements are accordingly cumulative. The terms ‘unjustified’ and the ‘intent to bring the person to justice’ are key for the interpretation of this provision. The term ‘unjustified’ provides the State with the opportunity to explain the reason, if any, for the delay before the Court makes a determination on admissibility, rendering this test more objective.²⁵⁰ The intention not ‘to bring the person concerned to justice’ presumably obliges the Court to inquire into the circumstances of each situation or case separately, in order to determine whether, according to the facts of a given case, the intention was to avoid the accused facing justice. Thus, the underlying meaning of ‘unjustified delay’ under Article 17(2)(b) does not target or cover any sort of delay that has no link or connection with the idea of shielding an accused from facing justice; rather it directly affects the domestic proceedings leading to the punishment of the alleged perpetrators. In making an overall evaluation of compliance with article 17(2)(b), as stated earlier the Court is to be guided by ‘the principles of due process recognized by international law’. The Court ‘must’ also make sure that its conclusions are ‘consistent with internationally recognized human rights’. Neither the Statute nor the Rules or Regulations of the Court state what may constitute a delay within the meaning of Article 17(2)(b). Nor do they spell out what may constitute a ‘justified’ or ‘unjustified’ delay. Human rights instruments aim at guaranteeing a trial within a ‘reasonable time’²⁵¹ and without ‘undue delay’.²⁵² This ‘underlines the importance of rendering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility’.²⁵³ They are also designed to ensure that an accused does not have to ‘lie under a charge for too long’²⁵⁴ in a ‘state of uncertainty about his fate’.²⁵⁵ When reading the cases decided by the bodies monitoring the application of these instruments, one may observe that the protection underlying the right is not triggered until ‘an individual is subject to a ‘charge’’. When compared to the language mirrored in article 17(2)(b), it becomes apparent that the provision of the Statute is broader in reach and application. Under the Rome Statute, an investigation begins with a ‘situation’ as opposed to a ‘case’. This means that in the early phases of an investigation there are no concrete identifiable suspects for the ²⁵⁰ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 54; see also ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, No. ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, part II.A (2002), Rule 51. It should be noted, however, that article 14(3) (c) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), adopted 16 December 1966, entered into force 23 March 1976, 999 UNTS 171, talks of ‘undue delay’; yet, the Human Rights Committee (HRC) still requires the State to provide it with explanation of any sort of unwarranted delay. See, inter alia, Sahadeo v. Guyana, HRC, Communication No. 728/1996, UN Doc.CCPR/C/73/D/728/1996, 10 November 1996.

²⁵¹ European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECtHR), signed 4 November 1950, entered into force 3 September 1953, 213 UNTS 221, ETS. 5, articles 5(3) and 6(1); American Convention on Human Rights (Pact of San José) (ACHR), signed 22 November 1969, entered into force 18 July 1978, OASTS 36, O.A.S. Off. Rec. OEA/Ser.L/V/II.23, doc.21, rev. 6 (1979), articles 7(5) and 8(1). This term appears in article 5(3) as well as article 6(1). Although the periods may overlap, article 6(1) is broader in scope as it covers delays in the entire proceedings in relation to all parties. Thus, this section is confined to looking at issues relating to article 6(1). For the distinction between the protection of articles 5(3) and 6(1) see Matznetter v. Austria, Application No. 2178/64, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 10 November 1969, para. 12; Stogmuller v. Austria, Application No. 1602/62, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 10 November 1969, para. 5.

²⁵² ICCPR, articles 9(3) and 14(3) (c). While article 14(3) (c) speaks of trial ‘without undue delay’, article 9(3) mentions ‘trial within a reasonable time’.

²⁵³ H. v. France, Application No. 10073/82, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 24 October 1989, para. 58.

²⁵⁴ Wemhoff v. Germany, Application No. 2122/64, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 June 1968, para. 18.

²⁵⁵ Stogmuller v. Austria, Application No. 1602/62, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 10 November 1969, para. 5.

purpose of prosecution. It follows that the evaluation of the speed or delay resulting from the domestic process would begin during the situation phase, which is earlier than is required under the human rights instruments, namely to have an identified person who is 'subject to a charge', or arrest, or being officially notified that he will be prosecuted.²⁵⁶ Moreover, article 17(2)(b) is concerned with a broader pattern of events, in the sense that it is not designed to address delays that touch upon the rights of the accused stricto sensu, but rather to address delays relating to the entire criminal process within the general scheme of events; that is, a delay which directly impacts on the idea of bringing an accused to justice. This line of reasoning does not intend to argue that the standard designed by the human rights bodies developed below is not applicable by analogy to the ICC criminal process. Rather, it tends to show that the criterion of 'unjustified delay', in the context of the ICC, serves a broader goal, and thus, the Court should adjust the standard to the unique nature of the ICC judicial procedure. It also follows that there are phases in the criminal process that require assessment, which might have been outside the scope of the jurisprudence of these human rights bodies when they examined delays in national proceedings. Nonetheless, the standards applied by these bodies may still serve as guidelines for the ICC in assessing the entire criminal process. Assessing a delay in national proceedings cannot be carried out according to strict time limits. Finding a violation of the principle of reasonableness of time varies depending on the particularities of each case. In König, the ECtHR ruled that the 'reasonableness of the duration of proceedings covered by Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6–1) of the Convention [in civil as well as in criminal matters] must be assessed in each case according to its circumstances'.²⁵⁷ Similarly, in Ratiani, according to the Human Rights Committee (HRC) 'what constitutes "undue delay" depends on the circumstances of each case'.²⁵⁸ As the ICTR stated in one of its early decisions, this assessment cannot be 'translated into a fixed number of days, months or years'.²⁵⁹ Nevertheless, the assessment of the duration of a criminal process has always been carried out within certain confines and according to a set of criteria initially developed by the ECtHR and later followed by the IACtHR as well as the ad hoc tribunals. In the leading König case, the ECtHR developed three criteria on the basis of which an assessment of the duration of the criminal proceedings may take place. The Court referred to the following three criteria: 1) the complexity of the case; 2) the conduct of the applicant; and 3) the conduct of the judicial authorities.²⁶⁰ The Court continues to apply the same criteria.²⁶¹ In Lazariu, one of the most recent cases, the ECtHR reiterated 'that the ²⁵⁶ Eckle v. Germany, Application No. 8130/78, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 15 July 1982, para. 73; Wemhoff v. Germany, Application No. 2122/64, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 June 1968, para. 19. The IACtHR considers the starting point for examining national proceedings is the arrest of the accused. See Suarez – Rosero v. Ecuador, Judgment of 12 November 1997, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 35 (1997), para. 70. This is the period that begins in the application of article 6(1) proceedings. However, the period regarding article 5(3) of the Convention and its counterparts in the other human rights instruments begins on the day the accused is taken into custody or detention. See, inter alia, Labita v. Italy Application No. 26772/95, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 6 April 2000, paras 145 and 147.

²⁵⁷ König v. Germany, Application No. 6232/73, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 28 June 1978, para. 99; also, Palka v. Poland, Application No. 49176/99, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 11 October 2005, para. 28.

²⁵⁸ Ratiani v. Georgia, HRC, Communication No. 975/2001, UN Doc. CCPR/C/84/D/975/2001, 4 August 2005, para. 10.7.

²⁵⁹ Prosecutor v. Andre Rwamakuba, No. ICTR-98-44C-PT, Decision on Defence Motion for Stay of Proceedings, Article 20 of the Statute, Trial Chamber III, 3 June 2005, <<https://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/b76164/>> accessed 7 March 2015, para. 26.

²⁶⁰ König v. Germany, Application No. 6232/73, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 28 June 1978, para. 99.

²⁶¹ With the exception that the phrase 'judicial authorities' appearing in the third condition was replaced by the broader term 'relevant authorities' to cover acts or omissions attributed to any responsible organ of the State. Also in some decisions a related element was added – namely 'the importance of what is at stake for the applicant in litigation'. See, inter alia, Majewski v. Poland, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 11 October 2005, para. 38. But this element has no significant application in the context of this study, as it is confined to civil rights before administrative courts. On this point see Buchholz v. Germany, Application No. 7759/77, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 6 May 1981, para. 49.

reasonableness of the length of proceedings must be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case' and with reference to the same criteria spelled out above.²⁶²

69 The IACtHR also followed the same path. In Lacayo, the IACtHR recognizing the similarity between article 8(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights and article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights, accepted that the criteria developed by the ECtHR equally applied.²⁶³ In Mugiraneza, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTR also developed criteria inspired to a great extent by those of the ECtHR. The Appeals Chamber found it necessary to consider the following factors: '1) The length of the delay; 2) The complexity of the proceedings, such as the number of charges, the number of accused, the number of witnesses, the volume of evidence, the complexity of facts and law; 3) The conduct of the parties; 4) The conduct of the relevant authorities; and 5) The prejudice to the accused if any'.²⁶⁴ Complexity encompasses all aspects necessary for deciding a case such as those referred to in Mugiraneza. Also the ECtHR spoke of similar elements revealing the complexity of a case and which accordingly render the delay justified. These may include a large amount of documentary evidence,²⁶⁵ the number of suspects involved,²⁶⁶ the number of witnesses,²⁶⁷ the size and complexity of the acts committed²⁶⁸ or the nature of the charges,²⁶⁹ the possibility of reaching these witnesses.²⁷⁰ Quite often delays in criminal proceedings can be attributed to other factors apart from the unique nature of the case. Delays may be caused by a certain behavior on the part of the suspect,²⁷¹ or the relevant authorities. This latter element is the most relevant for making a finding under article 17(2)(b). This is so because the actions undertaken or disregarded by the relevant authorities investigating or prosecuting a particular situation/case reflect their intention in relation to bringing a person to justice. The jurisprudence of the ECtHR and the IACHR could be also useful in this regard.²⁷²

²⁶² Lazariu v. Romania, Application No. 31973/03, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 13 November 2014, para. 147. Notably, in this case the Court also referred to the element of 'what was at stake for the applicant in the dispute'.

²⁶³ Genie-Lacayo v. Nicaragua, Judgment of 29 January 1997, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 30 (1997), para. 77.

²⁶⁴ Prosecutor v. Prosper Mugiraneza, No. ICTR-99-50-AR73, Decision on Prosper Mugiraneza's Interlocutory Appeal from Trial Chamber II Decision of 2 October 2003 Denying the Motion to Dismiss the Indictment, Demand Speedy Trial and for Appropriate Relief, Appeals Chamber, 27 February 2004, <<https://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/87a7a4/>> accessed 7 March 2015.

²⁶⁵ Ferrantelli and Santangelo v. Italy (1), Application No. 19874/92, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 7 August 1996, para. 42 (where the Court, despite thinking the case complex when 'examined as a whole', reached the conclusion that the time requirement in article 6(1) had not been complied with because, 'and this is the decisive consideration, the applicants were not convicted with final effect until sixteen years after the events').

²⁶⁶ Hager v. Finland, Application No. 14724/02, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 17 January 2006, para. 29; Eckle v. Germany, Application No. 8130/78, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 15 July 1982, paras 81, 85–87 (where the Court found that in the circumstances of the case as a whole, the delay was excessive and unjustified, despite the large amount of evidentiary material); and in the context of the IACtHR, Genie-Lacayo v. Nicaragua, Judgment of 29 January 1997, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 30 (1997), paras 69 and 78 (noting that although the case was complex, due to 'very extensive' investigations and 'evidence copious' when weighed in light of the entire circumstances, a period of 5 years since the date when an order to initiate proceedings was issued was deemed lengthy and violated article 8(1) of the Convention).

²⁶⁷ Wemhoff v. Germany, Application No. 2122/64, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 June 1968, para. 20 (opinion of the Commission shared by the Court).

²⁶⁸ Neumeister v. Austria, Application No. 1936/63, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 27 June 1968, para. 20.

²⁶⁹ Calleja v. Malta, Application No. 75274/01, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 7 April 2005, para. 128.

²⁷⁰ Neumeister v. Austria, Application No. 1936/63, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 27 June 1968, para. 20; Wemhoff v. Germany, Application No. 2122/64, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 June 1968, para. 20 (opinion of the Commission shared by the Court).

²⁷¹ Rylski v. Poland, Application No. 24706/02, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 4 July 2006, para. 76; Corigliano v. Italy, Application No. 8304/78, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 10 December 1982, paras 40 and 42.

²⁷² Eckle v. Germany, Application No. 8130/78, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 15 July 1982, paras 27, 29–33, 74, 83–84; Pelissier and Sassi v. France, Application No. 25444/94, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 25 March 1999, paras 25–26 and 73; Philis v. Greece (no. 2) (1), Application No. 19773/92, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 27 June 1997, para. 40; Genie-Lacayo v. Nicaragua, Judgment

3. Lack of impartiality or independence

Should the ICC determine that the proceedings were not or are not being conducted independently or impartially and are in fact being conducted in a manner which in the circumstances is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person to justice, the case will be admissible. Originally, this was to be put under the heading of inability, in the sense that the State could not provide for impartial proceedings and procedural guarantees for the accused person. However, during negotiations in Rome it appeared that proceedings could be defective even if they are not a sham. This would be the case if, for example, the State was acting in good faith, but other persons acted to cause a mistrial or to taint the evidence.²⁷³

Just as in the case of article 17(2)(b), Pre-Trial Chamber I refrained in its 11 October 2013 Al-Senussi Decision from developing the legal standard in relation to the interpretation of article 17(2)(c) and engaged in a purely factual analysis. In making its findings on the issue of impartiality and independence, the Chamber, for instance, considered that statements issued by public officials and which might violate the suspect's presumption of innocence are not sufficient to taint the domestic process. What matters is whether these statements were made by members of the judicial authorities dealing with the case.²⁷⁴ The Chamber also considered the information presented by the Libyan government under rule 51 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence²⁷⁵ which showed that its courts met international human rights standards. This included information related to the conduct of judicial proceedings against the former Libyan prime minister in a different case and the acquittal of the former foreign minister.²⁷⁶ In light of this information and some other relevant information, the Chamber concluded that it was not persuaded that there was 'a systemic lack of independence and impartiality of the judiciary such that would demonstrate, alone or in combination with other relevant circumstances, that the proceedings against [the suspect]', were not conducted independently or impartially within the meaning of article 17(2)(c).²⁷⁷ Although this conclusion could be factually correct if applied against a well-developed legal standard, the Chamber refrained from doing so. It spoke of Libya meeting international human rights standards without showing what these international standards were, what is the meaning of independence or impartiality in the context of article 17(2) and how other international judicial bodies and regional human rights bodies have carried out this assessment. Thus, in making such a determination, the Court should have been guided by the ample jurisprudence of the regional human rights bodies and other international criminal tribunals in order to establish its own legal standard in resolving questions related to the quality of domestic investigations in terms of impartiality or independence.²⁷⁸ of 29 January 1997, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 30 (1997), para. 80; Cantos v. Argentina, Judgment of 28 November 2002, IACtHR (Ser. C) No. 97 (2002), para. 56.

²⁷³ Holmes, in: Lee (ed.), The Making of the Rome Statute (1999) 41, 51. The only problem here is that article 17 speaks of unwillingness of a State. So if there were persons who are not affiliated with the State who intended to taint evidence, it is quite difficult to conclude that the State was unwilling due to partial proceedings, especially that these irregularities were not caused by the State. Although this is a narrow interpretation, the plain reading of article 17 'unless the State is unwilling' may suggest so. The recent jurisprudence of the Court tends to go in this direction. See Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 241.

²⁷⁴ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, para. 241.

²⁷⁵ ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, No. ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, part IIA (2002), Rule 55(2).

²⁷⁶ Prosecutor v. Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Pre-Trial Chamber I, 11 October 2013 <<https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/af6104/>> accessed 5 March 2015, paras 253-255.

²⁷⁷ Ibid, paras 241-258.

²⁷⁸ El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (2008), 166-171, 175-203 (providing detailed examples based on the jurisprudence of the human rights bodies and international criminal tribunals on how to test these elements); Van der Wilt and Lyngdorf (2009) 9 ICLRev 39.

72 Article 14(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states that 'everyone shall be entitled' to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.²⁷⁹ Further, article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights,²⁸⁰ as well as Article 8(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights, employ similar language.²⁸¹ However, these provisions speak of an 'independent and impartial tribunal'. This language is quite different than that found in article 17(2)(c) which refers to national proceedings 'not being conducted independently or impartially'. It is possible to examine independence or impartiality of proceedings through the scope of independence and impartiality of a tribunal. National proceedings conducted by a tribunal which lacks independence or impartiality will certainly have a bearing or impact on the national process. To put it differently, a tribunal which falls short of prerequisites of independence and impartiality raises doubt about the independence or impartiality of the national proceedings conducted by this judicial body.²⁸² The notion of 'independence' refers to a body which is 'independent of the executive and also of the parties'.²⁸³ In Crociani et al., the ECtHR also spoke of independence from Parliament as being a feature of an independent tribunal.²⁸⁴ Also in Fell, the ECtHR referred to other aspects of independence when it required that a tribunal should pay 'regard to the manner of appointment of its members and the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and the question whether the body presents an appearance of independence'.²⁸⁵ These elements referred to in Fell have been developed in legal doctrine²⁸⁶ and in subsequent jurisprudence.²⁸⁷ On the other hand, impartiality 'denotes absence of prejudice or bias'.²⁸⁸ The IACtHR reached the conclusion that 'lack of necessary independence' has an effect on rendering 'impartial decisions'.²⁸⁹ This conclusion finds support in legal doctrine. According to one commentator, a judicial body lacking independence of the executive will not 'comply with the requirement of impartiality in cases to which the executive is a party'.²⁹⁰ In one of its early decisions, the ICTY Trial Chamber ruled that 'whether a court is independent and impartial depends [...] upon its constitution, its judges and the way in which they function'.²⁹¹ Same as in assessing delays in the criminal process, the ECtHR also developed criteria for testing independence and impartiality. In Piersack, the ECtHR elaborated a two tier test, one subjective and the other objective. In relation to the subjective test, it relied 'on the personal conviction of a given judge in a given case'.²⁹² In ²⁷⁹ ICCPR, article 14 (1).

²⁸⁰ ECtHR, article 6 (1).

²⁸¹ ACHR, article 8 (1).

²⁸² In Norman, the Appeals Chamber of the SCSL argued in similar terms when it stated: '[A]n objection that the Court lacks judicial independence is basically, and in substance, an objection to the fairness of the trial and an allegation that the right of the accused to a fair hearing is likely to be infringed by the trial'. Prosecutor v. Sam Hinga Norman, No. SCSL-2004-14-AR72 (E), Decision on Preliminary Motion Based on Lack of Jurisdiction (Judicial Independence), Appeals Chamber, 13 March 2004, para. 4.

²⁸³ Ringeisen v. Austria, Application No. 2614/65, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 16 July 1971, para. 95.

²⁸⁴ Crociani, Palmiotti, Tanassi, Lefebvre D'ovidio v. Italy, Application Nos. 8603/79; 8722/79; 8723/79, Eur. Comm. H.R., Decision of 18 December 1980 on the Admissibility of the Applications, at 212, 221.

²⁸⁵ Campbell and Fell v. The United Kingdom, Application No. 7819/77; 7878/77, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 28 June 1984, para. 78.

²⁸⁶ Harris, D. J. et al., Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (Butterworths 1995), 232.

²⁸⁷ See, inter alia, Barbera, Messegue and Jabardo v. Spain, Application No. 10590/83, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 6 December 1988, paras 53–59; Ocalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 12 March 2003, para. 119; Thomas Eccles and others v. Ireland, Application No. 12839/87, Eur. Comm. H.R., Decision of 9 December 1988 on the Admissibility of the Application; Sramek v. Austria, Application No. 8790/79, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits and Just Satisfaction) of 22 October 1984, para. 42.

²⁸⁸ Piersack v. Belgium, Application No. 8692/79, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 1 October 1982, para. 30.

²⁸⁹ Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency (Arts. 27(2), 25 and (8) American Convention on Human Rights), Advisory Opinion OC-9/87 of 6/10/1987, IACtHR (Series A) No. 9, para. 24.

²⁹⁰ Harris, D. J. et al., Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (1995) 234.

²⁹¹ Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić a/k/a 'Dule', No. IT-94-1-T, Decision on the Defence Motion on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 10 August 1995, para. 32.

²⁹² Piersack v. Belgium, Application No. 8692/79, ECtHR, Judgment (Merits) of 1 October 1982, para. 30.

Demicoli, the Court spoke of the ‘interest of a particular judge in a given case’.²⁹³ Also a judge was deemed partial if he/she ‘had displayed any hostility or ill-will’,²⁹⁴ had acted ‘with personal bias’,²⁹⁵ or made special arrangements to be assigned with a case based on personal reasons.²⁹⁶ Regarding the objective test, as stated in Marin, it aims at considering whether a judge ‘offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect’.²⁹⁷ The distinction in application between the subjective and objective tests was pointed out in Warsicka, where the ECtHR said in relation to the latter that ‘quite apart from the personal conduct of any of the members of that body, there are ascertainable facts which may raise doubts as to its impartiality’.²⁹⁸ Appearance is an important factor and the key factor is whether the lack of impartiality ‘can be held to be objectively justified’.²⁹⁹ The ECtHR has tackled different factual examples representing these elements in other jurisprudence.³⁰⁰ Applying either of the two tests depends on the particular circumstances of the case sub judice. As stated in Micallef,

‘there is no watertight division between subjective and objective impartiality since the conduct of a judge may not only prompt objectively held misgivings as to impartiality from the point of view of the external observer (objective test) but may also go to the issue of his or her personal conviction (subjective test).’³⁰¹

In the context of international criminal tribunals, it is worth referring to one of the first 73 notable judgments issued by the ICTY Appeals Chamber. In Furundžija, the Appeals Chamber inspired by the jurisprudence of the ECtHR, developed a set of conditions for testing impartiality. According to the Appeals Chamber:

‘A. A Judge is not impartial if it is shown that actual bias exists.

B. There is an unacceptable appearance of bias if:

